EPIC AND PHILOSOPHY: A MAP OF CORRESPONDENCES

The narrative correspondences between the seven kāṇḍas of the Rāmāyaṇa and the eighteen parvas of the Mahābhārata are recorded in the following tables according to the structure adopted for this novel. These comparisons are not meant to suggest that the modern characters are reincarnations of the ancient figures, or their equivalents in caste.

The Seven Kāṇḍas of the Rāmāyaṇa: The Narrative Journey

Kāṇḍa	Mahābhārata Parva	Chapters	Social and Narrative Journey
Bāla Kāṇḍa	1. Ādi	1–12	The emergence of names, lineage, the city's ancient river, and the first notice of death.
Ayodhyā Kāṇḍa	2. Sabhā	13–24	Home, rights, vows, and exile brought about by public humiliation.
Araṇya Kāṇḍa	3. Vana and 4. Virāṭa	25–48	Life outside the shelter; concealed identities; a re-education in labour and knowledge.
Kiṣkindhā Kāṇḍa	5. Udyoga	49–60	Unequal allies, broken promises, the search, and the first attempt at a pact.
Sundara Kāṇḍa	6. Bhīṣma, 7. Droṇa, and 8. Karṇa	61–96	Crossing the border to bring back evidence; the testing of a teacher's authority, birth, and messages.
Yuddha Kāṇḍa	9. Śalya, 10. Sauptika, and 11. Strī	97–132	Disaster amid cooperation, the losses of the night, and confronting the dead and those who remain alive.
Uttara Kāṇḍa	12. Śānti through 18. Svargārohaṇa	133–216	Responsibility, rehabilitation, homecoming, disintegration, and an unfinished future.

The Eighteen Parvas of the Mahābhārata: The Structure of 216 Chapters

Parva	Rāmāyaṇa Kāṇḍa	Chapters	Principal Narrative Thread
1. Ādi	Bāla Kāṇḍa	1–12	The register of names and the steps of the pond.
2. Sabhā	Ayodhyā Kāṇḍa	13–24	The assembly, privacy, and displacement.
3. Vana	Araṇya Kāṇḍa	25–36	Rumour, forest rights, and education.
4. Virāṭa	Araṇya Kāṇḍa	37–48	The register of labour and the measurement of structures.
5. Udyoga	Kiṣkindhā Kāṇḍa	49–60	Unequal alliances and an accounting of the benefits of water.

6. Bhīṣma	Sundara Kāṇḍa	61–72	Vows, warnings, and the hospital.
7. Droṇa	Sundara Kāṇḍa	73–84	Evidence, the murder of Mahesh, and journeys across the borderlands.
8. Karṇa	Sundara Kāṇḍa	85–96	A stage-by-stage answer concerning the twenty-seven names.
9. Śalya	Yuddha Kāṇḍa	97–108	Consent and the web of causes before the disaster.
10. Sauptika	Yuddha Kāṇḍa	109–120	The actual labour of rescue and the failure of structures.
11. Strī	Yuddha Kāṇḍa	121–132	Confirmed deaths and grief in the flesh.
12. Śānti	Uttara Kāṇḍa	133–144	Investigation, accountability, and governance.
13. Anuśāsana	Uttara Kāṇḍa	145–156	Documents of rights, the register of the ghats, and schools.
14. Aśvamedha	Uttara Kāṇḍa	157–168	Attribution of credit, measurement of water, and public compliance in rehabilitation.
15. Āśramavāsika	Uttara Kāṇḍa	169–180	Care of the elderly, love, and personal distance.
16. Mausala	Uttara Kāṇḍa	181–192	Memorials, new contracts, and the failings of reform.
17. Mahāprasthānika	Uttara Kāṇḍa	193–204	The safeguarding of memory, copies, and homecoming.
18. Svargārohaṇa	Uttara Kāṇḍa	205–216	The right to knowledge, names made public, and the life that remains.

A MAP OF PHILOSOPHICAL CORRESPONDENCES

In order to preserve the distinction between the original philosophical doctrines and their narrative application in the novel, the concepts, recurrences, and decisions of the plot associated with each of the three texts are shown separately.

Bhāmatī: Adhyāsa and the First Four Sūtras

Concept	Parvas / Recurrences	Narrative Application
Adhyāsa	Parvas 1 and 2; again 11 and 18	The error of taking a name for a body, a title for a character, and a register for the whole of a human being will be undone.

Athāto brahmajijñāsā	Parva 3; again 12	The right to inquire will reach beyond birth and title; Mrinal's question will change the teacher's reply.
Janmādyasya yataḥ	Parvas 5 and 9	The search for causes will not stop at a single culprit; nevertheless, individual responsibility for a particular crime will remain.
Śāstrayonitvāt	Parvas 7 and 14	The limits of evidence, the validity of knowledge, and written authority; due credit for domestic labour in the making of knowledge.
Tat tu samanvayāt	Parvas 8 and 18	The intended meaning of words spoken to one another will be examined; eliminating disagreement will not be taken for true harmonisation.

Nyāyakusumāñjali: The Five Stabakas

Stabaka	Philosophical Question	Principal Parvas and Consequences
First	The unseen (adṛṣṭa), otherworldly means, and the question of a conscious governing principle.	Parvas 3 and 5: in Udayana's temporal strand, a dispute over the fruits of action; in modernity, discipline in reasoning about unseen causes.
Second	The possibility of rites without God; the Mīmāṃsaka objection concerning the validity of knowledge.	Parvas 5 and 12: can collective work be accomplished without a chief? This modern question will enter into dialogue with the original dispute.
Third	Examination of the evidence said to refute the existence of God.	Parvas 6 and 7: distinctions between non-apprehension, non-establishment, and negation; the absence of a name does not establish the non-existence of a person.
Fourth	God as a knower, true cognition, and the reality of knowledge.	Parvas 8 and 14: claims made by an omniscient speaker, old and new knowledge, and a test of the reliability of institutions.
Fifth	Positive inference in support of God, and the responses to it.	Parvas 9, 12, and 18: Udayana's case will receive its full force, as will the opposing questions; disaster will not become cheap, conclusive proof of any doctrine.

Tattvacintāmaṇi: Divisions of Pramāṇa

Means of Knowledge	Narrative Application	Principal Parvas
Perception (pratyakṣa)	Illumination and distance in testimony, sense-contact and illusion; blindness must not be equated	1, 4, 6, and 13

	with the absence of all knowledge.
Inference (anumāna)	Pervasion (vyāpti), limiting conditions (upādhi), subjecthood (pakṣatā), reflective consideration (parāmarśa), and fallacies of reason (hetvābhāsa); merely seeing a vehicle carrying a consignment does not establish every offence.	4, 7, 9, and 12
Inference of God (īśvarānumāna)	Gangeśa's particular dispute over agency, power, and causation; the unbridgeable distance between reasoning and grief.	6, 9, 12, and 18
Comparison (upamāna)	Understanding the relation between name and object through resemblance; a similar face or a caste stereotype is not sufficient proof of identity.	3, 7, and 13
Verbal testimony (śabda)	Expectancy (ākāṅkṣā), semantic fitness (yogyatā), proximity (āsatti), and intention (tātparya); testimony, digital excision, silence, and translation.	2, 8, 14, and 17

A MAP OF CHARACTERS, LINEAGES, AND RELATIONSHIPS

Genealogical relationships are given only where the manuscript offers explicit evidence. Otherwise, the groups that follow are "narrative/social circles", not assertions of blood relationship. The original story maintains the distinctions between birth, upbringing, and communal association.

Documented Family Relationships

Relationship	Status Established in the Story
Sarita → Naira	Mother and daughter; Naira's death is irreversible.
Subhadra → Kabir	Direct testimony concerning birth mother and child; confirmation from the original birth record remains incomplete. The mother who raised him is a different person.
Shakuntala → granddaughter	A relationship across generations; the granddaughter's independent decision about her education.
Yusuf → son	Father and son differ in their choices of occupation.
Meera Banjara and her sister	They are sisters; each has independent rights concerning transport clients and her work.
Anupama Sen and her maternal grandmother	The grandmother's old private letters and the right to a shared copy.

Seven Principal Social and Narrative Circles

The Das Family and the Station

Characters: Sarita, Naira, Sanket, Fakira

Relationships and conflicts: The identification of living people; the struggle between names concealed for safety and the right to publish.

The Mishra Family and the School

Characters: Maithili, Ishan, Subhadra, Kabir

Relationships and conflicts: Recognition for philosophical work; the difference between being raised and being born into a family; dispossession of rights within the guise of protection.

Mallik and the Artisans' Quarter

Characters: Shyam, Tara, Lalit, Shakuntala

Relationships and conflicts: The price of craftsmanship, the measurement of drainage works, and the freedom of a new generation to choose its occupation.

The Weavers and Textile Trades

Characters: Yusuf, Parvati, Nasim, Urmila

Relationships and conflicts: Wages, confidentiality, the border, and allegations about an illicit consignment; disagreements between generations within the household.

Ruhani's Shelter and the Crossroads

Characters: Ruhani, Champa, Rukhsana

Relationships and conflicts: Protection, earnings, and self-determination; even the provider of shelter must learn to relinquish control.

The Itinerants and the River

Characters: Janaki, Hira, Devaki, and migrant families

Relationships and conflicts: The right to routes and movement; defence against rumour, and the admission of one's own mistakes.

Commerce and Medical Care

Characters: Devavrat, Aniruddha, Aditi

Relationships and conflicts: Profit, dependence upon medical treatment, and genuine service; crimes and responsibilities at different levels.

Ancient and Modern Narratives: Groups of Characters

Rāmāyaṇa: Birth and Home

Characters: Janaka, Sita, Urmila, Mandavi, Shrutakirti, Dasharatha, Kausalya, Kaikeyi, Sumitra, Manthara.

Relationships and conflicts: Birth, marriage, the labour of service, inheritance, and the cost of vows; Parvas 1–3 and 13.

Rāmāyaṇa: Exile and Companionship

Characters: Rama, Lakshmana, Bharata, Shatrughna, Guha, the boatman in the Kevat episode, Shabari, Ahalya, Anasuya, sages, and the unnamed workers of the hermitages.

Relationships and conflicts: Trust, the body, rights over the forest, and the conditions of shelter; Parvas 3–5, 12, and 15.

Rāmāyaṇa: The Search and the Adversaries

Characters: Sugriva, Vali, Tara, Angada, Hanuman, Jambavan, Sampati, Jatayu, Trijata, Mandodari, Vibhishana, Ravana, Kumbhakarna, Indrajit.

Relationships and conflicts: The failings of alliances, news, the adversary's family, and the cost of war; Parvas 5–11.

Rāmāyaṇa: After the War

Characters: Sita, Lava, Kusha, Bharata, Urmila, episodes associated with the textual tradition of Shambuka, and unnamed citizens.

Relationships and conflicts: Public opinion, the right to study, homecoming, and the right to tell a story; Parvas 12–18, with attention to textual variants.

Mahābhārata: Beginnings and Power

Characters: Satyavati, Ganga, Shantanu, Bhishma, Amba, Vyasa, Vidura, Dhritarashtra, Gandhari, Kunti, Madri.

Relationships and conflicts: River, lineage, vows, niyoga, state power, and women's decisions; Parvas 1, 2, 6, and 11.

Mahābhārata: Education and the Forest

Characters: Drona, Kripa, Ekalavya, Drupada, Shikhandi, Hidimba, Ghatotkacha, Ulupi, Chitrangada, the Nagas, and imagined supporting characters from forest communities.

Relationships and conflicts: Access to knowledge, the interests of the forest, marriage, and the unequal acceptance of lineages; Parvas 3–7.

Mahābhārata: Assembly and Negotiation

Characters: Yudhishthira, Bhima, Arjuna, Nakula, Sahadeva, Draupadi, Krishna, Subhadra, Duryodhana, Duhshasana, Shakuni, Vikarna, Yuyutsu.

Relationships and conflicts: Rights, play, silence, humiliation, conflicting understandings of dharma, and opportunities for peace; Parvas 2, 5, 8, and 9.

Mahābhārata: War and Birth

Characters: Karna, Radha, Adhiratha, Abhimanyu, Uttara, Ashwatthama, Kripa, Kritavarma, Shalya, Sanjaya.

Relationships and conflicts: Upbringing as greater than birth, the limits of warfare, violence at night, and the witness; Parvas 6–11.

Mahābhārata: The Life That Remains

Characters: Gandhari, Kunti, Draupadi, Uttara, Yuyutsu, Vidura, Parikshit, Janamejaya, Ugrashrava, Shaunaka, and the listeners.

Relationships and conflicts: The obligations of the living, authority over narration, the chain of vengeance, and the question of the final journey; Parvas 11–18.

Bhāmatī

Characters: Vachaspati Mishra; the voice of Shankara's commentary; Bhamati as inspired by popular legend; the fictional Mrinal and Lohana.

Relationships and conflicts: The genuine philosophical debate over adhyāsa and the first four sūtras, labour, inquiry, and co-authorship; Parvas 1, 3, 5, 7, 8, 14, and 18.

Nyāyakusumāñjali

Characters: Udayana; fictional speakers presenting Mīmāṃsaka, Buddhist, Cārvāka, and other opposing positions.

Relationships and conflicts: Full arguments and replies on the questions raised in the five stabakas; Parvas 3, 5–9, 12, and 18.

Tattvacintāmaṇi

Characters: Gangeśa; traditional and new opposing positions; the fictional Malati, Madhav, and the workers of the school.

Relationships and conflicts: The four divisions of pramāṇa, the distinct inference concerning God, and new questions that alter the examples; Parvas 1–9, 12–14, 17, and 18.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS: THEIR AGENCY AND DECISIONS

This list is drawn from the novel's register of characters. The ages given here are those recorded in the original register; they do not independently establish biological relationships.

Naira Das — 34

Goal: To restore the records and secure the right to her own labour.

Difficult decision: The hurried publication of the truth would compromise a witness's safety; she must subsequently acknowledge her mistake in public.

Sarita — 58

Goal: To establish proof that she is alive and win recognition for the work of a woman who was left out.

Difficult decision: To admit that the practice of changing names for protection was misused.

Sanket — 16

Goal: To have a means of communication of his own and receive technical education.

Difficult decision: To prevent his image and the material on his phone from being used without consent.

Fakira — 60

Goal: The right to earn a living, move freely, and receive healthcare.

Difficult decision: To refuse the pressure to describe an incident he has only heard about as one he witnessed.

Ruhani — 42

Goal: Safe shelter and respect within the community.

Difficult decision: To relinquish control over the decisions of those who depend upon her.

Champa — 36

Goal: Treatment for her mother, wages, and the freedom to pursue her love.

Difficult decision: Whether to surrender private information demanded in exchange for help.

Janaki — 39

Goal: The safety of an itinerant family.

Difficult decision: To admit an unrelated financial deception of her own while confronting a false accusation of child theft.

Yusuf — 49

Goal: The weaving business and his son's freedom to choose another path.

Difficult decision: To return a profitable consignment that is nevertheless illicit.

Parvati — 45

Goal: Recognition for her contribution to weaving; a livelihood distinct from Pavitra Patwa's work of knotting and threading.

Difficult decision: To resist the erasure of women's due share from collective demands.

Urmila — 41

Goal: Wages and the correction of the hospital's textile register.

Difficult decision: To give perilous testimony despite the needs of her family.

Tara — 24

Goal: Craftsmanship, the measurement of water, and shared control over records.

Difficult decision: To enter even her own family's old unlawful bargain into the record.

Lalit — 52

Goal: Safe construction and payment of the money owed.

Difficult decision: To refuse to sign a false bill under a contract.

Shakuntala — 63

Goal: Fair payment for work in clay and an education for her granddaughter.

Difficult decision: To change the family's old rules of inheritance.

Hira — 47

Goal: Recognition for waterways and the boatmen's methods of measurement.

Difficult decision: To disclose the true limits of danger to everyone and revise the rescue plan.

Aditi — 38

Goal: To improve the town's drainage.

Difficult decision: To withdraw her own earlier, erroneous report.

Kabir — 40

Goal: Legal assistance and the protection of the family that raised him.

Difficult decision: To turn documents concerning the secret of his birth into evidence.

Maithili — 61

Goal: Recognition for co-authorship of philosophical work.

Difficult decision: To acknowledge her part in suppressing recognition of Sarita's labour.

Ishan — 67

Goal: His school, scholarship, and reputation.

Difficult decision: Despite possessing genuine learning, not to defend himself against the charge of having appropriated another's credit.

Devavrat — 55

Goal: Commerce, lineage, and public influence.

Difficult decision: To open the warehouse in the final crisis and then struggle with the obligation to submit to investigation.

Aniruddha — 46

Goal: His hospital and the treatment of patients.

Difficult decision: To acknowledge his own role in irregularities in medical supplies.

Subhadra — 62

Goal: Authority over the story of her own life.

Difficult decision: To decide the price of making Kabir's birth public.

Rukhsana — 44

Goal: Financial independence for the kitchen.

Difficult decision: To reconcile the public expectation of free meals with fair payment for labour.

Padma — 32

Goal: To mediate communication through signs and to pursue her own teaching.

Difficult decision: To refuse to disappear into the role of an assistant, and to demand fees and recognition.

Mahesh Mandal — 50

Goal: To give testimony and secure his family's future.

Difficult decision: To bear the consequences of his identity becoming public before his safety has been assured.

157 OCCUPATIONS AND COMMUNITIES: CHARACTERS AND NARRATIVE CIRCLES

These 157 entries follow the order of the original register, not an alphabetical arrangement of the novel's characters or its social and occupational circles. Neither community nor occupation determines a character's nature by birth. The chapter numbers below indicate the principal episodes in which these figures appear; they must not be taken as evidence of genealogical relationship.

Chapter 1 · The Dead Person's Kitchen

In Videhapur, on that Ashadha morning, the news of Sarita's death arrived while she was searching a tin of rice for a prescription belonging to her dead husband. Her husband had died seventeen years before. The prescription was dated yesterday. And the notice that had appeared on her phone declared that Sarita herself was no longer alive.

The rice was boiling over on the stove. Sarita lowered the flame first, then set on the water she had kept beside the tongs. A person standing close to the fire knows what must be done immediately. But there is no stove to tell one when the news on a telephone must be attended to.

Bittu, a child from the neighbourhood, was reading the screen. He was in Class Two and still stumbled over conjunct letters. "Dea... th... no... tice," he sounded out, and looked up at Sarita's face. "Whose name is this?"

"Mine," said Sarita. "Reading the word 'dead' a second time won't change anything. Find your slippers and get ready for school."

Bittu laughed to himself, but held the laughter back. No one seemed to be allowed to laugh at the news of a death. He fell silent and picked up the pair of slippers, each a different colour, that lay in the corner. Outside, his mother was asking someone to return a milk vessel. The world was still conducting its small accounts.

Sarita's room stood behind the railway line. The trains could not be seen: between her room and the tracks lay a medicine warehouse, tin-roofed houses built all around a sealed-up pond, and a high wall. But she could tell by the sound whether a train was arriving or departing. Today the railway whistle offered her a kind of consolation: whatever is alive and moving has a voice.

She turned the phone face down on the cot. The notice gave a name, an age, an identification number and a date. The age was correct, the year of birth was correct; the date of death was two days before today. During those two days, in that very room, Sarita had gone to the market twice, cooked rice, wrung out clothes and rubbed oil into her knees in the evening. The telephone had asked for no proof of any of these acts.

"They even chose the date on which I was to die," she murmured. Then she took out a plate for herself and slid it towards the door, as though preparing to answer someone.

She found the creased paper in the rice tin. At the bottom was a blue printed emblem; above it were her husband's name and the stamp of the hospital's distribution centre. The medicines listed were three tablets and an injection. While her husband was alive, he had never received treatment for this illness. The time of dispensing was recorded as 5:12 yesterday evening. In small letters, at one corner of the prescription, were the printed words 'Medicine received'.

Sarita knew where her husband's death certificate was kept: in a brass box, among folded clothes, which she took out every year without reading it. In seventeen years she had been required to prove his death many times—first for a pension, then for a small share of land, then to change a name on the ration card. Each time the old grief had come with a new fee. Today she had no desire to open that box again.

On the back of the prescription, Sarita's name appeared in the space marked 'Next of kin'. On one piece of paper she was the living relative of a dead husband; on another she was dead herself. Both statements had been entered into the records of the same town, yet neither cancelled the other.

She stopped herself from putting the two records together. The notice of death was on her phone; the prescription lay at the bottom of the rice tin. It was as though the rice between them would prevent anyone from hastily joining one to the other.

Naira arrived eighteen minutes later. Her bag contained a charger, two dry rotis, a small notebook and a damaged hard drive. She had found work near the station salvaging copies of old records; even when she went half-fed, she never forgot a date on a fragile sheet of paper. At the doorway Naira looked first, not at the phone, but at her mother's face.

"Did you send for anyone else?"

"I sent for you. Bittu read it. He's gone to school."

"The prescription?"

"Wash your hands first. There's rice here."

"Mother, this is terribly urgent—"

"The news of a death can wait for the rice. The rice cannot wait for news of a death."

Despite herself, Naira smiled. Sarita spoke such sentences precisely in times of distress, leaving her listeners unable to decide whether to answer or remain silent. Naira washed her hands. There was scarcely any water left at the bottom of the bucket. Her mother called out, "I've kept fresh water for you. You can spare a little time to fetch some yourself, too."

Naira turned to look at her. What had sounded like a scolding in childhood had now become the reassuring voice of a house in which no one treated her as a workbench. She filled the water vessel and sat down on the cot.

When she opened the mobile phone, the notice bore the heading Municipal Life Records Service. Beneath it were the registration number of the death, the symbol of a digital signature and a link for an ‘Application to Correct Status’. Naira opened the page separately and preserved a screenshot bearing that precise time. There was an option to conceal the name and identification number before sending it to anyone, but she did not send the original screenshot beyond her own device.

The application’s first question was: What is the applicant’s relationship to the deceased? There were three choices: husband, son, authorised representative. No daughter. Naira turned the screen towards her mother. It was not that Sarita could not read; she read it, then asked, “Where am I in this?”

“Not on this list,” said Naira.

“Then correct their list first.”

“Before that, we have to save your life.”

Naira selected ‘Authorised representative’. The next field demanded the consent of the deceased. Her finger hung in the air for a moment. She photographed the sentence on the screen, but did not share it as a joke. Two days earlier, her mother’s identity had been terminated; now the same mother was being instructed to give her consent.

“Mother, will you show me the documents? Write me a statement saying you are here before me today.”

“What shall I write in this statement? That I am alive because I’m cooking rice?”

“Cooking rice isn’t proof. But the fact that someone has seen you can become evidence.”

“Then the person who sees me will need another piece of paper. Write it down. But don’t let my rice burn.”

In her notebook Naira entered the date, the time and what Sarita had said. Beside what she had witnessed with her own eyes she wrote ‘Direct observation’; beside what had come through the phone, ‘Information received’. She did not wish to turn the two into a single kind of evidence. This caution came from her profession, but for the first time it felt so difficult within her own home.

From the roadside came the wet rasp of someone clearing his throat. Fakira rested his walking stick beside the doorway. A damp cloth was tied around its tip so that the knocking would not trouble the station watchman. He remained at the door and asked, “May I come in? The children said some news had come about Sarita.”

"Come inside," said Sarita. "There's a bucket on the left. No ill omen will follow if you touch it."

Fakira found the edge of the bucket with his foot and moved on. The way through the house was familiar to him, but the things left by the doorway were forever changing. Sarita gave him a corner of the cot. As soon as he sat down, he said, "So we shall be eating rice cooked by a dead person again?"

"Will you make certain I'm dead before you eat?" asked Sarita.

"Not if they ask me. On a day when a living person serves you rice, who has the leisure to call her dead?" Fakira laughed. Naira's lips, too, curved into a smile, but within both their laughter she could hear her own terrible helplessness.

Fakira took an old pass, folded in two, from his cloth bag. Its corners had gone white with being unfolded so often. "They stopped me at the gate today. Said my voice wasn't in the new register, nor my name. Pass cancelled. If I come back, I must bring fresh permission."

"How long have you been passing through that gate?" Naira asked.

"I would say thirty years. The man at the gate would say he was seeing me for the first time. He wants receipts for thirty years. I need water today and enough time to catch my train."

He began to say his name for himself. "Listen. In one register someone wrote me down as 'Sai Fakir'; in another, 'Diwan'; in another, 'Madar'. Those are not all the same thing. My name is Fakira. Keep the account of the work I do in each place under the name of that work. Shoving all of us into some old column will not open my road."

Naira examined the pass. On one side were the hours during which he could pass through the railway square; on the other, the seal of the service centre and a date. Fakira did not want to name the person in charge who sometimes left water for him at the station. He wanted only to say that the pass had worked until yesterday, and today it did not.

"What exactly did the person who stopped you say today?" Naira asked.

"He said I wasn't in the register. He did not use the words 'You are dead'. People say someone has struck my name off. I want to keep what I've heard separate from what I've seen."

Naira remembered the notice about her mother. The same system, the same day, but no evidence that it was the same error. Above Fakira's statement she wrote 'Heard'. It was easy to declare one incident the cause of another; restraining oneself was harder.

"May I put your name before anyone?" Naira asked.

"Ask me again first. My livelihood isn't waiting for my name to appear in print. It's waiting for the road to be opened."

He put the pass back in his pocket. Tucked into it was a small receipt, the account of the coins he had paid for tea at the station that morning. Fakira showed it with a little smile. "The tea seller still refused me credit today. To him, I seem to be alive."

Sarita served rice on three plates. Fakira asked how the fish tasted. "Fried potatoes today," Sarita said. "These days the river is bringing up more papers than fish." Fakira replied that potatoes, at least, did not ask for water; they could be boiled in whatever happened to be lying by the stove. Sarita accepted this science of his.

Naira was about to take her first mouthful when she noticed the sign that the correction page on her phone was closing. The deadline for applying was that evening. On another page was the receipt for medicines issued in the dead man's name; it carried a different application number. Naira wrote down both numbers. It might be coincidence, or it might be conspiracy; what the evidence showed for now was merely two separate transactions.

"Someone has collected these medicines," Naira said. "It isn't just that a prescription was made. The time of dispensing has been recorded."

"Who collected them?" Sarita asked.

"There's no name on this copy. We'll have to request the receipt register from the centre."

"Then write this: my husband could not have collected the medicines. Someone is declaring his living wife dead. Those are two separate matters. Otherwise they'll turn them all into papers for the same quarrel."

Naira paused as she wrote down her mother's words. Sarita did not know the cause of the errors, but she understood their consequences. If her husband continued to be recognised as dead, she was entitled to a widow's rights; restoring him to life on paper might efface the history of his actual death. If she herself remained declared dead, the rice for her kitchen, her medical registration, every claim upon her home could be called into question. A reversal on paper descends first upon the means of living.

Naira stepped outside and placed a call, almost soundlessly. The help centre's automated voice first recited the language options. When she selected Maithili, the response said, "The identity of the authorised applicant has not been established." She noted down the helpline number. On a second attempt, the request was registered, but no time was given for its resolution.

Daylight was growing beyond the doorway. On the other side of the warehouse wall, water lay stagnant. The monsoon had not fully begun, yet water had already acquired the habit of standing still in one place.

Schoolchildren on the narrow path were circling around it. Naira did not yet invent a story about some unknown drain. First there was the wet soil she had seen; the cause of it was a matter for investigation another day.

When she went back inside, she saw that Sarita had taken the old death certificate out of its brass box. Her hands did not tremble as she unfolded it, but a yellowed flower petal was caught in the crease. Sarita lifted it onto her palm, then returned it to the box. Naira asked nothing.

“Make a copy of this document,” Sarita said. “The original stays with me. What you’ve taken onto your phone, keep it layer by layer. And don’t send our address everywhere.”

“But a moment ago you were telling me to correct the list.”

“Correcting a thing and showing it to everybody are two different matters. First see what you need to see. You can show it to the world afterwards.”

Naira could not tell whether she liked that answer. Her contract work consisted of opening up other people’s old writings; for many years her mother’s work had also included keeping certain names buried. A line was being drawn between the two kinds of labour in the same house.

Fakira finished his plate and lifted his stick. “I have to catch the midday train from the station. The road is closed, but time hasn’t stopped. I’ll tell you this evening whom I managed to speak to.” Naira wanted to stop him, then heard the decision in his voice and remained silent. She asked permission to make a photocopy of the receipt, and recorded only the time and seal.

At the doorway Fakira laughed. “Auntie, how am I to enter the price of the rice I ate in your house? If I write it in the name of the dead, I’ll never get clear of the debt.”

“Write it in the name of the living,” said Sarita. “And after you’ve eaten, you can still feel your body, can’t you?”

“Oh, very much so,” Fakira said. This time the tip of his stick gave a faint ringing knock. Measuring the path before him, he went on his way.

Naira saved the image of the death notice and the copy of the prescription in two separate, secure folders. She named the first ‘Mother—Alive and Present’; the second, ‘Father’s Medicines—Verification of Receipt’. She recorded their dates separately. Fakira’s testimony remained in a third note, which she did not treat as an explanation of either of the first two documents.

From under the cot Sarita brought out a sheet of paper wrapped in an old cloth and turned it over in her palm. “There’s something I must tell you tomorrow,” she said. “Some names are such that, even while correcting them, you must protect the people who bear them.”

Naira did not reach for the paper. “Today, your name first.”

"Yes," said Sarita. "But my name isn't caught in this alone."

The midday train whistled again. The pot of rice was empty, save for a little stuck to its bottom. Sarita poured water into it so that washing it in the evening would be easier. On her screen Naira saw the message 'Application received'. Only this much was certain: the question had been entered into the record. An official answer confirming that Sarita was alive had still not arrived.

Yet there was fire in the stove, a vessel of water in the house, and the work of cooking again that evening. As Sarita put the pot away, she said, "If they tell you again that I have died, ask them—who is going to account for this rice?"

Chapter 2 · Twenty-Seven Names

On the second dawn of Ashadha, when Naira woke, the kitchen door stood half open. Inside, Sarita was drying paper, not rice. Two drops of rain blown through the window during the night had fallen on the wooden platform. Sarita had spread out an old newspaper and laid a folded sheet upon it. At each of its four corners she had placed a small brass bowl upside down, to keep the paper from blowing away.

"Has water got into it?" Naira asked.

"Into the cloth on top. The writing is safe."

Naira remained standing in the doorway. Yesterday her mother had said she would speak today. Today, before anything else, Sarita was saving the paper.

"Will you have tea, or examine this first?" Sarita asked.

"You have your tea first."

"But you are always in such a hurry to understand everything at once."

Naira smiled. Sarita did not accept the smile as an answer. She measured water from the lota and set it on the fire; twice, while crushing the ginger, she stopped her hand. The firewood was damp. In the ordinary delay of that household task, Naira found herself able to hold back, a little, the questions rising inside her.

When the tea was ready, Sarita lifted the bowls from the sheet. One part of the paper was the colour of wheat; another had been blackened by smoke. It bore three fold marks. There was no official heading on the first line, only writing in Sarita's own hand: twenty-seven personal names, with small marks beside some of them. Four names had been written in different ink. Here a date, there a question mark, elsewhere a blank space. At the last fold Sarita had placed a separate little slip of paper, tying it in place with thread.

"Where did this come from?" Naira asked.

"I wrote it. Not all on one day."

"At whose request?"

"At my own, to begin with. Later, at the request of each person who said no one had listened to what they had to say."

Naira reached to lift the sheet. Sarita interposed a warning: "Do not open that fold."

"Why?"

"There is a name there. I shall tell you when you have the right to read it. For now, no one has the right to print it."

"How am I to investigate without reading the name?"

"Begin with twenty-six names. Your eyes will not close merely because you have not read one."

Naira felt this was unfair. She worked with old records, and in her line of work a sheet whose one line had been covered with cloth seemed scarcely worth examining at all. But she looked at her mother's face. Sarita was not eager to impart a secret. She had already decided that, to protect someone, she would endure even her daughter's mistrust.

"The original will stay with you?"

"Yes. I shall give you a copy. But the fold will remain closed."

Naira laid both hands upon the platform. "I agree. Provided you write in your own hand, in the margin, that this part has been kept closed at your request."

Sarita put down her tea. "What difference will writing that make?"

"If tomorrow someone asks whether I hid the name of my own accord, I can say whose decision it was. And if you wish to change your decision, that too will be on record."

Sarita considered this for a moment. Then, on the blank reverse of the sheet, she wrote: 'The final fold has been kept closed at my request. No decision has yet been taken to open it.' Beneath this she entered the date and signed her name. Naira watched her. Yesterday other people had been demanding proof that this woman was alive; today she was herself putting proof of her own will into writing.

"Are all twenty-seven people on this list dead?" Naira asked.

"No."

"Are all their documents wrong?"

"No. Some documents are correct, but have been put to the wrong use. Some names are right, but the relationships given are wrong. Some people have changed their own names. Some have had their names written down by others without being asked."

"Then this is not a register of deaths?"

"I own no register. This is an account of work that could not be completed."

The tea was growing cold. One by one, Naira examined the first twenty-six names. Their significance did not unfold to her all at once; a sheet of paper was not, in itself, the story of a person's life. She asked her mother what the marks meant. A small circle had been drawn where Sarita had received information; a double line, where someone had requested a correction. A line struck through an entry did not mean that the correction had been completed. Indeed, that was precisely what was in dispute.

"Why has a line been drawn through this name?"

"I was told the case had been closed. But the woman who came seeking the correction received not a single document. So I put a question mark beside the crossed-out line."

"Did you send her name again, then?"

"Not that day. The office had closed. The following week I was not allowed to go in."

"Did someone stop you?"

"The man who stood at the door said there were orders. The person who could show me the order was in another room, but he did not have the key to it. I never clearly understood who was stopping me. So do not write down anyone's name as the person to blame."

This caution of Sarita's astonished Naira. For years her work had taught her to preserve evidence and keep inference separate. Her mother had learned the same lesson without naming it, without training, amid the struggle for a livelihood and the humiliations of everyday life.

Outside, the morning rain was dripping from the tin awning. Bittu's voice came from the neighbouring house: he could not find his school exercise book. From beneath the platform Sarita took the pencil he had left there the day before and set it by the door. "Tell him he left his own thing here last night. But don't write it in my name that I am teaching him."

Naira burst out laughing. "Everything is about names today."

"Because people who write down names forget to write down the work."

A small, old receipt had been tucked into the middle of the sheet. It recorded no sum of money, only a time of entry and a serial number. Its corners were worn. Naira asked, "Have you kept this?"

"Yes. A man came for three days trying to have his name heard. On the fourth day he was allowed in. This proves no more than that he entered that day. Whether anyone listened to him, the receipt cannot tell us."

Naira asked permission to photograph it. Sarita said, "Copy the name and number into my notebook. Do not separate the original receipt from this sheet." Naira wrote them down. Then she began transcribing the meanings of the marks, each on its own line in her notebook. Beside what she understood she wrote 'Sarita's statement'. What she did not understand she left blank.

"How old is this sheet?"

"The first writing is old. I added the last four names recently. The dates were never all recorded in one place. Your task now is to establish that chronology."

"And yours?"

"Not to sell, without asking them, the confidence of those to whom I have given my word."

Naira looked at the sheet again. In the course of her contract work she had opened many records to public scrutiny. Where an office had concealed them, making them public usually seemed the proper course. Yet this sheet might also contain a path into the innermost rooms of someone's home. When a government's wrongdoing and a frightened person's privacy are written on the same paper, the manner of disclosure has to change.

By noon Naira had checked the lettering of all twenty-six entries. In three places the same name had been spelled differently. Sarita supplied no evidence that would justify identifying those spellings as one and the same person. In one entry the word denoting a family relationship had been crossed out, though the original name remained intact. The one firm conclusion was that the paper was not a list of criminals, but an account of errors of several kinds and of corrections that had been held up. Even this conclusion, however, rested on Sarita's words and writing. Verification against outside registers had yet to be undertaken.

As she prepared the midday meal, Sarita saw there was little oil left in the pan. "We'll need to fetch oil this evening."

"I'll bring it. Aren't you going to the hospital?" Naira asked.

"I must go to notify them that I am alive, or they will close my old account for medicines. But you must examine the medicines printed on that prescription. Don't make those two matters into one again."

Naira agreed. Instead of attaching the photograph of her father's prescription to her mother's sheet, she placed it in a separate folder. She made a third folder for the list, naming it by the date alone, not after any person on it. On her phone she disabled the facility that could automatically share someone's home address or identification number.

Rising from the stove, Sarita looked at the imprint left upon her hands. "Do you remember drawing a red flower in my account book when you were little?"

"And you wouldn't give me a pen for three days afterwards."

"I didn't give you the pen, but I gave you rice to eat."

"Was there a name hidden beneath the flower?"

"No. It was a flower, that's all. Not every old mark is a mystery."

Naira laughed, and the fear within her loosened a little. To search for a clue in everything her mother said was another kind of injustice, not unlike the one from which she wanted to rescue her mother's writing. For a while the two of them quarrelled over whether the vegetables needed more or less salt. Sarita said that anything fried by Naira would smell of investigation rather than fenugreek; Naira replied that evidence needed salt as well. Through their laughter, life returned by its ancient right.

In the middle of the meal Sanket appeared at the door. Sixteen-year-old Sanket carried two different casings from old mobile phones and a small screwdriver. Yesterday he had told Sarita he would replace the button on her broken phone; today he had brought a button of the right size. He did not ask whose death notice had reached the house. First he opened the phone's back cover and laid it on the table. Then he said, "This button will work, but fitting it won't bring back the old photographs. The pictures will have to be saved separately."

Naira watched him at work. "Do you keep things stored in a broken phone?"

"What is mine, yes. Having somebody else's phone in my hand doesn't make its photographs mine," Sanket said, turning the screwdriver. "Yesterday at school they sent a group photograph to everybody. The number written on the back of my book was visible too. I told them to remove it. They said everyone was forwarding the picture. So I asked: does everybody doing a thing make it right?"

Sarita laughed. "There will be no holiday for your teacher if you go on arguing like that."

"I don't want a holiday. I only want them to crop out that part of the photograph and send it again."

Naira glanced towards her copy. She did not ask Sanket to open any part of the sheet. She asked only what one ought to do to conceal a name in a photograph of a document. Sanket said, "Cover the part you don't want anyone to see before you take the picture. If you black it out afterwards, who knows where an earlier copy might still be?"

He fitted the button and gave the phone back. Sarita offered him tea in return for his work, but Sanket said it was time for school. He could not stay for tea; tomorrow he would have some hot milk sweetened with jaggery. Sarita agreed without insisting. After he had gone, Naira looked at the folded sheet. There had been no inspection of any copy, no disclosure of anyone's secret: only a boy's dissent over his own photograph, left behind in the house.

After the meal Sarita folded the original sheet once more. She tied the little slip concealing the final name with fresh thread. Naira wanted to photograph it, but Sarita refused. Her daughter made a copy instead: twenty-six visible names, the marks accompanying them, and a blank space for the twenty-seventh. On the reverse of the copy she recorded that the original was in Sarita's possession and that the final name was confidential at her express instruction. Both of them entered the date; what Sarita had said aloud, Naira recorded beneath her own signature as 'Statement heard'.

"Who will see it?" Sarita asked.

"For now, I shall. If I need to check something with someone, I shall cover the names and ask the question. Without your permission I shall not send anyone a photograph of the original."

"And if keeping that name closed causes an innocent person to be accused?"

Naira fell silent. For the first time Sarita herself had raised a question against the rule she had made.

"Then I shall have to come back to you," Sarita said. "Sometimes secrecy is protection. But we cannot make it a sacred duty for all eternity."

Naira did not immediately assent. She said only, "If the investigation reveals that someone may be harmed, I shall tell you first. And I shall accuse no one without evidence."

Beyond the window, water had gathered against the wall of the railway warehouse. Two children were sailing paper boats upon it. One boat quickly sank; the other wheeled around towards the wall. Sarita shut the window. "The water isn't deep there, but there is glass at the bottom. Tell the children to keep their shoes on when they play." Naira went outside and told them. She noticed then that one trickle of water was running towards the wall, but she could see no way for it to flow out. She drew no conclusion about its cause; she merely resolved to examine the place when she had the chance.

When she returned, the phone rang. An unfamiliar number. Naira said 'Hello' in her ordinary voice. At first she heard a distant sound like a train whistle. Then a man's voice asked, "Has the paper reached you?"

"Who are you?"

"It has reached the person who was meant to know. Tell Sarita that if the twenty-seventh name is uncovered, it won't take long to put out the fire in her kitchen. You two should be careful which roads you take."

"Do you know my name? Why do you think it necessary to threaten us?"

There was silence at the other end for several moments. Then the voice said, "If you have any sense, don't send those names." The call ended.

Naira immediately wrote down the time. She recorded exactly the words she had heard. She looked at the number again: no name appeared on the phone. The identity of the voice, its location, its purpose—none of these was certain. One look at her daughter's face was enough for Sarita to know that something had gone wrong.

"Whose call was it?"

Naira repeated the words verbatim. Sarita did not interrupt.

"Do you recognise him?"

"Not by his voice. I understand one thing: someone knows about the paper. Who that someone is remains to be discovered."

"I shall inform the police," Naira said. "The exact words of the threat. Not your sheet."

"I won't stop you," Sarita replied. "But keep a secure copy of my application to be recognised as alive, in my own name. If tomorrow someone says the person who received the threat is dead, I don't want to have to point to the kitchen all over again."

For the first time Naira saw her mother's fear plainly. It arose less from the unknown man's voice outside the house than from the dread that someone within the world of documents might erase her living existence once again. Naira sat beside the stove and took her mother's hand. There was no official category for that touch, yet in that instant her own decision changed: she would not abandon the investigation; she would not rush to publish; and she would record the threat as a separate offence.

Picking up the bag in which they would bring home the evening oil, Sarita said, "Tomorrow Fakira will bring news from the station. Don't attach him to this sheet unless there is a reason arising from his own account."

"I won't," Naira said. "His gate pass and your list are two separate matters."

Sarita placed the original sheet in the brass box. She did not yet close the lid completely: first she straightened the flower petal inside. Naira did not draw so much as a question mark in the final blank space of her copy. The count of twenty-seven names was complete, but she possessed only twenty-six of them. She recorded that absence as a lack of evidence, not as evidence of guilt.

Outside, a train went by. Water still lay motionless beside the wall. In the house the evening fire was lit, and Naira understood that protecting this sheet was not merely a matter of hiding the sheet itself. It was the beginning of the difficult work of restoring to those whose names were written there the right to their own lives.

Chapter 3 · Time at the Crossroads

The tea seller at the railway crossroads was taking the kettle off the fire for the third time, but Fakira had yet to lift his glass. After the first train of the morning had gone, a silence descended upon the crossroads. At first it seemed empty; then, little by little, the sounds of people's work became audible within that emptiness—the wicker of a basket shifting, a wheel freeing itself from the mud, the lid of a milk can rattling. Amid all these sounds Fakira pieced together the route of his day. Today one sound was missing. The iron chain hanging across the railway service gate had not been unfastened since the night before.

"How much sugar in your tea?" the shopkeeper asked.

"As much as comes at the price. But tell me the price first."

"Back to your accounts again today, are you?"

"It's because you keep your accounts straight that I ask you. A man who doesn't keep them straight holds out his palm without asking."

The shopkeeper laughed. Fakira counted out two coins. He paid for the first glass of tea but did not reach for a second. His daily earnings came from three kinds of work: telling strangers at the crossroads when their buses would leave, receiving payment for carrying someone's bundle, and sometimes asking an acquaintance for help. He did not put all three under the same name. Begging was no disgrace to him; but neither would he allow money earned by labour to be called charity and struck from the accounts.

An old timetable of his own making was pinned to a bamboo post outside the shop. The early train, the first bus to the market, the boat across the Tilwah, the small vehicle bound for the hospital—he had had all their times written on the sheet in large letters. Some dates were crossed out; others had been altered. Today a new question would have to be inserted between two times on that old timetable: when would the service gate open?

Yesterday's lost earnings were perfectly clear in his reckoning. He had been due five coins for carrying the sacks of a family arriving by the midday train; but when the train was missed, the family took another road on its own. What angered him was not that they had failed to wait. It was that the people who shut the gate said, "You sit about at the crossroads doing nothing." Sitting there was itself part of his work. The person who explained to strangers where to change vehicles was not an employee of any particular shop; and when someone mistakenly set off towards the hospital instead of the river, half a day could be lost.

Outside the tea stall that morning, a young man stood anxiously holding his mother's hand. He was asking the way to the market across the river, yet kept repeating the train's name in a loud voice. Fakira asked him, "Are you going to the market, or to the platform?" "The market, but from the railway crossroads," the young man answered. Fakira described the route: the grain warehouse at the turn, the intersection beyond it, and then a wait for Hira's boat at the water's edge. He made it clear that the water was rising and the timing might change. Delighted, the young man held out a coin. Fakira accepted it and said, "Don't let go of her hand. The steps down are wet." The young man tightened his grasp on his mother's hand. Fakira knew the routes people travelled, but how difficult it was for someone else to travel them he still had to learn from the bodies of others.

The movements of arriving passengers, the speech of different neighbourhoods, and the inexpensive ways people measured time changed daily at that crossroads. Some addressed Fakira by his proper name; others substituted four designations from the community register for that single name. Sometimes he grew tired of arguing; sometimes he dismissed the matter with a laugh. But when his entry pass was prepared, he himself had said, "Write just one name." Once the paper was issued, he had thought his passage secure. Today, without that piece of paper, the gate no longer recognised the person he was.

The previous day Fakira had gone to catch the midday train. The watchman had told him he could not enter. After making two journeys there and back by evening, Fakira had finally returned home along the rough river path. He had been unable to bring Sarita the news he had promised her. His knee ached so badly in the night that he could scarcely move the blanket away from his leg. This morning he had fulfilled his promise and returned to the crossroads.

A new guard sat at the service gate. At the sight of Fakira's walking stick he said, "Baba, not that way. It's forbidden again today."

"Until what time?"

"Ask the administration."

"Where has the administration hung up its clock?"

The guard grew a little irritated. "The pass isn't valid. If you want to get in, pay the facilitation fee."

"How much?"

The guard named a sum. Fakira made no move to take out his coins. "A receipt?"

"Who takes a receipt for such a small matter?"

"The sum may be small. The road is not. May I write down your name?"

Instead of giving his name, the guard pointed towards a window beside the gate. Fakira committed to memory his voice, the location of the window, and the time. He was not calling anyone a thief. It remained to be established whether the unreceipted payment demanded of him was an official entry charge or someone's private demand.

There was a long queue at the window. Some had come for permission to load railway sacks, others for a way through with baskets of fish, and still others to ask the time of a vehicle for patients. Fakira took his place at the very end. The woman ahead of him lifted her child from her hip and put yellow slippers on his feet. The child reached towards Fakira's stick. "Why hasn't this stick got a bell?" he asked.

"If it had a bell, people would listen to that instead of listening to me," said Fakira. The child laughed, and so did his mother. The queue moved one step forward.

The clerk behind the window placed the old pass before his machine. He entered the number once, then asked Fakira's name. "Fakira," came the reply.

"Any other name?"

"Read out what is written in my identity record."

"Three names come up here. One has Sai before it, another Diwan, another Madar."

"Don't turn three names into one man. Match the number on the document that belongs to me. I've already told you my name."

The clerk sent to another window for an old register. Fakira kept his palm upon the wooden ledge. At last a voice came from within: "The travel authorisation associated with this number is inactive. The linked life-register entry records the person as deceased."

Fakira asked first for something on paper. The clerk pointed towards the screen. "Baba, it's written here."

"I won't be able to read it merely because you show it to me. I've heard you read it aloud. Now, if you write it on paper, I can show it somewhere else."

The clerk was silent for a moment. The queue outside was growing. He took out a small slip and wrote down the travel-authorisation number, its current status, and the time of the inquiry at the window. Fakira spoke again: "Write that it says 'deceased' as well. Tomorrow someone may say you were speaking only of the pass's expiry date." The clerk added that word too, but wrote beneath it: 'Verification of original entry pending.'

When the slip was placed in his hand, Fakira did not fold it. “Whether I am alive cannot be settled at this window. But if the error begins here, I now have its location in writing.”

“The way across isn't closed altogether,” said the clerk. “Keep going around by the riverside.”

“How long does that take?”

“I don't know.”

“Then how does that become an equivalent road for me? Will anyone put the distance my legs must travel, the passenger's train, and the hours of my earnings into any of these papers?”

The clerk did not answer. But at Fakira's insistence he recorded the time of the application and gave him a reference number. For the first time, the complaint passed from a voice outside the window into a register inside it. This did not reopen the gate, but it would now be harder to deny that a complaint had been made.

Before noon Fakira went down towards the Tilwah. There was an uproar along the riverbank. Two men with baskets of fish stood near a boat, while several passengers pressed to be taken across at once. Hira the boatman was bent over the stern, lowering a long bamboo pole into the water. Different colours marked the places near its knots; the colours were not decoration, but a way of remembering his own measurements.

“Hira, you're late calling out today,” Fakira said.

“First I listen to the water,” Hira replied. “The force of the current upstream isn't what it was yesterday. Push the boat off too soon and we'll regret it in midstream.”

Fakira rested his stick on a dry strip of bank. Hira plunged the pole into three places. At the first, he reached the bottom quickly; at the second, the depth increased suddenly; at the third, there was a sound of something shifting. He tested it again. “The earth has slipped here,” he said, “but I won't judge the depth from the sound alone. I'll steer the boat according to what the pole tells me.”

“How old is your pole?” a passenger asked.

“Age doesn't make a thing accurate,” Hira said. “I checked the coloured markings again yesterday. But the current has changed today.”

People were insisting that two sacks piled on the bank be taken aboard. Hira had one of them removed. “Not that much weight on this crossing,” he said plainly. “The man who reaches the other bank keeps his earnings. If he falls into the water, the price of his goods won't bring his body back.” The owner grumbled but set half his load aside. Once the boat was moving, the water did not flow at one pace along both banks. From a distance the eddies downstream looked smooth; but where they lay, Hira slowed his oar.

Beside the river every kind of work kept a different clock. For baskets of fish, the first crossing at dawn was valuable; those bound for their fields needed to be across before the sun climbed high; and for a patient even the last boat of the evening could sometimes be too late. The boatman could not be the keeper of everyone's time. Yet it was he who had to decide when a crossing was safe. A woman carefully lowered her covered basket and asked Hira, “I'm losing the hours when I can sell. Why hasn't another boat been arranged?” Hira said, “I'll call its owner. But he'll have to examine this altered depth as well.”

Looking towards Fakira, the woman said, “Every day we arrive late, and then the buyers at the market say, ‘Lower your price.’ We aren't the ones making ourselves late. Who is going to account for the time we lose at the landing?” For the first time, Fakira considered that question beyond the limits of his own case. He always recorded the hours of his lost earnings, but there was no shared reckoning of the time others spent waiting at the river. “Get together one day and write down how many times the boat was held back, and why,” he said. “We can't abolish the time needed for safety checks, but we can demand an account of unnecessary delays imposed at the landing.” The woman answered, “The buyer will refuse even to look at our written account.” Hira had been listening. He agreed to record departure times for the boat, but fixing the market price was beyond his authority.

Nearby a small boy was drawing a boat in the sand with a stick. He traced a track around all four sides and announced, “This is the railway and this is the water. They'll run together.” Fakira did not drag his stick across the lines the boy had made. He merely told him that the reckoning of a toy boat could not be used when boarding a real one. The boy laughed and rubbed out his lines. When the water crept up to the edge, the sandy track broke apart of its own accord. Fakira did not treat the sight as an omen. A child had made and unmade his game; there was nothing extraordinary in that small freedom of the day.

Fakira did not cross yet. He waited for Hira to return. An elderly woman had been seated towards the rear on the first crossing; she needed to fetch medicine from the railway crossroads. Fakira told her that the inner service gate was closed. The river route was open, but taking the long way round would take time. He gave her no fixed duration, for he had not yet measured the route himself. “Son,” she said, “sometimes time itself is medicine.” Fakira listened but offered no reassurance he could not justify.

When Hira returned, Fakira boarded his boat. Placing a hand upon its side, he felt a smooth join in the old wood. “Lalit's repair?” he asked.

“No. That's an old strip I had fitted myself. Lalit will inspect the forward planking next week,” Hira replied. “Not every join is the work of the same hand.”

Fakira laughed. “Just as the records decided all the names belonged to one man.”

“What has happened?”

“One window says I'm dead. Yet your boat is still asking me for the fare.”

Startled, Hira looked at him. “Something wrong with the pass?”

“Yesterday all I knew was that the pass had been blocked. Today I have a paper saying that the linked life-register entry marks me as dead. I still don't know how the error was made.”

Hira asked no more questions than he needed to. He said his old ledger, in which he kept the times of people arriving at and leaving the landing, recorded many of Fakira's journeys. But that ledger could not correct an entry in the life register. “I'll testify to your crossings,” he said, “but only to those I actually saw. I won't swear to the days I didn't see you.”

Fakira nodded with satisfaction. “That's all I ask.”

After disembarking on the far bank, they stood together for a little while. Hira pointed out a fresh place where the river had eaten into the shore. Fakira touched the soft ground with the tip of his stick. Earth that had been firm yesterday sank today under the weight of a foot. Someone had driven a bamboo pole into one part of the bank to mark a landing; on the other side an old footpath had disappeared beneath the water. Fakira asked whether the pole marked a public place to disembark or the boundary of someone's private lease. “Different people say different things,” Hira replied. “We'll have to see a copy of the records.” Neither of them pulled out the pole.

The driver of a small vehicle approaching from the village recognised Fakira and sounded his horn. Fakira counted the stages: the walk to the river, the wait for the boat, the climb up the far bank, and the remaining distance to the vehicle. What he had lived through today was not a matter of clock time alone; it involved legs and risk as well. He decided against writing ‘alternative route available’ in his timetable. A road that was available was not available in the same way to everyone.

When the midday heat had begun to abate, Naira met him at the crossroads. Fakira began by saying that he had been unable to keep yesterday's promise. Naira saw the new slip in his hand. “Have they marked you dead under your own name?”

“The clerk at the window read it out, then wrote it on this copy. I won't claim to have seen the record with my own eyes.”

With his permission Naira read the slip. The wording of the original status, the application reference number, and the time were clear. “May I copy this?” she asked.

“Copy it. But keep the times of my journeys and the matter of my complaint. My name isn't a key for joining up every register.”

Naira noted the document number. It differed from the reference number on Sarita's death notification, and the service gate's travel register was yet another record. It would have been easy, on seeing the same word ‘deceased’, to regard the two cases as threads of a single crime. Instead she wrote clearly in her notebook: ‘Fakira's travel authorisation; Sarita's life notification; connection unverified.’

“Will you come to the centre with me?” Naira asked.

“I can. But first, write down what I have to say.”

Naira opened her notebook. Fakira recounted as four distinct incidents the refusal he had heard the previous day, today's demand for money without a receipt, the word ‘deceased’ read out at the window, and the journeys Hira had witnessed. Whenever the question of guessing the guard's intentions arose, he stopped himself. “For now, write down what he demanded, not the name of an offence.” Naira headed his account ‘Fakira's testimony’; she recorded separately the details of the new slip she had seen herself.

They went to the service centre together. A different clerk was at the window. He examined the number on the slip. Fakira did not plead. He reckoned up what the journeys had cost him. “Yesterday I missed the midday train. Today I've crossed the river twice. I was asked for money without a receipt. If your rules have changed, give me that in writing. If there is an error in my record, give me a date when it will be corrected.”

The clerk turned through the file and issued a provisional inquiry slip. It neither changed Fakira's recorded status as dead nor automatically reopened the railway's inner service gate. But it stated a date for a further hearing and named the officer responsible for alternative entry. Fakira asked Naira to read it aloud. “Does it say anywhere here that I must give up my livelihood and sit at home?” he asked. Naira said, “No.” “Then tomorrow I'll be back at the crossroads at my usual hour.”

That evening, at the tea stall, Fakira added a line beneath his old timetable: ‘Service gate: authorisation disputed; river route: ask about current and load before crossing.’ He did not put his name beside it, for the timetable was there for every traveller's use. As he poured the tea, the shopkeeper said, “So now even Baba's death has come with a receipt!”

“No,” Fakira laughed. “I've got a receipt for having been written down as dead. I still have to pay my fare to stay alive.”

The warmth of the glass spread through his fingers. Across the crossroads people were setting off along their separate roads. On the far side of the river, Hira's boat was drawing in to the bank again; from the tracks rose the sound of the approaching train. Fakira counted his coins, paid for his tea, and straightened the time of tomorrow's first train on the bamboo post outside the shop. His complaint had not yet been answered, but he had not decided to surrender the hours of his life to someone else's mercy.

Chapter 4 · The River's First Home

In the ancient days of Hastinapura, before the morning boat set out from the Yamuna landing, Satyavati would open the baskets of fish belonging to her father and inspect them. The fish kept in cold water overnight looked fresh at the top, but two had spoiled in the pile beneath. She set them apart. The price of raw fish should be determined not by the brightness of its eyes but by the actual condition of its flesh: her father had taught her that when she was a child.

Seated on the bank, her father moved small wooden counters back and forth. Each counter stood for a reckoning: repairs to the nets, the boatman's share, payment to the carrier who took the catch to market, and grain for the household. The boat was the family's means of livelihood, but the river was not their inheritance. When the water fell, the landing shifted; when the current grew fierce, a day's consignment was lost; and when the king's men came to be ferried, ordinary passengers had to wait. Her father did not know the names of all who waited. Their lost earnings, however, found no place among his counters.

Satyavati examined the knots of a net set aside for her younger brother. He had cut his finger the night before; a knot tightened with an injured hand might tear the mesh. She repaired the broken join herself, yet entered the full share of the work against her brother's name. Her father had once said there was no question of counting wages separately for work done within a family. Satyavati had replied, "Today I mend the net; tomorrow he will row the boat. If the work is done and no name is kept beside it, who will remember whose work it was?" Her brother had found in those words not pride but a small assurance. Today he showed her the bandage on his finger and gave a wry little smile. Even in a household to which a proposal of marriage had come, its smaller lives had not surrendered their own rhythms.

"Is the boat to make the crossing today?" Satyavati asked.

"Take the market people over first. Then we have word that the king's people wish to speak again."

Satyavati put the lid on the fish basket. She remembered Shantanu's first arrival: the smell of the river, the rocking of the boat, and the man seated opposite her, who asked questions without understanding what the respondent's time was worth. She did not deny her attraction to him. But attraction and the conditions of marriage were not the same thing.

Her father swept the counters into a single pile. "If you enter the royal household, your suffering will be less."

"Will my suffering be less, or will my boat be cut loose from its own landing?"

"Both may happen."

"Then say each thing separately."

Her father looked towards the stretch of shore where the old mooring post had had to be replaced twice. "We must not treat it as an insult that people of a great house wish to take our daughter into theirs," he said. "But if someone recognises you in the morning river as a boatman's daughter, and by evening the palace considers it necessary to conceal that identity, what kind of honour is that?" He did not regard his daughter as a prize to be awarded. Yet the prospect of drawing close to royal power weighed heavily in his calculations. Satyavati listened to that desire of his, too.

Her father looked at her. He was not asking for a kingdom for himself. His concern lay with the future of the children Satyavati might bear, and with the dignity of a house that could be despised at court for the smell of its fishing nets. But his daughter added her own words: "If the rights of my children are bargained over without my being asked, my body will bear the burden of that bargain. And if all of you decide that the earnings of my old home no longer count, what will become of the shares owed to those who work on this boat?"

She held out a basket towards her father. "Here is today's catch. No discussion of kings and kingdoms will lower its price."

At that moment the sound of horses' hooves came from far away. Devavrata was approaching along the river road. He possessed the power to resolve the king's desire; with that power came the beginning of a difficulty for which he would have to pay with his own life. Satyavati rose to her feet, but did not hide behind her father.

Devavrata bowed in greeting. Her father stated his condition: the right of Satyavati's future children to the royal throne must be secured. Devavrata was silent for a moment before answering. He was weighing together the debt he owed his lineage, his father's wish, and the duties of a future king. Before him, too, lay this household's boat—a boat whose loss of a single day's earnings meant less rice in the house.

"The vow you make," Satyavati said, "you will make at the cost of your own life. I want none of the glory of a vow whose weight silences someone else's voice."

Devavrata looked at her. "Then what do you wish for?"

"I wish for a place in which I can speak for myself. I do not wish my children's future to be made the subject of deceit. And when I enter the royal palace, this house upon the river must not be turned into a reason for shame."

Her father wanted to say something, then held his peace. It was no simple matter to give a royal promise concerning a son's right. The vow Devavrata was about to take would bring him extraordinary renown; but the full meaning of the severe restraint that vow would lay upon his future was not yet within anyone's grasp. Satyavati listened to his decision without turning it into a likeness of her own. She kept open the possibility of consenting to the marriage, and with it her right to answer her father's question herself.

A basket of fish at the back of the boat suddenly stirred. A child was trying to lift the lid. Satyavati checked his hand and laughed. “Take the fish to market first. The king can wait.”

The river went on flowing in its own current. The story of the vow made that day would travel far into the future; but that morning the oar was still in the hand of the person who steered the boat, and the household's account of food at the landing had yet to be settled.

Videhapur, Ashadha 2039. On the banks of the Tilwaha, it was the midday sun, rather than the light of dawn, that now fell upon the shore. The acknowledgement number for Fakira's complaint lay in Naira's notebook; the questions surrounding it remained unanswered. She had come to the landing to measure the time taken by Fakira's circuitous route, and to see how people actually used the place described on paper as “alternative access.”

Two young men were washing motorcycles on the masonry steps of the first landing. On the other side, where the steps ended, Urmila was trying to steady her feet in the wet earth beneath a load of washing. Her washing board stood so low that she had to bend to lift every sheet. What weighed upon her was not the cloth on her head but the demands upon her working hours. She had to deliver the first batch of hospital laundry by noon.

“Can a vehicle reach this place?” Naira asked.

Urmila raised her eyes. “The van that collects the clothes comes as far as those paved steps. They won't let me do my washing there. A van can't come down here. First tell me whose route you're asking about.”

Naira explained her work. She was helping with Fakira's complaint, but she had not come merely to turn public access to the landing into evidence for his case. Having listened, Urmila asked, “Will you write down the time my work takes, too?”

“If you want me to.”

“Then write this first: besides the time it takes to wash the sheets, there's the time spent carrying them from this landing up to the van. The hospital wants the work done on time, but it doesn't count the labour of carrying them that distance.”

Naira wrote it down. She had not seen the hospital's bills, so she recorded Urmila's words as testimony. With her wet hand, Urmila tapped the edge of the washing board. “I bought this board with my own earnings. Calling the landing public property doesn't turn the board into government property.”

A boy on the paved steps was taking photographs with his phone. Urmila called to him at once. “You can photograph the water. I've spread out my laundry, and the patients' names are written on it. Don't photograph that.” The boy lowered his phone. Naira put hers away in her bag as well. In the eagerness to show a blocked route to the landing, a patient's identity and illness might be made public.

As she separated the clothes into two piles, Urmila explained that not all the hospital sheets were washed in the same way. Cloth requiring special cleaning had to be kept apart; another batch needed a separate line of posts for drying. “If you cut the time, you break the sequence of the work,” she said. “The people who make out the bills see how many baskets there are, but not how many different jobs there are inside a single basket.” Naira did not look at the colours of the cloth and draw conclusions about anyone's treatment. The order of work Urmila described contained knowledge of how to labour safely. To verify it, the hospital's written instructions and payment register would also have to be examined.

At a nearby food stall, Amina Bhathiyara was serving rice in little bowls made of leaves. Hasan and Zubaida had set two boxes beside her. Their old place of livelihood at the bus stand had shrunk, and they spent their days moving from one consignment to another; today they were trying to sell the contents of one box at the landing. Amina asked Hasan to help carry the empty dishes, promising not to deduct his payment from the food bill but to enter it separately. With a small hoe, Zubaida levelled the wet earth before the stall, making a little dry place.

“Will I be able to sit here every day?” Hasan asked.

“I don't know,” Amina said. “How can I promise you a veranda that isn't mine? But I'll pay you today for the work you've done.”

She opened her ledger. On one side was the amount owed by those who had eaten; on the other, the amount due to the person who had carried the boxes. Naira noticed that on that day's sheet the distinctions between kinds of work occupied more space than the prices.

An old notice for the festival honouring the river landing and keeping its water clean, held in Kartik and Agahan, was tied to a bamboo pole at the landing. Last year's date had faded; no names had yet been entered for this year. Urmila said that every year people came together for the cleaning, yet after the landing had been cleaned, the question of who could use it and at what time remained unresolved. “This time brooms and songs won't be enough,” she said. “The hours for using the steps, for washing, for unloading fish baskets, and the path for bathing will all have to be written down separately."

Urmila still remembered last Kartik's gathering clearly. One group had cleaned the steps, another had read out the accounts of donations, but no one had asked the women washing clothes on the earth at the unpaved landing what hour they needed the water. The day after the cleaning, they had once again been ordered to move, over and over. This year she recalled the timing of the vehicle Fakira had spoken about. She wanted the festival's register to contain not only a column for attendance but also one for omissions—whose work had been delayed, and why. Naira suggested marking a separate, safe way down for children; but to do that, they would first have to examine the path across the ground. Urmila agreed. Their understanding was being reached not on the day of the festival, but on this wet afternoon.

Meanwhile, Chetan Bhat was about to take a folded manuscript from his old bag. At the landing he earned his living by reciting family genealogies and reading invitations to ceremonies of the past. He was paid to show the pages of his manuscript, but he himself made no claim that everything written in them was true. Dev Gaine sat beside him, tightening a string on his instrument. Chetan asked, "Shall we sing the old songs at Kartik?"

"We shall," Dev answered, "but anyone who wants to record them and sell them in the market must ask first. Listening to a song and trading in it are not the same thing."

Chetan laughed. "Nor does the story in my papers become proof of anyone's ownership of land without being checked." Dev plucked a string; the note faltered a little, then settled. He did not sing the whole song just then. Only the opening phrase about the landing could be heard—a melody that gave pleasure to those who recognised it, not a hint of some new accusation.

Near a pile of goods, Phoolchan Lodh was shifting wet sacks. The first rains had flooded his field and changed the order in which he could sow his seed. There had been talk of assigning him a temporary plot outside the village. On paper it was vacant land; quite another reckoning was needed to determine the soil available for cultivation and the distances to water and the market road. He borrowed a dry length of bamboo from Urmila and, in return, spread earth over a slippery patch along the footpath leading down. Naira asked him, "Are you making this path?"

"I'm making it fit to walk on today," Phoolchan said. "Spreading this earth won't give me ownership of the land."

On another side, Bina Kalar was setting out empty bottles and measuring glasses for her small shop. The question of obtaining capital from her father was still being discussed at home; she kept the accounts of today's business in her own name. Nahid Moghal came from a little farther away carrying a paper bag. Seeing the two women together, Naira thought that a family's name on a land document and the consent of every member of that family were separate matters. But Nahid did not show Naira her papers at that moment. She bought two bottles from Bina, paid for them, and put the receipt in her bag. Through that small purchase, the question of her ancestral share remained suspended until its own time.

Entering the price in her ledger, Bina turned a page. Three months' earnings were recorded separately from the capital she had asked her family to provide. “If you want to call a shop your own, you must also bear some of its risks,” she told Nahid. Nahid smiled. She was not asking for instant advice about the family's land; she needed time to hear properly what the family agreed to and what was being said about her share. Naira made no attempt to overhear their private conversation. Not every person's private papers are an invitation to an investigator.

One of the young men on the paved landing moved his vehicle away. A space opened up. Urmila did not lift her washing board and move to the paved steps. “If they tell me to leave this place now, the next batch of sheets will be late again,” she said. “Let the times be settled in writing first.”

Bending beside Urmila, Naira counted out the distance between the landing's two approaches. The shorter path climbed the paved steps, but a temporary bamboo barrier stood across its entrance. The other circled up from the unpaved landing, where a load could slip in the wet mud. The words “alternative access,” which Fakira had questioned, now carried another meaning for Naira. Fakira's railway gate and Urmila's river landing did not belong to the same institution; it would be wrong to make them identical examples of a single injustice. Yet here, too, the cost of the extra distance was absent from the paperwork.

“Who put up the barrier?” Naira asked.

“The fishing people put one up once; later the municipal people said something about it,” Urmila replied. “Whoever takes it down now must know exactly whose it is. If you pull it out without finding out, someone else's net will be torn.”

Naira entered three points separately: barrier present; ownership unverified; public access obstructed. Urmila said, “Put the time beside my name in the Kartik register. Put the value of my labour in the wage register. And if everyone can agree, keep a clean way down for the children, too.”

As she closed her ledger, Amina offered Urmila some of the rice left over from the meal she had prepared. Urmila asked the price. “Hasan's help made the work with the dishes easier today,” Amina said. “I'm sharing some of that ease. No charge.” Urmila laughed. “Then one day I'll wash your sheets. But we won't make it an everyday rule.” They both laughed. Amid the hard questions that had filled the day at the landing, there was this unplanned sharing of food; no one's phone took a photograph of it.

Before evening fell, Naira turned towards home. Chetan Bhat called after her. “You examine documents, don't you? I have an old ledger. The same names appear in it again and again. I won't tell you they're all correct. When you have the chance, you may read it.”

Naira did not immediately ask for the ledger. “First tell me whose it is, and whether you have the right to show it.” Chetan nodded. His manuscript remained closed for its own time; the way to another meeting had opened.

When Naira reached home, Sarita was serving rice. Naira told her about Urmila's work at the landing, but did not add the patient's name, the contents of Nahid's bag, or anything from the ledger of Chetan's that she had not read. Sarita asked, “Is the water the same for everyone?”

“No. And their ways to reach it aren't the same either,” Naira replied. “You told me, didn't you, not to put every name in a single box? Today I understood that a landing doesn't fit into a single box either.”

Sarita set a water vessel beside the plate. “And who will measure the land now?”

Naira looked again at the distance between the landing's two approaches in her notebook. “Whoever measures it will first have to ask who uses the land. A place that looks empty isn't necessarily unoccupied.”

From the direction of the Tilwaha came the evening wind. The river had not yet reopened its old course; nor were Naira's papers proof that it would. But the people at the landing, who had insisted on counting their time, their earnings, and their right to speak as separate things, had already changed the question she would ask next.

Chapter 5 · Janaka's Measure

In the age of Janaka in Mithila, the foundations of a new chamber were being dug in the rear courtyard of the royal residence. Rainwater from the night had collected in the excavation; two craftsmen were bailing it out with cups folded from leaves. A measuring cord had been drawn taut, but a damp stake had tilted to one side. The master builder was driving it back into the ground when Sita came to the edge of the courtyard.

She had not come to inspect the foundations. She had set out along that path towards the garden, and stopped when she found it blocked. One of the craftsmen bowed to her from a distance. Sita asked, "The cord is straight, but where will this old footpath go?"

"A new courtyard is to be built," the builder replied. "The old path will be enclosed. This is land belonging to the royal residence."

"The path ran through the royal residence," she said, "but who used to walk along it?"

Instead of answering, the builder picked up the wet stake. A young craftsman said that the women gardeners had always used the path to reach the well. Once the new wall went up, they would have to walk all the way around from outside. Nobody interrupted him, but the master builder signalled with his eyes that he should be silent.

Sita asked him to speak again. The craftsman gave his name and, showing the rough wound on his hand, explained that the previous day he had pulled out a nail to save the measuring cord. Two days' wages were still owing to him. "I was given work, not land," he said. "They tell us where the wall is to go. What happens to the path afterwards is not in my hands."

Janaka arrived in the meantime to inspect the work. Seeing his daughter standing among the labourers, he smiled. "What are you looking at?"

"They are measuring how large the courtyard will be," Sita answered. "But there is no measurement of how much of the footpath will be lost."

Janaka questioned the master builder, who explained the ownership of the royal grounds and the proposed use of the new assembly hall. Janaka listened, then said to Sita, "In affairs of state, one sometimes has to give up one path and make another."

"Who will bear the burden of giving it up?" Sita asked. "For every cubit by which the cord is extended, the journey round the wall will not be shortened by a cubit. If land is given away as a gift, is the old labour of the people who use it given away with it?"

At this mention of a gift, Janaka fell silent for a moment. A grant of land was under discussion in the royal assembly: the state was to give a plot to an ashram or for some work of service. The generosity of the giver would be proclaimed, but the assembly had not yet decided what should happen to the seed already sown in that soil. Sita had heard of the proposal. She wanted the question of existing use settled before the gift was made.

"Gifts make works of dharma possible," Janaka said.

"But who will attend to the dharma of the person whose field yields less grain?"

There was no bitterness in the disagreement between them, yet Janaka could not evade the question. He instructed the builder to provide another cord. The first was to measure the space within the wall; the second, the path by which the women gardeners reached the well. As for the proposed land grant, he ordered that the land's existing use be investigated first. This order was not a final decision about the gift. Sita understood at least this much: a gift declared in words and a life altered on the ground could not be reckoned with the same measure.

Beside the chamber, on a heap of earth left over from the digging, an elderly woman was sorting two pieces of stone. Her task was to separate the defective stones, but the tally book recorded only the stones, not the hands that sorted them. She rubbed one piece a little and showed it to Sita. A fine crack ran through its interior; if a wall were raised upon it, the rains might split it open. The master builder set the stone aside. His authority was not diminished by hearing another person's knowledge of the crack; on the contrary, the wall was made safer. Sita asked who would bear the loss incurred in returning the stone. The builder said that he would examine the accounts for the materials supplied. An object required for the building had been rejected; the question of the money remained.

From this Sita understood that the royal command, the craftsman's measurements, and the actual condition of the materials all had to be brought into relation with one another. The king's seal alone could not make a defective stone sound; nor could a craftsman's experience alone determine the right to a field. There was earth before her eyes, but the promises attached to that earth extended far beyond it.

The builder raised the question of the young craftsman's unpaid wages. Janaka called for the accounts. The man was not paid at that moment, but a date was fixed for opening the ledger. Sita saw that a single command could move a wall, yet payment still required a further reckoning. If the reckoning remained unchanged, the outcome of the labour would remain incomplete.

Videhapur, Ashadh 2039. The first rain of the morning had not yet dried. Two chalk lines had been drawn across the footpath leading from the paved steps of Barki Pond towards the unpaved landing. When Naira arrived, the first line ended precisely where the load of laundry Urmila carried would swing round and slip. The second disappeared behind a vegetable stall in the market. Beside the lines stood a notice: ‘Survey of proposed access; not the final boundary.’

The previous evening, Sarita had asked who would measure the land. Naira had come today hoping to find an answer. The survey team had not yet arrived; an assistant was driving bamboo pegs into the ground and laying out a measuring tape. He said the path was being examined under orders from the municipal body, but no final notice of land acquisition had been issued. Naira entered that distinction in her notebook.

At the bend near the landing, Kiran Raut was setting down a sack of dried paddy seed. Kiran’s field did not lie directly on the pond’s edge, but the cart carrying its produce to market passed through this narrow turn. Naira first heard Kiran speaking to the assistant, saying that the chalk line cut across the route used to transport the goods. “This is for a public amenity,” the assistant replied.

Kiran opened a little account book. “An amenity for whom, an expense for whom? The name on this sack isn’t the name of the landowner. I sow the seed as a sharecropper. The owner’s name is written on the land deed, but the debt for this consignment is entered in my account.”

Kiran did not offer the book to Naira unasked. First came a question: on whose behalf had she come? Naira introduced herself: she assisted in examining errors in records; she was not the municipality’s authorised survey officer. “I can write down what you tell me. I cannot declare the measurement correct.”

Kiran began with a straightforward question: once the new path was built, how much farther would the seed cart have to travel? The assistant pointed to a short line on his map and said that the difference would be slight. Kiran untied the sack and showed him the calculation. Four sacks could be loaded in one consignment; if the handcart could not turn at the bend on the detour, the journey would have to be made twice. Both the hire charge and the time required would rise. The assistant stretched out the tape again, but the cost of lifting and carrying the sacks found no place in his measurements. Naira recorded that separately. There was nothing wrong with showing a distance on a map; what was wrong was to leave unasked what would move through that distance, whose body would move it, and how much time it would take.

Just then Kiran took from the sack a cheap box of pencils bought for a daughter. One corner of the box was wet, but the pencils inside were dry. Kiran laughed and said that at home the little girl drew the outlines of fields in her exercise book, always making them rectangular. “There isn’t a field of mine shaped like that anywhere,” Kiran said. “So perhaps when she learns to measure, she’ll finally explain my own field to me.” The people from the survey party joined in the laughter, and for a little while the quarrel over the chalk lines fell still.

Kiran showed Naira a page. The share of the grain and the seed bought on credit were entered on separate lines. Kiran was not asking Naira to verify them yet. The request was that the surveyors, when drawing the proposed route, hear not only from the owner of the field but also about the time spent transporting its produce. “Will you give me a copy of this page?” Naira asked. “Cover the part with the amounts first,” Kiran said. “Why should I expose the household’s entire debt in a dispute about a path?” Naira agreed.

Before noon, a young man arrived carrying a cardboard box of papers. It contained old bills from a construction contract; the name written on top was Ratan Bhuiyan. Ratan himself, a thin man, accompanied him. He had carried earth and bricks at a previous construction site in the village, but on paper a sum of debt had somehow become attached to his name. Naira did not infer that a crime had been committed merely from seeing an old bill. Ratan said, “The weight I carried was called wage labour. The money I never received is now being called a loan I owe.”

“Do you have a receipt?” Naira asked.

Ratan showed her two sheets: the first listed materials delivered, the second an amount payable. He was not certain whose signature appeared against the sum. The contractor's stamp was clear on one side of the paper and blurred on the other. Naira explained that a dispute over ownership, an account of sharecropping, and unpaid wages should not be jumbled into a single complaint. Ratan quietly separated his papers. “If we keep them separate, will they listen to us separately too?” he asked. “Whether they listen is not in my hands,” Naira said. “But when I put the papers together, I won't erase the differences between your claims.”

There was an old crease in the bill Ratan held. He said that two men who had worked with him the previous year had left for distant places after failing to receive their pay. He did not know their full addresses and refused to add names on the strength of guesses. Naira told him to write only what he knew for now. He could not recall the exact date of the earlier payment, but he remembered the day the materials were unloaded because rain had come down in torrents. The memory of rain was not enough to establish a date; to Ratan, it was an aid to remembering.

A young assistant wanted to photograph both sheets together on his phone. Ratan stopped him. “The first paper is about the work I did. The second carries a debt written down by somebody else. If people see the two stuck together in a photograph, they'll say I've accepted the debt.” The assistant lowered his phone. Naira remembered the condition Sanket had placed upon the use of his own picture. This time the consent of the person to whom the papers belonged became the first condition for photographing them.

In the midst of this brief exchange, a cart bound for the unpaved landing came to a halt. Urmila called from a distance: where the peg had been driven in, her laundry cart could no longer turn. The assistant moved the peg back by two cubits. That adjustment decided nobody's title to the land; it did, however, make room for one day's burden to pass. Urmila pushed the cart through, checked the time, and set off towards the hospital without prolonging the argument. Naira remembered the route she had measured the day before. The movement of living labour appeared differently upon what had looked like an empty line.

There were separate slips in the survey team's box. One recorded the weekly fee for Bela Turaha's place in the market; another line of the proposed road ran close to the space where she temporarily spread her goods. Another slip contained an old neighbourhood roll for Hema Dev's school, from which the names of women who had built their own homes had repeatedly been omitted. Rachana Dhimal's name appeared in an attendance register documenting language instruction for a family newly arrived in the area. None of this established the boundaries of a parcel of land. It did, however, make plain that the market, the school, and people's movements were all bound up with this route.

The first page of the survey ledger bore only the title of the survey. Beneath it lay a short list of local uses gathered from the people present. This did not turn Hema Dev's school's concerns, the language spoken by Rachana Dhimal's family, and Bela Turaha's modest market stall into identical claims of property. If roadwork began the next day, access to the school, market hours, and the entry of laundry carts would have to be examined separately. All these activities belonged to the same adjoining parts of town, yet their losses could not be expressed in a single figure.

As the young man lifted his box, two more slips fell out. One was a proposal for an event involving an audio recording of Rashid Bhat's singing; the space for permission to record had been left blank. The other was an estimate for repairs to Karun Damai's musical instrument; no separate fee for the performance had yet been added. In one place the thing being measured was land, in another it was remuneration. Naira saw that if these slips were rolled into a single total, the sums owed to everyone would be wrong. She asked the assistant not to fill in the empty spaces. He said the event committee would do so later.

The surveyor arrived at midday. Looking at the chalk lines, he first opened the measurement sheet. Kiran put the sack aside, and Ratan set down the old box. The surveyor said the width of the road was marked on the sheet, but the position of a narrow drainage ditch at the side had not been indicated separately. The chalk line ran over the ditch. The assistant took the measurements again; the tape was accurate, but the starting peg had been set on the wrong side.

That small mistake was corrected. A new line was drawn and the old one crossed out. Ratan asked whether this would cancel his debt. The surveyor said no. Kiran asked whether the sharecropping arrangement would now be protected. The answer was that it was still uncertain. But everyone had seen the proof that the first line ought not to have been treated as a final boundary. Naira wrote in her ledger: 'Measurement reference corrected; questions of possession, use, and debt remain unresolved.'

A little way from the landing, a reading session for the evening was being rehearsed in the open veranda of a school. Naira had promised to bring Sarita there; Sarita could not come today, but she had given Naira a copy of a page from an old manuscript. The page employed the names Triyuga and Lakshmana as poetic expressions in a story set in Janaka's time. There was no reason to treat those names as precise measurements of the modern Tilwaha waterway at Videhapur. Another book lying in the veranda referred to a possible connection between the names Lakshmana and Lakhandei, a connection still awaiting examination. Naira wrote 'poetic name' in the margin of the page and left the space for a location on the map blank.

In an old photograph of a festival pasted to the veranda wall, people from the landing sat together. A line from a song was written beneath the picture, but the singer's name was incomplete. In the neighbouring classroom, children were writing down the names of trees, ponds, and footpaths near their homes. On some papers a name was marked 'heard'; on others, 'seen'. The teacher indicated that the old name of a river, heard from a grandfather, should not simply be pasted onto the present-day survey map without examination. A boy wanted to write Triyuga underneath Tilwaha. Naira asked him to keep the two names on separate lines. He was not offended. "Then both names will survive," he said.

One of the schoolgirls was reading the story of Janaka and Sita. She asked, "If the king gave the land away, did he give away its water, its paths, and the rice growing on it as well?" The woman conducting the reading did not answer at once. "The story tells us of a gift," she said. "But asking whose life was changed by it is also part of reading." The girl wrote the question in her exercise book. That day she wanted an answer, not a triumphant speech.

When Naira came home, Sarita was grinding spices on the stone slab. Naira explained how the day's survey line had been corrected, how Kiran had covered the figures in the account book, and how Ratan's two papers differed. She mentioned no one's private sums. Sarita asked, "The line that was wrong has been corrected. But what was it that told the person drawing it who would have to go the long way round?"

"Not their names. The people first explained the work they did," Naira said.

Sarita washed the grinding stone. "Then look again at our old household tables. How many of the names there belong to the family, and how many of the entries are accounts of work? Even I haven't always written the two in the same way."

Naira looked up at the old satchel hanging above them. The sheet containing twenty-seven names was still in Sarita's keeping; Naira had no right to make a copy without her consent. There was another old household ledger here, which Sarita now offered to open. "Tomorrow, in daylight," she said. "And ask first: on what date was this written?"

Outside came the sound of a handcart's wheels from the direction of the pond. The corrected chalk line might wash away in the damp of the night, but the correction had already been entered on the survey sheet. Naira made a reckoning in her mind: the land had been measured; one wrongly placed peg had been removed; the time for examining the household ledger was yet to come. She rose to check the water in the pot of rice. With that ordinary task, the day came to its close.

Chapter 6 · The Arithmetic of Home

Before putting the morning rice on to cook, Sarita drew out the old satchel from beneath the wooden cot. A length of string, of the kind used to tie a bundle, was caught in its strap. She did not cut it. She worked it loose gently, as though cutting the string might somehow diminish the papers inside. Naira sat on the mat opposite her. Yesterday her mother had said they would open the ledger by daylight. Daylight had come, but the right to open it was not Naira's. It remained in Sarita's hands.

"Shake the rice off it first," Sarita said. Two grains of dried rice were lodged in a corner of the satchel. Naira picked them out and placed them on a plate. Sarita laughed. "If a little grain survives among the household's old accounts, don't take it for an ill omen." Water was still warming on the stove. The room held a faint smell of smoke, and from outside came the distant sound of a train.

The ledger had no handsome title on its cover. On the first page, in heavy letters, someone had written 'The Arithmetic of Home'; beneath it were five columns: rice, oil, salt, medicine, and fares. On the reverse of the paper was the incomplete impression of an old school stamp. Someone had thrown the book away, and Sarita had rescued its unused pages. Now its first use and its second lived together under the same cover.

"When is this page from?" Naira asked.

"Which page? The first blank sheet came into my hands on one day. I began writing later. A stamp already printed on a sheet doesn't make the writing belong to the day of the stamp." Sarita answered as she turned the page.

Naira saw '2027' written in the margin. Beneath it stood the price of salt and two tablets of medicine. On one side of the following page, 'On credit' was written in red ink and 'Paid' in blue; Sarita had struck through some of the entries with her own hand. "Red first, and blue afterwards?" Naira asked.

"Sometimes. But I can't say everything written in red came first. Once the blue pen ran dry and I wrote down the price of cooked rice in red. The colour of a pen is no clock."

Hearing this, Naira did not open the camera on her phone. She wanted to remember, separately from any photograph of a page, the circumstances in which it had been touched, turned, and examined. Sarita stopped her finger at one place in the ledger. Beneath a straight line drawn across the middle of the page were the words 'Rajinar well: bricks for the steps'. In another hand, or at least another pen, someone had added 'rope for drawing water'. Between those two lines lay an account of grain.

"Why is this expense for the well in the household accounts?" Naira asked.

"Because it was paid out of this house. The water belonged to the well, but the fare for bringing the bricks came out of my pocket. Look there to see whether anybody repaid it afterwards." Sarita showed her an empty space in the last column. Naira did not call that blank an outstanding debt; neither did she draw a question mark beside it. The expenditure was recorded. Any reimbursement remained uncertain.

Sarita turned back two pages. There was a list of purchases made one evening at the market: green chillies, sattu, a cubit of cloth, and paper for Sanket. He was still little then; he would ask for paper and make brightly coloured pictures. "He was learning his tables on those ruled lines," Sarita said, "while I wrote the expenses on the backs of his unused sheets." Naira remembered a little train Sanket had once drawn: the carriages were all different shapes, but he had made them run on the same track. That memory proved no allegation against anyone. It did, however, offer one answer to the question of why the household ledger had been kept.

On the other side of the page was a small fold. Before opening it, Sarita looked at Naira. "You may unfold this. But this ledger and the sheet of twenty-seven names are two different things. Don't imagine that because the ink looks alike, you understand everything about the names on the other sheet." Naira agreed. Inside the fold was an old repair receipt bearing the year 2038, on which the bricks for the well's wall and the wages for the work were added up separately. The date stamp was indistinct, but the total was complete. It was now certain that papers belonging to two different times had been kept against the same page; why they had come together remained uncertain.

Before noon, Sarita gave permission for copies to be made of two pages of the ledger—the pages dealing with the household's grain expenditure and the costs at Rajinar well. She did not authorise copies of the others. Naira first asked who would see them. "You, me, and whoever is responsible for examining the old repair accounts," Sarita replied. "Not everybody out on the street." Naira took photographs on her phone, returned the original ledger to Sarita's lap, and entered in a separate file: 'Restricted copy, made with the owner's permission.'

Sarita asked, quite naturally, "That sheet of twenty-seven names, where four places are written in a different ink—had you taken it to be a list made on a single day?"

"At first I thought someone had added four names later. But that, too, was a supposition."

"Do you write down a household's rice accounts in a single day? The days change. Sometimes I wrote a name after hearing it spoken; sometimes I corrected something written before. But ask separately who wrote it and when. I'll tell you what I remember. What I don't remember, I won't pretend to remember."

From this admission Naira obtained one small answer: the list had not been completed in a single sitting. She dated her mother's oral account to the present day. The nature of the work associated with the four names, the restricted layer of the record, and the case of Sarita herself, recorded as dead, still required separate investigation. Naira made no claim that she could determine the age of the ink on an old receipt merely by looking at it.

Earlier Naira had imagined that once a copy had been made, it would be easy to lock the original paper in a cupboard. But Sarita kept lifting the ledger to explain its words; to shut it away might also be to shut away someone's lived experience. At the top of her notes Naira wrote: 'Examine separately the order of pages, the account of when they were written, and independent records of dates.' The same ink could be used on different days, and different inks on the same day. Sarita's account had disproved the assumption of a single sitting, but the question of who had added which name, and on what date, remained open.

On the way to Rajinar well, the new chalk line drawn the day before still survived in patches on the damp earth. The corrected stake, whose position had provoked the disagreement between Kiran and Ratan, was standing where it had been moved. Passing it, Naira noticed that a cart had been able, for the first time, to get through without being pushed backwards. Urmila's handcart was not there today. Naira did not go on to conclude from its absence that the work had stopped. All she knew was that yesterday the cart carrying the hospital laundry had found enough space to turn.

The mouth of Rajinar well was not wide, but the old raised platform surrounding it lay across the paths of many people. Children coming home from school set their satchels down on it; residents drew water; those pushing carts made their way round its edge. The iron railing on one side of the well had come loose. The friction of the rope had worn away the corner of a brick. Water shone below, but its brightness was no proof that it was clean or fit to drink.

Lalit Mallik was bending over the edge of the platform, inspecting the joints between the bricks. Padma was with him, checking whether the notice written for schoolchildren could be read clearly. 'CAUTION' stood out in large letters on the board, but nothing indicated which section of the railing was loose. Padma drew an arrow to mark the place. When Naira began to ask how deep the well was, Lalit said it would be wrong to offer a figure without a safe measurement and the presence of people authorised to undertake it. He refrained from leaning over to make an estimate himself.

To the right of the well, Sudha Rai stood among a gathering of people, clutching documents against her chest. She had proposed building a small awning to provide shade over the well's platform, and a declaration was being prepared that she would give some land for public use. But the new line drawn in the deed of donation crossed the narrow passage used by two tenant families. Schoolchildren used that passage too.

"I'll pay for the awning," Sudha said, "but put it in writing that this land is a gift. If the papers remain held up, who is going to begin the work?"

Without attempting to take the papers from her, Naira asked, "Have the tenants been heard about their right of way?"

"Nobody is putting them out of their homes. There's another way round."

Padma pointed towards that 'other way'. There was a shallow pit there and a stretch of broken brick. A child carrying a schoolbag could cross it, but going round with a water-filled pitcher was hardly easy. Sudha was silent for a moment. For the first time, behind the graceful signature on her deed of donation, she could see the labour a tenant performed each day. She did not tear up the declaration then and there. She said that the use of the passage should first be recorded separately. The decision about the donation remained to be made.

At that moment one of the tenant women standing beneath the proposed awning lifted her pitcher. She had no wish to mount a platform and make a speech against Sudha. All she wanted was to be able, that very night, to walk to the well from her home by the path she had always taken. Sudha made room for her to put down the pitcher, but kept the deed of donation tucked under her arm. Naira was unwilling to bridge that small distance between one person's generosity and another's rights with a mere signature. Someone proposed fixing a date for the hearing; the task of entering it in the register began. No decision had been reached.

Repair estimates had been collected on an old wooden bench at one side. Among them lay a receipt concerning the wooden planks of Keshari Bin's boat. Keshari had written that someone had asked what the boat would fetch if sold, whereas the cost of repairing it had yet to be measured. The boat's timber and the well's railing were separate jobs, though the materials bought for both at the market had travelled in the same cart and incurred a common transport charge. Rather than combining the two bills into a single cost, Lalit kept them apart. Materials arriving in one cart did not make the work belong to a single owner.

In the school veranda, a small account book lay open for rehearsals of the next public reading. The time allotted to Phoolmati Pamariya's song was entered separately from her fee; the cost of repairing Ramesh Ghasi's instrument was entered separately from what he would be paid to play it onstage. At first someone had written 'community contribution' over the two entries, leaving both amounts unpaid and unspecified. Seeing the blank spaces beside those words, Padma sent the book back. There was no rebuke in her voice, but she had no intention of perpetuating, through her own handwriting, the old habit of listening to songs without paying for them.

A bill for goods supplied by Lakshmi Kathbaniya lay pressed against the veranda window. She had reckoned separately the prices of the small lengths of rope and the materials for lids that came from her shop. Someone had entered her name in the account book beside the entire debt of the well committee. Padma made it clear that selling goods did not make a person jointly liable for everyone else's debts. Lakshmi herself was not present; her receipt spoke for the price she was owed. On the second copy of the bill, the date for payment remained blank.

On the same table was a slip specifying an advance payment for articles Shanti Bari had prepared for a wedding. A family wanted to use those articles on the day of the proposed public reading, but the space for the advance had been left empty. The organisers had wanted to put the slip together with the donations for repairs. Padma separated the two entries: one was the price of wedding articles for a household, the other the cost of maintaining a public well. A distinction so small might prevent a woman's earnings from vanishing under the name of a charitable contribution.

Naira picked up the last slip. It was a letter envelope addressed to Anupama Sen, with a line written clearly beneath her name: ‘Original letter private; no shared copy without permission.’ Naira did not open what was inside. The envelope was intended for the collection of local history assembled for the public reading, but its owner would decide whether anyone needed to see the original contents. Naira remembered the restricted permission her mother had given for just two pages of the old household ledger. The greater age of a document did not lessen the force of its owner's wishes in the present.

A little girl stood beside Rajinar well with an empty lota in her hands. Others were still waiting to draw water, and the growing crowd on the platform left her no room. Padma closed the account book and asked everyone to move back a couple of handspans. Lalit stretched a temporary rope beside the loose railing, but made it clear that this was not a repair, only a sign marking an area to be avoided for the day. The girl's mother drew water, placed the filled lota in the child's hands, and left by another path.

No decision was made that day about replacing the bricks at the well or putting up the awning. Two things were nevertheless accomplished: access beside the loose railing was temporarily barred, and it was agreed that the use of the passage would be recorded before either the costs of repair or the declaration of donation was settled. Naira mentioned the restricted copy of Sarita's receipt. Lalit asked permission to look at the prices on that copy, not at the original ledger. Naira said she would first ask Sarita again for consent to this specific use. The earlier payment had still not been established in full; the old prices might nevertheless be useful when the cost of future work was calculated.

On her way home, Naira noticed an old wooden cot beneath the veranda. Some faded numerals, apparently denoting years, had been scratched into one of its legs. Someone had recently taken the surface for a vacant space and laid an account book on it. Children sat there writing the old stories of their houses in their exercise books. One asked who had made the cot. Their teacher replied, “If we find the name, we'll write it down. If we don't, we won't invent one.” Naira paused. From where she stood, she could not read the age of the marks in the wood. She went on without touching the cot.

Along the road, two children released from school were arguing over whose account should be believed when telling the history of an old house. One said that his grandfather always told the same story, and therefore it must be true. The other said that his grandmother told it differently, but that did not make her a liar. Naira smiled as she listened. The wood of the old cot had given her a question, not an answer. Perhaps the next day someone would find, beside that wood, one end of a thread leading into the history of a family. For now it was only a possibility.

That evening Sarita sat at home sorting lentils. Naira told her what had happened during the day: the loose railing at the well, the separate bills for repairs, Sudha's deed of donation, and the need to ask permission again before showing a copy of the expense record. Sarita listened without interrupting. “If you want to show my receipt,” she said, “first make it clear that I paid the transport fare that day. I don't remember whether anyone repaid me later. If I don't remember, don't turn it into a debt somebody is assumed to owe.”

In her notes, Naira changed ‘payment unverified’ to ‘reimbursement unverified’. The difference between those two expressions was slight, but the first suggested doubt about whether the fare had been paid at all, while the second raised the question of whether it had been paid back. Sarita read the page and agreed. The committee could examine the portion of the record concerning Rajinar well; the entries for food and medicine would remain within the household.

“And the sheet of twenty-seven names?” Naira asked softly.

“I still have it. Tomorrow I'll tell you separately as many of the dates as I remember. Not all of them.” Sarita made a small heap of lentils. “What have you learned today?”

“A single page doesn't hold the life of a single day. And I can't fill in from my own imagination what the paper doesn't say.”

Sarita put water on to wash the lentils. Naira wrapped the ledger in an old cloth and placed it back in her mother's hands. On the wall, the shadow of the lota standing on the cot moved slowly: no impossible shadow, merely the light of evening changing. The day's expenses had yet to be entered in the arithmetic of the household. Sarita measured out the rice and said, “Add another handful to the rice for two. Someone may come.”

Naira did not ask who. She dropped a handful of rice into the pot. The story of the numerals on the old cot could be heard tomorrow, but a plate had already been set aside for tonight's guest.

Chapter 7 · The Bench of Five Generations

The rice from the extra handful Sarita had put into the pot was still warm by evening. When a voice sounded at the door, she lowered the flame rather than taking down the plate. Shakuntala stood outside. In her left hand she carried a small earthen vessel with a clay lid; in her right, two papers wrapped in cloth. Her granddaughter was with her, holding a school exercise book whose corner had curled slightly in the rain.

“Was there any water left today?” Sarita asked.

“The clay was left. The water, not yet,” Shakuntala replied. “I've come back from Kumharauti. Let me eat first, and then I'll show you the papers.”

Naira spread a mat on the veranda. Shakuntala's granddaughter put her exercise book safely inside, out of the wet. Sanket laid an old newspaper beneath it for her but did not ask permission to pick it up and look through it. The girl opened the pages herself. Her school assignment was to write about five generations of a household. The first line asked, ‘Whose home?’ Half a page had been left blank for the answer.

“I can write down five people's names,” the girl said, “but nobody will tell me whose bench it was.”

Naira remembered the wooden bench she had seen that day on the school veranda. The numerals on one of its legs had worn away. She took out the little sketch she had made on paper and showed it to them. “It looks like a year, but we still haven't managed to read it. What's written on the bench might be the maker's name, or it might be a mark added afterwards. If we want a comparison, we'll have to go back and examine the wood.”

Shakuntala leaned closer to see the sketch without her spectacles. “My father used to say that the school's old bench was commissioned from a carpenter in exchange for earthen vessels. But I have evidence only that I heard my father say so; I haven't seen the accounts for the bench.” She did not tell her granddaughter to close the exercise book. “Write down the difference, if you can.”

Sarita served the rice. The granddaughter liked vegetables; Shakuntala preferred her dal with little salt; Sarita liked a little more water with her rice. Sanket put a roasted chilli on his plate. Shakuntala burst out laughing. “Five different palates in one kitchen! Make a register of that, and they'll divide the house into five parts.” Sarita laughed in such a way that the granddaughter began laughing too, forgetting her question for a moment.

After the meal, Sarita took some old sheets, bound in cloth, out of the chest. They were not the household ledger she had shown Naira yesterday. This was a bundle of papers in different sizes: some written down by one person, some recording what another had said, and some bills kept in the house simply because they were papers. On the first sheet stood the year ‘1942’; a water stain spread along the edge of the lettering.

“The date is written here,” Sarita said, “but I don't rightly know who wrote it. My grandmother used to tell us about her grandmother's household. I wrote down what she told me. Two hands, belonging to different times, are present on a single sheet.”

“Then I won't put ‘eyewitness account from 1942’ at the top,” Naira said.

Sarita agreed and began telling the first story. Her great-grandmother would turn the vessels upside down at night so that work could begin at dawn without a sound. Before the rains came, the village had organised the clearing of a pond. Some people dug out the earth; some supplied spades; others carried water; still others cooked rice for the weary hands. A quarrel broke out over whose field should receive the excavated soil, and a day's work was put back by two days. Sarita's grandmother used to say that the villagers took a very long time to count the labour of the women who cooked for the workers.

“This was said to be the story of the pond-clearing in 1939,” Sarita added. “I remember the date because my grandmother said it. We must look separately for a document that records it.”

“In whose names was the work counted on the days they cleared the pond?” Naira asked. Sarita thought for a moment. “Grandmother said the names of those who wielded the digging tools went into the register. The time given by those who cooked the rice, carried water in pitchers, or washed injured hands often found no column at all. Later, one woman wrote down what her kitchen had cost and laid the account before everyone. At first they laughed. Then they understood that without rice, fuel, and labour, the pond would never be cleared.” Shakuntala asked whether she remembered the woman's name. Sarita shook her head. “No. If her name cannot be found, I won't invent one for her. But neither will I erase her work.”

Shakuntala lifted the lid of her vessel. Inside were two small lumps of clay, one red and one grey, each wrapped in a separate piece of cloth. “We heard about that old quarrel in our house as well. My family said that the silt of a pond was not the same as the clay that could be turned on a potter's wheel. But these samples I brought today still have to be tried on the wheel. Don't treat them as though they came from that old clearing.”

Naira did not touch either lump. Shakuntala took up the grey one and crumbled a little of it between her fingers; that alone could not establish whether it was suitable for pottery. An enclosure around a construction site had narrowed the old footpath leading to the clay ground at Kumharauti. Transport had grown more expensive, while Shakuntala had yet to receive payment for the vessels she had supplied. In the midst of that delay, the admission expenses for her granddaughter's new class remained unsettled.

“How much clay will you take out?” Naira asked.

“As much as we're permitted to take, and as much as proves usable. I won't claim that the entire place belongs to me. But nobody has the right to close off an old route of access without a hearing.” Shakuntala unfolded the papers she had brought in the cloth. The first recorded an earlier transport charge; the second was an unpaid invoice for vessels ordered from her. “If I spend every rupee in the house fighting for access to clay, how will my granddaughter go to school? We need papers. Spoken words don't always endure.”

On the back of her exercise book the granddaughter drew a small circle. “Grandmother, I want to learn how to make clay pots, but I want to go to school as well.”

“Both choices may be different from what I would choose,” Shakuntala said. “And if one day you tell me you don't want to make pots, your schooling won't stop then either.” She did not smile as she spoke; the unpaid invoice lay open before her. Naira understood that the cost of such a promise could never be entered in an account, yet without some means of paying that cost the promise would remain incomplete.

Sarita turned to another sheet. Beside the year 1974 were the expenses of moving a household: two sacks of grain, some vessels, and the repair of a leg. The mention of which family had moved was brief, its name incomplete. “My grandmother used to say that in that year part of the house was made into a place for studying. But, from what she told me, it wasn't open to all the children in the household. Some worked during the day and learned their letters at night.”

Beside this sheet, Shakuntala's granddaughter found another answer to her school question. A window had been drawn in the picture of the old house, but it struck her that not every child had enjoyed the same freedom to look outside. She drew a little window in her exercise book, and a path beyond it. Looking at the picture, Sarita said, “You understand the state of a home not from the size of its windows, but from whether the way out is open.” Sanket smiled and said he could understand the picture too. “Then teach me to draw a vehicle,” the granddaughter said. The two of them sat together on the mat, their sheets of paper side by side.

As he listened, Sanket asked, “Could everyone write their own name, then?”

“No,” Sarita replied. “And if someone couldn't write, it wasn't right to take their thumbprint without their consent. There are things in a family's story that are not easy to hear.”

The sheet dated 1993 listed railway fares and the cost of posting letters. Sarita said that her mother used to read aloud letters from relatives who had gone away to earn a living. The letters spoke not only of household expenses but of the taste of food: one person did not like the rice where they lived; another found salt too dear. The space where ‘reached home’ should have been entered was blank. “Perhaps a letter was lost here,” Sarita said, “or perhaps nobody wrote down that it had arrived. A blank space is no grounds for declaring someone missing.”

Whether or not the letters named a great city, people at home often gathered everyone living away under a single word: ‘pardesiya’, one who had gone to another place. Sarita did not accept that simplification. “Going far away and abandoning your family are not the same thing. Some return. Some send letters. Some cannot send even a word of news. I won't put reasons into their mouths because no reply came.” Shakuntala said, “When someone failed to come back to the village, people would sometimes begin dividing that person's share among themselves.” Then she added at once, “But I'm not saying that happened in this household.” Sarita nodded at her care.

Naira resisted the urge to make a copy of that entry. Her mother's permission to handle the papers did not extend equally to every sheet. She looked at the question in the girl's exercise book: ‘Whose home?’ If the home of five generations were reduced to its owners' names, those who tended the hearth, made the vessels, or went away to earn a living would vanish. For the moment, however, that was Naira's own thought, not evidence supplied by the page.

Just then, Bindeshwari Sahu's son came to the door with a slip showing the price of a bottle of oil. The cost of replacing an old part of the oil press and the price of oil bought in the market appeared on separate lines. Shakuntala smelled the oil in the bottle and said that once, in their home, you could hear the sound of oil being pressed. Bindeshwari was thinking of selling the press, but others in the family regarded it as an object of remembrance. “Keeping the machine won't pay off the household's debts,” Sarita said, “but if we sell it, where shall we keep the memory? That's a question too.” The slip went into the cupboard. No one settled the matter that night.

When Sarita opened the third bundle, two school-fee receipts from 2008 came out. One concerned Naira's education; the other related to the distribution of old books to someone. Naira examined them closely. The column for payment of the fee had been completed, but there was no signature acknowledging delivery of the books. She remembered that in that year, instead of giving her a book, someone had salvaged the unused pages of an old exercise book for her. Yet that memory could not supply the missing signature on the receipt.

“I won't tell a story in which I left home just so you could get an education,” Sarita said, looking at her daughter. “I went on doing my own work. Your schooling came into conflict with the work of the house. Once I left the dishes unwashed on the day of your examination, and the household talked about it all day."

Naira laughed. "At the time I thought you had lied for my sake. You said the tap was broken."

"The tap really was broken," Sarita said with a smile. "But how often the truth was spoken on someone's behalf—that's another set of arithmetic altogether." The granddaughter joined in their laughter, although she did not know the name of the examination Naira had taken.

On the sheet dated 2027, a vehicle's wheel had been drawn in Sanket's childish hand. Seeing his old drawing, he looked a little embarrassed. With that small hand he had drawn everyone in the household: one face round, another figure tall, and an empty space left for one person. "Why is this space empty?" Naira asked.

"The paper was torn," Sanket said. "It's possible someone was left out. But now I can't say who." Sarita returned the drawing to the boy's hands. Naira resisted the temptation to connect its empty space to the list of twenty-seven names. The meaning of the drawing could be no more certain than its maker's memory.

Along with the slip concerning the footpath at Kumharauti, Shakuntala had several more receipts in her bag. Amrita Chauhan had written her name beside an old claim relating to the clay at Nonthara; Gomati Beldar had separately counted the hours she had spent transporting materials for modern construction work. The two documents had been tied together, but the work they recorded was not the same. It would be wrong to add Gomati's wages to Amrita's claim over land merely because the old occupational register grouped the Nonia and Beldar communities together. Understanding the distinction, Shakuntala put the papers away separately again.

One envelope contained an old measuring slip from Mahendra Mahaseth's business; another held a receipt for a small purchase by Binod Jaiswal. People associated both households with the name of an old occupation and treated them as though they shared one account, but the names on the payments, the dates, and the owners were different. Naira could read the names clearly on both envelopes. No one had asked her to judge anyone guilty or innocent on the strength of those slips. Shakuntala said only, "If the price of the pots from Kumharauti gets put on the same bill as these, my money will disappear."

The granddaughter opened her exercise book again. Between the pages was a copy of a wedding invitation sent by Nilima Nurang. Nilima had written that she intended to apply to have her mother's name entered correctly in the marriage register. "If a name is left out," the girl asked, "can it be written in afterwards?" "An application can be made," Sarita said. "But correcting a document and correcting an old family memory are not the same thing." At the top of her exercise book the girl wrote: 'What I don't know, I shall ask.'

In a small songbook kept on the veranda, the fee for Hamida Miriyasin's wedding songs had been entered separately. An organiser had wanted to sing the words of an old song in mockery; Hamida had refused permission for that use. Her song belonged to the memory of a household, but calling it a memory did not cancel the singer's right to be paid for her work. Shakuntala's granddaughter said she wanted to hear the tune. “First we'll ask the singer,” Sarita replied. “All right,” the girl said. “Then tomorrow I'll recite my own poem.”

The last paper in the bag was an old notice concerning rent for Shashi Mahuri's warehouse. It recorded only the rental period and the general conditions for storing goods, not what had actually been stored there. Naira did not try to match the notice to the sheet of twenty-seven names. Nothing about the shop's condition or any irregularity could be established from this one receipt. For now, she could see only one possible use for it: they would need to ask separately about the transport charge for certain vessels brought from Kumharauti to the warehouse, and when that journey had been made.

A light shower began outside. Waiting for it to pass, the granddaughter sat on the threshold of Sarita's house and drew five houses in her exercise book. Beneath the first she wrote 1942; beneath the second, 1974; beneath the third, 1993; beneath the fourth, 2008; and beneath the fifth, 2027. Then she stopped. “Are these five houses the same house?”

“Sometimes they are, sometimes they aren't,” Sarita said. “Land changes, rooms change, people change. Even those who eat together don't always live beneath the same roof. So don't write about all five times under a single person's name.”

“And 1939?” the girl asked.

“Put that story of the pond-clearing under a separate heading,” Shakuntala answered. “Say that it is something you heard. When we find the old accounts, we'll check the date.” The granddaughter left a blank space along one side of the page. Sarita's story said that on the day of the clearing some people lifted earth, some cooked rice, and some found their way to the pond's landing blocked. The girl wanted to ask all three groups about it the next time, before filling the blank.

When the rain stopped, Shakuntala helped her granddaughter to her feet. She wrapped the two clay samples again; she would test them on the wheel tomorrow. Naira spoke of arranging a separate day to examine the numerals on the school bench, but she thought it more urgent to prepare Shakuntala's written request concerning access to the clay ground. Shakuntala herself said, “In the application I'll write only that the old path to the clay ground has been used, and that I want its use investigated and heard. I won't write that the entire piece of land belonged to my forefathers.”

That decision did not diminish her claim. For the first time, it would be stated in a form to which the other side could respond. Remembering the limits Sarita had placed on permission to use her ledger, Naira gave Shakuntala a blank sheet of paper. Beneath the first question in her exercise book, the granddaughter had written: ‘Listen to the stories of those who lived in the house, those who worked there, and those who went away.’ It was not a complete answer, but it was enough of a beginning for learning.

Before closing the door, Sarita wiped the wet corner of the threshold. She bound the first bundle in cloth again, but laid aside one letter bearing an old postmark from Simatirtha. “This isn't my letter,” she told Naira. “I won't open it without permission from the person whose name is on it.” Naira looked at the letter without turning it over and went to fetch water to wash the dishes.

A little rice remained in the pot. Sanket asked whether they should save some roasted chillies for the granddaughter if she came tomorrow. “Ask her,” Sarita replied. “Why should everyone like what you like?” Sanket smiled. Amid the names of five generations, this small question about a meal was giving the home of the present day a time of its own.

Chapter 8 · The Letter from Simatirtha

At dawn, when Sarita lifted the envelope from the top of the chest, she found that damp had softened one corner. Water had dripped beside the barred window all night. Naira came to kindle the cooking fire and saw her mother passing a dry cloth around the edges of the envelope. The postmark was from Simatirtha; the name was Ramvati Khatve's. Sarita did not fold it away again. “This turned up yesterday while we were looking at Shakuntala's papers. When Ramvati was staying here, she left an old letter of hers in my keeping. Somehow there was never a time to return it.”

“Have you opened it?” Naira asked.

“No. A piece of paper doesn't become mine merely because it has grown old.” Measuring the water for the rice into a vessel, Sarita said, “Ramvati is going towards Makhaniya Dabra today. I'll put it into her hands. If she thinks it right, she'll tell us about it herself.”

Naira was getting her bag ready. She remembered how, the day before, Shakuntala's granddaughter had drawn five houses in her exercise book, with a blank road between them. A Simatirtha postmark made it easy to estimate the distance between two towns, but not to know how a letter had crossed it. She slipped the envelope into a plain protective sleeve to keep it dry. Sanket asked, “Shall I take a photograph, so we've got a copy?” Naira shook her head. “We'll ask Ramvati first. Keeping an envelope safe and having its image on everyone's phone are not the same thing.”

The water on the road beyond Videhapur had not yet risen to knee height. The wheels of the light vehicle threw up mud as it went. Naira and Sarita sat at the back. At a narrow bend before the pond, a man working for Devki Pal got up to move the bundles of wool he had laid beside the road. Devki herself was noting down the time at which the animals were taken across. New stakes had been driven into the footpath leading to the pasture beside the canal; both the animals and the wool bundles now had to go round by another way. Devki's receipt gave more attention to the extra cost of conveying the wool than to its weight. Naira did not ask to copy the receipt. She asked what one line meant, and Devki answered, “The freight is mine to pay; the path belongs to everyone.”

Farther on, a little marker bearing Phulo Chaurasia's name was tied in a furrow of a betel field. A worker was testing the dampness of the soil. The marker stated the proposed time for releasing water, but not how much water the field could bear. Beneath Suraj Chaudhary's palm tree, a receipt for the daily wage of a tree-climber had been stretched out to dry. A bamboo tube had arrived from Nandini Bhandari's nursery for a trial; its dimensions might prove useful for cultivation at the pond, but they would not establish the value of the nursery's land. All four kinds of work lay along the same road, yet the losses and gains of the four households were distinct.

Before they reached the pond, the vehicle stopped on a narrow culvert. Two young men sat there, delivering wedding invitations: one family was from Simatirtha, the other from Videhapur. Both said there would be music at the wedding, but no one had yet decided who would pay the bride's fare to visit her mother's home. The young men held the invitations and two slips concerning travel expenses. Sarita said with a laugh, “It will do no harm to reckon the travel fare before the wedding songs.” One of them asked, “But who will sing?” Sarita replied, “Whoever wishes to—and whoever is paid an honorarium for it.” A little laughter passed over the culvert, and the vehicle moved on.

Makhaniya Dabra was not like Barki Pokhari. There were neither masonry steps for bathing nor a stone platform for washing clothes. A safe footpath down to the water had been marked along the bank; beyond it, the makhana leaves, their thorns, and the marshy earth presented difficulties of their own. Ramani Bind was spreading wet sacks at the head of that path. Four women beside her were sorting dried makhana seeds from the previous season. The section planted with new seed lay across the water. If the level rose, they would have to move the sorting place; so the hours of work and the route into the pond had to be settled first that day.

“Will you finish popping them today?” Naira asked.

“Only a sample from the old lot,” Ramani replied. “The new crop is still in the water. To claim that we've brought it out and popped it today would be a lie to the market and a lie about our wages.” She showed Naira one of the seeds in her hand—dried, hard, needing heat and then a practised hand before it could be popped. “Work in the water and work beside the fire must be counted separately. People looking on call it all ‘makhana’.”

Sarita set down her cloth bag and sat on the bank. Naira noticed a thick ledger already lying open on the work mat. At the top was a heading for transactions under the water lease; below it, dates and numbers of loads. There was a column for women, labelled ‘Family assistance’. Its figure was zero. Ramani placed a finger on the page. “What I do when I go down into the water has been entered as assistance. The time these four women spend sorting is zero too. The value of the produce will go into the account of the person who holds the lease. There's nowhere that records how often we have had to shake the water off our bodies.”

A clerk said the old water-lease register had no separate column for wages. Instead of prolonging the argument, Ramani produced two sheets. The first recorded the times at which work began and ended; the second carried the names of the women present, entered with their own consent. Some did not wish their names made public; private receipts had been prepared for them.

“No names will be posted without consent,” Ramani said, “but anonymity must not become an excuse for withholding a day's pay.”

“These pages won't change who owns the lease,” the clerk replied.

“I'm not asking for ownership just now,” Ramani said. “I'm saying that sowing, entering the water, collecting the seeds, drying them, and popping them are not one person's labour. Let the dispute over ownership be heard separately. Write down today the price of the work done today.” Weariness showed on the clerk's face. He too said it would be difficult to release money without a signature in the account kept above him. Without raising her voice, Ramani laid three old receipts before him. One bore a man's name; on the other two there was nothing but the number of loads.

Ramani pointed out another entry. New transactions had been posted under the name of an old account holder, although the local register of deaths recorded that person as deceased. Ramani did not possess a certified copy of the death register, so she did not yet allege that the account was fraudulent. She asked instead for separate particulars: who had paid in the money, who had received it, and how the register had been updated. Naira remembered the notice concerning her mother's death, but resisted the temptation to treat the two occurrences as proof of the same crime.

Meanwhile, people gathered to agree on the sharing of seed and water. They first had to settle when water would be released, how much of the approach would remain safe, and whether anyone who entered the pond would have a helper. The small measurement taken with Nandini's tube was accepted only as a reading for today; a condition was added that it must be taken again if the rains grew heavier. Phulo's marker recording the watering time for her field was kept separate, because the cost of protecting the field could not be thrust upon the workers at the pond. A marker was left for the route used by Devki's animals. Someone gave the three undertakings the name of a common festival. The disputes, however, were not yet settled.

Ramani had the first rates entered on paper: the payment for the seeds sorted, the time spent drying them, and the remuneration for popping them, on three separate lines. No one accepted the argument that a skill which had taken days to learn should command a lower rate. A woman who had come for temporary work asked, “I've given half a day. Will you write down half my name?” Ramani replied, “Your whole name; the number of hours you worked, separately.” Hearing that, the clerk turned the page again. He made no payment yet, but agreed in writing to provide a copy of the attendance record and the separate rates.

Ramani added a second condition: women entering the water must have somewhere to change into dry clothes and to rest. There was only one shelter on the bank, and a merchant's sacks occupied half of it. The clerk said the goods might get wet if the sacks were moved. “Then find another safe place for the sacks,” Ramani answered. “To leave our people wet, with thorns in their skin, and then write zero against their labour—these are two parts of the same injustice.” The work group had half the shelter cleared at once. The sacks of seeds were raised onto a wooden platform.

During the half-hour break, Sarita saw Ramvati at the edge of the pond, taking papers written in two different scripts out of her bag and separating them. One came from a household where a marriage had taken place; the other concerned money sent home from work away. Her family of birth was not identified in the same manner on both. Sarita placed the envelope in her hand. “You left this at my house. I haven't opened it.” Ramvati touched a corner of the paper and looked at the postmark. Her eyes did not immediately fill with tears; first she read the date on the back, as though making a calculation.

“I wanted to reconcile the two forms of my name in one document then,” Ramvati said. “The marriage register wasn't made in the name by which they called me at home. When earnings came in, the bank wanted proof of the other name. I left this letter here so it wouldn't be opened in front of everybody.” Before thanking Sarita, she asked, “Who has seen it now?”

“Only Naira and I have seen the envelope,” Sarita answered. “Sanket asked whether he could take a photograph, but he didn't.” Ramvati relaxed a little. She opened the envelope herself and drew out a sheet yellowed with age. After reading it alone for some time, she returned. “It contains the old address of my mother's house, and mentions two testimonies,” she said. “I'll tell you one line, but there will be no copy of the whole letter. It is also about my mother's life.”

Naira closed her notebook. “Keep the original of a paper that serves both sides. If you ever need a translation for an application, you can choose the words yourself.” Ramvati said that once, when an expression of kinship was altered in translation, members of her mother's family had been taken for relatives by marriage. To correct the mistake in the documents, she wanted separate replies from both sides. The letter contained an old thread that might lead to such a reply, not a final decision.

Two expectations had stood behind Ramvati's marriage. Her mother wanted her daughter not to change her birth name; her husband's family wanted a single form in the documents. Ramvati had heard both, but within her own household she made her own decision about the name by which she would be called. “I won't turn my mother's family into a lie, and I won't turn my husband's family into an enemy either,” she said. “What is wrong on paper must be corrected. Whatever love there is in a relationship must not be wrung into a document of dispute.” Her words brought back to Sarita an old disagreement with her daughter Naira. She said nothing.

At the edge of Makhaniya Dabra, the wage slips belonging to Naseema's and Rafiq's families had arrived in a bag bearing Amir Kulhaiya's name. They sent letters by way of Simatirtha. The name Mahananda appeared on one sheet bearing their old family address; nobody mistook it for another name for the Tilwaha at Videhapur and added it to the map of the water lease. In Naseema's letter a term of domestic address carried different meanings in two languages. Amir wanted the translator's fee for that line stated plainly, because a difference so small could cause money to be held back under the wrong person's name.

The remittance account distinguished the gross sum, the charges deducted along the way, and the amount received at home. According to Amir, the intermediary had said that all the charges were to be paid once, yet the document named three deductions. This still required verification. Taking the slip, Naira added the figures, one after another; the two totals did not agree. She told Amir to ask both sender and recipient to show their separate receipts, and not to call the intermediary a thief yet. Amir agreed, but said anxiously, “If I pay the fee a second time under the name of correcting an error, how many days will the medicine at home have to wait?”

Elsewhere, Sugni's old exercise book held a memory of flooding, recorded under the name Kosi or Kosika. Suraj's family had linked that memory to a debt on fields the flood had cut away. The first page of the book recorded no water-level readings, only an estimate of when the household had fled. Naira listened to the recollection but did not set it alongside today's measurement at the pond in Videhapur as though the two were comparable. A different river, a different year, different people: resemblance in suffering does not make maps identical. The page concerning Sugni's household debt was put aside for the next meeting, separate from what was owed for the makhana work.

As the day wore on, some visitors who had come to watch the makhana being sorted began asking why so small an undertaking needed so many separate lines in the accounts. Ramani showed them the dried seeds. Two women were lifting the same sack, but one was testing the seeds while the other repeatedly turned to tend the heat of the fire. The time required for the two skills was different, as was the danger of injury to their hands. Ramani said, “When the day's produce is given one price, that does not give you leave to erase all the kinds of labour that went into it by calling them one job.” Someone laughed, but before putting another question, the visitors sat down beside the work and watched.

A small bill from a trader arrived at the edge of the pond. It set out the conditions of an advance sent by Kamala Jain's family: the price of the goods, the sacks, the carriage, and the date for repayment. It said nothing about Kamala's private or religious decisions; no rumours about her could be accounted for by this bill. Ramani said they would not accept the advance as grounds for deducting the entire price of the produce beforehand. The trader's representative left a written agreement to reconsider the rate at the next meeting. The buyer had not changed, but a previously unanswered condition was now clear on paper.

A young man who came to examine the sacks wanted to put makhana seeds of different sizes together in one heap. Ramani stopped his hand. “If the market pays different prices for different sizes, you must recognise the separate care the women put into sorting them.” The young man said that buyers at the market looked at a basket, not at names. Ramani placed two different samples in the basket to show him and said that the rate the buyer accepted after inspection must be recorded in writing. This time he did not object, but neither did he sign for a new rate. The question remained open, deferred until the fair.

After midday, the popping of the old lot stopped. Clean water was set aside for washing hands. Ramani folded the private slips belonging to women who had asked that their names not be publicly displayed and put them in her bag. On the public board were written only the number of workers, the hours worked, and the total amount due. For the first time, the clerk copied those figures into his ledger. Payment was still outstanding; nevertheless, nobody could afterwards claim that the women had merely come to watch.

When the singing began, one woman held back at first. “This is my grandmother's tune,” she said, “but I've changed the words. If you're going to write a name, listen to me sing before you put mine down.” With her permission, Ramani had the song's title and the singer's name entered on a cultural sheet separate from the work ledger. The song recalled the road home, wet palms, and cooked rice. The melody rose and fell; someone forgot a line, and someone else laughingly began again. Naira did not record the song. For a while, she simply listened.

Sarita repeatedly missed the beat as she tried to clap along. A young woman beside her laughed and showed her how to hold back her hands for one beat before the second line began. “I know the rhythm of lifting the lid from a cooking pot,” Sarita said. “I'll have to learn this new one.” Everyone burst out laughing. In the midst of that laughter, Ramani asked when they should rehearse the song for the village's next fair. The young woman said she could come only after her school examination. Ramani agreed to change the date. No page of debt was opened, no accusation written down; the singer's time was simply respected.

After the song ended, Ramvati called Naira aside. She folded her letter and put it into her bundle. “When I go to Simatirtha again, I'll obtain separate testimony about why my mother's name changed between two papers. If I want one of those accounts to reach you, I'll ask first. I want to protect my home; I'm not asking for the right to conceal anybody's crime.” Naira said she would not make a name public without consent, but an ordinary error in a register would still have to be corrected through the proper procedure. The two women agreed on that distinction.

As they were leaving the pond, Ramani showed Naira a copy of her new page. The working hours were clear, but there appeared to be a difference between the route recorded for the incoming water and the path actually used to enter the pond. “This wasn't what I'd set out to examine,” Ramani said, “but no measurement was taken today on the side from which they say the water comes. When Tara and Aditi come tomorrow, I'll ask about that first.” Naira did not regard it as decisive proof of some hidden scheme. She merely marked the questions separately with her pen: From where does the water enter, and who measured it, and when?

On the journey home, the old envelope was no longer in Sarita's bag. In the space it had occupied she put a small sample of makhana for the granddaughter, which Ramani had given her permission to take. Ramvati's private letter had reached its rightful owner; for the first time the women's wages had been entered on a separate page; the account of the deductions from Amir's remittance still awaited examination. As the vehicle rounded the bend, Sarita asked, “It'll be late before I can cook the rice. What shall we eat today?” Naira said, “Let's begin with what is left. But we'll ask Sanket first whether he wants a chilli with it.”

Chapter 9 · The Blocked Channel

Along the far side of Barki Pond, the grass had grown so tall that it was difficult to read the direction of the water from the stalks rising above it. At dawn Tara Mallik thrust a slender bamboo rod into the growth. It sank into soft earth, then struck something solid and stopped. She bent and touched the ground. Beneath the mud lay the straight edge of a brick. When she cut through the grass roots and lifted them away, one corner of an old, half-buried outlet came into view. No water flowed through it. In the pond above, yesterday's rainwater lay motionless.

“Is this passage shown on the map?” asked Lalit Vishwakarma. He had brought two wooden stakes. Before answering, Tara traced the edge of the brick with the tip of her rod. “There is a line on the map. But we have come today to find out where that line opened. A line on paper cannot make a brick stand upright.” Lalit drove his stakes in farther away, where the earth would not give way beneath anyone's feet. When someone proposed climbing down and clearing the mouth by hand, Tara forbade it. “First we must know the depth, and the weight pressing down from above.”

A little way off stood the warehouse's rear wall. Fresh plaster gleamed at its base, and a strip of cement had been laid across a narrow crack beside it. The old papers showed more open ground between the wall and the pond than could now be seen. Tara took a small drawing, made in her father's hand, from her bag. The paper had yellowed; some figures had faded away. On one side was the mark of a woven bamboo structure made by Shyam Mallik, and on the other a route taken by water. “This drawing is not a title deed,” Tara said. “It only shows how work used to be carried out here.”

When Aditi arrived, the dust of the marketplace still clung to the soles of her shoes. In her hands were an old municipal report and the inspection sheet for that day. For a month she had been hearing complaints that the channel was blocked. The preliminary report recommended minor repairs: remove the accumulated silt, replace the damaged bricks along the outlet. Tara looked at the sheet and then pointed towards the wall. “If a weight has been placed over the mouth, clearing the silt alone will not be enough. Where will the water go?”

Aditi sheltered the papers beneath her umbrella to keep them dry. “I drew up the proposal for minor repairs from the measurements available before I visited the site,” she said. “What I see now gives us grounds for another examination. But one old brick does not prove that the channel ran from here beneath the warehouse.” Tara did not contradict her. She laid her rod on the ground in two different positions and said, “That is precisely what I am saying. First, write the question correctly for the investigation.”

Meanwhile people had gathered at the pond steps. A day for the communal dredging of the pond had been fixed before the rains, but the work had stopped halfway through, when heavy clouds gathered and wages remained unpaid. One heap of excavated mud had dried hard upon the footpath leading to the steps. Some said the pond had been cleaned; others said the steps had been blocked. Today's gathering was not a repetition of the festival, but an occasion to reopen the accounts of that unfinished day. A child had brought the flute on which the songs were played, though it was not yet time for him to sound it.

Urmila Rajak arrived carrying wet clothes. On one side of the steps, three women were waiting for their turn to wring out their washing; a bamboo enclosure set up for the fishery lease had narrowed the path. “Calling the pond public does not open my washing place again,” Urmila said. “My working hours are different. When the fishing nets are spread out to dry, where am I to wash the clothes?” She showed them her statement of expenses: the extra fare caused by the detour, the labour of carrying the wet washing once more, and the delay to a consignment of hospital linen.

There was an old receipt for a fishery lease in Ramani's name, but she had not come that day. Tara did not send Naira a photograph of the receipt. Instead she asked Urmila whether the hours reserved for fishing could be kept separate. “The approach to the washing place must be cleared,” Urmila replied, “and the fishermen's livelihood must not be destroyed either. But the written conditions concern fishing. They do not, of themselves, extinguish my right of passage.” Tara gave that sentence a line of its own in her notes.

Hira Sahni stepped out of his boat and watched the inspection from a distance. He needed to keep an eye on the time for setting the evening nets, but Tara had called him there. Hira pointed to the direction taken by a dry leaf floating on the water's surface. The wind was blowing eastwards; the leaf was turning back. “Do not write that wherever the leaf goes, the current must be going the same way,” he told them. “The surface may be still while the route underneath is different. When I take out the boat, I test the depth separately with a bamboo pole.” Aditi entered his observation on the measuring sheet as the observation of a working boatman. She did not call it an engineering survey.

Lalit was moving his wooden stakes away from the open patch. In his bag lay the carpenter's receipt: two stakes, one straight board, and a temporary safety barrier. When he named the price, a man nearby declared that everything should be provided free for a community festival. Lalit laid the board on the ground. “If I choose to give something, I shall say so. But if wood requested for an official survey, and a day's work of my hands, are simply treated as free, there will be no truthful account of the work.” Aditi promised to attach his receipt to her inspection papers, though payment would still depend on the office's approval that day.

By then Shyam Mallik had been turning a fragment of old bamboo weaving over in his hands. The woven piece had been made not to dam water in the drain but to mark a place where the earth might collapse. A new contractor had entered it among the materials for a temporary bridge. Tara measured the old specimen and said that when the work changed, its name ought to change as well. Shyam did not prolong the argument. On his daughter's paper he marked three knots in the old pattern. The price of the work and the credit due for its design would have to be discussed more fully later.

A volunteer opened the page of unfinished accounts for the pond dredging. The number of people who had lifted mud on the first day, the cost of food on the second, and the rain on the third had all been crowded into the same column. The receipt for vessels of rice brought from Rukhsana's kitchen was separate; some had entered it as a donation. Tara did not examine every receipt, but proposed that the labour of the women who prepared the meal be costed separately. Two schoolboys planted a red flag on an old mound of earth to keep children from playing there. The communal undertaking would survive only if the record of who had done how much work survived with it.

Along with the grass-cutters came Dhani Rajbhar's application concerning a footpath used for irrigation. He had written that a bamboo fence had been erected across the mouth of the old ditch that carried surplus pond water towards the fields. Dhani himself was absent; with the application came a schedule of farming seasons. Tara marked the matter separately: was the channel intended for public drainage or for irrigation? The same line could not determine both rights. It would not do to save the higher fields by drowning the houses below; nor would it do to save those houses by releasing water onto the fields without permission.

Two women from the settlement behind the pond arrived carrying baskets. Mud excavated on the dredging day had been dumped outside their doorways. After it dried, people had begun driving large carts over it, and the carts, turning there, struck the walls around their hearths. The women did not withdraw from the communal dredging, but no one had asked them to decide where the mud should go. Tara had the destination of the heaps and the cost of carrying them away entered separately on the new work sheet. “I have nothing against work done for everyone,” one woman said. “But my doorstep is not a place for everyone's refuse.” Space was left on the new sheet for her consent.

One of the young men cutting grass said that, now the old opening had been found, they could all clear it together in a day. Another, whose leg had sunk into the mud the day before, stopped him. The upper soil was wet; if a hollow lay beneath it, the earth might cave in. Aditi herself took a length of cord and marked the safe boundary. Standing beside her, Tara said, “Enthusiasm makes hands reach out. But who will keep the accounts for an injured labourer's family?” One young man quietly put down his spade. He had not run away from the work: he began putting up the barrier.

The clerk who had accompanied Aditi was reading out a list of records. In a supply slip sent from Simatirtha, Rafiq's own description of his regional identity had been recorded, but the office software had merged it into another, more familiar category. Tara asked that the complaint about the wording of the slip alone be entered on the sheet, saying that the form of the name Rafiq used for himself must remain distinct. Another file contained Maitri Shrestha's objection to a translation concerning the transport of medicines: the time when the supplies arrived and the time when they were issued had been rendered by the same word. Neither file proved why the channel had become blocked. Yet an incorrect identification could change where responsibility fell in the future.

When the sun came out, the bricks concealed in the grass became clearly visible. Above the old opening lay a deep score unlike the surrounding mud. Tara copied its outline onto paper; she did not measure it. Aditi regarded the provisional comparison of the ground levels on either side of the opening as incomplete, because what everyone was calling the old measurement had been made from the present water level. The water stood high after the rain. Nearby there was also a narrow cut made by a small run of water. “We must not treat all this as a single drainage route,” Aditi said. “The small flow, the water-cut and the channel will have different functions.” Tara ran her palm beneath the grass and saw the distinction for herself.

Aditi opened the last page of the old report. The date on which measurements had been taken was written there, but not the points from which they had been taken. Someone began to accuse a member of the former survey team. Aditi stopped him. “The signature is mine. First we shall find the original measurement register; then we shall decide who is responsible.” Tara asked whether the register was safe. Aditi wrote down that it must be checked the next day.

By then the sunlight had slipped behind the clouds again. A sudden wind crossed the pond; one row of grass bent, while the next remained upright. For a moment Tara watched the line made by that bending. In her childhood Shyam had told her that, before the rain, the grass around the outlet used to bend just so. The memory had given her a reason to look for the place. But she could not take the wind's movement as certain proof of the old current's direction. On her sheet she wrote: “Local memory: confirmation pending.”

At noon the people engaged in dredging the pond sat down to eat together. Rice from Rukhsana's kitchen had arrived with kanika and vegetables. A small boy began playing his flute, but stopped halfway through to ask when the heap behind them would be removed. People laughed at the question; then an elder said that when a child's playground had been fenced off, there must still be room for a child's laughter. Shifting her plate, Tara said the safe footpath would be made first. No one forbade the flute. Amid the work, laughter continued, even without a promise to sustain it.

After the meal Urmila returned to the steps. She asked Tara to show her the papers. The provisional plan for draining the water showed a route to the washing place in pencil, but gave no width for it. Lifting her bundle of clothes in both hands, Urmila walked along the proposed route to demonstrate. At the narrow point she could go no farther. “Now write that a person going to the washing place does not go empty-handed,” she said. Tara moved the removal of the earth heaps to the first place in the work plan. The annual observance honouring the pond steps would be held in Kartik; preparations for it had begun with today's footpath.

A farmer asked who would be answerable if opening the channel sent water towards his betel field. Aditi did not assure him that such a thing was impossible. She said that the new measurements, the old map, the slope of the field and the likely rainfall runoff would have to be examined separately. Tara also wanted them to decide, before work began, where the water might be held temporarily. Opening the mouth without examination would be as careless as leaving it closed forever.

A warehouse employee had been watching the inspection from afar. He said the wall had recently been plastered, but the paperwork for the warehouse extension was at the office; he had no copy. Tara neither asked his name nor accused him. Aditi noted the warehouse office as the place to which a formal request must be sent. As the employee turned away, Tara noticed water standing at the foot of the wall. That was an observed fact. To infer the whole underground course from the standing water would be a different undertaking.

A note arrived on behalf of the families who sold fish from Barki Pond: the terms of the fishery lease conferred rights over fish, not every right concerning bathing, washing or drainage. Two different signatures appeared on the note, but it was unclear to whom one of them belonged. Aditi asked for verification. Before arriving at any decision, Tara drew Urmila's washing place and the bank used for fishing as two separate lines. She understood that saving one person's access to the steps today must not take away another person's livelihood tomorrow.

As evening came on, a bamboo barrier was put up around the deep cut. Yellow cloth was tied to Lalit's stakes. Separate teams were selected to cut grass, remove the heaps and make a temporary approach, with each team's remuneration recorded. The new fill lying across the channel mouth was not removed: doing so might affect the warehouse foundations. Tara did not stop there. Standing outside the barrier, she compared Shyam's old drawing once more with Aditi's measuring sheet. The two agreed approximately on the direction of the opening, but differed in their figures for the distance.

“Should I have written ‘ordinary accumulation of silt’ in my first report?” Aditi asked of her own accord. As she awaited an answer, she looked not at Tara but at the mark that had been fenced off since morning. “Do not write that you saw what you did not see,” Tara replied. “But neither can you now bury what you have seen beneath the old line.” Aditi took out her sheet. She did not strike out the words “minor repairs”; beside them she wrote clearly, with the date: “Traces of an old outlet observed on site; further investigation required into possible structural drainage and encroachment. No work without measurements.”

The written correction did not, in that instant, drain the pond. Nor did it secure Urmila's unpaid wages. But the trace of the outlet now appeared in the public inspection record, and responsibility for the small task of opening a safe approach had been entered separately. The volunteers began collecting their tools from the grass they had cut. That day one barrier had been made secure, the value of several people's work had been put on record, and the rainwater remained standing exactly where it had stood before.

When Naira arrived in the evening, Tara showed her only the public portion of the inspection sheet. Naira did not immediately connect this mark with Sarita's ledger or the transactions at the makhana pool. “When, according to your papers, was this outlet blocked?” she asked. “At present,” Tara replied, “I have found the opening, not the date on which it was closed.” In Hira's old travel notebook there was a page bearing the name of the river Kamala; that name also appeared in the papers concerning the earth at Shakuntala's parental home. Naira did not put the two documents together on the assumption that Kamala was another name for the Tilwaha. She thought only that she would have to speak to different people to hear the memories of the old journeys and the old earth.

As Naira returned home, the mud of the channel clung to her shoes. Sarita set a lota of water by the doorway. “What was opened today?” she asked. Naira took off her shoes. “Not the channel,” she said, “but the way to investigate it. And a temporary footpath to the steps.” Sarita understood that what had been opened as a question on paper remained closed in the water. She began serving the meal. Outside, water dripped softly. Tara had no definite measurement yet for that dripping, but she had a reason to return tomorrow.

Chapter 10 · The Shadow of a Name

After the night's rain had ceased, a thin film of water shone along the footpath leading from Barki Pond to the warehouse. The yellow cloth Tara had tied to Lalit's stake the previous day had grown wet and sagged halfway down. Naira tightened its knot. When the wind rose, the stake did not stir; the earth still held it fast. But beside the old bricks within the cordoned-off area, the water stood just as it had before. Yesterday's inspection slip had said 're-examination'. Today they still had to decide where that re-examination should begin.

Tara arrived with two notebooks. One bore the stamp of the municipal survey team; the other contained lines she had drawn herself. “First I need a way of reaching the back of the warehouse,” she said. “Unless we establish where the line that runs across the paper actually passes over the ground, taking measurements will only repeat yesterday's mistake.” “Have we permission?” Naira asked. Tara said that the warehouse office had been asked to arrange a time for inspection, but written permission to enter had not been given. They therefore decided to remain outside the cordon that day.

They had heard the name Purnadhar before. In old conversations at Sarita's house, it had meant, by turns, useless land, the bed of a river that had changed its course, and a low-lying place that filled as soon as rain fell. Behind the warehouse wall lay a narrow strip of land known by that same name. Much of it had already been filled in. Water collected where grass had grown; where cement gleamed, no stream was visible. The survival of a name was no reason to assume that the old passage remained open.

Sushila Mahato arrived carrying a small tied handful of paddy seed. The day before, she had asked the municipal team not to let the inspection barriers close the path she used to irrigate her field. Tara noticed the seed in her hand. “What do you want to show us with that?” she asked. Sushila picked up a pinch of wet earth. “I've come to tell you how the timing of sowing works in my field. If you open the channel and the water suddenly runs that way, the seed will drown. If it stays blocked, the beds on the western side will dry up. Either way, I bear the cost.”

On a page of her notebook Tara drew not the name of Sushila's field, but the routes by which water entered and left it. Sushila explained that the family had followed the same way of selecting seed for a generation, though she was now learning to calculate the water levels from her school-educated daughter. “She says, 'Mother, if we write down our estimates, we can test them next year.' I tell her, 'First take the soil in your hand.' Put the two together, and it will be better still.” Naira saw her smile. It was not only the engineer's knowledge being tested here; a whole year's savings from a field depended on those lines.

A little way off, there was a receipt in Gomati Beldar's name for a day's construction labour. It recorded the carrying of earth, but did not say how many loads had been tipped behind the warehouse. Gomati was working at another site that day. Her absence was taken neither as an admission of guilt nor as consent. Tara wrote to the office requesting a copy of the receipt. Who had carried out the filling that could now be seen, and who had kept the accounts of the wages paid, were two separate questions.

A handcart stopped on the right of the cordon. Rani Halalkhor's name was entered on the municipal cleaning crew's list. The workers were separating broken glass and barbed wire discarded beside the standing water so that visitors to the inspection would not cut their feet. Not everyone had protective gloves; the space on the list for requesting equipment was blank. Naira noticed the blank, but did not photograph the workers without their consent. The clearing made the path look clean. It did not dispose of the question of unsafe work.

Meanwhile an elderly man arrived with folded papers in a jute bag. Tara introduced him as Ratan Vanpar. Ratan had been born into a family settled beside the river, though he now lived in a neighbourhood behind the market. From the bag he drew an old, hand-drawn map. Its edges had worn away; across its centre ran a crooked line, alongside the names of four fields from another time. “This is a copy made in my father's hand,” Ratan said. “I don't know where the original is.”

Naira wiped her hands before taking hold of a corner of the paper. “Where did the line you're showing us once run?” Ratan answered, “When I was small, the river after the rains did not flow deep enough to carry a boat. But there was a passage where water gathered, as though remembering its old home. My father used to say, 'Water does not readily part from this earth.'” He stopped speaking. What he had offered was a sentence from memory, not a claim to have measured anything.

Ratan had not brought his map to sell it. The measurements of the strip inside the cordon might bring together the footpath his maternal grandmother had used and the site of an old, temporary fish enclosure. He wanted that distinction entered separately in the hearing. “It would be wrong to call what was a field a river and make someone surrender possession,” he said. “And it would be no better to call the place where water used to flow a field and bury it.” Tara assured him that both possibilities would be examined, but his hand-drawn map could not serve as conclusive proof of land rights.

While Ratan was speaking, a warehouse employee came to the outer gate carrying an empty sack. He wanted to spread it in the sun to dry. The municipal team did not tell him to keep the gate closed; they merely asked him not to leave anything inside the inspection cordon. The man picked a small, broken wooden board out of a heap of rubbish and set it aside. Two letters in old paint remained visible on the board. When the dust was brushed away, Tara read the name: 'Purnadhar'. Nobody present knew what year it had been painted or where the board had originally stood.

Tara measured the board. The wood was light, with two rusty nails on its back. “It isn't a boundary marker,” she said. “It might have been a signboard.” The warehouse employee said it had been lying in the heap since the day before, and he knew nothing of its origin. Naira wrote in her notes: 'Found beside rubbish outside the gate; original location unknown.' The words on the board were no proof of the history of the land or the warehouse, but the board itself was certainly an object that held the memory of a name.

Seeing signs of another shower, the employee moved the board away from the gate and propped it against the solid wall. At that moment sunlight fell through a break in the clouds. Naira raised her hand to show Ratan where to fold his map, and her gaze happened to fall on the board. It had already been moved away from the wall and placed somewhere else, yet its narrow shadow still stood on the wall in its former place. A second shadow slowly darkened where the board now rested; the first remained for a little while, unchanged.

Naira's hand stopped above the map. She blinked. Water was dripping, the sunlight was changing, and a vehicle passing nearby had stirred up dust. She did not know whether anyone else had seen anything on that old stretch of wall. The shadow slowly grew pale, like someone turning round belatedly at the sound of their name. Meanwhile Tara was talking with Ratan about the folds in his paper. The employee was gathering up the sacks. No one cried out in astonishment.

Naira went over to the wall. There was a faint line in the old plaster, but it did not have the shape of the board. She set her palm against the wall. The shadow of her hand moved with it. She wanted to lift the board and repeat the experiment, but she stopped herself. Whether what she had seen was the fatigue of her eyes, the shifting light, or some small delay in time itself, she could not yet give it a name. The rusty nails, the colour of the wood, and the place where it had been found could all be measured; that lingering shadow was a private experience, hers alone.

“What are you looking at?” Tara asked. “A difference in the old plaster on the wall,” Naira replied. “Photograph it, but don't say the photograph tells us where the board used to hang.” Tara agreed. Naira said nothing about her strange experience. She felt less fear than a kind of embarrassment: if she entered into another person's records something whose only evidence lay within her as a memory, even that memory might be pronounced false.

The inspection team placed bamboo rods at two points to gauge the depth of the water beside Purnadhar. Remembering Hira's method of measuring water, Tara asked whether the ends of the rods had reached firm ground or merely stopped in mud. The first sank into the soil; the second touched hard earth. The figures were recorded, but no one claimed that both measurements had been taken from the same bed. A short message arrived from Aditi's office: a copy of the warehouse's old approved plan had been requested; it had not yet been obtained.

Another paper followed the message. A slip gave a different name for an old crossing used by Gopal Majhi's boat, but on the municipality's new map the line did not extend as far as the passage had once run. Gopal was not there himself; the slip recorded the time of his boat's next crossing. Tara wrote in the margin that a navigable route and a safe rescue route in a disaster must not be treated as one and the same. What was needed now was to compare the documents, not to presume the boatman's agreement.

Suraj Gangota's application for a loan arrived with the other papers. He wanted the dues on land taken by the river to be considered separately from his old land title. A person looking at the survey of the strip beside the warehouse might call all of it abandoned land. Suraj's application was a reminder that behind land described as abandoned, a household's debt might still be alive. Naira did not copy the amount he sought onto the public sheet. The application was kept separately, under restricted access, with the land-dispute papers.

At noon Sushila returned. This time she had a small diagram drawn by her daughter. It recorded the triangular part of their field, the height of the water channel, and the different sowing dates in each of the preceding two years. “We worked all this out sitting in a room at home,” she said. “My daughter told me that if a number was wrong, I should strike it through and write a new one. I realised that even a mistake written down by village people can be corrected.” Naira smiled. “Instead of rubbing it out, strike through it and add the date,” she replied. “Then next time we'll know when the correction was made.”

Sushila was willing to leave the page with Tara, but decided to take the original home. Tara made a copy in her own hand. In this modest piece of work, two days' water levels, the timing of flooding in the field, and the calculations behind the choice of seed became a new question for the enquiry. No order to open the channel could be issued without the warehouse's formal approval papers; meanwhile, work in the fields could not simply stand still. They had to record whose preparations for the next rainfall were most inadequate.

When Ratan saw the lines of Sushila's field, he grew a little uneasy. “If this strip used to be a watercourse,” he asked, “why is there a field boundary there now?” Sushila opened her handful of seed. “I did not build that embankment, but my crop grows behind it. Don't destroy my paddy today in order to understand the past.” Both gathered up their papers and fell silent. Naira told Tara that the disagreement must be recorded alongside the two possibilities shown by the maps. There was, as yet, no order either to cut anyone's crop or to remove the barriers.

Standing nearby, Ratan could feel other people's eyes upon his old map. He said to Naira, “When I see the names written in my father's hand on this paper, so many things about our home return to me. But I cannot say my father was right about everything.” Naira handed the paper back. As Ratan tightened the string around the folded map, he recalled how his mother, when the rains came down, would first lift the sacks of wheat above the level of the doorway and only then ask after the river. In his household, the memory of water had been both a fear and an ordinary sequence of domestic tasks.

Later in the afternoon, small children began playing marbles on the path at Purnadhar. One child's marble rolled inside the cordon, and he made to run after it. Naira stopped him and told him that not all the barbed wire had yet been cleared away. Instead of enduring a long scolding, the child asked, “Who will build this path?” Tara answered that if the path was for public use, its measurements and the responsibility for repairing it would be put into writing. The child did not understand, but someone rolled his marble back to him. He returned to his game.

Far away in the market, smoke rose from Rukhsana's kitchen. Naira remembered the smell of rice cooking at Sarita's house. In recent days her time had been so divided between home and office that she had not finished a brief conversation with Sanket the day before. The child's marble reminded her of Sanket's old paper boats, which he had floated in the water of the courtyard when he was little. To those boats, river and pond were places for play; to Urmila, a livelihood; to Sushila, cultivation; to Ratan, the way home. No single survey could contain all the meanings of the same piece of ground.

As she closed the inspection, Tara separated three sets of papers: yesterday's drawing of the outlet, today's limited enquiry at Purnadhar, and the list of records requested from the warehouse. “What will happen to the old board you found?” Naira asked. Tara said it would be wrapped in clean, dry cloth and deposited, in the presence of a warehouse representative, as an object found at the site; its origin would be recorded as unknown. The mere act of reading its name did not transfer ownership of the object to the municipality.

Before going home, Naira stood alone for a while. The sunlight no longer touched that wall; the long shadow of the warehouse stretched across the ground. She opened her small private notebook, which she kept apart from Sarita's ledger and the official documents. She wrote: 'Today, outside the gate at Purnadhar, after the wooden board was moved, I seemed to see its former shadow remain on the wall for a little while. No other witness known. Possible error of sight or light. Not evidence for the verification of facts.' She closed the notebook. The purpose of that page was not to address a court, but to speak truthfully to herself.

That evening Sarita was washing rice at home. “What became of the name today?” she asked casually. Naira said that an old board marked 'Purnadhar' had been found, but that it did not establish the boundaries of the place. Draining the water from the rice, Sarita said, “Sometimes a thing keeps its name, though its place has shifted.” Naira did not tell her about the shadow on the wall. Sarita did not ask. There had been silences like this in the household before, silences each of them had learned to carry in her own way.

Sanket sat at the table, repairing the cracked cover of his phone. An acquaintance wanted to see the photograph he had taken the day before of a red mark on the warehouse. Should he send it? Naira did not take the phone from his hand. She merely asked, “Does the picture show anyone else's papers or face?” Before answering, Sanket opened it and stared intently at the image. Then he said that the backs of two men and the corner of an old receipt were visible at one side. “The picture is yours,” Naira told him, “but not everyone shown in it has the same rights over its use. Tomorrow we'll decide what can properly be shared.” Sanket kept the phone with him.

When Sarita served rice, Sanket asked for rotis. There was little flour in the house; Sarita said she would knead some in the morning. Suppressing a smile, Sanket said, “Then give me rice, but plenty of pickle with it.” Naira laughed. The family settled this small dispute over dinner. It corrected no record and uncovered no crime. Yet sometimes laughter shared between two plates keeps a household free, for a moment, of arguments over names and papers.

That night Naira looked once more at the copy of the official inspection report. It clearly distinguished the documentary sources concerning Purnadhar, the measurements available, and the permissions still outstanding. Her private notebook lay in another compartment. She did not bring the two pages together. A breeze came through the window from the direction of the old pond. Whether it carried a voice, or merely stirred the leaves, was not something Naira needed to decide. Tomorrow she would have to hear Sanket's own conditions about the photograph of the warehouse mark. Today's task had been only this: not to turn the experience of a shadow attached to a name into an accusation of wrongdoing.

Chapter ıı · My Phone, My Terms

At dawn Sanket wiped the screen of his phone with the end of Sarita's old cotton sari. On the screen was the warehouse wall, and on the wall a crooked red line. Beside the line were the backs of two men, and, at one edge, the corner of what looked like a torn receipt. Sanket enlarged the photograph with his finger. The red paint came into focus, but the writing on the receipt grew blurred. He held the phone away and looked again. What he had regarded yesterday evening as no more than a mark now held within it the concerns of three different people.

Sarita was baking rotis on the hearth. They had been short of flour the day before; this morning she had kneaded the dough in advance. When Sanket reached out to take a roti, Sarita pointed to his plate. "Sit down first. The phone won't eat your roti, but if you eat at this speed you'll go on feeling hungry." Sanket did not laugh. "I've got to show the photograph today," he said. "Who will ask those two men?"

Naira was taking an inspection slip from her bag. "I cannot say that because their faces are not visible, we have no need of their permission," she said. "And even if their permission is obtained, that doesn't entitle someone else to draw whatever conclusions they please from their photograph. What is it you want to do?" Sanket broke off a piece of roti and thought for a while. "I'll keep the original photograph. I'll show only the part needed for the inquiry. I won't send it over the internet." Taking another roti off the griddle, Sarita said, "Good. Now don't let your breakfast go cold."

When they reached the gate at Purnadhar, Tara took a fresh measurement sheet out of her paper bag. Yesterday's yellow circle was still visible at the mouth of the channel. On the cement dust in front of the warehouse, the night's water had left small marks. "Did you take the photograph?" Tara asked Sanket. He said yes, but did not hand her his phone. "First tell me where you're going to use it," he said. Tara was silent for a moment. The condition, voiced so quietly, did not offend her. Instead, she checked her papers and answered, "To examine the marks at the site. Not to display it at a public meeting."

Sanket opened the photograph. The two short red strokes on the warehouse wall looked, from a little distance, like a single connected mark. Tara asked on what day, at what time, and from what distance he had taken the picture. Sanket showed her the time, but could not remember the distance. "Then we won't write down a guessed distance," Tara said. Sanket held the phone steady. A few days earlier he would have taken questions of this kind for distrust. Today he understood that the credibility of a picture he himself had made could depend upon his willingness to say, "I don't know."

A warehouse worker came out through the gate. He was the same man who had been drying sacks the day before. The colour of the clothing on one back in the photograph resembled his shirt, but Sanket did not announce that he had identified him. The worker said the red paint might have been a mark left when old stock was unloaded. In some places, masons also put red marks beside cracks they were repairing. “I'm telling you what I've heard,” he added. “I don't know who made this particular mark on this wall.” Tara entered his name and the time of his statement on her sheet; she did not record what he said as a formal admission.

Sanket looked at the corner of the receipt visible at the edge of the photograph. Until yesterday it had seemed to him an inanimate scrap. Now, seeing the empty basket for carrying goods in the worker's hand, he understood that a receipt might also be a record of somebody's dues and earnings. “Can I ask whether that man's back is in the photograph?” he said. The worker replied, “I won't speak for another man when he isn't here.” Sanket switched off the phone. It did not seem right to fill an answer that was not yet available with something imagined.

Beside the wall, Tara opened her notebook to a drawing she had made herself. The position of the red paint was represented there by no more than a dot. She turned the page towards Sanket. “Your original photograph may have evidentiary value. But first we must find the original measurement for this point and the old records of the wall. The paint tells us nothing by itself about ownership. Nor does it prove, by itself, that water was blocked here.” Sanket wrote in his notebook: ‘The paint may have served several purposes.’ That short line on paper did not make his photograph less important; it protected the photograph from being made the instrument of a false accusation.

Tara began packing her bag for the meeting at Pachhiyari Chaur, the western lowland. Sushila's map of the moisture in her fields had reached her the day before. If the channel mouth beside the warehouse was opened, any discussion of where the water would move would remain incomplete without knowing the present slope of the lowland. Naira asked whether Sanket would go with them. Tightening the case around his phone, he said, “I will. But first it must be agreed that nobody on the meeting committee will use my photograph in their publicity.” Tara wrote down the condition. Her signature was on the paper; Sanket's rights had not passed into her hands.

The shade of the trees was still cool along the path towards Pachhiyari Chaur. On one side stood young transplanted rice; on the other, vegetable beds. People called the thin, raised ridge of earth between them a chanchar. When the rains rose, people and small animals walked upon it. Seeing the gleam of water across the lowland, Sanket asked, “Are there fish here too?” “In season,” Sushila answered. “But water you can see and a right to catch the fish in it are not the same thing. And when the water recedes, this very ground becomes a place for growing rice.”

Sushila laid a bamboo pole on the earth and traced two lines. The first marked the remembered reach of the rainwater; the second, the path used by people and animals in the dry season. “If you draw both in the same colour,” she said, “half our village will become empty space on the town's paper.” Tara took out red and blue pencils, but Sushila stopped her. “Write what the lines are called first. Give them colours afterwards.” Sanket remembered the red mark on the warehouse wall. He did not open his phone to show it.

Just then two girls came from the far side of the lowland carrying bundles of grass. The first found her footing on the chanchar; the second stepped down into wet mud. Laughing, she set her bundle to one side. But Sushila stopped them where they stood and asked which way would still be passable next week, when the water rose here. “The path that seems short in the dry season becomes very long in the rains,” one of the girls said. Tara drew the detour she described as a faint line on her map. The girl said that going home by that route took more time. Time was recorded alongside distance.

Ramesh Kushwaha arrived carrying a basket of vegetables. His feet were muddy, and in his hand was a small receipt recording the days on which water had been supplied. He pointed out his field on the map and asked who would pay for the first crop in his beds if the mouth of the drainage channel was widened. “I don't object to water being drained away from the village,” he said. “But along the route it takes, how many times will water stand in my field? Why should I say yes without a calculation?” In the margin of her paper Tara made separate spaces for the timing of the crop and the losses it might suffer. No decision had yet been made; nor had anyone consented without first recording the cost.

Devaki was taking her animals along the path. She stopped at a narrow point on the chanchar and said that when the lowland filled, her cattle had to make a long detour. Sushila added the route to the drawing. A representative of a fishing family asked where the seasonal nets were set. Tara marked their positions but did not colour the area as though it were under permanent occupation. The more lines were added to the map, the less the lowland resembled an empty expanse. It looked more alive than before.

An old school desk had been set at the edge of the lowland. At this meeting of the seed-and-water partnership, people were first asked what work they wished to undertake; nobody was handed a spade on the strength of their caste or household. Those who could not enter the water chose to read receipts, record measurements, or watch the safe route for children. The rates of pay, the provision of safe tools, and the attendance register lay on the desk. For the first time, Sanket recognised in these arrangements a rule akin to the one he had made about his photograph: to do work and to retain a right over what belonged to you were not opposing things.

The young man keeping the attendance register was writing down names in haste. Sushila noticed that one woman's whole day of work holding back the water had been entered as ‘help’, although she had left the sowing of her own plot to come. The slip was opened again; her hours and wages were entered. A bill for expenses was attached to the containers of food Rukhsana had sent. An elderly man laughed. “At this rate we'll have to account for the singers too.” “If someone wishes to sing,” Tara replied, “we shall ask both their permission and their fee. No one will make singing a condition of attendance.” With that, everyone turned to their work.

Six small slips had been set apart at one end of the desk. The slip bearing Renu Gondhi's name acknowledged receipt of her application concerning the enclosure of the pond and access to it; the question of the landing would not be settled by a map of the lowland. Asha Bhumij's receipt concerned temporary accommodation costs for a displaced family. On a slip for travel money received in Binu Darai's name, the person who had paid the sum and the person who had received it were recorded separately. These papers did not concern a single issue, but all needed to be kept safe if the presence and labour of the families participating in the partnership were to be accounted for accurately.

A short passage in two languages accompanied a petition from Hira Meche. He had had a note added beside his signature stating that he did not understand the words of the first passage. Verification of its meaning in the original language was set aside for the next hearing. Tulsi Donwar had submitted a copy of a document concerning rights in another village; a single village's name on the lowland footpath could not, therefore, determine every right of use. Sanket did not offer to photograph the slips. The organisers entered only the receipt numbers in the public attendance record.

Kiran arrived with an old bundle of sharecropping papers. Two pages contained the names Budhi Gandak and Adhwara. One appeared in the margin of an old sharecropping agreement; the other, in an account of dues sent from home. Sushila asked whether the names meant that the direction of the Tilwaha should be redrawn. After reading the pages, Tara said, “No. These are the context of the papers and an account of a family's travels; they are not evidence that a branch of either river ran through this place.” Kiran's concern was somewhat different from the river map: who still owed the dues from the last harvest? Kiran kept the sheet recording those dues and gave permission only for a copy to be made.

By midday everyone was looking at the two maps laid beside the desk. A stretch across the middle of the lowland was white on the municipal office's drawing. On the map made by the villagers, that same space was filled with four distinct marks: rice cultivation, seasonal fishing, grazing, and the route along the chanchar. Tara said the villagers' lines could not take the place of a measured survey, but neither could the blank white on the municipality's map establish that people had no rights there. Both maps were to go to Aditi for examination. Sanket wrote a small reckoning in his notebook: one map showed the route taken by water; the other, the time of the families whose lives depended upon it.

At mealtime the containers of rice and vegetables sent by Rukhsana were opened. Sanket, who usually preferred roti, had no complaint about rice today; he was very hungry. The vegetables contained tender greens bought from Ramesh's basket, their price entered on a slip. “There ought to be room on the map for the time people need to eat, too,” Sushila said. Everyone laughed. In the midst of the laughter, Devaki's cow came up to the desk and began sniffing the papers. Sanket sprang to his feet and gathered them up. His phone was safe in his pocket.

After the meal a young man told Sanket to send the photograph of the red mark on the warehouse wall to the group; otherwise, people would not believe there was an obstruction in the old channel beside it. “There is a wall, and there is a mark on it. Those are things we have seen,” Sanket answered. “How the obstruction came about is still to be investigated. And I won't send a photograph showing other people to a group without their permission.” “Then why did you take it?” the young man asked. Sanket's voice rose a little, but he steadied himself. “To understand something. Not to hand out the right to show it to everybody.” Naira did not intervene.

For public purposes Tara opened a drawing she had made with her own hand. It showed the warehouse wall, the possible traces of an old channel mouth, and the limits of the area that still required inspection. There were no photographs of people on it. Sanket gave permission for Tara to look at his original photograph in his presence, solely to compare the position of the mark. He also asked that a separate line be written: ‘Original photograph retained on Sanket's phone; no public copy issued.’ Tara signed that line. Sanket understood that his condition had not become an enemy of public work; it had become a rule governing the use of a document.

Before evening the first copy of the seasonal map of the lowland was finished. It marked separately the raised chanchar, the spread of rainwater, the dry-season route for cattle, seasonal fishing grounds, and the boundaries of the vegetable beds. A question mark remained wherever measurements had yet to be taken; receipts concerning disputed crop payments were kept apart. As the people rose, they wrote down the date of the next meeting, when the lines for both seasons would be checked. No one could say the dispute over drainage had ended. But the first attempt to impose an outlet upon fields that had not even been marked had been brought to a halt.

On the way home Naira asked Sanket, “What did you find hardest about today's work?” “Everyone wanted to see the photograph,” he said. “And I wanted something I'd taken to be of use. But I didn't want to watch it being turned into an outcry against someone.” Naira told him that if the photograph was formally requested at the next inspection, he should keep the original safe and insist on a written account of why it was wanted, who would receive the copy, and the limits of its use. Sanket agreed. He did not yet know the whole procedure behind such a condition; he understood why it was needed.

At home Sarita had begun preparing the evening meal. Seeing the mud on Sanket's shirt, she asked whether his phone had survived. Sanket laughed and took it out. “The phone survived. And now nobody gets to use its photographs without my say-so.” “Very good,” Sarita said. “But you aren't getting on the bed in those muddy clothes.” Sanket went to change his shirt. Naira placed an authorised copy of the lowland map on the table, apart from Sarita's paper bearing the twenty-seven names. Papers concerning two mysteries could lie on the same table; the meaning of one did not thereby unlock the other.

When night fell Sanket looked once more at the original photograph on his phone. The red line was still as red as ever. Beneath the image he wrote a note for himself: ‘Warehouse, Purnadhar; location of view known; purpose of mark unknown; consent of other persons pending.’ Then he turned off the phone and opened his school notebook. A copy of the lowland map was to go to the municipal office the next day. In the blank white space on that town's map, so many people's kinds of work had been entered today. It pleased him to know that something important could be brought before the world without displaying anyone's face.

Chapter 12 · The City Behind the Ghat

As the first sunlight of morning fell across the rear landing of Barki Pond, Ramani Bind turned her fishing net inside out and spread it open. The dew of the night still clung to every mesh. Two children came out of a water-filled hollow, gathering marbles, and she drew the net in a little to give them room. It was forbidden to leave fish baskets on the narrow steps of the landing, but nowhere was it written who had issued the prohibition. In Ramani's bag lay a folded copy of the fishery lease. The men's names appeared on its first page; half of the second had been torn away. Her question was greater than all the fish she might catch from her boat in a day: on whose page was her right to catch them written?

Hira was checking the rope of his boat at the landing. Ramani showed him the lease. "I have to attend the hearing today. If they show me only the first page again, I shall get up and leave," she said. Hira let go of the rope and looked at the paper. "Then ask for the entire lease. But the route of a boat and the limits of a fishery are not the same thing." "I know that too," Ramani replied. "When I go out to fish, the owner of the landing is one person, the lessee of the water another, and the person who fixes the boat's hours a third. I am expected to answer all three." She picked up her basket and went on her way.

At the crossroads Naira and Tara sat with yesterday's map of the low-lying floodplain spread out before them. Sanket did not photograph it; his task was to keep the corners of the paper from lifting. On the municipality's printed map, a straight line ran along the back of Barki Pond to the mouth of the drainage channel. On the map made by the local people, the old footpath beside that line was marked separately, as were the temporary fishing enclosures, the gardens submerged in the rains, and the narrow route along which the hospital's laundry was brought. The two maps were not drawn to the same scale, so Tara first recorded their scale ratios and the years in which they had been made. Even then, one piece would not fit: where the municipal map said "vacant land," the people pointed to a path by which three generations had descended to the landing.

Aditi arrived carrying her inspection bag. Inside it was a description of the marks found at the mouth of the channel, but not the original copy of the warehouse's approval. "On this map," Tara asked, "does this line mark the pond's boundary, the drainage boundary, or a revenue parcel?" Aditi removed her spectacles and bent closer to the paper. "It would be wrong to treat the three as one," she said. "The municipal drawing shows a provision for the outflow of water; it cannot, by itself, determine rights over the land." "Then who holds the property file for this white strip?" Naira asked. Aditi replied that the file from the municipal estates department and the original entry in the revenue office would have to be requested separately.

From behind the landing an elderly man came with papers wrapped in mud-stained sacking. Suraj Gangota was on the opposite bank of the river. A copy of the debt papers for his field, sent by him, had reached Tulsi Donwar's hands. Tulsi laid them before Naira. "Where there is sand today, there used to be a field," he said. "Without that field, the account of what is owed is difficult to understand." The document contained measurements extending as far as the old field embankment, but it did not show where the bank lay after the latest erosion. Tara marked the date on the page. "This is evidence that the old field existed," she said, "but without a measurement of the present bank, I cannot say that the same land will reappear when the water recedes." Tulsi lowered his head. The river did not suspend its waiting for the day a debt fell due.

Below the landing one could see the fresh furrows left by sand being dug from the river. By the afternoon's turn, water would fill those furrows again. Sugni Saday climbed the path with three women and two young men from her neighbourhood. They carried no spades, only the attendance slips they had written out themselves. "Count us in the team that will clear the channel," she said. "But first tell us whose way the work will block, and when the wages will be paid." Tara explained that they were still assessing the risks; no order had been given to open the drain. "Very well. Then we shall be part of the survey," Sugni answered. "Do not say afterwards that the people of our neighbourhood never saw the work being planned." She had her name entered on the first line, together with her right to choose the work she would do.

Beside the map, Mamta Hari of the municipal cleaning team submitted a slip. The work schedule printed an instruction to descend inside the drain, but the boxes for protective gloves, boots, and the bamboo support rope had been left empty. Mamta argued with no one. She circled the blank boxes in red pencil and wrote: EQUIPMENT NOT RECEIVED. After getting the slip stamped as received, she went to inspect the worksite. Sugni saw the paper and said, "Our team will not go down there without an inspection either." There was no display of heroism in this, no pleasure in stopping work. People bring their bodies to their labour; when those bodies are not safe, the account of public work remains incomplete.

Meanwhile, Ramani had reached the veranda of the municipal office. The clerk at the counter showed her half the lease and said that the list of named beneficiaries was sufficient. Ramani did not even touch the paper on the desk. "Why does this page say nothing about the limits of the water, the duration of the lease, access to the landing, the contractor's share, or the names of the women?" she asked. "All that will be in the second annexure," the clerk said. "Then show me that as well. I have not come merely to ask for a count of the fish. I want the complete document setting out the limits of my work and what is due to me.” Standing behind her, Naira recognised an absence of a different kind from the one in the list of twenty-seven names. Here the person’s name had not been concealed; the terms of her rights had.

By noon, tables had been set out in the courtyard of the municipal library for a public reading of the accounts. The principal annual public reading took place in Phagun, with songs, schoolchildren reading out figures, and public questions about the use of the river. This special meeting, held after the onset of the rains, had been called under the regular rules of that event; it was not an attempt to repeat the Phagun festival. Karim Dafali had brought his dholak wrapped in cloth, along with a receipt for the cost of fitting it with a new skin. The committee entered the fee for his singing as a separate item. The coloured cloth ordered to decorate the platform had been hired from Nasim’s shop. Labour and goods had not vanished into the assumption that they were gifts.

On the other side of the table lay Vinita Kesharwani’s two small account books. One held her own debts, the other the accounts of a business shared by the household. The men from the office wanted to combine the sums, but she had insisted that the books be stamped separately. Meena Tharu’s application for a land lease had arrived as well, with the land’s actual agricultural use and the company’s proposal recorded on different pages. No one’s entire documentary history was read aloud here; only the receipt number and the date of the next hearing were entered. Amid this crowd of ledgers there was no single measure by which to say whose difficulty was the greatest.

When the public reading began, the payment for water and refreshments supplied from Rukhsana’s kitchen was read out first. Karim lightly struck his dholak twice. Two schoolgirls sang two lines of an old river song, then stopped. They were asked to remain on the platform, but their allotted practice time had ended. Laughing, they stepped down. Ramani was pleased by this small thing: no one now seemed to believe that inviting a person onto a platform made that person the platform’s property. Fakira, seated in the front row, kept time with his fingers. He did not wish to sing.

Naira lifted the first document: the water register. It described the uses of the pond, the outlet, the sand landing, and the low-lying floodplain. She read out the place names and the entries for public expenditure, leaving out private addresses and details that might identify people through their medical treatment. Then someone raised the matter of Sarita’s page of twenty-seven names. A young man said, “Now that everyone is gathered, read that list too.” Naira did not even open it. “That is a register of people’s names,” she replied. “For some of those people, their safety and their identities as living persons are at stake. The right to inspect a public water account is one thing; compelling the disclosure of someone’s private name is another. Two documents do not become subject to the same rule merely because they happen to be lying on the same table.”

On either side of the public drawing, Aditi wrote a few small figures: the year the map had been published, its scale, and its source. With their help Tara identified the position of the old channel mouth. One stretch of the municipal line and the revenue boundary almost coincided; elsewhere a discrepancy remained that could not be explained away by differences of scale. Turning towards the assembly, Naira said, “The failure of two maps to agree does not prove fraud. But where one map shows vacant land, people have a path and a history of use. We are requesting the municipal estates file for the plot behind the warehouse and the revenue file for the plot along the pond’s edge. The approvals, amendments, and boundary surveys in both files must be examined together.”

A voice from behind the table said that even if they obtained all these papers, the signatures of officials and contractors would not bring back the old soil. It was Tulsi speaking. There was despair in his voice, but no permission for anyone to put his land in another person’s name. Aditi replied that the inquiry must begin by measuring the present boundary accurately and registering the old claim separately. Naira wrote this down, adding that the loss of a field to river erosion did not automatically cancel the debt upon it; nor did the survival of old documents amount to an order that the river restore the land. Tulsi folded the paper again and put it back in his bag. His question was as difficult as before, but now there was an office from which the documents could be demanded.

Ramani rose once more in the midst of the assembly. “Where is my complete lease?” she asked. The office clerk said a copy of the annexure could be provided the following day. “And until tomorrow,” Ramani asked, “may I cast my net or not?” This time Aditi was silent before answering. The fishery lease did not fall within her office’s jurisdiction. The local official presiding over the meeting recorded that, until the existing written terms had been clarified, anyone imposing a new prohibition or a new fee would have to produce a reasoned order from the department that had issued the lease. It was no lasting victory. But instead of hearing a different prohibition from a different mouth every day, Ramani now had grounds to demand a written answer.

The second small paper sent by Suraj contained no compound interest, only a record of ordinary outstanding dues. Naira struck out a proposal to enter an estimate of the lost field’s former yield in the same column. “Paying the price of the paddy does not bring back the field,” she told Tulsi, “and the field’s submergence does not automatically reduce a loan taken out in a previous year to zero.” “Then what am I to tell them at home?” Tulsi asked. Naira did not hurry to answer. Tara walked down to the sand landing. At the edge of the wet sand, an older layer of earth lay exposed. She did not drive her staff into it, for the bank might slip. She marked its position from a distance and scheduled a further measurement for another day. On the paper they wrote “CLAIM OUTSTANDING,” not “LAND VACANT.” It was a distinction Tulsi could carry home.

The people were gathered all around the table when children’s laughter drifted up from the water-filled landing. Three children had made little boats of wood. One boat stuck at the edge, and another child pushed his own boat towards it to set it free. Both boats turned and came to rest together. The youngest child grew angry, claiming that the other had stolen his boat’s victory. An older girl pulled his boat free and set it on the water once more. “It’s only just begun,” she said. In this game there were no leases and no boundaries of land. Hearing their laughter, Fakira went over to them. Rather than lift the wooden boat with his foot, he brought it to the bank with a thin stick. The children went on, absorbed in their race.

When the crowd in the courtyard turned back towards the table, Sugni was standing with her copy of the attendance sheet raised in her hand. She pointed out that the work of the local drainage team had been entered by name, but no time had yet been fixed for a meeting to choose the team itself. “We shall decide the day,” she said. “We are not going to put down our names and sit quietly.” Naira did not take the decision into her own hands. The committee members fixed a separate date for an open meeting of the workers, at which women, young people, and those employed under subcontractors could all have a say. Mamta’s safety slip became the first item on that meeting’s agenda; the empty equipment boxes were not treated as if they had been filled. Sugni read the acknowledgement and signed it. Beside her name there was now a record of something real she had done in demanding a voice in the leadership.

When the receipt number for Meena Tharu’s application was announced, she took a copy to the elderly member of her family standing by the door. Vinita gathered up her two ledgers. Someone urged her to reconcile the figure in one of them with the orphan-relief fund, but she replied that the basis of any such accounting must first be set out in writing. Karim unwrapped his dholak, then bound it in its cloth again. He lingered near the committee to receive the fee agreed upon for his two beats that day. The song at the public reading had brought people together; it had not made the singer’s expenses for the day disappear.

Amrita took a copy of a land document from her bag and examined it. Along one edge of the paper stood the name “Amrita,” identifying a person and appearing beside her mother’s signature. There was also an old list of sources in which “Amrita” appeared as a river name; someone had once attached a copy of that list to the land papers. Naira marked the two occurrences separately. “Amrita is a name in your family,” she said. “The other page refers to a river. The same letters do not make both references one place.” Amrita gathered up her family’s original document. More than the geography of a river, she was troubled by the thought that, at the coming hearing, the evidence her mother had preserved might once again be dismissed as “unclear” and excluded.

As the evening sun declined, receipt numbers came through for formal applications seeking two property files. The first concerned the approval and subsequent alterations relating to the municipal plot behind the warehouse; the second concerned the revenue entries for land adjoining the pond and Purnadhar. They also requested the rules governing which pages could be made public and which personal details would have to be redacted. The white strip on the map had not yet been filled in. The only decisions entered were that, pending examination, the people’s documented footpath should not be closed without a hearing, and that no new drainage works should begin without measurement, risk assessment, and written authorisation.

As she left the office, Ramani looked again at the incomplete copy of the lease in her bag. Beside the torn page there was now a new receipt: an acknowledgement of her request for a certified copy of all the conditions. She folded the receipt separately from the first page. Gathering up her maps, Tara said to Naira, “There used to be a blank space. Now there are questions in it.” “If we change the white line before those questions are answered,” Naira replied, “we may give rights to someone who had none, and dispossess someone who did.” They were still caught in the argument when Sanket came with a length of string to tie up the papers. Today there was no phone in his hand.

On the road home, a notice hung announcing a benefit-distribution meeting for Sarita. The next day, an announcement of assistance for certain families was to be made from the municipality’s open platform. Naira read the notice but did not search for Sarita’s particulars there in the midst of the crowd. A whole day spent marking the differences between two maps had shown her how much harm a single name in the wrong place could do beneath the glitter of a public platform. She wrote the date from the poster in her notebook and went on towards home. For now, Sarita needed her evening medicine and her meal of rice; tomorrow’s meeting was a question for another day.

The little boats at the landing had gradually grown heavy in the water, as soaked wood does. The children took them out one by one and set them aside, so that they could play again tomorrow. Ramani tightened the rope of her boat a second time. She had not yet received her lease, Sugni’s team had not received its tools, and Tulsi had not recovered his field. Yet the receipt numbers for the papers demanded at the table, the conditions of labour committed to writing, and the children’s game, saved for another day, were separate truths belonging to that same day. Behind the landing stood the city—and in the city’s records, for the first time, the people of the landing had entered their demand that the paths beneath their feet be clearly shown.

Chapter 13 · The Dead Woman Called to the Stage

On the stage erected for the distribution of assistance, the placard bearing Sarita's name lay face down. Its white edge showed against the red cloth, so that no one looking from a distance could tell whose name was written there. Early that morning municipal workers had been raising the bamboo posts, but one of the pegs was loose. As a young man pulled the cloth taut, the skin of his palm was scraped away. He let go and asked for water. Sarita opened the lid of her water vessel and gave him some. He thanked her and went back to the post. Sarita did not ask to have the placard turned over. She wanted her name to be spoken from her own mouth, not by the cloth on a stage.

Naira accompanied her to the meeting ground. After yesterday's discovery of the discrepancy between the two maps at the landing, the receipt numbers for the two property files were safely entered in Naira's notebook. She had not left the notebook at home today, but her mother had made one thing plain: "Let the hearing about the landing stay at the landing. What I have to say, I shall say at the table where they read my name." Naira accepted this. Sarita had brought a copy of the notice of her death, her earlier application asking for her living presence to be recorded, and a copy of the medicine prescription issued in the name of her dead husband. The original page containing the twenty-seven names remained locked at home. That page was more vulnerable than the gathering itself.

Behind the stage stood a blue tent. Inside, employees were determining the order in which the beneficiaries would be called. At one table they kept the slips brought by families seeking assistance; at another, complaints about inconsistent entries. Yet the sign at the entrance pointed both queues in the same direction. An elderly man was asking about the assistance payable on account of his dead wife. His hands were trembling. Watching him, Sarita understood that today's gathering was not merely a place where fraud might occur; for some people it was also the way to money they genuinely needed. Even in her anger, therefore, she did not wish to wear down the old man's patience.

At the list desk Naira found Rama Karna, who was supervising the making of copies. There was red ink on Rama's table, files bound with string, and an empty receipt register. She was checking the dates written at the top of the documents one by one. A man standing beside her said quietly, "If Sarita's status is changed, there will be no trouble on the stage. We can supply the papers later." Rama stopped her hand. "On whose orders? If that is what you are saying, put it in writing. I shall not alter an entry without a signature."

Sweat stood on the man's forehead. He said there was no time. "That makes the date and signature more necessary still," Rama replied.

Rama examined Sarita's application and then looked at Naira. "The number in this receipt register is the office's incoming-mail number. Do not take it to mean that the correction has been made. A separate written statement of today's discrepancy can be submitted, but I have no authority to strike out the earlier page." All Naira wanted was to ensure that no one quietly changed her mother's identity on the strength of somebody else's spoken instruction. She left a copy of the application with Rama, who entered it in a separate register and stamped its receipt. She handed one half of the receipt slip to Sarita and placed a carbon copy in the file, bearing her own name as well.

On the other side of the desk stood Savitri Sardar. In her cloth bag were papers giving addresses in two villages. After the flood, her family had temporarily moved from the first village to a second settlement; on the new relief list the village had changed, as though every claim belonging to the earlier time had changed with it. "We changed where we lived," Savitri said. "The days when we needed food did not change." The clerk said that the present address could be corrected on the list, but the assistance still due for the preceding month would require another examination. Savitri made him put that in writing. She was not prepared to accept one correction as compensation for every loss.

Niranjan Kisan was troubled by the word that followed his given name on his slip. He explained that 'Kisan' formed part of his family's name and self-identification; in an old office field it had been treated as the name of his occupation, and other details had consequently been deleted. As a result, a bank-linked account had been held up for one transaction. "That I farm is one thing; that Kisan is part of my name is another," he said. The young employee at the desk at first began to laugh. Then Niranjan spread out both papers. Rama checked him: "Look at name, occupation and account identity in separate fields. Put one in place of another and you will cause another mistake somewhere else." Niranjan received an acknowledgement for further scrutiny, not a promise that the account would be released immediately.

Garlands and a plaque naming the donors were being carried towards the stage. Arun Barnwal stood with his account book in a cloth bag from his shop. An organiser had offered him a large garland and the announcement of his name over the microphone. Arun asked whose account would bear the expense of printing names on the publicity plaque. He was told that he could make a voluntary donation towards it. Opening his ledger, he showed that the deadline for paying the tax due from his shop was near. "A donation will bring applause," he said, "but what is owed must be paid first." The organiser grew uncomfortable. Arun declined the garland and closed his ledger. He had no faith that this decision would immediately make his public image shine.

Sarita burst into laughter. “Everybody here has a different sorrow attached to their name today,” she told Naira. “What are you laughing at?” Naira asked. “That man left the garland of charity behind and took his accounts with him. If the sack of rice at home is empty, a garland will not cook a meal.” Savitri, hearing her, smiled a little too. For this moment in the crowd there was no announcement. Savitri asked Sarita whether she belonged to the same village. “As long as I remain alive, I belong here,” Sarita answered. “The papers say something else.” Savitri’s smile slowly disappeared.

The microphone test began. First came a loud “One, two, three,” repeated three times; then someone broke into an unfinished line of a song. Tea from Rukhsana’s kitchen arrived. When the question of payment arose, the organiser said that this was public service for the day. The young woman who had carried the tea asked, “If it is public service, who will pay for the milk, the sugar, and the labour of carrying it here?” The organiser asked to see the expense slip. When Sarita lifted her cup she noticed a crack along its rim. No tea was spilling; she turned the cup, placed her finger over the cracked part, and began to drink. Naira felt that her mother had already gathered within herself the weight of the voice she would need today.

When the meeting began, the names of the first few families were read correctly. A woman signed an acknowledgement for assistance towards the treatment of her elderly father; a labourer’s wife was absent, so the office hours of the following day were announced in connection with her payment. Each person in the crowd had concerns of their own. The master of ceremonies made a short speech about the success of the assistance distribution. Sarita listened. She did not wish to call the work of helping people false merely because she had a question of her own to raise. But as the list was read in the final part of the meeting, the announcer’s voice suddenly changed.

“Will a representative of the family of the late Sarita Das please come up to the stage,” the microphone announced. Then there was a pause, as though the crowd were waiting for some dependent relative to rise. The placard beside the microphone was turned over. Sarita’s name was written on it in Devanagari, with ‘Assistance to the Family of the Deceased’ printed beneath. Naira reached to take her mother’s hand; gently, Sarita withdrew it. “I must go myself,” she said. She needed her daughter’s protection, but she would not place upon her daughter the burden of proving that her own body was alive.

Sarita walked to the stage. One section of the steps was loose. The young man to whom she had given water in the morning was still there. He showed her where to put her feet. Sarita climbed one step at a time. At first the announcer took her for a dependent relative and extended the envelope in his hand towards her. She did not touch it. “I am the person whose name you have just read,” she said. Confused, the announcer began, “Then you are from the deceased person’s family—” Sarita interrupted him. “My husband died a long time ago. But you have read ‘late’ before my name. This paper says that I am dead. I have come here and am standing before you myself.”

Some of the people seated in front rose to their feet. Someone called for the microphone to be handed over; someone else said she should be taken to an officer first. The paper shook in the announcer’s hand. He wanted to move the microphone away, but Sarita looked at him and said, “I have not come to quarrel with you over your name. If the page is wrong, show me the page. Do not read it in place of my own voice.” Behind the stage, employees began turning through the file in which the category of assistance was printed. The microphone passed into Sarita’s hand.

“I want no one’s pity,” Sarita said. “You can take a wrong page even from the hands of someone who does need pity. I still light my cooking fire. My husband died seventeen years ago, yet a medicine prescription was issued in his name as recently as yesterday. A notice of death arrived in mine. I have already written to say that I am alive, but no answer came. They called this a public meeting today, so I came. If you are truly listening to me now, put the procedure for correcting the error in my papers into writing. Examine the entitlement to assistance properly as well. Do not declare me dead and applaud.”

A young man in the crowd raised his phone above his head. Sanket was standing nearby. “If you take photographs,” he told the man, “do not spread everyone’s faces and papers together.” The young man answered that it was a public meeting. “The meeting may be public,” Sanket said, “but every letter on a private slip is not.” He took out his own phone, but did not begin recording. Between the mother’s words and the daughter’s, there was also the question of his own permission. Sarita looked towards him from the stage. Sanket asked with a gesture; Sarita gave a small sign that he should write down what was said into the microphone, not make a moving picture of her face. Sanket opened his notebook.

The officer seated beside the announcer asked for the microphone. “There may be an error in the record,” he said, “and the complaint will be registered. Nevertheless, I cannot verify everything here and now. We shall not make a payment on the basis of the printed assistance list without checking identity.” Some people in the crowd jeered. The officer added that the final matching of names would require the departmental papers and the family’s statement to be examined separately. “And the word ‘deceased’ that was spoken here?” Sarita asked. The officer faltered. Then he instructed the announcer to remove the display placard, although it was possible that photographs had already been taken.

Naira rose from her place among the spectators. Rather than ask the officer for the microphone, she went to Rama Karna’s desk. “How can we obtain a written record of what has just been said?” Rama explained that minutes of the meeting would be prepared and that Sarita could submit a signed account of her own statement. “Let her words be entered as she spoke them, not as somebody else’s ‘the error has been corrected’,” Naira said. Rama answered quietly, “I shall not write a decision in a field where no decision has been made.” At the top of a blank page she wrote the date and the words ‘Disputed death status—statement of the person appearing in person’. She left space for Sarita to read and approve it.

As Sarita descended from the stage, she stopped at the first step. Her feet were aching. A woman carrying a child moved aside to let her pass and asked, “My name is wrong on the list too. How many days does it take?” Sarita did not invent an answer. “I am still going from place to place to get mine corrected,” she said. “But if they take your statement in writing, keep the receipt.” The woman’s child had caught hold of Sarita’s sari. The mother quickly freed its hand. Sarita smiled and rested one finger against the child’s fingers for a moment. The child did not mistake her for a grandmother; nor was the woman a symbol of anyone else. Each had her own way to go.

Savitri carried her relief slip with its changed village address back to Rama. What she had seen on the stage made her afraid that the correction recorded today might be erased tomorrow. Rama showed her the sequence in the receipt register and explained that the outstanding assistance from her former village had not automatically been added to the new list. “Then register a separate claim for it,” Savitri said. “I can come back again, but do not make me into a different person every time my home changes.” Niranjan too obtained a number for his application concerning the confusion between his name and occupation. They did not stand beside Sarita to have their photographs taken; they checked their own papers and went on their separate ways.

At a table outside the meeting, Arun Barnwal was showing the receipt for the tax he had paid. An organiser he knew said, “If you had accepted the garland today, everyone would have been looking at you.” Arun replied, “A day’s attention does not balance an account.” He put the office receipt into his bag. A little way off, an argument was going on over payment for the tea; Arun made no proposal to combine his shop accounts with the public kitchen’s expenses. Each piece of work had its own amount due. Sarita watched in silence. Today the debt owed to her own name on paper seemed the greatest of all, yet that did not make anyone else’s dues smaller.

By midday two copies of Sarita’s statement had been prepared. The first was kept in the office receipt register; the second was placed in her hands. She read it. Rama had written that the applicant had appeared in person and had formally disputed the recorded status of her death; verification of the earlier entry and a separate inquiry into the dispensing of medicine had been requested. Nowhere did it say that Sarita had been officially declared alive. Naira looked at her mother. “If they had written down something that has not happened," Sarita said, "it would have been the same mistake all over again." Only then did she sign the page.

As the meeting drew to a close, the cloth over the stage sagged once more. The young man who had drunk water that morning was tightening another peg. "After what happened today, will you go home now?" he asked Sarita. "Now I shall go home. It is time to put the rice on," she answered. The young man laughed. "Well, everyone has heard your name." Sarita looked at him. "Hearing a name is one thing," she said. "Hearing it and writing it correctly is another." When she stepped beyond the stage, a light breeze came from the direction of the landing, bringing together the smells of mud and sun-warmed cloth.

On the way home Naira asked whether speaking in public had lightened her mother's heart at all. "The weight will grow lighter when you no longer have to go about every day proving that I am alive," Sarita said. "What I said today was my own word. But the people who heard it have their own work to do; we shall see how much of it they carry out." Naira did not apologise to her mother, because today she had not spoken in her place. For a while they walked in silence, a silence without the pretence of sympathy, with only the ease of going together.

That evening Sarita opened the kitchen window and began to wash the rice. The amplified voice from the meeting could not reach the house, but as she swirled the grains in the water one of her own sentences came back to her. Meanwhile Naira placed two slips apart on the table: the old copy in which Sarita was recorded as dead, and the written statement of her living presence made that day. The same name appeared on both papers, but they did not say the same thing. Outside, Sanket was comparing the words spoken into the microphone with what he had written in his notebook; he would not decide to make them public without first asking those concerned.

In the neighbourhood behind them, the women at Ruhani's shelter were reading the notice of the next day's assembly. Ruhani had been invited to sit on the stage as a 'representative of the community', but her name was absent from the field granting voting rights. The matter had not yet reached Ruhani herself. There were plenty of chairs at Videhapur's meetings, plenty of name placards, and small empty boxes where written rights should have been. In Sarita's home the rice had begun its first rising boil. She lowered the flame. Her name had been spoken often today; the work of writing it in its rightful place still remained.

Chapter 14 · The Representative's Chair

The next morning, in the community hall at Videhapur, the chairs were being dusted, wiped clean, and set in straight rows. Five chairs at the very front were draped in blue cloth; behind them stood plain benches. The doorkeeper said the blue coverings were for guests. On the back of one chair a slip of paper had been fastened to the cloth: "Ruhani, Community Representative." Beneath the name there was neither an organisation nor an office. When Ruhani reached the gate of the building, that slip was the first thing she saw. The invitation had come yesterday. Today she had to discover what it meant.

Ruhani had walked from her shelter in the back neighbourhood. Champa was with her, but she had not come to carry Ruhani's belongings; she had brought her own account of travel expenses for treatment and the wages lost by taking leave from work. On the way Ruhani had asked, "Do you think they have called me here to hear what I have to say?" Champa had replied, "Calling you is one thing they have done. Listening requires ears, and making a decision requires not a chair but authority." Ruhani had laughed. She kept the answer in mind, for she knew that even the authority of someone who offered shelter could sometimes weigh too heavily upon the voice of the person being sheltered.

At the entrance lay an attendance register. One column was headed "Men," another "Women," and a third "Special Guests." Ruhani picked up the pen. "You are a guest," the clerk said. "Sign in the third column." "Where is the register for members who have a vote?" Ruhani asked. The clerk pointed towards the secretary seated inside. Beside the secretary lay a separate volume bound in green. Ruhani went over to it. The green register held eighteen names. Hers was not among them. The secretary smiled. "You will be seated at the front as a mark of respect. Only permanent members have voting rights."

"How does one become a permanent member?" Ruhani asked. The secretary produced a copy of the rules. The committee made recommendations on municipal relief, shelter, access to the ghats, and complaints about drainage. Its decisions did not themselves become government orders, but its recommendations could alter priorities for grants and public works. The rules provided for nominations to membership from neighbourhoods, occupations, and institutions. A "specially invited representative" was a person summoned to be heard, not to vote. Ruhani did not turn down the corner of the page. She read the small print in the last line: the committee itself had the power to amend its rules.

"If hearing me cannot change anything, why put up this nameplate?" Ruhani asked, pointing towards the chair marked with her name. "So that everyone can see that your community has been treated with respect," the secretary replied. “I can tell you who needs respect,” Ruhani said. “But when the hours of access to the ghat, grants to the shelter, and the route to medical care are being decided, why is my voice not wanted in the vote?” Gathering up the papers, the secretary said that this question would have to be taken to the chairperson. Ruhani insisted that it be entered on the agenda at the start of the meeting.

Tea was being served in the courtyard before the proceedings. Champa asked the price and paid for a cup. Her travel expenses had not yet been reimbursed, but she disliked having to appear dependent upon another person’s generosity even for her tea. As Ruhani lifted her cup, she noticed the shadow of the building falling in two parts across a little puddle. There was no mystery in the puddle: rain in the night and broken paving were its straightforward causes. “If people cannot understand a little puddle like that,” Champa said, “how much will they understand about a sick person trapped in mud on the road to the ghat?” “Perhaps they will understand,” Ruhani said. “But we shall look for the proof of that understanding in their decisions.”

Across the tea table stood Neeraj Panda with an old ledger. He was preparing payment slips for people engaged to perform religious rites. Looking over the ledger, an organiser suggested that the expense of the rituals be added to the assistance payments for bereaved families. Neeraj struck a line through one of the columns. “Whoever wishes to arrange a rite according to their faith may do so of their own will and within their own means,” he said. “Assistance depends upon an examination of everyone’s entitlements; it must not be tied to my ritual fee.” The organiser said the families would be pleased if every service could be provided on the same day. “Getting things done on one day,” Neeraj replied, “is not the same as putting everybody’s costs into one account.”

Ruhani asked Neeraj whether, after the wrong name had been announced among the dead at Sarita’s meeting yesterday, a proposal for a ritual had also been sent out. Neeraj said that he had received no list of anyone’s private names, though he had certainly been given a combined payment form. “When someone has protested that she is alive,” Ruhani said, “adding the cost of her memorial observance would be another humiliation.” In his ledger Neeraj wrote two distinct headings, one for assistance and the other for rites. It was a small act, but it left families a place from which they might later raise an objection.

Behind the hall Basanti had set her basket of betel leaves on a table. A damp cloth lay over the leaves, and with clean fingers she was separating the spoiled ones from the sound. Against her name in the vendors’ register stood an official alternative designation that her family did not use for its identity. Basanti unfolded a slip lying beside the basket and showed it to the registrar. “We call ourselves Paan Sawasi Panar,” she said. “Write the name we use in the register. If you need the term from the government column, put it in another column." The registrar explained that it had been copied from an old list. "An old copy does not keep a betel leaf fresh," Basanti replied. "Nor does a name remain the same for ever merely because it has been copied."

Champa bought a betel leaf from her, but Basanti did not leave her work to attend the meeting. She did not want the leaves she still had to sell that day to go to waste. Ruhani asked whether it would be possible to seek correction of the register after the meeting. "After the meeting they will pack up their tables and leave," Basanti said. "Write it now." A little slip reached the secretary, recording separately the identity Basanti had given herself and the old terminology in the document. Ruhani understood that even to secure the correct pronunciation of a name, people had to take time away from earning their living.

As soon as the meeting began, the chairperson read out the names. Ruhani was called a "distinguished representative," and a young man came forward to place a garland on her. He seemed embarrassed; he had been assigned a task and had to carry it out. Ruhani accepted the garland in her hands, thanked him, and did not sit in the blue chair at the front. She placed the flowers at the corner of a table and took a seat on a bench near the audience. "Is there something uncomfortable about the chair?" the chairperson asked. "The chair is perfectly good," Ruhani replied. "But it does not seem right to display my name where my vote has no place."

The first proposal concerned the order of priority for admission to relief shelters. One member argued that the funds available should go first to registered permanent residents. Another spoke of the need for medical treatment among people living in temporary shelters and of their exposure to flood danger. The secretary read the two alternatives in turn. Ruhani raised her hand. The chairperson allowed her to speak as an "invited speaker," but made it clear beforehand that her raised hand would not be counted in the vote. "Why is there not a single permanent member," Ruhani asked, "from among the people whose names and lives will be affected by these alternatives?"

"We are listening to your experience," one member said. "If we change the rules, every group will demand a member of its own." "Who chose the eighteen people sitting here now?" Ruhani asked. "In whose names were they given this authority?" The secretary showed her the nomination forms. Several members had been nominated by institutions, others by meetings held in their neighbourhoods. "I do not object to that," Ruhani said. "I want the process of electing members to be open also to the people whose places to live, ways of moving about, and routes to treatment are being determined."

Shabnam Mallik was seated near the doorway, reconciling slips for voluntary expenses. Seeing the nameplate before her, someone addressed her as "Mr Mallik's representative" and placed an official file in front of her.

Shabnam did not open it. “Mallik is my family name,” she said. “It is not an official seal. Take the papers you are handing me to the authorised desk.” The young man who had brought the file was embarrassed for a moment. Shabnam did not scold him; she showed him the authorised accountant’s table. On the receipts for her own voluntary expenses she had also written “Verification pending.” Ruhani saw how readily a title that sounded distinguished could inspire an unwarranted trust.

The chairperson interrupted the discussion and called for a vote on the proposal. Ruhani raised her hand again, this time to ask a question. “If everyone listens to what I say but my vote is not counted,” she said, “then record that plainly in the minutes. And I formally object to the list of people in the relief shelter being made public without their permission.” Champa rose from the bench and said that the details of her medical treatment must not be entered on a collective list. She spoke in her own name; Ruhani’s representation could not take the place of her consent.

A faint fragrance of betel leaves drifted from Basanti’s basket near the hall window. The registrar called her over again and asked whether the name in the official list should be struck out. “If you strike it out,” Basanti said, “tomorrow you will say the old document cannot be found. I want the entry I have given you to be matched with the earlier one.” As she spoke, she showed the receipt for last month’s market fee. One name appeared on the receipt, another in the new vendors’ register; the basket and the labour of selling its contents were hers in both. The clerk entered a note linking the two names. He had no authority to make the final correction. Basanti returned to her leaves. Ruhani saw that, when people required such care in the recording of their own names, it was equally wrong to call someone their representative without taking comparable care.

At first the secretary wrote a single line: “Suggestion by Representative Ruhani.” Ruhani read it and said, “It was not merely a suggestion. I submitted a written proposal concerning membership and voting rights, and an objection to the public disclosure of the private details of shelter residents. Record them separately.” The secretary took a fresh sheet. The chairperson looked uneasy, fearing that if the pages multiplied in this fashion every day, the meeting would never end. “You reach decisions on these matters in a single sitting,” Ruhani said, “but the days on which their consequences are lived are very long. Two extra lines will not ruin the day.”

The members voted on the original proposal for distributing relief. One side secured a majority, though no final distribution of money could take place until the departmental review. Ruhani did not insist that her own vote be counted; she remained seated on the open bench. The chairperson said the demand to amend the membership rules would be taken up at the end of the meeting. Ruhani asked that it be placed specifically on the agenda of the next meeting and that, until a consent procedure had been clarified, the private patient list of the shelter should not be circulated outside the meeting. One member asked how essential services could be delivered without a list. “The information needed for treatment,” Champa replied, “will go to the person giving the treatment. Not to the spectators at a meeting.”

There was a short break at midday. Rukhsana had sent a slip stating the price of a plate of pua, the sweet fried cakes ordered from her kitchen. Eating half a pua, Champa said, “Today the garland was yours, but I got the sweetness.” Ruhani smiled. In Champa’s jest she heard a measure of dissent directed at herself: sometimes she too was too quick to make decisions for others in the name of the shelter. “If we sit down together inside the shelter,” she asked, “will you speak?” “I will,” Champa replied. “But only if there will be listening afterwards as well.” Ruhani pushed the plate towards her.

During the break Naira arrived outside the hall. Yesterday’s written statement from Sarita bore a clearly visible receipt number from the office; today Naira had come to learn its status. At the gate she met Shabnam. Shabnam told her how a document had been put into her hands merely on the strength of her name, and that she had returned it. “My mother’s name, too, is written as dead on one page,” Naira replied, “and on another she is recorded as present and alive. Who had the right to write those entries, and with whom were they checked? Reading the name alone will not give us those answers.” Shabnam showed her the authorised desk where she could submit the receipt and inquire about the case.

An employee told Naira that yesterday’s statement had been received, but that no decision had yet been made to verify Sarita’s status as living. A separate complaint about the medicine prescription was awaiting reconciliation with another office. Naira asked whether any committee there had examined copies of such documents. The employee said that the committee received the meeting’s expenses and aggregate relief figures; individuals’ private papers ought to remain outside its proceedings. Naira wrote down that this was the employee’s statement, not a certified departmental rule. Listening to Ruhani’s argument, she was coming to understand that the question of who had the right to see information was connected to, though distinct from, the question of who had the right to vote on its use.

In the second part of the meeting the secretary read out the request for an amendment. Ruhani submitted a formal proposal: there should be a method of choosing members in consultation with the affected shelters, itinerant workers, and non-permanent users of the ghats; people from different groups must not all be classified as belonging to one caste or one occupation; and rules should provide for attendance expenses and compensation for the loss of a day’s work. Her proposal was not a demand that her own name be entered immediately against every position on the committee. The chairperson made it clear that permission to consider a rule amendment could be put to the vote now, but the rules themselves would not be changed that day.

“If people are to have voting rights,” one member said, “they must also shoulder responsibility.” “I have not come here to escape responsibility,” Ruhani replied. “Those who are suffering the harm are carrying responsibility already. But they are not given the right to demand an account of it.” From the back Neeraj Panda observed that someone would also have to give final approval to the decision to separate the costs of rituals from grants; otherwise everybody’s name would end up attached to an incorrect bill. Basanti had come as far as the doorway with her basket in her hands. The slip seeking correction of her name had still not been returned. Ruhani gestured towards her. “If you write a person’s name incorrectly, the register for choosing her representative may be wrong as well.”

This time the secretary read the draft aloud to everyone. Ruhani stopped him at one word. It said, in Hindi, “Proper representation of all communities.” “How can you write that as a conclusion already?” she asked. “That is the very matter we are debating.” The secretary struck out “proper” and wrote instead, “Objection concerning representation received.” The chairperson looked at Ruhani as though wondering why so much time should be spent on one word. “That one word,” she said, “would allow you to claim that the work has already been done.” Shabnam, still gathering the expense slips, spoke up. “It is the same difference as that between a verified receipt and an unverified one.” She had not become a vote for either side; she had simply offered an example from her accounts.

At last the chairperson called for a vote on placing a review of the membership rules on the agenda of the next public meeting. The permanent members agreed that the proposal would be read and considered; Ruhani, however, did not obtain a vote at the meeting that day. The secretary made the distinction explicit in the minutes. An interim procedure for withholding the shelter’s private patient list from open distribution was sent to the accountant and the relevant service workers for examination; it was not described as a final rule. Having read the page, Ruhani asked for copies of her objection, her proposal, and the meeting’s response. The secretary supplied a receipt number and wrote down when the copies would be made available.

Towards evening Ruhani left the hall. The blue cloth still covered the chair; the garland was where she had left it. “Will you take the garland?” a cleaner asked. Ruhani paused. “No,” she said. “Give it to whoever prepares today’s expense account. Let the price of the flowers be entered too.” The cleaner laughed. “But it was your name on it.” “My name was on the chair,” Ruhani replied, “not on the decision. Next time we shall test both.” Champa set off home beside her. Neither felt that this was a complete victory, but the dissent entered in writing that day would not be so easy to erase on the morrow.

On the way Naira met Ruhani. She showed her a copy of her mother’s statement but did not unnecessarily disclose the private information it contained. Ruhani showed Naira the receipt for the minutes of the meeting. The two sheets carried the voices of two different human beings. “What was said over the microphone has been written down,” Naira said, “but my mother’s recorded status as dead still has to be changed.” “They heard what I said, too,” Ruhani replied, “but I still have no vote. We must keep a measure of the distance between words and rights.”

As they approached home, Champa glanced at her watch. Tomorrow she had to go to work, and she still had to find the fare for her treatment. “If I cannot come to the next meeting,” she said to Ruhani, “do not give your assent in my name.” “Not without your consent,” Ruhani answered. In that small promise she recognised a test of her own leadership. The question raised within the meeting would have to remain alive inside the shelter as well: who could call themselves another person’s representative, and who had the right to stake another person’s life upon a decision?

Chapter 15 · Draupadi's Question

In the assembly hall of Hastinapura that day, the dice made scarcely any sound. Amid the gleaming floor, the lofty seats, the fragrance of incense, and the heavy breathing of those gathered, the four dice knocking against one another sounded, now and then, like an unfinished word escaping from someone's throat. The game had already gone much too far. The men who at first had called it an entertainment of the royal court were now watching one another's faces more closely than the things being wagered.

Yudhishthira's hand lay motionless beside his knee. Having lost his wealth, his cattle, his chariots, his kingdom, and his brothers, he found within himself a vacancy where judgment ought to have been; into it Shakuni's voice entered with disquieting ease. Shakuni raised the matter of another stake. Everyone present understood that this was no longer an ordinary game. Yet no one rose and took upon himself the authority to stop it. Each man looked to the next, as though the responsibility for the first refusal must always belong to someone else.

Vidura's lips tightened. The question for him was not simply how many possessions had been lost; it was by what right a person whose own freedom had been imperilled could pronounce upon the freedom of another. He looked around the assembly. Concern showed on the faces of certain learned men, but others seemed to be waiting for the one phrase that would confine the whole dispute within the boundaries of a rule.

Draupadi was not yet in the hall. Her name was spoken in that place where the old convenience of treating a woman's absence as her consent remained available. The stake was declared. The dice were thrown. Among the men who gambled, a decision was announced; yet no one had asked the person upon whose life that decision was to be imposed. The flame of a lamp standing in the hall trembled, and no one knew whether it had been stirred by a draught or by the unease within the building.

A messenger was sent to Draupadi. When he arrived with the summons, she began not with obedience but with a question. On hearing why she had been called before the assembly, she did not simply accept the command. Her question was precise: had the king lost himself first, or had he staked her before that? If he had already lost himself, whence came his right to wager the life of another? The messenger could give no answer. He had been instructed to deliver an order; no one had taught its bearer how to answer a question.

The messenger returned and laid the question before the assembly. Some of the men then heard, for the first time, that the woman who had been named as a stake was herself questioning what had been done with her life. Impatience showed on Duryodhana's face. To him, the immediate fulfilment of the assembly's command mattered more than its obligation to answer. The objection already stirring within Vidura was beginning to find words. Bhishma remained silent amid the discipline of a long lifetime and the conflicting boundaries of royal duty. His silence did not diminish the question; it made it heavier.

That evening in Videhapur, Naira placed two documents separately upon Sarita's table. The first was a receipt acknowledging a statement that Sarita was alive and present. The second recorded a proposal to amend the rules of Ruhani's committee. Both bore official stamps, but they meant different things. One acknowledged that words had been heard; the other asked who would possess the authority to accept them and act upon them. Naira moved the little earthen lamp away from the corner of the table so that no drops of oil would stain the papers.

Sarita was picking stones out of rice. “Another meeting today?” she asked. “There was more work after the meeting than in the meeting itself,” Naira said. “Ma, I have a copy of your statement. But the person empowered to change the file has still made no decision.” Sarita set aside a small pebble. “So they will still consider me dead on paper?” There was weariness in her voice, not amusement. “Yes, wherever the false entry remains,” Naira replied. “I won't comfort you with a lie.”

Just then Sanket appeared at the door and said that two women were standing outside the office asking to be heard. One carried a bag of old papers; the other had a small cloth bag from the hospital tucked beneath her arm. The first introduced herself as Anita Chaupal. In the local register, she had been assigned to a social category she did not recognise as her own. Consequently, her application concerning her earnings had been sent to the wrong counter, and unwelcome questions had begun to be asked about her family.

Anita did not set her bag upon the table. First she asked, “Will what I say about these papers in this room be carried outside?” “I will record only as much as you wish,” Naira answered. “But if an application must be submitted to an office, I will tell you beforehand what information is required.” “The wrong caste has been written beside my name,” Anita said. “To get it corrected, must I recount the entire history of my father, my grandfather, and my husband's family?” Naira was silent for a moment.

The other woman, Salma Sheikh, had come from the hospital's temporary assistance desk. She helped patients' families fill in admission forms. That day an elderly woman had arrived struggling for breath, but her identification number did not match the entry in the register. A member of the treatment-room staff had insisted that the form be corrected first. Salma had replied that no one could hold her breath while waiting for numbers to be reconciled. She needed to make the patient's rights understood, but she needed, too, to protect the livelihood her work at that desk afforded her.

Sarita carried the tray of rice inside and came back. “Drink some water first,” she told them both. Salma took a glass in her hand. “They did finally take the patient in. The doctor examined her. But no one kept any account of the time lost. If I submit a written question, they'll tell me my work is to fill in forms, not to change the system.” Anita looked at Salma. “In my case they made the form wrong and then told me to explain the meaning of my name. I gave them the name. They supplied the meaning themselves.”

Naira did not merge their grievances onto a single sheet. Anita's case concerned wrongful social classification and privacy; Salma's concerned the demand for identity verification before treatment. One thing joined the two: at the decisive moment, the voice of the person whose life was being judged had been absent. But that resemblance did not erase the difference between their cases. Naira took out two separate blank pages.

Anita drew a receipt from her bag. Her application had been accepted, but a note from the subsequent office said it could not proceed without verification of the social classification. An employee had told her simply to accept whatever appeared in the list as correct. “If I accept it,” Anita said, “the same thing will appear in my child's papers next time. If I refuse, they'll say I don't want assistance.” Naira read only those portions of the document that Anita had authorised her to use.

From behind them Sanket said, “Shall I take a photograph?” Anita immediately gathered up her bag. Sanket lowered his phone. “No, not without your permission,” he said. “I can read out the dates on the old documents if you'd like. There is no need for a photograph.” Some of the hardness left Anita's face. Salma laughed. “In this house, at least, a mobile phone asks before it is raised.” Sanket smiled too, but put his phone away in his pocket.

In the ancient assembly, the messenger had gone back once more. Draupadi stated her question again, with greater clarity. To her, evading an answer was itself a decision: a decision to enforce a judgment about her life without hearing her. The discipline of the assembly sought to keep her from speaking, but she would not surrender the path of questioning. She demanded an answer from the assembly, not merely permission to enter it.

Bhishma's difficulty was not that he failed to understand a woman's suffering. It was that several accepted rules were colliding, and power was profiting from their collision. The old practice of a husband's authority, the claim of enslavement, the rules of the game, the honour of the royal house: amid these words, Draupadi demanded the right to be present as a person. Vidura knew that the assembly would not quickly agree to an answer that disturbed its own convenience.

At last Draupadi was brought before the pitiless gaze of the assembly. An outrageous attempt began to exert control over her body and her voice. The moment of humiliation was being arranged as though it were a display of royal power, yet Draupadi did not relinquish her question. She did not ask for an answer as the object of anyone's pity. She pressed her case: why had no account been taken of the consent and independent existence of the person described as the object of the wager?

The lamps high above the royal hall cast many shapes upon the polished floor below. One shape reached Draupadi's feet and broke apart; another grew long and spread into the distance. No one took these shapes for omens. They were light and shadow; and upon that floor stood a human being whom many in the assembly chose not to hear, turning instead to observe the direction from which the light fell.

The following morning, Salma reported for duty at the hospital in Videhapur. The register of the night's events recorded the time at which the elderly woman had been admitted, but the space for the time treatment began was blank. Salma asked the desk employee why it had not been entered. “Complete your own forms,” he told her. “The doctor will record the treatment time.” “Then record why that line has been left empty as well,” Salma replied. “The patient was made to wait. That must not disappear.”

The employee grew irritated. “Are you going to take every patient's details and discuss them outside?” “I'm not asking for the patient's name,” Salma said. “I'm asking how long the system makes people wait.” Aniruddha was coming out from inside the hospital. He stopped and listened to them both. The hospital had difficulties of its own—a complaint about medicine being supplied under the wrong identity was still unresolved—but that concern did not justify withholding urgent treatment. Aniruddha gave no definitive decision yet. He asked for a written account of the incident.

Salma wanted her name to appear on the statement. “Better to write it anonymously,” the employee said. “There'll be less trouble.” “Use my name if I choose to give it,” she answered. “Don't impose anonymity upon me either.” The elderly woman's family had not granted permission for her name to be made public. Salma therefore removed the personal details and recorded the delay, the procedure, and the order in which treatment had become available. Aniruddha gave her an acknowledgment of the application. Salma was not asking that essential medical examination before treatment be abolished; she was asking that identity verification and the sequence of treatment be kept distinct.

That day Anita reached the back entrance of the office. A newly painted notice about public welfare covered the outside wall. Inside, names were being called at a window, and people bent towards its small opening to answer. Anita showed her application number. The employee again demanded an extensive account of her family's lineage. “I will provide as much as the rules require,” she said. “My family's private life will not be the price of correcting a list.”

The employee placed a finger upon a line in the register. “But this is what it says here.” “The register has written my name wrongly,” Anita replied, “and you are making the register a witness against me. Show me the source of the entry.” The employee fell silent for a while. On taking out the file, he found that no copy of the document from which the original entry had been made was attached. He then said that nothing could be changed without an order from a senior officer. Rather than continue arguing, Anita asked that this absence be recorded in writing.

Naira met her in the shade outside the office. Anita told her that the original supporting document had not been produced. Naira did not press advice upon her. “Would you like us to raise this at a public hearing,” she asked, “or should we first submit a written question to the responsible officer?” Anita thought for a moment. “A written question first. No one has the right to call out my name before a crowd. If I decide to speak publicly later, that will be another matter.” Naira added a line to the application: Permission has not been given for the public disclosure of private particulars.

As the two came out, they met Rama Karn near the gate. She had brought the acknowledgment slip from the previous day's assistance meeting. Seeing Anita's distress, she started to ask what had happened; but Naira made a small gesture with her hand to indicate that the matter was private. Taking no offence, Rama spoke instead of the business that had brought her there. “To write that someone living is dead, and then, when the person comes forward, to refuse to accept the proof—that's a remarkable art these offices have perfected.” Anita laughed openly for the first time, then said, “It gives us a laugh. But this art comes at a very high price.”

That evening at the shelter, Ruhani was examining the acknowledgment of her proposed amendment to the membership rules. Champa returned and asked how many more people's names had been put at the top of a list before they had agreed to it. Ruhani had left the list blank that day. “I remembered what you said,” she told her. “Someone was telling me about Anita's complaint, but I did not go to summon her. She will choose her own way.” “Today you were silent in the right place,” Champa replied. Ruhani laughed. “Will someone garland me for this silence too?”

Smoke rose from the cooking fire on the shelter's veranda. Rukhsana was keeping a small account of the evening meal. She told the two women that the price of vegetables had gone up that day, but the number of plates given free would be recorded separately; the labour of those who prepared the free meals would not itself be free. Taking up her plate, Champa said, “Today everyone is writing down a line about rights. Write down the number of aubergines on my plate." "I'll write down the number," Rukhsana replied, "but eat your aubergines before you start arguing again."

That night Sarita took out her old account book. Naira had told her about Anita's complaint without disclosing the woman's private particulars. Sarita pointed to an old entry listing rice and oil for several different households. "I had written Kamal's name wrongly here," she said. "It was corrected when Kamal pointed it out. And I remember asking myself then: I may have the right to make an entry in this book, but who has the right to decide the true form of another person's name?"

"The mistake in your account book was corrected," Naira said. "The procedure for correcting a government file is complicated." Sarita closed the book. "Complicated doesn't mean a person must give up their name. But if someone wishes to conceal a name, that person's reasons ought to be heard as well." Naira remembered the day when Sarita, alive before the microphone, had been pronounced dead. She also understood that some altered identities saved lives; to make every entry public could itself become an act of violence.

In the ancient assembly Yudhishthira's head was bowed. All the history of the royal house stood around him, yet Draupadi's question brought him face to face with a decision of his own. He knew what it meant to suffer defeat. But the injury of changing another human being's fate without consent could not be contained within his experience of losing. Even if those assembled accepted the outcome of the game as valid, the question remained: who could be called a stake?

Draupadi looked towards Vidura and then towards Bhishma. Neither gave her immediate justice. She set out her objections once more, each in its order: what power to transfer another's rights remains to someone who has himself suffered dispossession? On what grounds may a person who was never consulted be called a thing? And who gave the assembly the right to call its silence consent? The three questions sounded through the hall from three different directions.

Vikarna had been listening for a long time. He was younger than many in the assembly and possessed less influence; he also bore the weight of his close kinship with Duryodhana. Resting a hand upon his seat, he leaned a little forward. To answer the question the elders were evading would mean more than presenting an argument: it would mean deciding to stand against his own side. No words had yet left his mouth. Draupadi's question held its place at the centre of the hall, and the noise of the assembly slowly gathered around that silence.

In Videhapur, Naira was putting away two slips for the following day. Salma's acknowledgment number was separate from Anita's request for the source document. The two files did not bear the same red mark; no single person's guilt had been established. But both slips had taught her that before a decision could be made about anyone, at least this much had to be known: where had that person's voice been recorded, what had that person been asked, and who had been obliged to answer?

Before going to sleep, Sanket hung his phone from a peg beside the door. “If you don't look at my photograph,” he asked Naira, “will you believe what I tell you?” “I'll listen to what you say,” Naira replied. “But I'll record separately what I've seen, what I've heard, and what has been verified. And I won't look at your picture without your permission.” “Then that's all right,” Sanket said. To him it was no grand principle. It was the satisfaction of being able to make his own small decision about his own small possession.

Far away, at the unbuilt landing of Barki Pond, two lights from the town trembled upon the water. The ripples broke their reflections apart and joined them again; but the way to the ghat remained closed, and the written decision to reopen it had yet to be made. Sarita fastened the door from inside. Naira wrapped the two slips separately in cloth and put out the lamp. Not one file changed of its own accord that night. But two women had already demanded answers of those who presumed to decide their lives.

Chapter 16 · The Silence After Vikarna

In the assembly hall of Hastinapura, Vikarna slowly lifted his palm from the wooden arm of his seat. The wood was warm; only now did he realise how many times he had gripped it tightly. Draupadi stood before the assembly. Instead of answering her question, the men looked from one another's age and rank to the expressions on one another's faces. Directly in front of Vikarna, a courtier was silently folding the edge of his upper garment, as though straightening the creases in the cloth might set right the disordered proceedings of the court.

Vikarna looked first towards Draupadi, then towards his brothers. He knew that if he sought Duryodhana's permission before speaking, permission might never come. He rose. No one had ordered him to do so; no one offered support. At first his voice trembled a little, but what he said was clear: the answer to Draupadi's question could not consist merely in proclaiming who had won the wager. By what right had a man who had already lost his own freedom put another person at stake? To leave that question unheard could not make the loss just.

Vikarna did not stop there. He said that there had been many ways in which judgment could be hemmed in during the game; the future of a kingdom and of kindred had been set upon a gaming table. In such circumstances, who had asked Draupadi what she wished? Why should her absence be treated as consent? More than anger, his voice carried astonishment that, among so many people, no one had yet been willing to hear this simple question to its end.

Duryodhana stared at him. To be a brother meant both shelter and constraint within the royal court. Vikarna understood that words easily spoken inside the household might change his relationships the moment he spoke them before the assembly. For an instant a line of hope appeared on Vidura's face. Bhishma remained silent in his seat. His silence was no answer to Vikarna's reasoning, but the men of the assembly stood ready to interpret it according to their own convenience.

Karna rose. He sought to dismiss Vikarna's objection as immature, placing first the rules of the game and the result publicly declared for the wager. His voice bore a hardness born of memories of his own long humiliation. He knew how the order acknowledged by the assembly decided whom to admit and whom to exclude; yet no private suffering of his could confer a right to humiliate Draupadi. His reply did not resolve the fundamental difficulty in Vikarna's question: Draupadi's consent, and the authority that Yudhishthira had already forfeited. Nevertheless, Karna's words carried weight in the assembly, because those who held power wished to hear them.

Draupadi heard Vikarna speak on her behalf. No immediate comfort came over her face. She saw plainly the distance between one man speaking the truth and the orders of an assembly proceeding as before. She did not ask Vikarna to promise her deliverance. Her question was addressed to the assembly, and it was from the assembly that an answer was required. “Does one person's speaking change the meaning of everyone else's silence?” This gave her question a new edge. Vidura wished to answer, but the uproar in the hall grew louder.

Vikarna was signalled to sit down again. He sat, for he possessed no physical force with which to alter the course of the proceedings. Yet what he had said remained there after he had taken his seat. The court scribe had already recorded the sequence of victories. In small letters at the edge of the page, he entered the objection. The line containing the principal decision remained untouched.

In Videhapur, during the second part of the day, a drop of water fell from the roof of the local committee room into an empty bucket. Old newspapers had been spread beside the window to dry the papers. The minutes of yesterday's meeting were to be read aloud today. Ruhani had arrived early, but her chair once again stood in the row reserved for those who were not permitted to vote upon decisions. This time there was no blue cloth upon it. Files lay on the table, and among those files her written objection lay pressed down.

The secretary began calling the attendance. Ruhani asked, “Am I present, or am I invited?” “Those are not the same thing,” the secretary replied, “but your name appears among the invitees.” Ruhani said, “Then when you write ‘unanimously agreed’ in the minutes, write also that my vote was never taken.” The secretary grew somewhat uncomfortable. The chairperson explained that a review of the rules would be considered at the next meeting; today's proceedings would follow the existing rules. “I am not asking you to announce that the rules have already changed,” Ruhani said. “I am asking only for an account of the voices that those rules keep outside.”

Amla Sarbariya had brought a bag containing copies of documents and a small bundle tied with red thread. The bundle held no account of anyone's private life; it held the receipts acknowledging applications from different households. Her community's name had been written in three different ways in three municipal offices. In one place a letter had been omitted; in another the final vowel-sign had been changed; in a third it had been linked to an altogether different name. This had affected the application numbers, and some families had been turned away on the allegation that their entries were duplicates belonging to the same person.

Amla began by stating her name distinctly. When the secretary opened the register, the entry again contained the wrong spelling. She did not laugh.

“Write this correctly first,” she said. “Then listen to what I have to say. We have asked that the name be written in one consistent form, but each household must keep its own number and its own rights. If, in correcting a word, you make us all into one person, you will have committed another wrong.” An employee suggested that changing the characters in the mobile system would be sufficient. “What has been printed on paper travels in people's pockets,” Amla replied. “Changing an entry on a mobile screen will not erase the reasons given for earlier rejections.”

A young man who had come with her stood holding a bag of books. He had to go to work the next day; finding the fare for journeys to both places was difficult. Amla gestured for him to sit. “Your working time is an expense too,” she told him. “When I have this recorded, I shall also have them record what all these repeated journeys have cost.” The chairperson asked how that could be joined to the collective application. Amla untied her bundle and showed how many people had gone three times to different counters, only to be sent back each time without an answer as to where the original error had arisen.

Naira was seated in the back row. She remembered Anita Chaupal's application. Anita's difficulty had been an incorrect social classification; Amla's was a misspelled name and an erroneous matching of entries. The two were not the same. Naira did not bring Anita's private affairs before the assembly. In her notebook she wrote: source of the incorrect entry; officer authorised to accept a correction; time allowed for issuing a copy. Then she closed the notebook and listened to Amla. In this matter, today, the right to speak belonged to Amla herself.

Sakib Abdal had put an old bag of accounts beside the door of the meeting room. He had been asked to collect contributions for clearing the drainage channel the previous month. He earned his living from small transport jobs and occasional collection and delivery of goods; people also left contributions at his shop. The day before, someone had alleged that Sakib's private earnings and the public contributions were mixed together in the same bag. Rather than merely deny the allegation, Sakib had brought two separate account books.

He laid the first ledger on the table. “This is where the public contributions are entered: how much came in, and by whose authority it was spent on the work,” he said. He kept the second ledger in his hands. “This holds my transport charges, debts, and household expenses. No one is entitled to inspect every page of it. But if my transport was used for work paid for out of the contributions, I will show the receipt separately.” The chairperson grew a little irritated. “So much formality over cleaning a channel?” “The contributions for the cleaning must be open to scrutiny,” Sakib replied. “That does not oblige me to make my household accounts public.”

There was a blank line in Sakib's public ledger. Payment for transporting Lalit's wooden measuring board to inspect the mouth of the drainage channel had not yet been approved. Cutting a route for the water was prohibited until Aditi had inspected it, so the only expenditure entered against the proposed work was the money spent on preparation. Sakib himself distinguished any profit he might earn. "If my vehicle is needed, agree the rate beforehand. I will not make a quiet profit out of public contributions, but neither will I abandon my livelihood and work for nothing." From the back row someone murmured, "He is right."

Ruhani looked towards the voice. The chairperson was reading from the draft minutes: "with the agreement of all members present." "Does this 'all' include Sakib?" Ruhani asked. "Does it include Amla? Does it include me?" "Invitees' views are entered in the record," the chairperson said. "Members cast the votes." "Then write two separate lines," Ruhani replied. "'Votes cast by members'; 'objections raised by invitees'. Words heard aloud have their place, and votes have theirs." The chairperson looked at the secretary. For a while the secretary's pen hovered over the page.

One member of the committee said, "If we spend so much time on these little distinctions, how will the pond excavation ever move forward?" Gathering up her papers, Amla said, "If wages for digging are entered in my name, but on paper I am taken for somebody else, how am I to do the work? Putting the accounts right is part of preparing the excavation." Sakib added, "If you do not record what is owed to a worker separately, you will afterwards claim the work was donated. Things are delayed because trust in the accounts was never established at the outset." From outside came the continuing sounds of measurements being taken on the steps of the ghat.

The chairperson carried the proceedings forward. No proposal to amend the membership rules had been placed before that day's meeting for decision; only the draft minutes of the earlier meeting had been read. Ruhani asked again whether the silence of those members who had said nothing had been described as support. "Under the rules," the secretary replied, "those who did not cast a vote at the time of the count were recorded as present." Ruhani said, "I am asking you not to invent figures. Who spoke in favour, who spoke against, who remained silent, and who had no right to vote—why must these four different conditions disappear into the single word 'unanimity'?"

Naira rose from her place. "I am not a member of this committee," she said, "so I will not decide what its rules mean. But if I may inspect a copy of the minutes, I can read the passages relating to dissent separately." The chairperson smiled faintly. "Your mother's case is proceeding elsewhere. Must we have another discussion of evidence here?" Naira remained calm. "Yes—elsewhere. If we mix these matters together, we will do harm to all three: Sarita's statement that she is alive, Amla's name, and the voting of this committee." She lowered the paper she had been holding.

In Hastinapura, after Karna's reply, some members of the assembly fell utterly silent. They had heard Vikarna, but to take an open position was dangerous. Vidura once more insisted upon justice. Yudhishthira's bowed face was not, for him, proof of consent given in silence. The fact that Draupadi's question remained unanswered did not mean that the decision could now be accepted as just. The silence of one whose throat cannot release a word may contain reasons altogether different from those of the assembly.

Vikarna wondered what would come of what he had just said. Would his household continue to count him among its own, or call him disloyal? The questions rose within him, but he felt no shame. He looked again towards Draupadi. He understood that his words had not saved her from the humiliation of the assembly. Yet if he had not spoken, the account of what had happened would have made all the men appear to hold the same opinion. For the sake of that single distinction, he accepted the price.

Draupadi's gaze fell upon the massive doors of the hall. Life went on outside too: water had to be fetched, meals cooked, stables cleaned, and messengers awaited. It was the people outside who would have to bear the consequences of the royal assembly's decisions. Yet they had no seat in the place where its rules were made. Draupadi began to perceive another side of her own question: an order that determines people's lives owes an answer not only to those who win within the assembly, but also to the lives upon which its decisions descend.

When the meeting in Videhapur broke for an interval, Champa arrived on the outer veranda. Ruhani offered to read the draft minutes to her. “I've only just come from work,” Champa said. “Don't enter my name without my permission. But if you want my opinion, tell me the whole of it.” Ruhani handed her a page. Champa could read, but fatigue made her blink again and again. She did not ask for a chair; she sat on the wooden platform of the veranda. It was not the seat of honour inside the committee room, but here there were fewer obstacles to asking a question.

When Amla came outside, a receipt slipped from her bag, and Sakib picked it up for her. One edge of it was damp. “Have a copy made of a paper like that,” he said. “Then you won't have to go running about again.” “The price of the copy will go into the account too,” Amla replied. “They have written our names wrong, but every office has collected its fare and fees with perfect accuracy.” They both laughed. A little way off, small paper twists of roasted gram flour had been sent over from Rukhsana's kitchen. Sakib bought two; Amla bought one with her own money. No question could keep hunger at bay.

After the interval, the secretary read out a revised draft. It now stated that Ruhani's objection concerning voting rights had been received, that a review of the membership rules was proposed, and that the opinions of invitees had not been counted as members' votes. The relevant records office would be asked to investigate the source of the spelling of Amla's name; until then, copies of the reasons for rejecting her applications would be preserved. A copy of Sakib's public contribution ledger had been lodged with the committee's accounts, but not the full text of his private ledger. These were small changes in procedure, not final decisions.

Having heard the draft, Ruhani asked, “And the members who remained silent?” The secretary showed her the place where something could be written. Until then the line had been blank. He filled it in: “Present, but expressed no opinion.” The chairperson said that these words did not constitute a final interpretation of the rules; they merely recorded what had happened that day. Ruhani accepted that. “Write only what took place. I will not pretend this line has given me the right to vote.” There was a slight weariness in her voice, but her inner resolve had not weakened.

Meanwhile, for the first time, Amla saw her name correctly written on a correction application. The office's original register had not yet been altered. Holding the paper in her hands, she said, “For now, this has my name right. The work concerning my household still remains.” Sakib checked the receipt number for his public contribution ledger. “If there is still a dispute about my transport charges,” he said, “I'll put the rate and the receipt before them. Contributors ought not to have to trust my word alone.” Each held a small piece of written evidence, but neither document undid the damage already done.

Before the meeting ended, the chairperson announced that the earlier vote count would stand. Ruhani left without the right to vote. She understood that having the name of an objection preserved in the minutes and having an institution change its decision were two different stages. Champa met her at the door. “Another garland?” she asked. “We saved the cost of flowers today,” Ruhani replied. “That will pay for two copies.” “Make sure you get a receipt for the copying,” Champa said, “or you'll end up quarrelling with Sakib.”

When Naira reached Sarita's home, the evening rice was just being taken off the fire. Sanket had set warm water in an earthen bowl and was washing the nib of his pen in it. Sarita asked what had happened at the committee. “The decision hasn't changed,” Naira said. “But those who said nothing were not recorded as supporters; those who had no vote have had their objections preserved separately.” Sarita considered this for a while. “On the stage they called me dead, and afterwards they wrote down that I had spoken. Because the page bearing my words survived separately, it became possible to fight from there. But it will take people again to make them change the paper.”

Naira looked towards her mother's old ledger. The page with the twenty-seven names was still kept separately, wrapped in cloth. Nothing at today's meeting had established a new owner or a culprit in relation to it. In her small notebook she made three headings: “Stated”; “Heard”; “Decided.” Amla's correctly written application lay somewhere between a statement made and one acknowledged; Ruhani's objection had been heard, but voting rights had not been determined. Sarita's declaration that she was alive had been recorded, but the notice of her death had not been cancelled. These distinctions did not make the mystery of the papers more sensational; they made it clearer.

At night the wind came from the direction of the Tilwaha. In the rustle of bamboo in the courtyard there seemed to be the sound of a boat's oar striking water. Sanket set his pen upon the wooden platform to dry. “If everyone keeps silent,” he asked, “who will tell what happened that day?” “Whoever saw it will say what was seen,” Sarita replied, “and whoever heard it will say what was heard. And whoever found the courage to speak should at least have the right not to have their words changed according to someone else's wishes.” Naira remained looking at her.

In the assembly hall of Hastinapura, the lamps were growing smaller one by one. Vikarna's voice had not altered the immediate outcome, but it left a witness to one thing: even those of the same household, sitting in the same assembly, did not regard the same injustice in the same way. Draupadi's question still stood amid the assembly's claims of authority. The shadows lengthened; the court's decision remained as it was. The protest against a wrong that could not be stopped that day did not fall out of history. It remained both in the words people had spoken and in the heavy debt of the words they had left unsaid.

That night in Videhapur, a sheet bearing the committee's seal was being prepared for delivery to three different households: one copy for Ruhani, one to accompany Amla's application, and one beside the acknowledgement of the contribution ledger. No one received from that sheet a complete remedy for the troubles of a life. But if, at the next meeting, someone declared that “everyone had agreed,” there would now be written grounds on which to read the claim and challenge it. Long after Sarita's hearth had gone out, the ash beneath it remained warm. Naira did not put her hand to it. She merely closed the veranda door and thought: sometimes even silence must be accounted for, lest one person's failure to speak be made into false evidence of another's victory.

Chapter 17 · Kaikeyi's Due

When the bell sounded for the changing of the watch in the royal palace of Ayodhya, Manthara lowered the little oil lamp in her hand. The night watchman stood his staff beside the door and rubbed his eyes with weariness. Baskets of flowers were arriving along the corridor. News of the preparations for the coronation had not yet reached every chamber in equal measure, but the new pitchers set in a corner of the courtyard and the seats washed in haste made one thing plain: tomorrow the palace would assume another form.

Manthara carried three keys wrapped in a piece of cloth. The first opened Kaikeyi's inner storeroom; the second, the servants' veranda; the third, a small chest containing medicines, bandages, and vessels for heating water. As she grew old, the weight of the keys seemed greater in her hand. It was not the weight of iron. It was the weight of a question: with a new king and a newly ordered women's household, to whom would the authority of those keys pass?

A young attendant stood holding a basket. "How many flowers shall we need from today onwards?" she asked. "Count as many as there are in the baskets," Manthara replied. "A change of king does not change the number of flowers, but it can change the name of the person who counts them." The attendant tried to laugh, then asked, "My name too?" Manthara slipped her palm beneath the basket to steady it. "Save the flowers for now. I have no authority to answer for your name."

In her chamber Kaikeyi was unfastening a silken band. It was old, and its threads held the memory of a wrist injured in wartime. To her it was less a sign of victory than the mark of a day on which, after she had saved the king's life, he had promised to grant her two boons. Through all the years since, she had never turned that promise into payment for the ordinary work of her days.

"Your Majesty," Manthara said, "today the attendants have been asked to draw up a list for the new arrangements. No one has told them who is to be assigned where." Kaikeyi folded the band and put it aside. "The work of the coronation has increased. There will be more service to perform; that will be why they want a list." Manthara answered, "When the work increases, the hands required increase too. But there is talk of striking names off as well. No one has looked into the faces of those who do the work."

Hearing her tone, Kaikeyi sat upright. Manthara had been with her for many years, but old affection did not mean that Kaikeyi accepted every supposition of hers as truth. "Are you telling me what you heard, or what you saw?" she asked. From the knot at her waist Manthara brought out not a sheet of paper but a list made of knots tied in cloth. There were no names written upon it. She counted them from memory: the one whose household drew its grain from here; the one whose wounds were dressed from this very chest; the widow who came to serve with her son beside her.

"Who will answer for all of them?" Manthara asked. "I have no objection to Rama. But if, after his coronation, the new overseer of the attendants says their service is no longer wanted here, where will these people go?" "Rama is not one to cast people aside," Kaikeyi said. Manthara answered at once, "We can trust in his kindness. But does kindness secure what was already owed?"

Kaikeyi fell silent. She knew Rama's affection within their royal family. She also carried a mother's concern for Bharata, who was not then in Ayodhya. Rama's happiness had never seemed to her something separate from the happiness of her own house. Manthara's question was beginning to set these things against one another all at once. "Is it only the attendants' due that troubles you?" Kaikeyi asked quietly. Manthara did not avert her eyes. "No. There is Bharata's future. There is my own old age as well. I will not give my fear the name of selfless service."

That admission made Kaikeyi look at her afresh. Manthara was not concealing the possibility of fault in herself. "However deep the affection of a royal house," she said, "affection is not a rule. Someone assured of safety today may find their name on the list of those cast off tomorrow." "Then you want me to prevent Rama's coronation in Bharata's name?" Kaikeyi asked. Before answering, Manthara straightened the lamp's wick. "I want you to decide now what your promise means. Do not afterwards lay the blame on me for having raised the question."

Kaikeyi went to the window. Outside, clouds were passing across the moon above the courtyard. A servant covered the mouth of a new ceremonial pitcher with cloth so that no dust would settle in it before dawn. The affairs of the kingdom had long been conducted with such care. Yet at the moment of a great decision, where did even half that care disappear from human beings? She remembered Dasharatha's pledge—a promise the king had made, but one she herself remained free not to invoke.

"If I ask for the boons," Kaikeyi said, "I shall receive what is due to me, but it will become a punishment for Rama." "Rama's coronation without even a pause may become a humiliation for Bharata," Manthara replied. Kaikeyi turned towards her. "Bharata is not here. If I write my own desire in the name of what he feels, that too will be an injustice." Manthara said nothing. She understood that fear alone would no longer govern Kaikeyi's course.

A tray of food was brought into the chamber. Kaikeyi lifted a mouthful, then put it down again. When the attendant moved to take the food away, Manthara stopped her. "Let the tray stay here," she said. "Hunger will return." "Have you eaten anything all day?" Kaikeyi asked. Manthara shook her head. The two women took a little rice from the same tray into separate bowls. The difficulty of the decision did not vanish, but this ordinary act reminded them that the palace ran not upon a king's promises alone, but upon the time of a thousand people.

Dasharatha came to Kaikeyi's chamber in the last watch of the night. His face was tired from the preparations for the celebration; yet at Kaikeyi's summons he asked with pleasure, "What gift would you like today?" Within that easy question Kaikeyi perceived the heavy place occupied by an old pledge. She did not sit down after greeting him. "Not a gift," she said. "I want a reckoning of your promise to grant me two boons."

The smile left the king's face. He first remembered the event of the war; then he looked at Kaikeyi as though he had expected the future of that memory to be nothing more than an occasion for celebration. "I have pledged to give you whatever you ask," he said. Kaikeyi answered, "Then listen first. You will not bear the burden of what I ask alone. It will fall upon Rama, Bharata, Kausalya, the citizens, and all of us."

For the first boon she asked that Bharata be crowned king. Dasharatha's palm trembled upon the arm of his seat. Before naming the second boon, Kaikeyi took a little time to steady her breathing. "Let Rama live in the forest for fourteen years," she said. The sound of a bell outside reached the chamber; somewhere the rehearsals for the celebration were continuing. Once the king uttered "Rama," and then his voice failed him.

"Kaikeyi," Dasharatha asked, "what are you trying to save by this promise?" Anger and entreaty were joined in his question. Kaikeyi herself could not see her answer with perfect clarity. She wanted Bharata to have a secure place at the centre of the kingdom; she wanted a future free from the pain of mistrust; she had heard of the insecurity in the lives of Manthara and the attendants. Yet she could not herself claim that these reasons made Rama's departure for the forest an indisputable necessity.

"I will not withdraw the boons," Kaikeyi said. "But neither will I say that this decision harms no one." Dasharatha could only look at her. On the day he made his promise, the king had seen his own generosity; now, on the day when he must fulfil it, he could see no end to its cost. He gave no answer. Silence spread through the chamber in place of words.

Manthara stood outside the door. Because the king was within, she had no right to enter. She could not hear every sentence spoken inside; she refused to risk fashioning a complete meaning out of fragments of sound. The servants' keys clinked once more in her palm. She understood that the household whose security she had spoken for might now become the beginning of another insecurity. She put the keys not upon the chest, but into her own bag.

In the first light of dawn, Kaikeyi sat beside Dasharatha. Outside, the flowers for the celebration were still fresh; inside, deep lines of exhaustion marked the king's face. For the first time, Kaikeyi turned Manthara's words about in her own mind: if a new right is taken away in order to protect an old promise, whose home is laid waste in the name of protection? But she had made her decision, and she could not escape responsibility for its harm by laying it upon another person's conscience.

In Videhapur that same day, the wind was lifting one corner of a printed sheet intended for the school noticeboard. Asad Syed climbed a ladder and took it down. The page contained two phrases relating to the assistance-distribution committee's previous meeting: "unanimously" and "approved." Asad supervised admissions and the attendance register at the school; reading public notices issued by the town had also fallen to him. He knew the weight of words which, once fastened to a wall, would be quoted from house to house.

The headmaster said, “It’s a notice sent down from above. Why are you throwing it away?” Asad showed him the torn corner. “I’m not throwing it away. I’m taking it down. Whose signature is on this? Yesterday we received the minutes with the objections recorded separately. This notice again says everyone agreed.” “Why should the school get involved in this dispute?” the headmaster asked. “Our work is teaching.” “The wall belongs to the school,” Asad replied. “The children’s families read this page. If a falsehood goes out in our voice, how can teaching remain separate from it?”

An old bamboo penholder stood on Asad’s desk, though most of the school’s work now appeared on sheets printed by machine. In his own handwriting he set down three lines: the original source of the notice, the date of issue, and the limits of what the school had verified. He had no wish to leave the space for a signature empty, but neither did he wish to sign a claim for which he had no authority. He made two copies of the page for submission to the office.

At that time Naira had come to the public assistance counter behind the school to enquire about obtaining a certified copy of Sarita’s statement that she was alive. The minutes of the previous meeting were in her bag. On seeing her, Asad asked, “Have you read this page? It says ‘everyone’s approval.’” “Not everyone was present,” Naira answered. “And not everyone who was present had the right to vote.” “Then this is not a school notice,” Asad said. “It has become publicity for somebody’s conclusion.”

Naira told him that Ruhani’s objection had been recorded, but she had not been given voting rights; Amla’s application had been accepted, but the original community register had not been corrected; Sarita’s statement had been entered on record, but the notice of her death had still not been cancelled. Asad did not interrupt. He wrote each of the three circumstances separately upon the paper. “Write down what has been achieved,” he said. “Do not turn what has not happened into an achievement. Otherwise, when a child asks tomorrow why their mother’s application is still held up, what shall we tell them?”

In one of the classrooms, some children were rehearsing a play. A girl forgot her line, and another child quietly prompted her. Asad turned towards the door. Watching that simple act of help, he remembered that reading out someone’s name from a paper and taking the right to speak in that person’s name were two different things. He told the children to carry on rehearsing and returned to the desk. In that brief pause Naira, too, understood that the right to speak was not settled only upon the platforms of public meetings.

The headmaster returned to the office. “All this running about to correct two lines? If the board stays empty, people will say the school is hiding information.” Asad offered a solution. “Let us keep a copy of the original notice. Add a note underneath saying that this is a statement sent by the committee, not a conclusion verified by the school. When the correct minutes arrive, we can post a copy beside it." "And the cost?" the headmaster asked. Asad took two receipts from his bag—one for photocopying, the other for glue. "I have paid for these myself. Next time, let us decide in writing beforehand whose account will bear the expense."

Naira looked at the receipts. Such small sums generally escaped notice, but the labour of correcting a school announcement also took time and money. Instead of thanking Asad, she asked, "Will your name appear on this application?" "It will," he answered. "The incorrect page was put up by my hand. The demand for its correction should go forward under my signature as well. But the whole fault of the person who sent the letter must not be put upon my name."

At the assistance counter, an employee said that a separate application would be required for a certified copy of the committee minutes. Naira produced one she had already written. The employee went on to say that the school's seal would not be affixed to the copy. Asad laughed. "Why would it need the school's seal? It needs the seal of the body that held the meeting. My seal cannot make me the owner of its decision." Displeasure showed on the employee's face, but he wrote down the acknowledgement number for the application.

Naira entered the number in her notebook. This was not going to put right, at once, the record falsely declaring her mother dead. But the difference between the committee's accurate minutes of yesterday and the publicity sheet of today had been preserved. She did not assume that any one person had knowingly dictated a lie. All she knew for now was that the state of the proceedings had been presented differently in the public announcement; the original author, the signature, and the sequence of approvals would have to be examined separately.

As the afternoon waned, Asad sat in a patch of shade beside the school and unwrapped his rotis. He invited Naira to sit, then set aside half of the fried greens he had brought from home for her. Naira refused. "You won't have enough to eat," she said. "It isn't too little," Asad replied. "It's a matter of sharing. No one's name needs to be struck off for someone else to eat." They both laughed. For a while they spoke of the children's games at school, the repair of a broken bench, and the water that collected on the road during the rains. No mystery was solved in that conversation.

On the other side of Videhapur, Sarita was setting water to heat upon the stove. Naira reached home before darkness fell. She placed the school letter and the acknowledgement number before her mother. As she read, Sarita asked, "Does anyone here say that the false record of my death has now been corrected?" "No," Naira replied. "This letter concerns the committee's statement. Your case remains separate." Sarita nodded. "Let it remain separate. Give every injustice one name, and no one can tell who is responsible for which."

On the veranda, Sanket was making a little boat out of paper. The story about the school play interested him. "If a child forgets a line and another child tells it to them," he asked, "who gets the credit for saying it on stage?" "The one who speaks the line," Naira answered, "and the help given by the other child deserves recognition too." Sanket drew two separate blue lines on his boat—one for the person who steered it, the other for the person who showed the way through the water. He saw no official map in those lines.

That evening Urmila was waiting for the vehicle that would take the hospital linen. The person who was to collect it had earlier asked her to wait until nightfall; nothing had been put in writing about wages for a second shift. Sarita offered her some of the hot water from the stove. Drinking it, Urmila said, "When the night grows longer, the work grows longer too. But entering the hours of the night in the column for daytime will not give me back my sleep." Naira listened without hurrying to reply.

In Ayodhya, dew lay upon the palace flowers at dawn after that night. Kaikeyi could not step outside the consequences of the boons she had demanded. Beyond the chamber, Manthara tended the attendants' keys and listened as their names were called one by one. She knew that even if her fears had been true, the remedy she had proposed was not innocent. Within the door the king was silent; outside, people were asking what had become of the celebration. No one yet possessed a sentence capable of speaking truly, all at once, of everyone's due, everyone's loss, and everyone's future.

In Videhapur, before closing her notebook for the night, Naira wrote two headings: "The one who gives the promise" and "The one who bears its burden." Beneath them she laid out separate papers: Asad's school notice, Ruhani's dissent, and Sarita's statement. She did not open the page of twenty-seven names; the discoveries of this day had yielded no direct answer to the mystery surrounding any of them. Outside, Urmila's vehicle arrived late, and she refused to load the bundles of linen until the additional hours had been entered in writing. The night went on deepening, but one small account had been changed for this night.

Chapter 18 · Urmila's Night

In the royal palace of Ayodhya, the sound of pitchers being filled for the morning rose before the sound of human voices. Dew from the night had settled on a brass water vessel standing upon the raised platform. When Urmila lifted it, the cold entered her hands. Inside the chamber two trunks stood open: one held the plain garments for Lakshmana's journey, the other the clothes of the palace's daily life. The first trunk was easy to fill. No one wished to take responsibility for the second.

Lakshmana had said that he would accompany Rama into the forest. The decision had been announced during the night, but the moment of hearing a thing and the moment of understanding what it would mean to live through it are not the same. Urmila had kept awake all night, not because she was weeping, but because she was reckoning anew the work of a household whose duties had, until yesterday, been divided among its people. Rama's departure for the forest, and Sita's decision to go with him, were events so immense that people had begun to forget even their right to ask small questions. Urmila was making a list of those questions: who would give Kausalya her medicine, who would be with Sumitra through the night, who would ask whether the elderly attendant had been allowed to rest?

When Lakshmana came in, he found Urmila straightening the edge of a garment. "I shall take very little with me," he said. Urmila looked at him. "I can make your bundle smaller. But how am I to make smaller the bundle of work you are leaving behind?" Before answering, Lakshmana laid the bow in his hand beside the door. "I must go." "I am not disputing the necessity," Urmila said. "I am only asking: once you have gone, whose needs will remain here?"

Lakshmana had to weigh his decision once more. He felt his loyalty to Rama, his obligation to keep Sita safe upon the journey, and, beside them, the faces of the tired people in his own home. He did not say that Urmila would manage everything. Nor could he bring himself to promise that all the burdens left behind would somehow grow lighter of their own accord. "I shall make arrangements for the mothers," he said. Urmila answered quietly, "An arrangement is not the name of one woman. If you assign someone work, you must decide when that person is to rest as well."

Shrutakirti stood at the doorway. She held a little glass bowl containing a little jaggery and roasted grain. "Eat something first," she said. "If the stomach that does the thinking is empty, our thoughts will devour us too." Urmila laughed. It had been a long time since her laughter had sounded in the room. She took a small piece of jaggery and gave half to Shrutakirti. "Where do you find so much wisdom?" "It comes with the roasted grain," Shrutakirti replied. In that instant, beyond the forest, the throne and all the vows, the two sisters still possessed a world of their own.

“When will you sleep tonight?” Shrutakirti asked. “When the night’s work has been apportioned and written down,” Urmila answered. Shrutakirti laughed. “Then the palace will keep an account of sleep for the first time.” Urmila smiled too. “Here the watches change, but no one counts the watches kept by those awake beside a bed.” After a pause she added, “I do not ask for the boon of sleep. I ask for my share of the night.”

Before noon, Urmila sat with Mandavi and Shrutakirti in the inner courtyard. They listened as the attendants’ duties were divided. One elderly woman said plainly that during the third watch of the night her eyes no longer saw clearly. She was ashamed to admit it. “Gather flowers by day, not by night,” Urmila told her. “There is no reason to punish anyone whose eyes see less well in darkness.” Another woman asked whom she must seek for leave to attend to a sick child. “Come to me,” Urmila said, “or, if I am absent, to Shrutakirti. We shall make clear whom everyone should approach. You need no written order to have your child’s suffering heard.”

Having listened to them all, Mandavi said, “People will come to me as well, but Bharata is not here. How much authority do I have in his absence?” Urmila replied, “You must have as much authority to decide as you are being given responsibility for the work. Otherwise only the blame for mistakes will be yours.” At that, Mandavi enumerated the duties entrusted to her: issuing grain from the stores, arranging suitable food for the long-standing patients, and ensuring rest for the women on night watch. Not everything was settled at once, but it became clear to whom each question should be taken.

When Sumitra came into the courtyard, she said that she too was owed a share of the waking nights that would follow Lakshmana’s departure. Urmila rose at once, but Sumitra motioned her to remain seated. “I am growing old, but I can still speak for myself,” she said. “Ask me before you choose the woman who will attend me. And decide whom she is to call when she grows tired.” For the first time, Urmila saw in this decision not merely a mother-in-law’s permission but the partnership of a fellow worker. Sumitra added, “Lakshmana has gone in the name of the duty he believes in. Its burden shall not fall upon you alone. I too belong to this house.”

When Lakshmana returned, Urmila handed him his bundle of clothes. “Are you angry with me?” he asked. “You understand the love that lives within anger,” Urmila replied. “But if you take my question for nothing more than anger, it will never be answered.” Lakshmana took her hand. He might have said that he would return and put everything right, but he did not know whether such a promise could be kept. He said only, “I shall remember the arrangements you have made.” Releasing his hand, Urmila said, “Remembering will not cook the rice here. Tell others, too, what you have heard.”

In Videhapur, on that same rainy night, Urmila stood beside the bundles of hospital linen. The vehicle had arrived, but the paper in its driver’s hand recorded only “daytime transport.” Daylight had long since faded; the hours of the second shift were mounting. There was sweat on Urmila’s forehead, and her arms ached from lifting the linen at the ghat. Instead of loading the bundles on the vehicle, she set them squarely on the ground.

"What has held us up now?" the driver asked. "The work has not been held up," Urmila said. "The account of the night has." He showed her the paper. "Get it signed. If the linen reaches the hospital late, I shall have to answer for it." "So shall I," she replied. "But your paper says these things were collected in daylight. How can work done at night be entered in the daytime column?"

Sarita had come out onto the veranda carrying a vessel of hot water. She made Urmila drink a couple of mouthfuls first. Naira had arrived too, but she did not take the argument out of Urmila's hands. She remembered the question raised at the previous day's meeting about Ruhani's chair and her right to speak. "Urmila-di," she asked, "would you like me to read the paper, or would you rather state your terms first?" "Read the paper," Urmila said. "I shall state the terms."

The paper gave the number of bundles as three, but no time of collection. The driver said that the clerk who opened the hospital's supply ledger would not be available before morning. Urmila showed him the different marks tied to the cloth of the bundles. "These two contain washed sheets. The third contains other linen used for patients. Do not enter all three as one kind of item. They will go to different places inside the hospital." For a moment the driver was silent. He was in a hurry to deliver the linen; Urmila was in a hurry to avoid being blamed if it went to the wrong place.

Naira opened her notebook to write. Urmila stopped her. "That is your notebook for evidence. If you put my wages in it, the hospital will say tomorrow that this is merely someone's private writing. I shall take out my own register." From an old cloth bag she drew a small register. Some pages containing the year's wage entries had curled where they had been wetted. Urmila ruled a fresh line: "Additional night collection"; "Total bundles"; "Time vehicle arrived"; "Time of arrival at hospital"; "Payment outstanding."

"Are we going to spend until dawn writing all this?" the driver asked. Urmila placed the paper before him. "You can watch the time. Every minute spent writing is part of my time too. But if you prefer, telephone the hospital and tell them these three bundles will arrive late because the wages have not been accounted for." The driver thought this harsh. He took out his phone, then, before dialling, asked, "Will you record my time as well?" "Your working time under your name," Urmila replied. "Not under mine."

They spoke by telephone to the employee who received linen at the hospital's night entrance. He said that he could issue a receipt for the supplies immediately; the contractor would have to decide the wages. Urmila understood the distinction perfectly. "A receipt for delivery proves that the work was done. It is not an acknowledgement of wages. I need both, separately." The employee agreed to record the count and the time of arrival. With his own hand the driver entered the time of collection. No money had yet been paid, but they had stopped the night's work from being turned into day's work and the account closed on that falsehood.

As the vehicle set out, Naira asked, “Shall I come with you?” “You have work to do at home for your mother,” Urmila said. “I shall go with the vehicle this once. If I need you there, I shall telephone.” Sarita gave her a flatbread and a little container of leftover vegetables. Urmila pulled a face. “Are you sending me to work at night, or to a wedding procession?” Sarita laughed. “At a wedding feast, who keeps count of the serving dishes? This bread is from my home for you, not from the hospital’s supplies.” Urmila put the container in her bag. Her tiredness had not lessened, but a small smile had come to the corners of her eyes.

On reaching the rear entrance of the hospital, the vehicle stopped again. The place where bundles of clean linen were to be kept in the inner section had been changed; mud and water had collected along the old route. Urmila asked the gatekeeper why the laundry had not been informed of the change. “I was not ordered to tell anyone,” he said. “Then whose account will show the delay caused by the changed location?” she asked. This time she was not asking who had the authority to give an order, but about the sequence in which the work had to be done. An employee came forward with a lamp, and the bundles were counted separately.

By the door, Saraswati Thakur was fastening the cord of her cloth bag. Inside were a comb, scissors, a clean strip of cloth for covering a customer, and the things needed for braiding hair. Her modest trade outside the hospital was tending the hair and beards of patients’ relatives, workers, and attendants. She had just finished combing the hair of an elderly woman whose daughter was a patient. The woman had said that, after waiting all day for the doctor, she had found no opportunity to attend to her hair. Saraswati had given her the time, done the work, and written a receipt for the agreed fee.

Urmila had seen her before but had never asked her name. Looking at Urmila’s register, Saraswati said, “Do you keep an account of the night too?” “You as well?” Urmila asked. Saraswati took a paper out of her bag. “Some people say, ‘You only moved the scissors twice. How much time can that take?’ But before cutting hair there is water to fetch, a seat to set out, a clean cloth to change. Who counts any of that?” Urmila smiled. “The person doing it with her own hands must count it first.”

Saraswati saw her daughter waiting outside. Along with a book, the girl held a notice about a training course. “Ma, may I go to that class tomorrow?” she asked. “First we shall look at the household accounts,” Saraswati answered. “We must work out the fee and the cost of getting there and back. But what you wish to learn will not be tied to the scissors in my bag.” The daughter hesitated before speaking, as though she were not accustomed to hearing permission given so plainly. Saraswati laughed. “Knowing how to shorten someone’s hair does not give me the right to cut short everyone’s dreams for the rest of their lives.”

As she listened to them, Urmila folded a page of her register. “People tell me that if my daughter goes to study, who will look after the household income?” Saraswati said. “But those same people never count the time she needs for learning." "I hear that question every day too," Urmila replied. "Who will do the housework? Who will wash the linen? Who will carry the patient's bundle? The work can be shared and an answer found. But why must the answer always be one woman's body?" Saraswati did not laugh at this. She said to her daughter, "Come, let us go home. The work will be there again in the morning."

Meanwhile Champa had come out of the hospital. She had been sitting there since nightfall for her mother's tests. Seeing Saraswati, she said, "I was supposed to give you your ribbon yesterday, but I could not get home." "Give it to me tomorrow," Saraswati answered. "This is no hour to demand a debt from someone who has sat awake all night." Champa glanced at her phone in her pocket, then slipped it away again. She indicated the faces of those standing by the hospital door; one person had lifted a piece of cloth to give a relative some privacy. "Everyone asks for news here," Champa said, "but not every piece of news belongs to everyone." Moving towards her bundles, Urmila said only, "You decide when to tell your own story."

Night had deepened by the time the receipt for the bundles was written. Urmila sorted the clean linen and checked the time of handover. The additional night hours were entered in the register, but the space for payment remained blank. "I can attest to the hours," the employee said. "I cannot fix the rate." Urmila accepted that limit, but she would not put her thumbprint against an empty space. She wrote "Payment undecided" and asked for a copy of the paper. The employee hesitated at first, then gave her one. One answer had been secured; the next dispute still lay ahead.

Urmila remembered the coming Kartik festival, the day of honouring the ghat. She wanted that year's celebration to be more than flowers and lamps arranged by the water: she wanted a board displaying the working hours of all those who washed the linen. How many pieces each person had carried, which paths had been closed, who had found a replacement during the night watch —these things ought to be read aloud before the people. Then she remembered that months still remained before the festival. It was a comfort in the middle of the night to imagine better arrangements for the future; it did nothing, however, to free her body from the weariness of today.

On her way back, Urmila saw Saraswati's daughter reading a book beside the road. Beneath a faulty light bulb the girl narrowed her eyes to make out the words. Saraswati told her not to read in such darkness. "Once the work starts at home, I shall have no time," the daughter said. Saraswati did not close her book. "Then we shall divide up the hours at home," she said. "But for now, watch where you are walking." Urmila remembered the fresh line in her register: one counts time not only to claim payment, but also to make room for one's own life.

In Ayodhya, as evening fell, Urmila sat with a friend in a small courtyard. The commotion of departure had subsided. Her friend was unstringing a garland of wilted flowers and arranging leaves upon a new thread. "Why are your eyes red?" she asked. "I have been awake," Urmila said. "And I have wept a little too." Instead of replying, the friend loosened a knot between the leaves. Urmila spoke again. "People will say Urmila spent so many years in patient endurance. But today I shall get through only tonight. Tomorrow night I shall face tomorrow."

"What used to give you pleasure?" her friend asked. Urmila was taken aback. Then she answered, "Catching the wrong note in the middle of Shrutakirti's song; arguing with Mandavi about the colours of flowers; sewing a little garment with my own hands." Smiling, her friend asked, "Then why should all that end?" Urmila rose and gathered up the thread. "It will not end. When there is need, I shall work; when my heart wishes it, I shall sing too. I shall not surrender my right to the space between the two."

In Videhapur, Urmila returned home before dawn. Inside the veranda Sarita was lighting a small electric lamp, not an oil lamp. Naira opened the door and asked, "Did the linen reach them?" Urmila held out the receipt. "It reached them. The time is recorded. The money is not here yet." Looking at the paper, Naira said, "You must keep this copy." "I shall," Urmila replied. "But right now there is something else I must do." "What?" Sarita asked. Urmila laughed. "Sleep."

Without a word, Naira drew the curtain across the window. She did not open the notebook containing the entry recording Sarita's death or the page bearing twenty-seven names. No new clue had been found at this dawn; nevertheless, they had prevented a night's labour from being swallowed by a false daytime account. The duplicate receipt lay safe in Urmila's bag. What her body needed now was not another paper, but sleep. Outside, the sound of the first vehicle starting up rose into the morning. Inside, for the first time, Urmila closed her eyes without anxiety.

Chapter 19 · Champa’s Message

In the light of early morning, Champa was wiping a fingerprint from the screen of her phone. She had scarcely slept since returning from the hospital the night before. She had already written down the time for her mother's medicine, how much she might save on fares, and the hour she had to be at work. Only then did she open a private message on her phone. It contained few words, though they had taken her a long time to compose: she wished to spend her next day off wandering through the market with someone, eating hot jalebis and sitting for a while without anyone watching over her. No one had bestowed this wish upon her as charity. She wanted to claim a single day from the midst of her own labour.

Ruhani appeared at the doorway. “The hospital again today?” she asked. Champa closed the phone. “I have to collect Mother's test report. Work first, then the hospital.” Ruhani stood holding the shelter's account book. In her hand was the acknowledgment of the objection they had lodged at the previous meeting: the private details of Champa's mother's treatment were not to be read aloud. “Keep this copy with you,” Ruhani said. Taking care of the paper, Champa replied, “An acknowledgment does not mean they have accepted what we asked. But a paper made on my behalf ought, at the very least, to remain with me.”

On the shelter's little veranda, Rukhsana was taking the pot of rice off the fire. Champa tasted a mouthful and said it needed more salt. Rukhsana immediately held out the bowl. “Put more in your own plate; I won't put it in everyone's rice at once.” Ruhani burst out laughing, and Champa laughed too. The ordinary exchange lifted a little of the night's exhaustion. Reading the notice of the meeting hung beside the door, Rukhsana said that the community building would hold a public review that day of the previous week's assistance and medical receipts. Champa decided to leave her mother's private papers at home and take only her own receipt for travel expenses.

At the town's community building, rainwater was dripping not from the roof but from a broken drain beside the steps. A woman from the cleaning crew had placed a bucket at the entrance to intercept the water. Inside, two kinds of papers lay on the meeting table: a statement of public expenditure and individual applications for assistance. Naira had arrived early and reminded the secretary that placing the two kinds of documents before the same meeting did not make both of them public. “We'll examine everything in front of those who need to read it,” the secretary said. “Examination is not the same as reading aloud,” Naira replied. “First decide where the boundary lies.”

When Champa came in, Ruhani indicated a bench at the back. At the previous meeting, Ruhani's name had appeared on the blue-covered chair, though the chair conferred no voting right. Today she did not ask for the place bearing her name. Looking at the papers laid out in front of her, Champa asked, “What am I supposed to do at this hearing?” “Speak for yourself where the matter concerns you,” Ruhani said. “My name does not stand in for your consent.” Champa looked at her. This promise had been made inside the shelter before; today it would be tested before other people.

Across the table, Karim Dafali was adjusting the strap of his dholak. He had received the wages owed for singing at the Phagun folk-recital, but the cost of repainting and refurbishing the instrument remained unpaid. Two young men approached him near the door with a handbill proposing that he write a campaign song for the forthcoming local election. “Everyone's attention is on Champa now,” one of them said. “Take a couple of lines from her message and make a fierce song out of them. You'll draw a crowd.” Karim handed the sheet back. “Since when did something said to her in private become merchandise for my drum?”

Annoyed, the young man asked, “Don't you ever sing political songs?” “I do,” Karim answered. “I sing about roads, wages and crooked accounts. Not about stealing a woman's private words and making her a laughingstock.” The young man tried to lay an advance payment on the table. Karim did not touch it. “I'll pay for the skin of my dholak out of what I earn,” he said, “not out of the price of someone's humiliation.” Both men went away. Karim did not know for certain who had sent them with the proposal, and he would not attach anyone's name to a mere guess.

The chairperson first ordered the public expenditure to be read aloud. The cleaning crew's wages, the cost of the drainage survey and the fare for bringing medicines to the shelter were announced separately. Champa examined her travel receipt: the date was correct, but part of the amount was still outstanding. She raised her hand. The secretary said questions would be taken at the end. Meanwhile, a man in the front row lifted a small sheet of paper. “We should also hear an example of assistance being misused. Look at what a beneficiary writes.” He handed the paper to the chairperson.

The chairperson began to read. At the first two words, a chill passed through Champa's body. They were the words of the private message she had sent from her own phone, but the lines in the middle had been removed. Even the name of the person to whom she had written was printed only in part. Her ordinary wish to go out and eat jalebis was turning, in the mouths of those listening, into laughter and insinuation. “She wants help with treatment, and money for outings too?” someone said. Another person laughed. Champa's shoulders tightened. She could not understand how the page had found its way out of her phone.

“Stop,” Champa said, rising to her feet. The chairperson did not stop reading. A public accusation had been made, he said, and she would have an opportunity to answer it. “I will answer,” Champa said again, “but first stop reading out my stolen private words. This is not a statement I consented to make.” Her voice was raised, but she was not abusing anyone. Some people in the meeting took offence at the sound of her protest. Naira did not rush to the microphone. Instead she asked the secretary who had authorised the paper's public circulation and where the original was. The secretary said nothing.

Ruhani rose from her bench and came before the chairperson. “Champa is here herself,” she said. “She has a voice of her own. Reading out her private message is not the same as taking her testimony.” The chairperson asked why the message should be concealed if it was true. “I am not objecting to the truth,” Champa replied. “I will answer for what brought me here: my mother's treatment and the accounts of my wages. My love, my day off and the life of the person at the other end of my phone do not belong to this assembly.”

An elderly member asked, “Do you admit that in this message you said you wanted to meet someone you know?” Champa looked directly at him. “I wrote that I wanted to meet someone. That is my own wish. I have no obligation to tell the assembly the name of someone dear to me. I applied for assistance; I did not promise to make every letter of my life public.” For the first time, the room fell silent for a little while. Champa did not mistake that silence for approval. She simply finished what she had to say.

Karim picked up his dholak and set it behind him. The young man came over and murmured, “See? That could have been a song.” “My drum will not sound today,” Karim replied. “Until this meeting returns to its proper business, another song would only turn people into spectators of this humiliation.” Going up to the chairperson, he reported that he had rejected the proposal for a song based on a private message. “Do not put my name down for anyone's campaign,” he said. “If you want a song, read out the wages still owed today. I'll decide on the tune separately.” His refusal did not put an end to song; it drew a line between who owned it and what it was meant to do.

In an outer room of the building, Rahina Thakurai earned a little money copying papers and binding them into books. On her table lay an old paper cutter, thread, glue and a price list that gave separate charges for making copies. A man from the office had asked her that morning to duplicate some pages. She had no authority to read and verify the original papers, but she entered the number of copies and the time of delivery in her register. Hearing Champa's voice rising from the meeting room, she stopped the cutter. The size of the paper being passed around at the inner table seemed familiar, but she did not assume that two sheets of the same size must have come from the same original.

When Champa came outside, her hand shook as she held a glass of water. Rahina vacated her chair. “Sit here,” she said. “No one takes photographs in this room.” “Do you make copies of papers?” Champa asked. Rahina nodded. “Yes. I record the price and the time; I don't sell the truth of whatever is written on a sheet.” Champa said, “I want the original sequence of my words kept safe, and I want to know how many copies were distributed.” Rahina replied that she could account for all the copying jobs that had come to her, but could not claim to account for every copy made in the town.

Rahina opened her ledger and showed Champa a line: the morning's copying job, the number of sheets, and the reference number left for the recipient. She did not hide the box for the name with her finger. She said only that she would not give out someone's private contact address without authority, though she would produce the register to an authorised person investigating the complaint. Only then could Champa finish her glass of water. Rahina's family had advised her to keep away from quarrels of this kind; for now she made no accusation against her family. Keeping an honest account of her work and accusing someone of causing humiliation were two different courses.

When Naira came outside, Champa asked her directly, “Have you seen what was on my phone?” “I heard the opening part of what was read at the meeting,” Naira said. “I have not seen the original message.” Champa took out her phone, then checked herself. “I am not going to show you the whole of my private conversation,” she said. “But, to compare the lines that were cut, I will show the parts I choose to whoever is given responsibility for the investigation.” “That is your decision,” Naira replied. “There is no need to hurry and call my conjecture evidence.”

The three women went back inside. Ruhani first reached toward the secretary to ask for the paper, but Champa put out her own hand. She laid a written petition on the meeting table. It made three demands: that the public reading and circulation of the stolen message stop at once; that the copy which had been read be preserved rather than destroyed, so that its source and the omissions could be examined; and that the minutes state explicitly that Champa had not consented to the reading. Champa signed her name below the petition. Ruhani's name was entered only as that of a witness who had accompanied her.

Kabir was outside the building in the legal-aid room, examining another applicant's papers. Naira asked him only about the procedure for submitting a petition. Kabir came in and told Champa, “If you wish, a copy of this complaint can be given to the appropriate officer to prevent further unauthorised circulation of private information. I do not yet know who stole it.” Champa added a separate line to her petition: “The right to seek legal remedy is reserved.” Kabir did not add his own name beneath her signature; he merely told her which counter was the proper place to submit the copy.

“If you stop the copies, how will there be an investigation?” the chairperson asked. “Keeping something safe for an investigation and distributing it around the meeting hall are not the same thing,” Champa answered. Naira explained the evidentiary distinctions between the edited copy read from the dais, the original conversation on the phone, and the process by which the paper had been made. None of the three, by itself, established who had stolen the message. The chairperson initially proposed putting the question to the assembly, but the secretary reminded him that a majority of spectators could not acquire ownership of someone's private words by voting for the right to read them.

Two members of the assembly objected. One argued that an accounting of public assistance must also examine the conduct of the people receiving it. “Show me where the conditions of assistance have been written down,” Champa said. “If the receipt for treatment is false, examine it. The fact that I think of eating jalebis on my day off does not prove that the price of medicine has been falsified.” This time Rukhsana spoke from the back. “If you want the bill for jalebis, get it from the market. Why are you attaching it to a medical prescription?” Some people laughed, but this time their laughter was not directed at Champa.

The secretary recorded the receipt of the petition. The chairperson announced that no more of the page would be read at that day's meeting and asked for the distributed copies to be returned. There was no evidence that this request brought every copy back from the hands into which it had passed. The sheet on the table was placed in an envelope, sealed with the date and the signatures of two people present. Champa turned the envelope over in her hands; she did not ask to read the paper inside it. She asked only whether the count of copies, responsibility for the envelope and the date of the next inquiry would be clearly entered in the minutes. The answer was that they would now be written down.

Rahina came in and laid on the secretary's table a certificate bearing the reference number from her copying register. “One copy of this morning's job went to this office,” she said, “but I will not say, without checking, that it was the very page read here.” The secretary took the certificate. “Why involve yourself in this dispute?” a member asked. “Anyone paid to make copies of papers is also responsible for saying how many were made,” Rahina answered calmly. “My family's name may mean something to you; it is no substitute for my accounts.” Taking back her register, she returned to the outer room.

After the meeting, Karim found Champa on the building's steps. He asked whether he should attach the campaign-song proposal to her complaint. “Keep a record of the pressure placed upon your own work,” Champa said. “But do not make the matter of a song in my name public on your own initiative.” Karim agreed. He put the handbill into his ledger and noted as well that he had refused the advance payment. He had not been paid the hire charge for his dholak that day; he asked the secretary for a written statement of what was still owed and went away. Choosing the right work did not make the question of one's livelihood disappear.

As Champa stepped outside the building, a message arrived on her phone from the person to whom she had written that morning. It was a brief question: “Is your day all right?” For a long time she looked at the screen before replying. That person's name had been printed incompletely before the assembly; they too might have to face embarrassment and danger. Champa wrote: “Something wrong happened to me. I won't explain it all now. When we meet, I'll tell you myself.” Afterwards she did not switch off the phone. She simply put it in her pocket. She still wanted to speak with the person she loved.

Back at the shelter, Ruhani asked Champa, “How many people should I tell about this?” “Only as many as the work requires,” Champa said. “Ask me before telling anyone news of my mother.” Ruhani nodded. Then Champa said, “You spoke for me today, but when I read my own petition, you stepped back. I liked that.” “I still have to learn how to step back,” Ruhani replied. There was neither an abdication of leadership nor a proclamation of her own importance in the answer: it was the difficult practice of standing beside someone.

That night Rukhsana served not jalebis with the rice but flattened rice and curd. Champa laughed. “Now everyone will think of my affairs whenever they hear the word jalebi.” “The wish you had this morning will not be turned into a thing for people to insult,” Rukhsana said. “When you really get a day off, eat jalebis bought with your own earnings.” Champa picked up her plate without replying. The next cost of her mother's medicine, her wages and the rent on her home were still present at that plate; yet she also had a right to keep one small happiness for the future.

When Naira reached home, she showed Sarita the acknowledgment from the meeting. Sarita was cutting marela greens that day. “Whose private words were read from the platform?” she asked. “An edited version of Champa's message,” Naira said, and no more. “She submitted the request to stop it herself.” Sarita resumed cutting the greens. “Do you have her whole message?” “No.” “Then don't fill that empty space with guesses of your own.” Hearing her mother, Naira opened her notebook. For the first time, she felt no need to add a new name to it.

Naira wrote two separate entries: “Copy read at meeting: original unknown,” and “Objection: received with Champa's signature.” She left a third line blank: “Identity of person who made the copy.” That empty space marked a lack of evidence, not an ornament of mystery. A copy of Champa's petition would enter the inquiry papers only with her permission; it would be wrong to bind it into the same file as Sarita's page of twenty-seven names. Naira closed the notebook. The question of Sarita's being alive was still unresolved, but that day a small obstacle had been placed in the path of those who would treat a person's private voice as the property of an assembly.

Far away, inside the community building, the secretary was putting the sealed envelope into a separate compartment of a cupboard. The signatures he could see upon the envelope did not tell him where the first copy had come from. In the outer room, Rahina had spread open a page of her copying register to dry; she slipped a dry cloth beneath it to keep the ink from running in the damp left by the rain. The Dafali's dholak was silent that day. Champa was back at the shelter, counting the little containers of her mother's medicines. Across the town, many papers were being put in their proper places; no one's ownership of a life could be contained wholly within them.

Chapter 20 · Premature Publication

The fine rain had stopped, but the outer steps of the town's community hall were still slippery. When the cleaning crew arrived at dawn with old bamboo brooms to sweep away the water, they found two papers from the previous night's meeting soaked in the drain. One was a statement of public expenditure; on the other, someone's name had been half erased. The woman cleaning the steps held her hand over that second sheet for a moment. Then, without trying to read it, she placed it in the office's locked box. Protecting the paper was her work; deciding the course of the life written upon it was not.

Naira had slept little that morning. Champa's message had been read aloud, and even after the objection had been entered in the meeting minutes, the sound of laughter remained in her ears. Sarita was taking the pot of rice water off the stove. "If testimony is urgently needed," Naira asked, "and the person who can give it is afraid, what should one do first?" Sarita covered the pot. "First understand whether the person giving the testimony is taking the same risk as you." Naira did not reply. In her bag was a letter from Mahesh Mandal, and she was impatient to unfold it.

Mahesh had asked to meet behind a small repair workshop across the railway tracks. He had not wanted his name associated with the dispute before. Some years earlier, while overseeing temporary arrangements for moving goods from a warehouse, he had been given the task of recording the times at which vehicles entered. He had kept notes of times and places; his own eyes had not seen what was inside the consignments. He made that distinction three times at their first meeting. But he remembered vehicles and labourers passing at night along the road behind the warehouse—a road shown on the municipal map as an ordinary dead-end lane.

The rasp of metal sheets being ground came from the workshop. Mahesh and Naira sat not in an inner room but beneath an open-sided shed. Mahesh took a letter from his pocket. "You may read the times I have written down," he said. "But make this public only after my home and my family's movements are secure. My daughter's route to school has not changed. I am trying to arrange a move. For now, no name, no voice, not even details of what I was doing that day that would allow people to identify me."

Naira read the first page. Mahesh had signed a limited consent: the municipal committee could be notified so that the road behind the warehouse might be inspected in general, but neither the witness's identity nor the details of his testimony were to be made public until his safety was assured. The final line read, 'No conclusions beyond what I myself witnessed are to be attributed to me.' The words 'may be notified' in the first line caught Naira's eye. She read the last line too, but her attention did not rest upon it.

"If a general notice goes out today, the channel may be measured sooner," Naira said. Mahesh shook his head. "A request for inspection can be submitted within the committee today. But my timings, the kind of work I did, and the direction of my house must not be put together in a news report yet. Even if you omit my name, people who know a few things will recognise me." Naira said she would be careful. Mahesh laid a finger on the page of her notebook and repeated, "What I mean by caution must not count for less than what you mean by it." He did not smile.

Meanwhile, on the far side of the shed, Chandra Badi stood with her instrument case beside her. She earned her living by playing and singing; for the town's folk-recitation programme she had been promised payment for three songs. The case held small cymbals, a percussion instrument wrapped in cloth, and a copy of her contract kept safe from the wet papers. An office clerk had told her that she was a guest at the programme, not someone entitled to payment. Chandra had replied, "The songs I sang were not guests. They were my work. If my fee was fixed before everyone, put it in the accounts."

Naira met her at the doorway. Chandra held out the contract. The three songs and the hours of rehearsal were entered separately; the space for travel expenses was blank. "They summon us as singers for their meetings," Chandra said, "and then make up stories about our lives as they please. Some imagine that gives them the right to question me about my body. I sell my art, not the history of my body." Naira examined the sheet and said plainly that she could not make the office pay, but could show her how to register a claim for the money owed in the open accounts. "I know the way," Chandra answered. "Just write that I made the demand myself."

Chandra's fellow singer came from behind with a needle and thread. The torn strap of the instrument case needed mending. Chandra set the contract on the table and held the strap herself. "Without this case, I cannot even carry my instrument to the stage," she said. "And if the money doesn't come now, what about the next programme?" her companion asked. "I will not abandon the stage," Chandra replied, "but I will not sing again without written terms." There was more confidence in her craft than anger in her voice. The strap was sewn; the outstanding payment remained unsettled.

Mahesh was leaving the shed. Chandra merely greeted him as he passed; she did not ask why he had come. Naira was glad of that ordinary silence. Here, no one assumed ownership of another person's secrets. Yet in Naira's mind the mouth of the blocked drainage channel, the old map of Purnadhar, Aditi's postponed inspection, and the approaching municipal meeting were all moving together. Every day's delay meant another day with the outlet blocked. She felt that if something appeared in print, the officials would be stirred into action. Within that thought she gradually pushed aside the need to wait for Mahesh to move his family.

At noon, in the office's small computer room, Naira was preparing the next issue of the citizens' bulletin. At first she wrote only about the discrepancies between public maps and the demand for a fresh survey of the channel. These matters had already been raised in an open meeting. Then she remembered the vehicle timings Mahesh had recorded. She added a sentence: 'According to a former worker associated with repair work behind the western warehouse, not all night-time entries are recorded in the municipal register.' There was no name, but the type of work, the time, and the place had appeared together. Having written that much, she stopped. Mahesh's warning came clearly back to her.

A colleague read the draft and asked, "Do you have permission to publish this testimony?" Naira opened Mahesh's letter at its first line. "There is permission to give general information," she said. The colleague read the last line. "But it also says the information is to be made public after security is in place." "I've left out his name," Naira replied. "It is a general fact." The colleague proposed printing only the maps and the request for a site inspection, and holding back the details of the testimony until the next issue. "If we publish that little," Naira said, "the officials will bury the file again." It was a prediction; she had no definite evidence that an immediate delay would follow.

A headline glowed on the computer screen: 'A Night Road Behind the Blocked Channel?' Even with its question mark, the direction of the headline was plain. Naira shortened the wording and removed one of the times, but left 'former worker' and 'repair work' intact. She pressed Send. The page went into the town's public-information group, gradually reaching the phones of those who kept copies of its posts. Printed sheets could be counted; she no longer had any means of counting the households to which the copies shared by phone might travel.

In the citizens' bulletin group, someone also tried to attach a photograph of Champa at the meeting to Naira's post. Naira asked for it to be removed and wrote explicitly that Champa's private message and the inquiry into the channel were separate matters. Even then she did not feel the full weight of her own contradiction. She was protecting Champa's photograph from unauthorised use while having herself published details that could lead to Mahesh's identification. Applying what one knew of another person's rights to one's own sudden enthusiasm was proving the hardest thing of all.

The first response came from a schoolteacher in town: why did the two municipal maps give different names to the same road? The second came from a fish-market shopkeeper: what effect did the night traffic have on the fishery's waters? The third was an accusation; its author declared that everyone employed at the warehouse was a thief. Naira immediately wrote beneath it that the documents supported no such charge. Yet the details she had brought together in her original post began taking on forms of their own in conversations beyond it. One person was already circulating the story with 'the man who exposed the secret' in place of 'former worker'.

None of the talk among Mahesh's former colleagues at the repair workshop across the tracks amounted to verified testimony. One man said that every vehicle travelling at night must be illegal; another answered that, during the flood season, even permitted vehicles sometimes travelled at unusual hours. To Mahesh, both statements sounded dangerous. He had written down the times he had seen in his records; people were now adding cargo, motive, and crime to those times. No explicit accusation had yet been made against him, but he could hear that the manner of the talk had changed.

Mahesh called that afternoon. His voice was subdued. “You published what I told you?” “I did not give your name,” Naira said. Mahesh was silent for a few moments. “Does someone who knows I used to keep the night-time records for that stretch need my name? An old colleague rang to ask whether I had made a statement against the town. My home is still there. My daughter will come back from school along that same road today.” The pen slipped from Naira’s hand and fell on the table. She did not pick it up.

“I will take down the post,” Naira said. “Do, if you can,” Mahesh replied. “But how will you erase it from the memory of those who have seen it? Tell me first: did you read the last line of my letter?” “Yes.” “Then what was it you did not understand?” There was no abuse in the question. Naira searched for an answer. At last she said, “I treated my own haste as more important than your permission.” Mahesh did not hang up. “Calling it a mistake does not settle the matter,” he said. “The road my family takes home has not changed today.”

Naira first posted a correction to the original notice: the witness’s essential conditions for making these details public had not been met; the details were not to be treated as testimony properly authorised for public reliance. She removed the original post but recorded the time of its removal. Then she preserved the draft of the report, its published version, the correction, and Mahesh’s initial consent in separate files. The page containing his private address did not go into the public records. She understood clearly now that deleting the original draft to conceal her error would be wrong as well.

Naira went to Kabir and asked, “What is the first thing we must do now to keep Mahesh safe?” Kabir said they must not make his family’s whereabouts public without his permission, and must ask Mahesh himself through whom he wanted safe travel and temporary accommodation arranged. If a formal request for police or administrative protection was to be submitted, the risks and uncertainties must be recorded in writing. “I will not write a letter saying protection has been provided when it has not,” he made clear. “And you must give a separate account of what you did in publishing the report. Do not call that Mahesh’s consent now.”

Mahesh agreed to meet Kabir that evening, but told Naira not to come to his house immediately. “My family are angry at present,” he said on the phone. “If you come and tell us how distressed you are, we will find ourselves comforting you. First let us decide where we can go and where we cannot.” This time Naira did not interrupt him. She repeated his wishes to Kabir word for word. Work on the application began, but the space for the family’s location was left blank; Mahesh would fill it in himself. The blank was no one’s oversight.

At Mahesh’s home, as the evening meal was being prepared, his daughter put her schoolbag down beside the door. Mahesh moved it farther inside. His wife asked, “The paper you showed us said our safety had to come first, didn’t it?” “It did,” Mahesh answered. “Then just because we are now agreeing to discuss leaving home,” she said, “that does not mean leaving is easy.” For the first time, they made a list of possible routes. They did not settle where they would go, but every member of the family now had a voice at the table where the decision would be made.

That evening Chandra returned to the folk-recitation committee’s office about her payment. Outside, two men were examining a screenshot of Naira’s deleted post on a mobile phone. One stopped Chandra. “You people travel from village to village. Have you heard anything about where Mahesh is going?” Chandra understood that her work on the road was being turned into a cheap means of spying. “I travel for performances,” she replied directly. “I have no right to ask where another person’s family intends to go.” Then she went inside to ask for a receipt for the amount owed her.

The clerk again told her that her songs had been performed for the public good, so her fee would be considered once the grant arrived. Chandra laid the contract on the table. “Which rule says that, for the public good, the artist must go hungry?” The clerk said her name was on the guest list. With her finger Chandra pointed out the hours of rehearsal, the journey, and the three songs, each entered separately. The office did not pay her full fee that day, but acknowledged the debt and gave her a written receipt. Chandra made two copies: one for her instrument case, the other for the committee’s accounts. “When I sing again,” she said, “I will settle the conditions for both the stage and the payment beforehand.”

Watching this, Naira remembered the last line of Mahesh’s letter once more. Permission was not a copy of someone’s debt: it came with conditions. If the committee could not fix the price of Chandra’s songs and impose it upon her, how had Naira assumed the right to measure Mahesh’s risk by herself? She kept that question to herself. She did not take up Chandra’s working time by telling her the story of her own mistake in publishing the report. As they came outside, she asked only, “Did you get a copy of the receipt?” Chandra rested a hand on her case. “I got the receipt. Not the money. I will not mistake one for the other.”

That night, at Sarita’s house, Sanket was taking wires from an old radio and fitting them to a small speaker. When Naira came inside, he asked, “Why was your post removed from the town group today?” “I published details of a witness’s statement without full permission,” Naira said, “details by which the man could be identified.” Sanket put down the wire and looked at her. “You ask me before publishing a picture from my phone. Why did that rule not apply to Mahesh?” “I thought acting quickly would get something done,” Naira said. Sanket’s reply was brief: “Thinking a thing will get done and its actually being done are different.”

Sarita was sitting on the veranda, sorting rice through a sieve. She heard everything. Naira thought of defending herself by speaking of the danger posed by the blocked channel, but Sarita asked first, “Had you given Mahesh reason to believe that he would remain in control of decisions about his own home?" Naira lowered her head. "It is wrong to hide the truth," Sarita said. "But it is wrong, too, to put another person's body and home in danger in the name of truth. One mistake cannot pay off the debt of another." She did not stop sorting the rice.

Naira took out a copy of Mahesh's letter. She marked its four conditions: arrangements to secure the household; the family's consent; limits on what might be made public; and a final check of the original statement. Not one of the conditions had been fulfilled. She could have said that the error was small because 'the name was not printed'; but the question of how easily people could work out Mahesh's identity demanded an answer. In her notebook she wrote: 'Publication was my decision; conditional permission was not full permission.'

Meanwhile, a notice arrived from Aditi's office: time would be set aside at the next meeting for a fresh survey of the mouth of the drainage channel. The notice did not say that Naira's public report or Mahesh's testimony had prompted the decision. Gomati's site application, Tara's markings, and Hira's water measurements had already been submitted. For a moment Naira felt as though she had found a justification for the usefulness of her post. Then she read the paper carefully. It proved nothing about the necessity of placing Mahesh at risk. A proper administrative step and a wrongful publication could take place at the same time.

Kabir sent a message: Mahesh and his family were considering temporary arrangements for alternative routes of travel; their location must not be written down. Official protection had not yet been confirmed. Naira replied only to acknowledge receipt. She picked up the phone, wanting to apologise to Mahesh again, but remembered his earlier refusal. She would not ask the person she had forced into difficulty to take on the further work of listening to her guilt. She did not yet know what Mahesh's family would decide that night.

Padma had been invited to examine several fragments of audio for an inquiry the next day. Short recordings were circulating among many phones: who had said what at the meeting involving Champa, when the microphone had been switched off, and how much of Mahesh's statement was being circulated separately. Padma told Naira, "Before you write down what someone has been heard to say, you need the whole sequence of events. You cannot determine the intended meaning of a person's words from a cut-off fragment." "This time I will wait until the original recording is available," Naira replied. Her words were a promise; they could not erase what she had already done.

In the last watch of the night, Chandra opened her instrument case and tightened a loose string. In rehearsal, half a line of the song kept going wrong, but she did not immediately cut it away. When the breaths before and after a note fell into place, the meaning of the phrase changed. Elsewhere, Naira sat looking at the times of her original publication and its correction on the computer screen. The letter containing Mahesh's conditions was preserved separately. Outside, a thin stream of water ran through an old drain. Its direction needed to be measured to be known; there was no need to endanger anyone in order to make that measurement.

Chapter 21 · Whose Voice?

The fan was turning in the western room of the community building, but its low drone made the little red light on the recording device on the table seem to tremble. Padma did not sit behind the table. First she opened one shutter of the window halfway; then she turned the meeting chairs so that whoever spoke would have the light on their face. “Listening to a voice is not a matter for the ears alone,” she said. “Those who understand by watching lips, those who ask questions in signs, must have room to answer too.” The secretary gathered up his notebook and phone and left the middle chair vacant.

Outside, preparations were under way for the annual public recitation, open accounts and songs. On the veranda, children were making paper pennants; in one corner Rukhsana was seeing that the smoke from the cooking fire had a way out; and Hamida Miriasin was protecting the pages of her songbook from the wind. This year's gathering was to hear readings from the water register, the accounts of unpaid wages and the minutes of the previous meeting. Yet for three days the greatest excitement had been over two short audio recordings. In one, something resembling Ruhani's voice could be heard; in the other, an incomplete fragment of a statement by Mahesh. No one possessed the entire recording, and still people were pronouncing their final judgments.

When Naira entered, Padma drew out a chair for her but did not reach towards the phone on the table. “Are you present in this room as a writer, or as the person who owns the testimony?” she asked. “I violated Mahesh's conditions in my last publication,” Naira replied. “I want to help with the inquiry now.” Padma said quietly, “Then first acknowledge that your guilt is not evidence either. We shall listen to the voice on the terms belonging to that voice.” On the first page of her notebook Naira wrote: statement, inference, permission. This time she did not fill in a person's name in advance beside any of the lines.

Padma had an old notebook devoted to listening. On the left-hand page she wrote what had been said; on the right, the circumstances in which it had been spoken—whether someone had stopped midway to ask for water, whether someone had failed to hear a question, whether someone had answered before another had finished speaking. She remembered the first day of her training, when a teacher had told her that an interpreter's gravest error was not merely to omit words, but to erase a disagreement between two people. The warning had seemed difficult to understand then. Today the two phones lying on the table made its meaning plain.

The meeting secretary arrived with two phones and a little memory card in a paper envelope. He said that in the first clip circulating through the public group, a woman's voice could be heard saying, ‘Read it before everyone,’ followed by the words ‘Champa's private matter.’ People had joined the two together and were saying that Ruhani had ordered Champa's private message to be made public. "Who verified that those two fragments belong to the same sentence?" Padma asked. "That is how people understand it," the secretary replied. Padma wrote 'That is how people understand it' in her notebook and put a question mark beside it. "Now write down where the original recording is."

From an office cupboard the secretary brought out the recording device used on the day of the meeting. After a long discussion, the chairperson had authorised the original file to be heard in the room, not for copies of it to be distributed publicly. Padma read the terms of that permission carefully. She made clear that the presence of a file on the office machine did not, by itself, establish its complete authenticity; its sequence of creation had to be checked against other recordings and the minutes. She did not remove the memory card and put it in her own phone. The original would be played on the office machine itself, while the starting times and pauses were entered on paper.

Champa and Ruhani came in. Standing beside the door, Champa asked, "Are you going to play my private message to everyone again?" "No," Padma answered. "In this inquiry we shall listen to what was said from the dais, not to the message inside your phone. If it ever becomes necessary to compare the original conversation, you will decide who may see how much of it." Champa sat down beside the table. Ruhani did not wait for the secretary to signal where she should sit. She pulled up an empty chair and said, "I shall hear the whole sentence behind the accusation against me. But answering an accusation does not mean reopening the discussion of Champa's private life."

Padma played the circulating clip first. There was a knocking sound, as of a hand striking the table; some words were loud, others thin and faint. 'Read it before everyone' could be heard, and then another fragment joined it without so much as the space of a breath. Ruhani's face showed her weariness. "I am listening to my own voice as though it were separate from my mind," she said. "We shall not settle whose voice it is yet," Padma replied. "First we must examine the order of the sentences." She asked the secretary where the meeting clock, the changes of subject recorded in the minutes, and the time shown by the machine corresponded with one another.

The office's original audio file began to play. First came Champa's request; then the sound of the secretary turning papers; then Ruhani's distinct voice: "Read the rules before everyone—the rules under which private papers were brought out." A few moments later she spoke again: "Do not read Champa's private matter before everyone. Do not make the rules and a person's private life into one thing." In the circulating clip, the opening of the first sentence had been removed, and the latter part of the second, including the word 'not', had been cut away. Padma stopped the original recording. Champa had been holding her hand tightly clenched; now she opened it and laid it upon the table.

The secretary opened the attendance register and checked the time of the meeting. At that moment an employee had gone into another room to fetch water and had moved away from the microphone; consequently, half a minute of sound in the original recording was indistinct. Instead of concealing the gap, Padma marked it on the paper. “We have enough corresponding evidence to establish the sequence of the two sentences,” she said, “but we will not write down who said what during this interval.” Naira saw how much patience it took to acknowledge incomplete evidence. In her old haste to fill a page, she would never have left such a space unfilled.

Naira was about to say, “Then the accusation was false.” Padma stopped her. “The full sentences have yielded one meaning here. To claim that we have proved who made the edited file, or that anyone acted with malicious intent, would be another judgment altogether.” Naira struck through a line in her notebook and wrote it again: The alleged support by Ruhani for reading a private message is inconsistent with the original recording available; grounds exist for suspending the accusation. Padma agreed to that wording, but would not allow her to write that the original recording was complete.

The secretary opened the minutes from that meeting. One line read, ‘Ruhani's request that the rules be read’; another, ‘Objection to the reading of Champa's private message.’ Between them a word had been crossed out in the secretary's pencil. “Who crossed out this word?” Padma asked. “I may have corrected the writing when I made a fair copy at the end of the day,” the secretary said. “I cannot remember exactly now.” Ruhani stared at the sheet. “If a person cannot remember, no one should be found guilty on the strength of a guess,” she said. “But both the first draft of the minutes and the later clean copy must be preserved.” The secretary agreed.

The clip on the second phone contained Mahesh's indistinct voice. Someone had circulated it in the public group with the caption ‘All the night vehicles are illegal.’ Mahesh's voice did not appear in the original recording of the meeting at all: he had not spoken from the dais that day. Padma pointed out the difference. “This must be a voice recorded somewhere else. It cannot be verified against this office file.” Remembering Mahesh's conditions for his safety, Naira fell silent. Then she said, “I shall make no public response to this second clip until Mahesh himself chooses a safe way to proceed.” Ruhani answered, “Silence is no longer a remedy for everything. But we must understand who has the right to decide another person's silence.”

Hamida appeared in the doorway. She had heard something of the examination of the recordings, but she had come carrying her own songbook. A young organiser wanted her to alter two lines of an old wedding song and perform them so as to raise a laugh at Champa's humiliation. “If I sing it, people will think I agree,” Hamida said. “If I refuse, they will say the song belongs to the village—who is the singer to forbid it?” She showed them the fee previously agreed upon in writing. The organiser had reduced it by half, calling the performance ‘traditional service’. “These are two different questions,” Padma said: “permission to use the song, and what is owed for singing it. Each calls for its own decision.”

Champa looked at Hamida's book. “I am glad you will not sing a song naming me,” she said, “but sing the wedding song you yourself choose. Your livelihood must not be stopped in order to stop my humiliation.” Hamida smiled. “Songs are my livelihood, but not every word is merchandise for the market. Once I sing for a daughter leaving her parents' home, the family keeps the meaning of those lines for itself. If someone later turns them into a drumbeat for humiliating another, I can change my tune again.” She closed her book.

By midday the open seating for the public recitation had been arranged. On one side of the little stage stood a clay water jar; on the other lay a thick account register. Ramani Bind wanted to read out a written statement that the complete lease for the fishing waters had still not been received. Chandra arrived with the receipt for the money owed her for singing. To the audience, entertainment and accounts seemed two separate things; yet payment to a woman singing on the stage and wages owed to a woman working on the river were different entries in the same register. Rukhsana also demanded a written account of how much rice had been used in the kitchen and how many women had served the food.

Padma asked the organising committee to make summaries of the speeches available in signs and in writing for participants whose hearing needs differed. She had been invited to perform precisely this work, yet the line for her honorarium was blank. “Interpretation is a service, not the honour of being a guest,” she said. After some hesitation, the secretary made a separate entry in the register: payment for sign-language communication and transcription. Accepting the written acknowledgment, Padma said, “I have not received the money yet. But once the work has been given its proper name, it will be harder to erase it later by calling it free.” Naira remembered what Chandra had said about her earlier receipt.

Making the opening announcement to the public assembly, Ruhani said, “When we say that the full passage of a statement is to be heard today, we do not mean that every private audio file will be played into everyone's ears. The full context of the minutes already made public will be read. The remaining evidence has been examined in a secure room, in the presence of the people concerned.” There were objections. A young man said, “Then how are we to know that you are not being protected?” Padma answered, “The reasons for an inquiry can be explained. Stealing someone's private papers all over again is not verification.”

The secretary read the approved public portion of the minutes. ‘Read the rules before everyone’ and ‘Do not read Champa's private matter before everyone’ were heard in their proper order. Afterwards he made it clear that the circulated audio fragment did not correspond to the sequence in the original office recording, and that examination of the allegation that Ruhani had supported the public reading of the private message would be suspended pending further inquiry. The assembly did not respond with one voice. Some applauded; others asked why the maker of the edited clip had not been caught.

“We have no right to put an unidentified person's name onto a document,” Padma said.

Champa was invited to speak from the stage. She did not respond to the laughter by reading out her private message again. She said only, “In the words we have heard now, one of my requests has been accepted: that my private affairs should not be read aloud. But the humiliation I heard will not leave my body as easily as a wrong line can be struck from a piece of paper. The accounts for my treatment and the question of my wages are still unresolved.” She sat down. Ruhani made no public speech to console her; she merely pushed a glass of water towards her.

Behind the stage Hamida loosened the strap she had been tightening on her dholak. The organiser asked again, “If we leave out the old song with the jokes, will people stay?” “Whether they stay or get up and go, I do not know,” Hamida replied. “I will take responsibility for the words I sing.” She began an old wedding farewell song, without mocking anyone by name. In the song, the daughter leaving her home was not merely an object of tears: she carried with her the landmarks of the road, the earth of her mother's home and her own voice. Hamida paused and said, “My grandmother taught me the next line of this song. She used to say: when you send a daughter away, keep the road open for her return as well.”

In the midst of the song an elderly woman brought a copper water vessel from her house and placed it upon the stage. She said it was the vessel from which water had been given to her on the day of her wedding farewell. Hamida did not break off the song. She completed the last note of the phrase before asking, “Who is to have the vessel now?” “My granddaughter has gone to the city to study,” the old woman said. “When she comes home, I shall give it to her.” Laughter rose in the gathering, but this time no one was being humiliated. Hamida placed the vessel back in the old woman's hands.

Padma was working with Sanket to write out the meaning of the next lines. Sanket displayed the text on a small screen, but he did not leave the automatic speech-recognition system's mistaken words in place for people to mistake them for the actual song. Hamida herself corrected two words. A little girl asked, “Why does the song speak of a ‘road home’?” “Because the one who leaves must be free to return of her own will,” Hamida said. “A farewell song must not take that right away.” After this answer, no one laughed at Champa by name. Some people began to hum along with the song.

Late in the afternoon a short inquiry note was prepared in the secretary's room. Padma had it set down unambiguously: the order of the two audio fragments circulating in the public group differs from the office recording available; changing their order reversed the meaning of the statement; the particular allegation against Ruhani is suspended for the present; the source of the editing, the equipment used and the intention behind it remain unverified. “May I post a photograph of this note?” Naira asked. “First see whether it contains a private mobile number,” Padma replied, “and whether everyone named in it has had a chance to read the portion intended for the public." Naira put her phone back into her bag.

Having read the note, Ruhani said, "This finding favours me, but we still do not know who leaked Champa's message. I shall not lead a victory procession now." Padma agreed. Champa took out the first acknowledgment of her complaint and laid it beside the new note. "At first I said, 'Listen to me,'" she observed. "Now two documents record my right to speak. But I shall still have to pay for my treatment myself." Outside the room Rukhsana had set aside some rice for her. Champa thanked her for the food, but also asked that the cost of rent and meals be entered in the shared accounts.

By the time the gathering ended, Chandra had gone back to the office for her unpaid fee. Hamida was with her. Under the heading 'Cultural Programme' the secretary wanted to combine both singers' fees in a single entry. "My rehearsal, travel and payment are separate," Chandra said. Hamida rested her hand on the written permission for her song. "And the conditions governing the use of my words are separate too." The secretary made three columns. The full amount was not paid in cash that day, but both the date and the money due were recorded. After the public recitation, this small piece of accounting had become as necessary as the songs performed there.

There had been no new disclosure about Mahesh. Only a brief message had arrived through Kabir: the family would decide its travel arrangements for itself, and its private location was not to be made public. Naira read the message and closed her notebook. "You have not written a single line today about Mahesh's audio?" Padma asked. "It would be wrong to publish another guess about a voice whose original source has not been verified," Naira replied. "And even if the source were found, it should not be published without honouring the conditions for his safety." Padma offered no praise. As she gathered the papers from the table, she said, "Now keep to this rule on the next difficult day."

That evening, on the veranda of Sarita's house, a plate lay covered for Naira. Sanket was trying to listen to a recorded tune through the small sound-box he had made. He had not recorded Hamida's song without permission; he was only playing an old instrumental melody at home. "What did you think of what you heard at the public recitation today?" Naira asked. "Someone had taken a piece out of something whole and made it say something else," Sanket replied. "But when I heard all the words of Hamida's song, I understood that keeping the road home open is part of the song too." Sarita lifted the cover from the plate. Steam rose from the rice, and amid the silence the ordinary hunger of each day demanded its place once more.

The next day, the public portion of the inquiry note was posted on the committee office's noticeboard. Beneath it was written that no immediate action would be taken against Ruhani on that specific allegation, and that the original audio material would remain secure. Yet in another corner of the same board a new order was being put up: payments under certain municipal contracts would be suspended pending review. The office clerk pinned the paper in place and walked away. Naira read both notices without adding anyone's name or guilt to what they said. One false accusation had been stopped. Whose household cooking fire would be affected by the other decision—that was the question for the following day.

Chapter 22 · The Order Concerning the House

The paper on the noticeboard had curled at one corner in the damp of early morning. Naira reached out to smooth it, then checked her hand. At the bottom of the page, the office seal and date were clearly visible; above them was an order suspending payments to contractors and service providers. The last line said that no fresh material for the work was to be handed over until the review was complete. The moment she saw her name, Naira understood that this was more than a notice withholding her fee: it also barred the path of her daily work examining the records. Inside the doorway, the clerk was turning his chair towards the sun.

"What objection has been raised against my contract?" Naira asked. Turning the pages of his register, the clerk replied, "All contracts are undergoing the same review. This paper does not record any particular fault on your part." "Then give me a receipt for the hours I worked and the material I submitted under my name." The clerk looked up. "But payment has been stopped." Naira said, "Payment and work already submitted are two different matters. Who is responsible now for the records I read with the office's permission?" The clerk did not venture an answer of his own. He took two copies of her application and stamped one to acknowledge its receipt.

Her earlier mistake obliged Naira to test the sound of her own voice once more. Since she had published details contrary to Mahesh's conditions, some people had wanted her removed from the office; others said the suspension of her contract was retaliation. The order established neither explanation. She sat outside the office and divided a page into three parts: work completed, payments outstanding, and material now in the office's custody. Where she might have written the word 'retaliation', she left an empty line. It would take documents, not a story, to fill it.

Just then Ruhani telephoned. "Someone has pasted a notice on Champa's room," she said. "The landlord says she must leave within three days. I'm going there now, but I won't decide anything on Champa's behalf before speaking to her." "Is it a municipal order or the landlord's?" Naira asked. "I haven't managed to read it," Ruhani said. "A name printed on a paper is not enough to settle what authority it carries." Naira put the office receipt in her pocket and took the lane towards Champa's room. More than her own contract, she was troubled by the thought that Champa might once again be the last person told what was to happen to her home.

Champa's rented room stood at a bend in the lane. On one side was an iron trunk, on the other a vessel for storing water, and at the small window hung a blue curtain. She did not spend every night there; her mother's treatment and journeys after dark sometimes obliged her to stay at Ruhani's shelter. But her own lock, her bedding, and a towel drying in one corner made this a place of her own. Today the door was unlocked. She stood there reading the notice, while the landlord kept repeating from in front of her, “I have received an order.”

The notice said that the room was to be vacated pending an examination of certain papers concerning the building’s ownership and use. At the top was a mark resembling a municipal-office stamp, but nowhere on the page was the issuing officer clearly named. Below were the landlord’s signature and a three-day deadline to leave. Champa peeled the paper carefully from the wall so that the pasted corner would not tear. “I’m not throwing this away,” she said. “My rent receipts and this notice will be kept separately.” Before photographing it, Ruhani asked her permission. “First I’ll keep a copy on my own phone,” Champa replied.

“The more papers you gather,” the landlord said, “the house won’t become any less divided. The upper floor is being examined for repairs.” “Then why am I the one given three days in the name of repairs?” Champa asked. “What have you told the tenants in the other rooms?” The landlord replied that each would receive a separate notice. Champa wrote down his answer. She could see that the building did have cracks; there was damp in the walls, and she had no wish to deny it. But inspecting an unsafe building and immediately driving out a tenant were not the same decision.

“There’s a vacant bed at the shelter,” Ruhani said. “If you wish, you can put your things there now.” Champa looked at her. “Thank you for the bed. But don’t take that to mean I have surrendered my right to stay here.” “I didn’t say that,” Ruhani answered at once. Champa replied quietly, “You didn’t intend to. But people often offer their decisions along with their help. I haven’t decided to vacate the room today.” This time Ruhani fell silent. She did not withdraw the offer of help; she changed its terms. The bed would be ready whenever Champa wanted it.

Two young men who carried household goods were standing in the lane. The landlord had probably summoned them already. They waited in the hope of wages, without having lifted anyone’s trunk. “Who called you here?” Champa asked them. One of the young men glanced towards the landlord. “I don’t want your wages to be withheld,” Champa said. “But no one will lift my trunk without my permission.” For the first time, the landlord realised that he might have to pay the cost of work he himself had arranged. He told the young men to wait outside the courtyard.

On her way back to the shelter, Ruhani noticed a new red line drawn against the entries for electricity and water in the old account book. One room in the building was run with temporary municipal assistance, another part was supported by Rukhsana’s sale of meals, and some of the residents paid rent out of their earnings. The new order again demanded proof of how assistance had been distributed. The member who kept the accounts said, “If we don’t submit all the papers now, even our use of the house could be questioned.” “Tell everyone that,” Ruhani replied. “No decision will be made in secret on anyone’s behalf.”

A small meeting gathered in the room beyond the kitchen. Rukhsana lowered the flame before joining them. Champa brought the notice from her own room, but made it clear that her private medical papers were not to be added to the shelter's accounts. One member wanted her registered immediately with the municipal office under the shelter's name. "What would that mean for my right to remain a tenant elsewhere?" Champa asked. Nobody could give a definite answer. Ruhani deferred the decision. "We won't sign something in the name of everyone's welfare when we do not understand what it means."

As she passed round glasses of water, Rukhsana said, "A home isn't just a count of beds. Yesterday the money for oil for my kitchen didn't arrive, so for one day I didn't cook here. People said I'd left the shelter hungry. But the children in my own home need rice too." One member said in embarrassment, "I thought all the supplies came as donations." Rukhsana laughed, but there was nothing light in the laughter. "Even donated rice must be washed, cooked and served. Whose time is all that?" She insisted that the hours spent on each kind of work be entered separately in the register. Champa raised her eyes from the notice and signalled her agreement.

In the middle of the meeting, Gauri Kapariya arrived. A folded tarpaulin lay over her shoulder, and in her hand was a small ledger recording the travel dates of temporary encampments and the sums owed for repairs. Her people moved their stopping places with the seasons, near the open ground beyond the river. This time they had been told orally to leave in the name of clearing the roadside. "We travel," Gauri said, "but that doesn't mean we have no place. The day someone's vehicle gets stuck, everyone suddenly remembers the name of our road."

Gauri's ledger recorded two outstanding payments for tarpaulin repairs from the previous week. "Do you want to stay here?" Ruhani asked. "Some families will stay; others will go towards another market," Gauri replied. "Don't put everyone's decision under my name. I came to understand what the paper means, not to enter myself on the shelter's list." Champa showed her the notice. Gauri bent over it. "My name isn't on it," she said, "but I recognise a threat of three days." People from the different groups would submit an objection together, she said, but nobody was to make anyone's private route public.

In the courtyard, the children began unfolding the tarpaulin. Gauri stopped one of them. "That's hired equipment, not a mat to play on." The child grew embarrassed, and Champa showed the child the torn corner of the blue curtain from her room. Gauri took out a needle and thread. "Stitching a tarpaulin and stitching a curtain are different jobs," she said. Everyone became absorbed in watching her make the repair. Champa asked the price. "It's a small job," Gauri replied, "but it's still work." Champa took out the money from her purse and paid her. Neither had bought the other's charity in that exchange.

Naira arrived just then. Gauri spelled out her own name and asked who would be shown anything that was written down. “I don’t automatically have the right to prepare a report on this house’s difficulties,” Naira said. “I’ll put only as much in my notebook as you tell me, and ask again before making any of it public.” “A summary of what our people say can go before the committee,” Gauri replied, “but not the roads our children will take.” Naira agreed. This time the memory of Mahesh’s testimony, given under conditions, did not return as another test for anyone to pass. It had become a boundary in her conduct.

The shelter’s members spread out their papers: a copy of the building lease, the kitchen’s unpaid accounts, an earlier demand for repairs, and the register of assistance distributed. “I used to sign for people again and again,” Ruhani said. “It built trust, but those signatures also brought other people’s decisions into my hands.” “You run the shelter,” Champa said, “but the decision whether to leave my room must remain mine.” “And in our group,” Gauri added, “everyone must have their own time to set out.” Ruhani pushed the notebook forwards. Those present entered their names, objections and proposals in separate lines.

Ruhani suggested a small working group: Champa would examine her rent papers; Rukhsana, the kitchen accounts and outstanding payments; Gauri would seek the travelling families’ consent and prepare a collective objection; and the shelter’s longstanding members would request the original terms governing the building. Naira offered to help read the documents. “Your contract has been suspended,” Champa said. “Are we to go forward as though you carry the office seal?” “No,” Naira replied. “I can read what I’m able to in a private capacity. I won’t submit an inquiry report in the government’s name.” This limit was entered in the minutes.

Kabir arrived at midday. Naira had made it clear beforehand that they were not seeking a final legal judgment written on a document, only guidance on the proper way to lodge a petition. Reading the notice, Kabir said, “It gives three days, but ask for the original order showing whose authority set that deadline. If the building presents an immediate danger, a proper safety inspection must come first. If it is only a dispute over possession, do not make that the same thing as building safety.” “Will asking for the papers guarantee that I can stay tonight?” Champa asked. “I can’t promise that,” Kabir answered. “But a written objection and its acknowledgment will matter at the next hearing.”

Naira showed Kabir the order suspending her contract. She set the two papers on the same table, but Kabir made it clear that two notices issued around the same time should not be assumed to have arisen from the same cause. Naira wrote in her notebook: ‘Separate papers; examine their issuing authorities separately.’ Champa smiled. “Your notebook has more empty spaces these days.” “I used to be in a hurry to fill them,” Naira said. “We’ve all had to bear the effects of that haste,” Champa replied. “Now I want to see what good your patience can do.”

Before evening the working group went to the municipal office. From her rent receipts, the original notice and the slip for repairing her torn curtain, Champa selected only the two documents that were needed. Gauri carried the group's collective questions, not the identifying details of individual encampments. Rukhsana brought the kitchen ledger. "All your applications concern different matters," the clerk said. "They are different matters," Champa replied, "so give us separate acknowledgments. Don't lose my papers by calling us one crowd." The clerk opened three registers.

At the office they learned that Champa's notice had been prepared on the basis of a letter from the building's owner; a copy of a municipally verified building-inspection report was not available at that counter. Having said as much aloud, the clerk hesitated to put it in writing. Champa wrote in her application: 'A certified copy of the inspection report has been requested; it has not yet been received.' The paper was stamped. That did not immediately cancel the eviction, but it closed the way to accepting an order to vacate, issued on one side alone, without question. Arrangements were also confirmed for a copy of the application to be sent to the landlord.

The counter for Gauri's group was separate. An employee said that certain families' names did not appear on the list of temporary encampments. "Don't write that because a name is missing from the list, the people do not exist on the ground," Gauri replied. "Speak to our representatives before carrying out an inspection." She did not submit the private particulars of every member of the group for the file; she supplied only their collective objection and an agreed means of contact. When she received the written acknowledgment, she explained to the others that it did not establish a permanent right to the land, but it did open a paper path towards a conversation the following day.

Looking at Rukhsana's accounts, an office employee asked, "If the people at the shelter receive meals free of charge, why demand payment?" Rukhsana opened the ledger and showed the rice, fuel, cooking hours and cash payments for each day as separate entries. "I'm not asking the people who ate the meals for money," she said. "I'm asking the institution that enters my labour in its accounts as zero to account for it." The employee gave her an acknowledgment slip. Rukhsana made sure she heard clearly that the final answer would come after the inquiry. Closing her notebook, she said, "For today, my work was to put my name in front of that zero."

A light drizzle began outside. Rather than unfold her tarpaulin, Gauri kept it tightly bound; if it became wet, carrying it to the next market would be difficult. Champa stood at the edge of the awning. "What if they still tell me to leave after three days?" she asked. "Then you will decide whether to appeal, take a temporary room, or risk remaining where you are," Gauri answered. "I cannot make that decision for the people in my group." Champa looked at her. Rather than a promise to 'save' her, the answer seemed difficult, but useful.

When Naira returned home, Sarita was cooking lentils over a low flame. "How much work was done today?" she asked. "Payment on my contract was suspended. I asked for a receipt for the material I'd submitted. Champa lodged an objection to the notice on her room. Gauri made a way to put things in writing after consulting her group." Sarita stirred the lentils. "So three papers became the stories of three different homes." "And no one wrote a decision about someone else's home under their own name," Naira replied. Sarita set the lid on the pot; the bubbling lentils settled.

Sanket came to the doorway carrying an empty bucket to fetch water. "Didi, if your contract has stopped, does the computer work stop too?" he asked. "I won't open the office's original files now without authority," Naira replied. "I can read the public facts in my own notebook. Then I'll examine the terms of the contract again." Sanket showed her his phone screen: an old school notice used the word 'unanimous', though the minutes of the meeting recorded dissent. "Should this sort of thing be examined separately too?" he asked. "Yes," Naira said, "but we must check the reasons and the permission before printing anyone's name."

As evening came down on the shelter's courtyard, a little girl who had arrived with Gauri was making a small windmill out of a leftover piece of torn tarpaulin. "That won't help drive the smoke from my kitchen," Rukhsana said, "but it's lovely to watch it turn." The girl put the windmill into her hand. Ruhani tied it to a stake in the courtyard. There was little wind; its blades turned twice and stopped. "When the wind blows a little harder, it will turn again," the girl said. Nobody made it into a parable about the dispute over the house. For a moment, everyone simply watched the windmill.

After supper a short message came from Ruhani. A bed would be kept for Champa at the shelter, but her belongings would not be moved without her decision; Gauri's people would go where they themselves chose; and Rukhsana's outstanding payment for meals would be entered again in the next account. Each of the three proposals had received separate consent. Naira read the message aloud to Sarita. "Champa still has the key to her room, hasn't she?" Sarita asked. "She has. Today she locked the door herself." Gathering up the plates, Sarita said, "Sometimes simply keeping the lock in your own hands is a great thing."

That night Champa looked at the newly stitched corner of the curtain in her room. The crack in the wall was still there, and so was the notice; she could deny neither. She folded her bedding, placed her rent receipts in the iron trunk, and saved on her phone the offer of an extra key to the shelter. Then she locked her own door. Someone in the lane said, "The order about this house will come from above now." Champa did not turn around. She understood that asking for the original order, having an unsafe roof examined, and keeping the choice of her own place in her own hands were three tasks she would have to undertake together.

On the other side of the town, the office clerk was entering the acknowledgments in order in the register. After Naira's application about her contract came Champa's request concerning the notice, then Gauri's group's objection, each on a separate page. Nowhere in that sequence was anyone's victory recorded. The key to a vacated house, the lease for a house still occupied, and the right to safe shelter—none of those questions had yet received a final answer. But the people who had once been told only, 'It is an order from above,' had asked today: Who is above? Which order? And who has the right to decide?

Chapter 23 · Bharata's Refusal

In the royal palace at Ayodhya, the lamps along the veranda were still burning long after day had risen. Their wicks, steeped in the smell of oil, had not been trimmed for some time; the flames stretched upward as though reaching for the carved wooden eaves made by a craftsman overhead. After dismounting, Bharata went first to one of those lamps. A servant hurried up. "Prince, everyone is waiting inside." Bharata told him to lower the wick. The servant raised his hand, then abruptly drew it back. No one was certain any longer who in the royal household had the authority to give an order. Bharata himself shook off the charred end of the wick. It was a small task; but in this house even the smallest tasks had begun to require permission.

News of Dasharatha's death had reached him, yet the words of that news were one thing, and the experience of his father's absence another. Entering his mother's chamber, Bharata found Kaikeyi folding away yellow bedding and trying to mend the broken clasp of an old bracelet. She did not rise. "Why did you attach my name to the boons you asked for?" Bharata asked. Kaikeyi gave no answer. The clasp slipped once more from her fingers. Outside came the sound of Shatrughna's sandals; he did not enter.

"When did you ever hear me say that I wanted the kingdom?" Bharata asked again. Kaikeyi said, "What I heard was the voice of my own fear. The court was preparing for Rama's coronation, and I thought your place would become smaller." For the first time Bharata saw his mother through the fear to which she had given the name of love. "To preserve my place, you took away Rama's. Is what remains now a kingdom, or merely an empty seat?" Kaikeyi laid the bracelet down. She had no comforting answer to that question.

In the assembly hall the emblems of kingship lay folded in red cloth. The priests, ministers, scribes, officer in charge of the stables, and keeper of the granaries stood anxious around the same seat, each for a different reason. Some urged Bharata to accept the coronation at once, so that orders could begin to be issued again; others insisted that it would be improper to unlock the treasury while there was no king. Bharata listened to them all. The keeper of the granaries reported that food distribution on the outskirts of the city had been halted for two days. The officer of the stables said the fodder was running out. While the crown awaited its wearer, the hunger of the people and the hunger of the animals stood waiting too.

Bharata rose but did not touch the red cloth that covered the royal insignia. "I will not enter my elder brother's right under my own name," he said. Several faces in the hall went still. "But neither can I escape by saying that I have nothing to do. Let the granaries be opened for distribution, let the roads be maintained, let wages not be withheld. Whatever account is written here must be an account of temporary responsibility—not a deed of ownership." A minister asked, "Under what title will you sign?" Bharata answered, "I shall write my name. Record the assembly's disagreement over the title as well."

An elderly member of the assembly objected that a kingdom could scarcely be run without a king. Bharata heard him out and asked for a small sheet of paper. On it he began to have the limits of decisions recorded, rather than the orders themselves: distribution of grain, care of the sick, public safety; but no gifts of land, no new proclamations of succession, no private rewards. One minister warned that such restraints would weaken the government. Bharata replied, "If I take the trust placed in my hands for my own property, governing will certainly become easier. But what, then, will be left for the one whose seat we claim to be preserving?" His voice did not rise. That was why some of those present had to lean forward to hear him.

That evening Kausalya, Sumitra, Kaikeyi, Shatrughna and Bharata sat down to eat together on the same veranda. Urmila brought a bowl of lentils from the kitchen and arranged for the plates set aside for the serving women to be brought out to the veranda as well. Taking his first mouthful, Shatrughna said that when they were children Bharata would refuse to eat rice if too much ghee had been poured on it, yet felt no shame at all in stealing ghee from someone else's plate. A laugh escaped Sumitra before she could stop it. "The witnesses to that offence are still alive," Bharata said, "so I cannot plead innocence." For a few moments laughter stayed in the house; no council of decision-makers entered it in the record.

At the end of the meal Kausalya asked Bharata, "Will you go to Rama?" "Yes," he answered. "I have no title to carry with me to that meeting." As she gathered the plates, Urmila said, "And who will decide the everyday work of those who stay behind in this house?" Bharata looked at her. It was a question that had to be answered before anyone could reach the forest. "For as long as I am away, let Shatrughna and the ministers keep the accounts open," he said. "If any of you see someone's rightful due withheld in the name of getting work done, do not wait for my return." Kaikeyi quietly pushed the water vessel towards them. The affection of a household did not erase the wrong committed by a kingdom, but the evening meal helped them live through one more night.

On another morning of that same season in Videhapur, a little windmill tied to a stake in the courtyard of Ruhani's shelter stood half-open even though there was no wind. Rukhsana turned it by hand, then set a pot of water on the stove. "Yesterday the little girl said it would spin when the wind came," she remarked. "All I need is somewhere for the smoke from my stove to go." Ruhani laughed, but the laughter stopped as her eyes fell again on the municipal office's letter in her hand. Her name had been proposed for the temporary maintenance of the shelter building; the letter did not make clear how much authority was to accompany that name.

The letter said that an 'authorised contact person' was required to keep the shelter's daily arrangements running without interruption until the investigation was complete. Another page was enclosed, asking for particulars concerning the use of the building and its permanent transfer. The secretary said, “Sign both at once and the repair of the water tank and the next consignment of rations will be easier.” Ruhani placed the two pages on separate parts of the table. “Serving as a contact and becoming the owner of the house are not the same thing,” she said. “First everyone must see what promise each paper contains.”

When Champa arrived at the shelter, she carried not her iron trunk but only an envelope of rent receipts. Two days had passed since she had been given three days’ notice to vacate her room. She still had not received a certified copy of the inspection. “I can stay in this house tonight,” she said, “but that must not put the key to my own room in someone else’s name.” Ruhani showed her the register for temporary stays: the visitor’s name, the period for which accommodation was needed at night, and the limits of consent were entered separately. Champa chose to leave blank the space requesting details of her medical treatment.

A member seated by the table objected. “If everyone insists on their own conditions, help will come to a halt.” Wiping her hands on the end of her sari, Rukhsana said, “The fact that you can take all our labour without conditions does not prove that people who ask about conditions are bad people.” She set out the previous month’s food expenses. The donated rice was entered in one line; firewood, oil, hours spent cooking, and wages for washing plates were recorded separately. For the first time the member’s gaze moved away from the foodstuffs alone and settled on the time the work had taken.

Naira had come not to give legal advice, but to help them read the papers. She made it clear at the outset that her own records contract had been suspended. She spoke briefly to Kabir by telephone. He advised them to examine the wording of the two documents separately, ask for the original terms governing the building and a copy of the public decision, and not assume, without seeing the relevant file, that signing would actually alter permanent ownership. When Ruhani put down the phone, she said, “Then for the moment we agree only to the limited work on the first page, and keep the second for examination?” Champa asked, “And the signatures of the people who live here?” “There can be no consent without the voice of those whose rights will be affected,” Ruhani replied.

Just then came the sound of two boxes being set down at the shelter’s outer door. Hasan and Zubaida had arrived from the bus stand. The old space at the bus terminus, where they had once found a little room to stand near Amina Bhathiyara’s roadside stall by the ghat, had now been closed off with an iron barrier. Hasan’s box contained needles and thread, a small measuring tape, waterproof cloth bags and little articles useful to travellers; Zubaida’s held strips cut for sewing, wire and small lidded tins. Both depended for their earnings on people passing through on their journeys.

Hasan showed them a receipt for the fee he had paid to occupy the old space. “The stand has gone under a new contract,” he said. “Now they say my receipt gave me no right to sell anything there; it was only a charge for occupying the place that day." Zubaida said, "If we accept that as the whole truth, we shall have to abandon years of work. Yet we will not lie and say the receipt grants us a permanent lease. Our appeal asks this: who will account for when the arrangement was changed, what notice was given, and what alternative space was offered?" Ruhani invited them to sit inside. "First tell us where to put the boxes," Zubaida said, "somewhere safe from fire and water."

Beside the doorway stood Hiravati Kurariyar with a small bamboo frame and her repair tools. She travelled from the bus stand to the next market, working wherever she found a job. She had been offered work sewing the torn mats on the shelter's rear veranda, but in return for being allowed to sit there she was being asked to guard the place all day without pay. "I know how to sew a mat," she said. "Keeping watch is another job. Tell me separately the hours and the price of each." Rukhsana took out a sheet of paper. "Shall we measure the mats first?" Hiravati sat down at the table and stretched out her measuring tape.

Hasan picked up an old bench lying in the courtyard and tried to set it level, but one of its legs wobbled. "If we put the boxes here, the cloth will get damp underneath," Zubaida said. Hiravati measured a leftover piece of bamboo from her frame. "This could go beneath the leg," she said, "but it will not be a permanent repair." "How much?" Hasan asked. "As much as the work is worth," Hiravati answered. "But mending the bench will not get me my place at the bus stand." Everyone burst out laughing. The separate crises of three livelihoods could not be contained in the leg of a little bench; nevertheless, for the moment the bench stood steady.

Zubaida took out the draft of her appeal. Its first line read, 'Please put the old place in my name.' "Do you actually want permanent ownership?" Naira asked. After a moment's thought, Zubaida replied, "No. We want a definite time when we can work there every day, and a place where no one can demand arbitrary fees. If changes are necessary for safety at the stand, we do not oppose them. But we cannot accept an iron fence being put up at night, only for someone to say in the morning that no one ever earned a living there." She struck out the first line and wrote another, asking for evidence of their former use, a copy of the order changing the arrangements, a hearing, and an alternative site.

Hasan wanted to attach to the old receipt a wage slip Amina had given them for work at the ghat. Zubaida stopped him. "That slip is for work somewhere else. It will not prove a right at the bus stand." "Then what use is it?" Hasan asked. "Keep it in the account of our new livelihood," she said. "When the office asks what loss the closing of the stand has caused, we can show that we have not been sitting idle, yet still cannot earn what we earned before." Hasan accepted the distinction. Their decision to undertake new work did not amount to forgiving the old injustice.

As the secretary entered Hiravati's name in the shelter's register of payments due, he asked how to spell 'Kurariyar'. She showed him the name written on a small piece of paper she carried. “Do not put down my travelling work as proof that I have a permanent place here,” she said. “And if I go to another market tomorrow, do not write that I abandoned the work and fled. I shall accept work with a date agreed, and deliver it on an agreed date.” Ruhani had the time required, the wages and the cost of materials entered separately on the sheet where Hiravati had recorded the measurements of the mat. With her permission Hiravati had a photograph of that copy kept on Zubaida’s phone. She owned no phone herself, but the right to ask for a copy was hers.

Later in the day the shelter committee met again. Hasan and Zubaida decided to submit their appeal independently; the shelter had no authority to grant them a permanent lease at the bus stand. Ruhani said, however, that one corner of the building’s veranda could be made available for their repairs during two specified periods each week, provided fire precautions, access and the safety of the other residents were checked. “What would the rent be?” Zubaida asked. Rukhsana stated the small costs involved; any decision to waive the charge, she said, must be entered in the committee’s open accounts. This was not a gift, but a proposal for limited use.

Some members again pressed for the shelter’s letter to be signed. “If it is not signed today, the repairs will stop,” one said. “The repairs really are needed,” Champa replied. “But how does that mean we should give away the key to this house for good?” Ruhani picked up the first paper and read it aloud: temporary consent to act as a contact, arrange inspections for fire and water safety, and fix the dates for necessary repairs. She asked for written authorisation for that work alone. Separate lines were made for the views of those present; the names of dissenting members were recorded as well. The second paper was not signed.

At the municipal office that afternoon, a clerk refused at first to accept the two parts of the letter separately. “Half a document will hold up the file,” he said. “Then record now the half of the work that lies within our authority,” Ruhani replied. “We shall examine the original conditions governing the other half.” The clerk asked for a copy of the rules from the next desk. After checking them, he was able to issue a receipt acknowledging the limited request for maintenance, while keeping the file on permanent transfer separate. Champa made the meaning of the receipt explicit: it was not a decision on ownership of the building, only proof that the request for inspection and necessary work had been received.

Outside the office, Hasan held two papers in his hand: the old receipt for the bus-stand fee and the new acknowledgement of his appeal. “One paper belongs to the past,” he told Zubaida, “and the other to the road ahead.” “The old paper says only what is written in it,” Zubaida replied. “And the paper about the road ahead contains, as yet, only a request.” Just then Hiravati was lifting her bamboo frame onto her shoulder. She laughed. “You count your papers, and I shall count my mats. If the two accounts agree one day, so much the better; and if they do not, the wages must not stop.”

That evening five plates were laid out on the shelter veranda. Rukhsana served the meal, keeping a separate account of its cost. Taking a plate, Champa said, “I still do not know whether I shall be in my room tomorrow or here.” “But we can decide about a plate of food right now,” Ruhani said. Zubaida told Hasan there was too little salt in the rice; he slid his share of salt towards her. Hiravati laughed. “Do not start a dispute about who owns the salt in this house.” For a few moments everyone’s attention rested on the meal. Outside, a light breeze turned the little windmill’s blades three times.

Back home, Naira told Sarita what had happened. Sarita stopped sewing for a moment and asked, “Did Ruhani sign?” “Only for the work she was authorised to undertake,” Naira replied. “Not the page about ownership.” Sarita said, “If someone lets another person use a key in their keeping, the house does not thereby become that other person’s.” Naira laughed. “Are you saying that about your own ledger, or about the shelter?” Pulling tight a knot in the thread, Sarita answered, “About whoever needs to understand it. But the original page of the ledger will stay with me.”

That night Naira opened her notebook. After her own mistake in breaking the terms of Mahesh’s permission, she had been learning to set down the limits of even the smallest undertakings. On today’s page she wrote three sentences: permission to repair the shelter is not ownership; an old fee paid at the bus stand is not a permanent lease; a copy of a private document is not consent to publish it. She did not yet possess answers to every question. But she wrote those three sentences so that, the following day, no one’s rightful due would be entered under the wrong name. Outside, a drop of water fell from the veranda at Sarita’s house. Sanket moved a bucket beneath it. Repairing the tap would be tomorrow morning’s task; placing the bucket there was tonight’s responsibility.

Chapter 24 · The Veranda Outside

By dawn the bucket on the veranda of Sarita's house had filled. In the water that had dripped from the roof all night, no reflection of the sky remained; fine particles of falling lime had settled into a milky layer at the bottom. Sanket carried the bucket outside to empty it and noticed a new crack beside the wooden doorframe on the veranda's right side. He reached to touch it, but Sarita stopped him. “Not yet. If the mason says tomorrow that this beam is weak, we must support it first.” Naira heard them from inside the house. Until the previous night, the thought of leaving home had seemed to her almost imaginary; now they had to move their bedding from beneath that very doorframe.

Since Naira's contract for archival work had been suspended, the household accounts had changed. Sarita wanted to spend the money saved from her sewing on repairing the roof, but the workman had warned that the veranda would be unsafe to live in until its rotten inner timbers were replaced. Sanket proposed making a temporary prop. Sarita examined his drawing and said, “You may be able to make it, but first we shall listen to someone who knows how to take the measurements. If your hands remain unharmed, there will be much more for them to make.” Sanket put away his notebook. He was hurt, but he did not take offence at his mother's speaking openly of her fear.

In the lane, the landlord's man had been standing outside Champa's room since morning. He carried a padlock and a paper bearing the words “Safety Reasons.” Champa was filling a water vessel and giving her mother her medicine. Her mother's knee was swollen; during the night she had found it difficult to descend the room's steps. “The three days are over,” the man said. “Put your belongings outside.” Champa answered, “You still have not given me the original inspection report. I shall not insist on living beneath an unsafe roof, but you will not put on that lock without an inventory of my possessions and a receipt for the key.” Instead of offering reassurance, the man pressed her harder. Lifting her mother's pillow, Champa said, “I shall not spend another night here. That does not mean you may enter the outstanding rent or the security deposit in your accounts however you please.”

“What will people say if we go to Ruhani?” her mother asked. Folding an old blue sheet, Champa replied, “People say all manner of things even while we are living here. Your medicine and your breathing matter to me first.” She tied her mother's clothes into a small bundle, opened the iron chest, and placed the rent receipts, treatment prescriptions, and private letters in three separate envelopes. The wound left by the stolen message was still with her. This time she wanted to know the whereabouts of her papers no less certainly than those of her other belongings.

At Ruhani's shelter, Rukhsana had set rice to cook on the stove. When Champa arrived, Ruhani first showed her mother somewhere to sit, then opened the register. “There is a room free here for two nights,” she said. “After that we shall sit down and decide whether the stay needs to be extended in light of the hospital examination. If you wish, your application concerning your rights to the rented room can proceed separately.” Champa opened the window. A small windmill was turning on the veranda outside. “Let Mother have the bed,” she said. “May I sit on the veranda and sew clothes?” “Sit there,” Rukhsana replied, “but work for which you receive wages must not be entered as a free service provided by the shelter.” For the first time, Champa's mother smiled.

Just then Badri Nonphar arrived from the edge of his old settlement. His family lived in the back row of a temporary construction site, where rainwater had been collecting for want of a drain. An official had given him a resettlement slip assigning a particular corner in a new settlement, but offering no clear arrangements for drinking water, sanitation, or the journey to and from work. Unfolding the slip, Badri told Ruhani, “It says ‘alternative shelter’ here. But nobody knows from which well we are to get water for the child at night in the place they have shown us.” On the back of that slip his wife had written, in another hand, a list: the child's medicine, utensils, work tools, and a rope for their milch goat. The inventory of possessions had grown larger than the name of the home.

“Did you sign this slip?” Ruhani asked. “I acknowledged receiving it,” Badri said. “I did not accept the resettlement in full. If my family pitches a tarpaulin at the edge of an empty field for two days, that must not be taken as permanent consent.” His wife intervened: “And under which account will they pay the money demanded for a hired cart?” Badri had not thought of an answer to that question. He lowered his eyes to the paper. The decision to leave a home was not merely a man's signature; its first reckoning was written upon the back of the person who carried the load.

Malati Koche, who had come with Badri, already lived in the new settlement. Her house had been there before, yet no firm path had been built for carrying water from the public tap to her neighbourhood. She unscrewed the lid of her yellow container and showed them the muddy water. “They are sending all of you here,” she told Badri's family, “but a queue forms at our only tap from early morning. Some say that when the new people arrive there will not be enough water to share. I say: why should we not share it? Ask, too, for an account of what is being done to increase the supply.” Her voice held both welcome and concern.

Malati spread out a small map of the new settlement. There was mud in front of the tap, and the lane beside it had been washed away by the first rains. Hiravati's bamboo framework might be useful there, but it could not be trusted as one would trust a permanent bridge. Badri's wife said, “I will not take the child along that path at night.” “Then first we need a temporary passage built together, and an outlet for the standing water,” Malati replied. “I shall not allow a new lock to be put on the tap without the consent of my neighbourhood. But neither shall I tell any family to stand humbly at my door begging for water."

Naira arrived in the midst of these discussions. The workman examining her family's roof had told her to vacate the inner room for two days. Sanket had found a small room to rent near Railway Square, with a solid roof overhead and a window through which the west wind entered when it was opened. Sarita had been unwilling at first. "How can we leave everything that is in the house?" she had asked. "We shall go for two days," Naira had said. "Without measured details of the repairs and a written account of the cost, there will be no document declaring that we have abandoned the house." "You can say 'document' easily enough," Sarita had replied, "but who will water the tulsi in the courtyard?" Naira had not been able to answer her then.

By midday the concerns of all three families had gathered upon the same veranda: the bed for Champa's mother, the rope for Badri's hired cart, and a sample from Sarita's cracked roof. They had not all been driven out by the same order. Champa was moving because of the dispute over her room and her mother's health; Badri was leaving an unsafe place without accepting the incomplete resettlement slip; Sarita was choosing temporary accommodation for the repair of her home and the safety of her family. Outside, the afternoon sunlight was moving towards evening, but no one inside the shelter made a proclamation of heroism out of anyone else's decision. Each needed an actual place in which to spend the coming night.

Rukhsana set out three glasses of buttermilk. "With so many people coming into your kitchen, how will you keep the accounts?" Malati asked. "If someone gives a donation, I enter the name separately," Rukhsana replied. "If someone pays for a meal, that is another entry; and the cooking I have done since morning is another." Sipping his buttermilk, Badri's little son asked, "Why is my glass a different colour?" Rukhsana laughed. "Look: there is buttermilk in your glass, not water." "But the colour belongs to the glass," the child said. In that laughter the weariness of all three households grew lighter for a little while.

Champa went back to the landlord's man. This time it was Champa herself who spoke, not Ruhani. They drew up an inventory of the belongings inside the room in two copies, one for Champa and one for the man who would fit the lock. She lifted the bedding from her mother's cot, then hesitated over a small earthen flowerpot on the window. She had planted it in that room a year earlier. "Leave that old pot," the man said. Champa took it in her hands. "I did not buy it in my own name," she said, "but I filled it with earth, and I planted what grows in it." The man said nothing. The door was locked, the receipt for the key was signed, and the dispute over the deposit remained unresolved.

Badri was loading the family's belongings onto a handcart. In the little tarpaulin home beside the railway tracks, his wife had dried neem leaves to drive away mosquitoes. She placed them in a bundle. A neighbour asked, "Have you accepted the new settlement, then?" "No," his wife replied. "We are taking the child away from dangerous water. Badri will submit a written objection, and Malati is showing us how water may be obtained once we reach the place. Even while we were living here, the family's water had been bad for two days." The neighbour helped lift her bundle onto the cart. He did not have to leave his own home, but that did not absolve him of carrying a share of the weight.

At the edge of the new settlement, Malati and two other women were clearing a small platform where water buckets could be placed. When Badri's family arrived, there was no space near the tap to unload the tarpaulin from the cart. Some people said, "More crowds here as well?" Malati replied, "You shall decide together how the space is to be used. But closing the tap is no way to put anyone to the test." She gave Badri's wife two glasses of water from her own house. "This is hospitality, not a permanent arrangement," she made clear. "Tomorrow we shall write a joint application about the hours of access to the tap, the queue, and the earthen path." Rather than fold his hands in gratitude, Badri asked, "What shall we do to help with the work?" "First listen to how every family uses the water," Malati said. "We are not going to uproot the tap that is already there."

Before evening, Naira returned to empty the room at home. Sanket was putting the books into sacks. His cheap old radio, lengths of metal wire, and half-finished sound box lay in one corner. "Shall we take all these?" he asked. "Only as much as you can carry," Sarita said. "Make a list of the rest." Sanket asked, "Mother, if we empty the room, will people say that you have gone away?" Looking towards the row of houses beyond her own, Sarita said, "We shall watch who records in the papers whether we are living here or not. But what kind of mother's love would it be to make you sleep in a house that is not safe?"

It was then that Naira raised the question of the page bearing twenty-seven names. Two sets of leaves from Sarita's old ledger had been kept apart: in one notebook were the entries concerning public corrections; within another, older fold lay the original page of names. Until now that paper had remained in Sarita's private chest. "If they take the roof down, it will not be right to keep it here," Naira said. "I can seal it in a safe envelope and take it with us." Sarita stayed her hand. "You may give me an envelope. But I shall keep the original page myself. The hurt of what was made public without asking me is still in this house." Naira's mistake in publishing Mahesh's testimony before the agreed time was fresh in her memory. She did not argue.

Sarita opened the chest. The corners of the original page, kept between folded layers, were old and yellowed; Naira did not reach towards the writing. Sarita placed blank sheets on either side and folded the page inside a cloth. No photograph of that page was taken with any new phone. Sanket merely measured the cloth-wrapped bundle to make certain that it would fit properly into a small wooden box. Sarita tested the lock and tied the key into the end of her sari. "If I am questioned, I shall answer," she said. "But no one will take a paper from my hand and write an answer in my name."

Naira understood that her mother was not, at that moment, guarding a page that proved some fraudulent crime, but defending her authority over what was in her own keeping. “I shall record separately the status of the copy I have kept for examination,” she said. “The original remains with you, and the public use of private names is prohibited for now.” “And the one name I had forbidden you to read?” Sarita asked. “That prohibition will not be broken,” Naira said. “But we shall record separately where the inquiry has come to a halt.” Sarita gave no answer. On the wall, the hand of the old clock advanced by a minute. Water was still dripping inside the house.

The workman who came to inspect the roof fitted a temporary wooden support against the outer doorframe. Lalit had been called to examine the measurements; he warned that installing a support was no proof of lasting safety. The workman's written note recorded the length of the crack, the waterlogged timber, the necessity of removing the roof, and the date for a further inspection. Naira took a copy. An elderly neighbour asked, “If you all go away, who will look after the tulsi at this house?” “I can come here every evening,” Sanket said. “You must not go inside until the supports have been removed,” Sarita said at once. “Put the tulsi in a pot outside.” The old woman offered a place beside her own courtyard for the pot.

On her bed at the shelter, Champa's mother could at last stretch out her legs and sleep. Champa sat beside her, threading a needle. When Ruhani came in, Champa asked, “If I work here in return for staying, will that leave less room for another patient?” “Your wages for work will be a separate matter,” Ruhani said. “If the period of your stay must be extended, we shall consider everyone's needs. It would not be right to move your mother; that much we shall put in writing.” Champa looked towards the window. The little windmill was turning faster now, but no one stopped to watch it. The indispensable work of living lay ahead.

Badri pitched a small tarpaulin shelter behind the new settlement, but that night they discovered that they had too few vessels for fetching water. “We left the large earthen pitcher at the old place,” his wife said. Badri wanted to go back immediately. Malati stopped him. “Do not take the eroded path in the dark. Keep one of my empty pitchers for now. We shall go together in the morning.” Badri was still turning the office slip over and looking at it from every side. “If I write down the household accounts, will the place begin to feel like a home?” he asked. His wife smiled. “It was not a home there either when water had risen to our pillows. But we shall go back for what we left behind. That is not a letter of acceptance; it is looking after our own belongings.”

It was the eve of Bharata's departure from Ayodhya. On one of the palace's outer verandas, people were tying up small bundles. Bharata had promised that he would go to Rama, yet the obligations owed to those remaining in the capital could not simply be put on hold. Shatrughna asked the record-keeper who would enter the measures of grain and the entries for wages. A servant said that the first order had been written in King Dasharatha's name, and they were now waiting for a new name. “Hunger will not wait for anyone's name,”

Shatrughna replied. The work of serving those within the palace and the needs of the city beyond it could not both be contained in the preparations for a single journey.

Kaikeyi brought Bharata a woollen wrap. Before accepting it, he asked, “From which household has this come?” “I took it from an old chest in my own chamber,” Kaikeyi said. Bharata accepted the wrap; that act was no declaration that the injustice brought about by his mother's fears had been forgiven. Urmila set aside a small purse for the cost of the serving women's meals. “The work of those who do not go on this journey will not cease,” she said. Bharata nodded. The sounds of departure filled the palace, but the voices of those who had to stay at home were heard that night as well.

In Videhapur, Sarita's family reached the little room near Railway Square. The door's sliding bolt was loose; Sanket opened his tool kit and tightened its screw. As Naira put down their belongings, she asked, “Are you tired?” “I am tired, but I shall cook some rice,” Sarita said. “You must all be hungry.” Naira went forward to look at the stove. The container for the rice was new here, the drinking glasses were new, but Sarita's old brass measure for rice was the same. “The little bowl has changed homes too,” Sanket said with a laugh. “Not the bowl,” Sarita replied. “The reckoning of what our stomachs need has come with us.”

After the evening meal, Naira put three papers into a separate file: information concerning the inventory of Champa's belongings and the receipt for her key; Badri's objection to incomplete resettlement and the water problem at the new site; and the inspection note about repairs to her own home. The losses suffered by the three families were different. The first family's deposit remained withheld; the second had no assured permanent water supply; the third had not yet had its roof repaired. No single acknowledgement of receipt had resolved all their difficulties. Yet the people of each household, with their belongings and their decisions, had made it through to another day. Naira did not add this information to the public register of names.

Sarita placed the wooden box not beside her pillow but beneath a small table. “Have you got the key?” Sanket asked. “Yes,” Sarita said. “And what if I am away from time to time?” he asked. Sarita looked at him. “If neither of us is at home, we shall decide who ought to look after the papers. But for now their ownership will not be handed over to anyone.” “In the morning I shall go to Railway Square to meet Fakira,” Naira said. “Not to ask for news of Mahesh, but to learn the next date concerning Fakira's own complaint about his right to travel.” “First,” Sarita replied, “we must learn how the water reaches this new home.”

A short whistle sounded from a train outside. Sanket opened the window, and air damp with rain entered the room. Sarita wiped the table with a corner of her shawl, covered the rice that was left, and touched the lock of the box once more to make sure it was fastened. Naira read no names. That night they were outside their home, but the story of the home had not ended. In the darkness near Railway Square, someone's footsteps sounded and then receded. Sarita put out the lamp. In place of the empty veranda, the doorway of this little room had now become the threshold she kept watch over.

Chapter 25 · An Empty Space on the Train

In the rented room at Railway Square, the first sound of dawn was not a train but an empty water bucket. Sarita had turned on the tap. Twice it gave out nothing but air; the third time, a thin stream of water appeared. She slid a lota beneath the bucket and called to Sanket. “Before anything else, write down the hours when water comes to this house.” Sanket looked at the clock. Naira was examining, in her notebook, the unfinished business of three families from the day before. Today she had to go to the station to learn the date of the next hearing on Fakira’s complaint about his right to travel. Sarita said, “Your inquiry will go on, but if the water in this house keeps stopping like this, how are we to cook rice?” Naira rose and took hold of the other side of the bucket.

The road near the station was wet. Keeping clear of the water dripping from the awning of the tea stall, passengers hurried along with their bundles. Fakira stood beside a pillar, touching the edge of the paving stones with his foot to gauge the distance along the path. The old service gate was still half shut, though a few people were slipping in by the narrow way beside it. As soon as Naira reached him, she said, “I’ve come to find out when your application will be heard again.” Fakira replied, “I need to know about that hearing too. But the morning train is due in now. This time I’m not going to miss it.”

Naira glanced at her watch. She had been told that the office staff would not take their seats before nine; Fakira said that by nine he would have earned the first money of his day. “I can stay with you until the train comes,” Naira said. Fakira laughed. “Stay, by all means. But when I show someone the way, I shall answer for myself. You are not my master.”

The morning train had not yet arrived when Sona Kathautiya appeared, bringing two bamboo frames and a bundle of tools on a handcart. Part of the load had to be delivered to a repair site across the railway tracks. A wheel of the cart stuck in the mud. Explaining where to push, Sona put her own shoulder to it. A man said that a charitable association in the town would describe the delivery as social service in its printed notice. Sona let go of the cart and looked at him. “Who is paying the carriage charge? The cart-puller is still owed two days’ wages.” The man said, “Such accounts, even in charitable work!” Sona answered, “Record the donation under the name of charity. Record my carriage charge under my name.”

Fakira turned towards Sona. “Take your cart around the right-hand corner of the drain. The ground there is soft.” Sona said, “I’ll hold the frame steady. You keep calling out the way.” It was a small partnership: Fakira did not pull the cart, but he knew and described the signs along the route. Sona counted the items again against the slip recording the load and gave the cart-puller a copy. The man from the charitable association wanted to take a photograph for the printed notice. Sona stopped his hand. “First the receipt for the carriage charge; then permission from the person whose work this is.” The man gave no answer yet.

Then Haricharan Paswan’s small goods vehicle came to a halt in the square behind the station. Its driver had been summoned unexpectedly during the night to carry a patient to hospital; the vehicle had to be made ready again for the morning’s consignment. Haricharan sat beside a tyre, checking its air. “Everyone wants the fare reduced when they call it a vehicle for patients,” he said, “but both the driver’s night and his morning must be counted.” In a thick ledger he entered the times of the previous day’s journey—when the vehicle had left, when it had returned, the cost of petrol, and the driver’s rest. Naira asked, “Does this vehicle go near the warehouse too?” Haricharan did not close the ledger. “It goes wherever it is hired. But carrying another person’s goods does not automatically make me responsible for what is inside them.”

Naira checked her question. Mahesh’s family was still suffering the consequences of her premature publication of his testimony about the old road to the warehouse. She asked Haricharan only whether the hire charge for a journey and the driver’s wages appeared on separate receipts. He showed her a blank specimen, concealing the name of the actual customer. “If a formal inquiry comes, I shall produce the records I am entitled to produce, through the proper procedure. Don’t turn a supposition about a journey into an accusation of crime.” Naira agreed. An empty stretcher strap hung from the back of the vehicle. The sight reminded her of Urmila’s night-time transport of hospital linen. The hours spent on both kinds of work needed to find their place on paper.

When the train entered the platform, the press of people grew on one side. Fakira had already heard that the passengers were coming down the inner staircase more quickly now. He directed one family towards the bus for the market and another towards the place where the dispensary’s small vehicle stood. Two people gave him coins; a third, a woman, thanked him and walked on. After answering all three, Fakira felt the separate coins in his hand and put them into his pouch. Naira did not offer to count them. For a moment she thought he should come straight to the office; but at the next traveller’s question—“Which way across the river?”—Fakira was back at his work.

Near a heap of sacks unloaded from the train, Shiv Dhandi stood holding his wage slip. He was not a railway employee; he worked with a contracted team unloading vehicles. In the previous week’s accounts, the last letter of his name had been changed, and his signature no longer matched the payment list. “When you ask my name, I tell you I am Shiv Dhandi,” he said to the man keeping the accounts. “Why, then, are there two spellings on two slips?” The clerk said, “Prove your identity first.” Shiv showed him the marked tickets for the sacks he had unloaded. “Match the number of days I worked against these. My days must not disappear in a dispute over my name.”

Naira asked if she might see Shiv’s papers, but he first asked, “What will I gain from your doing this?” It was a fair question. Naira said that instead of taking his private details she could explain the form in which a public complaint might be written. Keeping the slip in his own hand, Shiv had a line entered before the employee: payment withheld because of a difference in the spelling of his name; work tickets retained; a date to be given for correction. The man at the office issued an acknowledgement but gave no answer to the larger claim. Shiv said, “Now this slip is going home with me. My name will not go into your notebook yet.” Naira accepted his decision.

At that moment Lakshmi Jhangar came up behind them, holding an old cloth bag carefully. Inside were several copied pages from an earlier labour contract, with the working season entered on one line and the arrangements for lodging on another. She did not yet know for certain who held the original. She said to Shiv, “Your days of work have been lost from the paper; in the matter of my family’s old work, the paper itself is still unavailable.” Naira asked what she hoped to establish by means of those pages. Lakshmi answered, “First I must find out which pages these are copies of. Only then can I make a claim. Payment due for my grandfather’s work and a debt owed by the household would not be entered on the same line.”

Shiv told her the way to an inexpensive place that bound documents. Lakshmi said, “I’ll bring the copies, but I will not present a paper that does not belong to my family as though it were ours.” Her family wanted the dispute settled quickly; Lakshmi wanted to make sure that a false claim did not saddle them with a new debt. Naira did not press her to fix a date. When the cord of Lakshmi’s bag came loose, Shiv tied the knot for her. Both had to return to their work before the next train arrived.

Outside the platform, Javed Kalandar was fastening up a little curtain of cloth. Behind it were two slender bamboo rods and a handmade paper puppet. He had once performed with live animals; now he had decided not to keep animals at all. The children asked, “Where’s the monkey?” Javed laughed. “Today the monkey is made of paper. It needs no rice, only the labour of these hands.” Working the puppet strings, he told a short story in which a hungry character acted out giving away half his rice. The onlookers laughed, and some of the children insisted that he perform it again.

When the performance was over, Javed opened a small tray. Those who wished to pay did so; others walked away without paying. He did not detain them. But a station guard said that the gathering was blocking the passage. Javed immediately lowered the curtain, pointed towards an empty space, and asked, “If I put it on this side, will the way remain clear?” The guard laughed at first, then said they would have to check where the station boundary ended and the public square began. Javed asked to see the boundary peg. “I changed my livelihood so that it no longer depended on animals,” he said. “I do not yet know how to make a livelihood when I am allowed no place to stand.”

Naira lingered over Javed's puppet. Sanket wanted to learn to make such stringed toys; this morning he was at home writing down the hours when water ran from the tap. Naira asked Javed whether a small evening performance for the children might be arranged with the proper permission. Javed said, "Settle the fee, the place, and the time first. Call it free, and everyone will think the work is worth nothing." With that he retied a knot in the strings. From a little distance Fakira recognised the sound and said, "This song would suit that puppet very well." He hummed two lines of an old folk tune he loved. Javed caught the rhythm. For once, no one spoke of documents.

When Fakira had finished singing, he sat down quietly. The crowd from the train had thinned. The tea seller brought him a small glass. Fakira paid for it and asked how much sugar was in the tea this time. Javed said, "You could charge for your singing as well." Fakira laughed. "I sing this song for myself. Not everything has a slip of paper attached to it." Naira did not write that answer in her notebook. Some things people did for their own pleasure had no need to be turned into testimony.

Suddenly a cry went up beyond the square that a child had gone missing. A woman was walking quickly through the crowd holding a child by the hand; someone called her a member of an unknown gang and raised a mobile phone. Naira saw an elderly relative of the child hurrying towards them from the other side. A young man shouted, "Send the photograph! A child-snatcher has been caught." Fakira got to his feet. "Who has seen a child being stolen?" he asked. The young man said, "Everyone says so." Fakira replied, "What everyone is saying is not the same as what someone has witnessed." Frightened, the woman lifted the child into her arms.

Naira told the young man with the raised phone that the child's safety must be checked first and no photograph circulated. At the station's enquiry window, the woman was given an opportunity to explain. The elderly woman travelling with the child had alighted from a different carriage and reached them by another route; the child had been travelling with her, but they had become separated for a short while in the crowd on the platform. In the presence of an employee, the two sides' travel papers and their conversation with each other confirmed that the younger woman was a member of the family. The child asked for water. Naira told the crowd to move away. This incident did not establish that a child had been abducted here; nor did it give any reason to call off the search for a missing child from some other family in the town.

The young man was unwilling to delete the incomplete image on his phone. "What if it really had been a kidnapping?" he asked. Naira answered, "Then a safe investigation would have been necessary, not a public accusation." The employee at the enquiry window recorded that the child had been reunited with the family and that a false rumour had spread about this incident. Fakira asked whether anyone would also note the time taken to clear the crowd from the platform. "That is a separate entry," the employee said. "Good," Fakira replied. "The child's matter belongs to the child; the matter of my blocked passage belongs to me. Don't bury everyone on a single sheet of paper."

Naira remembered her original purpose once more. The acknowledgement of Fakira's old complaint, complete with its number, had been entered in her notebook; Fakira himself held the original. When they reached the official's desk, Naira urged him to inquire into the status of the complaint. Fakira said, "The morning train has gone now. Give me ten minutes." He took the coins he had earned from his pouch and counted them separately, deducted the cost of tea, and checked the time of the afternoon train again. "Your inquiry matters to me," he said, "but if you tell me to go at once, who is going to pay for the food I lose by doing so?"

Naira did not give the easy answer that almost escaped her—I will pay. It would have been wrong, in the name of an inquiry, to make Fakira dependent on her generosity in place of his earnings. "I'll stand in the queue and ask the office about the position," she said. "You finish your work with the afternoon train. If they need a statement from you in person, I'll ask for the appointment to be fixed after it." Fakira nodded. "If the officer wants to hear me, I shall name the time myself. You will not make a statement in my place." Naira answered, "I will not." Since Mahesh's case, she knew very well the weight of that small promise.

At the office window Naira showed the old reference number. The employee turned through the register and said that the complaint was still active, not closed; a reply from another section was awaited for the verification of the name. The original entry declaring Fakira dead was still in the system. Naira asked, "What is the prescribed number of days for a reply after acknowledgement?" The employee pointed to the written noticeboard. Naira copied the public time limit into her notebook, but did not repeat Fakira's private identification number aloud before the crowd. The officer proposed a morning appointment for his statement. Naira said, "The applicant earns his living in the morning. Let a time in the afternoon be offered, with his consent."

At first the employee said, "It is difficult to give everyone a separate time." Naira indicated the crowd outside the window. "Then record that a request has been made to change the time. Give the applicant an answer, whether the request is accepted or refused." The employee wrote the date on a slip, entered a proposed hearing for an afternoon the following week, and said that final confirmation would depend on the applicant's signature. Naira came out with a copy of the proposal. This did not correct the entry recording Fakira's death. It might, nevertheless, spare him the necessity of surrendering his morning livelihood in order to pursue his complaint.

Naira read the new proposal slip aloud to Fakira. When he had heard it, he asked, "Won't the boat across the river have left by then?" Naira did not know. Fakira opened his old timetable and checked the boat's departure time; the rains could alter it. "I'll ask Hira tomorrow," he said. "I must meet the people who run the boat at the Tilwaha landing. First I want to hear their conditions from them." Naira said, "For both the inquiry and the journey, we need to understand the water at Tilwaha." Fakira replied, "Yes. But do not think of those who work on the water merely as people who show us the way."

After the afternoon train arrived, Fakira guided two passengers to the place where their luggage had been put. One paid him the agreed amount; the other said he had no change. Fakira did not insist on remembering the man's name or face, but said plainly, "Next time, ask the price beforehand. I want the value of my work, not your pity." The passenger went away embarrassed. This time Naira did not follow him. When Fakira heard the train's final whistle, he sat down on the empty plank beside his feet. He hummed the last two notes of the same tune again. There was no entry of death in this song, nor any mystery of an envelope.

When Naira returned to the room at Railway Square that evening, Sanket was sitting over a timetable he had made of the water supply. After the first flow at dawn the tap had stopped twice. He had asked a neighbour for water, but neither its price nor the rule for sharing it had yet been agreed. Sarita had put lentils on the stove. "What happened about Fakira?" she asked. Naira said, "The death record has not been corrected. But we have a written proposal to change the time of his hearing. He did not miss his morning train." Sarita asked, "Did he want to look at the original page bearing the name?" Naira answered, "No. He wants his own entry examined. My page, the rumour about the child, and the papers concerning fishing rights are three separate matters."

In the middle of his notebook Sanket drew an empty square and labelled it 'Afternoon Train'. Naira smiled. "Why this square?" Sanket said, "In the morning there is water from the tap, in the afternoon Fakira's train, in the evening Mother's lentils. Not everyone lives by the same hours. Making room for one person's work does not mean that another person's time is empty." Stirring the lentils, Sarita said, "If all your studying has taught you that, it has been worthwhile." Outside, the whistle of a train continued to sound. This time the sound carried more than the mystery of someone whose living identity had been lost: it held the weariness of those returning home after their work was done, a little money earned, and the road into the following day.

Chapter 26 · Guha's Riverbank

After the crowd from the morning train had thinned, Fakira tapped the stone paving of Railway Square with the tip of his stick. Naira had brought him the slip received the previous day, proposing a new time for his hearing. Taking it in his hand, Fakira said, "It says after midday. But the timing of the boat we must catch to cross the river has to fit as well. Let us hear what the boatmen have to say first." Sarita was putting the water vessels in order in the new room. Before leaving, Naira had told her that today she would not be examining the original page of names; she would be looking into the arrangements for Fakira's journey.

The rainwater had still not receded from the road towards Tilwaha. Beyond the paved road lay an earthen rise, where water stood in ruts left by the old wheels of bullock carts. Fakira found the edge of the path sometimes by its sounds, sometimes with his stick. Once Naira moved forward to take his hand. "Tell me when a rut is coming," Fakira said. "I'll place my feet myself." Walking beside him, Naira warned him of the ruts ahead. She was only now learning to respect this small distinction.

The first thing they saw at the landing was not a boat but a wet plank. Two men were fastening an iron strip across its split joint. Hira was bent beside the boat, measuring the waterline. In his hands were a coarse length of rope and a narrow wooden strip with peeling paint. "The water is higher than yesterday," he said. "The boat will run, but we must settle the fare and the load first. Everything cannot go aboard one boat." On the far bank no one was waving a flag; a few people simply waited with their belongings.

Beside Hira sat Madhu Kevat with a thick ledger. His boat generally took people and small consignments as far as the opposite bank, sometimes giving travellers bound for Simatirtha the first stage of their journey. Crossing a river and crossing an international border were different journeys, a distinction Madhu explained openly to everyone. "If you have a bus to catch farther on, I'll put you ashore on the other side," he said. "Border papers and checks at the post are not included in my boat fare." Naira entered the distinction in her notebook.

Behind the landing, a notice sent from an office had been tied with rope to a post. It declared that the boatmen's community would provide free service for journeys undertaken as public assistance. There was no signature. Madhu unfolded the paper and held it up. "If people from the village are in trouble, we will not turn our faces away. But the boat, the oil, the planks and the boatmen's time did not spring into existence as a donation from somebody. Whoever announces a free passage must first say how the boat is to be kept going." An elderly passenger asked, "Are you selling your river?" Madhu replied, "The river is not my property. But the boat is my responsibility. Do not confuse the two."

Hira looked at the reverse of the notice. “At yesterday’s meeting it was called a ‘proposal’. How has it become an ‘order’?” Madhu asked anyone who had a copy of the meeting’s proceedings to bring it forward. No one immediately moved. Naira asked, “Who put up the unsigned copy?” Madhu shrugged. “That is a question for an inquiry. Do not make me the guilty party by telling me what you yourself do not know.” Naira fell silent. Her remorse for publishing a half-truth after Mahesh’s testimony still demanded a place in the way she worked.

Meanwhile Fakira stood on the open ground beside the landing. “I need two things from the boat,” he said. “A safe place to sit, and the revised sailing time when the river rises. I’ve been given a new time for tomorrow’s hearing, but if I must wait two hours at the landing, I’ll lose that day’s earnings all over again.” Madhu asked who he was. Fakira gave his name, but did not read out the entire account of his death entry before the assembled people. “I may not understand the sickness afflicting your papers,” Madhu said, “but I can record the waiting time in the ledger.”

Long before this, on a bank of the Ganga, Guha listened to the water striking the underside of his boat. The river’s current had changed during the night. In the small Nishada settlement, the morning meal was being prepared; the boat’s ropes were being dried, and some children were pulling aside a fence of thorny bamboo. It was then that Rama, Sita and Lakshmana reached the shore. They had a journey before them, but for the people who lived along the bank this morning had already been a morning of work. Guha recognised his guests. After bowing to them, his gaze went to the mud on Sita’s feet and the planks of the boat.

“Accept my friendship,” Guha said, “but first hear what the river has to say. The landing planks are wet. We cannot carry all the baggage at once. If we turn the boat across the route where our people lift their fishing nets in the morning, we shall spoil their day’s work.” “We need to reach the other side quickly,” Lakshmana said. “Then it matters all the more that we choose a safe passage,” Guha replied. “Tearing the nets in the name of haste is no act of friendship.” Rama looked at him. What a friend had said did not seem to him a defiance of an order; it was knowledge drawn from the riverbank.

Sita touched a plank of the boat and asked, “Who will give a hand to someone who cannot swim as they step down?” Guha called two boatmen and had them set a sturdy bamboo pole at the landing. “If a hand is wanted, we shall offer it after asking,” he said. “There is no need to make another person’s body a monument to our own helpfulness.” Lakshmana looked towards the water. He accepted the condition that his weapons should be placed apart, so the balance of the boat would not be disturbed. Guha instructed his people not to cut across the old route of the fishing nets on the return journey after the first crossing.

A young boatman on the shore asked, “If the princes are guests, who will collect the fare?” Guha said, “The guests are dear to me. Today I shall pay the boatmen what is due to them from my own share of food. But if another traveller comes tomorrow, asking that person for a fare will be no insult." Rama said, "Then I understand that you keep your hospitality to guests separate from the rights of your own people." Guha's small decision made room within the boat; the day's labour of those who cooked, dried the nets and rowed did not come to an end merely because guests had arrived.

At Tilwaha in Videhapur, the water surged once more. Madhu had two sacks taken off the boat. One was described in the papers as 'disaster supplies', but inside were sealed packages belonging to a private shop. "I will not give this sack a free place reserved for disaster relief," Madhu said. "Record it under the name of what it actually is." The shopkeeper who had brought the sacks protested. Hira pointed to the wet planks. "The load limit of this boat is written here. Remove two sacks and two passengers can sit safely." The shopkeeper began scolding the labourer who was lifting the sacks. Madhu stopped him. "Argue about your goods with me, not with the labourer."

A young man tightening the planks wrung out his wet shirt. He was Lakhan Satar. Since the previous night he had been repairing the temporary incline to the landing; now he saw that the contractor's paper described his day's labour as 'community service'. He put a finger on the ledger. "I carried the timber here. I did not stop the water. If you wipe out the hours I worked last night by calling them service, where will my morning bread come from?" "How many hours did you work?" Madhu asked. "There were two others with me," Lakhan said. "If you record only my hours, their names will be left out." He was writing the three men's hours separately in his own notebook.

Naira asked Lakhan whether he wanted a copy of the paper. "Let me put my own records straight first," he said. "If the payment is cut, I shall speak with my companions." There was anger in his voice, but he did not turn the dispute of that moment into a larger accusation. One corner of the plank Hira was inspecting was still loose. Lakhan picked up his hammer. "I shall finish the work. Once it is done, see that a date is fixed for payment." Madhu entered in his ledger that the team working on the planks would be given a separate receipt.

On the open ground above the landing, two groups were considering where they might set up a small stage. Nandu Nat was measuring the distance between his bamboo poles; the child who had come with him, schoolbag on one shoulder, was revising the following day's lesson. Hari Natuwa was gathering up a cloth curtain and saying that, if there was a performance that evening, part of the earnings would be put aside for the child's books and fees. The two groups were not one: their arts, families and accounts of rent were distinct. A member of the landing committee said, "If the boat is to run free, let the entertainment be free as well." Nandu did not laugh. "The child will not be on the stage during school hours," he said plainly.

Hari rattled the coins in his thin tin box. "Money set aside for a child's books cannot be turned into cheap entertainment. Anyone who wants a performance should state the hours and the wages." Nandu added that the stage must be placed where it would not block the path of people getting off the boats. Madhu insisted that Hira's measurements be checked before a crowd gathered at the landing. Nandu and Hari marked and set aside their respective bamboo poles; instead of rehearsing for a performance that day, the children were given time to attend school. A small agreement had been reached. A complete contract for the performance had yet to be drawn up.

A woman who had been tracing lines on a stone beside the water had listened silently throughout. Rita Ekka held a folded paper. She had witnessed an application for a loan during an earlier repair of the landing, but in the present demand for repayment her title and another person's name had been joined in the same line. "Why is this sum against my name?" she asked. The man with the ledger said, "It will be some change in the family name." "I know the accounts of my family," Rita replied. "I shall not sign this without seeing what it says."

Madhu offered Rita the notice, but she kept it in her own hand and said that the original agreement and the lender's copy must first be produced. "It is easy to look at someone's poverty and declare every debt to be the same," she said. "I shall repay whatever is mine. Why should I owe what is not?" Naira did not write Rita's name in her notebook. She recorded only that the landing committee's register of loans had no procedure for requesting a comparison of names, and that an applicant was seeking the original copy. Rita's private dispute remained in her own hands.

Ramani Bind arrived at the landing with a slip concerning the fishing rights at Barki Pond. Renu accompanied her and was keeping separate records of the hours for passage at the landing and for washing clothes. "Showing a lease for fishing in the pond does not establish a right over every landing on this river," Ramani said. "And permission to let everyone disembark at the landing does not, in turn, become a fishing contract." Renu said, "I need the hours when the landing is open. Ramani needs the terms governing production. If two different questions are written on one slip, once again neither will be heard."

Renu had an old copy of a paper in her hand. She said that a letter from her maternal home gave the name of a river as 'Bagmati', while another old transcription had 'Bangmatti'. The letter concerned the use of water in that other region; it was not a physical survey of the Tilwaha in Videhapur. "Seeing these two readings gives me no grounds to say that the Tilwaha joins that river," Renu said. "Only this: if a letter speaks of a landing, and we reduce it to a share in the fish from a field, the path by which women there came to fetch water disappears." Naira copied both readings exactly as they stood. She drew no new line of confluence on her map.

One employee, suppressing a laugh, asked, "So how many ledgers do you people want?" "As many separate lines as there are separate kinds of work," Ramani replied. "More ledgers will not increase the water; they will reduce the number of wrong entries." Folding the paper, Renu added that the hours worked by Urmila, who washed clothes, also depended on an open path to the landing. Hospital linen could not be put into the river wherever one pleased, but its safe transport to the bank was necessary. Hira agreed that forcing boat safety and general access to the landing under a single rule would be harmful.

As midday advanced, the last plank of the boat's approach was fastened. Hira stepped into the empty boat first and checked the four places where loads could be put. Madhu pulled twice on the rope to test it. Lakhan stood to one side holding the slips recording his companions' hours. Nandu and Hari had moved their stage poles away from the boat's path. Rita had put no new signature on her debt papers. Ramani and Renu were writing separate applications. There was no great cheer at the landing, no scene in which one person had made everything right for everybody else.

"May I cross now?" Fakira asked. "Four passengers and two small bundles on the first trip today," Madhu replied. "Feel the plank before you sit down. There is no hurry." Fakira asked where he could grasp the rope. Before reaching out his hand, Madhu explained its position. Fakira boarded and sat down at his own pace. Naira remained on the bank; she had no immediate need to cross. Hira checked the line for the load, and the boat slowly left the shore.

On that ancient bank of the Ganga, Guha's boat too was moving forward. Rama sat with Sita and Lakshmana; on the bank, the people drying fishing nets went on with their work. Guha himself held the oar and looked back once. The shore was not empty. He owed friendship to those he was carrying across; he did not cease to owe responsibility to those he was leaving behind. He told the young boatman that, on their return, the woman who lifted the nets must be given her share of the food. That day, the ordinary hours of work continued alongside friendship.

In Videhapur, when the boat carrying Fakira had reached the opposite bank and returned, Madhu took down the notice promising free passage and placed it inside his ledger. "Does that mean the assistance is stopped?" the employee asked. "No. Anyone who needs to reach a hospital urgently should go first. Write a proposal that the cost be met from the town's relief fund. Put up the fare openly for those who will pay their own passage. Unaccounted expenses must not be deducted from the boatmen's wages." The employee said again that the office's approval would be needed. "Then it is a proposal," Madhu said clearly, "not an order."

Hira showed Naira the limit marked on a wooden strip. "The water changes every day. Today's inspection cannot guarantee tomorrow's safety." "I shall write that," Naira said, "but you must identify for yourself what needs checking." Hira entered the current water level, the boat's load and the time of the next inspection in the measurement register. Naira examined its public copy; she did not ask for the private names of passengers. A separate receipt was issued for the plank-workers' daily wages. No date was fixed for producing the original loan agreement in Rita's case; she received only an acknowledgement of her request.

As evening came on, the raised platform at the landing began to empty. Nandu's child was drying the wet corner of the schoolbag beside the fire; Hari counted his earnings into the box reserved for books. Madhu asked both men to meet again about the time allotted for a stage performance the following week. “First we shall look at the school holiday hours,” Nandu replied. On her way home, Rita kept the papers safe in her bag. She had not won her case, but neither had she accepted a debt entry without proof. These small refusals along the riverbank were as real as the day’s earnings.

When Naira returned to the room at Railway Square, Sarita was tempering the lentils. Sanket was drawing a boat on a sheet of paper. “How many people crossed?” he asked. “Four on the first trip,” Naira said. “But today I learned that the conditions mattered more than the number.” “Eat your rice and tell me who laid down those conditions,” Sarita said. Naira recounted separately what Madhu, Fakira and Hira had said. When she came to the two names for a river in Renu’s old letter, Sarita asked, “Has Tilwaha changed its name again?” “No,” Naira said. “That is an old letter from another place. I must not put on the map what I do not know.”

Sanket left an empty place in the boat he had drawn. “Who is that for?” Sarita asked. “The person who rows the boat every day needs somewhere to sit, too,” he replied. “I kept giving all the passengers a place in the picture and forgetting the boatman.” Sarita laughed. Naira took the proposed slip for Fakira’s hearing out of her bag and placed it on the table. The time had not yet been confirmed; the work across the river was not finished in a day either. Yet the boat had run that day, an erroneous ‘free service’ order had been returned to the status of a proposal, and five people had spoken about their rights to their labour or their names without erasing one another’s identities.

Chapter 27 · Shabari's Dawn

One dawn in Dandakaranya, Shabari was separating wet firewood into two piles. Wood that had dried through to its heart was laid beside the hearth; pieces whose bark still held the night's rain were spread upon a raised bamboo frame to await the sun. The hermitage had only one hearth, but the mornings of those who depended upon it began at different hours. One person brought water, another stitched leaves together, another prepared a warm poultice for a sick child. The guest had not yet arrived. The work was already under way.

When Shabari had first come to this place, she had been shown where to gather fruit, but no one had clearly answered her questions: where the fruit was to be left, who would distribute it, and what was to become of any that ripened too far. One year's rains had spoiled a store of grain. Since that day she had set aside separate places for seed, dried roots and drinking water. People still bowed their heads in reverence to the memory of Matanga, the hermitage's teacher, on a morning such as this. But to kindle a hearth one needed dry fuel, not memory.

"Will you wait beside the path again today?" Karuna asked as she washed the leaves. Her mother had an old injury to her leg, and Karuna wanted to take her midday medicine home. "I shall keep watch," Shabari said. "But you must leave at your usual time. The guest's arrival is something I wish for; it is not a debt you owe." Karuna laughed. "Will you be able to say that in front of the visitor too?" For a little while Shabari said nothing. "I will," she answered. "If I cannot, the work of the morning will slip out of my hands."

Shabari remembered the first dispute she had had with her teacher. After the rains, the finest fruit from the hermitage orchard was always chosen first for visitors; the women's plates were left with what had fallen or broken. One day she had asked why the hunger of those who served was reckoned less. The teacher had answered that they must all decide the question together. Nothing changed that day, but little by little those who worked outside throughout the day began to have their portions set aside first when the morning fruit was divided. When Shabari remembered words, she remembered small changes such as these along with them.

The wind stirred along the forest path. Through the sound of falling leaves came the footsteps of two people in the distance. A young man from the hermitage ran up to say that two travellers carrying bows were asking where to find water. Shabari did not seize the basket of fruit and rush out. She first gave Karuna the poultice for her injured mother, then looked at the rice on the hearth. "Set aside what we ourselves need," she told the women sitting in the courtyard. "The guest's meal can be prepared from what remains."

While washing the courtyard for the visitors, Mriga tightened the binding around an old broom. "All my life I have been told that everyone in the hermitage is equal," she said to Shabari. "But when it is time to pick the fruit, it is my hands; when it is time to tell the story, it is somebody else's name." Shabari said, "Speak for yourself. Even if the visitors give no answer, your question will still stand." Mriga went a little way and stopped. It was not as though she had suddenly been granted some new right; but she had gained courage to put the question into her own words.

Rama and Lakshmana came along the path to the hermitage. Their bodies were dusty from travel, and in their eyes was concern for someone absent. Shabari set out water. "Wash your hands and faces first," she said. "There is a great deal of dust on this path." Rama thanked her. Lakshmana asked where the hermitage drew its water. "Down the slope," Shabari replied. "But a tree fell across that path last night, so those bringing water now come by the upper bend." Her answer held a map of the forest, not some mystery descended from heaven in bodily form.

Rising from the hearth, Karuna asked, "What would you like to eat?" Lakshmana said that whatever was available would do. Hearing this, Shabari said, "Not everything that is available belongs to a guest. Some of this fruit has been kept for the sick. These roots have been cooked on the hearth, and we can offer you some of the fruit." Rama looked towards the basket; for a moment his gaze rested there, as though all the hands behind an ordinary meal had become visible to him together for the first time.

"Why have you waited for so many days?" Rama asked. Shabari replied, "My teacher said that one day guests would come with whom it would be important to speak. But in the meantime, the people who came here every day went on being hungry. I could not turn them away in the name of waiting." Rama looked at her. She continued, "It is good that you have come today. Tomorrow you will leave, and the hearth will burn as it did before."

Mriga, the youngest woman in the courtyard, spoke up about the work they had shared. "Everyone will tell the visitors' story afterwards. I picked the fruit, Karuna brought the water, Shabari cleaned the roots. Will anyone even ask my name?" She was not shy; she merely wanted an answer. "What is your name?" Rama asked. "Mriga," she said. "And I know the paths through the forest." Lakshmana asked her about the way ahead. Mriga described the marshy ground beyond a large rock and warned them that the short, straight path in the rains deceived travellers like a trap.

Shabari served the meal on leaves. Karuna set aside her own portion and left for her mother's home. No one detained her in the name of honouring the guests. After the meal, Mriga divided up the task of washing the earthen vessels. When Rama and Lakshmana asked about the forest path ahead, Shabari told them what she knew, without adding conjecture where her knowledge ended. The time for their departure was drawing near; that did not mean the hermitage's clock had stopped.

As he was leaving, Rama said, "Your service will be remembered." Shabari answered, "It is good to remember service. But the hands that light the fire need time to rest as well. When you visit another home, ask about that too." Lakshmana asked Mriga to explain the landmarks once more. With a twig she traced the turnings in the earth. The two travellers departed. Shabari counted the fruit that remained, filled the water jars, and said to Mriga, “Take the evening off from the hearth today. I shall do my share.”

That week a small kitchen had been opened at Railway Square in Videhapur to distribute meals at dawn and in the evening. Sarita, who had left her house and was living in a temporary room, arrived with an empty container. She had not come to beg for food but to examine the grain accounts; containers holding medicinal dressings and drinking water, together with the rice, were standing in the same veranda. After crossing the river by boat with Fakira, Naira had understood that a shortage of food was not the kitchen's only problem. Someone brought the grain, someone unloaded the burdens, someone received the bread: each person's time was different.

Inside the kitchen were three hearths. Dal simmered on the first, rice on the second, and water was being heated on the third. Urmila had not come with the hospital linen, but an old, clean piece of cloth she had sent was being used to lift hot vessels. She had already made it quite clear that a patient's linen and kitchen cloths must never be kept together. Sarita saw the separate mark on the cloth and smiled. The dispute over Urmila's wages remained unresolved, yet the practical rule she had given was protecting everyone at work here.

A board outside the kitchen read: “Community Meals — Service Free of Charge.” Beneath it two men were counting five sacks. “There were seven,” one said. “Two have disappeared.” Meera Banjara pulled her handcart to one side. “Did the paper list seven sacks of rice, or seven sacks of different goods?” she asked. “Open them and look before you suspect us.” On her cart were separate bundles of flour, salt and dry firewood.

When Naira arrived, she first noticed the fear on people's faces. She remembered the earlier affair of Champa's private message. She asked Meera, “May I write your name in a public notice?” “Put it in today's account of the goods,” Meera said. “Not on a poster making accusations.” Sarita said, “Count the grain first. People are hungry.” An elderly woman stood by the board holding a small plate. She was given bread before the argument continued.

Kedar Bauri was repairing a broken plank in one corner of the veranda. Three migrant labourers were with him; they had still not been paid for earlier repair work. A fresh blister had risen over an old wound in Kedar's palm. “Will this be entered as free service too?” he asked, looking at the board. “Today is a day of relief,” the manager said. “Everything cannot be governed by accounts.” “Relief meals are one thing,” Kedar replied, “and wages for hammering down planks are another. I am not asking for bread because my stomach is empty. I am asking for the price of my work.”

Sarita set down her container and sat beside Kedar. “How many hours?” “Three today. And payment for the previous four days is being withheld,” he said. Ramu, a young worker who had come with Kedar, showed his time slip, its edges soaked through. Naira did not reach out to take it. “Keep your copy,” she said. “If you wish, I can help you examine the wording of a written application.” “First give us enough room to write in every hour,” Ramu said. The manager's form had a box headed “Volunteer,” but none headed “Worker.”

Meanwhile Poonam Chidimar arrived with a thin length of netted cloth folded against her chest. She sewed covers to protect sacks of fruit and grain from sun and rain. Seeing her surname, the manager asked, “Your people catch birds, don't they?” Poonam opened the folds and showed him the fine stitching. “I made this. What my family used to do is another story. Today I sew covers and send my child to school. If you wish, write the old story beside my name, but do not record today's occupation incorrectly.”

Poonam's daughter stood nearby, wearing wooden sandals and reading a page from her schoolbook. “Mother, how do you spell ‘free of charge’?” the girl asked. Poonam said, “Those entitled to this meal will receive it free; but the people who cook it and bring it here do not labour for nothing.” The child studied the letters. Sarita burst into laughter. “You'd need a very large notebook to write down the meaning of that phrase,” she said. Laughing too, the girl tucked the page into her schoolbag.

Shanti Bote arrived just then, having stepped ashore from a boat. River sand clung to her sandals. She laid a slip of paper on the table. “Two sacks were on the far bank,” she said. “A man from the settlement delivered one, and I carried the other. The unloading charge for these two sacks is entered separately. When the seal is dry, enter it in the ledger on my return.” The manager checked the figures on the slip. In the first count it had been assumed that all seven sacks had reached Videhapur at once. In fact, five were here and two at the distribution point across the river.

Loosening the rope of her handcart, Meera said, “My signature is against the goods that arrived here. Why should I answer for sacks left across the river?” Shanti said, “And who decided my unloading charge? The people who count five sacks count their own hours, but forget the hours spent on both banks of the river.” Naira asked that Shanti's slip and the register of delivered goods be placed on separate tables. “One register records the amount of food, the other the cost of transport. Do not turn them both into a single story of blame,” she said.

Fakira arrived, his stick tapping steadily. From the sounds of Railway Square he could tell where the next turning towards the kitchen lay. When someone moved to take his hand, he stopped them. “First tell me which side the hearth is on,” he said. “I shall find my way.” Poonam's daughter counted aloud the stone steps in that direction. “What's cooking today?” Fakira asked. “Chickpeas and rice,” the girl replied. “Then give me one bowl of chickpeas and half a portion of rice,” Fakira said. “Let me decide what my stomach needs.”

Someone proposed a new rule for the kitchen: if a person took only half a plate, a red mark should be put against their name, so that they would not receive a full grain allowance on the next occasion. Sarita intervened. “A person's need for food changes. Taking half a plate does not make someone entitled to only half their rights. Record the amount of food distributed, not a fault in the body." Kedar added, "And someone who has no appetite is no reason to deduct the wages of the worker who keeps the hearth going." For the first time the manager looked away from the board and into the faces of the people.

A woman warming herself by the fire in the veranda said that news of the supposedly missing sacks had already spread through the square. "Some people are naming Meera's group." Meera spoke at once. "If anyone has something to say, let them say it to my face. But first show me the original count." Instead of taking out her phone to issue a public notice, Naira compared two lines in the register: five sacks received here, two received at the place across the river. There were entry numbers on all three papers. Shanti covered the private passengers' names on her boat-fare slip and showed only the goods entry.

The count was made again. None of the seven sacks had disappeared. The town's talk of "two sacks stolen" proved false. "Now put the result where people can see it," Meera said. "Suspicion spreads in an hour. How many days will a correction take?" The manager pinned a new sheet behind the board: "ERROR IN COUNTING. ALL SEVEN SACKS ACCOUNTED FOR AT POINTS OF RECEIPT OR DISTRIBUTION. ALLEGATION OF THEFT FALSE." "Write that the error was in the counting, not against my name," Meera said. The sheet was amended accordingly.

But correcting the false accusation did nothing to settle Kedar's wages. In a temporary ledger the manager created a separate heading: "Repair Labour." Kedar entered his three hours there; Ramu made a clean copy of his damp time slip. The group's application for the four preceding days' arrears would go before the next meeting. "All that has happened today," Kedar said, "is that my work has acquired a name. The day I receive my money is still far away." Sarita replied, "And if the price does not follow the name, we shall ask again."

The smell of chickpeas bursting on the hearth rose into the air. Poonam knotted the edge of her netted fabric, but did not give away her new cover for nothing. Meera had its measurements and price entered on a separate slip. Shanti said that she would name her rate once she had seen the time needed to lift goods on both banks at dawn. Meera asked when her transport cart might connect with Shanti's boat. They considered a partnership, but agreed only that each would first write down her own expenses. Neither would entrust her entire family's route to the other's hands.

Poonam's daughter asked whether their kitchen would operate every day. No one could give a definite answer. "The morning meal could be connected to the work we do," Meera said. "And it would be good if, once a year, all the families met to examine the accounts of the kitchen, the landing and the warehouse again." "An annual meeting is fine," Kedar said, "but don't withhold daily wages until then." Shanti added, "The river does not rise at the same time on every day of the year. When you choose a date for a collective gathering, listen to the people who work at the landing." No date was fixed; they agreed only to put the proposal before the next meeting.

Towards evening, Kedar's companion Ramu sat in the kitchen veranda, drawing an old path in the earth with his finger. “They have stopped us bringing dry wood from beside this forest,” he said. “Rules to protect trees are not wrong,” Poonam replied. “But who will grant permission for fuel for our hearths and materials for our work?” “If the path has been closed,” Meera said, “the first thing to reckon with is the water and labour of those who travel on foot.” This discussion was becoming a question about how the paths would be allotted the following day. As yet, no one had decided to break a rule.

As Meera was turning her cart to go home, her younger sister called from behind. “At the next market, I want to sell goods by my own route.” Meera was about to say that everyone in a partnership ought to follow the same road; instead, she paused and asked, “How much can you carry?” Her sister told her the weight of the goods and the cost of transport. “Come with me for two days and look at the expense book,” Meera said. “Then decide according to your own reckoning.” This short conversation produced no immediate agreement, but neither was the sister's separate path refused.

Naira returned to the room with Sarita. Sanket was making a paper basket, with little separate name labels inside it for a boatman, a woman who carried goods, and a woman who blew the hearth into flame. “Were the seven sacks found?” he asked. “All seven were counted,” Naira replied. “We had been looking in two wrong places.” Sanket turned his basket over and examined it. “If we write something in a ledger, do we have to write the name of the person who carried it?” Sarita said, “Before writing a name, we must understand that person's permission and what the work means.”

Fakira had finished his half portion of rice. The sound of the little girl's laughter was still coming from the kitchen. “Eating half a plate of rice hasn't made me half a man,” he said. “If the chickpeas are good tomorrow, I'll ask for a full portion.” Sarita filled a vessel with plain water for him. For the first time, the woman who managed the kitchen's work sat down in the middle of the veranda with her own plate. No one ordered her to rise again.

In the distant hermitage of Dandakaranya, evening had fallen, and Shabari too was cleaning the hearth. Mriga sent one slice of the last ripe fruit she had reserved for herself to Karuna's mother's home, and offered the other to Shabari. “The visitors have gone,” Mriga said. “Who has a right to this fruit now?” Shabari ate her slice and laughed. “First, those who are hungry, those whose labour has gone into it, and those who have a voice in how it is shared,” she said. For a little while they were both silent. The wet bark laid over the wood had begun to dry. There was still the problem of the next morning's meal, but on this night no one would leave their plate untouched and go to sleep hungry.

Chapter 28 · Hidimba's Pact

Far from Dandakaranya, at a resting place along the Pandavas' journey through the forest, Hidimba was gathering three pieces of broken bamboo before dawn. The path beside the roots of a tree had been damaged in the quarrel of the day before yesterday. Two children had gone that way to collect tubers, and she pressed the earth down with her feet, showing them a new turn in the path. The marks of the night's violence were still visible on the bark. Hidimb was dead; for his sister, his death had brought no end to the forest's hunger or fear, nor to her responsibility for its paths.

Bhima came carrying a vessel of water in one hand. "Shall I lift the bamboo?" Hidimba looked at him. "Lift it, but I shall tell you where it must go. Your arms are strong, but my eyes know the ways of this earth." Bhima picked it up without replying. He had begun fitting together two hollows at the side when Hidimba stopped him again. "This turning must remain open for the pregnant deer. We do not close the paths of every other creature merely to make a shorter path for people." Bhima laid the bamboo down in another direction.

The attraction that had arisen between them had not made Hidimba forget her brother. She had refused his cruel command to kill the strangers; even so, it seemed harsh to her to turn his death into a song of victory. Bhima asked, "Do you wish to come with me?" Hidimba said, "The question is not whom I shall follow. The question is what kind of bond I may have with you while remaining here in my own forest."

Kunti was sitting beside the fire, cleaning the husks from rice. When Hidimba approached, Kunti rose to offer her a seat. "I can sit here," Hidimba said, and sat on the earth. She set out her wishes without circumlocution. She accepted Bhima's love, but need not leave the forest to go with him; if they had a child, the mother's word about the child's upbringing and name must be heard first; and no child would be considered conscripted at birth into the army of any lineage.

This was not easy for Bhima. He could not see how to divide his time between his duties to his brothers and the time owed to Hidimba's home. Hidimba noticed the mark of a thorn on his hand. "Does it hurt?" she asked. "It is nothing," Bhima said. As she drew out the thorn, Hidimba said, "A hand that protects others is not diminished by admitting its own wound. Tell me what promise you can actually keep." For the first time Bhima spoke of his difficulty without turning it into a tale of valour. "I cannot abandon the journey with my brothers. But when I am here, I will not remain merely a guest in your forest." Hidimba handed him a wooden vessel. "Then fill this with water and bring it back. We shall speak of the rest of the promise."

Yudhishthira had been listening. His first question was, "Our journey must continue. How, then, will this relationship be sustained?" Hidimba placed a thin sheet of bark before him. “Do not promise what cannot be sustained. Let the time of staying, the conditions of departure and the respect due at a future meeting all be stated clearly. Let us begin the child's future with the child's rights, not with our fears.” Nakula asked, “Where will we find paper here?” Hidimba laughed. “This is bark, not paper. And if people refuse to honour what is written, how is that the bark's fault?”

Kunti examined the split on the back of the bark. Hidimba called for a woman of her community who made marks to preserve agreements. The elder first repeated Hidimba's words, then listened separately to Bhima and Kunti. Bhima said he would not conceal the obligations of his journey, and that while he stayed he would respect Hidimba's decisions concerning the forest's welfare. Kunti promised not to deny the mother's rights in raising a child. The elder made three marks on the bark: consent to stay, honesty in parting, and the child's own future. This was not the seal of a royal court; it was a memory laid before witnesses.

Hidimba folded the bark. “If one day you call upon our child's name in a time of danger,” she told Bhima, “ask the child before summoning them. Giving one's blood is no tax imposed by birth.” Bhima remained silent for a long while. Then he said, “I have heard you. I am here today; tell me what share I can take in today's work.” Hidimba pointed to the remaining pieces of broken bamboo. On the first morning of love, making this path passable again was no small answer for her.

Videhapur, the monsoon of 2039. The question of firewood raised in the Rail Square communal kitchen the previous evening received its answer at dawn from a notice nailed to a gate: “FOREST-EDGE ROAD CLOSED. ACTION WILL BE TAKEN AGAINST UNAUTHORISED ENTRY.” The lower corner of the paper was wet. The date was clear, but splashes had erased the next line identifying the office of the issuer. Ramu stood there with an empty handcart. Behind him came Meera Banjara's sister carrying a sack; it contained no firewood, only empty baskets bought for the kitchen.

Kedar Bauri said, “Yesterday I was told to enter what I was owed for fixing the planks. Today the very road to the kitchen is closed.” Meera did not interrupt him. “The two matters are connected, but keep their accounts separate. An application for wages will not be settled simply by opening a gate.” While they were discussing this, Batohi Dhami arrived with two empty honey vessels and a long bamboo hook. Its end was smooth so that it would not tear the bark of the trees.

Reading the notice, Batohi said, “I take this road to gather honey. There are old beehives on some of the trees, though the yield is not the same every year. Today I am not going to cut a hive; I am going to check the vessels I left there.” The guard standing at the gate said, “Your name is not on the list.” Batohi asked, “Who made this list, and where can I submit an objection?” The guard had only a duty slip issued two days earlier. He had no authority to invent an order of his own.

Devaki Pal had halted her goats some distance from the gate. Their hooves were sinking into the wet earth. “If we go round this way, we shall reach the pasture,” she said, “but during the rains the channel behind it stays full. I will not take the animals that way.” In her bag was a copy of an old water-route record. The word “Khairi” was written at its head. She had found the paper among her mother's family's accounts of seasonal grazing routes; she did not know whether it bore any geographical relation to the Tilwaha of Videhapur.

Tara read the words on the paper carefully. “The value of this name is that it may help us understand the old conditions governing access here. It is not proof that the Tilwaha flowed under that name,” she said. Devaki breathed more easily. “I do not need a new name for the river. I need to know how to get the animals safely to water.” She stroked a goat's neck. A little goat was chewing at the end of her sari; laughing, Devaki gently pushed it away.

A girl who had come with Devaki was counting water containers. “Two here for the animals, and three for people,” she said. The gatekeeper asked, “Do all of you live in the forest?” Devaki replied, “Our home is in the village. A grazing route does not determine where we live.” As she handed out water, the girl noticed Batohi's empty vessels. “Didn't you go to fetch honey?” “They would not even let me see whether the hive is still there today,” Batohi said. The girl asked, “If someone says the tree belongs to him, do the bees become his as well?” Batohi laughed. “We shall have to ask the bees. But before taking a hive, we need to understand the rules of the forest and of the people who use it.”

Meanwhile, Tulsi Tajpuriya climbed down from the driver's seat of a small goods vehicle. The next journey scheduled to bring medicines along the unpaved forest-edge road was approaching, though today his vehicle carried sacks of grain. “This gate concerns more than firewood,” he said. “If you close every road here, the vehicle will have to go through the town's narrow lanes, where schoolchildren walk.” The guard said, “I cannot decide an alternative route for the vehicle.” Tulsi answered, “Then let the person who can make that decision come here.”

Rosie Lalbegi was shaking the collected water from her umbrella. She worked under contract, collecting separately sorted rubbish from the nearby rooms, and her community also had its own tradition of religious identification. The young man filling out a temporary register at the gate made an assumption from her name and put her religion and occupation into a single box. Before taking up the pencil, Rosie asked, “Will you write what I tell you, or what you think you know?” The young man started.

“Yes, tell me.” Rosie pointed to each entry in turn. “My work is sorting waste, but that is not my religion. My surname determines neither of those things. I need to take the materials for my work through this gate every day.” The young man crossed out his earlier supposition and entered the information she gave him on a separate line. Signing her name, Rosie said, “This is not only about whether I am allowed inside. The names of the people counted here must be correct.”

Mangari Gorait arrived at the gate last of all, although her work had been obstructed before anyone else's. She had once led a sorting and cleaning team at the now-closed factory on the edge of the forest. After the factory shut down, she had never been able to obtain its book of outstanding payments. The outer wall of those premises was now being used as part of the new gate across the forest road. “Who ordered this door closed?” she asked the guard. “I don't know,” he replied. Mangari said, “I will not blame the man guarding the wall of the factory that withheld my team's wages. But neither will I surrender my right to ask the name of the person who owns the door.”

When Naira arrived, she did not take out her phone at once. Her mistake in violating Mahesh's conditions for his safety at the last meeting still pained her. She asked Batohi, “May I see your vessels and the map of your route?” Batohi showed her his copy, but on condition that she did not reveal the exact location of the hives. “If a crowd gathers where the hive is, both the bees and the people will be harmed,” he said. On her map Naira marked only the turning that gave access to the area, not the location of the hive.

Gomati arrived too. Rainwater was swirling in the ditch outside the gate. “The new earth piled up here seems to have changed the slope,” she said. “I will not say so with certainty merely from looking. We need measurements.” Tara went down beside her. In the copy of the old drainage record she carried, this bend had no name. As they investigated, the two women marked three features separately: the gate, the ditch and the public footpath. Aditi's inspection papers were not yet at the gate; no one attached her name to an order on the strength of an assumption.

As the crowd in front of the gate grew, a man called out, “Let us all break the lock.” Batohi refused at once. “Then the path to water, honey and pasture for the goats will disappear into a quarrel. What we need today is written evidence of our demand.” Mangari said, “Breaking a lock will not open my wage ledger.” Turning his vehicle key in his palm, Tulsi said, “The goods in my vehicle have to be delivered today. How long is the crowd going to stand here?”

Poonam Chirimar from the kitchen arrived carrying measurements for the netted fabric prepared for the evening meal. She laughed when she saw the guard's torn raincoat. “You guard the gate while your own shoulders are getting soaked.” “The requisition for a raincoat has been held up too,” the guard said. Poonam asked, “If I sew it, will I be paid?” The guard could not decide what payment she should receive. That brief exchange of laughter eased the crowd a little, but the road remained closed.

Meera proposed that everyone should first set down the particulars of their own work, and only then prepare a joint application. Batohi's honey vessels, Devaki's grazing route, Tulsi's transport, Rosie's regular work and Mangari's factory arrears were entered on separate lines. Kedar wanted to record the outstanding payment for his repairs as well. Meera did not stop him, but had a separate application number assigned to it. “Giving five injustices one name does not make any one of them smaller,” she said.

A woman who had worked with Mangari showed her old identity card. Mistaking it for an entry pass, an employee stepped forward. “This is an old employment identity card, not a pass granting passage,” Mangari said. “Do not mislead everyone by holding it up.” The employee asked for an earlier register. It emerged that the gate's security arrangements were covered by contract papers, but no independent order closing the public path was shown in that file. The discovery did not open the gate by itself, but it weakened the rumour that the closure was a final prohibition imposed by the forest department.

Naira asked, “What is the written procedure for obtaining a copy?” The employee was not authorised to answer. He went inside to fetch the main office's receipt book. The wait was long. Tulsi decided to turn his vehicle along another road through town so that the grain could arrive on time; he entered the additional freight cost separately, with the question of who should pay it left open. “On a day when I am carrying patients, I will not make such a diversion without discussing safety first,” he said, and drove away. His decision did not avert the coming dispute over transport. It revealed its first cost.

Rahina Thakurai, who had once worked in Mangari's old factory, also came to the gate. She made copies of documents and had previously transcribed the proceedings of public meetings. Mangari asked her to examine a copy of an incomplete stamp on the margin of the old wage register. Rahina said, “I can copy the letters, but I cannot tell which office had authority to use this stamp without seeing the original.” Mangari turned the paper to show her. Three months of unpaid wages had been combined in a single column, with no separate amount due to each worker. Mangari decided that before the next meeting every worker in her team would write down their own days of labour. The lock on the gate would open no wage slip, but during this wait her old claim began to take shape again.

After noon, a woman employee from the office came out herself. Having examined the guard's slip, she said that the security of the warehouse inside the premises and the legal status of the old communal footpath would be investigated separately. For the present, only a team conducting measurements and inspections could pass through one corner of the gate; the restriction on general entry remained in force. She assigned a receipt number to the application and accepted the request for a copy of the papers within three days. Mangari asked, “And if no answer comes in three days?” The employee said, “The time is written on the receipt. Ask again on the strength of that.”

Devaki took her goats towards the ditch, but would not lead them into the deep water. Turning an empty honey vessel in his hands, Batohi said, “I never got to see the hive today. Whether the honey will wait for me until evening, I cannot say.” Rosie asked him, “What is in the empty vessel?” Batohi laughed. “Tomorrow's hope.” “Then keep it safe,” Rosie said. “It is hard to keep a ledger of what hope is owed.” They both laughed.

Meanwhile, a young man turned a camera towards the crowd and declared, “Show everyone. These people are blocking the road.” Two families from Janaki's travelling group were passing that way with their belongings. Naira gestured for him not to take close pictures of their faces without consent. The young man filmed the gate from a distance, but Naira did not see what his phone had saved. Janaki told her group, “Get the children and the loads across first. We can argue later.” By evening, the story of the road closed at dawn could have turned into many different stories.

At the old forest encampment, as evening fell, Hidimba and Bhima returned to the path. While driving a piece of bamboo into the ground, Bhima asked, “What if one day you change your mind and wish to come with me?” Hidimba replied, “Then I shall say so. If you change your mind, you must say so too. We shall not mistake silence for a promise.” Bhima let go of the bamboo and looked at her. “You have been fighting a greater battle than I have, long before this.” Hidimba laughed. “I am making things clear not because I want to fight you, but because I want us to live together.”

She went on. One of Hidimb's former guards, a young man, stood beside the path. His question was bitter: “If you live with a stranger, what becomes of your brother's people?” Hidimba told him her decision. “I shall not erase my brother. But I shall not bring back his commands of violence either. The forest paths will remain for everyone who works on them. I shall decide who enters my home.” The young man lent a hand in lifting the bamboo. His misgivings had not disappeared, but he ceased obstructing the path to the house.

By evening in Videhapur, Meera had prepared four copies of the joint application: one for the office, one for those who used the road, one for the separate dues of the workers, and one to be entrusted to someone who had been unable to attend the hearing. Rosie asked, “Which copy will contain my private information?” Meera said, “Only the register for which you gave your permission.” Batohi had the location of the hive removed; Devaki specified the season when the grazing route was used; Mangari kept the old claim for unpaid wages separate.

As Sarita washed the kitchen utensils, she asked Naira, “Has the road opened?” “Not yet,” Naira said. “But we have found a way to demand the original document showing whose order it is.” Sarita drained the water and turned a vessel upside down. “If every question found its answer in one day, how would people go on living the next?” She did not smile. Her voice carried the weariness of experience. Naira saw a small cut on Sarita's hand, made by the edge of a container. Without speaking, she offered her a clean piece of cloth.

At night Devaki's little goat kept chewing at its new rope. Devaki quickly pulled it free and said, “I can undo this rope's knot, but tomorrow people will have to gather again to undo the knot at the gate.” Smoke rose from the distant kitchen. Tulsi's vehicle had delivered the food; Kedar's wages were still unpaid; Batohi's honey vessels remained empty. Four separate signatures on the joint application were drying on the damp table in the night. No one had handed over their forest, their livelihood or their future into another's keeping. Yet they had all spoken of coming together again to seek a passage through the next dawn.

Chapter 29 · The Child Stealer

The photograph of the forest gate, wet until late into the night, had spread by dawn through the tea stall at Railway Square like a sheet of paper laid out to dry. The stallkeeper's son held one phone before another and played the video. For a few moments Janaki's back appeared on the screen, then a child's hand; beyond them were the bamboo gate and someone's sharp cry—"Catch them!" As the video ended, a caption appeared: 'Child thief caught this morning.'

Fakira was standing in the queue for tea. Hearing the words, he looked not at the phone but at the stallkeeper's son. "Who recorded it this morning?" he asked. "It was sent today," the young man replied. "The time something is sent and the time it happened are not the same," Fakira said quietly. The young man laughed, but did not put the phone away. Two people standing nearby had already forwarded the video to another group.

At that hour Janaki was spreading her group's damp sheets in the sunshine beneath the railway bridge. The day before, at the forest gate, she had turned two families back, children and burdens together. Now she was intent on shaking the water from a sheet when a strange woman saw her from a distance and tugged at her little daughter's hand. The child faltered; her mother almost lifted her bodily and carried her away. Janaki was left with the wet sheet in her hands.

"What has happened now?" asked Sarayu, an elderly woman of the group. "Yesterday people watched us on the road," Janaki said. "Today they hide their children when they see me." Wringing out a sheet, Sarayu said, "Shall we put locks on our mouths as well, then?" Janaki did not answer. She remembered the young man's phone at the gate. He had been asked not to take photographs, but no one knew what he had recorded from how far away.

When Naira arrived, Janaki stated her conditions before anything else. "Make your enquiries, but do not put our children's faces on phones again. Last time Mahesh's words were published. The people in my group will not pay the price for that mistake." Naira took a notebook, not a phone, from her bag. "Tell me the sequence of your work that day," she said. "We can discuss making anything public afterwards, with everyone's permission." "And if we do not give permission?" Janaki asked. "Then I will not disclose names without consent."

To begin with, Janaki allowed only three things to be written down: she had reached the gate yesterday evening; in one of the two families a child was with its mother; and no abduction had taken place before her eyes. She did not want the child's name recorded. "When the crowd shouted 'Catch them,' who were they shouting at?" Naira asked. "Someone had spoken of breaking the lock on the gate," Janaki replied. "Perhaps somebody was frightened. I cannot say for certain either, without hearing the whole of what was shouted."

Behind Railway Square, in the school's temporary classroom, Meera Mandal was propping up a bamboo board. In her household she was known as Dhanuk, but in the work of running a class it was not her caste that mattered; it was the children's time for learning and the rent she had paid. For two months she had been buying the rented matting and chalk from her own earnings. Three children had failed to come to class today. Their families had said Railway Square was unsafe.

Meera showed her register. "Should a child who wants to study be kept out of the classroom because there is no permanent address? Two of these three were here yesterday. The third comes from a travelling encampment. I have written the child's name, but not a home address." "Who wrote yesterday's attendance?" Naira asked. "I did," said Meera. "But this register will not catch a child thief. It can tell us where education was interrupted—that much." She laid the damp pieces of chalk beneath the board to dry.

When Meera gave the hours of the previous day's lesson, it emerged that a child from Janaki's group had been in this classroom. There was, however, no proof that this was the child seen in the video. After a moment of eagerness to match the names, Naira stopped her pen. A school attendance entry did not establish where a child's body had been at every moment. "Will you take a photograph of my register?" Meera asked. "Only a written confirmation of the time," Naira said, "not the complete list of children."

The noise of the crowd grew. Outside the tea stall at Railway Square a young man was telling people that Janaki's group had fled the village the previous day. At that very moment Janaki herself arrived there with Meera. She set her empty bamboo basket on the ground in front of him. "If I ran away, where have I come from now?" she asked. The young man showed no embarrassment. "If the video is false, bring the child before us." Janaki's reply was fierce. "I will not turn any child into a spectacle to put your suspicions at ease."

Durga Danuwar also came into the crowd. On her shoulder was a small bundle of cut bamboo; in her hand she carried a copy of the route map. She had been bringing raw materials for baskets from the overgrown riverbank beyond, and the closing of the gate had forced her to make a detour. Someone pushed against her, saying, "The child's case first; bamboo afterwards." Durga lowered her bundle. "Bamboo afterwards, if you like. But my cart travelled along this road yesterday, carrying this very bamboo. If you want to know the time, I can tell you."

Durga showed Naira her transport receipt. It bore the date of the previous evening and the number of bundles loaded. "My cart was stopped at the gate," she said. "Janaki's people were on this side with their belongings. People were talking about opening the lock. I heard no child scream, though I remember the uproar." "Did you see everything that happened?" Naira asked. Durga smiled. “I was trying to free my cartwheel. I will not claim to have seen what I did not see.”

Naira wanted to see the video again. The stallkeeper’s son was willing to hand over his phone, but all he possessed was a forwarded copy. He did not know who had written the words ‘this morning’ above it. He showed the time displayed for the file: it was the time the phone had received it, not the time it had been made. “That tells us when it was forwarded,” Naira explained. “It cannot establish when the original recording was made.” For the first time the young man heard a question that had nothing to do with the glitter of the screen.

They went to the gate to find the original video. The watchman was drying the previous day’s soaked duty slip. Naira first asked whether he had detained anyone on an accusation of stealing a child. “My duty is to guard the road,” the watchman said. “I took no child into custody yesterday on any such charge.” Durga checked the time of her consignment. The watchman showed them the restriction on vehicle entry recorded against that hour, but refused to hand over the section bearing names without a formal request for a copy.

Then a friend who had accompanied the young man admitted that he had recorded the scene from a distance. The original file was still safe on his phone. Janaki trembled when she saw the face of a child from her group clearly visible on it. She stated her condition plainly. “We can view it together here first, but no copies are to be passed around.” The young man agreed. Padma was absent, so Naira did not pretend to be a technical expert. She simply wrote the original file’s date, the sequence of images and the owner’s account separately in her notebook.

In the original footage the rain-soaked notice on the gate, Tulsi’s cart carrying grain and Durga’s bundle of bamboo were visible together. Meera then checked the time of the cart carrying grain for the previous day’s kitchen against her food register. The circulated copy, labelled ‘this morning’, was presenting an event of the evening as though it had occurred at dawn. Three separate records of work confirmed this error of date and context. Who had circulated the video with that caption, however, was still unknown.

The mother of the child from Janaki’s group also came to the gate. She did not want to bring her child before everyone. Sitting a little apart, she spoke of her working hours, the journey the previous day and the child’s presence with her. She had no birth certificate for the child, but that did not become a pretext for forcing her into a public spectacle to prove that she was its mother. “Your private statement will be kept separately and securely,” Naira said. “We will not show the child’s face in the public correction.”

“Then what answer will you give to the words ‘thief caught’ written there?” Durga asked. “This video does not prove that a theft of a child was caught,” Naira replied. “An event that happened in the evening has been called a morning event. We will seek a correction of those two claims. Details of whose child it is are not for the public meeting.” The tension in Janaki’s palms loosened. For the first time since morning she felt a little relief from her fear. But the crowd had already sent the file onwards; it could not be recalled from every phone.

At precisely that moment another voice rose. A woman came running towards the railway bridge, sweat and dust streaking the side of her nose. “Has anyone found my son?” Without asking anyone’s name, she looked straight at Janaki. Janaki immediately stood up. The woman said her name was Lata. Her eight-year-old son, Mithun, had become separated from his family at the market near the kitchen after morning. Searching and asking after him, she had come this far.

The crowd turned towards Janaki once more. Meera stepped between them. “One moment. Write down when and where Mithun was last seen. Yesterday’s video cannot be of this child’s disappearance—the times are different.” “What do I care about the video?” Lata said. “I want my son.” Her eyes were wet, but her voice was hard. Moving her basket aside, Janaki said, “Our people will help look for your son too. Do not block the search by declaring my group guilty before it has begun.”

Lata described her son’s clothes: a blue kurta, a scarf that shed red dye when wet, and a broken strap on the sandal of his left foot. Naira wrote down these details with their time and place, but did not repeat the child’s full identifying particulars before the crowd. “Did Mithun go to the market alone, or with someone?” Fakira asked. “With my younger brother,” Lata said. “My brother went into a shop to buy oil. When he came out, the child was gone.” Nobody had yet formally spoken to the shopkeeper.

Sabina Mirshikar was returning from the market. Her bag contained a needle, cord for repairing old nets and half the money a labourer owed her. She had quarrelled the day before with a young man in her family. He had pressed her to take up prohibited hunting in the name of tradition, and she had refused. Now she looked for work in the market mending nets and binding baskets. Someone in the crowd saw her bag and said, “People like these could carry a child off from anywhere.”

Sabina opened her bag and set the needle and cord on the ground. “This is not even a fishing net,” she said. “It is cord for tying the joints of a bamboo basket. If a child is missing, I will help search. But do not pronounce a crime proved the instant you hear the name of my forebears.” Turning directly to Lata, she asked, “Have you actually been to the shop where your son was last seen?” Lata shook her head. “The crowd will not even listen to me.”

Janaki decided to go with Lata. Naira wanted to stop her—the safety of the group was at stake—but Janaki said, “If I leave, they will say I fled. If I help, someone will say I came to wipe away the traces. Where is a person supposed to live under such reckoning?” “You will not go alone,” old Sarayu said. Janaki asked that no crowd of five follow them: only Meera and Sabina should come. Lata agreed. Naira asked Fakira to make a separate check on the times at the station, on the condition that his livelihood should not be interrupted.

At the oil shop in the market, Lata’s younger brother admitted his mistake. “I left the child standing outside. I thought it would only be three minutes." The shopkeeper could not be certain of the time; he had been weighing oil for the kitchen just then. His ledger recorded the money, not the child's movements. "The water seller, the fruit seller, people crossing the street—did anyone see anything?" Meera asked. "Someone said they had seen a child in a blue kurta in the northern lane," the shopkeeper replied. "I did not see him myself."

In the lane Sabina picked up a broken sandal strap lying beside a heap of rubbish. Lata rushed towards it. "That's his!" "The colour and the way it is broken are similar," Sabina cautioned her. "That alone does not prove the child came this way. First let us see whether the strap has any distinguishing mark." Lata held it in her hand, but did not immediately allow anyone to record it as certainly belonging to her son. On a separate sheet Naira wrote: 'Possible object.'

Fakira worked out the timing from the station bell and the order in which trains had arrived. His daily work enabled him to clarify the interval between the afternoon train and the purchase of oil in the market. Even so, he could not say whether Mithun had boarded a train. "Can we get permission to look inside the carriages?" Naira asked. "First approach the railway staff in writing," Fakira replied. "Even if the child had no ticket, that does not mean he did not get on a train."

Back in her classroom, Meera drew a small map: the market, the oil shop, the water tap, the northern lane and the two roads leading to the station. When dismissing the children, she explained the ordinary rules of safety again, but did not turn Mithun's name into a public spectacle. As Durga steadied the map against the bamboo board, she said, "Do not draw yesterday's blocked forest road and today's search for a child in the same picture." "There are two maps," Meera replied. "Paths of suffering may meet. Evidence of what happened must remain separate."

Before evening Janaki and Lata reached the local assistance desk. The employee first showed them the viral video. "That video is from yesterday evening," Janaki said. "It is not the morning when this child went missing. If you wish, I can give you the written findings of the time check. But first register the report that Mithun is missing." Lata gave her son's identifying details. The employee drew up a separate report; the unproven accusation against Janaki's group was not automatically entered into it as a finding of guilt.

"When will the search begin?" Lata asked. The employee spoke of checking the possible routes and contacting the relevant police post. Naira insisted on a written acknowledgement. The employee entered the time and serial number of the complaint and handed over a copy. There was no miracle in that sheet of paper. Mithun had still not been found. But the official report of a missing child was no longer buried beneath the viral accusation against Janaki's group. Holding the paper in both hands, Lata read her son's name written upon it.

Naira prepared a second application concerning the original video from the gate. It set out the wrong time and context, the corroboration provided by the previous day's grain cart and transport records, and the demand that the child's face not be circulated without consent. Janaki listened to the whole text before approving it. "Do not write that everyone lied," she said. "Write that this recording does not establish that a child was stolen." Naira changed the sentence. She had learned that the right words, too, could sometimes keep a person's life safe.

Durga lifted her bundle of bamboo onto her shoulder again. Her signature had been on the previous day's application about the gate; today the account of her transport had helped verify the video. But the problem of access along the forest road remained precisely as it had been. "I shall go this way again," she said. "I still want a separate answer in law. No one acquires the right to stop my bamboo in the name of a child." Meera resolved to open her classroom the next day. The fear outside had not disappeared, but she refused to leave the children's schooling suspended.

Sabina gathered up her net-mending cord. As she was leaving the market, a young man asked, "So you've given everything else up and become a social worker now?" "Pay me for my work and I'll stitch your basket tomorrow," Sabina replied. "Helping for nothing today has not relieved me of the cost of feeding myself." She put the slip for her half-paid wages back in her bag. She did not receive the other half that day, but neither did she abandon her reckoning of what her skill was worth.

As evening fell, Janaki's group returned beneath the same railway bridge. Sarayu was reheating the leftover rice-and-lentil khichdi for the children. A little girl asked, "Mother, do we look bad in the photograph?" Janaki stroked her head. "A photograph is not bad. What people say about it without asking can be bad." The girl asked again, "Where is brother Mithun?" Janaki's answer was brief. "We are still looking. We shall look again in the morning."

When Naira sent word to Lata, she said only that the separate possibilities of the market, the lane and the station had been recorded for investigation. There was no news that anyone had been caught, or that anyone had been finally declared innocent. "How long before I get my son back?" Lata asked. Naira had no answer. She could give only a copy of the acknowledgement, the correct way to make contact and the time of the next enquiry. In the face of grief, the glitter of conjecture could accomplish nothing.

At night Sarita washed the water vessels and turned them upside down. When Naira returned, she asked, "Did the list of names come out today?" "No," Naira said. "Two different papers came out today. One concerns the context of a false accusation; the other, the search for a missing child." Sarita wiped the rim of a vessel with her palm. "Then keep the two papers separate. Behind a name that sends people running, someone may truly be waiting for a person to come home."

Naira placed two envelopes on the small table. The first held the application to correct the context of the viral footage; the second, a copy of the written report seeking Mithun. The original page bearing the twenty-seven names remained safely wrapped in Sarita's own cloth. No connection between it and the day's search for the child had been established. Outside, the smell of Sarayu's khichdi came mingled with the far-off sound of a railway bell. The children of Janaki's group had eaten their rice and begun to fall asleep, while in Lata's home a plate of food stood covered, waiting.

Chapter 30 · Ahalya's Voice

The morning sunlight fell upon an empty plate in Lata's courtyard. The night before, she had covered a serving of rice and kept it for Mithun. She poured away the water that had settled over the thin rice, but could not bring herself to wash the plate. A neighbour told her, "The people searching will come again." Lata looked towards the door. "Let them go to the market instead of coming here," she said. "How will looking through my house help them find someone who is not in it?"

Naira arrived carrying two separate copies of the papers: the application seeking correction of the viral video, and the report of Mithun's disappearance. Lata would not even touch the first. She studied the time written on the second. "Did nobody look for him before this hour?" Naira said, "There was a search, but this is where the official written record begins. I will not erase the interval between the two." Lata folded the paper and tucked it into her sari.

A girl from the neighbourhood, returning with a water pitcher, said that a new notice had been pasted on the market wall. Beneath the announcement of Mithun's disappearance was a blurred photograph: a man standing beside a handcart, with two children at its edge. Someone had drawn a red circle on the image. There was no government seal, but underneath was written: "Beware." Naira asked, "Who put it up?" The girl shook her head. "Everyone who reads it says it came from the authorities."

At the market Naira saw that dampness had curled the edges of the paper. Half the man's face lay in shadow in the photograph; neither child's body was fully visible. A single word below it had spread from tongue to tongue: "Kanjar." Naira reached for her phone, then stopped. To prevent a second circulation of the unauthorised image, she first copied the words of the notice into her notebook. She did not photograph the face.

A little way off, the owner of the cart was taking apart the axle of a broken wheel. His name was Mohan. Someone had told him that in this village his community's identity travelled ahead of his name. Mohan laid a screw on the ground and saw people gathering on both sides. "The wheel will be stuck again today," he told the young man working beside him. "Yesterday in the mud; today in people's talk." The young man could not laugh.

Lata's cousin went and stood before Mohan. "Is that you in the picture?" "It looks like my cart," Mohan said. "And whose children are they?" Showing his palm, slick with axle grease, Mohan replied, "To answer that, we first need the original photograph. I have a record of the days my cart was here. But why should anyone assume that I know every child ever seen standing beside it?"

Beside Mohan was a thin metal box. From it he took three slips relating to wheel repairs. One bore an earlier market date, another a payment for hire near the railway bridge, and the third the unfinished work of that morning. “Look at these,” he said. “I was pulling my cart to earn a living. Your paper does not say where the photograph was taken, when, or by whom.” Naira said, “These slips establish your work, not a complete account of any child’s movements through the day. We shall write down the two things separately.”

Instead of putting his slips away, Mohan looked at Naira’s notebook. “Yesterday I had made no accusation against anyone. Today people use my name and say, ‘Look at his caste.’ Yet the day after my name has been dragged about, I shall still have to mend a wheel.” A small bell on the cart rang as the wind touched it. No child was crying at the sight of Mohan; nevertheless, the silence of the crowd weighed more heavily than that bell.

Just then Sajid Nat entered through the market’s other gate. Brightly coloured costumes were slung over his shoulder, a small camera was in his hand, and between his fingers he held a battery cover. He trained schoolchildren in music and acting, and sometimes recorded festival performances to sell the footage to the organisers. Two days earlier he had filmed a performance. Since the previous day, a fragment of that recording had been circulating without his name.

When Sajid saw the photograph on the wall, he put his costumes down on the ground. “That picture of the cart is from the rehearsal for my play,” he said. Someone asked, “Where is your proof?” Sajid did not hand his camera to Naira. “I have the original file. But I was recording the children rehearsing. Their parents gave permission only for the rehearsal and the stage performance. If, in the name of an inquiry, I distribute the whole recording through the market, I shall be committing an injustice too.”

“You may set the conditions under which the original file is viewed,” Naira said. “I shall give you the purpose of the examination in writing.” First Sajid opened the receipt for the performance. It gave the venue, the fee and the school’s scheduled time. The cart shown in the photograph had been hired to carry theatrical materials. Mohan said, “Yes, that day my cart carried the wooden boards for the play. But you cannot recognise the date merely by looking at the photograph. Compare the receipt with the original recording.”

Since morning, the crowd had pushed aside the question of finding Mithun. When Lata herself reached the market, someone said, “Look, they’ve caught the cart man.” Lata looked at the red circle on the paper and then at the axle in Mohan’s hand. “Where is my son?” she asked. Nobody answered. “Drawing a circle around somebody’s photograph will not bring my son back,” she said. “If anyone knows anything, let them tell us the time and the place.”

Her question brought back to Naira an old story she had heard from Sarita in childhood. It was the story of Ahalya. But Sarita used to say that those who told the story often said least about Ahalya herself. Now Naira wondered: when the judgement upon a person's life has been fashioned in another voice, through which doorway may that person's own voice return?

Long ago, in a forest where fine dust and green grass grew together beside a sage's hermitage, Ahalya was wiping one corner of a platform plastered with earth and cow dung at dawn. Many people knew the name of the place. But it was those who worked there who knew in which season the water rose, when the paddy was pounded, and who gathered firewood on winter nights. Ahalya had watched their days and nights pass.

After a visitor had come, an accusation had been raised against her. The men of the hermitage told different versions. Some spoke of a disguise, others of recognition, while still others merely repeated Gautama's anger. Ahalya tried in her memory to separate a man's voice from the hour of his arrival. Memory did not make everything plain; what one considered alone was not the same as what became an accusation before the world.

After Gautama's anger, no assembly was convened at the hermitage in which she might answer. People went on talking; few troubled themselves to hear what Ahalya wished to say. Some called her stone, some a sinner. Ahalya saw that when a person was called a stone instead of by her name, people ceased asking about her food, her fear, her sleep and her sorrow. There were many ways to tell the story here; her life would not fit into only one of them.

Much later Rama and Lakshmana came to that place. Standing beside a vessel of water, Rama bowed to Ahalya. The people waiting outside the hermitage immediately declared, "She has been redeemed." Ahalya looked towards them. For years she had been denied the chance even to hear that word, yet it was no complete answer. She invited Rama to sit and offered Lakshmana water from the pitcher.

"How long have you been alone here?" Rama asked. Ahalya answered, "If I spend my days counting them, who will keep account of the work I have done in those days? You have come: that belongs to the present. But have you already accepted as truth everything that has been said about me?" Rama was silent. The vessel of water did not tremble in Lakshmana's hand, but his eyes turned away.

Ahalya went on. "There is fear in my memory, and confusion, and the pain of my own decisions. Where I am uncertain, I do not wish to speak with certainty. But why should those who wrote the story of my punishment without asking me be regarded as the sole owners of every account?" Rama replied, "I am standing here to listen." "Then listen first," Ahalya said. "And when you tell the story afterwards, consider where you will place my voice within it."

An elderly woman from the hermitage came to them carrying a bundle of dry kindling. She told Rama, "I have never known her as a stone. In the dry years it was she who tended the rope of the forest well. When the water ran out, it was she who worried over how more might be found." Ahalya smiled at the old woman for the first time. "Do not ask for testimony to that," she said. "To see another's work, you must observe not merely a face but the passing days."

As she loosened her bundle of kindling, the old woman said, "Many people know the ground on which this hermitage stands. But when the floods came, they asked Ahalya where the path would still run. Now that guests have arrived, everyone wants to tell her story in their own words." Ahalya stepped forward and set aside a broken twig from the bundle. "If anyone asks me, I shall speak," she answered. "But the days of my life contain more than a single accusation. If guests come here again, I shall decide for myself when I wish to serve them food."

As Rama prepared to leave, he rose as though to say something. Ahalya did not stop him. She said only, "Wherever you repeat my story, repeat my question too. If justice is completed merely by the touch of another, where in it is the voice of the one whose life has passed?" Sunlight spread outside. The work of the hermitage was not finished. The old woman went to put away her kindling; Ahalya too lifted the vessel with which she fetched water.

At the market in Videhapur, Sajid set his camera on a small table. Janaki, Lata, Meera and Mohan sat around it. Naira first wrote down that those present would view only the timing and sequence of the images; no copies showing the children's faces or names would be taken away. Once he had switched on the camera, Sajid said, "Whoever cuts up what I have made and sells it is selling more than my labour. They are selling the children's trust as well."

The original recording showed Mohan's cart, the construction of a bamboo gate and the children rehearsing for a school play. Sajid paused the screen and pointed out the theatrical signboard. "What looks like a red cloth in this photograph is the stage curtain. The viral footage of Janaki's group by the forest gate is a different recording; this stage photograph is not part of it. The notice that Mithun had disappeared dates from the day after this performance." Meera compared the attendance record for her school class with the time on Sajid's performance receipt. The two times agreed.

Naira made it clear that the photograph showed Mohan's cart at a rehearsal on another day, and could not sustain the claim that Mohan had taken Mithun away. Lata asked her to repeat the sentence. "Write that the photograph was displayed in the wrong context. Do not write that the search for my son is over." Naira wrote two separate lines. After reading the paper, Mohan said, "I do not need grand words declaring that my innocence has been proved. Let people read only this: the picture from which the accusation arose does not support that accusation."

The person who had pasted up the notice had still not been identified. A shopkeeper said a young man had left the paper there in the evening, but he had not seen the whole of his face. Sajid's original file offered no evidence as to whose hand had drawn the red circle on the photograph. Naira entered the matter as "unknown", not under speculation. She remembered her earlier mistake in publishing Mahesh's words prematurely. This time she would not attach another name to the affair for the sake of a small victory.

Mohan asked for the notice to be taken down. Some said it should remain until Mithun was found. Mohan answered, "My cart and the missing child are two different matters. Why should an injustice against my name remain in place while everyone waits for the day the child comes home?" With the market shopkeepers' agreement, the misleading photograph was removed. In its place, with Lata's permission, they posted only a general notice giving a contact point and time for information about the search, without a face marked out for suspicion.

Sajid also had in his bag a slip recording an outstanding payment for the performance that day. When he went to the organiser, the man said, "Now that everyone has seen your video, who is going to pay for it again?" Sajid answered plainly, "Permission to use the images and payment for my labour are two different matters. My work has been used to disgrace someone publicly; that does not make it free." He entrusted a second copy of his receipt to Meera for safekeeping. The dispute remained unsettled, but the question of who owned his work had been put in writing for the first time.

As he gathered his coloured costumes, Sajid asked Mohan, "Will you still hire out your cart to me?" Mohan smiled at the corner of his eyes. "First pay the last hire charge. And don't hang that red cloth in another photograph and bring an accusation down on my head again." "In the next play," Sajid said, "we shall have a boat instead of a cart." Mohan answered at once, "Get the boatman's consent first. Otherwise his name will become a spectacle too." They laughed together for a little while. The hire was still unpaid, but ease had returned to their faces for the first time.

At a corner of the market Janaki arrived with Sarayu, the elderly woman of her group. "The accusing notice has been taken down," Sarayu said. "But when our child goes to school tomorrow, what will people call her?" Meera answered, "I shall open the class again. I shall enter the children in the attendance book under their own names, not under the name of an offence." Janaki fell silent at the answer. She felt relief, but the face of the little girl who had been frightened beneath the railway bridge at night was still before her eyes.

Lata's brother said a child in a blue kurta had been seen in the northern lane. Lata rose at once to go there. Naira said, "First ask the person who told you when it happened. If we run after no more than the colour of a garment, the children in that lane will again become objects of suspicion." Lata stopped. "Are you trying to hold me back?" she asked. "No," Naira replied. "I shall go with you. But we will not surround someone else's child without checking."

An elderly water seller in the lane said that a boy in a blue kurta had passed by not yesterday but that very morning. He had seen the boy with his own eyes, but had not seen who, if anyone, was with him. Besides the colour of the clothes, Lata asked whether the strap on the boy's left sandal was broken. "Who had time to look at his sandals?" the old man said. That small answer left Lata's hope suspended once more; at least, however, one confusion about the time had been cleared up. She made no demand that any unknown child be seized.

Meera was having the water seller's statement written down when Mohan came past, pushing his cart. A new nail had now been fitted to its wheel. Lata stopped him. "What happened to you today involved people from my family too. An apology will not bring my son back, but what was said falsely was false." Mohan stopped the wheel and listened. "We shall talk when your son is found," he said. Lata replied, "If this matter hangs unresolved until my son is found, the injustice done to you will hang unresolved as well. Both things needed to be said today."

At noon Sarita was tending a fire on the veranda of their temporary lodging. Naira returned exhausted. "Was Mithun found?" Sarita asked. "No." "And the paper about the Kanjar?" "The misleading photograph has been taken down; whoever made the accusation is still unknown." Sarita stirred the thin rice with her ladle. "The day you learn to write two answers separately," she said, "you will cause less harm to one by means of the other." Naira took the lid from her hand and set it on the hearth on the veranda.

That evening Sajid sat in the market once more, with the account book recording the children's play and its fees. "Who will teach the children who want to learn how to record?" Meera asked. Switching off his camera, Sajid said, "First teach them to listen when a child says they do not want their face shown. Then show them the buttons. Before becoming a teacher, one must practise listening." Mohan had parked his cart behind the table; the wheel was turning quietly now.

That night another serving of rice was placed on the empty plate in Lata's house. This time she covered it and set it not beside the doorway but inside the kitchen. The search for Mithun would continue the next morning; understanding that one photograph was false evidence had not brought him home. But the red circle that had made a whole community's name synonymous with crime was no longer on the market wall. Only a small trace of drying paste remained, upon which the morning sunlight would fall again.

Chapter 31 · Ekalavya's Lesson

On the second morning after the false photograph with the red circle had been taken down from the market wall, Sajid arrived carrying not his camera but an empty wooden frame. He set it on the bed of Mohan's handcart. "Another performance today?" Meera Mandal asked. "Not a performance," Sajid replied. "A lesson. Whoever takes a camera into their hands must first understand what gets left outside the frame." Mohan, oiling a wheel, said, "Just make sure the hire for my cart isn't left outside it." All three laughed. After the humiliation of the previous day there was a measure of caution in their laughter, but there was laughter still.

Meera had begun a small gathering for children's lessons on a makeshift veranda near the railway square. It was no substitute for a permanent school: there were only sacks to sit on, a piece of chalk, and letters written on an old board. Even so, several children had arrived early. In her attendance notebook Meera was making a small mark beside each name, so that coming to this class would not be mistaken for formal enrolment at a school.

Just then Reva Gulguliya appeared outside the veranda with two children. One carried a bundle of cloth; the other had a shallow bamboo basket tucked beneath an arm. Reva's whole family moved camp as the seasons changed. Someone had told her that letters were being taught on this veranda. She approached Meera. "Please let both children learn to read. I don't yet know where we shall be living next month."

Meera first asked the children their names. "Birsi," the girl said. "Jatan," said the boy. Reva smiled. Having given his name, Jatan asked, "Will you write my name on paper for me?" "First you'll practise writing it yourself," Meera said. "But to enrol at a school we shall need an address, an age and information about your guardian. Where the papers are missing, we shall have to find a way." She did not pretend that enrolment had already taken place.

Reva took two folded slips from her bag: one was a collective list of the temporary settlement, the other an attendance record from the children's learning circle at their previous stopping place. The first had no number for a permanent house. Meera put the papers separately to one side. "They provide a way of contacting you," she said, "but they are not school admission papers." "Shall I put down a house number that doesn't exist?" Reva asked. Meera shook her head at once. "No. We will not invent what is not there. The children may sit in the class now; I shall raise the question of formal admission in writing."

From the other side of the veranda came a woman carrying a torn blue bag. Its opening was tied with a thick knot of cotton thread; inside were a short measuring tape, two screws and papers folded into cloth. She introduced herself as Chanda Munda. She had been thinking of returning home after a long spell of construction work away from it, but on the contractor's attendance records she appeared in one place as "Chanda" and in another merely as a labourer's number. "The proof that I worked is in my hands," she said. "The account for the day I can go home is still in someone else's."

Chanda wanted help writing an application for unpaid wages. At the distant worksite she had handled iron frames, inspected the knots in ropes and measured the spacing of scaffolding used by workers carrying stone. She had two slips showing working time and a receipt for supplied materials as evidence. She opened her bag to show them, but before giving the slips to Naira she asked, "Whom will you allow to see these papers?" "Copies will be made only for a purpose you approve," Naira replied. "The originals will stay with you."

Naira had come because Meera had asked her the previous day to provide a corrected copy of the false allegation against Mohan. Since the termination of her contract, Naira had become careful to distinguish between a private notebook and a public petition. Her mistake in publishing Mahesh's testimony before its time had been no small episode for her. Seeing Chanda's slips, she did not immediately take out her phone to photograph them. First she wrote in her notebook: "Original documents held by Chanda; permission to examine them limited to wages and papers concerning return home."

Sajid lifted the frame and placed it in the middle of the veranda. "One lesson today," he said. "What a camera shows is not the whole world." Birsi stood inside the frame. When Jatan stepped outside it, Sajid asked, "If a photograph were taken, who would not appear?" "Jatan!" the children answered. "Nor the person who made the basket Jatan is carrying," Reva said. At that, Sajid laughed openly again. Leaving his camera switched off, he said, "First understand the frame. Only then ask whose photograph you have permission to take."

Chanda examined one of the frame's joints. "This screw is loose. If a child hangs on it, it will fall." Sajid tried to tighten it, but he had no tool of the right size. Chanda took a screwdriver from her bag and aligned the two edges of the wood. When she had tightened the screw, she shook the frame herself to test it. "You learn by watching work," she said, "but the price of tightening a screw and the time spent teaching are two different accounts." "Now I see that hiring my cart belongs in the lesson too," Mohan said.

That small repair led Meera to ask a question. "Whom do we call the teacher when someone teaches a skill? And how does the learner find food for the day?" Instead of demanding answers from the children, she asked Sajid to write the questions on the board. Jatan went on joining his letters, while Birsi brushed chalk dust from her hands. Meera remembered an old story of the forest, the story of a man called Ekalavya. "Many people tell the story of Ekalavya's thumb," she said. "Listen now, and imagine how his days may have passed afterwards."

In a forest long ago, Ekalavya once again tried to draw his bowstring with the hand whose thumb he had given away as his teacher's fee. At the first attempt the string slipped. The second time the arrow lodged in the earth. The third time the wood of the bow struck his arm sharply. A boy seated at the edge of the forest watched him. He had come to learn the art of archery, but seeing Ekalavya hurt himself he asked, "What can you teach me now?"

Ekalavya set the bow on the ground and looked at his hand for a long time. With that hand he had once held distance and direction in a single rhythm. Others had treated the giving of the teacher's fee as an event concluded, and gone back to their homes; its consequences in his body began again each morning. He said to the boy, "Not the bow today. First watch the wind. Which way are the reeds bending, and how long do they stay bent in the same direction?" "Will watching the wind fill my stomach?" the boy asked. Ekalavya did not take offence.

Among the families at the forest's edge, hunting, gathering forest fruit, fishing and barter were different kinds of work. A bow did not have to be drawn every day. But when the rains went wrong, when the stony paths were closed, the entire group felt the absence of one accomplished hand. Ekalavya did not conceal his injury. He showed the boy the position of his fingers. "The skill I have lost is lost," he said. "I shall not turn it into glory and pretend that glory will feed you."

At dusk an elderly woman came through the forest carrying a vessel made of bark. She worked with a family who made bowstrings. She tested the tension of the string and said, "What you could do before will be difficult now. But making strings, seasoning bamboo, teaching measurement—all these kinds of work have value. If all you teach a pupil is how to worship you, what will there be for that pupil's household to eat?" Ekalavya listened. Within the honour he had once attached to the word teacher lay a deprivation he had not seen; now he began to discern its shape.

Earlier Ekalavya had set up an image of Drona as the teacher of his solitary practice. There had been a dispute over his claim to acknowledge Drona as his guru, and the giving of his thumb had changed his life. Those who told the story did not speak in a single voice. For one who remembered the humiliation, there was no possibility of denying that humiliation. But for the forest's new pupil the question was not only the punishment of the past. How far did the door to learning stand open now, and who would pay the cost of keeping it open?

The following morning Ekalavya assigned the boy and two new pupils three tasks: first, to judge the straightness of bamboo; second, to keep the tension of a string even; and third, to check that no living creature stood beyond the target. He tried once more to shoot an arrow himself. It fell far short of the mark. The boy burst out laughing, then grew ashamed. “You may laugh,” Ekalavya said. “But now tell me at which stage the error occurred.” The boy did not run after the arrow. He examined the pull of the string and said, “I think the hand cannot grip as it used to.”

For the first time Ekalavya laid his failure wholly before a pupil. “Recognising an error is work too,” he said. “A teacher who hides his injury teaches you in darkness.” He then made a modest arrangement: families sending pupils would agree upon a share of food for the teacher; those making strings would be paid separately; pupils without the means to buy materials would receive them from a common store. The arrangement answered by no means every question. “And if the store is emptied?” the elderly woman asked. “Then instead of stopping the lessons, we shall reckon the work and its costs again,” Ekalavya replied.

In time the boy learned, besides judging a bow’s strain, to distinguish the different joints of bamboo and to read the signs along wild paths. His first earnings were not the reward for a hunt but payment for strings he had made for two households. When he brought Ekalavya a portion, Ekalavya asked, “Is this payment for my name, or for the time I spent teaching you?” “For your time,” the boy said. Ekalavya accepted the share, but asked for a piece of bark on which to write it down. For the first time, name and payment entered separate ledgers.

When the story reached this point on the veranda in Videhapur, Birsi asked, “Was Ekalavya able to aim again?” “In the story of his later life that I have told you,” Meera said, “his hand never became what it had been. He found new work and new pupils. It would not be right to say that everything was made well again.” “It is not right for someone else to make a livelihood out of another person’s wounded hand,” Chanda said. “But even after the injury, that person must be paid for the work they can do.” In his notebook Sajid wrote “time” before he wrote “education.”

By noon Meera had brought a list of the available procedures for enrolling Reva’s children at school. The form said that the box for a permanent address had to be filled in. Someone had told her orally, “First settle your camp at a fixed address.” Meera did not accept that answer as the last word of the law; she decided to ask a school official for clarification in writing. “Our camp will be here until evening,” Reva said. “Tomorrow we might be in another lane. The children’s names will still be the same.” Meera prepared two applications: one requesting temporary attendance in class, the other asking how formal enrolment could be secured without a permanent address.

Jatan had written the letter “J” of his name backwards. When Birsi reached over to pull his notebook towards her, Reva stopped her. “Whatever he has written, that much of the learning is his own,” she said. Meera wrote the correct letter beside it; she did not rub out the earlier one. Sajid picked up his camera, then put it down again. He wanted to show the child's first attempt at writing, but he had no right to sell it, or publish it without permission.

Meanwhile Chanda unfolded her wage slips and showed them to Naira. The first recorded her working days and bore a signature. On the second, part of the amount had been deducted, but the box giving the reason was blank. "Does the contractor have the original attendance record?" Naira asked. "Yes. These two copies are all I have left. Before I go home I need to know they cannot declare me absent and withhold my wages again." Naira recorded the dates on the slips and the difference in the deductions separately, but did not claim that they proved the final amount owing.

"I want to go home," Chanda said. "But one person says I must remain on the job until I get all my money. Another says that if I leave, the papers will be closed." "What do you want?" Meera asked. "I want to see my home, and then decide for myself whether to stay here or choose other work. What is due for my past attendance must come with me. It must not bind my body here." Naira put Chanda's own words into the application; she did not make the decision for her in the name of giving advice.

In Chanda's bag was a little loop of rope of the kind she used to secure the timbers of scaffolding. Sajid asked whether she could teach the children to make knots. Chanda looked around at the small hands, the loose frame and Mohan's cart. "Not knots for high scaffolds," she said. "Here I can teach practice knots that carry no load. When an actual weight has to be supported, you need both trained people and an inspection." Having set that limit, she laid two slender ropes on the table. Meera entered the fee for Chanda's hour of instruction in the public expenditure ledger.

A few people objected. "It's only teaching little children two knots. Payment for that?" Reva laughed. "Anyone who thinks teaching is easy should try doing it." One man tightened a knot, but it came undone as soon as it was pulled. Chanda did not scold him. "First decide what the knot is meant to do," she said. Hearing the question, the man looked at the rope again. Mohan placed a rupee beside the ledger—not the full fee, but a first contribution. Meera checked what money was available in the common fund for the rest. The payment was agreed before the work began; it was not announced afterwards as charity.

Birsi, sitting beside Reva, asked whether she too would be paid a wage. "Your work today is to learn, not to earn wages," Chanda said. "When you are older and choose work for yourself, do not give anyone the right to call your labour free." "If I learn to read, will I be able to tie knots like you?" Birsi asked. "You need not become like me," Chanda replied. "You will learn in your own way. There will be things I have to learn from you as well."

As the afternoon sunlight faded, Mohan lifted the frame. One of its screws still needed checking; Chanda marked it, because without the correct replacement part it would be wrong to call the frame completely safe. Sajid did not photograph the loose joint. “I’ll bring the part tomorrow,” he told Mohan. “Today’s lesson is finished, not the repair.” “Right,” Mohan answered. “I won’t charge hire for calling unfinished work complete.”

In the evening Naira put the papers into separate envelopes. Chanda’s applications concerning wages and the journey home went into one; the two applications concerning the admission of Reva’s children went into another. The papers in the search for Mithun had already been kept separately, while Sarita’s original page of twenty-seven names remained in Sarita’s own care. If all these papers were made into one “problem file,” one person’s wishes might disappear inside another person’s accusation. Naira did not want to make that mistake again.

Meera remained on the veranda. Birsi’s “B” and Jatan’s reversed “J” were still on the chalkboard. Afraid of rain, she was about to bring the board inside, but Birsi said, “Not yet. Mother must see.” Reva stood and looked at the two letters. “One the right way round, one backwards,” she said. “Both are the beginning of reading.” She divided flattened rice and jaggery among the children. This small meal bore neither the stamp of an admission form nor an account of wages; nevertheless, amid the day’s fatigue it made a place of its own for everyone.

By the smoke of the cooking fire Chanda was tying up her blue bag again. “Have you fixed the day you will go home?” Naira asked. “Not yet. I’ll take the acknowledgement of my application and then choose the day for myself. My home may be waiting for me, but I will not let papers bind my feet.” Reva gave her a handful of flattened rice. As Chanda ate, she undid a knot and then folded the same rope neatly into her bag.

That night Sajid was wrapping his camera in cloth. “Nothing was recorded today,” Meera said. “What shall we put in the account of the training?” “Write down the reason for what was not photographed,” Sajid replied. “What remains outside the frame is part of everyone’s knowledge too.” Meera entered separately in the training ledger the hours of the class, Chanda’s fee, the children’s temporary attendance and the fact that a written answer from the school was still awaited. The telling of Ekalavya’s story had been part of that day’s lesson; it had not been turned into proof of official history, or into a rule assigning a profession to anyone by birth.

As the veranda was being closed, Jatan put his little notebook into his mother’s bag. His backward “J” was still on the first page. “Will you write again tomorrow?” Birsi asked. Jatan nodded. Reva did not say whether their camp would still be there tomorrow. She simply took the children by the hand and set off along the night road. Inside the notebook, in the darkness, the page remained where it belonged; no one had yet crossed out that letter.

Chapter 32 · Athāto: Whose Right to Inquire?

At dawn, Jatan was practising writing his name on the damp earth of the veranda. The backward “J” was still on the first page of his notebook; he had not crossed it out. Meera Mandal took a little piece of chalk, wrote the letter correctly on the board, and left a small space between the two forms. “Whose mistake is this?” Jatan asked. “The writer’s,” Meera said. “But pointing out a mistake and shutting the writer out are not the same thing.”

Reva Gulguliya sat beside the children. In readiness for moving camp, the knot on her bundle had been pulled tight since the night before. The written reply requested from the school the previous day was due to arrive today. Three times she looked out beyond the veranda. In her notebook Birsi had drawn a house with a door but no number inside its walls. “This is my house,” she said. Reva smiled. “For as many days as you live here, this is your house. Afterwards we shall make another.”

When Naira arrived from her temporary lodging, she carried two copies of Chanda’s wage papers and Reva’s school application in separate envelopes. The night before she had written three questions in her notebook: who had submitted the application, who had authority to answer it, and whose voice had been lost between the two. The mistake of publishing Mahesh’s testimony before the agreed time still filled her with shame. This time she had made herself a rule: ask permission before photographing anybody’s papers.

The school clerk rode past the veranda on his bicycle. He handed Meera a short, stamped letter and went on. It said that verification of a permanent address for Reva’s children remained pending; no final order had been made concerning their participation in classes. Meera read the letter again. There had been neither an admission nor a written refusal. But if someone were to claim tomorrow that the school had driven the children away, this letter would not allow the claim to pass as fact.

“Where, then, will Jatan and Birsi study?” Reva asked. “Today’s lesson is here,” Meera said. “I shall speak separately with the head of the school. But I will not say that they have been enrolled.” Jatan asked, “Will they see my backward ‘J’ at school?” “Your letter belongs to you,” Naira told him. “If the school requires another document, the two papers will be shown separately.”

A public reading and discussion had been arranged that day at the old pathshala in Videhapur. At the community’s request, Maithili Mishra had agreed to speak on “Access to Learning,” but the invitation placed only the word “Respected” before her name. Beside Ishan’s name stood his credentials as a scholar and editor of texts. Maithili folded the invitation and put it in her bag. It was not respect she objected to. Her question was whose labour made scholarship possible, and who was entitled to see that labour recorded.

On the veranda of the pathshala they found Harimohan Pathak wiping the seats. He conducted classes in the reading of manuscripts and had undertaken to prepare a copy of an old book. He feared that if everyone came without preparation, both the reading and the discussion would suffer. “Discipline is necessary in study,” he told Maithili. “A desire to inquire does not, by itself, bestow grammar, knowledge of variant readings or skill in argument.”

“You are right,” Maithili replied. “But to keep the door to practice closed and then say people lack the qualifications to enter—what kind of discipline is that?” Harimohan objected at once. “The door is not closed. The levels are different.” “If the levels are attained through learning, where does one find the first lesson?” Maithili asked. “And if someone has learned but possesses no certificate, who will listen to what that person has to say?”

Ishan came out carrying a sheet of paper. From within, he had heard the exchange between his wife and Harimohan. “Raise this systematically in today’s disputation,” he said. “The question will be written down,” Maithili answered. “So will the name of the person asking it. Otherwise, when the question appears in a book later, the only person credited with it will be the one who gave the answer.” Ishan’s eyes showed a moment’s discomfort, but he could not evade the argument.

A work schedule had been pasted to the pathshala wall. Paper repair, copying, laying out seats, cleaning and instruction each had an allotted time; only the copying had a figure entered in the payment column. Maithili pointed to the empty lines. “The list says who will sweep. Where is the payment due for that work?” “It is a community contribution,” Harimohan replied. “If it is voluntary,” Maithili said, “record the consent beside the name. Otherwise this, too, is labour.”

Meanwhile Meera arrived with Reva, Birsi and Jatan. Showing the school’s reply, Meera asked only whether the children might sit in the pathshala’s public beginners’ class. At first Harimohan supposed that she was requesting formal admission to the school. Meera made the distinction clear. “No. The application to the school is a separate matter. Today we are asking for a place where they can learn a few letters.” With that clarification, Harimohan’s first objection changed.

Birsi reached towards a book resting near the wall, then checked herself. “May I touch it?” she asked. Harimohan showed her the fragile edges of its pages. “This is not the old manuscript but a copy of it. If these thin pages get wet, the letters will be damaged.” “If I make a mistake in my notebook,” Jatan said, “I can write it again.” Maithili smiled. “The question here is not merely whether a hand may touch a book. It is also how to keep the book safe while opening a way for people to read it.”

Far away, in a Mithila belonging to another age, Mrinal was spreading a thin sheet of paper out to dry in the sunlight. Night dew had soaked one corner, and the dark strokes of the writing were beginning to spread. Lohna, who made the paper, told her, “Put it in the direct sun and the sheet will shrivel. Give it air in the shade.” Mrinal lifted the paper and carried it beneath the veranda roof. The small task of preserving its script was bound up, for her, with the desire to read it.

Mrinal worked in that compound drying paper, counting manuscripts and brushing away dust. She recognised some forms of letters, but not others. Every day during a lesson she sat outside and listened to the voices. That morning Vachaspati Mishra was to speak on the opening of the Brahma Sutras. “I can save the paper,” Mrinal said to Lohna, “but I have no leave to ask the question written on it. Is the fault in the paper, or in me?”

Wiping the paste that clung to his hands, Lohna said, “I make paper. I do not decide whose name will be written on it. But I will ask about the price of paper and the hours of my work. If you wish to ask a question, go to the teacher yourself.” “What if he tells me to learn the text first?” Mrinal asked. “Then ask for a way to learn it,” Lohna answered. “That is all.”

At that hour Vachaspati was explaining to his disciples the opening words, “Athāto brahmajijñāsā”—“Now, therefore, the inquiry into Brahman.” The disciples offered differing views on the sequence of atha and ataḥ and on the purpose of inquiry into Brahman. The teacher did not force their statements into a single meaning; after hearing the opposing positions, he clarified the grounds of the question. Mrinal stood at the edge of the veranda. She could not follow every interpretation of the aphorism, but she kept hearing the word jijñāsā: the desire to know.

At the first pause Mrinal folded her hands. “May I ask this question too, today?” Some disciples looked at the clothes she wore for work. “The meaning of the scriptures is taught here,” one of them said. “You dry the paper.” Mrinal did not rebuke him. “My work is different,” she said. “But is it forbidden here for me to ask the meaning of a word I do not understand?”

Vachaspati motioned her to sit near the inner edge. “Ask. And do not be ashamed to say what you have not understood.” “When we say atha,” Mrinal asked, “does the time for inquiry open at the same moment for everyone? If one person has already studied the scriptures and another is still putting letters together, how can they both reach the same question?” The teacher did not answer at once. Turning to his disciples, he said, “First understand the question. Do not reduce it to whatever is convenient for you.”

One disciple argued that without the necessary preparation for study, serious questions became meaningless. Another said that the transmission of knowledge demanded an order of learning: to seize upon the terms of doctrine without elementary practice led to confusion. Mrinal listened to both. “I am not opposed to preparation,” she said. “I am asking for the teaching by which one may prepare. If you do not teach me my letters, tomorrow you will have made your own proof that I am unqualified.”

Vachaspati did not set that day’s question down as a final philosophical position. “An aphorism must be interpreted through its reasoning, its tradition and its purpose,” he said. “The difficulty you encounter in your life is not merely an illustration; it is a real question about work. If an illustration gives rise to a question, I must test whether it has been applied in the right place.” These words unsettled the disciples’ accustomed order a little.

The teacher pointed to a thin rope lying on the veranda. “Have you heard the example of mistaking a rope for a snake in the dark?” “I have,” Mrinal said. “But when the strokes on a wet page spread, I could understand its letters before, and afterwards I cannot. My eyes are the same. Knowledge has changed because the condition of the object has changed. Is this the same kind of error?”

“That is not what the example means,” a disciple said immediately. Mrinal nodded. “Then explain the difference. I do not want to call a fault in the paper a fault in the rope.” Vachaspati looked at the corner of the sheet in her hands. “Good,” he said. “Here the physical state of the letters has altered; there the object is taken for something else in the dark. To treat the two as one would damage the reasoning. Now let the disciples say why the distinction matters.”

The lesson had not been transformed into a claim that drying paper was the meaning of inquiry into Brahman. Yet after his first familiar illustration the teacher added another question: was the obstruction to knowledge caused by an error of the senses, a change in the object, or a want of preparation in the reader? To acknowledge Mrinal’s objection did not mean that she now understood all the aphorisms. It meant that her experience had helped discard a misleading analogy.

When the lesson ended, Vachaspati asked Mrinal, “Can you come here every day?” “For one muhūrta, after I have finished the morning work with the paper,” she replied. “But if the sheets are not dried, the manuscripts will suffer too. If the hours of my work are to be reduced, we shall have to speak with Lohna.” For the first time the teacher saw plainly the practical weight of the question. “Then tomorrow we shall settle the time with Lohna present,” he said.

Lohna had left some water outside the classroom for Mrinal. “Have you gained admission?” he asked. “I have been allowed to sit. The time for learning my letters has not yet been settled. Those are two different things.” Lohna laughed. “Then do not beat the drum of victory. Tomorrow we shall see how to divide the work.” “The drum can sound,” Mrinal replied, “when I am able to disagree, in my own words, with the meaning given to a line I have read.”

All day Mrinal continued counting the folds of paper. When one sheet had been saved, Lohna said, almost casually, “This one will do.” That small praise gave her an unexpected happiness. She brought water for him in a brass lota, then measured with her eyes the evening shadow falling across the wall. Tomorrow she would not have to dry the pages alone during the lesson: Lohna would tell his assistant in advance. So that one person’s hour of learning would not become another person’s unnoticed extra labour, the two of them divided the work that very day.

At the Videhapur pathshala Harimohan had written “Athāto brahmajijñāsā” on the board. Maithili asked that the aphorism’s original philosophical meaning be explained separately from the present-day question of education. “This sutra is not a government school’s admission rule,” she said, “and it would be wrong to derive a direct verdict on the social policies of our own age from it. But readers will still ask, in their own circumstances, who decides whether a person is qualified to inquire.”

Harimohan drew two columns beneath the words on the board: “Interpretation of the Scripture” and “Today’s Dispute over Access.” In the first he wrote text, reasoning, opposing position and response; in the second, beginners’ classes, materials, time, instructors and fees. “Which column am I in?” Jatan asked. The gathering laughed a little, but Maithili answered, “For now, the second. The wish to learn does not cancel the first question’s right to be asked, but it does open the path by which the subject itself can be studied.”

Harimohan had spoken of his fear that the pathshala’s manuscripts would be damaged. Chanda Munda arrived and said, “On a building site, when we hand a tool to a new worker, we begin by teaching the lighter tasks; we do not make the worker lift a heavy load without practice. But if you say, ‘You may not even touch the tools,’ and keep someone outside for life, how is that person ever to learn?” After hearing her example, Harimohan did not hand the old manuscripts to the children. Instead, he proposed making ordinary sheets for practice.

Maithili placed two copies of an old page she had brought with her on the table. Both were copies of the same text, but in one the marginal annotation had been reproduced, in the other it had not. “Is the author’s signature enough to explain the meaning of this omission?” she asked. Harimohan examined the pages. “No. We must compare them with the original.” “And in that work,” Maithili said, “we must record the names of the copyist, the examiner and the person who supplied the annotation.” Ishan remained silent. He understood that the matter was not confined to the class being held that day.

“Not every kind of effort is the same,” Harimohan said. “We must distinguish the original argument from checking a copy.” “By all means distinguish them,” Maithili answered, “but do not erase either. Do not credit someone for work they did not do, and do not leave uncredited someone who did it. Attribution too must rest on evidence.” She did not seek a final judgment on her own contribution that day. First she asked that the register record the nature and date of the work.

Naira had been listening. She remembered that after breaking the conditions attached to Mahesh’s testimony by publishing it too soon, merely writing “I am sorry” had not been enough. Here too there was a question of consent: whose written annotation might be made public, and whose private copy was to remain available only for checking. She suggested to Harimohan that permission to attend a class and permission to publish a copy of a text should be recorded separately, for they were different acts. Permission to publish a photograph alongside a child’s name was not to be presumed.

Jatan wrote “J” once more on his practice sheet. This time its shape was right, though the stroke beneath it slanted. Harimohan showed him how to hold the pen. “May I keep the wrong letter?” Birsi asked. “Certainly,” said Harimohan. “The paper is yours. The pathshala’s original manuscripts are another matter.” The girl’s question made him realise that the protection of materials and the humiliation of a learner must not be made into one and the same rule.

At the other end of the room, Sarita showed Naira an old notebook in her handwriting. “Hearing all this has brought something back to me. Someone used to make me write the accounts by hand, and in the end it was his name that appeared. I was paid for the work, yes, but the corrections I made left no trace in the document.” “Mother, when is this notebook from?” Naira asked. “We shall have to check the date,” Sarita said. “Do not link it to the original page of names yet. The two documents will have different histories.”

As the meeting’s final resolution, the administrator of the pathshala recorded three points. Practice sheets would be distributed for elementary lessons; the children’s temporary attendance would be recorded separately; and a written reply from the relevant school was still required for formal enrolment. Chanda’s time spent training others would not be treated as unpaid: if the pathshala invited her to teach a practical class, the payment due would be agreed beforehand. Harimohan signed the proposal.

“And the register of contributions to the work?” Maithili asked. The administrator opened a second ledger. This time Harimohan himself wrote in the empty headings: textual revision, copying, linguistic comparison, examples, final approval. “The names will be filled in after the material has been checked,” he said. Maithili agreed that the evidence needed examination, but insisted that the vacant columns must not be closed. Ishan undertook to establish the dates of the older manuscripts in that ledger. The dispute had not been decided, yet it was no longer so easy to bury it in nameless silence.

During a break Harimohan asked Birsi how far she had travelled. She showed him the dust on her feet. “This far.” She had no measure for the distance. “When our camp moves, there will be another road,” Reva said. Instead of supplying an answer at once, Harimohan put a light practice book into her hands. He set no fixed date for its return, only gave her the pathshala’s contact address. “What if I go far away?” Birsi asked. “Take what you have learned with you,” he said. “We can speak again about the book.”

After the class Reva saw that Jatan had kept the first backward “J” beside the correctly written “J” of that day. “Why the old one?” she asked. “Because I used to write it this way, and then I learned to write it that way. If I keep the first one, I shall understand again.” Reva wrapped both pages in the same piece of cloth. She did not know which camp she would be living in tomorrow, but she would not let the difference between these two days of her child’s learning be lost just yet.

In the evening, as Maithili was closing a window of the pathshala, she asked Harimohan, “Did you change your answer today, or your example?” Harimohan did not smile. “I learned the limits of my example. There is more reading to be done before the answer,” he said. “That too is a beginning,” Maithili replied. She took the old copy of her annotations from her bag, checked its date and put it away again. This was not the day on which the quarrel over credit would be settled; but the question was now in writing.

On the veranda of that far older age, Mrinal stood once more with a damp sheet in her hands. Seeing the difference between sunlight and shade, she returned the page to Lohna. Inside, Vachaspati was selecting the lines his disciples would study the following day. Mrinal looked towards the door but did not go in again after the lesson was over. Tomorrow they would speak once more about time, labour and a way into learning; today she had work of her own to finish.

That night, on the temporary veranda in Videhapur, Meera was closing the class register. Beside the names of Reva’s children was written “temporary attendance”; in the school’s register, “reply pending”; and in the pathshala’s ledger, “elementary instruction.” None of the three expressions could stand in place of another. From a little distance Naira read the three lines. On the way home Sarita spoke of a small lamp. “Those who write need light,” she said. “So do those who make the paper.” Naira took her mother’s hand and walked on. In that evening light no one’s question had yet come to an end, but the name of the person asking it had not been erased.

Chapter 33 · The Lamp and the Paper

The following dawn, when Mrinal reached the veranda where the paper was laid out to dry, Lohna was already measuring water into two earthen trays. In one the water was clear; in the other, fine strands of ground fibre floated on the surface. He put a thin wooden frame into Mrinal's hands. “We made time yesterday to listen to the lesson,” he said, “but these pages will not make themselves. From today we shall keep a fresh account of the work.”

Mrinal lowered the frame into the water. When the fibres had spread evenly across the mesh, Lohna lifted it with care. A thick clump had gathered in one corner. Mrinal reached out to touch it. “Don't,” Lohna stopped her. “Wet fibres find their own course. Press them down and they will knot where they lie. Watch the flow of the water first.” Mrinal tilted the frame a little, and the dense clump slowly dispersed. For the first time she understood that making a sheet of paper smooth demanded more patience than the labour of one's hands.

Inside the same compound, copies of the text had been made by lamplight throughout the night. When Bhamati came there in the morning, she found the oil bowl empty and the tip of the wick black. A fine film of soot lay across two leaves of the manuscript. “We had enough light last night,” one disciple said, “so the work went forward quickly.” Bhamati looked at the blackened edges. “Quickly, yes. But who will clean off this smoke? Who will pay for the oil? And when a lamp has been kept burning all night, whose eyes will have the chance to rest at dawn?”

The disciple replied that serving the scriptures was a meritorious duty shared by all. Without lifting the smoke-stained sheets, Bhamati set them against the wall. “The merit is yours to speak of,” she said. “The stinging eyes are mine. Put them both in a single account, and the figures will not come right.” Her voice carried neither anger nor a plea for indulgence. She was reckoning costs as one reckons the grain in a household.

Vachaspati was inside, collating the lines of the text. Bhamati called him out. “The longer the lamps burned in the night, the heavier the burden left for the morning,” she said. “Four pages are ready; two will have to be dried again. Lohna will not provide any more fibre until the earlier payment is made.” “How much is owed?” Vachaspati asked. “We shall know when we have seen how many sheets can be saved and how many are spoiled,” Bhamati answered. “Not by counting the sheets alone.”

Lohna came in carrying, not a stack of the paper he had made, but a piece of torn screen. “This must be replaced,” he said. “The edges do not rise to an even thickness through the old mesh. I was promised payment for my labour; the cost of materials was separate. The disciples are calling the two one expense.” Vachaspati had been absorbed in his text, but the torn mesh now lay before him. “When can a new screen be brought?” he asked. “On market day,” Lohna said. “Until then, we can make smaller sheets with what we have.”

On the classroom wall Bhamati wrote three lines of accounts: sheets made, sheets spoiled, sheets saved. Lohna added a fourth: time spent at work. One of the disciples laughed. “At this rate we shall have a ledger longer than the book itself.” “Make a book without accounts,” Bhamati replied, “and in the end all you will have is torn pages.” A faint smile crossed Vachaspati's face. It did not erase his disagreement.

Later in the morning Mrinal came inside for the single muhūrta allotted to her lesson. She saw that on a leaf of the new copy someone was transcribing, not a list of the many names of rivers, but a fragment of an unfinished poem. One line contained the word “Kṛtasārā.” The words before and after it had been lost; the corner of the original from which this copy was made was broken too. “Is this the name of a river,” Mrinal asked, “or a word describing some quality in the poem?”

“It is a word associated with water,” a disciple said, “so it must be a river.” Mrinal looked at him. “Yesterday the letters I saw were damaged by water, but that did not make their meaning a river. The preceding words are missing here. Is it right to guess from a single surviving line?” Vachaspati asked to see the incomplete leaf. He did not immediately declare the word to be a river's name. “This is a question about the reading of the text,” he said. “To fill the space left by a missing page with conjecture is not to give an answer.”

Bhamati set a slender marker beside the leaf so that the word could be checked again. “When we find another copy of the original, we shall compare them,” she said. “And until then,” Mrinal asked, “what if someone uses this name to claim land at a landing place?” “Tell them to look at the measurements of the land,” Lohna replied. “A boat cannot be steered by a line from a book.” Laughter ran through the room, but Vachaspati did not dismiss the question.

That day a little girl came to Bhamati. She belonged to a disciple's family and had wandered inside in her eagerness to watch the paper drying. Seeing the charred wick of the lamp, she asked, “When the light is finished, where does the smoke go?” Bhamati took her to the window. “Some of it goes outside,” she answered. “Some settles on the paper, and some enters our breath.” “Then why don't you burn fewer lamps?” the girl asked. “We shall all talk about that this evening,” Bhamati said.

In Videhapur that same morning, clouds had gathered thickly overhead. Rainwater had dripped all night through a seam in the tin roof of the pathshala, dampening the bottom of a bundle of practice sheets. Jatan was turning the pages, trying to save the letter “J” he had written. Birsi lifted a sheet. “My letters can still be read,” she said. Reva spread it towards the sunlight. Harimohan Pathak grew uneasy as he examined the paper. “If this goes on, the pathshala will not survive the rains,” he said.

Maithili was busy saving an old copy kept on the pathshala veranda. Ishan went up to inspect the sheets of tin. The accounts had not been settled for the craftsman previously called to seal the seam. “Today's lesson will be delayed,” Harimohan said. “The children are already here,” Meera answered. “We can give them a short lesson even while the sheets are drying.” To Jatan she said, “Saving even one page is work. But don't put the wet paper too close to the fire.”

Just then a woman stood outside the veranda and lowered a wet bag to the ground. Her name was Somri Hembram. She had come from a group of migrant labourers. In her bag were a work slip, a contract only partly translated, and a small receipt wrapped in cloth. Chanda Munda had directed her to the pathshala because Somri needed help reading the written conditions.

Somri opened the paper and showed it to Maithili. “My name is here,” she said, “and the figure for a day's wages is here too. But there isn't a single word in the language I speak at home. They told me to put down my thumbprint; they would explain it afterwards.” “Where is the work?” Maithili asked. “On construction work away from home,” Somri said. “They will call us again tomorrow. I understand the work I am to do. I do not understand everything the paper says.”

Harimohan examined the slip closely. One line set out the ordinary wage conditions; another concerned notice of a change in accommodation; a third provided for deductions if the work was abandoned midway. Somri asked first about the day's pay. Then she asked, “If work stops because of rain, will this deduction be made?” “That line is ambiguous,” Harimohan said. “Then why,” Somri replied, “am I being asked to put my thumbprint on an ambiguity?”

Meera began explaining the written terms in plain Maithili, but Somri stopped her. “I shall listen to what you explain,” she said, “but payment for someone to explain it in my mother tongue will be a separate matter. Some in our group understand Maithili; others do not. I can have my own statement written down. Each person's consent must come from that person's own mouth.” There was resolve in her voice, without any desire for a quarrel. Chanda smiled. “Naira asked permission before she made a copy of my papers too. People ask first here. That is why I brought you.”

Somri also carried a short bamboo measuring rule in her bag. She looked up at the leaking seam in the new roof. “Water has collected at this joint,” she said, “but I will not stand here and give orders as though I had been hired to repair it. Whoever is responsible for safety while climbing on the roof, for the tools and for the wages must decide how the work is done.” Ishan was coming down. “I could tighten that sheet myself,” he exclaimed. “You may be able to tighten it,” Somri replied, “but if your foot slips on the wet tin, you may save the paper and injure your body. There is a difference between eagerness to work and working safely.” Ishan stayed his hand.

“What would you like written in your application?” Maithili asked Somri. She considered for a moment. “Not that somebody else will sign in my name,” she said. “Write that the conditions of the contract must be explained, that the members of the group must understand them in their own languages, and that the wages of the translator must be entered in the contract accounts.” “I cannot yet give a final judgment about all the legal implications,” Harimohan said. Somri folded her slip again. “I am not asking for a judgment,” she replied. “First I want a copy of the questions in writing.”

There were two brief messages from the contractor's clerk on Somri's phone. The first gave the hour at which she must report the next morning; the second asked for the slip to be returned. She read them without replying at once. “Are you afraid?” Chanda asked. “I am afraid of losing the work,” Somri said. “But if I put my mark on something I have not understood, my family will pay the price.” In her village lived an elderly woman who could hear a voice over the phone but could not read written conditions. Before going away to work again, Somri wanted that woman too to understand the difference between wages and deductions. She had come to this decision through her own experience, not on the orders of any meeting.

Meera chose a clean page from an old notebook. At Somri's direction they wrote four questions: the daily rate, the accounting for work stopped by rain, the terms governing a change of accommodation, and the right to understand the terms in one's own language. One copy would remain with Somri; the other was for the workers' meeting. Simply receiving these questions had not altered the original contract. But before any thumbprint was given, the questions had at least been put into writing. Somri took the receipt from her bag, checked its date, and put it carefully away again.

At that moment Jatan stumbled while lifting the bundle of paper. The sheets scattered, and Birsi burst into laughter. “It isn't only my pages that flew away,” Jatan said crossly. “Everybody's did.” Somri bent her knees and sat beside him. On one sheet she noticed a backward “J”. “What is this?” she asked. “An old mistake,” Jatan said. “Don't throw it away,” Somri told him. “When you write it correctly, that first page will show how your hand has changed.” The child put it safely in the middle of his bundle.

At midday Sarita arrived carrying hot rice and a shallow pot of dal. The cooking fire's smoke drifted beyond the veranda. “Have you eaten?” she asked Somri. Somri took out her own flatbread. “I have this,” she said, “but if the vegetables are for sale, I'll pay for them.” Sarita laughed. “What we have cooked today is for a shared meal. If I take on the cooking as work tomorrow, then we shall settle the price.” Somri took a spoonful of vegetables and opened a little jar of pickle from her bag, offering everyone a taste.

Over the meal Sarita asked Maithili whether the wet books had been saved. “The old copy has survived,” Maithili said. “The practice sheets can be written again. But the space for the payment due to the person who made the copies is still blank.” Sarita looked at the empty bowl from her cooking. “I like it when people eat food made by my hands and ask for me by name,” she said. “But let somebody go on cooking anonymously every day, and one day even the household accounts will begin to lie.”

Later in the afternoon a heavy drop fell once more from the wet roof. The water did not remain there: it ran past the bundle of paper and disappeared into a deep footprint in the courtyard. Sanket was making a small sketch of the stream's course. Seeing Harimohan glance at his phone, he said before the teacher could speak, “This is a picture of how the water travels here, not of anybody's face. You can look at it before I make it public.” Naira asked him to put a time on the paper; in the next rain, the course of the water might change. What they had seen was neither proof that a house had flooded nor proof of any contractor's wrongdoing. But it was an observation useful enough for making the roof safe.

On the veranda of that much older age, no lamp had been lit by evening. Bhamati was sorting the sheets in the day's last light. Lohna came with his account of the work. He had received half of his wages for the previous two days; for the remainder, a fixed measure of grain had been recorded. “I shall take this much today,” he said. “Write down the day on which the rest is to be paid. If payment is impossible now, there is nothing to be gained from a false promise.”

Vachaspati placed his mark upon the account. Lohna asked to have it read aloud. “The mark is there,” a disciple said. “What need is there to read it again?” “You all read the pages made by my hands,” Lohna answered. “Why should I not hear the line that records my wages?” Bhamati read it aloud. Lohna changed one word: instead of “assistance”, it must say “balance owed”. Vachaspati accepted the alteration.

Bhamati was quietly cutting a wick for the lamp. “Everyone here will have a line recording their own work,” Lohna asked. “In which line will your name appear?” Bhamati folded the wick between her palms. “There are entries for oil, mats, keeping watch at night, separating the faulty copies,” she said. “But the question of names is not simple. Some stories tell of a wife who kept vigil beside a lamp. I shall not turn what a story did not witness into a proven event by declaring that it happened.”

Mrinal sat down beside her. “Then should people's stories be written down, or not?” she asked. “They may be written down—as stories,” Bhamati replied. “What someone has seen may be recorded as testimony; what someone has inferred, as inference. Yet the wife's labour in preparing food and staying awake through the night is no less for that.” “And your own account?” Mrinal asked. Bhamati lit a little lamp. “I shall tell my own story,” she said. “I will not allow another person's tale to be put into my mouth.”

Hearing Bhamati's words, Vachaspati came out from within. Seeing her small lamp, he asked, “Will so little light be enough to make out the fine letters of a verse?” Bhamati moved a delicate sheet away from the flame. “No,” she said. “So tonight read only as much as can be read. Leave the rest for the morning light. Hands and eyes are household resources too.” Vachaspati promised to reduce the copying that night. The disciples would lose some practice, but the sheets Lohna had made would be spared the smoke. One disciple was displeased at first, then began gathering the papers into their chest himself.

The little girl who had asked about the smoke that morning came in again from outside. Holding a small crooked scrap of paper, she said, “May I write my name on this?” “It's a torn corner,” Lohna told her, “but it will do for writing.” The girl looked at Mrinal. “Who will teach me the letters?” Mrinal asked. Bhamati moved the lamp a little farther away. “Anyone who can read,” she said. “But first let the paper dry.” The child tried to dry the sheet by blowing upon it, and Lohna broke into a hearty laugh.

By evening in Videhapur, repairs to the seam in the roof had still not begun. A temporary tarpaulin protected the damp bundle, and a time was set for the next day when the craftsman could reach the roof safely. Somri took away her copy of the four questions about her contract. In the work register Maithili recorded her name not as “a labourer requesting translation”, but as “Somri Hembram, seeking clarification of the contractual terms”. Somri nodded after the entry was read aloud, but said, “Tomorrow the others in my group will speak for themselves. I do not stand in for all of them.”

At the end of the day Naira examined the corner of the surviving copy on the pathshala table. Maithili had kept two versions of her corrected page apart. One carried the name of the person who had supplied the annotation; the other did not. “We must not conflate this with the original document in the register of names,” Naira said. “The question of credit is separate.” “Yes,” Maithili replied, “but when something goes missing, people readily suppose that the cause must be the same in every case. Paper can be ruined by water, or smoke, or carelessness. We shall have to look.” Without touching the page, Naira examined its dry corner.

On her way home Sarita covered the lamp. Jatan was tightening the knot around his practice papers; Birsi was measuring out water to wash the empty rice bowls. On Mrinal's veranda in that distant age, Lohna had set his screen out to dry, and Bhamati was trimming the wick of that small lamp. In both places the hands of those who preserved the written page were weary. Yet when morning came, the children would have letters to write again.

Chapter 34 · The Unseen Cause

On the rain-soaked veranda of the pathshala, Hema Dev measured the wooden display board before she looked at the papers. An old nail protruded from its right-hand edge. Beneath it, half the exhibition sheet hanging there had curled in the night's rain. Hema paused before touching the paper. It carried pictures of the founding of Videhapur, the old road, and the dredging of the pond. Beneath the pictures were ten men's names and a single line: “With the assistance of the women of the village.” Hema asked quietly, “On which page are the women's names?”

Harimohan Pathak was drying a bundle of books. “I wanted to see them myself,” he said. “Perhaps a later page was left out.” Straightening what remained of the exhibition sheet, Hema answered, “Perhaps. But if it is always the same people's page that goes missing, who is to notice the mistake?” She took the board down from the wall and laid it on the ground. Meanwhile Jatan and Birsi were forming letters with lime in the wet courtyard outside. They liked the pictures, but the meaning of the blank margin on the paper escaped them.

Hema had brought two registers from home: an old list from a school ceremony and a copied page relating to the dredging of the pond in 1939. The latter was a photographic copy of an older reproduction preserved within a family, not an original government record. On one side were the words “food”; on the other, “those who carried the mud” and “marking the landing steps.” Several names ran into the torn edge; in places only an initial survived. Hema did not want to complete indistinct letters with names of her own imagining.

When Meera Mandal reached the veranda, Hema showed her the two pages. “There is nothing wrong with writing the men's names in the school's history,” she said. “What is wrong is that those whose work made the men's work possible are all compressed into a single nameless word.” Meera asked, “Which names can you read with certainty?” Hema pointed out four marks. Two names were complete, one was incomplete, and an old water stain covered the fourth. “Then we must not call all four equally reliable evidence,” Meera said.

A short lesson in local history was being prepared at the pathshala that day. The pupils had been asked to look not only at pictures of the ghats but also at the old accounts of labour. Yet what appeared clear and agreeable on the exhibition board was not the whole story. Hema drew a white line in chalk. On one side she set down verified names; on another, incomplete names; on a third, labour recorded without names. “These three lines do different work,” she said. “The fact that a name cannot be read does not prove that the person never existed.”

Long ago in Mithila, a lamp burned on the outer veranda of Udayana's place of study until the first light of dawn. After the night's disputation, two piles of manuscript leaves had been laid apart. On one were written the arguments of the position being defended; on the other, the objections. As a disciple lifted the smoke-blackened wick, he asked, “How are we to accept the claim that something unseen exists as a cause?” Instead of answering, Udayana motioned for the disciple who was opening the manuscript to sit to one side.

A guest was to present the Mīmāṃsaka's pūrvapakṣa, the opposing position, at the day's assembly. Udayana invited him to speak first. The guest argued that the fruits of action often do not manifest immediately. To account for the later fruit ascribed to an act properly performed, the supposition of adṛṣṭa, the unseen, or apūrva, a potency not previously manifest, might be sufficient. Why, then, was it indispensable to posit a separate conscious governor for every such result? There was no mockery in the question. He proceeded to set out the grounds of his position systematically.

One pupil grew impatient. “What is unseen is unproved. There is an end to the matter.” Udayana stopped him. “Unseen and unproved are not the same word,” he said. “Some things are not directly perceived, yet an inference concerning them has conditions of its own. For now, hear our guest's statement to the end. Before you refute a position, you are obliged to understand it in its entirety.” The pupil folded the leaf in his hand, then opened it again.

The guest continued. If the mere observation of a delay between human action and its fruit were offered as proof that God was necessary, one would have to ask where the invariable relation, the vyāpti, had been established. If the unseen were admitted, could it adequately account for the connection through apūrva, or not? And if it could not, where precisely did the explanation fall short? Udayana had each question written down. In that room disagreement was finding its proper words; respect for argument did not become an obligation to agree.

Outside the veranda stood a small earthen pot. Its owner, an elderly potter, was turning over vessels soaked by the night's rain to dry. A disciple pointed to the pot and said that although the water inside could not be seen, its presence could be inferred from the weight; the unseen was much the same. The guest smiled. “Lift the pot and test it. You have a means of checking its weight. The relation you posit for the delayed fruit of an action has a different limit of verification. Do not suppose the dispute is already settled by stretching one example into the likeness of another.” Udayana told the disciple to ask the potter's permission before touching the mouth of the vessel.

Wet clay covered the potter's hands. As he turned a pot upside down, he said, “If I fail to sift out the sand mixed into my clay, the pot will break in the firing. But whenever I see a broken pot, I do not always blame the sand.

Sometimes it is the heat; sometimes the time given for drying.” Udayana smiled at the words, but did not turn them into ready-made proof of a scriptural proposition. “Your example shows that more than one cause may be possible,” he said, “and that is how far its usefulness extends.”

Before noon, the wording of a manuscript leaf caused a dispute between two disciples. One wished to set down the opposing questions in abbreviated form and move quickly to the answer. The other objected that this would weaken the guest's position. Udayana took up both leaves and examined them. On the first, five questions had been reduced to three; on the second, the space for the reply had been left blank. Udayana instructed the scribe to write “incomplete,” not “abridged,” upon the first. “Keep this leaf safe today. We shall answer tomorrow. First, do not cut away the body of the question.”

Back at the Videhapur pathshala, Hema was asking how much it would cost to reproduce the old pictures. Harimohan said the school's small fund could cover two copies, but the managing committee's permission would be required to reprint the display board. “Then let us make the corrections we can make on paper today,” Hema replied. “For the rest, we shall submit a written request.” Maithili Mishra was seated nearby, examining the old copy. “Where a name is incomplete, leave the space blank and add a clear note,” she said. “Do not lead readers to mistake a conjecture for the original record.”

Just then a woman unknown to them came to the front of the veranda. In a narrow bamboo basket she carried strips of paper protected against damp, knots of thread, and a small box of colour. She introduced herself as Nasima Shershahbadi. She had heard that the school needed someone to reinforce the edges of the exhibition sheets. “The paper you hang here will get wet,” she said. “Colour alone will not save it. It needs a strip fastened along the back first.” Hema slid the board towards her so that she could examine it.

Nasima unpacked her tools and steadied the torn corner of a sheet. “My family say it is pointless to give a full receipt for a small job,” she remarked. “But when I attach something to a sheet, there are three things to account for: the cost of materials, the time of my hands, and the terms of any later repair.” Meera asked, “How shall we put your name down in the account?” Nasima answered slowly and distinctly, “Nasima Shershahbadi. Exactly as I have told you.” Meera wrote the spelling on a slip and read it back to her.

Nasima examined the right-hand edge of the exhibition. “The last letters of the names have been cut away here,” she said. “The board is narrower than the width allowed for in printing. Whoever trimmed the sheet cut into the line of names.” Excited, Hema asked, “Then did the women's names disappear simply because of a printing mistake?” Nasima shook her head. “I can tell you this much: some letters on this sheet were cut away. Why names that were never written down to begin with are missing—that is not something I can discover from this corner.”

Hema rested a finger on the board and remained silent for a little while. Until then she had thought all the names had been removed deliberately. Now there was a physical explanation for part of the loss. But a printing error could not account for the women whose work had been left anonymous in the original list of the old ceremony. “I am revising my first accusation,” she told Harimohan. “The evidence of trimming in print must be kept separate from the question of names never entered in the original register.” Harimohan wrote both statements into the school's meeting book.

Looking at Nasima's box of colour, Jatan asked, “Does that paint cost a great deal?” “It has its price at the market,” Nasima replied. “But whatever remains here can be used on another job, so I shall deduct that from the account. What I shall not deduct is the time of the hands doing the work.” Birsi showed her the practice sheet bearing her letter “B.” Nasima offered her a narrow strip and said, “Ask your mother's permission before you paste this on. A child's first page does not belong to the school.” Reva laughed from a distance.

Hema showed Naira the old dredging page. Naira opened her notebook with care. “When you made this copy, did you have a chance to see the original?” she asked. “I found a copy of a photograph in an old box belonging to a family,” Hema said. “We still do not know whose hand wrote the original.” Turning the paper over, Naira replied, “Then the date of the paper and the date of what it describes must be checked separately. This is not the original list from the register of names. We can compare it with that list, but we must not force a match.”

Hema suddenly asked, “If some women's names are nowhere recorded, on what grounds can we recognise their labour?” “The measurements of the cooking, wage accounts, old tools and objects used in the work, separate accounts given by families—whatever can be found,” Naira answered. “Record the sorrow of what cannot be found as well, but do not put names of your own choosing into the empty spaces.” Sarita was just setting down a pot of dal. “And even if not a single name had been written,” she said, “somebody must have gone to clear out that mud. To know that work was done and to know the names of those who did it are two different questions.”

Nasima reached for a bowl of dal, then stopped. “In which book is the price of this meal recorded?” she asked. “We are eating together today,” Sarita answered. “But the water, the firewood and the work of cooking are accounted for separately.” Nasima laughed. “Then neither names nor rice go unaccounted for on this veranda.” Jatan came over with his empty bowl. Hema told him to wash his hands first, then gave him two little packets of roasted grain as well.

During the midday recess in that ancient debate, the guest came back to Udayana. “You had my question written down,” he said, “but my position is not that everything invisible works of itself. I am asking at precisely what point an additional conscious cause must be held indispensable, when the unseen already admitted may explain the connection with the fruit of an act.” Udayana inclined his head. “We shall set down the question in that form,” he said, “so that the burden of answering rests upon me, not upon a distortion of your position.”

When the disciples had gathered, Udayana laid down a simple rule. Each side must first restate its opponent's reasoning in a form the opponent accepted, and only then advance an objection. One disciple complained that this would take too much time. “If you invent a false opposing argument to save time,” Udayana said, “the answer will come quickly, but what you produce will be confusion, not disputation.” The guest had the rule entered on his leaf. The complexity of the assembly was not diminished; the likelihood of humiliation was diminished a little.

Then a pupil of eleven asked, “If a person does evil and does not suffer the consequence at once, is that because of the unseen? And what of the innocent who suffer?” Udayana did not give him an instant answer about fate. “The idea of the unseen cannot erase responsibility for every injustice that we can see,” he said. “Whose hands performed the deed, who was hurt: what can be investigated in this life must first be investigated. Our disagreement about the unseen is another debate, still before us.” The guest accepted the limits of this reply; the original philosophical dispute remained unresolved.

A disciple asked whether this reply should be written into the book as Udayana's final and definitive doctrine. “Write that it was the conclusion reached by today's assembly,” Udayana answered. “Do not make it into a line of my authoritative treatise and quote it without an established text.” He placed a small mark in the right-hand corner, so that the leaf would keep its proper place within the imagined record of the debate. This manner of writing showed respect for questions, with no desire to mislead readers of a later age.

In Videhapur, Hema was drafting a new proposal for the school's history lesson. Her first sentence read: “The contribution of women to the dredging of the old pond.” Harimohan asked, “What comes after that?” Hema wrote a second sentence: “The available pages do not preserve every name in full; the list of verified names extends only as far as the names that can clearly be read.” She left several blank signs where names would have stood, but added that these blanks signified a lack of evidence, not an absence of labour.

An elderly teacher did not like the new wording. “Why put controversy on the school wall?” he asked. “People want to remember their forebears.” “So do I,” Hema replied. “But why should remembering them require us to forget the women of their households?” The teacher said that adding names to anonymous work could provoke disputes between families. “It could,” Hema acknowledged. “That is why we shall give a source for every name. Where a name is incomplete, we shall not display it as complete.”

Someone proposed that Naira connect the school board to the private documents in the register of names. Her reply was unequivocal. “The original page containing Sarita’s twenty-seven names is not material for this exhibition,” she said. “The public history of dredging the pond and the rights governing records connected with a living person’s safety are separate matters.” Hema agreed at once. She wanted to restore women’s names to the history of labour; she did not want that victory at the price of anyone’s confidential identity.

Nasima prepared a sample of the new reinforcing strip. She had a small receipt for the paper, with her name, the quantities of the materials, the hours of work and the transport charge entered separately. “A receipt for such a little favour?” a school volunteer asked. “Those who wish to give help may do so on their own terms,” Nasima replied. “What was discussed with me was a job. This is work.” Hema wrote the time of receipt on Nasima’s bill and signed it. The date of payment was entered separately; she did not receive the entire sum at once.

In the afternoon Meera brought the children over to the exhibition. In the old picture of the pond, Jatan noticed a long bamboo pole. “Did someone carry that pole there?” he asked. “Yes,” Meera replied, “in somebody’s hands. Those hands are not shown in this picture.” “Then is the picture incomplete?” Birsi asked. “A picture may be complete within what it chooses to show,” Meera told her, “but what we need to know cannot all be found in the picture alone.” Birsi was not satisfied with the answer, but she had found herself another question.

Sarita was sorting greens on the school’s wooden bench for the evening meal. Hema asked who in the family had told her the story of the 1939 dredging page. “It happened before I was born,” Sarita said. “What I know is a memory passed down through the mouths of later generations. Not all of it is of the same standing as what can be read on paper.” Hema wrote down the phrase: “Oral recollection: a separate source.” Sarita laughed. “Will you put my name beside that?” “If you give permission,” Hema replied.

Somri Hembram arrived with a copy of her four questions about her contract. Seeing Nasima at work binding the paper, she asked whether Nasima could also make her pages safe. “I can,” Nasima said, “but I shall not interpret the meaning of your contract. A translator’s work calls for separate payment.” Somri smiled. “That is all I want—that each person who knows a kind of work should have their name written beside it.” There was no long sermon between them. The thread was drawn tight, and the edge of the paper made straight.

No answer to Hema's application arrived that evening. The school's officer in charge merely wrote that the sample of the revised history lesson would be considered at the next committee meeting. Hema did not insist that the board be replaced immediately. Instead, she had Nasima attach a temporary strip beneath the sheet: “This picture and list of names are based on incomplete sources; verification of the proposed corrections is in progress.” She had kept her promise not to conceal the empty spaces. The definitive publication of the names was still to come.

Night fell on the place of study in the older age, and both manuscript leaves from the disputation were closed. Udayana read the guest's recorded questions back to him. The guest corrected two words: “necessary” and “sufficient.” The disciple wrote the corrected words again. “Today,” Udayana said, “the argument and the objection have been preserved. The road towards an answer begins here.” On his way out, the guest noticed the potter's dried vessels. He asked the price of a pot and chose one for his drinking water. The conclusion of the doctrine remained unsettled; the buying and selling of the pot was complete.

Before leaving for home in Videhapur, Hema raised the school's damp display board onto the wall once more. Nasima tightened a knot of thread behind it. Hema placed the receipt in a register separate from the pages of history, so that payment for labour would not be allowed to disappear into anonymity again. Jatan stumbled over the letters as he read the temporary notice. “It says ‘incomplete’ here,” Birsi said. “Shall we read it again?” “Yes,” Hema answered. “When a new page comes, we shall read it again. We will not hide the old mistake.”

As Naira went away, she noticed two shadows cast on the veranda's outer wall: one from the board, the other from the bamboo prop. The shadows ran together, though the objects were different. She made no attempt to prove her private experience at Puranadhar by means of this sight. The next day she had to examine photographs of two similar faces; the distance between seeing the same likeness and declaring the same identity had yet to be crossed. Inside, the school's new strip stirred lightly in the breeze, while the knot Nasima had tied held fast in its place.

Chapter 35 · The Recognition of the Gavaya

The board that had hung all night in the school veranda was being taken down. The knot in Nasima's thread held firm, but a new sheet pasted beside it fluttered at the slightest breath of wind. It belonged not to the school but to the market's search party. Two blurred photographs had been attached to it: one taken at the bus stand, the other in the western lane. In each, half of a man's face could be seen. Between them someone had written in red ink: "The same man?" Below, another hand had added: "Enquiries concerning Mithun." Mira Mandal stopped as she steadied the board. Before anything else, she kept the children from reading the notice.

Jatan was drawing lines in the earth outside. Birsi had laid out yesterday's lesson pages to dry in the sun. The red lettering aroused their curiosity. "Is this another picture of a child-stealer?" Jatan asked. Mira laid her palm across the edge of the paper. "For now, these are two photographs, not an accusation. We must examine where they came from before writing anyone's name." Birsi asked, "If the faces look alike, why shouldn't they belong to the same man?" "Looking alike and being the same," Mira replied, "are two different things. That is what we shall study today."

When Naira arrived, she carried a slender file: copies of information gathered by volunteers searching for Mithun. The original complaint was with Lata, and the formal investigation was proceeding along its own separate course. This file had been assembled to help people cooperate in the search. It gave Naira no authority to write "suspect" across a photograph in red and thereby turn a person into a criminal. She stared at the notice in surprise. "How did this picture get out of my file?" she asked. "Someone pasted it up here during the night," Mira said. "It bears no school seal."

The first photograph showed part of the signboard of a tea stall at the bus stand. In the second, a person was turning away, the shadow of a gamchha falling across his eyes. The images differed in date, distance and the camera with which they had been taken. Naira turned the sheet over. The file did not name the person who had supplied the photograph. It merely said, "Seen." "Seen by whom?" she asked. "No one wrote that down," Mira replied. Naira was silent for a moment. When she had published Mahesh's account too hastily, she had made her gravest mistake at precisely this point: she had filled a blank space on paper with her own certainty.

Just then Reva Gulgulia came from the direction of the railway square. In one hand she carried Jatan's small notebook, in the other Birsi's damp sheet of writing. There had been talk since the previous night of moving the encampment yet again; the road beside it was waterlogged. Reva stood before Mira and said, "We were told to meet the head today. The children's names are still on the class register, but not on the school's admission roll. What house am I to show the people who demand a house number?" There was more exhaustion than anger in the question. Meanwhile, the children wanted to look at the letters they had written.

Mira showed her the letter brought out from the school's little office. It said that address verification was pending. "I did not stop them from learning yesterday either," Mira said. "But without a written order admitting them, the class on my veranda cannot count as enrolment in the school." Reva laid the notebook in her lap. "So childhood must stay where it is while I wander from place to place? A child's age is not tethered to a house-post." On hearing this, Mira looked at the clock. There was still some time before the head's meeting began. Rather than simply take the children along, she first asked Reva how far their photographs and personal papers could be shown to others.

At the bend of the veranda a woman Mira had not seen before was setting down a bucket and a tube of rolled paper. The bucket held no lime, only thin strips of washed wood. Her name was Rajo Bhogta. For the time being she lived in a small house between the school and the railway square. Because she had moved about the town, her old certificate of residence in the village and her present rent receipt gave different addresses. She was also owed two days' wages for carrying materials for the school. She approached Mira with an application. "I put my name down for school assistance," she said, "but the office says the papers do not agree because there are two addresses. Does living in two places mean I am two human beings?"

Hearing Rajo, Reva turned round. "Do your papers show your first home?" she asked. "Yes. My people are still there. I find work here. What kind of reckoning allows the address of one place to wipe out what I earn in another?" Mira examined the copy of Rajo's old certificate and her new rent receipt separately. Rajo put out a hand to stop her. "First write down who you are showing these papers to and why. Last time I handed over a copy, I never found out whose phone received its photograph." Naira immediately wrote the purpose of the inspection on a blank sheet. Only after Rajo had read it and agreed did she show them the copies.

By then word of the red notice had spread outside. A shopkeeper from the market came towards the school. The same gamchha, the same line of the cheek, he insisted, appeared in both photographs. If the pictures were set aside during the investigation, the guilty man would escape. "Have you seen the original files of both photographs?" Naira asked. The shopkeeper shook his head. "No. But I have eyes." Rajo did not laugh at his reasoning. She picked up one of her wooden strips and placed it beside another before him. "Look at these two thin pieces of wood," she said. "One belongs to a school window, the other to a bench. Their colour and width are alike. Does that make the window a bench?" "That is wood," the shopkeeper said, "not a human being." "Then we ought to be more careful still," Rajo answered quietly, "when we speak of a human being."

Mira had already been thinking of an old example for the children's lesson. On the board she wrote "gavaya." Jatan stumbled over the word, and Birsi helped him sound out the letters in her own way. Mira said, "Suppose someone who knows the forest tells you that a gavaya is an animal resembling a cow. Later, in the forest, you see an unfamiliar creature, recall that description and understand what the word 'gavaya' refers to. That is the kind of relation discussed under upamāna, knowledge through comparison. The cow and the gavaya have not become one and the same animal." "So it can look like a cow and still have another name?" Jatan asked. "Yes," Mira said. "And it would be a still greater mistake to use this example to declare that two human beings must have the same identity."

Harimohan Pathak came out from inside. He heard the children laughing and repeating "gavaya." When Jatan mispronounced it as "gavaiya," a singer, Rajo smiled. "Don't summon a singer," she said. "He'll arrive with a song and demand payment for it too." The children laughed. Harimohan drew two columns on the board: "Relation between word and object" and "Identity of a person." "In the first," he said, "resemblance can be a useful indication. In the second, the likeness of faces alone proves neither a name, an event nor a crime. The day and place of the photograph, whose camera took it, and independent confirmation of the person's identity: these call for separate enquiries."

Long before, in Mithila, during the period of Gangesha's studies, a pupil had been writing out the example of the gavaya. He remembered the sentence he had heard: the animal resembling a cow is called a gavaya. "If I say 'gavaya' as soon as I see a cow-like shape," he asked, "is my knowledge complete?" The teacher first distinguished the sentence he had heard from the object he had seen. "Ask whose trustworthy words you heard, how the unfamiliar creature really corresponds to that description, and how you understood the relation of the word to its object. You cannot see one distinctive mark of a cow and call every wild animal a gavaya."

"And if, after seeing one gavaya, I see another?" the student asked. "Then you have reached questions about the class to which a thing belongs and the difference between individuals," the teacher replied. "The purpose of this disputation is to understand the meaning of the word 'gavaya,' not to catch a thief. Learn its limits first." That day an analogy was entered in the notebook, with a space left beneath it for objections. The propositions of that philosophical debate belonged to the questions of their own time; a photograph from Videhapur many ages later could not serve as evidence for them.

When the door of the head's office opened in Videhapur, Mira went in with Reva, Rajo and the children. The clerk looked at Rajo's papers and declared at once, "There are two addresses. The assistance will have to be stopped." "Which assistance, and under what rule?" Rajo asked. "And why have you added my wages for carrying goods to this?" The clerk turned the file over. A number from the receipt for transporting materials had been entered beside the application for assistance; because the name was the same, the two accounts had been linked. "Examine the connection between these entries first," Mira said. "Here Rajo is a worker; elsewhere she is an applicant for assistance. Even when a copied sheet is the same, the purposes of the accounts are different."

The head said that eligibility for assistance would be examined separately, but it had been a mistake to place the transport-wage receipt in the assistance application. Rajo insisted that the two sheets be separated. "All this dispute over such a small sum?" an employee present in the office asked. Lifting her bucket, Rajo said, "It is a small sum on your desk. When it reaches my house, it will buy salt and oil." The head gave the payment department written instructions to examine the receipt separately. Rajo did not receive her wages that day, but the grounds for treating them as a suspicious transaction in her assistance file had been removed.

When Reva's turn came, the office again asked for a permanent address. She opened Jatan's notebook. "The child's name is written here, not the number of a house," she said. "I will not write down a false number. I have copies of the slips from the places where he studied before. Tell me in writing what other way there is to complete the verification you require." The clerk said admission could not take place without the procedure. "I am not opposed to procedure," Mira replied. "But there must be a procedure that does not leave out a child whose home moves." The head turned to the notebook and looked at its pages: Jatan's reversed 'ज' and Birsi's straight 'ब'.

"This is not the school's regular attendance record," the head said. "No," Mira replied. "And calling such a class regular enrolment would give us a false account. But while a decision is pending, why should the children be deprived of lessons?" The head issued a written order that attendance in the temporary class and decisions about admission should be entered in separate registers. There had still been no formal admission; a possible alternative method of address verification remained for consideration at the next meeting. Reva took the acknowledgement of receipt into her own hands. She did not smile on reading the order. Her first question was, "Where will the class be tomorrow?" "For now, on the veranda," Mira said. "We shall decide together how to make our way around the town."

Outside the office they met Lata. She had been gathering information from another house in the western lane in the search for Mithun. Sleeplessness had left its weariness around her eyes. When she heard about the red photographs, she went straight to Naira. "There is a possibility that both faces belong to the same man, isn't there?" she asked. "There must be grounds before we can speak of a possibility," Naira replied. "These images do not yet establish a person's identity. It would be wrong to put the person linked to the second picture on a list of criminal suspects." There was a sharpness in Lata's voice. "Are you cutting away my hope again?" "Not your hope," Naira said. "I am setting a limit to one inference. We are keeping safe all the other concrete information in Mithun's search."

The shopkeeper still had the first picture in his hand when Sajid came up. Instead of saving the photograph on his phone, Sajid first asked who had supplied this copy on paper. "I got it from a market group," the shopkeeper replied. "I don't know whose phone held the original." Sajid raised the sheet towards the light from a window. "Half the shop's name can be seen here," he said. "But has anyone checked whether that signboard was replaced last month or a year ago? And the clock visible in the corner could be the shop's clock, not a record of the time the picture was taken."

"Then the photograph is useless?" Mira asked. Sajid shook his head. "No. It may tell us something about a place. Perhaps it can be matched against another witness's account. But this sheet tells us nothing reliable about the camera, the date, the limits of the crop or the whole face. I do not have the original file, so I will not claim to know its digital timestamp either." Naira wrote down his words exactly as he had spoken them. For the first time the shopkeeper said, "I was only trying to help." Lata looked at him. "Help us. But if your own son goes missing one day, do not paste your grief over the face of a stranger."

Mira brought two vessels of water from the school. The shopkeeper looked ashamed; Sajid had not snatched the paper from his hand. Behind the veranda, Reva was taking out flattened rice for the children to eat. Rajo gave them jaggery from a little tin in her bag. Handing half his piece to Birsi, Jatan asked, "Is today's lesson over?" "No," Mira said. "You have all asked some very good questions today. Now eat, and put your notebooks away." Lata's anguish was not dispelled in that moment, but amid the children's chatter the voices around her sounded ordinary again, if only for a little while.

Lata examined the photographs. In the first, sunlight fell along the side of the man's cheek; in the second there was shadow. Even the colour of his clothes could not be made out clearly. "What if this man saw Mithun?" she asked. "Then, once his identity is established, he may be a witness," Naira replied. "If we call him an accused man before checking, it will become harder even to ask him what really happened." Lata nodded slowly. She did not demand that the sheet be pulled down and torn apart. Instead she said, "Keep the original copy safe. Remove the red word 'suspect.' If someone who actually saw anything comes forward, take that person's statement separately."

In Mira's and Lata's presence, Naira opened the community search register. On the page it said: "One person: similar face, possible connection." Above that line she entered an unmistakable correction: "Identity unverified; not to be used as grounds for suspicion of a crime." She recorded the uncertainty of the images' provenance separately. An untouched copy of the original images was placed in an envelope for safekeeping, so that their dates and sources could still be examined. No one's face was to be put on a public notice. Lata gave her written consent for a copy of the correction to be sent to the officer conducting the formal investigation.

Mira brought the board outside once more. "So the man in the picture wasn't a thief?" Jatan asked. "I do not know who the man was," Mira replied. "When we do not know, calling him a thief is wrong. And if we have spoken wrongly about someone, we should not wait for a great public announcement before putting it right." Beside the picture she had drawn of her home, Birsi drew another house. "The two houses look just alike," she said. "Can I say I live in both?" Reva laughed. "You might live in both. But a picture cannot tell us where you will sleep tonight. I can tell you that."

After leaving the office, Rajo set her wooden strips outside the school. She showed Nasima her account for the work of making a new edge for the board. "The two sets of papers have been separated," she said, "but I still have to count my payment again." Nasima checked the knot in her thread. "Count it when the person who owes you is standing there. Otherwise tomorrow they'll say it was assistance work." "This time," Rajo said, "I'll have it written clearly on the receipt that the place of work is temporary, but the worker's name remains the same." The two women gathered up their tools.

In the evening, an employee of the head came to Mira with a short letter. It asked for a plan for a public site for the temporary teaching camp, language assistance and safe travel; the school vehicle was not yet available. Padma would need a means of communication in the classroom, and Sanket had his own conditions concerning the use of his equipment. Mira knew that no such plan could be made without their consent and payment. "You will be there yourself at the next meeting," she told Reva. "I will not decide where the children's home is according to my own reckoning." Reva took the children's hands and sat down at the edge of the veranda. The path for tomorrow was still to be settled not on paper, but among people.

That night Naira wrote three lines in her notebook: "Resemblance: observed"; "Identity: unverified"; "Crime: unproven." Beneath them, with Lata's permission, she recorded the time for the continuing search and a place of contact. The original page bearing Sarita's twenty-seven names was not part of this notebook; it remained separately in Sarita's custody. Naira looked outside. The board cast two shadows on the school wall, one new and one old. From a distance they looked alike; close up, the nail in one shone new, while the other bore the rust of years. She did not mistake the shadows for evidence. Inside, Birsi and Jatan were putting away their own notebooks. That night their names remained not on a sheet of accusations, but in the notebooks in which they were learning to read.

Chapter 36 · The School Beyond the Walls

Jatan had set three bricks together on the school veranda to make a little platform for his notebook. The morning's rainwater had drained away, but the earth was still wet. One of the bricks sank at the edge of the platform, and his notebook slid into the mud. Birsi picked it up, brushed the dirt from its pages and said, “You've rubbed out the ‘ba’ I wrote, too.” “How did I rub it out?” Jatan protested. “The brick sank.” Mira Mandal watched them both. No separate report was needed now to demonstrate how makeshift their place of learning was; the damp corner of the notebook lifted from the mud said enough.

Mira had brought in her bag the letter received from the school office the previous evening. It required a proposed route for a temporary teaching team travelling through the town, provision for language assistance and safe movement, and an account of the work's expenses. The letter did not decide the question of formal enrolment. Reva Gulgulia sat beside a pile of notebooks. “Will Jatan be able to study on this veranda only when the town comes here?” she asked. “If we come near your home,” Mira replied, “who will decide when we must go round to the others?” “All those who will be travelling,” said Reva. “If you draw up a fixed route without asking us, we'll find ourselves in the same trouble again.”

Padma arrived with two boards, drawings made in chalk and small pieces of cardboard in her bag. On seeing the school veranda, she spoke first not to the children but to Mira. “What have I been called here to do today—conduct a class, or help people understand the language used in the meeting?” “We need both,” Mira said. “Then enter the time and the payment for each separately,” Padma replied. “When I interpret a child's signs, that child is making themselves understood to me. Do not treat our voices as yours to use without payment.” Mira opened her notebook. She offered no praise in place of an answer to the objection; on a blank page she drew two separate lines.

Sanket came up from behind carrying a phone and an old speaker in a small cloth bag. The edge of the phone's screen was cracked, though its sound still worked properly. He did not put the equipment down in the middle of the veranda. “Does everyone here need to hear it played?” Padma asked. “First I'll find out who wants to listen,” Sanket said. “If someone doesn't, it won't be played.” A little girl was sitting at some distance; loud sound troubled her. Through hand signs and drawn pictures Padma found out what she preferred. The child chose the route symbols drawn on the board instead of the speaker. Sanket put the speaker back into his bag.

To make the first map of their journeys through the town, they were all to go towards Rajinar. Three roads branched from there, towards the school, the temporary shelter and the treatment room. Beside the raised platform, the old railing had been cordoned off with a temporary rope during the last repairs. The rope was still tied, but someone had rested a loaded sack against it, and a stake had begun to lean. Reva caught Jatan by the hand and drew him back. “Decide on the route first,” she said. “The children can come afterwards.” Lalit had been called in about the repairs. Bending down, he examined the earth behind the stake. “I've already reported that the railing is loose,” he said. “Simply tightening the rope again won't make it a permanent repair.”

At that moment Madan Raut arrived in his small vehicle. In the back were a folded bench, two ropes and an empty crate used for carrying medicines. He sometimes transported things for the school, but the fare and the time were settled separately on every occasion. “Could you bring the children along this route twice a week?” Mira asked him. Rather than unfold the bench, Madan first consulted his notebook of working hours. “If a call comes in the morning to take a patient,” he said, “I cannot leave a child halfway along the road. And if I already have children aboard, I cannot turn the vehicle around at once to collect a patient. The promises for these two jobs must be separate.”

“Then how are we to rely on the vehicle?” Reva asked. “First decide which days are for the regular round and which are for emergency journeys to treatment,” Madan answered. “When there is an emergency, who will arrange another means of transport for the school? Calling something a vehicle does not, by itself, make the work possible.” Sanket drew two strips, one red and one blue, on his board. Padma stopped him. “You cannot be sure that red means danger to everyone in the same way. There must be words and signs as well as colours.” Beneath the strips Sanket wrote ‘School round’ and ‘Patient transport’. Madan had two different fares entered. He lowered the charge for the school, but did not erase the cost of fuel or the driver's wages.

Saraswati Thakur came from the nearby lane carrying a bag filled with combs, scissors and strips of cloth. Work for the families of hospital patients had kept her out late the night before. Her daughter was on the school veranda that day, drawing a picture of the broken wire of a piece of equipment. “Will there be teaching here,” Saraswati asked, “or will the children be put straight back into my workbag?” “They need a place where each can say which road they want to take,” Mira replied. Saraswati looked at her daughter's drawing. “Because I have these scissors, why does everyone assume she too must earn her living with them? She likes taking equipment apart to see how it works. I want information about that kind of training.”

One of the school employees laughed. “If she learns her mother's work, she'll have a way of earning already.” Saraswati did not answer his laughter with laughter. “There is no smallness in the work,” she said, “but we ought to ask who is to choose whose work. I will not draw up an advance account of my daughter's earnings in place of her education.” The employee said the training would cost money. “It will,” Saraswati acknowledged. “That is why I want to change the hours of my work. I'll give up uncertain calls at night and take regular customers in the morning. My income will fall; but I will not save it by wiping out my child's wishes." Padma explained this to the daughter in simple words. The girl touched the drawing and said, "First I want to learn how to join this wire safely."

Just then Pratima Rajvanshi arrived with an old copybook and a folded map. Her family preserved the memory of an old donation connected with the school land; exactly which land it was, on what conditions it had been given, and who now held what rights still awaited examination of the papers. Pratima showed them two iron rods recently driven into the ground behind the school wall. "Someone is talking about measuring out land here for a market lease," she said. "If this is part of the school's public-use land, nobody can fence it off without an inquiry." Before taking the map, Naira asked, "Is this the original document?" "No," Pratima said. "It's the copy kept at home. The original is mentioned in the margin of this page. We have yet to find it."

Naira studied a corner of the copy. One mark on the old boundary appeared to correspond to the raised platform at Rajinar, but the present roads and the measurements on the page did not fall into the same pattern. "You can't establish ownership just by looking at an old brick," Lalit said. "We must also find out whether the school or the municipality is responsible for repairing this railing." "I am not making a final claim of ownership on the strength of a copy," Pratima answered. "But until the inquiry is complete, why should anyone be allowed to fence off the children's route?" The head's employee suggested that the rods might stand on private land. Naira recorded that statement too. They agreed to prepare a request for the written order authorising the rods and for a verified map of the boundary.

An elderly woman came back along the Rajinar path with water. "New papers are drawn up every day," she said. "Will anyone tell us whether the water in the well is fit to drink?" "I carry patients," Madan answered. "I don't test water." Lalit likewise explained that inspecting bricks could tell them nothing about the cleanliness of the water. On her page Mira wrote two separate questions: the safety of the railing and platform; the testing of the water and information about its use. "Which way are the children to go until the tests are done?" the old woman asked. Folding her map, Pratima replied, "There's a narrow lane to the east, but a handcart can't get through it." At once a route ceased to be merely a line: it became the different bodies and different kinds of work of many people.

Padma had them practise three different journeys. Jatan carried a board and notebook, Reva a vessel of water, and Madan a vehicle key. Each needed a different way past the well. Sanket did not show the three journeys with a single arrow in his notebook. On the board he drew small pictures: a child on foot, a handcart and a vehicle. The little girl who had earlier refused the speaker pointed to the narrow turn behind the platform in the drawing. With her hand she made a gesture for going around. Before interpreting it, Padma asked the child again; the girl nodded to confirm the sign. She was under no obligation to speak in front of everybody.

Jatan turned the exercise in finding a route into a game. He folded a paper boat, set it on one side of the platform and said, “This is my school; this is my house. If the water of the well comes between them, shall I sail a boat?” “Your paper boat will get wet and sink,” Birsi replied. “Find a dry road first.” Everybody laughed, but Jatan quietly picked up the boat and put it on the other side. He drew a new route on the board. “Then shall I go the long way round?” he asked. “Yes,” said Padma, “but make a road beside it for someone who cannot walk. Not every child comes at the same pace.” A third line appeared in Jatan's drawing. For the first time, the map of the school on paper was beginning to show the different journeys of three people.

As an immediate precaution, Lalit put up a temporary bamboo barrier two arm's lengths away from the loose railing. Saraswati supplied a strip of leftover red cloth, but Padma warned them not to depend on colour alone being visible. Following the method Nasima had used earlier for tying bamboo, Lalit had the words ‘Do not go this way’ written on a small board, with a bent-line symbol beside them. Mira asked the children to read the sentence aloud. The barrier was meant only for safety until the inspection, not as somebody's private wall; a dated notice saying so was written in Madan's and Pratima's presence. Lalit also made out a receipt for his materials and labour. No one claimed that the well had now been completely repaired.

Back on the school veranda, the committee met. On the first page Padma had the limits of her work set down: language assistance, communication adapted to differing needs in hearing, and adjustment of teaching in consultation with the children; no circulation of confidential family names or voices. “What I hear does not become my property,” she said. “The child whose words they are, and that child's family, retain their rights over them.” Sanket took out his phone and told the school employee, “The original recording stays on my device. No copying without asking. If we make pictures for teaching, no one's face or private papers will be put into them.” “Then how will we get proof?” the employee asked. “There are work registers, agreed accounts of attendance, and ordinary teaching materials that have been approved,” Sanket replied. “A child's face is not the only route to proof.”

Reva raised the question of her son's enrolment again. Mira was unequivocal. “Attendance at this travelling school does not amount to formal admission. I won't put the two together on one sheet and give you a false assurance.” Reva was silent for a little while. Then she said, “But let it be written somewhere that Jatan is studying.” “He will keep his own notebook,” Padma said. “The committee will keep only a collective account of how many lessons have been given.” Pratima added, “And if this turns out to be public land, the school's written permission to use the veranda will govern it, not the whim of the family that made the donation.” No one in the meeting gave particular applause to a statement that went against her own family's possible claim; the employee entered it in the minutes.

A disagreement arose over the times of Madan's rounds. The school wanted his vehicle available every morning at eight; Madan would not make that promise for a vehicle kept in readiness for patients. “If somebody suddenly needs treatment,” one parent asked, “will you leave the children to walk?” “No,” said Madan. “That is why we must decide beforehand the name, contact details and fare of another means of transport. One vehicle of mine cannot be in two places.” Mira proposed that the first two rounds be held at safe sites within walking distance, with a separate plan for children who could not walk that far; if the vehicle was needed, the school should contract with Madan for specified days in advance. Padma added that a class could not be called open to everyone while ignoring the cost of reaching it from far away.

Meanwhile Saraswati's daughter had drawn the wire of Sanket's old speaker again. Sanket would not let her touch the equipment; first he showed her why the switch must be turned off and what precautions to understand before removing a wire. “I need a broken thing to practise on,” the girl said, “not something that is working.” Saraswati laughed when she heard her. “I ought to tell my customers the same thing,” she said. “Just because I have scissors in my hand doesn't mean every head of hair must be cut at once.” Between mother and daughter there was a small decision: the following week they would ask for the training list, and Saraswati would alter her working hours a little. They had not yet raised the application fee. But the two of them had already made their first decision towards changing the course of her work.

Naira kept looking over the papers for the temporary school. Three registers seemed to lie together in the same bag: the children's lessons, the repairs to the well, and the itinerary of the travelling teaching team. If anyone's name were entered in the wrong place, an earlier mistake could happen all over again. “Applications for enrolment belong in the school alone,” she told Mira. “If the route map is made public, exact home locations must be taken off it. The minutes concerning the well should record only the work, its cost and the people responsible.” Mira agreed. The register for the search for Mithun was not opened at that meeting; Lata's authorised contact details and the actual search remained under their separate arrangements. The original page containing Sarita's twenty-seven names was not there either.

Towards evening the head's employee came with a short reply. It stated that the temporary arrangement allowing lessons to continue on the school's outer veranda would not be obstructed; for new rounds through the town, however, a formal proposal setting out parental consent, safe routes and expenses would have to be submitted. This was not final approval. Mira read the letter aloud. “Then where will lessons be held the day after tomorrow?” Reva asked. “Here,” Mira replied. “Before we fix the first day of travelling through the town, we need all your signatures.” “Not signatures alone,” Padma corrected her. “Everyone must understand the decision in their own language.” Madan said he would provide the fare calculation for the two proposed days tomorrow; no one should assume he was available during the hours set aside for patients.

On the last page of the proposal Saraswati added three lines: ‘Information on training for every family’; ‘A mother's occupation is not a daughter's obligation’; ‘An account of income lost when working hours are changed’. Pratima had this entered: ‘Request a verified boundary for the school land; do not close off the passage pending inquiry.’ Madan's signature, made with the point of his pen, was a little crooked; he took a separate notebook and wrote out again that the terms for the proposed school vehicle and for patient transport would remain distinct. Padma read the figure entered for her payment and corrected it. Sanket asked everyone for permission to photograph the page; consent was given only to make a copy of its public portions.

Two children stayed on the veranda until late. Jatan turned over his damp notebook and laid it on a page that had dried. Sitting in the shade, Birsi asked, “Will the brick sink again tomorrow?” Lalit gave them a leftover piece of dry wood. “Put it here,” he said. “It's not a proper desk, but your notebook won't fall in the mud.” “How much does it cost?” Jatan asked. Lalit paused. “It's an offcut. In the work account, we'll put the price of the wood down as zero. But when a proper bench is made, the charge for the labour will be separate.” For Jatan, this accounting was another lesson in arithmetic.

Rukhsana brought rice and water in the evening. Another argument arose over who would supply grain on which days and who would cook for the community kitchen. “When this school starts travelling, the children will need something to eat as well,” Mira said. Rukhsana set down the plate. “They will. But through whose labour? Put down the cook's time alongside the price of rice.” Urmila, returning from a day's work carrying laundry, heard her words. She was tired, but she fetched water for Rukhsana. “Let us eat first,” she said, “and look at the accounts again tomorrow. But we won't abandon the accounts.” There was hot rice and dal on the plate; tonight nobody needed testimony or a clue to some secret.

Beside Rajinar, the temporary bamboo barrier stood firm in the darkness. The railing was still loose, the water had yet to be tested, and the correct boundary of the school land was still unknown. Yet on the children's veranda a new wooden support now held their notebooks clear of the mud. As they were leaving, Padma asked Sanket, “How will you keep the original of the sign you drew on the board?” “With the little girl's permission, the board will stay at the school,” Sanket said. “I won't keep even a faceless copy of it on my phone. If she wants it changed next time, we'll change it.” “Then learning will continue,” said Padma, “but the child's voice will not be imprisoned in one place.” Madan's empty vehicle passed out along the narrow lane ahead.

They still had to decide together which road the children would take the day after tomorrow. At least this much had been settled today: nobody would silently make that decision in their place.

Chapter 37 · The Cook's Name

The rain had stopped, but the ashes beneath Rukhsana's hearth were still damp. She looked at the makeshift stove on the school veranda, three bricks set close together, and instead of putting wood on it, her first act was to move it. Muddy water seeped from behind the bricks. If a fire were lit there, the one dry place where the children could keep their notebooks would be filled once more with smoke and mud. She called to Mira Mandal. "There will be cooking where there are lessons," she said, "but the way to the fire must not be the children's way."

Mira came carrying the letter from the previous evening. Final permission for the travelling school to make its rounds through the town was still pending, although classes were going on in the outer veranda of the school. The attendance register and the register of formal enrolment were being kept separately. "Let us arrange rice for the children for two days," Mira said. "Then we can work out the next part of the route." Rukhsana asked, "How many children? Who will cook? And who will pay?" "People are giving grain," Mira replied. Wiping the wet clay from the brick off her palm, Rukhsana said, "Grain does not turn into cooked rice merely by passing from hand to hand."

Reva Gulgulia was drying the torn notebook belonging to her son, Jatan. Hearing them, she said, "I can work too, but Jatan must be allowed to go on studying. I cannot leave him behind and sit at a stove all day." A school employee heard her and said, "If the mothers from the households each give an hour, why should there be any need for wages?" Rukhsana looked towards him. "Would you want to prepare registers for an hour at a time and have your payment left out of the accounts?" The employee searched for an answer. "Anyone who wishes to volunteer should be free to do so," Rukhsana said. "But choosing not to volunteer is no offence. And write down the names of those who do."

A proposal had been made to hold this year's annual Shared Kitchen and Wages Day on that very school veranda. The previous year, people had called the food a free gift and failed to count the hours spent by the women who cooked it. This time, Rukhsana asked for the paperwork before anything else. She had three headings written on a board: Grain and Other Ingredients; Roasting and Preparation; Labour of Cooking and Serving. "There must be three separate sheets," she said. "Otherwise the name of the person who gives the rice will be printed, and the name of the person who tends the fire will vanish again."

Long ago, in the city of King Virata, the royal kitchens had grown hot while the morning was still young. Steam rose from great cooking pots, and grains of paddy lay scattered across the veranda floor. A powerfully built newcomer to the kitchen had introduced himself as Ballava. He had been given a place at court as a skilled cook, but his true name was Bhima, compelled to conceal his identity during the final year of exile.

On his first day an old servant of the kitchen looked at his hands and asked, "You can lift such a weight, but do you know how to measure spices?" Ballava made no grand claim. He took the pestle in his hand and asked the woman pounding paddy, "How much salt does this household use for one pot?" She answered, "The king's palate has one measure, a patient another, a traveller newly arrived a third." Ballava listened carefully. Strength could lift a pot; strength alone could not determine the measure on which flavour and health depended.

The chief cook of the palace was writing the number of guests at his table. He added Ballava's name on one line, but there were no blank lines for those who picked the grain, washed the greens, or dried the firewood. They had been working for days, yet in the count they were simply called "the kitchen people." "When there is not enough food," Ballava asked, "whose name will the blame be entered against?" "The cook's," said the chief. "And when everyone has eaten?" Ballava asked again. That answer did not come so readily.

In Videhapur, Raghu Sahu arrived from his roasting hearth with two baskets filled with roasted flattened rice and chickpeas. The warmth of the roasting still lingered in his hands. "Do not enter me under the donation of grain," he told Rukhsana. "The chickpeas belong to the people who supplied them; that price is separate. The cost of my fire, my time, and the carrying is another matter." He gave her a slip bearing the weight of what he had roasted and the hours spent on it. "Raghuji," a school employee asked, "aren't you helping with relief work?" "I am," Raghu answered. "That is why I can reduce the price. But if you write 'free', tomorrow anyone who has work done at my roasting hearth will show me this piece of paper."

Chandrika Rai came after him. Customers had been fewer at her little sweetmaker's shop for the past week, and she wanted the contract to supply savoury porridge and something lightly sweet for the shared kitchen. "If people are giving the rice, let the wages for cooking still be paid the day after tomorrow," she said. "I will not accept a debt of that kind. Ghee, jaggery, spices and cooking vessels are separate costs." "And your profit?" Rukhsana asked. Chandrika laughed. "Has it become shameful even to name a profit?" There was worry about the day's losses inside her laughter.

Mira laid the three sheets before them. The gift of ingredients would be entered under the school's name; Raghu's roasting under the name of his roasting business; Chandrika's prepared dishes against her commercial receipt.

“I will cook,” Rukhsana said, “but not all the time. When is the break? Who will serve? Who will wash the dishes? Those lines are still empty.” Reva stepped forward. “Tomorrow I will serve for an hour, of my own will. If you want me to work the next day, ask me first. Do not put my name in a register of permanent servants.” Mira copied that sentence exactly as she had said it.

There Naseem Idrisi untied a bundle. Inside were two dozen washed cloth bags, in which flattened rice and chickpeas could be kept apart. Their seams were strong, but no child’s name had been stitched on them. “Names would make distribution easier,” Mira said. “Keep the names in the register,” Naseem replied. “If an empty bag is found on some road, why should everyone learn where somebody’s child goes to school?” He handed her a slip showing the number of bags, the cost of the cloth, the time spent sewing, and the washing instructions. “I am a tailor, not an inspector. My customers’ names will remain safe in my measurement book.”

People were gathering with the supplies on the school veranda. When Jatan reached out to taste the flattened rice, Raghu gave him a clean bowl. “If there is too little salt,” Birsi asked, “shall we write ‘one pinch’?” “Whose pinch?” Chandrika asked. “Yours or mine?” The children began examining their own pinches of salt. Rukhsana made them wash their hands with water. “The first lesson today,” she told them, “is to have clean hands before tasting the food, and to use the same measure before writing down a measurement.” There was laughter, but the work of the kitchen moved forward too.

Durga Gangai brought a basket from the market filled with dried makhana, flattened rice and a mixture she prepared at home. She spent her days waiting for small customers; the larger shopkeepers took goods on credit, and payments had been held up for months. “My goods are not a donation,” she made clear. “For this first occasion I might give half a basket at a lower price. If people like the taste here, let the buyers come to me directly next time.” Rukhsana tasted a handful. “There is too little salt in this mixture.” Durga smiled. “Rukhsana will supply the salt, and I will take the payment.”

A thin sheet slipped out from the middle of Durga’s old ledger. The name ‘Gahuma’ appeared on it. Her elderly mother used to say that customers in earlier days had asked for goods using that name. Durga did not know what place, watercourse or market identity the name had once belonged to, nor when it had been used. Naira asked permission to photograph the page. “Will the photograph sell my goods?” Durga asked. “No,” Naira said. “It will only be material for checking a record of the name.” Durga drew the page back towards herself. “Then write down the sale first. You can ask about river names afterwards.”

Farida Qureshi came carrying a clean box with a lid and a weighing scale. Her family’s business in the market involved the sale and weighing of meat. Since people had different food preferences at the shared meal, she was not pressing anyone to buy meat here. The box held the lidded vessels requested for the school and a written list of prices for supplies available in the market. Seeing her, one shopkeeper said, “If we buy goods from these people, others will raise questions.” Farida lifted the lid of the box and showed him the scale. “Let them ask questions. Let them ask about weights, cleanliness and prices. But if you are refusing because you have seen my name, write down the reason.”

The shopkeeper made another grudging remark about her, but Farida did not immediately prolong the quarrel. She asked about the town’s health-inspection procedure and showed Mira a copy of an earlier inspection receipt for her shop. “I am not saying that this paper disposes of every allegation today,” she said. “But neither is it right to stop my customers without an inspection. If necessary, I shall request a fresh one.” Mira made a separate record of the objection. The inspection of the articles for today’s shared kitchen could be completed; the dispute over a collective boycott in the market had not been settled here.

In King Virata’s kitchen, Ballava’s first dish was ready. A court official exclaimed in praise, “The new cook’s magic!” Ballava laughed for a moment, then looked at the woman who had kept the fire at an even heat since dawn. He could not speak his concealed name before the king: his own safety and his family’s depended upon the disguise. But he could make a smaller decision. He asked for the expenditure on two pots of grain and the names of the cooking team to be entered separately. “Putting down names will not increase the royal revenue,” the chief cook said. “It will at least tell us whom to ask if something goes wrong,” Ballava replied.

That night Ballava looked at the turmeric stains on his fingers. He knew that the identity he had acquired at court was temporary, but for the people of the kitchen, the labour of every day was not temporary. His own need for a secret name was not the same as another person’s need to have a name made public. He did not wish to confuse the two. In the new ledger he had only what he himself had seen recorded: selecting the grain, carrying water, cutting greens, tending the fire, serving the meal. The counting of labour had begun; justice for that labour had not been accomplished.

By noon in Videhapur there was enough rice from donations for the moment, but the firewood had fallen short. Once again the school employee said, “Let everyone bring wood from home today.” “We will find what is needed to light the fire,” Rukhsana replied, “but we will not take the last dry sticks from a poor household in the village. I can prepare khichdi for one day. As for the next day’s account, there is still no answer to how much grain or fuel we have.” She altered the proposed two-day meal programme into a definite arrangement for the first day and a conditional one for the second. Mira was disappointed at first, but she accepted that account rather than write down a false certainty.

Urmila arrived carrying a vessel of water. She had brought it not from Rajinar but from the separate supply point used by the school. “The well water has not been tested,” she said plainly. “I will not give untested water for cooking.” The employee said there was no provision in the accounts for the time taken to carry water along that route. Urmila set the vessel down. “Carrying it is my work. I made no promise to give it away.” Rukhsana immediately had the time spent on transport entered separately. Urmila said payment for carrying hospital linen the previous night was still outstanding. If today’s wages for bringing water were merged into that earlier debt, no one would know which work had been paid for.

For a moment Rukhsana stood alone beside the stove. There was an old blister on a finger of her palm, left by a hot cooking vessel; she changed the strip of cloth over it. Chandrika sat nearby and opened the accounts of her little shop. “I like coming to a shared kitchen for a day,” Chandrika said, “but I have to shut the shop to do it.” “Not everyone loses the same thing,” Rukhsana replied. “Your customers may return. If I am given no rest, my body may not recover.” “Then let us divide the time that is left today,” Chandrika said. “Sit down for half an hour. I will see to the serving.”

The sheets of accounts were read aloud in public. Raghu’s payment for roasting, Chandrika’s price for savoury food, Naseem’s wages for sewing the bags, and Rukhsana’s hours spent cooking, serving and cleaning the vessels had not been muddled together on a single piece of paper. Durga’s first consignment was small; Farida’s list of prices was still being kept as an option. When the shortfall in the budget for the second day became apparent, a donor asked, “So much accounting for public service?” “This accounting will let public service endure for two years,” Rukhsana answered. “A gift without accounts shines for one day, and the next becomes a debt laid upon a woman’s shoulders.”

An elderly man among those who had supplied rice was a little offended. He wanted his name to stand highest on the board. Rukhsana did not remove it. She merely said, “The exact weight of the rice you gave is recorded. The cost of Raghu’s fire and Mira’s attendance work will not be left out. That takes nothing away from the honour of your gift.” In the end the old man agreed to have the word ‘rice’ written after his name. Reading that line, Jatan asked, “Where will you write the name of the person who washes the dishes?” “Whoever washes them will say so,” Reva answered. “I will wash them today. But tomorrow someone must ask me.”

Before the food was served, Rukhsana spooned some khichdi into a small bowl and tasted it for salt. “Still bland?” Chandrika asked. “It is right for the children,” Rukhsana said. “If you want more, put some on your own plate.” Raghu laughed. “There is salt in the chickpeas from my roasting hearth. Put my name in as well.” Still holding the bowl, Rukhsana laughed. “If everybody’s name goes into the food now, where will there be any room left for the rice?" In that one burst of laughter, the pain in her shoulders, which had been with her since morning, seemed a little lighter.

Jatan and Birsi sat together on the veranda. The children received their meal, but no decision had yet been made on their formal enrolment at the school. Padma arrived and asked Mira who would attend the language and movement exercises the following week. Ruhani was there too. The children wanted a cloth curtain for their dance programme. "I can sew the curtain," Naseem said, "but I shall take the measurements and quote a price. And I will not write names on children's private photographs." Ruhani smiled. "First let us settle where they are to practise. I do not teach the lesson that changing a costume changes the identity of somebody's life."

By evening the vessels in the kitchen were being washed. Chandrika counted the jaggery left for her shop; Raghu picked up his empty baskets; Durga tucked the receipt for her first sale into her ledger. Farida repeated that she would apply for a municipal inspection herself. Naseem completed his count of the stitched bags and marked a torn edge for repair next time. Behind these small tasks, large payments were still outstanding. But today no one's labour had been erased merely by writing it down as 'help'.

Mira gave Rukhsana two copies of the written accounts. One would remain at the school, the other with her. Rukhsana folded the page and put it in her bag. "We shall meet here on this day next year," she said. "But I will not be tied to a single day's communal cooking every year. I have been thinking of opening a shop of my own. Let there be a day when, instead of cooking, I can listen to someone sing." "Then I will buy you a ticket," Mira said. "I will buy my own ticket," Rukhsana replied. "Only let my time belong to me that day."

When she left the school, the temporary bamboo barrier beside Rajinar was still in place. The water had yet to be tested; the railing was old; permission for the travelling school remained incomplete. Amid all this, the children's dry notebooks and the sheets bearing the cooks' names were safe in separate bags. From a distance she heard Ruhani calling the children to their next practice. Rukhsana turned once, though she was weary, then went on towards home. For today, the stove had gone out.

Chapter 38 · Brihannala's Classroom

The following morning Rukhsana did not go to the kitchen. She set a low wooden stool outside her door and spread yesterday's receipts upon it to dry. The damp from the rain had curled the corners of the paper. Instead of putting rice on the stove, she made herself a cup of tea and looked at the clock. There was still time before Ruhani's practice began at the school. Today she had decided to go as a spectator, though, as she was leaving home, the old habit of taking a shawl from the chest to wipe down a chair nearly detained her.

On the school veranda, Jatan was attempting to turn in a circle with both arms outstretched. Birsi laid two pages from a notebook near his feet so that he could see where to stand when he had turned around. The moment Jatan stepped on a page, he panicked. Ruhani said, "This is not an examination in dancing. Look at the ground first, then listen to your own body." Jatan laughed. "Am I to read the notebook or save my feet?" Ruhani answered, "One day you will learn to do both. Today, save your feet."

When Rukhsana arrived, Mira began asking her about the work in the kitchen, but Ruhani interrupted. "Put her name down among the spectators today. Someone who feeds everyone else has the right, sometimes, to sit and watch." Rukhsana sat at one end of the veranda. Feeling the faint blisters on her palms, she watched the children move to a rhythm sounded without instruments. Not one of them could quite keep an even step, but no one laughed and shoved another child for falling out of time.

Long ago, in King Virata's city, the beat of a mridangam resounded through Princess Uttara's practice room. The new teacher there called himself Brihannala. The court had entrusted him with teaching dance and song; in truth he was Arjuna, concealed under another identity as he and his brothers completed the last days of their incognito exile. Light entered the room through a window, and a little bundle of ankle bells lay on the floor. No one there spoke of his former skill in warfare.

On the first day Uttara asked, "How can someone who knows the rhythms of battle teach the rhythms of song?" Brihannala set a pair of small hand-cymbals in her hands and said, "Both require the discipline of listening. But knowing one rhythm does not, by itself, give you the right to undertake another kind of work." He demonstrated the steps, then drew back. Instead of taking hold of Uttara's arm under the pretext of correcting her movements, he showed her from a distance where to place her feet.

A palace attendant spent the day stringing the ankle bells. Whenever the strap on Uttara's foot loosened, she fastened it again. No one counted the hours of her labour. Brihannala asked how long it took her to prepare one pair. The woman looked at him in surprise: why should a teacher be asking about the time her craftsmanship required? "If one bell breaks," she said, "the whole knot has to be undone." That day Brihannala shortened the lesson to leave room for the strap to be repaired.

Uttara had another question. "Teacher, your work is music and your name is Brihannala. But outside the court, whom do you call your own people?" Brihannala was silent for a moment. He was not permitted to tell the truth. Rather than invent another false story, he answered, "For today, my answer is only this: I am your teacher. A vow prevents me from answering certain questions; I shall not lay the burden of that restraint upon you." Uttara did not like this unfinished answer, but at least her teacher had made clear where his silence began. As she tied the sash for her lesson, she understood only that the two of them were choosing silence for different reasons.

One of Uttara's companions said that people at court laughed at the way Brihannala walked. Uttara stopped her. "Their laughter will not teach me my lesson any sooner." She asked her teacher how one should endure such laughter. Brihannala said, "If you answer every voice, the lesson will be lost. But enduring another person's contempt must not become a condition of learning either." Beneath his words lay the fear of his hidden life, whose full meaning Uttara could not grasp. As she fastened the ties in the classroom, she knew only that their silences did not arise from the same cause.

In Videhapur, an employee of the municipal assistance committee came to hang a signboard outside Ruhani's classroom. It read: 'Brihannala's Dance: A Special Hijra Performance.' Beneath the words a space had been left for photographs of the class and its performers. "This name will bring in a grant," the employee said. "And it will draw a bigger crowd." Ruhani read the entire board but did not immediately tear it down. She stopped Jatan's practice and said, "Children, have some water. I have something to attend to in this writing."

She asked the employee, "Who authorised this line?" He turned over his papers. "The committee said to connect it with an old story. Arjuna, too, had adopted a disguise." Ruhani replied, "Arjuna concealed his identity; when the appointed time ended, he could return to his own name. My own identity is not a weapon hidden from anyone. I will not allow the society and the life to which I belong to be sold as somebody else's disguise during an incognito exile."

Padma was there. She repeated the employee's words exactly as he had spoken them, so that their meaning would not change in anyone's hearing. She photographed only the heading on the board; no children's faces appeared in the image. "Whose signature is on the grant letter?" she asked. The employee said that he had been told to put up the board, not to choose its wording. Ruhani did not snatch the paper from him. "Then do not put this board up here," she said. "First give us written notice that the wording is to be changed."

Meanwhile Bhola Yadav arrived with two brass-coloured milk cans. Milk had been proposed for the children after class, but the amount owed to him from the previous week was still unpaid. Setting down the cans, Bhola said, "Yesterday's rice is a separate account; today's milk has a separate price. A donor may want his name on a signboard, but his proclamation will not pay me." The employee asked whether some of the milk might be given free for the festival. Bhola replied, "First count up how much was promised free the last time."

Mira wrote down the measures of Bhola's cans and a receipt for yesterday's outstanding debt. Bhola was thinking of sending his son into another occupation; selling milk was hard work, though the trust of his customers was longstanding. "I want the boy to choose work of his own liking," he said. "But if the money for the milk does not come back into our house now, who will pay his school fees?" Mira told him the next date for payment would be written down: there would be no vague 'later'. Bhola put his copy of the receipt into his pocket.

Phulmati Tiyar came up from behind carrying a bundle of fishing nets. At the boat landing's fish market she made nets and helped sell small fish. Mira wanted netting to shade the practice area, but Phulmati would not permit her fishing net to be used as decoration wrapped around the children's bodies. "This net was made to be stretched in water. A child will fall if a foot becomes caught in it," she said plainly. Instead, she quoted a price for making a shade screen from thin strips of bamboo.

A young man accompanying Phulmati asked how much she earned from the old net they owned jointly. Her face hardened. "The accounts for that partnership have still not been settled. I have come here to discuss a separate piece of paid work for this class." She drew out a strand and showed them a torn join in the net. "If this breaks while catching fish, that is a separate liability. Making shade for the children is a separate job." Mira kept her written quotation. The old partnership dispute was not settled that day, but the new work was not mixed up with the old debt.

Dulari Rajwar arrived at the veranda carrying a ration slip and a small book of debts. She had not come to watch the rehearsal; she had heard that there would be a government assistance camp. The employee said that beneficiaries needed to sign a collective consent form to verify their names. Dulari asked to read the paper. Its final line said that assistance received could be counted towards adjustment of earlier private debts. Her eyes remained fixed upon that sentence.

"Why must I agree to surrender my claim over a debt in return for rations?" Dulari asked. "The form is an old one," the employee said.

"Everybody signs it." Dulari sat down beneath the signboard. "Then everybody's signature is not my answer," she said. "I have not come here to quarrel. I want the grain to which I am entitled; the debt will be discussed separately." Padma read out the meaning of the line clearly. Dulari took away a copy of the paper without signing it.

Rukhsana had been watching all this in silence. After all the papers she had drawn up for the kitchen yesterday, she was beginning to understand how many different meanings a single signature could acquire. She half rose to bring Dulari a cup of tea, then remembered her resolution and stayed where she was. Jatan ran over with water. Ruhani smiled. "You see? The spectator's place is not empty. Jatan can do the work." For the first time, Rukhsana thanked someone without getting to her feet.

On the other side of the veranda stood Farid Chik, carrying a notebook wrapped in thin paper. His family had long been associated with the sale and cutting of meat in the market, but Farid wanted time for his studies. He had come to ask for the work of notating the tabla rhythms for the school programme. Someone said, "You would leave the family business for music?" Farid replied, "I am not abandoning what I owe my family. In the morning I help with the shop accounts; in the day I study. But why must I spend all my time in that shop?"

Ruhani called him into the classroom. Farid had divided the rhythms in his notebook into little sections. Padma asked whether he could change the beat for children moving at different speeds. Farid had an old borrowed book in his bag for his night-time studies. He told Ruhani, "At home they say that if I spend all day learning music, who will keep the shop books? I have said I will give two hours to the accounts, but not give up school time." Ruhani asked, "Does everyone at home agree to that promise?" Farid shook his head. "No. That is why I am not making a complaint against anybody yet. I am making a notebook in which to record my own time." Ruhani asked him to mark those two hours at the shop alongside the rhythms in his notebook—not because life should always be reduced to an account, but so that he could see the promise he had made.

"It can be changed," Farid said, "but I want one chance to play it and see." He struck a wooden board three times, lightly. Jatan caught the rhythm, while Birsi, moving in her own way, remained two beats behind. "In this classroom," Ruhani said, "being behind does not mean being wrong. Sometimes the rhythm itself needs to change."

In King Virata's palace the day of Uttara's second lesson arrived. Brihannala called in the attendant who fastened the ankle bells before the practice began. This time she proposed replacing the thin leather strap; the old cotton cord broke too easily. A court official asked why such a small task required new material. "Do not call the failure of something small," Brihannala replied,

“when the whole movement rests upon it.” He feared exposure beneath his assumed identity, yet as a teacher he could not evade responsibility for safe instruction.

That day the daughter of a palace attendant stood at the classroom door beside Princess Uttara. She did not ask to enter; she merely listened to the rhythm. “May she learn too?” Uttara asked. A courtier said that the lesson was for the princess. Brihannala answered, “Today’s lesson time belongs to the princess. If permission is granted to teach another girl, there must be separate time for her and a responsibility undertaken by her teacher; listening in secret cannot take the place of her right.” Uttara asked that an additional hour be set aside at the end of her own lesson. No decision was made at once, but for the first time the question of that girl’s education had been heard at court.

In Videhapur, the signboard came back to the veranda. The employee had crossed out the first words and written a new title: ‘A Class in Shared Rhythm and Dance.’ Ruhani read it and said, “I have no objection to this name. But the decision to print the children’s photographs, voices and full names in the programme must be made separately, with the consent of their families and of the children themselves.” The employee said it would be difficult to show donors proof without photographs. Ruhani asked him, “Can you not show that the class took place through attendance and expenditure records?”

Padma prepared two sheets. The first would record attendance numbers, times, the instructor’s fee and the cost of materials. The second would contain the families’ consent, with separate choices for the use of images and voices. The public copy would carry no private names. When Sanket arrived, Ruhani did not ask him to open his camera. He volunteered, “I can measure the lighting on the stage. There is no need to take photographs.” Padma laughed. “Today the world is managing without pictures.”

Mira recorded a separate objection to the debt-adjustment line on Dulari’s form. The employee acknowledged that he did not have a revised form. He could not tear up the paper, but he did at least write that Dulari had not relinquished her right to receive rations and that the debt dispute was a matter for separate decision. Dulari did not sign; she took away a stamped copy acknowledging receipt. She received no immediate assistance, but neither had any false consent been created.

Dulari folded the paper and tucked it into her clothing, then turned and came back. “One more thing,” she told the employee. “If I do not get the rations, listen also to how much grain will be left in my house tonight.” At first the employee took this for an emotional appeal, but Dulari counted out the provisions for three days and the four people who depended upon them. He agreed to add this information to the written application; he made no promise of distribution. Dulari left understanding the distinction: to hear someone and to fulfil that person’s right are not the same thing.

As Bhola took back the milk cans, he again asked Mira when the first payment would be made. Mira counted the days and wrote on the corner of the receipt: 'We will meet on this date; if payment has not been made, the reason will be communicated.' Bhola said, "Writing so much will not make the money arrive by itself, but I shall know what day to ask for it." Phulmati placed her sample of the thin bamboo shade screen beside Farid's notebook. The value of each person's work was entered on a separate sheet.

Still seated at her end of the veranda, Rukhsana noticed a calculation in the notebook. The time required to distribute milk to the children; the time spent washing and cutting vegetables; the hours lost in bargaining—yesterday's kitchen account had included the first two, but left out losses in the market. She remembered the small supply of greens and aubergines she had brought from the Rain-Kujra family near her home. She asked Mira for a sheet of paper. "What I bring from the market has an account of spoiled goods too," she said. "Work does not begin only when we reach the stove." Mira added a new item; the decision about payment was left for later.

Ruhani began the final practice of the day. The episode of Arjuna taking the name Brihannala appeared in her account, but she told them, "That story is of a disguise adopted to survive a difficult circumstance. My life is not an imitation of it. The name I choose today speaks of my own existence. If you want to learn to dance with me, you must understand the difference between those two things." Birsi asked, "Then whom shall I play in the drama?" Ruhani answered, "The character you choose through your own understanding. But first we shall read the story."

The children joined hands to make a circle. Once again Jatan stepped on the strip laid out on the floor. This time he did not panic; he picked it up, set it to one side and marked his place anew. Farid struck the board three times, Phulmati tapped two thin pieces of bamboo together, and Ruhani watched for the next movement without issuing a command. From her place among the spectators, Rukhsana began to clap. Her back ached, but she did not stop applauding.

At the evening meeting, Mira read out the proposed cost of the training. Naseem's sewing of the curtain, the possible supply of thread by Parvati Tanti, and Pavitra Patwa's knotwork would not all be given one price under the single heading of 'costume'. Parvati and Pavitra had not come to the classroom yet; it was agreed that their measurements, rates and consent would be taken the following day. Ruhani made it clear that her living identity must not be turned into a commodity for a display of disguise.

When the school veranda had emptied, the signboard bearing its new title was taken down from the bamboo and stored inside. Permission for the stage, regular funding and formal enrolment in the travelling school were still outstanding. Yet after the first day of classes, copies remained of five separate receipts and one objection to a rejected debt condition. As she was going home, Rukhsana said to Ruhani, “When Parvati and the others bring the cloth tomorrow, call me. Not to cook food here—to look at the colours.” Ruhani asked, “Will you buy your own spectator’s ticket?” Rukhsana laughed. “Yes. But this time, for the front row.”

Chapter 39 · The Weaver's Due

At daybreak, the first beat of the loom could be distinguished from the fluttering chatter of the doves. In Parvati Tanti's courtyard, the cotton threads stretched on the frame since the night before had grown faintly damp with dew. She drew one strand up between her fingers and bent her ear to listen. The thread was sound, but the wooden shuttle was rubbing against its course. No one else in the house had yet risen. Parvati let two drops of oil fall upon the shuttle's tip. Today she was to show samples of cloth for the school's dance class. More than the pleasure of choosing colours, she was troubled by the thought that the payment for her work might once again be entered under somebody else's name.

From inside she brought out an old length of cloth for a turban and spread it upon the veranda. A little green floral embroidery ran along the cotton border; the ground in the middle was grey. The edging still had to be knotted. Parvati had woven the length itself; the knotwork around its edge belonged to Pavitra Patwa. Anyone looking at it would have called it one piece of cloth. Parvati saw two lamps burning in two different houses, two separate portions of time, and two separate lines of debt.

As soon as Pavitra arrived, she turned the cloth over to examine it. "Why did you leave the first turn of the border unfinished here?" she asked. Parvati said, "So you can turn the thread when you tie the knot. If I had finished weaving the border, you would only have had to cut it again." Pavitra took her coloured threads from a little cane box. "Then we shall put the time saved into the price. People think the knotwork on a turban takes no more than a pinch of the fingers." They both laughed. They belonged to different families and had learned different crafts, yet customers often called out to them as though they answered to the same name.

Yusuf Ansari appeared at the doorway with a small bag of loom parts and a sample of cotton. There had been talk of supplying curtain material for the school, and he had come to show what his workshop made. "My son says we ought to photograph the cloth and sell it by telephone now," he said. "But when the warp snaps halfway through, how is a telephone to hear the sound?" Parvati replied, "Selling it by telephone may be his work; weaving it is yours. Each ought to have its own payment." Yusuf fell silent. At home the family was still arguing over his son's wish to take up another occupation. He did not want to carry that quarrel to the school door today.

Before Parvati left, her mother-in-law came and stood near the entrance. Her eyes fell upon the threads. "In my day, whenever a whole length of cloth was sold, the money was entered under the name of a man of the house," she said. Parvati asked, "Did you never ask for your share?" The old woman smiled faintly. "I did, and there was a quarrel. Afterwards I thought that when the children grew up, they would understand. Now it is your turn to make them understand." Parvati gave her a narrow strip of coloured edging. "Keep this. Tell me how it looks in the morning light." The mother-in-law laid it across her shoulder and went indoors to look in the mirror. Her desire to see a rainbow had not yet been exhausted.

When they reached the school with the three lengths of cloth, the marks of yesterday's dance circle were still visible in the earth of the veranda. Birsi stood upon one of them, keeping the beat with her feet. Farid was tapping lightly on a smooth wooden board. Ruhani was telling the children, "The colour of the cloth must not impede your steps. Whatever you wear must let you move comfortably." Rukhsana had come to sit among the spectators in the front row. That day there was neither a cooking ladle nor an account book in her hands. The practice of having her hands empty still felt strange to her.

Mira spread a thin sheet over a charpoy to display the samples. The employee first showed them a printed schedule of rates. Its heading read: 'Complete Dance-Costume Package.' Under that one entry, the prices for cotton, weaving, dyeing, edging, sewing and stage decoration had all been combined. "A single bill will be more convenient for the grant provider," the employee said. Parvati read the line and folded her cloth. "Convenient for whom? Where is the name of the person who weaves it?"

The employee's voice grew hard. "If you keep such elaborate accounts for collective work, when will the school ever hold its programme?" Closing her little box, Pavitra said, "I have not come to stop your programme. But if you drown my payment for knotting the turban in the wages for weaving the cloth, who will count the grain my household needs?" Ruhani made room for both women to sit beside the charpoy. She told the employee, "Yesterday we agreed that a costume is not the work of a single name. If the paper today is still the old one, the programme cannot proceed on the old terms."

In the meantime, Sonmati Turi arrived carrying a light, square frame made of bamboo. She made small samples for sale in the outside market. She had heard that after the school programme the artisans' work might be displayed at the town's trade exhibition. "Stretch the cloth across my frame," she said. "Then everyone can see its colours without wrapping it around a body." The employee asked, "Will that require a separate payment?" Sonmati set the frame on the charpoy for a moment, then lifted it again. "When a wooden frame is hired, hire is paid. Why should my bamboo be free?"

Rukhsana listened to everything from the edge of the charpoy. She remembered that Jatan had cut the vegetables for the dance class's first meal the previous day, yet the board had continued to say 'Rukhsana's Kitchen.' She had not asked for her name to be taken down. But hearing Pavitra speak of the many hands concealed within a single finished thing, she called Jatan over. “Was the payment for what you cut yesterday entered in the accounts?” Jatan said, “Rukhsana Didi, you saw the work I did. That itself meant a great deal.” Rukhsana answered, “Seeing is one thing. Paying is another.”

Ruchi Dharikar had come with Sonmati. In her cloth bag was a sample woven from coloured strips: threads winding inward from two directions to meet at a tiny point in the centre. The children immediately asked, “Is it a flower or a star?” Ruchi replied, “Before you give it a name, it is a pattern I have woven.” She opened her notebook to take measurements. “If something made in our house is displayed, its design may be shown with a photograph. But no one must copy it for an outside shop without asking us.” Hearing this demand, Parvati nodded without hesitation. For the first time, it seemed to her, someone was asking who owned a design before asking whether it was beautiful.

Kamlesh Khatik stopped at the doorway with a bundle. He had been asked to bring light straps and binding cords from the market for the stage. There were two red strips in the bundle. At the sight of one of them, a man muttered, “That looks like something from the very market where the wrongful consignment came from.” Kamlesh looked at him. “I have brought the bill for goods bought in the market. A thing does not become criminal merely because its colour is red.” He handed the paper to Mira. The bill stated the number of items, but the school’s new order had not yet specified what the strips were to be used for. Mira put the paper aside and said, “First we shall examine their intended use. No accusations: the measurements of the goods.”

Ruhani pulled one of the strips taut. A knot made with it around a child’s waist might tighten dangerously. She asked Kamlesh whether anyone had given him measurements before he bought it. “The order said ‘twenty red straps,’” he replied. “There were no sizes, large or small.” Farid held a strip against his arm to demonstrate; it left a red mark. The school employee looked embarrassed. “Can they be returned, then?” Kamlesh said, “I shall speak to the shopkeeper. But under what heading will you enter the transport fare and the labour of my journey?” Mira could not answer him at once.

Parvati lifted a light piece of cloth from among the samples. “Why use a thick cord for dancing? I can weave a soft drawstring into the cloth itself, and Pavitra can make whatever ornament the border requires.” Pavitra interrupted at once. “Not ‘can make’ as though that settles it. First we shall determine how much string, how many rows and how many hours.” Rukhsana burst into laughter. “Watching the two of you reminds me how often I have quarrelled in the kitchen over measuring two pitchers of water.” She corrected herself: “Not a quarrel—measuring the worth of one’s work.”

Birsi was looking at the blue thread in Pavitra’s box. “Is this for me?” she asked. Pavitra placed a little piece in her hand. “Feel it first.” Birsi turned the thread between her fingers. “It is cool, like the sky.” “And the green?”

Rukhsana asked. Birsi took the green edging and held it against her cheek. “Warm, like a field.” Everyone laughed. This time no one assigned a colour to a particular religion, caste or kind of body. An extra hour had appeared in which a child’s preference could be heard.

Water was collecting on the narrow earthen path beside the classroom. A little rain had fallen the night before; drops from one corner of the thatch began to fall directly upon the charpoy where the samples lay. Sonmati immediately lifted her frame. Yusuf gathered the lengths of cloth, and Pavitra put her box of colours into her bag. Birsi ran to bring an earthen pot, but Ruhani stopped her. “Your foot will slip there. Stand back first.” Together they saved the samples from getting wet. Mira took out a slip to enter the expense of repairing the thatch. Parvati said, “On a day when work is being done, somebody must also take responsibility for making the place safe.”

Just then Yusuf’s telephone rang. It was his son. The shop had said that parts were needed to repair the old loom at home; his son did not want to miss his electronics training to go and collect them. At first Yusuf said irritably, “Who is supposed to look after the work at home?” Then he looked at the five different kinds of labour spread across the charpoy at the school. Into the telephone he said more gently, “Do not leave your training to come. I shall fetch the parts. If you have time this evening, come and look over the shop accounts; if not, I shall manage them.” When he ended the call, there was no pride of victory on his face, only a little fear: would this new arrangement really work?

The afternoon sunlight shifted away from one side of the veranda. Sonmati spread Parvati’s cloth over her frame. Ruchi placed her own sample in the middle of the stretched fabric, and Pavitra began the knotwork along its edge. Five people, five pairs of hands, were occupied with one object, yet no one took another’s place. Ruhani guided the children in slow turns before the cloth. It was not draped around anyone’s body; a breath of air was enough to stir its border. “Before anyone wears it,” Ruhani said, “we must see where it might catch during the dance.”

The employee returned with the schedule of rates. This time five separate lines had been drawn on the page: Yusuf’s supply of cotton, Parvati’s weaving, Pavitra’s knotwork, the hire of Sonmati’s frame and the use of Ruchi’s design. Each had its own heading. Kamlesh’s bundle was kept apart until the examination was complete. “When we add these prices together, the budget will rise,” the employee said. Parvati replied, “The cost was always greater than the old budget made it appear. It was the wages that went unwritten which kept the figure low. They were simply invisible on paper.”

Mira worried that the programme might fall apart. With five separate entries, approval for the grant would have to be sought again; if it was delayed, the children’s practice might suffer. She asked Parvati, “Could we have one sample made first, against a small advance? Afterwards I can obtain the committee's approval for everyone's rates." Parvati answered, "Write down how many hours we are to give to making that one sample. The order for the full length must be separate. You cannot call the first piece a 'sample' in order to make its labour free." Mira accepted the condition.

As the little slips of paper were passed around, one parent grew anxious. "So many people to pay for a children's class? Buying a piece of cloth would be cheaper," he said. Ruchi gave him her woven strip. "Pull this twice." The father pulled; the knots did not loosen. "I have turned it back through the weave three times. If it breaks, no sharp end will pierce a child's hand. Cheaper does not always mean safer." The parent grew serious. "My child will stand on a stage before important people. I wanted the child to look beautiful; I had not thought first of keeping the child safe."

Pavitra drew the notebook towards herself. She wrote separate, precise measurements for the sample: the length of the edging, the number of knots, the quantity of cotton. The school employee wanted both women's names to appear in a single space on the receipt; it would save room. Pavitra wrote her name on an empty line and left the next one for Parvati. "The cheapest way of saving space is to cut out a name," she said, "but I need that space on this page." This time the employee did not argue.

Kamlesh's bill came up for discussion again. An old weighing slip from the market bore the name of the same shopkeeper who had previously supplied certain goods to the hospital. Someone guessed that the red strips might have come in the illicit consignment from that place. Naira, who had arrived to collect two copies of a water-lease document from Mira, examined the papers. "The appearance of one shopkeeper's name on two documents does not prove the goods came in the same consignment," she said plainly. "For now, match the actual strips, the measurements on the order, and the date on the receipt. We shall examine the hospital papers separately." For the first time Kamlesh breathed freely. There were still questions about his goods, but no accusation against his community.

Naira sat for a while beside the charpoy. Since the premature publication in Chapter Twenty, she had been reluctant to sign anything merely because a paper was put before her. She asked Kamlesh's permission to photograph the original bill. "No photograph yet," Kamlesh replied. "Look at the copy Mira gives you." Naira agreed. Ruhani brought her a cup of water and asked, "Since when have you begun stopping at once when somebody tells you 'no'?" Naira smiled slightly. "There is something I learned very late," she said. Ruhani asked no further question.

By evening, a fine splinter of cotton fibre had lodged in Pavitra's finger. Parvati took it out with a piece of her own cloth. Holding Parvati's hand, Pavitra said, "Writing our payments separately does not mean separating our affection.” Parvati’s eyes shone. “That is exactly what I have been fighting for,” she said. “Let everyone see how one person’s work is joined to another’s. But being joined is no reason to erase a name.”

A little friend of Parvati’s daughter came running from the house as a messenger. Her mother-in-law had not broken the mirror indoors; she had merely held the coloured edging against her old sari and said that she had not seen such colours for many years. The child carried a small packet of leaves containing jaggery and roasted chickpeas. “Grandmother says you must eat something while you work,” she said. Parvati opened the packet and shared a little with everyone. Pavitra wanted to give her share to Rukhsana, but Rukhsana raised her hand. “No. I shall take my own share today. I am not on duty to serve anyone.” They all laughed again.

As Sonmati lifted her frame, she warned Mira that its use in an outside market exhibition would require permission separate from its use at the school. Ruchi sewed a small mark onto the back of her sample, so that if copies were made, the question of their source could be raised. Mira said clearly that no long-term market agreement had been concluded that day; the proposal would go before the next meeting. Sonmati was pleased. The right to say no, even once, was itself a beginning of a new kind of trade.

Standing beside the cloth, Yusuf noticed a slight flaw in the fabric he had woven. He wanted to turn the border over to conceal it, but Parvati stopped him. “Mark the place on the sample. We shall put it right when we make the complete length.” Yusuf agreed. He could not yet see what great future lay ahead for his business. But he could see this much: showing a customer a mistake was not a humiliation; it opened the way to correct it in time.

While a fresh copy of the schedule was being prepared, Yusuf noticed that no earlier dues were entered against the line for supplying cotton. He remembered an old debt to a trader, incurred when he had bought fine thread on credit. He told Mira, “Do not add my old debt to the price of this sample. But if I receive the advance, I shall be able to pay the supplier of the thread.” Mira wrote down a separate date. The promise to repay the debt was greater than that day’s sale; Yusuf did not want his son’s training fees to become entangled once more with the debts of the loom.

When the work was done, Rukhsana stayed behind once more to look at the colours. The green, blue and grey lengths lay in the evening light. Without anyone asking her, she tapped out a little rhythm, and Farid answered with a laugh. “Tomorrow, when the children turn with these borders fluttering,” Rukhsana said, “I shall sit right at the front.” Parvati asked, “Have you bought your ticket?” Rukhsana replied teasingly, “We shall make out a separate receipt for the ticket. I have learned that much too.”

On the school noticeboard, the entry marked ‘Complete Package’ was struck out. The new sheet recorded five separate prices for making the sample, the permissions required, and the dates of payment. Not every price had yet been approved; even so, no one could sell the work under somebody else's name. As Parvati gathered up her cloth, she noticed that the mark left at one corner for Naseem's sewing was still clear. Today the weaving and the knotwork had been recognised as separate tasks. Tomorrow Urmila, who washed the cloth, was to come with the time required for laundering it and the old hospital register. Parvati ran a finger over the mark and folded the length away. The thread had not yet been cut.

Chapter 40 · The Cloth Register

Before spreading the clothes out at the ghat, Urmila ran her hand over the washing slab. The night's water had receded, but the mud between the stones was still soft. She set her laundry bundle to one side, untied the string of the old notebook fastened at her waist, and counted its pages. Those belonging to the hospital were wrapped in oiled paper to keep out the water; those recording her own wages were tucked inside a piece of cloth. Both ledgers were in the same bag, but they did not concern the same work, nor did they belong to the same people.

At the school yesterday, Parvati and Pavitra had insisted on entering separate prices for their weaving and knotwork. Urmila had not gone merely to listen. Her eye had fallen on a corner of the cloth left for Nasim to stitch, and she had said, "Until a length of cloth has been washed, you cannot know its true size when worn. But the accounts for hospital linen are not the accounts for dance costumes." Parvati had asked, "Does your register also make provision for recording separate payments?" Urmila had answered, "The names are there; the time is not always there." Today she had come carrying an account of that missing time.

Before sunrise, people were already lining up to fill two water pots at the paved steps of Barki Pond. On one side were the steps for bathing; on another, the slabs where clothes were washed; and farther along, the unstepped landing where handcarts entered. Each of the three uses had its allotted time. But for several days an iron grille and empty crates from the warehouse had occupied half the paved ghat. The handcarts had to descend into the mud of the unstepped landing. Those in a hurry would not wait for the laundry workers.

Renu was there already, with a short measuring cord in her hand and marks drawn across the slab. "They say we are to take measurements today in preparation for the ceremony honouring the ghat," she said. "People will plant coloured flags first and remove the grille afterwards. I say it should be the other way round." "Flags won't divide the water among us," Urmila replied. "Give us a passage to the washing slabs first." Renu laughed. "You have come again today to plead the case of your ledger." Urmila patted her bag. "Wet clothes can be counted as work. Who will count a heart soaked through?"

Just then Champa approached, not from the courtyard but along the path above the ghat. She was carrying a clean sheet fetched from the washing place for her mother's treatment. Behind her stood two young men with their phones raised. "We'll take pictures of the cleaning festival," one said. "We'll show everyone taking part." Champa stopped short. "My face and this sheet will not appear in the same picture." "It's a public ghat," the young man objected. Urmila looked towards the phone in his hand. "The ghat is public.

Champa's body is not. If you want a photograph of hands at work, first write down whose hands they are, what they are being paid, and whether they consent." The young man lowered his phone.

The volunteers who had come to organise the cleaning day belonged to different households. Some were shifting the grille; others were gathering the mud from the slippery slabs into a separate heap; others warned the children not to go down near the water. Rice and greens were to come from Rukhsana's kitchen, but Urmila insisted that the hours worked by those preparing the food and those cleaning the ghat should both be entered. "Everyone will sit down together at the feast," she said. "Everyone's name should be in the ledger too." A small child seized a broom and tried to run off with it. Instead of allowing the child to sweep, Renu gave the child the task of watching the stones marked in colour.

Saroj Kharkaut had brought two small pieces of fishing net. One was old, its threads hardened by long exposure to water; the other was made with new yarn. "When they're sweeping, will you make sure no one mistakes these knots for rubbish and throws them away?" she asked. She repaired the fishing nets herself, but there was disagreement in her household over sharing the cost of a new one. The person with the money wanted the rights to the entire net registered in his own name. Holding up the net, Saroj asked, "If the hands that haul it have little capital, where does their share go?" Renu showed her a place where the old knots could be tied up and kept apart.

On a page of the notebook Saroj entered the yarn for the new net, the bamboo stakes, and the time needed for repairs. Urmila noticed that a price had been entered for the thread, but the hours spent tying knots had been left blank. "Someone will fill in this empty line however they please later," she said. Saroj picked up the pen. "I'll write down today's time today. No final decision about shares can be made without everyone who makes the net." Their first small agreement was that repairing nets salvaged during the ghat cleaning would not be treated as unpaid labour. The cost of the larger, jointly owned net would be discussed at the next meeting.

Geeta Kori arrived along the narrow path above the ghat with a cloth sample. A fine fabric woven in her courtyard had crossed the border through a company, but she had not received the full payment. She had invited Urmila to examine the colour and weave of the sample: its resemblance to the colour of sheets supplied to the hospital had troubled her. "Just because the grey looks the same, does that prove it's my cloth?" Geeta asked. Urmila rubbed the fabric between her fingers. "Matching colours don't establish a common maker. Compare the thread, the measurements, the edges and the bills. Claim your arrears on the strength of your own papers." Geeta put the sample back in her bag. She resolved not to make her claim for payment depend upon anyone else's investigation into medical supplies.

As the sun climbed higher, Nurjahan, the brick seller, arrived with a small cart. It held no bricks, only rough pieces of old material intended to prevent slipping. A donkey stood tethered beside it. Nurjahan gave the animal water before unhitching the cart. Someone had proposed that she unload heavy bricks into the mud by the ghat, but one look was enough for her. “If the cart goes down this way, the animal's legs will sink,” she said. “I don't want the cost of caring for my animal confused with the cost of carrying goods.” One of the organisers said, “It's work for the festival. Think of it as a donation.” Nurjahan replied without hesitation, “I'll give what I choose to give. No one is going to declare contracted wages a donation.”

Madhuri Dangi arrived with two women carrying winnowing trays used to clean grain. Their group had sorted millet and rice for the common meal. It had been agreed with Rukhsana that the cost of the ingredients and the wages for winnowing them would be entered separately. “Everyone gets mentioned when there's a feast,” Madhuri said, “but the hours spent by the women cleaning the grain disappear.” Urmila pointed to the blank line in her own ledger where the hours of her night washing had been omitted. “Not this time,” she said. Madhuri consulted each woman before writing down her hours. Geeta laughed. “There's a brisk trade in time at the ghat today.”

Beneath the joking, Urmila's task was a difficult one. The hospital laundry brought in for a day's work came in two kinds of bags. Some were marked with a count for ordinary washing; the others carried a warning that they must be kept apart. In the old register both had simply been entered as ‘clothes’. “I don't examine the hospital's treatment of patients,” Urmila said. “I shall record only how much linen came into my hands and when it came. I won't open bags marked for separation without the proper arrangements.” Renu designated a safe place for those bags. They agreed not to put water used by the public at the ghat and the hospital's specialised work together into the same trough.

Naira arrived a little later. In her bag was a copy of the revised schedule of rates prepared at the school the day before, but she kept it separate from the investigation that day. “May I look at your old register?” she asked Urmila. Urmila did not hand it over at once. “First tell me which entries you want to see. Patients' names, workers' names and the dates on the bags are separate things.” Naira paused. She still remembered her mistake in publishing Mahesh's testimony too soon. “The number of bundles, and the times they were collected and delivered,” she said. “I won't record the patients' names.”

On that assurance, Urmila opened her duplicate register. The page from three days earlier listed fourteen bundles. In the ghat ledger, beside Urmila's signature, the collection time was recorded as eight twenty. But the copy obtained from the hospital supply room bore the word ‘received’ against seven forty-five. The difference between the two times was not merely thirty-five minutes; it was a reversal of their order. The dates on the pages agreed, and the identifying marks on the bundles appeared to agree as well. Naira frowned, then wrote three questions in her notebook: What did ‘received’ mean? Had the slip been filled out in advance? Who had matched the markings on the bags?

“I looked at the clock at eight twenty,” Urmila said, “because that day I had to leave another job at a different ghat. But I didn't fill out the hospital's page. All we can see is that someone wrote seven forty-five.” “Then had the clothes already reached the hospital?” Naira asked. Urmila shook her head. “I cannot answer that. Someone may have counted an earlier consignment, the slip may have been prepared in advance, or there may have been an error in the count. All of it needs checking. Don't record a delay against my name, and don't record a theft against anyone else's either.”

Geeta was looking at the corner of the notebook. “Can the same bundle mark ever be used again?” she asked. “Yes, if an empty bag is put back into service,” Urmila said. “So look at the number of pieces of linen along with the date.” Saroj held up an old coloured knot from her net. “I can remember the same blue knot in my net for two years,” she said, “but my memory is not a register.” Naira smiled at this small comparison. The three distinctions Fakira had taught her—what had been heard, what had been seen, and what had been inferred—stood out clearly in her notebook once again.

Champa sat to one side. “Did this reversal of times affect any patient's treatment?” she asked. Urmila quietly consulted another hospital page. A copy of the treatment room's public work schedule recorded a request for an extra sheet that day, but the identity of the person for whom it had been requested was in a private record. “All that's written here is that a request was made,” Urmila said. “When it was fulfilled, and whether any delay harmed anyone, must be investigated separately. I can testify as to when my cart left. A doctor must speak about the patient's condition.” Remembering her concern for her mother's treatment, Champa nodded in agreement.

Aditi came to the ghat to inspect the town's drainage. Her measurements distinguished between the flow of water outside the ghat and the route of water used by the hospital. Seeing Nurjahan's cart, she said, “Don't put a heavy load of bricks on the broken edge of the paved steps.” Urmila immediately asked, “Then which way is the hospital's laundry cart to go?” Aditi opened an old map. One route went around by the blocked channel, where the warehouse crates were standing. “For today we'll mark a temporary route for light carts,” she said. “A permanent repair will require an inspection.” “That will do for now,” Urmila replied, “but write down the time. Otherwise we'll be stuck at the washing slab again tomorrow morning.”

At the meeting for Ghat-Honouring Day, the proposal to take photographs came up again. This time Sanket himself had arrived. Before opening his camera, he asked Urmila, “May I photograph the hands doing the work?” “Yes, but not Champa; not the markings on patients' bags; and if taking a photograph interrupts someone's work, record that time too.” Sanket burst out laughing. “Wages for a photograph as well?” “If you make my hands stop, yes,” Urmila said. Sanket photographed the washing slabs, the safe route and the water markers. Anyone who did not want a face shown was left outside the frame. The lesson he had learned about having control of his own phone was proving useful now.

When Rukhsana and Madhuri brought the food pots, the tired ghat grew lively. Nurjahan tethered her animal in the shade and joined them. “If you bring your cart here again tomorrow,” Saroj told her, “don't crush the stakes for my net.” “I'll watch where the animal puts its feet,” Nurjahan answered. “You tie a flag to the stakes first.” Both women laughed. Geeta asked them to write out the recipe so that she could send it to a colleague who lived far away. “I'll write the recipe,” Madhuri said, “but don't forget the wages for cleaning the grain.” No new clue came to light. There was only rice, greens, water, and rest for weary bodies.

As she ate her first mouthful of rice, Urmila asked Rukhsana, “That day you went to look at the colours—did you truly get any rest?” Rukhsana smiled. “I saw the colours. But the next day I still had to cook for everyone.” “I'd like to come to the ghat once, at the next cleaning festival, without a washing slab or a laundry load,” Urmila said. “Someone else will dry the clothes.” “And shall I serve you rice then?” Rukhsana asked. “No,” Urmila laughed. “You'll sit beside me. Someone else will prepare our food.”

After midday, Aniruddha arrived with an employee from the hospital supply room. Urmila had insisted beforehand that the original pages of the register, the payment records and the confidential treatment records be kept apart. Aniruddha showed them an authenticated copy of the hospital record, but covered the portion identifying patients. Before anyone else could speak, Naira asked, “When the word ‘received’ is entered against seven forty-five, does that mean the linen actually arrived, or merely that an inward-entry slip was opened?” “This document doesn't make that distinction,” the employee replied. “As a matter of routine, a slip can be opened beforehand. But to find out who did so that day, I'll need to check the original records against one another.”

Urmila read out the questions she had prepared. “If the slip was opened early, why does it say ‘received’? My cart left the ghat at eight twenty. I could not have reached the hospital at seven forty-five. Thirty to thirty-five minutes have been deducted from my wages. On what basis?” Aniruddha grew serious as he listened. “We ought first to order the entry corrected,” he said. “Don't strike out the page,” Urmila replied. “If there's a mistake, attach a note of correction to the original. Let what was written remain there.”

The employee produced a copy of the gate register for that day. It showed a handcart carrying linen entering after nine o'clock, but the driver's signature was unclear. Naira recorded only that the seven-forty-five entry in the supply room and the time after nine at the gate did not agree; separate confirmation was needed that the cart had been Urmila's. Aniruddha ordered the relevant slips and the original weighing and payment records to be preserved without alteration. One inference had been disproved: the hospital's recorded time of ‘receipt’ could not be treated as proof of the actual completion of the washing. The decision halted the proposal to hold Urmila immediately at fault.

Urmila then took out another page of her wage register. It contained four entries: the time spent counting bags at dawn, cleaning the slabs, waiting for linen that had to be kept separate, and carrying it to the cart. The hospital's payment sheet said only ‘washing per bundle’. “On a day when a patient's linen arrives late,” Urmila said, “my wages go down, but the waiting time has still been taken out of my life. That isn't justice.” “The company does the same,” Geeta called from a distance. “You've entered your own claim separately, haven't you?” Urmila asked. Geeta showed her the corner of her receipt.

The meeting reached three modest decisions. Collection at the ghat and actual entry into the hospital would be recorded in separate fields; workers' waiting time and the labour involved in special separation would be accounted for separately; and neither photographs taken at the ghat nor copies of personal laundry registers would be made public without permission. No new wage rate was fixed immediately. But time previously dismissed as ‘not work’ would now be measured. “The cost of keeping hospital linen clean is not just soap,” Aniruddha told his employee. “It's time as well.” Urmila was not satisfied with the words until she saw the line provided for a signature.

Late in the evening Saroj gathered up the net she had been repairing. Nurjahan loaded the old brick pieces back onto her cart, since no heavy work could begin until the paved ghat had been inspected. Madhuri recorded the remaining grain from the meal and returned Geeta's cloth sample. Champa folded her mother's sheet and set off home. No one had been made into anyone else's saviour; calling the cleaning a festival had not erased the price of labour. There was less mud on the washing slabs, but the passage to the unstepped landing had not been fully opened.

As Naira was preparing to leave, Urmila stopped her. “Will you meet Lalit the carpenter?” “Why?” Naira asked. Urmila showed her a copy of an old hospital repair bill. One line described a wooden loading ramp for moving laundry from the ghat towards the hospital as ‘newly constructed’. Beside the approval for payment was an empty space for Lalit's signature. “At the place where it says a new ramp was built, I've slipped twice,” Urmila said. “The old timber is still there. But I know nothing about carpentry. Let the person said to have made it examine it." Naira noted the date on the bill. "Let him see it first. Only then can we speak of anyone's fault."

On her way home, Urmila straightened the pages of the registers in her bag once more. Two hours of her wages for the previous day were still owed; a written investigation into the hospital's reversed times had begun; Champa's right over her photograph had been acknowledged; and responsibility for marking a temporary cart route at the ghat had been recorded. Amid all this, she pictured the following year: a clear space by the water, a board bearing the names and hours of the laundry workers, and a day when she would come only to look at the river. Nearing home, she remembered what Rukhsana had said: on that day neither of them would sit down to prepare the food. Closing her notebook, Urmila understood for the first time that even the wish for rest needed a place kept safe for it.

Chapter 41 · The Carpenter’s Signature

When Lalit Vishwakarma opened the gate of his workshop at dawn, the paper pushed beneath it had curled into a damp roll. A fine rain had fallen through the night. He spread the sheet out to read it. It was a bill for repairing the wooden loading ramp used to move laundry between the hospital and the ghat. At the very bottom, a small mark in red ink stood in the empty space for authorising payment: Sign here.

Inside the workshop lay planes and saws, lengths of timber drying, and a curved rib from an old boat. Lalit usually examined the grain of wood before he looked at figures on paper. Today the figures had caught hold of him first. The bill declared that a new ramp had been installed, its joints replaced, and a safe passage made ready for loading carts. Only the previous afternoon Urmila had told him that the old timber there was still slippery beneath her feet.

He put a measuring tape, chalk, two small nails, and his old work ledger into his bag. As he touched the edge of a plane, the faint scar of an earlier injury showed on a finger of his left hand. He opened the ledger. He had still not received full payment for two stakes and a straight batten installed during an inspection of the drainage channel a month before. That work and the hospital loading ramp were separate jobs. It would be easy to combine them under one payment, but on whose account would the older debt then remain?

At the ghat, Urmila was wringing out washed sheets on the stone slabs. There was less mud after the previous day's communal cleaning, but an edge of the timber still stood proud along the way down to the unstepped landing. She gathered up the sheets and took Lalit to the place where the carts were unloaded. “I don't know one kind of timber from another,” she said, “but my feet have slipped here twice. The paper says this was newly built.”

Lalit bent to inspect the end of the old ramp. A little fresh paint had been applied to one side, but a crack in the wood ran inward beneath it. The nails on the other side looked to have been changed fairly recently. He made two chalk marks. “Some repair may have been done,” he said. “But what I can see here does not justify saying an entirely new ramp has been installed. And you cannot discover how much weight it will bear merely by tapping it with your hand.”

Naira had come with Urmila. In her bag were two copies of the conflicting entries in the laundry register: seven forty-five in the supply room and a time after nine at the hospital gate. She asked Lalit, “Does the bill for this ramp prove that the laundry was received on that day?” He shook his head. “Even if the ramp was built, whether the laundry crossed it at that hour is another matter. Look at the bill, the actual work, and the load separately.” Naira made three separate headings in her notebook.

Just then a representative of the municipal contractor arrived carrying a blue folder. Two labourers accompanied him, though they carried no new planks, only rope and empty sacks. The representative held out the bill to Lalit. “You understand carpentry. Inspect it and sign. The hospital's money is held up. Every labourer's payment will remain stopped.”

Lalit read the whole page. “It says here that a new ramp has been installed and that a cart carrying a specified load can cross safely. Tell me who installed it, and where the load-test record is.” “We have receipts for the materials,” the representative replied. “New timber was added to the old ramp. That's how such work is described.” Lalit said, “If a turn of phrase can make old wood new, who takes responsibility for an injured foot?”

He remembered something his old teacher, Harikishun, used to say: whoever made a wooden joint had to keep two accounts, one of what the eye could see and the other of the people who would walk upon it. When Lalit was learning his trade, the old man would step onto the completed planks himself. Later, from experience, Lalit had learned that water, mud, and the weight of a laden cart could not be tested simply by putting the carpenter's own body upon the wood. The memory made that blank space for his signature seem heavier still.

From the far side of the ghat a woman came carrying two bundles of clothes. It was Uma Rajdhob. She set her customers' washing on the raised platform, not at the water's edge, because her right to use the unstepped landing had not been settled. She held receipts for three different customers. “Urmila, if these slabs are busy during your hours, I'll sort my bundles up here,” she said. “But if the work at the ghat is entered under the name of one group, my customers will be counted under somebody else's name again.”

Urmila went over to her. “I don't want that either. My hospital linen isn't your customers' dhotis. The water hours should be separate, and so should the payments.” For the first time Uma looked at the document Lalit was holding. “Then why does the cost of repairing this ramp carry the names of all the washerfolk? Nobody asked me.” Naira checked the dates on Uma's receipts, but did not copy the customers' private names into her notebook. Uma said that for the moment she only wanted to propose separate hours at the ghat; she would not decide on cooperative washing without first consulting all her customers.

Uma folded one customer's slip, then opened it again. She had a sheet belonging to a third customer, who had proposed that its payment be included in Urmila's hospital contract. “The work is done differently,” Uma said, “yet people suppose that one person can set the price for every washerwoman's labour. I'm not against any group. I want the work done in my own name, and the customer's payment for it, to be visible separately first.” On the blank edge of her ledger Urmila wrote down a day for a separate meeting with Uma—not on impulse, but after asking her permission.

The sound of a chisel travelled across the ghat. Paro, the stonecutter, was marking a small stone beside the broken upper edge of the landing. She had been called to examine the work of temporarily securing that part of the municipal bank. She stopped her chisel. “This piece of stone can be removed,” she said, “but the earth beneath is wet. Put a heavy ramp on it and the whole thing could sink together. My trade is cutting stone, not certifying how much weight the ground can carry.”

“If none of you will work together,” the representative asked, “where will the hospital cart go?” “I'm ready to take measurements for work that can be done safely,” Paro replied. “I'm not accepting a contract to put in a heavy ramp without testing the ground.” She showed him her receipt. It specified the cutting of a stone sample, the marking of the damaged edge, and a day's wages. Nowhere did it authorise the building of a bridge. Having listened, Lalit wrote on his own paper: “Stone assessment separate.”

A slender white scar crossed Paro's left wrist. Once she had been ordered to lift a piece of cut stone before it was ready, and the stone had grazed her hand. She spoke of this not as some inherent feature of her hereditary occupation, but as an example of badly organised work. “I want to be paid for working quickly too,” she said, “but paying for an injury doesn't prevent it.” In her bag, apart from her tools, was her young daughter's notebook. On days when she found work and was kept late, there was less time to teach the child at home. She was accounting for that cost as well.

Meanwhile a handcart wheel had become stuck at the upper edge of the unstepped landing. Salim, the farrier, arrived with a small box of tools. His family had once earned its living shoeing horses and working on bullock carts; now he was learning to repair the joints and axles of small wheeled carts. He lifted the cart, tightened the loose nut on its wheel, and told the driver, “It's empty now. Before you load it heavily, the wheel will need to be checked again.”

“You've tightened the wheel,” the driver asked. “Doesn't that mean it can cross the ramp?” Salim did not laugh. “I inspected the wheel. Lalit will inspect the wood beneath it. An engineer must speak about the water and the ground. Why squeeze all three judgments into one man's signature?” He wrote the labour charge and the price of the part separately on a narrow receipt and handed it to the driver. On the back he had written the address of a training programme in modern vehicle servicing; he had not yet decided whether to enrol.

By noon the smell of damp timber mingled with smoke from the cooking fires. Gurmeet Kaur brought two containers of rice and lentils for the shared meal. Her family had settled in Videhapur through old trading connections across the border, but today's work in the kitchen was her own choice. She sat with Rukhsana and opened their accounts. “Don't enter grain received as a donation in place of someone's wages. The cook's time must have its own cost.” Rukhsana laughed. “Half my life seems to have gone by explaining just that.”

Gurmeet entered grain, cooking fuel, and transport under separate headings. Someone asked, “Bills even at a festival?” “If it's a festival, there'll be singing too,” she replied. “Does a singer have no stomach?” Uma began an old washerfolk's song at her words, but kept counting her customers' clothes as she sang. Rukhsana called everyone to eat. Lalit was still measuring the end of the ramp when Gurmeet set a plate of rice beside him. “You can sign while you eat,” she said, “but read it first.”

During the meal Lalit took out the account of a young man who worked with him. Two days earlier the young man had sanded timber from a boat in his workshop; the date on which his wages were due was approaching. Lalit had not told him he would be paid only if the hospital contract came through. Wages were owed for work performed, not conditional upon the award of another contract. In his head Lalit was calculating what he might get by selling an old workshop tool or taking on some smaller job. The more freely the people before him laughed over their food, the more silently his reckoning continued.

The contractor's representative returned. This time his folder contained a printed drawing: a proposal for a temporary approach over the unstepped landing, attached to the loading ramp. Lalit was startled when he saw it. Beyond the old planking, two lengths of timber would be added to make a narrow path on days when the water rose. People would take it for a bridge and carry heavy loads over it. “Who drew this?” he asked. “It's a way of keeping movement uninterrupted,” the representative said. “Once you certify it, we'll begin the work.”

“I can make joints in timber,” Lalit replied. “But you cannot call this safe without calculating the river level, the ground beneath, and the load. The drawing also encroaches on the boats' passage.” He marked the sheet to show where one end of the planking might be left unsupported when the water rose. “That's a possibility; it needs testing before anyone can say precisely what will happen. But if no test has been done, why should I write ‘safe’?”

Urmila put down her plate and came over. “Yesterday we asked for a temporary route to turn the handcarts. Not a heavy bridge.” Naira added, “If supplies arrive late, patients lose precious time. But putting other people at risk without testing anything, in the name of saving patients, is no solution.” The contractor's representative answered wearily, “I have a deadline too. If the papers don't go through, the money won't come. Then write down what work can actually be done.”

Lalit dictated three entries. First: the old loading ramp had been partially repaired; there was no evidence that it had been entirely rebuilt. Second: a temporary diversion for empty or lightly loaded handcarts should be marked separately, and its safety inspected each day. Third: any new approach or certification for the weight of heavy vehicles required an independent technical inspection. He signed this inspection note. He did not put his pen to the bill authorising payment.

Gathering up the papers, the representative said, “You cannot say this bill is false. We have receipts for the materials.” “I have made no finding that anyone has stolen anything,” Lalit replied. “I am saying only that the work I can see here does not agree with the words ‘newly built’ on this paper. If timber was made ready somewhere else, why record it as installed at this ghat?” Naira asked for separate copies of both documents. The representative promised a copy of the inspection note, but said the original payment file would stay in the office.

Towards evening Aditi arrived. Tara had brought her questions arising from the earlier measurements of the drainage channel. Lalit showed Aditi the drawing of the proposed approach. She searched the sheet for authorisation to construct a bridge; it said only “proposed alternative”. “This isn't a work order,” she said. “It would be improper to obtain a load-safety certificate on this basis. I'll add a note calling for another site inspection.” Marking the temporary fish enclosure and the turning space for boats on the drawing, Tara said, “If opening one route closes off somebody else's livelihood, hear them before you do it.”

As Gurmeet gathered the empty meal vessels, she asked, “Will everyone see these papers at the Boat-and-Tools Inspection Festival?” Hira had arrived to examine the stitching of an old boat sail. “We'll look at oars, ropes, wheels, and timber joints at the festival,” he said. “But a festival demonstration isn't an official load test. You can't sing a folk song over a measurement that hasn't been taken and declare the thing safe.” Lifting his tool box, Salim added, “I'll demonstrate the wheel, but I'll explain there and then the difference between an empty cart and a loaded one.”

Standing beside the river, Hira recalled an inspection at the previous year's gathering. An old boat rope had appeared wonderfully strong during the demonstration. The following week, after it grew wet, its fibres had begun to open. Ever since, he had urged the boatmen to make a rule that whatever was inspected at the festival should be tested again afterwards. Tara added that measurements should be repeated whenever the water level changed. No one should mistake a flag raised on one day of the year for proof of safety throughout the year.

In preparing for the communal gathering they made one modest decision. Four things would be recorded beside each tool: the name of its owner or maker, the date of inspection, what had been observed, and what had not yet been tested. Children would practise reading these entries, and payment for demonstrating the work would be fixed separately. “I'll show the washing slabs too,” Uma said, “but I won't put anyone's private laundry on display.” Paro wrapped a cloth around the point of her chisel and smiled. “I'll cut stone, but first I'll show people where to stand out of harm's way.”

Everyone laughed. For the first time in many days Lalit finished the last mouthful of his meal without anxiety. Yet as he set his plate aside, his eyes fell upon a young messenger from the office, approaching with a fresh notice in his hand. It stated that the immediate hospital–ghat repair contract was being withdrawn from Lalit: because authorisation for payment had not been secured within the prescribed time, the work would be assigned to another craftsperson. The outstanding payment for his earlier work would remain subject to a separate examination.

Urmila read the notice and fell silent. “If you had signed that paper, could you have kept the contract?” she asked quietly. “Perhaps,” Lalit said. “But then my signature would have been on the place where your foot slipped as well.” There was no pride of heroism in his voice. The worry of household expenses, money owed for tools, and the wages of his fellow worker was plain upon his face. In his ledger, against the day's work, he wrote: “Inspection; payment still outstanding.” His pen hovered for a moment.

“I'll keep a copy of this order safe,” Naira said. “Changing the contractor doesn't settle the questions raised by the first inspection.” “If another carpenter does the job with proper measurements, I've no objection,” Lalit replied. “My quarrel isn't with the work. It's with signing blindly.” At that moment Paro showed him her stone sample. The small, flat piece, laid on wet earth, had tilted to one side under slight pressure. “Look,” she said. “The stone is solid, but the earth underneath gives a different answer.”

Holding the sample, Lalit looked towards Shakuntala's potters' quarter. Smoke was rising from the kiln, and Shakuntala's granddaughter was coming home with her school notebook tucked beneath her arm. The investigation into the faulty timber would continue in its own right; but questions concerning the bank of the ghat, payment for clay, and the child's education would take him to that house the next day. Lalit gathered up his tools. The old ramp at the unstepped landing had not yet been closed, but his signature was not on the papers for the unsafe bridge they proposed to build in its name.

Chapter 42 · The Future of Clay

The morning sun had not yet reached the rain-soaked thatch above the kiln in the potters' quarter. Beside her wheel, Shakuntala Pandit set down two lumps of clay and kneaded them. The first spread smoothly beneath her fingers; in the second she could feel grains of grit. She did not throw them together into the same trough. Rain through the night had left the footpath under water, and a newly cut bamboo stake had been driven into the ground beside the gate to the clay pit. Shakuntala stood looking at it for a while. Then she pressed the marks of her fingers into the lumps and placed them before her granddaughter.

"Both clays are the same colour. Why are they different?" the child asked. Shakuntala replied, "Colour doesn't make a vessel. You have to see how much water the clay can take in your hand, how it shrinks as it dries, how well it survives the firing. All of it." The girl began shaping a little bowl from the first lump, but its rim leaned to one side. Shakuntala did not stop her hands. "If you want to learn another kind of work, you must learn here, too, how to see what has gone wrong." The child smiled.

Today was her first day in her new school uniform. The cloth had not come from Parvati's loom, but the sleeves of the tunic stitched by Nasim were a little too long for the girl. She bent her elbow to test them; the fabric hung loose. "Clay from the wheel will get caught in these sleeves," she said. Shakuntala laughed. "You aren't going to school to turn a potter's wheel." "But I want to know how to do both," the girl answered. "I never said I would spend my whole life doing only this."

Lalit Vishwakarma came to the door. The previous day, after refusing to sign an incorrect load certificate for the hospital's unloading ramp, he had lost the job that was immediately available to him. In his palm he held a small sample of Paro the stonecutter's work. "The stone beneath this clay has tilted," he said. "I came to understand how the wet clay of the potters' quarter differs from the earth used to fill the ghat. But a bridge's load-bearing capacity cannot be decided from a potter's experience alone." Shakuntala said, "Then take a sample, not a decision. Write down where the clay came from as well."

Naira arrived just behind him. She had not brought a copy of the hospital ramp bill, only the inspection slip bearing Lalit's signature. She had come to hear the potters' claim as a separate matter. Shakuntala brought out the pages showing her old dues: four consignments of vessels, one order for repairs, and two acknowledgements signed to confirm that goods had been taken away, not that payment had been made. "They counted the vessels for the municipal event, but not what they owed me," she said. "Now they tell me that, since the way to the clay pit is closed, I should accept half the old price as full settlement."

As they walked towards the clay pit, the child kept her school notebook tucked under her arm. The shutter of Kamlesh Dabgar's small shop beside the footpath stood half open. Kamlesh sold implements for mending broken handles on vessels, wooden moulds and thread for repairs. Since the rent on the roofed shop had risen, he had been thinking of taking some of his stock home. He called to Shakuntala. "With the route for carrying goods narrowed, the pressure to vacate the shop has grown. They've shown me a new calculation of the rent. Nobody has asked about the repair bills they still owe me."

On his slip Kamlesh drew two small boxes: one for the shop rent, another for his customers' unpaid accounts. Naira asked, "Will you give the committee copies of these records?" "I'll submit the rent proposal," he replied, "but I won't display the names of my customers and their households before everyone. Mending broken vessels is my work; making a spectacle of my customers' private possessions is not." Shakuntala told him that the cost of repairs should not be folded into the dispute over clay. Kamlesh nodded. His shop had not yet been padlocked, but nothing had been settled about next month's rent.

At the gate stood Niru Kumal, carrying not two sacks of clay but an empty basket and a measuring cord. Niru had come from a family in Simatirtha. She sold pots of her own making and hoped to join in a small partnership here. When the route for bringing in clay was closed, a supplier had brought a document requiring every artisan to be liable for the whole debt, no matter how much clay each one took. Niru had refused to sign. "I can fire a kiln together with others," she said, "but why should I carry into my home a debt incurred by someone else, without even knowing what it is?"

Shakuntala placed a piece of her smooth lump in Niru's basket. "This is my sample, not yours. Measure it and enter it under your own name, so there can be no confusion afterwards." Niru said, "And we'll divide the cost of firing by the day and by the consignment. If someone's pots break, we won't make the whole group pay for them as though they were a common debt." Lalit asked, "Shall I help you put your agreement into writing?" Shakuntala stopped him. "First let us decide the terms in our own words. Then we'll find someone to write them down."

The discussion about access to the clay pit brought back to Shakuntala a day in the previous monsoon. Two women from the work group had been returning with baskets on their heads. Water had pooled across the path, forcing them to make a detour, while the hired cart waited on the other side. The extra labour of that day had not been added to the price of the vessels. "The clay costs nothing," a customer had told her. Shakuntala had replied, "If the clay is free, then come and fetch it yourself." The customer had merely laughed and gone away. Today the question of that journey had taken the form of a written demand for access.

A board fixed to the gate read: ENTRY PROHIBITED FOR SAFETY REASONS. There was a date beneath the words, but the name of the person who had issued the order was not clear. Shakuntala herself had seen earth cave in along one side during the previous rains. She had no reason to pretend that danger was false. But she had received no document explaining who had decided to close the safer stretch of the footpath on the other side as well. Tara Mallik came over when she saw the measuring cord. She first recorded the length of the fenced-off ground; she gave no judgment about who owned the clay.

The clay pit in the potters' quarter was not a flowing channel of the river. Rainwater gathered in its hollow during the monsoon, and in the dry season the lower strata became visible. Shakuntala explained that the dark earth on top was unsuitable for vessels, while removing too much of the smooth layer underneath could bring down the edge of the pit. "For now, I can measure only the height, the water marks and the places where clay was previously dug out," Tara said. "The properties of the clay and the risk of erosion require separate examinations." Lalit kept the sample, and Naira marked the place of collection on each bag.

Tara drew a chalk line near the edge of the hollow, then kept the girl away when she came closer. "Don't stand on that wet edge," she said. The granddaughter stepped back. "If the clay is sliding away, where will you put the stakes?" she asked. "I don't know yet," Tara answered. "If drawing a line gave us the answer, engineers, craftspeople and labourers would not have to make their own separate examinations." The girl wrote the question in her notebook. For the first time, hearing someone say "I don't know" did not disappoint her.

A labourer returning from the fields said, "The lorry that carried off earth for the municipal filling took the same clay that can be used for pots. The receipt just says 'earth'." Shakuntala did not answer at once. She opened the receipt for her last consignment. It recorded weight and the number of vessels, not the digging of clay. Tara examined another paper, which was in fact an estimate for material to fill the road. Both papers used the word "earth", but the goods, the dates and the heads of payment were different.

"Then can we say that earth for filling was stolen and charged to the pottery account?" a young man asked. Naira shook her head. "No. Nothing here proves that. On the contrary, the claim that the two bills could be joined merely because they used the same word does not survive examination. We must request the original order closing the gate and the actual receipts from those who carried the material, separately." Shakuntala pressed the lump still clinging to her palm. "For so many days, what they owed me has been buried inside that word," she said softly.

By noon, people had gathered at a small temporary municipal camp. A desk had been set up to receive written questions about permission to excavate clay from the pit. Shakuntala laid out three samples of her old vessels, the acknowledgements of receipt, and her granddaughter's school admission form. The clerk's first question was, "Is the application about land, or about schooling?" Shakuntala did not laugh. "They are two different things," she said, "but a household's earnings and a child's education do not live far apart."

Beside the desk, Amina Bhathiyara was putting down containers of rice and vegetables. She fed travellers; today, two police employees who had come for the inspection had also ordered food from her shop. One of them said that, in the name of "public service", payment for the meals would be made later. Opening her receipt book, Amina said, "Travellers eat and pay. If people on government duty eat, I'll give them receipts too. For credit, write down a name and a definite date. A uniform does not turn a meal into a donation."

The first employee was irritated, but the other read her slip and said a receipt for the amount should be issued. Amina reconciled the account there and then. "I won't leave anyone hungry," she said, "but the decision to give away food is mine, not someone else's." The smell of rice made Shakuntala glance towards the girl. In her hurry to get to school that morning, the child had left half her flatbread uneaten. Amina gave her a small plate, and Shakuntala paid for it. "Grandmother, do we have to write down the time we spend eating, too?" the girl asked. Amina laughed. "Write down the price of the food. Don't count the pleasure of eating it."

On one side of the camp, Vibha Agrahari arrived with the records of her small medicine shop. The labourers who dug clay had been speaking of wounds, skin troubles and the cost of medicines, and she had brought a price list for basic first-aid supplies. An organiser said, "Record these goods as a donation. It will be good publicity for your shop." Vibha gathered up her papers. "I can decide how much profit I need," she said, "but if we record a donation without accounts, afterwards it will be impossible to see who actually received the medicine, and who bought it."

Vibha listed separately the quantities, purchase prices, selling prices and items she proposed to provide free of charge. She gave the injured worker no medical advice about taking drugs; she told him to go to the treatment centre. Naira mentioned that questions about names and times of receipt also arose in the hospital supply records. "My shop receipts will show the limits of my responsibility," Vibha replied. "Fault in some other supply cannot be determined from my name." She left behind a transparent account sheet and went away. The question of her larger business had not yet come before them.

When the meal was over, Amina was gathering her empty containers when she noticed Shakuntala's three sample vessels standing in the sunlight. She picked one up and asked, "Could you serve hot lentils in this?" "At present it's a sample," Shakuntala said. "Only when it has been fired in the kiln and tested for holding water will I call it a vessel for food." Amina put it back at once. "Then I'll write a separate order for the next batch," she said. For Amina, a bowl was an everyday object. For Shakuntala, every failed sample had consumed fuel and a day's work.

While examining the clay-pit papers, an official said that, to prevent anyone from falling prey to fraud, the simplest course would be to end all outstanding claims with a single settlement sum. "Which claims?" Shakuntala asked. "The price of four consignments? The cost of the repairs? Or the days of work lost because the path was closed? If you write them all as one amount, the price I'm asking for my vessels will vanish again." "You could receive a smaller amount now," the official said. Shakuntala pushed the slip forward, but did not sign it. "Receiving less money does not mean all the old dues have been paid," she said.

At that point Niru Kumal made a modest proposal: permission to collect sample clay from an approved, safe edge on designated days; a separate record of the weight taken by each artisan; and a distinct account of the expenses of the shared kiln. Tara added that the area called "safe" could only be marked after an inspection of the site. The official did not immediately grant permanent access. He accepted an application for the original closure order to be obtained and for a site visit involving artisans, engineers and municipal representatives. Shakuntala copied the acknowledgement number into her ledger. "At least the questions are on paper now," she said.

As the documents were being gathered up, the granddaughter suddenly grew quiet. A space for a guardian's signature lay empty on her school admission form. Shakuntala picked up the pen. "Can I study and learn to measure soil, find the way water flows and work on bridges?" the child asked. "You can learn," Lalit said, "but first, for now, go to school. If you want to learn to measure timber, I'll show you. The decision about whether a bridge is safe must be made by a properly trained and qualified engineer." Shakuntala did not change the meaning of the girl's question. "Choose your own path," she told her. "I'll teach you how to turn the wheel, but the wheel will not write your destiny."

After a little silence the child asked, "Grandmother, if I do other work, who will turn your wheel?" Shakuntala paused. Enthusiasm alone could not answer that question. The joints in her hands ached, and the girl's contribution to the daily work might one day have helped support the family. "I'll employ someone, or take on less work, or learn a new way of doing it," she said slowly. "Every one of those choices is difficult. But I won't tell you to surrender what you want merely because it will be difficult." The child kept her fingers against the old hardness of her grandmother's hands.

Shakuntala signed the admission form. The clerk handed over a notice about the school uniform and the new science class. The girl tried to read the sheet, stumbling over a difficult word. Naira began to sound it out in parts, but the child repeated it herself and smiled. Shakuntala suddenly remembered her own first day beside her father's kiln. Someone had shown her then how fast the wheel turned, but no one had asked what else she wanted. Now she held her granddaughter's form in her hand, and that question had not been silenced.

As they left the municipal office, Naira advised Shakuntala to keep three separate sets of papers: the question of access to the clay pit, the money owed for vessels already delivered, and the school documents. Shakuntala laughed. "What has my file to do with that sheet of twenty-seven names in your house?" "If we ever find a verified connection, we'll examine it," Naira replied. "For now, we won't combine these three matters either." There was a small relief for Naira in this: by resisting the temptation to turn every disorder into a story about one guilty person, she could still hear what people were actually owed.

Returning home at dusk, Shakuntala set the two lumps of clay beside the wheel once more. Niru had left her own sample of clay so they could decide on a day to use the kiln together, but the debt agreement had not yet reached Shakuntala's house. Kamlesh had sent a copy of the written proposal for his shop rent. Amina's food receipt clearly named the person responsible for paying. Vibha's price list lay in a separate pouch in the house. Shakuntala did not tie these pages together into a bundle of mysteries. Each paper pointed towards its own particular claim.

Her granddaughter came into the courtyard wearing the new tunic. The sleeves had now been altered to fit. She lifted the half-formed clay bowl, looked at it and sketched its outline in her notebook. "It isn't round," she said. "Turn it again if you want it round," Shakuntala answered. "And if you want to draw a plan, write down why it's crooked as well." On one page the girl drew the circle of the wheel, on another the footpath through the potters' quarter, and on a third the threshold of her school. The same hand had drawn all three lines, but the three paths were not one.

For supper there was rice, greens and a little pickle bought from Amina's shop. Shakuntala snipped a loose thread from her granddaughter's tunic. The clay near the kiln was still wet; the bowl made that day was not yet ready for the fire. The arrears had not been paid, the gate to the clay pit had not opened, and the money for each month of the child's schooling still had to be found. Yet, for the first time, the talk in that house was about the new subjects she would study, not about ways of stopping her. Shakuntala smiled as she washed the plates, and the girl put away her notebook and went to sleep.

Chapter 43 · The Brassworker and the Goldsmith

In the light of early morning, Meena Sah turned a brass vessel upside down and struck it lightly with her hammer. The metal rang clear, but at the third blow a cracked seam along one side began to shiver instead of sounding. She turned the vessel again. Two letters, painted long ago by the hospital, still clung to its rim. Years before, the vessel had been used on a trolley that carried meals to patients; now she had been commissioned to beat it back into shape for heating water. Meena laid down her hammer. “I'll raise that seam again, but I'll enter only the work I've actually done. I won't charge the price of a new vessel.”

Naira and Urmila reached the workshop veranda together. In Naira's bag were three separate copies of Shakuntala's clay receipts from the previous day. Urmila carried the page from the hospital's linen register on which the time of the vehicle's arrival had been entered before the time the linen was collected. Seeing the vessel beside Meena, Urmila asked, “Do you repair the hospital's old things as well?” Meena answered, “Mending broken vessels is my trade. But sometimes the slip says an article has reached the hospital when it's still lying here on my veranda. How is the sound of my hammer to reach beyond what the paper says?”

She opened a thin ledger. On its first page were her repair charges, on the second the pieces of metal used, and on the third the cost of transport. Three marks of identical size appeared in one corner of the new hospital receipt, but Meena's ledger listed repairs to only two articles. “Whose is this third mark?” Naira asked. “I don't know,” Meena said. “Only two vessels came to me in that consignment. I never saw a third. Whether this is a copy of my signature or another column on the materials slip, I can say only after I've seen the original paper.” Naira wrote the question down as a question.

Inside the veranda, Meena's sister had set water to heat on a small stove. Coal for the furnace had grown expensive, and Meena was reckoning what it cost to open an old joint and make it sound again. Customers sometimes asked, “How can a few little taps of a hammer cost so much?” She would show them the split in the metal. “What you cannot see in a single blow can take a whole watch of the day to put right.” Her sister insisted that they eat their midday meal on time. Since morning Meena had been working without a break, sustained by nothing but tea. At last she yielded to her sister's insistence and put the hammer aside for a little while.

That morning the market lane was awakening to its separate trades in metal, bangles and oil. People were carrying their wares away to prepare for the next collective inspection of boats and tools. Lalit Vishwakarma was finding little work since losing his contract, but Meena offered to pay him for holding the handle of a broken vessel steady. “I don't want hands working for nothing, even for an inspection," she said. Lalit laughed. "A household can't live on telling the truth alone. I need this small job today." There was a carpenter's plane in his hand; no one had entrusted him with testing the brass seam itself.

As she measured a strip of metal, Meena asked Urmila to show her the hospital page. Urmila first covered the patients' personal names. "The linen was supposed to arrive at this hour," she said, "but the hospital register says the goods were taken before our vehicle got there." Meena read the date on her repair receipt. Its recorded time was in the afternoon of that same day. Someone immediately wanted to conclude that every discrepancy belonged to the same business. Naira stopped them. "The dates for linen, vessels and treatment belong to three different registers. We'll compare the times, but we won't call all three matters crimes because one entry is wrong."

Just then a woman passed Meena's workshop with a bangle wrapped in a little piece of red cloth. Kamala Thakur, the goldsmith, was on her way to open her shop. Behind her came people from two families, arguing as they walked. A young man maintained that a pledged bracelet had belonged to his father; an elderly woman said it had come from her parental home and had been pledged in her own name. Kamala unlocked the till and asked the two parties to sit apart. "Whoever speaks the loudest will not have their article examined first," she said quietly.

Kamala's register had separate columns for the weight of each ornament, its assay, the signature of the person pledging it, and the name of the lender. But on an old slip, opposite the owner's name, someone had merely written "head of household." The elderly woman asked, "Instead of writing who was head of the house, write when I myself handed over my bracelet." The young man objected that the loan had been taken for his father's business. Kamala said, "Who benefited from a loan and who owns the jewellery are not the same question. First we'll compare the old deposit slip, the account of the witnesses who were present, and the marks on the article."

The old woman laughed when she looked at the bracelet. "I had this little crooked flower made on one side. The goldsmith said it would cost more to make the petals even. I told him to leave it crooked." Kamala turned the ornament in the light. There was indeed an uneven flower on the inner side. But she did not immediately pronounce on ownership. Recognising a mark could help establish a claim; it was not proof of the whole right. She prepared a copy of the claim in the elderly woman's own name and gave the young man time to submit the documents relating to the business loan.

Outside the shop, Rekha Sahu, the bangle-maker, had opened a little chest of bangles. On stiff paper she was drawing the measurements of a new pattern, its central line curving like a river. She had received an order for bangles for a community event, but the customer had said that the pattern Rekha designed should be handed to a machine workshop, with no separate payment for the design. Rekha raised her pencil. “Make them by machine if you like. But if you want a copy of the measurements my hands have made, you must have my permission and pay for it.”

Kamala called her over and showed her the old woman's bracelet. “Look at this crooked flower. Not every irregularity is bad workmanship.” Rekha lifted her pattern from the paper. “I may be paid for the bangles I make today,” she asked, “but who will go on selling this line for the next fifty years?” The women's problems were not identical. One concerned ownership of an ornament, the other the right to use a new design. Yet both knew how disputes began when the name of the person who made a thing and the name of the person entitled to sell it were made to occupy the same line.

Before noon, Usha Ram arrived with two pairs of shoes and some leather for musical instruments. In the preparations for the boat-and-tools inspection, repeated wetting had loosened the old skins on several drums. The event organisers had promised instruments on the stage, but suggested that the cost of repairing them be met from donations given for the singing. Usha had only laughed in reply: “The singer earns the fee for the song; I earn the fee for the leather. Write down the two kinds of work separately.” Today she had come to demand an order in writing.

Usha showed them the last on which she shaped her new shoes. She had altered the seam at the place where contact with water wore the leather away first. A trader claimed that the shape had long belonged to his shop. Usha showed him the first measurements in her notebook, the trial piece that had torn during testing, and a drawing of the seam she had remade. “I don't deny that his shop sells a similar shoe,” she said. “But I want to sell, under my own name, the alteration my own hands have made to this seam.” Instead of leaving the sample with the trader, she said she would show it to him after obtaining his written acknowledgment.

At the end of the lane stood Bindeshwari Sahu's old oil press. The dense smell of oil had settled into its walls as deeply as if they were made of date-palm wood. Some members of the household wanted the press preserved exactly as it was; his son argued that its upkeep could instead sustain a small new oil shop. Bindeshwari had invited a buyer that day. An elderly woman of the household was distressed by the thought that, if the press were sold, the memory of the family's old occupation might disappear with it.

Bindeshwari passed his palm over the wooden press. “I have memories too,” he said. “But it now costs more to turn this press and extract oil than we earn from selling it. There are debts to pay, and a small shop would let us work in a new way.” His son, pleased at this, was already thinking of increasing the sum written in the buyer's offer. But Bindeshwari went on: “The price of the timber and the old debts must be accounted for separately. The old weighing stones and the little measuring vessel my mother used will stay in the house."

"Then what of the lamp my father placed behind the press on its first day?" the elderly woman asked. Bindeshwari was silent for a while. "We'll keep the story of the lamp. Making an object of worship out of the wood won't pay our debts." They were not enemies, these two people, but two fears within the same family. Bindeshwari did not immediately seal the sale of the entire press. Before the buyer he stipulated an independent valuation and payment of the wages still owed to the household workers. The family's consent remained unsettled until that evening.

Examining the press, the buyer asked whether its old wood could be turned into new furniture. Bindeshwari answered only that it might be possible; without testing the timber he would not name a price. Meanwhile his son said he would look at a room to rent for the new oil shop. The elderly woman said that, if the new shop opened, she wanted to learn to use her old scales for measuring oil there. Bindeshwari smiled when he heard her. A household's memory lived not only in its old implements, but also in the knowledge of how to use them.

When Naira reached the oil-shop veranda, Urmila was sitting there wiping sweat from her face. "You again?" Naira asked, laughing. "Will the wheels of the linen cart turn without oil?" Urmila replied. "I came first to find out how much extra the driver will charge for carrying the supplies." Bindeshwari saw that her cart needed fresh oil, but did not put down an estimated charge. He asked the driver when it had last been serviced. "The bill for the vessels and the bill for the oil may both go under the hospital's expenses," Urmila said, "but that doesn't make them the same work."

Toward evening Lalit and Meena reached the old hospital warehouse. Gomti had come on behalf of the labourers' group. The previous repair bill stated that an old mixture of shell and lime had been removed and new material put in its place. Gomti said, "The sacks we carried had 'lime' written on their receipts. Where the sacks came from, and what they actually held—those are two things I cannot testify to." She produced separate slips showing the days she had transported them and the wages she had earned.

Meena examined a handful of powdered shell from the old material. In childhood she had heard stories of making lime from shells found beside the river, but those stories were no test of the scientific properties of the materials used in a new building. "I can speak about the joints in a metal vessel," she said. "I can't tell just by looking whether this powder is from an old wall or a new sack." Lalit added, "A soil sample, the price of lime, the seam of a metal vessel and the load carried by timber: each of these four things requires its own examination." Gomti had the names of the workers at the site entered, but took consent from each of them first.

A warehouse employee brought out an old delivery note. It bore a stamp saying “Materials Received,” but the box marked “Place of Use” was blank. Meena compared it with her repair bill. On the date when she had returned two brass vessels, the delivery note listed four items: two of metal, one sample of shell-lime and one unidentified piece for repair. “My bill accounts for only the first two,” she said. “Look elsewhere for the third and fourth. Don't enlarge the scope of my work until I'm made to testify about everything on that list.”

Naira entered two distinct questions in her notebook: when the hospital's articles had been transferred, and into whose hands; and where the building materials had actually been used. Here she discovered one small correction. On the slip bearing Meena Sah's signature, what people had read as “three repairs” contained a third mark that was not a count of repairs at all, but a separate tax column relating to labour charges. Once the employee produced the original form, that misreading was corrected. Yet the discrepancy between the receipt and the use of the four items listed on the delivery note remained exactly as it had been.

Outside the warehouse a weighing scale stood askew. A young man from the labourers' group asked whether the charge for carrying sacks had been reckoned by weight or by consignment. Gomti opened her papers and explained that on some days the workers had been paid by the load, but no additional wages had been entered for the heavier labour of lifting sacks of lime when they were wet. Naira did not write the claim on the page concerning discrepancies in construction materials. She opened a separate account for wages. Relief showed on Gomti's face. Her testimony was not merely a means of discovering faulty supplies; it was evidence, too, of what was owed for her own labour.

“Then take away the accusation of theft,” Meena said. Naira replied, “I'll record that there is no basis for accusing you of three repairs. But the question of where the other goods went remains open.” Gomti spoke for her workers as well. “We remember lifting sacks of lime. We won't be pressured into providing proof of things we never saw.” Lalit did not lay the papers from his lost contract on that same table. An injustice had been done to him, but his separate appeal would address it; it was not part of the question raised by this delivery note.

Meanwhile, the elderly woman returned to Kamala's shop with a witness from the old days. The witness said that, when the ornament was pledged years earlier, the woman had taken the bracelet off with her own hands, although the lender's receipt had been made out in the name of a man of the family. The young man was still anxious about the sum owed. Kamala explained that she had no authority to alter the old record. What she could do was attach a supplementary statement of the elderly woman's claim to ownership. The loan, its interest and the terms on which the article could be redeemed would have to be examined separately. The old woman received the copy bearing her own name and tucked it into a corner of her scarf.

Rekha had come to Kamala for the measurements of her new bangles. Looking at the design, the old woman said, “The curve in your bangle is very beautiful, but won't it cut the hand when it's worn?” Rekha laughed and turned the bangle around its wooden mould. One edge was rough indeed. She rubbed it smooth there and then. “That's what I need a customer to tell me,” she said, “not simply that it's beautiful.” For the first time, amid her anxiety about saving her bracelet, the elderly woman laughed with ease.

Usha showed Rekha the receipt for repairing the leather on her drums. The colour of the bangles and the sound of the instruments would both be noticed at the celebration; yet the names of the people who worked behind the brightness of the stage were often erased. Rekha proposed that at the next community gathering the maker's name and agreed fee be displayed beside each object. “And the singer's name separately,” Usha said. “Because I made the drumskin, I won't claim a right over the singer's melody.” A child sitting nearby heard this and insisted on writing the maker's name on a little box that held his toys.

Bindeshwari returned from the family's evening meeting. The buyer had agreed to provide a new valuation within the next two days; no final signature had yet been given for the sale of the oil press. The household had decided to keep his mother's old measuring vessel, the press's first wooden board and the ledger of oil extracted. There was weariness in Bindeshwari's eyes, but for the first time he could see a way not of freeing himself from those memories, but of preserving them separately. He brought Meena a small tin of mustard oil, for which she paid the full price.

Urmila picked up her register and set off for home. Meena gave her a copy of the bill for repairing the two vessels, on condition that the owner's private details should not be made public during the inquiry unless necessary. Naira put the copy of the delivery note in her bag, but left the paper concerning the woman's claim of ownership at Kamala's shop. It would have been easy to pull all those separate pages together under the name of a single mystery. Today, however, the real search lay in discovering who had seen which object, who had received what payment, and how far each person's signature could properly speak.

As night fell, the light tapping of metal rose once more in the market lane. Meena was finishing the seam of the first vessel. The crack inside the joint appeared to be closed, but she would not return the vessel until she had filled it with water and tested it. Across the lane Kamala was letting the supplementary sheet bearing the elderly woman's name dry; the edge of Rekha's bangle had been smoothed; Usha's new shoe last still stood on the veranda; and Bindeshwari's oil press awaited the buyer. The question raised by the hospital delivery note remained unanswered. Yet five people that day had come to see more clearly the workmanship, the price and the name belonging to each one's labour.

Chapter 44 · The Blacksmith's Tools

At dawn, the fire in Harinarayan Sharma's forge was not yet red, but a pale yellow. Holding a thin strip of iron in his tongs, he laid it upon the anvil and brought down his hammer. The strip bent to one side. At the second blow the bend flattened; at the third, a narrow groove formed within it. He placed a finger beside the groove. "A rope won't sit here," he said. "This is where the wheel-pin will fit." His son Ajit was recording the measurements in a notebook. The smoke from the forge rose and slipped through a crack in the door, out towards the marketplace, which was only just beginning to wake.

"Father, why are people frightened when they see iron shaped like this?" Ajit asked. Since the previous evening, a photograph of the workshop had been passing from phone to phone. It showed a long iron rod in Harinarayan's hand and three pieces of metal bent into strange shapes. Beneath it ran a caption: Evidence of weapons being made near the hospital warehouse. Without lifting the rod, Harinarayan answered, "If you give a thing a name before you see what it does, you'll end up calling a ploughshare, a nail and a latch the very same thing." Ajit's hand stopped moving over the notebook.

Four unfinished implements lay in the courtyard: a hook for lifting the grille over a drainage outlet, a pin for the axle of a handcart, an iron clamp to hold the wooden frame of a loom, and a ring to secure a rope along the side of a boat. Three had been ordered by different customers; the price of the fourth had not yet been settled. Harinarayan was writing a small mark in chalk beside each article. The old workshop ledger explained every mark in full. Those marks had been cropped from the photograph. What remained was the pointed end of a piece of iron and a frightening headline.

Just then Meena Sah arrived with a copy of the hospital's incomplete delivery note from the previous day. Her work was repairing metal vessels, but one of the four items on the note was still described as an "unidentified repair piece." Meena did not place the sheet beside the anvil. She spread it on an empty plank, safely away from the furnace. "Three repairs were entered against my name, and that mistake has been corrected," she said. "Now somebody is saying this fourth thing is your iron rod. I don't know who has said so."

Harinarayan studied the page. "I have receipts for everything that went from my workshop to the hospital. But here it merely says 'piece': no weight, no dimensions, no signature." He opened his ledger. A month earlier he had made two door hinges and a joint for a small grille for the hospital. The fourth line recorded an iron ring for a customer's boat, which had nothing whatever to do with the hospital. Meena lowered her eyes. "Then we must put a stop to this insistence on making the words on a sheet of paper stand in for the object itself," she said.

An argument was about to begin over the person who had circulated the photograph, but Naira stopped it there. “We still don't have the original picture, the time it was first circulated, or the consent of the person who took it,” she said. Ajit wanted to find at once whoever had disgraced his father. Harinarayan laid a palm upon the boy's head. “Learn to show the measurements of your own work. To declare someone guilty without evidence would be to repeat the very mistake made against us.” Ajit remained sulky, but he wrote down the actual measurements of the rod in the photograph.

Outside the workshop appeared two police officers and an employee of the municipal inspection team. Naira had come with them, though she stood a little apart. During the previous day's inquiry she had kept the shell-and-lime sample separate from the slips for the metal vessels. Today, acting on a local complaint, the police had come to examine the uses of ordinary workshop tools. “There are questions about the shapes shown on social media,” the municipal employee said. “Please cooperate with the inspection.” Harinarayan lowered the furnace fire, moved the workers to a safe distance and opened out his table of tools.

Looking at the long rod, the first officer asked, “Who is this point meant to strike?” Harinarayan did not thrust the rod towards him. Instead, he placed an old wheel axle on the anvil, fitted the rod against it to show the measurements, and said, “There is a groove on the other side of this rod for the retaining stop. What looks like a point is the end that joins the parts. Here are the mould and the old customer's wheel.” The employee examined the measurements. “Couldn't a tool be used for something else?” the officer asked again. “It could,” Harinarayan replied. “But what is possible and what has actually been done here are two different kinds of evidence.”

With the employee's permission, Naira wrote three headings on her paper: What the photograph shows; What was examined in the workshop; What questions remain unanswered. She had once feared that speaking too quickly against a public complaint might cause genuine evidence of wrongdoing to be overlooked. She remembered her own mistake in publishing Mahesh's testimony before it was safe to do so. “For now,” she said, “all we ought to state publicly is that the photograph does not, by itself, prove a crime. If there are other objects or documents, they will require a separate inquiry.”

At that moment Irfan Khan came over from the neighbouring vehicle-repair shop. A black smear of grease ran across the sleeve of his shirt, and he carried a small, worn bushing. He had come to collect an axle pin he had ordered earlier from Harinarayan. Seeing the crowd, he asked, “Have you stopped the part for my vehicle?” “It's here,” Harinarayan said, “but an inspection is under way.” Irfan placed his order slip before the municipal employee. It listed the axle of a vehicle wheel, the date, the identifying mark of the old part, and the request for its replacement.

One of Irfan's customers owned a small passenger vehicle, which carried patients and workers from the railway square at different fares. Its driver was in a hurry. He had told Irfan over the telephone that if a complaint about the noise of the brakes were put in writing, he might lose his transport contract. Irfan had not yet written the complaint down; he intended to inspect the fault a second time. Now, in front of the gathered people, he made his decision. “I'll issue a slip today recording what I saw in the vehicle. The customer may be angry if he chooses, but I won't call it safe without an examination.”

One officer looked at the round hole inside Irfan's bushing. “And this?” he asked. Irfan made no attempt at a dramatic demonstration. He set the old part beside the new measurement and showed where the metal wore away as the axle turned. There was the scar of an old injury across his palm; he understood the hazards of his work. “This is a repair sample,” he said. “A shape like this might be made for some other purpose, but look at its use on this vehicle first. Then put your inference into writing.” The employee took a photograph, and also recorded the instruction that the customer's private details were not to be made public.

Naira asked Irfan a question apart from the others. “How many days ago was this vehicle repaired?” Irfan replied that he had written down the dates of his earlier work, but he could not testify about the part replaced in another workshop. “Put the limits of my work in the record,” he said. Naira wrote three more words: Seen. Done. Heard. In the marketplace there were people eager to draw every consignment into a single criminal story merely because a vehicle had a similar name. The separate receipt for this inspection stood in the way of that eagerness.

Once a rumour spreads through a market, it alters the prices of goods as well. Harinarayan's regular customer Nandlal, who had ploughshares made for his fields, did not come at all. His son had seen the report on his mobile phone and sent word suspending the order. Harinarayan read the message and grew a little sad, but he did not offer it to the police as evidence against an adversary. “He was frightened. It's my task to explain things to him,” he said. “If every customer gets frightened, how will the forge stay alight?” Ajit asked. Harinarayan stood looking at the unfinished ploughshare beside the anvil.

Near the bangle shop, Farzana Chudihar was laying out three kinds of goods for a customer: hand-shaped lac bracelets, thin glass bangles, and uniformly sized pairs made by machine. After hearing talk of Rekha Sahu's new design, some people had begun calling Farzana's wares “copies.” Farzana explained the separate costs of manufacture and the different risks of breakage. “Rekha's design belongs to her,” she said. “The mixture of colours in these bracelets, and the turn given by my hand, are my work. And the machine-made ones I'll sell as machine-made. I won't call them handmade and charge more.”

The customer said, “Some people are even saying that bent thing in the photograph of the metal is a tool for cutting bangles.” Farzana did not laugh. She picked up her craftsperson's small tongs, showed the rubber on their jaws, and placed beside them a narrow clamp Harinarayan had made. “These two tools may look alike,” she said, “but one holds hot lac and the other steadies a wooden mould. If you turn a shopkeeper into a criminal without looking at the receipt or the work, these hands of mine will be brought to a stop as well.”

Farzana's sister's daughter had come to buy bangles with money she had saved herself, for the first time. Instead of red, she chose a grey-green bracelet. “Do you really like this colour,” Farzana asked, “or are you choosing it merely to go against what everyone says?” The girl laughed. “It's like the shadow of a cloud. It'll look even lovelier when it rains.” Farzana explained how to care for lac when it came into contact with water. Rather than lowering the price and calling the difference a gift, she entered the agreed discount on the receipt. For a little while, their laughter broke through the fear hanging over the market.

A short distance from the bangle shop, Sharda Kasaudhan sat with the pages of an old pawn ledger spread before her. Having heard of the dispute over a woman's ornament at Kamala the goldsmith's shop, she had decided to examine the old interest calculations in her own family's business. Her elder brother said that reopening the old slips would damage the family's reputation. Sharda had replied, “If an unfair charge has been entered, keeping the page shut won't save our good name. But I won't call every pawned article stolen property either.” That day she had brought separate applications from three families.

On Sharda's first page, the amount of the principal was clearly entered, but one item of interest had been charged twice. On the second, “family” had been written where the name of the woman who pledged the article should have stood. On the third, it was unclear who had paid how much towards redeeming an article after the term of the pledge had expired. Sharda made a separate account and told the customer, “I'll examine the figures. I won't authorise the sale of any jewellery today.” Her brother grew irritated. “If you reveal so much to customers, you'll ruin the family business.” “It will be ruined far more,” she answered, “when trust is broken by accounts that cannot be explained.”

When Kamala arrived, Sharda spoke to her about the supplementary claim concerning the elderly woman's bracelet. Kamala did not unfold the private documents for her to see. “The ownership claim is lodged in my shop,” she said. “You examine your own interest accounts. If the customer herself gives permission, then we can consider how the two sets of papers relate to one another.” Sharda agreed. Questions of a woman's ownership and of debt touched both businesses, but that was no reason to make the customer's private obligations public without her consent.

After midday the inspection team assembled once more at Harinarayan's workshop. Lalit Vishwakarma had also come, because the wooden and iron measurements needed to correspond for the clamps intended for the temporary landing platform at the ghat. Lalit had lost his earlier contract not through any mistake of workmanship, but because he had refused to sign a false certification of load-bearing capacity. He made no promise to undertake the new work; he merely showed the old template he had brought. “If the iron clamp is made properly, the wood won't slip,” Harinarayan said. “But whether the whole platform will hold when the water rises is not something my tool can tell you.”

Aditi and Tara arrived a little later. Aditi carried a preliminary drawing for the renewed inspection of the drainage outlet, where the measurements of the old obstruction restricting the flow were still incomplete. The municipal employee asked whether the iron hook could be used to lift the blocked grille. “The hook has been made to lift a grille,” Harinarayan replied. “But when it should be lifted, how far, and with whose permission—that must be decided by the engineer and the people who use it.” Tara pointed out that the grip of the hook needed another slight bend to prevent it from slipping in the hand. Harinarayan entered her suggestion in his notebook.

The inspection team examined the measurements of all four unfinished implements, the customers' orders, and a demonstration of how the tools were used. That day, nothing found in the workshop supplied specific material evidence for the phone caption alleging that weapons were being made there. One of the police officers agreed to record this in his remarks. He added, however, that any independent inquiry into an outside consignment or another complaint would not be closed by this finding. “That's fair,” Harinarayan said. “Only don't circulate a photograph of my ordinary tools as though it were proof of a crime already established.”

The municipal employee gave Naira a short copy of the inspection report, which mentioned the uses of the four ordinary tools and the receipts from their separate customers. Halfway through the page, she stopped at a single word: “recovered.” “What article was seized here?” she asked. “The samples were examined, not seized,” the employee replied. “Then please write ‘inspected,’” Naira said politely. “Changing one word can change the future of a document.” The employee prepared a corrected copy and handed it to Harinarayan.

Ajit was still standing in the doorway. He had a handful of small scraps of iron with which he wanted to make a little wind chime. Harinarayan looked at the string the boy had brought. “These pieces have sharp points. Grind the edges smooth first, or you'll end up cutting someone's hand with what you call a chime.” “Will they call this a weapon too?” Ajit asked. For the first time that day Harinarayan smiled. “If you can make it so it doesn't cut a hand and makes a beautiful sound, that will be the first test of your craft.”

A short correction appeared on the noticeboard in the market square: the inspection had not substantiated the allegation concerning the photograph of Harinarayan's workshop; an object could not be judged apart from its observed use and the relevant documents. No one offered an open apology. Nandlal did not immediately reinstate his order for the ploughshare. The loss remained written in Harinarayan's ledger; it was not a debt that vanished simply because a proper inspection report had been issued.

Irfan telephoned his vehicle-owning customer. “I'll finish the axle work today,” he said, “but I'll record the fault I saw on the brake-inspection slip. Whether to put the vehicle on the road is your decision; it's my responsibility to say when it is unsafe.” After a silence the customer said, “Just write that it needs to be looked at again.” “I'll write that it needs to be looked at,” Irfan answered, “and I'll also write down the wear I've already seen.” He ended the call. He knew he might have lost a customer.

In the evening Farzana set three small boards outside her shop: Handmade Lac Work, Glass Bangles, Machine-made Goods. She took time to explain the differences in colour and size to a customer, without pressing anyone to buy the most expensive things. Rekha Sahu came by briefly and asked her opinion on a new shape. “The colour is good at this joint,” Farzana said, “but it will rub against the wrist. The honour of a craftsperson lies in keeping the customer's hand safe.” Rekha noted a small correction on her drawing.

Farzana told her that she wanted to show children a short lesson on the three kinds of bangles. Instead of letting them touch hot lac while it was being worked, the lesson would use a cold mould, colour samples, and the safely finished edges of broken bangles. “If a child takes to the craft,” Rekha said, “the child should learn what proper training costs. No one should make children do a shop's work under the name of free skills.” “And a child who doesn't take to it,” Farzana replied, “will still learn the value of money earned by somebody else's sweat.”

At the family's evening meeting, Sharda laid down a sheet on which the principal, the interest, and the owner's name were entered separately. Her brother was still arguing, but he fell silent when he saw the line where interest had been charged twice. “We'll correct this one account,” he said, “but we can't open every old ledger in a single day.” Sharda agreed. She fixed a day on which the customer's permission would be sought for the first copy of an open interest register. It was not a complete victory, but the old command to keep the papers closed had been broken.

At night Harinarayan was putting out the forge fire when Meena returned with the corrected receipt for her brass-vessel repairs. “The question of that fourth item at the hospital remains,” she said. “My iron hook from today is not the answer to it,” Harinarayan replied. “If I find a receipt, I'll produce it in my own name. But I won't bear witness to what I haven't seen.” Meena nodded. Both wanted the missing article found; neither would turn the other's work into false evidence.

Before the workshop closed, Gomti arrived carrying a slip. Among the labourers who had collected samples from the hospital warehouse, one worker's signature was absent; in its place was only a thumbprint. “I'll call in the person whose print this is,” she said. “I won't put words in his mouth that aren't written on this paper.” Harinarayan glanced at the slip and gave it straight back. “Everyone who works at a forge can have blackened hands,” he said. “You can't identify one of my workers just by looking at a dark thumbprint.” Gomti kept the slip safe in her own possession.

Urmila passed the workshop beside the handcart used for carrying hospital linen. She asked Harinarayan whether the axle pin would be ready in time. “Your cart's pin is being made,” he said. “When you collect it, you'll have a separate receipt. But fitting this pin to an unsafe landing platform won't make the platform safe.” Urmila laughed. “We've begun to understand that water, linen, axles and platforms all need their own accounts. When the wages due to us are settled with the same clarity, then I'll say we've made progress.” There was mockery in her words, but weariness too.

Ajit hung his little wind chime above the anvil. When a breeze caught it, two of the three thin pieces rang, but the third remained silent. He took up the tongs and altered the distance between them. Now all three gave their separate notes. Harinarayan ran a hand along one rough edge. “This still needs smoothing,” he said. Ajit took the chime down again. Admitting that the work was unfinished did not lessen his pleasure in it. Outside, across the distant marketplace, the effects of the day's falsehood still lingered. Inside, the forge had gone dark; yet a small, new sound made of iron remained in the house.

Chapter 45 · The Weaver's Consignment

In the half-spent light of dawn, the first drop fell from the roof of Sukathi's market shed, and Vinod Kevart tipped over the bamboo cover. The water gathered in it fell not upon the baskets of fish but into a deep earthen pot set beside the drain. All through the fish market, the sounds of wet sacks, nets, broken pieces of ice, and the wooden sandals of the water-carriers rose together. Vinod's first concern was not the price of fish but the danger of someone slipping on the narrow passage where the last vehicle of the night was still standing. He lifted his small slatted selling platform and shifted it once more. From near the shed owner's accountant came a voice: "The rent will be higher in that spot." Vinod answered, "Write down the rent. But first leave some room for people to set their feet."

On the other side of that wet passage Yusuf Ansari was unloading two bundles of cloth. The fabric that had come from his loom was folded with such care that, as soon as the binding was loosened, a fine red thread along its edge shone in one unbroken line. A white paper strip was pasted to the second bundle: "Yusuf Ansari, Handloom, Approved for Hospital Use." His hand stopped at the sight of it. He had not written the words of approval, nor did he possess any test report showing that the cloth had passed the standards required for a hospital. The first bundle held cloth woven by his own hands; the fabric in the second felt strange beneath his fingers. Yet both carried the stamp of the same shop.

The driver opened his delivery note. "It's all one trader's goods. The unloading slip has been made out under a single name." Yusuf drew a thread from a corner of the second bundle and examined it. The structure of the yarn, the join at the edge, the feel of the folds—none belonged to his loom. He did not want to tear the length of cloth; he merely showed the corner of the sample and said, "I did not weave this. A stamp bearing my name does not make a thing mine." The driver insisted that the trader had paid an advance, that the market price was good today, and that the sensible course was to unload and sell at once. Yusuf placed the first bundle to one side and tied his own red cord around the second. In his household ledger that cord meant: "Sale stopped."

Yusuf's son telephoned just then. He was training in electronic equipment and wanted to devise a small method for matching photographs of customers' consignments. "Abba, look at the stamp on the second consignment through your phone. It will match the photograph of our sample," he said. Irritated, Yusuf replied, "You cannot feel the holes along the edge in a photograph!" His son fell silent, then said, "That is precisely why I keep asking you to put a sample number beside the photograph. I am not setting aside what your own eyes have seen." Yusuf looked again at a digit written in the corner of the delivery note. The previous evening, each time his son had urged him not to sell two different lots of goods under one mobile-phone image, Yusuf had heard only another obstacle to business. Today his own fingers were beginning to understand why the boy had said it.

As Vinod adjusted his scales, he noticed Yusuf. “In cloth, two bundles bear one name. In fish, they’ll say two baskets came from the same pond and use that to cut the price,” he said, laughing. A weight already stood upon his customer’s scale, but the question troubling him was why the carriers’ fee never appeared on the receipt. He sold his fish on a platform shared with the fishers. The wholesale contractor’s vehicle could pull straight into the shade; the small sellers had to bear both sun and rain. Today, for the first time, Vinod took a page of his own expenses to the shed accountant: the cost of buying the fish, bringing it ashore from the boat, carrying the baskets, and counting the fish that had spoiled, each entered separately.

After reading the page, the accountant said, “The big transporters pay in advance. That’s why their places are permanent.” Vinod answered, “I pay rent too. But will you count the spaces by the wheels of the vehicles or by the baskets from which people sell? A man who bought his fish at dawn has been given a place where water still drips.” The accountant did not pretend to search his register for the names of the small sellers; he actually turned the pages. There was only one entry for them: “Miscellaneous.” “Miscellaneous is not a person’s name,” Vinod said. He did not demand an immediate decision on the whole contract. Instead, he wrote down the date on which he could submit a separate application for space to the market committee.

Nearby, Suman Tikulihar was opening her little wooden box. Inside were brightly coloured tikulis made on safe clay and wooden moulds, round paper samples, and small identifying marks for the borders. For the fair at the fish market, the traders wanted boards bearing the names of their goods, and Suman had received a partial order to make coloured signs. She told one customer, “The pattern I have created will remain recorded in my sample book. You may use the board you buy for that board’s intended purpose; the price does not include the right to copy my mould for every shop.” The customer smiled at first, then asked, “What, then, is the price for making the sign?” On a small receipt Suman showed the paper, the colours, and the time of her hands as separate items.

At that hour Meena Sarki was fastening two leather straps to a bamboo post beside the shed and hanging up samples. Her family made equipment for pack animals, straps for tying sacks, and grips for tools. She had brought sample measurements from a cooperative group across the border, but transactions in this market were conducted in local currency and on local receipts. The currency, date, and allocation of costs for paying the people in her cooperative were still under discussion. Meena tugged lightly at one strap to demonstrate its strength. “This one isn’t for a wet fish basket. If water keeps getting into this joint, it may loosen.”

The driver asked Meena to bind both bundles of cloth with a single strap. “I can certainly tie them,” she answered, “but why should I tie a slip bearing the wrong name into my knot? First tell me which bundle is to go to whom.” She entered three items on her small receipt: hire of the strap, labour for tying it, and time spent waiting. “Everyone wants to be paid separately!” the driver exclaimed in irritation. Meena replied, “When the same person does three jobs, none of those jobs becomes free. And a strap is not proof of anyone’s wrongdoing.” She supplied her strap for the first bundle alone, withholding it from the second until responsibility had been made clear.

Yusuf opened the cloth in the first bundle. The days of his household seemed bound into its threads: where the warp had once broken, a small join had been repaired with earth-coloured yarn. He did not wish to conceal that little mark of handwork merely to make a sale. The cloth in the second bundle was smooth and lustrous, but he had neither the authority nor the test results needed to call it “hospital-approved handloom.” A representative of the wholesaler arrived and said, “You’ll get twice the price. We can find out later who put on the stamp. Just send the goods.” Yusuf opened his ledger and entered the first bundle’s number separately. “What I have not woven shall not go out under my name,” he said. “A double price cannot turn a false claim about hospital use into the truth.”

The trader’s representative reminded him of an old debt. The advance for the school curtains had still not been received in full; the shopkeeper who supplied his yarn was demanding another payment. “This sale would clear your debt,” the man said. Yusuf’s mouth went dry. He remembered the slip for his son’s training fees lying in a little drawer. On a page he wrote out his estimate of the loss: two days’ shop rent, the cost of bringing the bundles to the vehicle, and the delay in buying the next supply of yarn because this sale would be held up. Even after laying out those figures plainly, he did not untie the red cord. It was easy enough to speak of an ethical decision, harder to provide grain for the household.

Water was flowing from outside the roof into the shed’s drain. A young man declared that, because the drain was blocked, the pond water must certainly have gone bad. Vinod stopped him. “This is the shed’s outlet. The water in the pond is a separate question. Today’s smell cannot give you a numerical measure of the quality of the water there.” He drew a rough sketch of the shed’s gate, the route taken by its wastewater, and the place where the fish were stored. The drainage of the water running through the market needed inspection; testing the reservoir from which the fish came required a different sample and a different procedure. Suman added a fine line to the corner of her sign design so that, on the fair’s board, the market drain would not be confused with the picture of the pond.

By noon the organising committee for the fish-and-makhana labour fair had assembled on the market's communal platform. Ramani Mallah came carrying an old sample of dried makhana. She was clear about the fact that gathering makhana in the ponds, drying it, popping it, and taking it to market were separate kinds of work. One committee member proposed buying the lengths of cloth along with the fish and makhana at a single rate for "local goods." Yusuf, Vinod, and Ramani looked at one another. Ramani spoke first. "Calling something local is a mark of respect. But the price must follow the work. A raw makhana seed and a popped kernel are not the same."

Showing a slight flaw in his length of cloth, Yusuf said, "The rate for handwoven cloth must take account of the hours spent at the warp and the cost of the yarn. Add transport separately. I don't make fish baskets, and a fish seller isn't the keeper of my loom." Vinod added at once, "The buying price of the fish, the small seller's share, and the loss on spoiled fish must all be kept separate. Writing one price for everything brought in by a single vehicle makes matters easier for the trader, not the worker." This time the committee made four entries instead of one: fish, makhana, cloth, and transport. The rates were not approved immediately; the original purchase slips were requested for the next meeting.

The trader's representative returned. This time he carried a copy of an invoice showing the combined sum for both bundles, with the stamp of Yusuf's shop printed on it. "Sign it and we'll release the load. Otherwise return the advance you were given," he said. Yusuf saw that the invoice bore only a stamp, not his signature. He laid his authentic weaving sample, the earlier order, and the receipt for the first bundle on the table. "I am prepared to account for the money owed on the cloth I actually wove," he said, "but I will not sign to say that the other goods were made by me. Whatever advance was paid against those goods requires a written reconciliation."

Naira had come to the public noticeboard at the market to collect a slip concerning Urmila's wages. Yusuf had no wish to draw her into his dispute, but Vinod asked who would keep secure copies of the written papers. Naira heard the numbers of both bundles, photographed the lengths of cloth with their owners' consent, and wrote down no more than what could be observed: the first bundle matched a sample from Yusuf's loom; the second bore his printed name, but there was no proof of its manufacture. To investigate the words "hospital-approved," the hospital's purchasing register would have to be examined. The appearance of those words did not justify calling the faults in the hospital's old metal invoices and cloth register one and the same offence.

Naira noticed a common vehicle number on the representative's invoice. The same kind of vehicle number had appeared on some of the hospital's warehouse slips, but the dates and descriptions of work were different. She told Vinod, "A single vehicle may carry fish, cloth, dyes, and fluffed cotton through a market. A matching vehicle does not mean that every sack has the same source. Each consignment needs its own loading slip, place of unloading, and mark of acceptance.” “Then don’t write that my vehicle is a criminal either,” said the representative. “I won’t,” Naira answered. “Nor will I declare anyone guilty without investigation merely because his name has been printed here.”

Beside the red cord already tied around the second bundle, Yusuf fastened a narrow strip of paper: “Identity of manufacture and intended use unverified; sale suspended; original packing preserved.” On the first bundle he wrote an accurate description and measurements of the cloth from his loom. The representative objected that, if the goods were sealed, there was no saying how long they might have to remain in a corner of the shed. Meena displayed a blank receipt for her straps. “Wherever they are kept, charge the storage by the day and write it down. No one is to open a bundle without permission.” Yusuf accepted a temporary entry making him responsible for the storage charge. Whose debt it would ultimately become remained open.

At Vinod’s stall, an elderly customer chose two pieces of fish. “I don’t want half a paseri,” she said. “There are only two of us at home today.” The seller told her, “The price comes down with a big basket.” The old woman laughed. “Your scales don’t keep a register of the hunger in my house!” Vinod weighed out the smaller portion she wanted and, instead of using an empty leaf bag, placed it in a clean, shallow basket he had beside him. When she paid, another customer remembered his own calculation and asked for his fish to be weighed again. “This is a market, not an examination hall,” said Vinod, “but if you want the weight checked, the scales are free.” Laughter rose again among the crowd.

Toward evening the secretary of the fish-market committee prepared a temporary notice: the narrow central passage through the shed was to remain clear; the small vendors would submit written accounts of their stalls, rents, and carrying costs; a decision on permanent shade and the special concessions enjoyed by the wholesale contractor would come at the next hearing. Vinod’s demand had not yet been granted. Even so, it mattered to him that his own name had appeared on the hearing sheet in place of “Miscellaneous.” He folded a copy of the paper and put it in his netted bag. “Is there a song written in it?” his daughter asked. “Not yet,” said Vinod. “But if there is room left for your drum, there will be songs.”

Suman was handing the last customer of the day her sheet of coloured paper. The customer’s daughter picked out a round tikuli and said she wanted a blue dot on it, not a red one. Suman showed her another sample. “Choose the colour by which you want your mark to be known,” she said. “But learn how to use the adhesive safely before you put it near your eyes.” The little girl set the tikuli on her forehead and saw the reflection of her mother’s face in a broken mirror. Amid the uproar of the fish market, Suman was pleased by the child's small assurance. As she handed over the receipt, she closed her sample book, without promising to sell every design in it.

Meena gathered up her straps and gave the driver a separate receipt. She had received the hire for one strap; half the waiting time remained unpaid. She refused to reduce the amount and call it a "favour." After a moment's thought, the driver said he would settle the account tomorrow. Giving him the second copy of the slip, Meena said, "I can give you until tomorrow, but the date written on it must be today's." As she was leaving, Suman asked when she might put a little coloured mark of her own on a leather grip. Meena smiled. "First we'll write down whose object it is, how far the right to use the mark extends, and how the price is to be calculated. Then we can begin the new work."

Yusuf called his son once more. "Your method of photographs and numbers proved useful," he said, "but I need the sound of the warp on my loom as well." His son laughed. "I don't want to take its sound away. I want to learn electronics. I'll make the register of your lengths of cloth, but I don't want to spend the whole day sitting at the loom." Yusuf was silent for a moment. The father did not want his son to sever himself completely from the family trade; the son wanted him to understand that helping did not mean abandoning a different profession. For the first time Yusuf heard that difference without irritation. "I remember the date your training fee is due," he said. "We'll keep the debt account separate." It was not an easy promise to make, but the decision to open two separate pages was real.

On her way back from the shops, Naira took copies of three papers from Yusuf: the order for the first length of cloth, a visual description of the unverified label on the second bundle, and the vehicle's unloading slip. She left the originals with him. "The cotton-fluffer's, dyer's, and washerwoman's goods came on this shared vehicle yesterday too," Gomti told her along the road. "They've said they will bring their separate registers." Naira replied, "Then each register must be read together with its owner's account. The evidence found here must not be made to prove more than it can." The search for the old missing hospital supplies had not suddenly been resolved by this new label.

Back home, Yusuf opened two fresh pages in his night ledger. On the first he entered the wages for the authentic cloth, the yarn, and the amount due from the customer; on the second, the storage cost of the held consignment, the trader's advance, and the wait for an investigation. At the bottom of the page he wrote a separate date for his son's training fees. The loss was plain on paper now; it had not grown any smaller. Yet the bundle bearing the false label had not been sold that day in the name of any hospital or school. For the first time the small fish seller's name had entered the record of a hearing. And a son could lend a hand to his father's work without surrendering the work he wanted for himself. Yusuf lowered the lamp. The loom was silent tonight, but the true identity of its warp remained intact.

Chapter 46 · The Washerwoman, the Dyer and the Cotton-Fluffer

Urmila Rajak was spreading a freshly washed white sheet across the stone platform at the ghat, holding down its four corners with stones. The morning wind kept lifting one corner, again and again. Sunlight needed to reach the inside of the sheet, but the damp rising from the mud was making it heavy once more. Urmila passed her bare hand over its middle; if the inner seam remained wet, the sheet would begin to smell when it was put away at the hospital. She had set two baskets beside the platform—one for sheets already washed, the other for linen whose count and time of receipt had not yet been reconciled. The same day's sunlight fell on both baskets; in the register, they belonged to different days.

Renu came along the path above the ghat with an old piece of chalk and a length of string. Word of the cloth bundles stopped at Sukathi's cattle shed the day before had reached her. “Everyone says the cloth that came in the same vehicle was the hospital's missing property,” she said. Urmila did not stop folding the washed sheet. “Since when has 'everyone says' been the name of a register?” she asked. “I have a count of what I washed. Rahim will account for what was fluffed. Sakina will know the dyed cloth. Why should I identify what never passed through my hands?”

In the public room across the narrow road from the ghat, Naira had asked not for three tables but for one long plank. Three separate squares were marked on it in chalk: washing, dyeing, and cotton-fluffing. Those lines would settle no question of ownership; they would merely keep the papers from becoming muddled. Gomti opened the window. “A fourth square?” she asked. “For transport,” Naira replied. “The vehicle travelled between all of them, but a vehicle's delivery slip cannot take the place of a work receipt. Keep its accounts separately.”

Rahim Mansuri was the first to arrive. An old khadi bag hung from his shoulder, and in his hand he carried a small bundle of cotton. The moment he opened the bag, delicate fibres drifted into the air of the room. Loosening the cloth tied across his nose, he said, “Filling new mattresses with cotton I've fluffed and making old cotton rise again are different kinds of work. In the first, I am owed the price of the material as well; in the second, the cotton still belongs to the customer.” He had received an order to make a sample of a new mattress. Yet now, as soon as they heard the hospital mentioned, customers were asking whether he filled mattresses with stolen cotton.

Sakina the dyer arrived behind him. There were fine marks of indigo beneath her fingernails and two different stains in the spaces between her fingers. She unfolded a length of cloth, one half grey, the other inclined towards a shade between green and violet. “This isn't a mistake. The customer changed her mind,” she said. “When she first asked for a muddy blue, I tested the dye on this piece. Then she said she wanted green for the school curtains. The cost of the new dye, the hours spent washing it, and the labour of the first sample are three separate charges.” After ordering the change of colour, the customer was proposing to pay only half the bill.

The third visitor was Harish the grocer. He carried spices, rough pieces of soap, and two tins of dried ingredients ordered for testing fabrics. He set the tins down on the table and brushed away the dust. “I don't make dyes, wash linen, or sew mattresses,” he said before anyone could ask. “I sell certain materials. My sales register shows which sack left my shop and which came from the wholesale warehouse in the market.” The label on one of the tins was rubbed away. Rather than certify its contents merely on the strength of his own name, he wanted to show the original purchase invoice.

Naira had with her the papers for the two consignments tied with red cord the previous day: the measurements of Yusuf's first length of cloth, the unverified stamp on the second bundle, and the unloading slip for the shared vehicle. Yusuf himself had not come. He needed to finish a small order at his loom and find the money for a payment due to a customer. He had not sent his original pages, only agreed that the copies he had given Naira might be read again. “We'll examine things on this plank, not deliver a verdict,” Naira told them. “Tell us where your own papers came from. Don't drag in the name of anyone who isn't here.”

The driver arrived too. His name was Mahendra. He had been awake late loading bundles of cloth, and his eyes were red. According to his slip, the same vehicle had stopped in four places: first at the cotton-fluffer's yard, then in the dyer's lane, next at the goods entrance behind the hospital, and finally at the cattle shed. But two digits in the times were blurred. “It rained in the night,” Mahendra said. “The paper got wet. Don't make me a thief for that.” Naira wrote down his words. A wet sheet of paper was not, in fact, an answer to every discrepancy; but neither was it right to call the explanation a lie without examining it.

Rahim opened his first receipt. It recorded seven mattresses whose cotton had been fluffed again, cotton weighed for two new mattresses, and three covers taken home by their owners. Beside the thumbprint of an elderly woman, her grandson had written her name. “These were the customer's own covers,” Rahim said. “I wasn't paid for selling cotton; I was paid for fluffing it. If someone says that every bit of filling seen in the vehicle belonged to the hospital, does that make the old woman's mattress stolen too?” Urmila read the date on the receipt. It was two days before the disputed date in the hospital's linen register.

Mahendra said that not seven mattresses but only four sacks had gone into his vehicle. Rahim could not even bring himself to laugh. “The number of jobs done and the number of sacks carried aren't the same,” he said. “Three customers took their things away by hand. Four sacks went by vehicle. If you mean to cut the wages for my seven mattresses, talk about four sacks; but don't say all seven mattresses travelled in that cart.” Naira made two separate columns: the artisan's work and the actual transport. A young man in the gathering who had earlier made an accusation slowly slipped his phone into his pocket.

Sakina spread out her book of dye samples. Beside each colour a fine thread had been tied and kept inside the page so that the sunlight would not alter its shade. Showing the first sample for a length of cloth and the one made after the change, she said, “There are receipts for two colours, but only one length of fabric. The customer's finger mark is on the written instruction changing the order. The cloth hasn't acquired a new owner; it has acquired a new account for dyeing.” Gomti asked, “What if the same length has been counted twice?” Sakina replied, “Then why was I paid less? Two orders were counted; there was only one length of cloth.”

Harish the grocer's little notebook held the names of many things: salt, carom seeds, dried bark, two thin pouches of raw oil for making soap, and blank paper for wrapping. Seeing “white material” written on one page, the young man immediately said, “That must be powder for cleaning the hospital's linen.” Harish stopped him. “'White' describes a colour, not a use. This is a sample of dry lime, which is also white, but you don't put it on a person's body. Before opening a sack, read its name, its source, and the note explaining its purpose.” Harish did not want a mistake made by his shop to be concealed. Nor did he want someone else's imagining entered in its place.

Suddenly there was a commotion outside the room. Two young men came from the direction of the cattle shed, saying that someone had accused Mahendra the previous day of carrying off a child in his vehicle. One had a photograph on his phone: sacks, and between them a small blurred figure. “Look. A child was sitting inside,” he said. Instead of taking the phone in her hands, Naira asked, “Who saw it? At what time? From how far away?” “It came in a social-media message,” he answered. Mahendra's face reddened again. “There was cloth in my vehicle,” he said. “No child.”

Urmila went outside and saw that, at the corner of the photograph, there was an empty sack lying behind the vehicle; next to it stood a boy fastening the strap of his wooden sandal. His face could not be seen. Naira explained to the young man that a photograph did not establish the child's circumstances, relationship to anyone present, the time, or the context. A rumour of child abduction that had spread at the station some days earlier had been disproved on investigation; this new picture could not be treated as proof of that incident. “If a child really is missing,” Naira said, “the family's information must reach the responsible office by a secure route. Circulating an anonymous picture in the market does not find the child."

Meanwhile, a woman was standing outside the room with her son. The boy said he had not climbed into the vehicle; he had been waiting for his mother by the roadside. His mother did not consent to anyone showing her son's picture on the young man's phone. "I'll testify that my boy was with me yesterday," she said, "but his face is not going up on the market noticeboard." Naira said she would record the woman's statement and the time concerned separately and keep them safe. Settling the earlier rumour could not automatically determine the truth of this new photograph; nor was anyone to identify the woman publicly.

After midday the hospital's warehouse clerk arrived. He had a copy of a receipt, not the original register. In a somewhat sharp voice he said, "The same vehicle number appears at the hospital and at the cattle shed. Can there really be so much coincidence?" Closing her book of dyes, Sakina replied, "The vehicle is hired. It isn't a servant of one household. My length of cloth doesn't belong to the hospital. If the customer's name and contact details are needed, obtain her consent." The clerk said that the error involving packing marked with the hospital's name had to be examined impartially. Naira agreed. But what was now to be investigated was not merely the vehicle's presence: it was the acceptance of each delivery and the origin of its packing.

Urmila opened the page for the day the linen had been wet. In the list of seven hospital sheets and five covers, one recorded time of receipt came before the time the washing had finished. She showed the clerk the empty space in the corner of the paper. "I didn't write this. According to my ghat register, the sheets were still being wrung out at that hour," she said. "Perhaps someone entered the time of the order instead of the arrival," the clerk replied. "That may be," Urmila answered. "Then give the order and the actual receipt two separate lines. Don't erase the hours of my work along with the mistake."

Urmila told them something that had happened on the day of her mother's treatment. One night, when a patient needed a sheet, she had taken a clean one from her own home to the hospital. Afterwards the account of the payment due for that sheet had remained unclear in the office papers. "I don't want my mother's illness displayed in the hospital records," she said. "I want the hour when the cloth was delivered and the wages for the work of my hands to be written correctly, without using the patient's name." At that distinction the clerk's voice softened a little. He said that no amendment could be officially stamped without examining the original register.

Naira drew a timeline from the four receipts. Four sacks of cotton Rahim had fluffed were loaded in the morning; one length of Sakina's newly dyed cloth went in before noon; Urmila's clean linen was loaded towards evening; and Harish's two tins were delivered to a different customer. The hospital's copy showed a stop by the vehicle but did not fully record the quantity of goods, the seal, or the recipient. “This line shows that the routes of four separate jobs were involved,” Naira said. “It doesn't show that the hospital's missing goods have been recovered.”

At that moment Gomti asked, “Then what is the position of Yusuf's bundle tied with red cord?” Naira replied, “The source of the label claiming hospital approval must be examined. The registers of these four workers don't identify the person who made that label. No one may open the red cord without Yusuf's written consent and an authorised procedure for the goods.” The warehouse clerk said that if cloth was being stolen and sold in the hospital's name, the consignment held back could be useful to the inquiry. They all agreed that the goods should be kept safe, but unverified accusations must not be spread.

Mahendra's predicament was a separate one. Since the day before, two customers had stopped hiring his vehicle, and he feared his business would collapse even if no wrongdoing was proved. “Give me a copy saying I'm innocent,” he told Naira. “I'm not a judge,” she replied. “But I can give you a verified comparison of the receipts collected here and put in writing which accusations have no supporting evidence. Keep safe your vehicle-maintenance register, the signatures made when goods were loaded, and your accounts of hire.” Mahendra said, “If somebody's letter contains the word 'suspicion,' customers stop reading there.” At those words Rahim fell silent, remembering his own customers.

As he was gathering up his tins, Harish the grocer set aside a small packet. The name printed on its wrapper differed from the name on the paper inside. “I won't charge for this yet,” he said. “First I'll check the wholesaler's original receipt. But don't use one mistake in this packet to condemn all my spices.” Sakina asked, “Did you put this on the vehicle?” “No, I brought it myself today,” Harish answered. “The tins in yesterday's consignment have different numbers.” Naira kept the two entries separate. Harish gave written permission for a photograph of the packet to be used in a private inquiry, provided it contained no customer's name.

When the market committee drafted its notice for the evening meeting, a dispute arose over a single word. The secretary had written: “Suspect goods in a shared vehicle.” “People will read that line and think even the cotton in my mattresses is suspect,” Rahim said. Sakina added, “I changed a customer's dye colour, not the ownership of her goods.” Gomti proposed another wording: “The separate loading slips for a shared vehicle are being reconciled; labels on two consignments and the hospital's receipts are under separate investigation.” The secretary began calculating the cost of printing so long a sentence. “The wrong short sentence will be cheaper,” Urmila said, “but we'll be the ones who pay for it.”

The clerk answered that it was not possible to put every detail of the hospital's internal registers on a public board. Naira agreed. “No patient's name, customer's home address, or child's image should be made public. The board should state only the procedure and where a complaint can be lodged. Give separate written notice to anyone whose property has been held.” In the end a short notice went up: “A vehicle number alone does not establish the source of goods or prove a crime; submit the relevant receipts.” This did not settle the hospital's questions, but it blocked one immediate route by which four workers might have been publicly shamed.

Before returning to the ghat, Urmila telephoned Renu. “Has the grating been removed?” she asked. “Half the way is open,” Renu said, “but the earth by the gate is subsiding. If a vehicle turns there again, the edge may break.” “Then I won't send my handcart loaded with linen through that way,” Urmila said. “And record this as an obstruction on a public route, not as a decision on ownership under the water lease.” Renu explained that the fishery-lease map marked the water area, but did not give a complete measurement of the route workers used to reach the gate.

Hearing this, Naira took out an old copy of the water lease. It contained certain conditions governing the use of the water, but did not show the actual width of the passage along the gate through which linen, baskets of fish, and boatmen's tools had to be carried. The water-lease papers had nothing to do with the child-abduction rumour. Nor could the hospital bills be gathered with it into one great accusation of a single crime. But the narrowing of the public route had made it genuinely difficult to establish when, where, and why the vehicle had stopped. Naira recorded this point as a separate observation.

On their way home, Sakina showed her daughter a dye sample. “It's half green and half purple,” the girl said. “What's its name?” Sakina considered it before replying. “The customer may decide its name, but my hands worked to make that colour.” “If I give it a new name, will it have a new price too?” her daughter asked. Sakina laughed. “Changing the name doesn't add any yarn. But if the customer asks for the colour to be changed again, my labour must be counted again.” She showed her daughter how to wash the dye from her stained fingers with soap, for the beauty of colour was no excuse for neglecting the safety of the hands that made it.

That night Naira wrote four headings on the last page of the meeting register: Original Register of Names; Rumour Concerning a Child; Hospital Inventory Register; and Access under the Water Lease. The register of names still lacked some of the original signatures it required. Public accusations over who had circulated the child's unsafe photograph had been stopped. The hospital had been asked for the original record of actual receipts. An application had been prepared for a measurement of the gate on the water-lease route. These four lines might touch one another; without evidence, they could not be allowed to dissolve into one another.

A request was sent to Hira Sahni and Tara to bring measuring cord, a copy of the old boundary markers, and a record of the times when the route at the ghat became blocked the following morning. Urmila wrote down where her handcart had been unable to turn; Mahendra recorded how long he had been obliged to wait outside the gate; Rahim supplied a small drawing of the place where his sacks had been loaded. No signature made the gate wider by itself. But, for the inquiry, the things each person had actually seen were not forced into a single page of accusation.

In the last watch of the night, a small mattress cover rose and filled out again in Rahim's home. His daughter touched the bundle of cotton with her hand. “So soft!” she cried. Rahim laughed. “It is soft, but touch it when the mattress is finished; for now it will raise dust.” He put aside a clean, thin scrap for her to make a pillow for her doll. The dispute in the market had not gone away. Yet in this house, tonight, cotton had been restored to its true work, and his daughter to her play. Whatever width they measured at the gate tomorrow would have consequences for the passage along which that work had to travel.

Chapter 47 · The Measurement of the Gate

At dawn, beside the gate, Hira Sahni planted an old bamboo pole from his boat and rocked it to and fro. Its tip looked firm above the surface, but the moment it met the mud below, it sank another finger's breadth. He pulled it out, laid it aside, then planted it somewhere else. “Before we begin measuring from the surface of the water,” he said, “we must see whether that surface can be taken as a fixed level at all.” Inside the gate the water was still moving slowly; at the outer corner Urmila's handcart had stood trapped for hours the previous day. Half the grating had been opened, but the wheel marks in the mud were fresh even now.

Tara Binout arrived carrying two pieces of chalk, a measuring cord and a slim notebook. Behind her came Shyam Mallik, a cloth bag slung over his shoulder to protect the folds of the old papers. Aditi, the municipal engineer, appeared with two assistants. The copy in her hand clearly stated the outer width of the gate, but beneath it was a small symbol whose meaning no one could explain. “Is this the distance between the iron pillars,” Tara asked, “or the width of the passage through which a person can actually walk?” Aditi studied the paper for a moment. “The old report does not specify its reference points,” she admitted.

Urmila demonstrated by pushing her cart forward. As the first wheel crossed the gate, the second began slipping down the slope at its edge. She stopped at once. The cart carried no linen, only empty bamboo baskets. “I am not going to practise this with patients' sheets aboard,” she said. Mahendra, the driver, showed them the slip on which he had recorded the hours spent waiting the day before. “My vehicle did not go through here,” he said, “but because the unloading place was so far away, the hire went up.” Hira made one thing clear: whether the same width would suffice for a motor vehicle, a handcart and a boatman's equipment was a question to be tested separately in each case.

The first cord was stretched between the gate's two iron pillars. One of the assistants called out the measurement immediately. Tara stopped him. “The cord is taut, but will a wheel travel over the earth that has slumped at the side? Measuring empty air won't tell us how much passage there is on the ground.” They took a second measurement between the lower projection of the ironwork and firm earth; for a third, they tried to reach the hard layer beneath the mud. The three figures differed. Hira had the location, time and water level entered beside each one in his notebook, because a rise in the water could change how any of those measurements ought to be used.

Meanwhile, the representative of Dhani's irrigation lease pointed out a dry line with the end of his stick. “This used to be called Kankar,” he said. “My master's forefathers took water along this way to their fields. The little stream is dry now, so there should be no question of a public claim over it.” Tara squatted on the spot. Beneath the dry crust lay earth of different colours, and on one side she could make out a thin trace of where water had flowed. “We shall record the name Kankar as testimony,” she said. “But hearing a name does not establish that the land is vacant, and an old account of irrigation does not prove the present boundary either. We need to examine it against the dates of rainfall and use.” Displeasure settled over the representative's face.

“If that line is not vacant, how am I supposed to carry water to the fields?” he demanded. Hira pointed with his pole to a narrow bend below. “What served you for a day as a way to bring in water may have served fishing families all through the rains as a place to come ashore. We shall hear both accounts. But no one may fill in another person's passage to make a canal for himself.” Aditi said it would be wrong to mark out anyone's land immediately beyond the limits shown on the government map. Tara accepted that restraint too. They were there to inspect and measure, not to change possession.

Shyam took an old copy from his bag. In small letters along its edge was the word 'Kareh', beside two crooked marks. Tara lifted the paper and went to a worn old brick near the next corner. Two parallel lines had been scratched upon it. “My grandmother recognised this mark,” she said. “But what she saw has come down to us through my memory. I do not know whether this brick remains in its original place or has been moved.” In her notebook she entered Kareh as 'the local name on an old measurement paper', not as proof of a confluence or of the river's true course.

“If the marks cannot be trusted, why should anyone be paid for finding them?” Aditi asked. Tara pointed beneath the grass. Two women had spent until midnight searching for the old path, and no one had even wanted to ask how much time it took them. “Wages for locating a mark and the authority to treat that mark as conclusive are two different matters,” Tara said. “Pay the people who found the traces of the old course. What they have shown us may prove wrong under an engineering examination. That does not make their labour free.” Aditi told an assistant to open a time register for the local helpers.

By then Madhav Rauniyar had arrived with a small handcart. It held red chalk, waterproof sleeves for papers, a cord measured out in cotton thread, and two thin sacks of lime. “The municipal team asked for three things and the market people for five,” he said with a laugh. Taking the chalk from a glass bottle himself, he showed them a sample. “This is for marking paper, not for dissolving in the water. The lime is separate. I won't scatter that on anyone's ghat either without a proper description of the work.” His account book had three distinct columns: the price of each article, whether anyone had taken it, and who still owed money.

Lifting one of the sacks, an assistant said, “This is government work. Let us use it first; the receipt can be made afterwards.” Madhav caught hold of the sack. “Writing 'government' on a paper won't pay what my shop owes. Take only what has been authorised; I'll carry the rest back.” His son stood holding the cartwheel. “Father,” the boy asked, “if we sell it all, won't today's earnings be good?” Madhav replied, “If we waste lime on work nobody needs, who will pay the price the river bears tomorrow?” He issued a receipt for the chalk and the sleeves, and left the sacks of lime sealed on the cart.

When everyone climbed the embankment behind the gate, the view changed. On one side the raised earthen chharki seemed to promise the settlement protection from high water; on the other, the same filling had lifted the drainage outlet above the level of a small field. An elderly woman farmer approached carrying a hand hoe. “Behind this embankment my crop was saved from the rain,” she said, “but the water trapped here stood in the houses behind us for two days.” Hira studied the slope by the shadow of his pole on the ground, but said that a shadow did not measure the movement of water. No one should even consider cutting through the embankment without measuring the water height, the depth of the fill and the actual drainage capacity.

Aditi showed them a line in an old engineering report. Beside the chharki it drew one straight edge, as though no human foot had ever been set there. Beneath that line Tara drew three bends she had marked in her notebook: one for the route along which linen was carried, another for the footpath down to deeper water where boats landed, and a third for the narrow place people climbed during floods. Shyam's old record of bamboo work showed a bend too, though it gave no measured distance. This did not mean the report was false; it meant that the questions it had set out to answer were narrower. Tara circled the difference in red chalk.

“If we put every footpath on the map,” an assistant asked, “where will there be room left on the paper?” “In the water,” Hira replied, “people don't need space on paper. They need somewhere to climb out.” “Without the paper,” Aditi said, “we cannot obtain permission to make the route safe.” Tara answered, “Then correct the paper. Don't erase people's paths for the convenience of a straight line.” Someone in the crowd applauded. Hira stopped him. “If the figures are wrong, everyone will suffer.”

A member of the municipal committee produced a capacity certificate that had already been prepared. Once it was signed, temporary consignments and boating equipment could be taken through the gate. “Today's measurements are sufficient,” the member said. “If we hold up the paper, the fish market, the hospital linen—everything—will come to a standstill.” Hira read the sheet. One line declared 'safe passage for vehicles and boating equipment in all seasons'. He put the pen down. “Today an empty cart managed only half the passage. We have not measured the highest water here during the rains. Why should my name bear the weight of 'all seasons'?" The danger of increased hire charges and losses on consignments if he refused was real. But a false certificate might exact its price in someone else's injury.

"My linen arrived late yesterday," Urmila said. "If it is held up again today, patients' bedding cannot be changed on time." Hira looked at her. "I am not saying this to stop your work. I am saying it so the person sent along that route can keep both hands safe." "Then put an alternative route in writing," Urmila replied. "Don't simply say no." Everyone fell silent at that demand. Naira, who had so far been comparing copies of the papers, stepped forward a little and proposed that possible temporary access arrangements be examined on a form separate from the capacity certificate.

Hira pointed out the old place where people boarded the boats. Only pedestrians could pass there, one at a time; a heavy cart could not. On the far side, Gomti Beldar's team might be able to lay a small level platform the next day, but it would be wrong to open it before testing the stability of the earth and the river level. Aditi assigned another team to inspect an alternative temporary route. The essential linen Urmila needed that day was divided into two loads; a small vehicle would take them as far as the safe outer bend. The distance for which the loads then had to be carried by hand, and the wages due for that work, were recorded separately. "Changing the route doesn't wipe out the hours I work," Urmila said.

Near the embankment two workers were cutting grass in preparation for the old annual communal day on which the gate and water channel were cleared. On the day for opening the mouth of the channel, people usually identified the silt accumulated at the outlet, divided the labour among themselves and cleaned the sections that were safe to touch. Today no one had ordered the entire blocked mouth to be opened. At Tara's request, the workers cleared only the grass on the outside, so that the old watermarks could be seen. Beneath it another stone appeared. They measured its distance from the lines on the first stone, but did not treat it as an official boundary marker.

Hira brought out an old meeting notebook from the annual boat-and-equipment testing festival. It contained separate entries for the length of the bamboo pole, the estimated load on a boat and the marks on the bamboo used to test depth. "An old bamboo pole may go down into today's water," Hira said, "but yesterday's depth is not today's figure." He pointed to a worn strip along the bottom of a boat. One of the municipal assistants wanted to paint a handsome new mark upon it. Hira stopped him. "First test an empty boat and a loaded boat separately. A painted mark is no substitute for a sound point of reference." The knowledge of boatmen was being made part of the work, not put on display as a marvel.

Madhav returned with the account for the chalk. A committee member said that the purchase register listed five protective sleeves, although only three had been used. Madhav showed him the two unopened packets. “These will go back, and the bill will be reduced accordingly.” The member asked when goods bearing the hospital's name had come through Madhav's shop. “Hospital orders are separate,” Madhav said. “This receipt for sleeves belongs to the gate inspection. The quality of other goods has to be decided by testing those goods themselves.” Naira entered the two purchases separately.

After midday a boy began drawing a river on the earth with red chalk. His grandmother, who lived beside the chharki, asked, “There is no water here. Why draw a river?” The boy laughed. “In my notebook the river will pass this way.” With her hoe, the grandmother turned one bend in his line. “And when the water rises in the rains, where will my house be?” The boy drew another line. Tara watched. On paper, making a new line was a game of learning; on the ground, it raised the question of someone's home.

The sheet bearing the signature of the engineer who wrote the old report was in the office, but the copy available in the field did not state the seasonal conditions on the day of inspection. Aditi made it clear that no conclusion could be drawn about the report as a whole before the remaining pages were obtained. Tara agreed. Yet today's inspection had shown that the local enclosure, the footpaths and the drainage behind the chharki were missing from the available account. She had this recorded: 'Request the complete original document. The available copy does not adequately show the routes used for local access.' Instead of an accusation, the sentence preserved the proper place for further investigation.

Naira and Mahendra returned to the narrow bend and checked again the time at which the vehicle had stopped the previous day. Mahendra said his loading slip named the 'eastern gate', but the goods had actually been unloaded two hundred paces before it. “Did someone arrange that difference deliberately?” Naira asked. Mahendra shrugged. “I did what I was told. Someone may have changed the words on the paper, or I may have had to change the turning.” Looking at the creases in the old credit notes on his vehicle, he said, “That one little bend has cost me two customers.” Naira marked the actual unloading place; she did not write down a criminal motive.

An old wage list reached Shyam. Instead of people's names, some entries gave the names by which they were called at work: one person was 'Red Cap', another 'Little Boat'. “These are false names,” an assistant said. “Every receipt here is therefore suspicious.” Tara objected at once. “A name used at work, a name used at home and a name invented to commit fraud are not the same thing. Ask for the original payment register first.” Shyam did not keep the list as his own. He recorded the name of the person from whom it had come and the permission given for handing it over. Naira quietly set the matter apart. A mistaken identification on this sheet could multiply a thousand questions.

As the afternoon waned, the committee held an open meeting. Aditi had an assistant read out three findings: the width currently available at the gate did not provide sufficient evidence for a certificate of safe passage in all seasons; the available copy of the old report did not fully map local access; and the protective effect of the embankment on one side, together with its effect on drainage on the other, would have to be measured again. Hira signed only the line witnessing the measurements actually taken that day. Beside his signature the words 'NOT A CAPACITY CERTIFICATION' were written clearly. Tara added a separate application for payment of the time spent by workers who had located the old marks.

“What has all this achieved?” the committee member asked. “Tomorrow the gate will still be narrow.” “Tomorrow I won't push my cart through with my eyes shut,” Urmila replied. “The other route and the wages for carrying things along it are on record.” Madhav showed the revised bill; Mahendra supplied the actual place where the goods had been unloaded. The gate had not been opened, but it was now clear whose earnings were held up by whose waiting. Aditi recorded the request for the original report. No one would cut through the chharki without an examination.

That evening, while turning his boat pole in his hands, Hira dropped a dry leaf into the water. It spun slowly in the eddy inside the gate and caught against the side. A boy standing nearby asked, “Will a boat get stuck there?” “A boat isn't a leaf,” Hira replied. “Its weight, its draught and the wind are different. But that leaf has given me a question to look into.” He asked the boy to count the marks on the pole. The child counted to three, forgot the fourth, and they both burst out laughing. There had been less fresh money from fish in Hira's house that day, for he had given half his day to the measurements. Payment for his own labour was essential too.

Back home, Tara carefully dried the copy of the old Kareh marks. On the reverse of the paper she wrote not her grandmother's trembling letters, but only the measurements she herself had taken that day. She knew that some papers relating to her family's old bamboo work had not yet been brought out. Concealing them would not make the present map more trustworthy. A stone had been found today; a worker had recognised its mark; she had demanded payment for that work. But who could be called the owner of the earth was a question her pen had not yet approached.

At night Naira laid a new sheet beside four older, separate lines of evidence and headed it 'Evidence for Access and Measurements at the Gate'. One entry read: 'Reconciliation of work names, personal identities and payments in the original wage list remains outstanding.' On the strength of that list it would be wrong to label anyone a criminal or a secret accomplice. She kept a copy of the letter requesting the original report from Aditi's office and sent word to Shyam that workers' private identities must not be displayed on the public board. There would be another inspection at the gate the following morning.

Before then, they would have to distinguish three possibilities: whether the names concealed there were hidden to protect someone's safety, someone's livelihood, or someone's deception.

Chapter 48 · Three Reasons for Disguise

At dawn, Shyam Mallik kept his palm pressed against the folded corner of an old wage list, trying to smooth it flat. Yesterday's chalk dust had settled along the right-hand edge. The first line recorded the date of the work; the second, the hours spent clearing earth beside the gate; and on the third, in the space for a name, stood the words 'Red Cap'. Two days' wages were still due against that name, but there was no signature acknowledging payment. When Shyam lifted the sheet, a particle fell from the crumbling paper. “This dust won't tell us who anyone was,” he said to himself. “But we can still see whose wages remain unpaid.”

Tara had come from the edge of the Binout embankment and now stood before him. She had spent the night drying a copy of the measurements of the old markings. “Did you find the original list?” she asked. Shyam shook his head. He had obtained this copy from a trunk in an old contractor's house; the original register of names was said possibly to be in the municipal storeroom. The contractor's son was preparing to sell the house and did not want to hear accusations against his father. “We'll ask for the original,” Tara said, “but first we'll establish what work this list concerns. The women who marked the stones at the gate yesterday aren't named here.”

Naira arrived on time, carrying two empty envelopes and an old cloth bag. Shyam laughed. “Why all this covering up, when we're trying to see the names?” “Whether a name needs to be seen,” Naira answered, “and whether everyone needs to be shown that name are two different questions.” She laid a strip of paper across the list and read the serial number of each entry. Some lines bore names used in calling people at work; some gave full names; and in one place a name had been inserted in different ink over a blank space. “Someone may have changed this name,” she said, “but we don't yet know a single reason why it was changed.”

A municipal assistant had been having a noticeboard erected in the square since early morning. His idea was to put up a photograph of the list: anyone whose name appeared could come and identify themselves. “That would be an open inquiry,” he said in his defence. Tara's voice hardened. “Will displaying someone's name on a board make them safe if they haven't been able to come and demand their wages?” The assistant replied that they also had to identify fictitious workers. Naira looked at the white surface of the board. “An open inquiry does not mean open access to people's private details. Put up the dates, the kind of work and the unpaid amounts first. Where it becomes necessary to see a particular person's name, it can be examined in a separate hearing.”

At that moment, from the road outside the gate came the rasp of a metal file. A thin man set down a small wooden chest and took out three objects: a clasp for tightening a boat's rope, the worn tip of an old chisel, and the crooked iron tooth of a bhowra. His name was Nazir Sikligar. He meant to repair these three things that morning and return them to the river landing. Pasted inside the lid of the chest was a page from his handwritten receipt book. Beside each object he had noted its former condition, the time spent filing it, the owner's consent and the amount due. Nowhere was there a price for selling the object.

The municipal assistant had scarcely caught sight of the tools in the chest when he said, “Yesterday there was suspicion about the blacksmith; today, sharp objects again! Your list doesn't even give the customer's full name. It just says 'boatman'.” Nazir stopped filing and stood upright. “Before touching that clasp, I asked its owner whether he needed it for tightening the knot ahead. If you want, he'll tell you so himself. But his home address isn't a public part of my receipt.” The accusation that had earlier spread about Harinarayan's workshop had already frightened some of Nazir's customers. Nazir had no wish to close his chest: every interruption to his work reduced what he could earn that day.

Hira Sahni came up with a boat pole on his shoulder. He fitted the clasp into a coil of rope, then showed them the old, loose one. “Look at the difference,” he said. “With the first, the rope slips back; with the second, it doesn't. That's why it needs filing. You can't decide what a tool is for merely by looking at its edge.” Before touching the page of Nazir's receipts, Naira asked his permission. The date and duration of the work were clearly entered beside 'boatman'. “Who gave you that name?” she asked. Nazir smiled. “At the landing, five people know each other's boats by name better than they know each other's real names.”

Urmila was just then arriving at the bend in the road with the hospital linen. The narrow gate had not yet passed its safety inspection, so once again she would have to carry her bundle on foot along the smaller path. “Leave aside the question of the owner's home,” she said. “Sometimes I'm called the washerwoman, sometimes Urmila Rajak. On the day my name doesn't bring me my wages, whom am I supposed to say I am?” Naira made two separate columns on her list: 'Name used at work' and 'Person verified as entitled to payment'. She wrote down that the two should not be kept together in the same public register. Urmila picked up her bundle of cloth. The extra time she spent carrying it on foot had still not been entered in the wage register.

A little farther away, Sumitra Kami arrived with a small square wooden box. From it she showed them two right-angled fittings made of thin strips of metal, with a double groove on one side and a slight bend on the other to hold a rope. She had been asked for measurements to join the wooden edges of a temporary panel at the gate, but she did not describe the fittings as a certificate of load-bearing safety. “This is a sample. It can be used only after testing,” she explained. Her receipt listed the metal, the heating, the time spent shaping it and the measuring as separate items. Into the sample she had struck a little triangular mark of her own making.

“But you're a Kami. Why use this mark instead of your name?” the assistant asked. “The mark identifies my work; it isn't meant to conceal my name,” Sumitra replied. “Another craftsperson's name went onto a panel I made earlier. This time my full name will appear in the papers. But no photograph of this sample is to go to market without my permission.” Her father had known the older craft of repairing tools, but she had altered the measurements of the grooves herself. She also told them about an advance offered by a large customer, who wanted all rights to the design while paying only for a single sample. Sumitra had not accepted his proposal.

It was midday before the door of the municipal records storeroom could be opened. Inside stood three boxes: the first labelled 'Old Drainage', the second 'Contracts', and the third 'Wages'. The keeper of the storeroom said the original list ought to be in the third box, but the papers behind its glass panel had become wet. Naira stopped him from pulling the box out. “If the pages are damp, record their condition first and call the person responsible for them. I have permission to examine a copy, not to damage the object itself.” Shyam's heart began to pound. Where he had come in search of an account of wages set down in writing, the very body of the paper was in danger.

They found another copy of the list lying outside the box. Beside 'Red Cap', someone had written 'Moti' in pencil, but there was neither a full name nor a signature. “See?” the assistant cried triumphantly. “A false name has been turned into a real one!” Tara asked, “Is Moti a person, or a boat? When was that pencil mark made? Whose handwriting is it?” The questions subdued him. Naira took copies of both sides of the page, noting the corners, the colour and the differences in the writing. Until the original had been examined, the pencilled 'Moti' was not accepted as proof of anyone's identity.

From beside another old file, the storeroom keeper brought out a letter. A woman had written in it to claim her wages and had asked that she not be called by the name she used at home while at work. At one time, people looking for her had caused an uproar at the landing; she had been trying to live somewhere safe with her child. The letter also gave her actual address. As soon as Naira had read it, she folded it back and returned it to its envelope. She did not read out the name or copy the address. “The existence of this letter proves no fraud,” she said. “It shows that public identification put this woman at risk. Her claim to wages can be examined without destroying her safety.”

The assistant argued that keeping such letters hidden might help someone making a fraudulent claim. Naira agreed that fraud was possible, but the possibility was no reason to expose the woman who had written the letter to danger. “The date of payment, the place of work, the supervisor's testimony and a safe means of contact: those four things can be checked. There is no need to put a home address on a public board." Tara asked for a deadline by which the woman's wages would be determined. The keeper agreed to arrange a confidential meeting, but the demand that a copy of the original letter be made public that day was refused.

Long ago, in the royal palace of Viratanagara, Sairandhri was leaving the queen's chamber carrying a basket of fragrant flowers. At court she was known by a name of service, but she was Draupadi; to disclose her identity before the period of concealment ended might endanger her family. One of the attendants, who worked alongside her day and night, asked whether it did not weary her to be called by a name that was not her own. Picking a thorn from a flower stalk, Sairandhri answered, "The heart remains behind the name. But I shall survive only if I can choose, for now, whom to tell and how much." The attendant did not stare at her. She simply held out a hand and took some of the basket's weight.

That afternoon in Videhapur, when Naira came out of the storeroom again, Vinod Kevart was standing there with a net folded like bedding on his handcart. He asked whether they had an old copy of the records of the fishing enclosures. Shyam had a sheet bearing the name 'Chilon', followed by an account of the bamboo panels of a small fish enclosure and the net that checked the flow of water. In another old ledger the word was 'Chilaun'; nothing in that ledger established that the two referred to the same thing. "Changing one letter doesn't make the river, the object and the money due into one and the same," Vinod said. "The elders in our family used these two words in different circumstances, but we'll need the papers to establish the place."

A rumour was already moving through the market that the wage list contained the words 'Little Boat', and that someone must therefore have hidden a child in a boat and carried the child away. Hearing it, Urmila dropped her bundle of linen to the ground. "We haven't even established whether 'Little Boat' is the name people use for a cargo dinghy," she said, "so where has this child abduction come from?" A young man wanted to show a blurred photograph from the previous day on his phone. Naira stopped him. An earlier rumour concerning a child had been investigated separately; a word in this old wage list proved no connection with that photograph or with any actual disappearance.

A man in the crowd said firmly, "If you keep everything confidential, when will the guilty ever be caught?" For the first time, Shyam interrupted him. "I'm not in favour of shielding anyone who's actually guilty," he said. "But if you turn a person owed two days' wages into a criminal, no one will ever have to account for those wages." Naira asked what evidence would be required if someone had in fact taken two payments for the same work under two names for personal gain. They would need to verify the signature on the paper, the banking or cash-payment record, the dates of the work and independent testimony of attendance. Two similar names by which people were called were not, by themselves, evidence of deception.

After midday, they found a small cash receipt showing different amounts beside 'Red Cap' and 'Moti' on the same date. The assistant grew excited again. Naira examined the stamp beside the first amount: 'Payment Outstanding'. Beside the second stood 'Advance Issued'. They were not even the same kind of payment. “We cannot add together different sums for different purposes and call them duplicate payment,” she said. “Ask for the original stamp register and proof of who received the money.” At first the keeper evaded the question; at last he supplied a date on which a written application would be acknowledged. The possibility of fraud had not been ruled out, but no one had been declared guilty.

When a municipal committee member arrived, he raised the cost of the public hearing. “If you check so many names one by one, who's to pay for the work? The inspection allocation was approved for measuring the gate.” Tara opened her ledger. “Half the pay is still withheld from some of the people you first called in to take measurements. Now you want free labour for every new inquiry. It's right not to issue a false certificate; but finding the truth must not come at the expense of someone's food.” The member replied that he had no authority to release an advance. “Then don't summon another team in the name of an inquiry,” Tara said. “Put the terms of payment in writing first.”

Nazir opened the lid of his chest again. He still had to return the third object of the day, but the officials' questions since morning had left the work unfinished. “If I spend my time getting every remark that people make written down, when am I to pick up my hammer?” he asked. The assistant tried to reassure him that it would count as official work. “A classification won't put rice in my house,” Nazir said. Tara asked Nazir and Sumitra to record separately, on a sheet set beside them, the time spent in inspection, the time spent showing samples and the value of their materials. A line was added forbidding any photograph or sample from being shared without the consent of both makers.

Sumitra turned the sample with her triangular mark round in her hands and showed it to them. “I'll allow this fitting to be tested for this work,” she said, “but that doesn't mean a different contractor may take the sample and remove my name from it.” The municipal engineering assistant said that the office had a separate procedure for designs. “Then write down that procedure,” Sumitra answered. “Don't give me mere assurances.” She decided to deposit the metal fitting for inspection but to keep the original drawing herself. The office recorded the date of receipt of the sample and the terms of its return. The question of ownership in the forthcoming contract remained open.

Later, Naira and Shyam wrote five short provisions together. First: when a name has been changed for safety, the person's original identity is to be checked only through an authorised, secure process, never in a public list. Second: a name used to earn a living is to be matched with the work, the date and the wages due, without unnecessarily recording a home address. Third: a person's chosen public or professional name is to be respected, while any private reconciliation of payment records needed to prevent duplicate payment must be undertaken with consent. Fourth: differences of name arising from errors of language, script or hearing are to be checked against the original entry, without accusation. Fifth: where fraud is suspected, the underlying evidence of separate payments must be examined at a separate hearing; the allegation is not to be advertised publicly before the inquiry.

Reading the fifth provision, Shyam said, “You've made five kinds of rules, but we spoke of only three reasons: safety, livelihood and crime.” Naira smiled. “The three reasons are questions for judgment. The five rules are ways of keeping records. A fifth rule for checking evidence of fraud doesn't become a fifth reason. Nor is choosing one's name a crime; neither is a clerk's mistake.” Shyam remembered an old saying of his grandmother's: changing a boat's name does not change its bottom. But he did not think it necessary to write down the comparison. The real page lay before them, and it still needed evidence.

Naira prepared a separate application seeking secure access to the gate's original wage register, the stamped payment register, the inspection appointment letters and the list of those who had taken measurements. The application made no mention of the original page concerning Sarita's twenty-seven names. That page was in Sarita's own keeping, and no link between it and the gate's wage list had been established. Shyam said that if anyone began to combine the two lists, needless suspicion would grow. Naira agreed. “The same word, 'name', in two different sets of papers doesn't make them one document.” She kept the file on the child-abduction rumour in a separate sealed envelope too.

In the slanting light of evening, the committee member returned. He wanted to announce that all work at the gate would cease until the original register was found. Hira Sahni said, “Stopping the safety inspection is understandable. But leaving a rope loose, rubbing out the markings and holding back the workers' pay isn't safety.” Tara added that an immediate protective barrier and the accounting for inspections already completed ought to continue. The committee member accepted two kinds of work in writing: no unsafe load-bearing use, and essential maintenance within a safe boundary. Terms of payment would be settled before a new team was summoned.

When Shyam reached home, he found his young son drawing a boat on a blank page of an old exercise book. Above it the boy had written 'Little Boat'. Shyam did not scold him. “Whose boat is this?” he asked. “I drew it,” his son replied, “but when it goes into the water, even the fish will see it.” Shyam laughed, then looked at the corner of the page. The boy's name was written at the top, the boat's below. “Keep the two names separate,” he said. “If the boat is lost, your name won't be lost with it.” The boy closed his box of colours and began to draw water on the next page.

For the third time that week, Naira wrote 'Request to Examine the Original' in her notebook that night, but this time she added a date: the municipal office had agreed to issue an acknowledgement of receipt. Correcting the faulty measurements at the gate, investigating the discrepancies in the hospital linen supplies, stopping the abduction rumour and keeping workers' names safe each required a different method. A short message from Tara read: 'Not everyone will come for the next measuring team without an advance on wages.' Naira saved it. There might be three reasons for disguise, but the consequence of withholding pay was altogether tangible. They had to decide whose expense tomorrow's work would be carried out at.

Chapter 49 · The Price of Cooperation

The first sound of morning beside the gate was not the striking of a hammer but the peeling of a slender skin from a length of bamboo. Shyam Mallik held the cane against his knee and worked its end smooth with a small, sharp tool. Beside him, Tara Binout was rolling up her measuring cord and checking the lines she had drawn through the night against a sheet of paper. A message had come from the municipal office the day before: regular measurements were to cease until the original wage register could be found, but local people were to report at once to mark the unsafe ground beside the gate. The message stated the hour at which they were to appear. It contained not one word about payment.

Tara laid the notice on top of her ledger. “Are you shaving that bamboo for your own work, or making yet another free sample for the municipality?” Shyam tried to smile. “There's no distinction between the two in that notice.” The previous night, his household had had to buy milk on credit. The bamboo he was cutting was meant to become an oar for a customer; giving half the day to the gate would put that customer's order back another day. Tara lifted the bamboo and set it aside. “First we must settle who has been summoned for an inspection, for how many hours, and by whose authority.”

When the municipal engineer, Aditi, arrived, she was accompanied by two assistants and a representative of the irrigation embankment committee. One assistant carried a white sheet headed 'Voluntary Local Cooperation', with spaces below for names and signatures. As she read, Tara stopped at a clause: 'Samples and information submitted shall be available for public use by the municipality.' “So by signing one sentence, do I hand over my Binout drawings, the route of the old outflow and all of Shyam's markings to you?” she asked. Aditi took the sheet from her assistant. “It's an old office form,” she said. “I asked them to bring it for a safety inspection, not to transfer ownership of anyone's plans.”

“Whatever your intention, this is the line we're being asked to sign,” Tara replied. Shyam set his small bamboo model on the ground. Along one side were three differently tied joints, made to show which way a wheel might slip on the narrow approach; it was not a bridge capable of bearing a load. When the assistant reached to pick it up, Shyam raised his hand. “Look at it, handle it, take measurements. But don't carry it away to a workshop without my permission. If someone treats these joints as a finished structure and includes them in a contract, we'll be back where we started, with another false certificate.”

Hira Sahni came up from the boats and said that half the passage recorded in yesterday's measurements would become impassable as soon as the water rose. “There must be warnings wherever it's dangerous to put a foot,” he said. “There will be warnings today,” Tara answered, “provided we agree first on a fixed day's wages and the price of the materials. I'm not refusing to leave people in danger. I'm refusing the practice of pointing to danger as a reason to summon workers without pay.” Hira lowered his boat pole. He, too, was still owed money for an earlier inspection. He went and stood beside Tara.

Meanwhile, Parvati Tanti and Pavitra Patwa reached the gate carrying two separate bundles. Parvati's held three lengths of thin woven cloth with yellow and red borders; Pavitra's little box contained knots of coloured thread and braided strips to be tied to bamboo. The municipal assistant had given them a small order the previous day to make warning markers out of thread left over from the school performance. On the order form the materials were described simply as 'cloth ribbon'. Parvati spoke at once. “Weaving is one kind of work; braiding the borders is another. Call both of them one ribbon, and the wages of two households disappear into a single line.”

Pavitra took a red knot from her box and held it up. “This thick knot is for recognising the warning at night. This finer one is only for marking a measurement. The difference comes from what I've learned in the delicate work of knotting ornaments. But that doesn't mean Parvati's work at the loom has somehow become mine.” Parvati smiled as she listened. Part of the payment for the earlier school order had still not arrived, and she had fastened that notice to their two separate receipts. The municipal assistant asked, “Won't it be difficult to make two payments against a single order?” Pavitra answered, “At one gate you can pay separately for iron and wood. Why can't you pay separately for the labour of two households?”

There on the earth Shyam showed them the old line of the drainage channel. In his father's day there had been a small experiment in using woven bamboo to turn the flow of water; later, new fencing had diverted its course. His recollection was not proof of what the map showed, but it suggested where a fresh survey ought to look. “The office will need a copy of this line,” the assistant said. “Look at the copy, check it, record the disagreements,” Shyam replied. “But you have no permission to erase my grandfather's marking and call it a municipal invention.” Tara added, “And the hours spent showing you the marking will be counted as work.”

Aditi turned the paper over. “There is a small emergency allocation already approved for a protective cordon,” she said, “but I cannot authorise a contract for the entire drainage inspection here. If we draw up a list limited to the work immediately needed, it may be possible to pay an advance. The remaining inspection will require separate approval.” The embankment representative objected. “Keep the job small. Why so many names? Put ten people on the list and it'll take a week to open the gate.” Tara asked, “Whose name would you strike out? The person who wove the thread, the one who tied the knot, or the one who marked the earth?”

In her ledger Tara drew four columns: the item of work, the maker's name, the price by hour or piece, and the limits of its permitted use. Shyam entered his bamboo model and measurement markers; Parvati, the weaving of three lengths of cloth; Pavitra, eight braided strips; Hira, the time spent marking a safe passage. Tara put the original drawing back in her bag. “We'll show the paper for public inspection,” she said, “but the copy will carry the words 'Inspection copy; not permission to construct'.” Aditi accepted the condition as reasonable, although she asked for time to arrange formal acknowledgment of their contribution in the municipality's permanent map register.

Two children out playing in the morning saw the yellow strips and came closer. “That's the colour we had on our dancing clothes!” one of them said. Parvati folded the cloth. “The colour may be the same, but the work is different. This isn't permission to dance here. It's a warning not to go any farther.” The child asked whether they could attend the dance class. “Ask Ruhani about the class,” Pavitra said. “Don't go on to this loose stretch of ground.” Laughing, the children headed towards the safe bend in the path. Tara watched them go. Making safety markers, she realised, involved more than drawing a plan; people had to understand what the marks meant.

Long ago, in the forests of Kishkindha, while Rama and Lakshmana wandered in search of Sita, Sugriva saw two bowmen in the distance from the high rocks of Rishyamuka. His first feeling was not welcome but fear. His dread of Vali followed him in every unfamiliar footstep. Hanuman asked how the door to a possible friend could ever be opened if every stranger was pronounced an enemy before he had introduced himself. Sugriva replied, “I need a friend. But when someone comes bearing his strength, I must also ask where the limits of his intentions lie.”

Hanuman approached Rama in disguise and listened before anything else. Rama told him of his search; Hanuman spoke of the suffering of Sugriva's exile. The two sides did not face the same distress: on one, the search for Sita; on the other, fear of Vali and the question of kingship. A meeting became possible, but before friendship could be witnessed by fire, Hanuman had to understand what a promise would mean to each of them. Sugriva's fear was not mere cowardice. It held the pain of old injuries, political inequality and an uncertain future. He wanted an ally, but he also wanted the right to be heard.

By noon in Videhapur the sunlight had grown fierce, and the wet earth beside the gate was beginning to harden into a crust. The municipal assistant returned with another paper, headed 'Temporary Order for Safety Markers'. Against the advance payment were the words 'subject to approval'. Tara placed her finger on the line. “That's not an advance. That's a possible future. How is Parvati to buy thread in the meantime?” Standing beside her, Pavitra said, “The school still hasn't settled what it owes us. How long are we meant to run our households by doing one job after another on credit?" "If safety work is held up," the assistant said, "someone will have to answer for it." "And if hungry labourers do the work," Tara answered quietly, "does no one have to answer for that?"

A message came to Shyam's phone from home. The customer waiting for the boat oar had returned and said he would take his order to another workshop. When Shyam ended the call, he looked at Tara. "I made him wait yesterday. Now another half-day's gone. Shall I put the money I've lost into my own ledger?" "Certainly," Tara said. "But we mustn't force it into the municipal account if it's not a payment due for work done for them. Record the loss caused by this decision separately. Then we'll understand whose household bears the burden of a public inspection." For the first time, anger edged Shyam's voice. "So it's our lives that are being eaten away while they take their time deciding."

Naira arrived with the acknowledgment for the original register from the municipal storeroom. She heard that someone was proposing to attach Shyam's drainage line and the old wage list to the same map. "The stamped payment register for the entries marked 'Red Cap' and 'Moti' has still not been found," she made clear. "There's no need to publish those old names in order to inspect the map. If the local woven-bamboo design is useful, give Shyam and Tara credit for their work. The dispute over the earlier workers' private names must remain a separate, protected inquiry."

"There was a 'Little Boat' among those old names," the embankment representative said. "People say a child was hidden in some boat." Naira interrupted him. "People say—who says? On what date was anything directly witnessed? Which child? A wage list for work at this gate and a rumour of child abduction are two different questions. We cannot see one word and pronounce a verdict on another crime." The representative tried to show them an old blurred photograph. Naira would not let him turn his phone towards her. "There is a separate, safe process for investigating a child's disappearance. Spreading the child's picture here will not turn a rumour into proof."

For a few moments Aditi was silent. Then she opened the local expenditure register. There was enough money left under the previously approved safety-cordon allocation to make an advance payment for four limited items of work, though not for the whole inspection. She proposed that the day's strips, bamboo markers and marking of safe distances should be paid at half the agreed rate in advance; the balance would fall due on a fixed date after the measurements were verified. Separate acknowledgments would be issued in each person's name rather than a single receipt for the whole amount. "This decision falls within my authority," she said. "I won't pretend to approve the additional measuring work for which people were summoned."

"And the credit?" Tara asked. Aditi added another line: 'Local bamboo weaving and safety-marker samples: Shyam Mallik, Tara Binout; weaving: Parvati Tanti; braiding: Pavitra Patwa; waterway inspection: Hira Sahni.' Tara saw at once that the limits on using the design were still missing. Aditi amended the line again: photographs, copies or use in construction would require separate prior consent, while displaying the visible warning markers for public safety was authorised. Shyam regarded his model. “This is where my trust begins,” he said. “It doesn't end here.”

The employee preparing the accounts wanted to put Parvati's and Pavitra's names on one receipt. Pavitra took out her own copy. “What's owed to my household won't go into Parvati's, and what's owed to hers won't be entered under my name,” she said. “But without seeing and understanding each other's work, these warning strips could never have been made,” Parvati added. “Separate payment doesn't mean working apart.” The employee prepared two slips. Pavitra counted the knots she had braided, and Parvati measured the length of each piece of cloth. The small act of reckoning resembled a public assembly: nobody was making a grand speech, but each person wished to have a voice.

When the advance receipts were ready, the method of payment beside Shyam's name was entered as 'bank transfer'. He supplied his account details. Pavitra said that her own account was active, but she would not consider payment received without confirmation that the money had been deposited. The municipal treasurer was called. After the funds available and the grounds for receipt had been checked, instructions were issued for the four craftspeople's advances to be credited that day. “We'll verify both the bank orders and the marks beside the water,” Tara said. “A signature alone won't make us believe the money has arrived.”

Before evening, the first message confirming a small payment appeared on Parvati's phone. She looked towards Pavitra, whose phone was still silent. A little later the money appeared in Pavitra's account too. The municipal treasurer showed Shyam the paperwork confirming his payment, but no notification had reached his phone; in his ledger he wrote, 'Sent; receipt still to be checked'. Tara checked the advance in her own account, then placed her finger on the line recording the old arrears. “Half the payment for this new job has come,” she said. “Yesterday's work is still unpaid.” Aditi gave her a written date for a hearing on that claim, not a promise of payment.

When it was time to put up the warning markers, Tara first stood on the sloping ground to see how it lay. Rather than calling a small child over to test it, she asked an adult assistant to walk along the safe edge. Parvati's yellow strip was visible wherever a wheel might slip; red knots marked the narrow turn. Hira sounded the water again with his pole. Shyam attached the bamboo uprights only to markers driven into the earth, not to a platform that could support a weight. No one could climb on them. The arrangement was a temporary warning, not a repair of the gate.

While they worked, Tara saw the embankment representative trying to move one of the yellow strips towards the side leading to his field. She stopped him abruptly. “The measuring point was fixed here. Move it and the mark on the paper won't match the mark on the ground." He protested that the path to his field was being blocked for no good reason. "We'll record your claim," Tara replied. "But you can't shift a safety marker as you please. Neither ownership of the public outflow nor your right of access to the field has yet been decided." Aditi entered his objection with its date. The disagreement between the two sides remained on record, but the warning strip went back to the place that had actually been inspected.

Thin clouds were beginning to gather overhead. Shyam's son came to see his father from a distance and tried to read the four square boxes drawn in the corner of the ledger. Instead of handing the child his old bamboo-cutting tool, Shyam gave him a new pencil. "Look at these squares," he said. "The first is for the thing made, the second for whose hands made it, the third for how much time it took, the fourth for its price. Read them and tell me whose line is missing." The boy stumbled over Pavitra's name. Laughing, Pavitra read it aloud herself. "Once everyone can read their own name," she said, "mistakes on paper will have a harder time surviving."

After the work was finished, Naira put three papers into separate bags. The first was the public safety order: who had been engaged, for what work, and at what price. The second was the private wage register, whose original names and payment entries had still to be verified. The third was an information sheet relating to the investigation of the rumour about a child, which did not belong before this gathering. "We tested one claim today," she told Tara. "The order drawn up on the assumption of unpaid voluntary cooperation couldn't stand. In its place there's a limited order for paid work." "One order has been corrected," Tara answered. "When the water rises, all the passages these measurements have missed will come back asking to be accounted for."

Late in the evening, on his way home, Hira saw that no new sign declaring the old unsafe platform fit to bear loads had been erected. Only the red-and-yellow warning ribbons stirred in the wind. The bamboo Shyam had fashioned lay elsewhere, set out to dry; Parvati and Pavitra had taken home their remaining materials separately. Closing her ledger, Tara said, "So far the first price of cooperation has been this much: the workers' names and the money they actually received have been put on paper. But will those who don't want the water kept from their fields accept this agreement so easily?" Hira answered, "When the water rises, friendship and fear will both have to be measured again."

That night the embankment representative stood outside the municipal office reading the public order. He paused at the names of Tara and Shyam. "No one has signed off on this map as final," he told Aditi. "So who can have the path to my field closed?" "No one has changed any permanent right," Aditi replied. "We've put up a warning where danger was actually observed. At the next hearing, both your objection and the measurements made by the local workers will be considered." He folded the notice, but his doubts remained. Inside, Aditi was putting away the copy of the measurement ledger for safekeeping. In the margin of the paper stood the names of three parties still in disagreement.

Chapter 50 · Sugriva's Fear

Morning dew still clung to the yellow strip beside the gate. Uma Rajdhob was wringing out three wet sheets and spreading them over separate bamboo poles. A little slip of paper was tied to the end of each pole—not the customer's name, but the serial number in her own ledger. From a distance the sheets appeared the same colour, yet Uma could distinguish their torn hems, old stains and heavy borders. Just then a representative of the irrigation embankment committee came up from the ghat with two assistants. In his hand was a folded copy of the previous day's safety order.

"Who asked for this yellow marking to be put here?" he demanded. Uma did not put down the sheet. "If you want to see the municipal order, read it beside the gate. These are my poles for drying clothes. Tell me if they've obstructed the path." The representative said, "You might as well consider the path closed since yesterday. The people in the fields are frightened. Are we to let outsiders who come to take measurements run the place?" Before extending the argument, Uma tied down the corner of the sheet. The customer's clothes had to be returned on time.

Shyam and Tara arrived beside the narrow edge of the gate. Tara noticed fresh footprints made since the yellow strip had been put down. People had begun using a cramped, damp footpath towards the fields. "The danger hasn't been removed," she told Aditi when she arrived. "We've merely changed the direction in which people walk. If the alternative path is unsafe too, we mustn't conceal that fact and write down the first marking as a success." The representative replied, "If you call the way to my fields dangerous, you'll weaken my rights." Tara answered, "A measurement cannot decide whose rights they are. It can show where a foot will slip."

Aditi opened the safety order. Two confirmations of the limited advance payment had been recorded separately from the checks still outstanding. She said the warning arrangements would remain in force, but the day's meeting could not issue an order to open the gate permanently. In a harsh voice the representative asked, "Then at whose pleasure is the water to be held back from the fields?" Hira Sahni stood listening, his boat pole upright in his hand. "Whether the water is being held back and whether the passage has narrowed are not the same question," he said. "We'll look again at today's water level, the mouth of the outlet and the bamboo markers. I never claimed to know its capacity for the whole year."

Uma came to Tara from her row of sheets. Her concern was the route her customers could take. "Yesterday someone told a household that, from now on, only the old contractors would be allowed to wash clothes at the ghat," she said. "Three of my customers have already started sending their washing elsewhere. I never had a contract, only my regular customers. Whenever there's a quarrel over the path, the rumour is enough to stop my work too." Tara said, "Have them record where that claim came from. The warning order grants nobody a monopoly over washing."

On the raised platform, Urmila Rajak was counting the clothes. She asked Uma, "If you want, you can use the shade above during my shift. But our clothes, customers and accounts of what we're owed will remain separate." Uma smiled at first, then hesitated. "If I take shelter here, people will say I'm working under Urmila. I want to set the price of my own labour." Urmila answered evenly, "Let them say what they will. Neither of us owns the other. If we arrange safe water and drying space together, we can record the shared expense separately."

The market inn was Uma's largest customer, and it set the rates unilaterally. A man from the family that owned it had come again that day. "If you and Urmila work on the same platform," he said, "we'll give all the inn's washing under one name. And I'll set the price." Uma looked at him without speaking. It was those payments that bought grain for her household. She opened her ledger at the old sums owing: three payments made late, and once an additional job for which nothing had been paid. "The price of my hands has kept falling under this arrangement," she said quietly. "How many more times am I to accept these terms merely to keep a single customer?"

"Then what terms do you want?" Urmila asked. With a finger Uma drew three circles in the earth of the platform. "First, each household's clothes must arrive and go back under a separate serial number. Second, the washing charge must be fixed in the name of the worker who does the work. Third, the shared costs of shade, carrying water and keeping the path safe must go into another ledger. No customer may bargain with one person for the labour of an entire group." Urmila drew a fourth circle. "And water that hasn't been tested must be kept away from clothes and bodies. We must also record who pays for the testing." Uma left that fourth circle undisturbed.

The innkeeper's man looked less pleased. "After so much paperwork, how can washing stay cheap?" he asked. "Perhaps it won't be cheap," Uma answered. "But if clothes go missing, we'll know whose responsibility it is; and if wages aren't paid, we'll know whose household has been deprived of grain." Instead of agreeing to the previous rate, the man demanded all of Uma's working hours for himself. For the first time, Uma refused him outright. For an instant she thought of the fees for her young daughter's schooling, but the thought did not change her answer.

On the other side of the platform Shanti Bari arrived carrying two boxes of wedding decorations. In one were strips of bark for ceremonial wedding crowns and threads of flowers; the other held half-finished festoons and coloured knots. One corner of a box was wet. "Since the route was changed yesterday, the cart had to go round by the upper side of the ghat," she said.

“Let me dry these here, or the colours will run.” Uma shifted one of her poles to make room. Shanti's box was set not on the sheets but upon an empty wooden rack.

Two women had come with Shanti, hoping to order wedding materials for their neighbourhood. One said, “A date has suddenly been fixed in the family. Give us half the things now; we'll pay after the wedding.” Shanti showed them a page of outstanding debts from the previous year. Against the materials supplied to two families someone had written 'thank you', even after the cost of the goods had been deducted; there was no mark to show payment. “I may receive credit in a house celebrating a happy occasion,” Shanti said, “but credit will not buy my bark, thread or time.” The visitor lowered her head.

Shanti drew two lines on the lid of the box. “Half the cost of materials in advance for anything made in a colour specially for your family. The rest on the day of delivery. If a family cannot afford it, let them seek help from a separate fund for mutual assistance. But don't call it assistance and then waive my wages.” She turned towards them. “And if something already made can be used by several households, its hire charge must be separate, as must the account of anything broken. No one has to buy every wedding decoration anew.” Uma spoke up. “Your rules are like the ones we're making here at the ghat. Keep the customers, but don't erase the maker's name.”

By noon Shanti had drawn up two documents. The first was a model account for wedding orders: bark, thread, colour, time, advance payment and final amount due. The second concerned voluntary contributions for assistance: how much had come from whom and how it had been used. She wrapped the page of donations in a separate piece of cloth, apart from the page recording her wages. The first woman made no promise of an advance payment, but the second paid the hire charge for a shared festoon and took a receipt. Shanti entered the first actual transaction made under her new rules.

Meanwhile Phulo Chaurasia returned from her betel field. In her hand was a folded old family document, on which the name 'Khiroi' appeared in one place. A new assessment notice had described Phulo's field as a beneficiary of the drainage work and demanded a larger contribution. She spread the edge of the paper before Tara. “My grandfather's ledger gives this name, and two old lines of expenditure beside it. But when water is still standing in my field, what benefit have I received from the drainage that they now say I enjoy?”

Tara looked closely. The paper contained the name and two figures for old expenditure, but no clear measurement of the land. “The name Khiroi is attested in this family document,” she said, “but the paper does not establish a direct connection between it and the present gate. That claim will need maps, measurements and records that belong to the relevant period.” Phulo folded the document. “That's what I want too. But I showed you this page to stop them writing down a benefit against my name and deciding how much I must pay for the drainage before anything is established."

The representative of the irrigation embankment committee had been listening. "If each household counts its benefits and losses separately," he said, "what value does the committee's collective decision have?" Tara asked, "Does collective decision-making mean that one household's costs may simply be imposed on another? Yesterday we made separate wage accounts for a temporary warning. If we're going to divide the drainage costs today, we must hear separately how long water stands in each field, whose route is closed and who has difficulty even washing utensils." The representative would not concede the argument. He did, however, agree to receive Phulo's objection in writing.

On the rocks of Rishyamuka, Sugriva's inward terror had not diminished. Since his flight from Kishkindha, every rustle of a leaf seemed to him the approach of one of Vali's messengers. Hanuman came bringing news of his meeting with Rama and Lakshmana. "The two brothers are searching for Sita," Hanuman said. "They possess strength, but they wish first to hear your story." Sugriva looked across the distant valley. "Before I listen to a powerful man's promise," he replied, "I need to ask what limits there are to his strength."

When he came before Rama, Sugriva told the story of his exile: the mouth of the cave, the vigil for his brother's return, the dreadful sound from within, the decision he had made on seeing blood, and Vali's anger afterwards. Sugriva recounted his memories of his side of the story, one by one. "From what I saw that day, I concluded that my brother would never come back," he said. "But Vali understood my decision as betrayal. Before his strength, my explanation went unheard." Rama listened. He did not immediately deliver a final judgment upon the absent party on the strength of this account alone.

Sugriva stated his conditions for a promise plainly. "You want help in finding Sita; I want safety from exile and a hearing for my claim to the kingdom. I fear Vali may kill me. And I fear something else: once this alliance has placed the kingdom in my hands, how much right will the people who have stayed with me have in it? Friendship will not make that question disappear." Hanuman put Sugriva's fear before Rama without concealing it. Rama said that Sugriva's help was necessary in the search for Sita, and that he also had a duty to listen to Sugriva's suffering. But Sugriva asked again, "If the two brothers give conflicting accounts, whose word will your arrow believe?"

The dry grass bent along the edge of the rock. Rather than display the grandeur of his vow, Rama did not evade the question. "I seek your friendship so that you may be safe," he said. "But when strength is raised in the name of justice, it is right to ask the reason for its use." Sugriva's fear did not vanish, but he ceased to hide it. Hanuman saw that no decision about the kingdom had yet been made. What had begun was the possibility of two parties speaking openly of what they lacked and what they expected of each other. The work ahead would put that promise to a severe test.

In Videhapur, a strong wind rose after noon and the thin strips of bark in Shanti's box began to flutter. Uma gathered her sheets; Shanti pressed down the lid. Just then the man from the inn returned. “I've been to another washerman,” he told Uma. “He'll take on the whole job for less. If you wish, you may work for me alone at the old rate.” Uma felt a sharp pain in her chest. Her mother had washed clothes for that same inn for years. But a memory was not a contract.

“You're free to choose another worker,” Uma said. “But don't tell me that, to keep my customers, I must force down the wages of another household or erase its name. I'll give all three of my regular customers my new terms in writing.” The man stopped. “If you refuse half the price, the loss is yours,” he said. Uma answered, “Then I'll enter the loss in my ledger. At least I've begun to understand whose name a loss is carried under.” There was no heroic fanfare in her decision. It settled instead into the close silence of a household worried about its next grain purchase.

Urmila came to Uma's side. “The hospital washing will continue on its own separate receipts,” she said. “I can't hand those customers over to you. But we can divide the hours on the safe platform—morning for you, midday for me, and another measurement in the evening if the water falls. We'll share the cost of the bamboo drying poles equally. Shall we make a small timetable?” Uma asked, “And if someone has an accident on the platform?” Urmila did not laugh. “Then we'll stop work first, tend to the injury and inform those responsible for inspecting the public path. These bamboo poles are not a safe bridge.”

Shanti pushed forward her two papers. “My materials are separate from the donations; your customers are separate from the shared shade. If both sets of rules are read out at the same meeting, people will think we've all joined forces to put prices up.” Uma said, “Then each of us must speak about her own goods and the reasons for her terms. The prices will be decided together.” Shanti asked, “And what of a family that truly cannot pay?” Uma replied, “There must be an open register for helping them. We won't secretly cut a craftworker's wages and call it charity.”

A municipal assistant wanted to put up a notice on the public board: 'Washing operations at the ghat jointly transferred.' Uma stopped him the moment she read the line. “Who has transferred them? And to whom?” Such wording seemed easier to the assistant. Urmila stepped forward. “Sharing a cooperative's shade and dividing hours is one thing. Nobody has handed over the hospital contract, Uma's customers or my own wages to anyone else.” The assistant crossed out the words and wrote: 'Temporary shared use of the safe platform; each worker's customers and wages remain independent.'

Aditi came with the gate-inspection chart. It marked the side inspected and found safe, the side still uncertain, and the lower gate where access was prohibited. The representative immediately recorded a disagreement: one of the marks lay beside the cart track leading to his fields. Aditi answered, “This isn't a permanent restriction. It would be wrong to declare the path safe without testing both rainfall conditions and the loads it must bear. Your objection will remain on record under your name.” Tara said, “Our local measurements will remain in the cost ledger, but no engineering test still outstanding must be described as complete.”

At the end of the meeting, Naira drew attention to a call-name mentioned in an old wage register. One representative connected that name, 'Chhot Naav', with a family claiming rights over the approach to the gate. Naira asked to see the original page. The date beside the name was incomplete, and there was no accompanying payment document. “A call-name cannot establish someone's rights or guilt,” she said. “The identity of the living person you're referring to, and the claim to the land, must be examined in separate records. This call-name won't change the measurements of the gate.”

Before handing Naira a copy of her family document, Phulo asked, “Will everyone be able to read all of it?” Naira explained clearly that the public hearing needed only a verified extract of the entry bearing the name Khiroi, a statement about the condition of its date, and a general reference to the expenditure. The remaining pages of private family transactions would stay in a sealed envelope. Phulo gave her consent. “Investigate the damage,” she said, “but don't carry private debts into the marketplace.” Tara attached this restriction on disclosure to her measurement report.

At the hour when the first evening lamps were being lit, Uma's daughter came to the platform with a book. “Ma, no washing from the inn?” she asked. Holding her damp ledger carefully, Uma replied, “That work has gone elsewhere. I've got clothes from two households here now.” Her daughter sat down to add up the figures. Uma did not stop her, but said, “Learn to read accounts—that much is enough. You needn't come to the ghat to work beside me. Study whatever you want to study.” Under the line in Uma's ledger marked 'shared shade', the girl made separate pencil signs for poles, soap and time.

As she packed her box, Shanti handed a finished festoon to a woman. The woman put her thumbprint on the receipt for the advance; Shanti read out the count of the articles to her and made the date for the remaining payment clear. “My daughter wants this colour for her wedding,” the woman said happily. Shanti replied, “Let her choose the colour. The labour of making the things will still be mine." Their agreement contained neither humiliation nor any shame in asking to be paid.

When night fell, the representative of the embankment committee stood beside the measurement board for a long time, watching the water. "I'm afraid a temporary marking will be used as proof of a permanent boundary," he told Aditi. "Then write down that fear," she replied. "We'll record the duration of the marking, today's measurements and the limits of the inspection. What hasn't been examined cannot become evidence of a right." The representative read through his written objection again and changed one expression: in place of 'land seized', he wrote 'difficulty in the temporary use of the path'. The dispute remained, but for the first time his sentence described the actual nature of the difficulty.

Tara was walking home with Shyam. "Today Uma lost the inn's business, Shanti received her first advance, and Phulo's charge for the field—was it stopped or not?" Shyam asked. Tara replied, "Uma's loss was recorded. One receipt was issued under Shanti's new rules. Phulo's objection reached the hearing. There is still no decision on the charge. Don't weigh three different outcomes on a single scale." Shyam walked silently for some distance. Then he asked, "In the old story Sugriva found friendship after speaking of his fear. Why do people here still fail to find trust even after they've spoken of theirs?" Tara said, "Speaking of fear is the first condition for being heard. Then comes the question: whose voice will be heard when the decision is made?"

Tara divided her measurement ledger into three sections. The first: the risks observed that day, for which temporary safety measures would remain. The second: the households whose benefits and losses were still disputed, particularly Phulo's field and the committee's route. The third: the local knowledge for which credit and remuneration had yet to be entered. She wrote her name and paused with the pen in her hand. At the next inspection the old markings would be compared with the present measurements. But no line could be considered complete until it had been decided whose voices were to count.

Chapter 51 · Tara's Reckoning

Before the first shadow of morning had reached the right side of the gate, Tara had uncoiled the measuring cord three times. The first time she stretched it from post to post; the second, along the strip where people walked; the third, across the ground washed away by the night's rain. Shyam Mallik held the chalk. Raising the first length of cord, he asked, "If only the first measurement goes on the municipal map, what use will the other two be?" Tara answered, "The first is the distance between the posts; the second is the path people take; the third is the danger of collapse. Put all three into a single figure and a human being will fall—not the paper."

When Aditi, the engineer, came to examine the measurement book, two representatives of the embankment committee were already standing beside the gate. One maintained that the bamboo barrier blocked the way to the fields; the other feared that, if the bamboo were removed, a cart would slip off the narrow stretch. With her chalk Tara drew a circle on the ground where a cartwheel had sunk the day before. "We saw this wheel," she said, "but I cannot say whose land bears this mark." Aditi entered the measurements. Both representatives had their objections recorded once again, each in his own words.

Shyam laid a small strip of cloth across the three sections marked on the paper. The first was headed 'Immediate danger'; the second, 'Claims of benefit and loss'; the third, 'Knowledge contributed through labour, and payment due'. Tara said, "My reckoning includes not merely the quantity of water, but the people who come down on that side and the hours their work takes. Yet I will not issue an engineer's certificate. What Aditi can measure is her responsibility. What I have seen and heard must be written under my own name."

A municipal assistant carried a notice: 'Local suggestions received for the improvement of the gate.' The assistants' names appeared on it; Tara's and Shyam's did not. Tara did not tear it up. She took a red pencil and placed a question mark beside the words. "Which suggestions?" she asked. "Will the markings we showed you be copied, and something incomplete made public as though it were finished? Consultation does not mean taking people's knowledge and leaving out their names." The assistant looked uncertainly towards Aditi. Aditi withheld the original notice from circulation.

Just then Ruchi Dharikar arrived, a bamboo basket tucked beneath her arm. Inside, wrapped in cloth, was a sample of her new weaving. At an earlier craft exhibition the children had called its double-curving band a flower. Ruchi had used that pattern to make a thin mat which could be folded and tied around the warning post at the gate. Spaces left between its red and yellow strips made the pattern distinguishable even at a distance. “I've brought it for you to look at,” she said. “Whether anyone buys it is still undecided.”

The assistant laughed. “But this is like a design we've seen in the office. We made a print of it only yesterday.” He brought out a sheet bearing lines that resembled Ruchi's double curve. Beneath them were the words ‘Municipal local-warning pattern’. The basket went still in Ruchi's hands where it rested against the ground. “How did a line made in my house get into the office?” she asked. No answer came at once. Shyam remembered that when a photograph of the shared samples had been taken, Ruchi's mat had lain at the back. Did the mere appearance of a thing in a photograph make its use everybody's right?

“For my object to be visible in a photograph and for someone to reproduce it for sale are two different matters,” Ruchi said. “I understand why you need a safety sign. But if the municipality calls our family's weaving its own invention, who will own the new product my daughter has made?” Aditi drew the sheet towards her. “Printing from this draft will stop. First we shall find out whose consent was obtained for the photograph. Public use of the pattern and commercial copying require separate written permissions.” Tara looked at Ruchi with a new attentiveness. Her own question about the map had acquired another shape before her eyes.

Ruchi's daughter, Chhabili, picked up a narrow strip. “Ma, if I use blue instead of red, will it become something different?” Ruchi did not silence her. “A change of colour does not change who owns a pattern. But there is nothing to stop you learning to make a new one,” she replied. Chhabili laughed. “Then I'll make a weave of my own.” Phulo Chaurasia, standing by the doorway, smiled. Tara handed Chhabili a blank sheet of paper, but did not take the strip out of her hand.

Sakib Abdal climbed onto the platform carrying two bags. In the first was a bundle of receipts for contributions towards clearing the drainage channel; in the second, his private account book for small transport jobs. His shoulder still ached from stumbling while lifting a sack the day before. “How has my name entered this inquiry?” he asked the assistant. “Last month's public contributions were kept at your shop; some rope for the gate warnings was bought there too. The same name appears in two places,” the assistant said. Setting down his bags, Sakib replied, “The same name does not mean the same money.”

Contributions for the previous clearing of the drainage channel had been left at Sakib's shop. He issued receipts and charged separately for his work carrying goods. One rainy day, after he had brought the collection box indoors, a rumour had spread that the bags had been exchanged. Now his name had surfaced again in the inspection of materials used at the gate.

He opened the first ledger. Dates, receipt numbers, donors marked as public or confidential according to their wishes, and the headings under which collective expenditure had been made were all entered separately. The second book recorded petrol, hire charges and private earnings. The assistant asked, “Why does one record show you receiving this sum, while the other shows a transport charge on the same day?” Sakib answered, “Because one is a donation to that fund and the other is payment for the labour of my hands. If transport was paid out of donations, there must be an authorisation and a receipt. If a private customer paid me, that payment must not cast its shadow across the donations column.”

Tara noticed that one receipt box bore only the word ‘Food’ beside an expenditure. The amount was small, but neither the recipient's name nor the time was there. Shame crossed Sakib's face. “I ordered rice for the cleaning crew that day. The shopkeeper gave me the account by word of mouth; I took no paper,” he said. A representative burst out, “Then all the contributions are suspect!” Tara stopped him. “One incomplete entry means that, for now, this expenditure on food is unverified. It does not prove that the entire public fund was stolen.” Sakib drew a circle around the line recording his mistake.

“And if you cannot obtain the receipt?” Aditi asked. “I shall write down the date and the testimony of the three people who brought the food,” Sakib said. “The expense will remain marked ‘incomplete evidence’. I will not manufacture a document.” The assembly fell silent. Shyam said, “The photograph of our sample went out without our names; your food was entered without a receipt. They are different errors, but both need an account of how they will be put right.”

In an age immeasurably distant from this one, within the royal palace of Kishkindha, Tara had heard an unfamiliar sound: Sugriva's challenge, raised with an assurance that did not come naturally after defeat. Vali was preparing to leave the hall, trusting not in a bow but in his own strength. Tara barred his way. “Why does the brother who withdrew in fear yesterday call out again today with such confidence?” she asked. Anger shone in Vali's eyes. “He is testing my courage,” he said. “Look beyond your courage,” Tara replied, “and consider the help that may have come to stand behind him.”

Tara had not discarded the intelligence Angada had brought her. News of the meeting between Sugriva and the princes of Ayodhya, Rama and Lakshmana; of the search for Sita; and of the agreement made with Sugriva—she did not know the whole truth of every side of these matters. But she understood that the reason for Sugriva's courage in returning had changed. “You may win,” she said, “but who will trust the kingdom afterwards? The people are silent with fear. Is a kingdom to be governed by trust, or by a roar?”

Vali tightened the bracelet on his wrist. “Am I to retreat from my own brother's challenge, then?” Tara answered, “To step back is no disgrace if stepping back saves lives. Make terms. Bring the accusations you have against him before a hearing. Put the question of a share in the kingdom clearly before the assembly. Do not pay for today's anger with Angada's future." Vali stared at her. "Are you defending my enemy?" Her voice remained steady. "I am thinking of your life, of Angada's rights, and of the households of this city. Those three interests do not always coincide."

Vali remembered the blocked mouth of the cave, the death misunderstood, and the humiliation of losing his kingdom. Tara had heard the account; for that very reason she knew how both brothers fought in the belief that their own memories contained the whole truth. "If you believe Rama is just," she said, "go to him and ask your questions. If you do not, it is more dangerous still to fight without reflection against an enemy helped by an unknown archer." For an instant Vali fell silent. Then his anger outstripped his thought.

Vali set off towards the field of combat. Tara stepped aside from the threshold, but stepping aside did not signify consent. She called Angada to her. "Mother, Father will come back victorious, won't he?" the child asked. Tara laid a hand upon his head. "That is what I hope," she said. "But after victory, we must ask who survived, whose rights survived, and whose words will be heard." Angada's eyes were full of questions. He did not promise to abandon his father's side, and his mother did not ask him for that promise.

By the gate at Videhapur the midday sun had dried the knots of the measuring cord. As Tara prepared her table of estimates, she told Aditi, "One figure here concerns the water, another the hours during which passage is safe, and a third the petition of a family whose route is obstructed. Adding them together will not produce one meaningful number. Write a separate conclusion for each." The embankment representative said, "You give no importance to the carts that carry our crops." Phulo replied, "Record the times when the water to my field is obstructed; then my loss can be assessed too. Measure your cart route separately." At last the disagreement had taken a form in which it could be read on paper.

Aditi proposed a day for the next inspection, but Tara raised her hand. "Who will pay for it?" she asked. The assistant lifted his eyebrows. "The first advance was issued yesterday." "That was for temporary bamboo warning signs and that day's measurements," Tara replied. "At the new inspection I, Shyam, Hira and Ruchi will each perform different work. Set out the scope, record the duration, and then pay the advance. Don't write 'local cooperation' and remove our names as before." Beside her, Shyam held out a clean sheet of paper.

"Has every kind of knowledge become something to be sold?" the assistant asked. Tara did not smile. "Those who have come here are not all asking the same price," she said. "Hira's experience of identifying a navigable route, Shyam's labour joining bamboo, Ruchi's weaving, my calculations of local drainage—four different kinds of work. If that work is useful for public safety, it must be paid for. Nor shall I claim ownership of what I do not know to be mine." Aditi began writing four separate items on the notice.

Ruchi spoke up. "My strips can be used to show the colour signals on a safety warning, provided the price and duration of that limited use are written down. But the design cannot be copied for sale in the market." "What if people copy it in their homes?" the assistant asked. "How could I stop people from learning something at home?" Ruchi replied. "But learning from our household's sample is not the same as printing a thousand pieces in the municipality's name. How many will be made, on whose order, under whose name? Write that down." Chhabili listened as she drew three new lines on her paper.

Aditi wrote the agreement: during the two-week safety trial, Ruchi's sample warning strips could be tested for limited use; any photograph of the sample would credit Ruchi and her family; no large production order would be issued without a new contract. Ruchi read the paper with immense patience. She had a line resembling 'transfer of all ownership rights' struck out. Looking at the deleted words, Tara remembered the rules governing photographs of her old maps. "An agreement begins with this line," she said, "with saying plainly what we are not giving away."

Meanwhile, Sakib unfolded an old sheet brought by the shopkeeper. It listed food items and approximate quantities, but the shopkeeper could not remember the day the cash had been paid. "This paper makes it possible that food was supplied," Sakib said, "but it does not establish the complete sequence of cash payments. I shall write 'confirmation pending' in the contributions register." He separated his private transport book. "My daughter even records the dates when her school fees fall due in this. I will not expose all my household accounts to a public inquiry. I will show what concerns public money, and no more." Naira supported him. "Access for inspection must have limits. Privacy is no excuse for concealing accounts, but a public right to inquire is not permission to read every page in a private household."

A man in the meeting asked, "If the original wage list has 'Chhot Naav' written in it, why do people with that same name appear all through these contribution records?" Naira replied, "We have no evidence yet that a person known by a calling-name, a donor, and a carrier of goods are one and the same individual. The original payment papers must be compared with the dates. The rumour about the missing child will remain separate from this reckoning." She did not pin a copy of the old list onto the public board. Unnecessary exposure of private names had to be prevented.

Later that afternoon, before returning home, Shyam and Tara sat under a bamboo shelter beside the river. Looking at a cut on his palm, Shyam asked, "If people understand that the name of the person who does the work ought to be on the paper, why do they grow so angry about it?" Tara answered, "Because once a name is written, someone can ask: whose work was it, who received the pay, who must answer if something goes wrong? Nameless cooperation costs least of all." Shyam laughed. "Then should I start giving receipts for every task in our house?" Tara looked at him. "At home we need justice, not receipts. It is unjust to treat household labour as free, too."

Having said this, Tara fell silent. That morning Shyam had dried the measuring cord she had spent much of the night untying and fastening. His manual labour was entered by name in her table. But in whose ledger would there be a place for the hours he spent that evening telling Chhabili the story of Ruchi's family's weaving? After a while she asked, "Will you leave your own household work tomorrow and come with me to the inspection?" Shyam said, "If we list each job separately, who will soak the bamboo at home?" They both laughed. Yet Tara immediately resolved that, before the next inspection, she would ask how much of Shyam's time was actually available.

Far away, in the forests of Kishkindha, a harsh sound rose among the leaves. Vali and Sugriva confronted each other once again. In the midst of their struggle an arrow came, and Vali fell to the earth. Tara was still in the palace with Angada. When the news reached her, her feet trembled for a moment; but she told no one a lie in order to conceal her grief. Angada tried to run. Tara took his hand. "Come," she said. "But we shall see with our own eyes and ask questions. What someone tells us will not, merely by being told, become the whole of our truth."

When Tara reached the battlefield, the story of Vali's strength lay suddenly cast aside, like a heavy mace set down at the edge of the ground. She sat beside her husband. Grief and anger closed about her together. "I tried to stop you," she said softly. "This is no moment for proving that I was wise. Who will answer for the fear that will now rise among the people?" Sugriva stood at a distance; in Rama's presence difficult questions about the justice of the combat were being raised. Grief did not make Tara surrender her objections; nor did anger make her turn Angada's life into an instrument of revenge.

Sitting beside his father, Angada asked, "If there was friendship, why was my father an enemy?" Tara did not order him to be silent. "That is your question," she said, "and you have a right to have it heard. Counsel about the kingdom, a father's wrongdoing or strength, and a son's future—these cannot be entered in a single account." She looked towards Sugriva. "If you take charge of the kingdom, you must account for this child's life and his trust as well. You will not secure the realm by silencing him." For the first time Angada saw that his mother's reckoning counted not the numbers of power, but the space in which he could breathe.

The evening meeting at Videhapur was brief. Aditi read out the revised notice: three points of temporary danger; two written objections concerning the disputed route; and the four names of local advisers, with separate payments due. It stated clearly that technical certification had not yet been completed for every part of the work. The embankment representative saw his objection entered with a date, rather than dismissed. Phulo received a date for a formal hearing on the benefits and losses to her field. Changing the words had not set the water flowing, but it had given the affected people somewhere to speak.

Sakib handed copies of the public contributions register to two members of the meeting and put his private transport ledger back into his bag. The single food entry would remain marked ‘incomplete evidence’ until separately verified. Ruchi agreed to the limited trial of her sample, but did not sign any large production order. “Come home,” she told Chhabili. “We'll finish your new blue-striped design.” “And if people say it's good?” Chhabili asked. Ruchi smiled. “Being praised doesn't mean the work is finished. We must count how much thread it took as well.”

That night Tara reopened her measurement book. Beneath its three sections she wrote a new line: ‘Whoever's interests are counted has the right to be heard.’ Shyam sat beside the lamp, smoothing a thin split of bamboo. Tara asked, “When the next meeting comes, can we make sure no one is left out—someone whose loss has been calculated but who has never been called to speak?” Shyam answered, “And those who are called must be given time to ask their own questions.” Beside her new line, Tara left a blank space. The figures were still to be entered; she had come to know that, next time, a young voice would be heard first in that emptiness.

Chapter 52 · Angada's Tomorrow

Before dawn, in the open ground behind the gate, Nandu Nat was pulling two bamboo poles out of the earth. The rope, soaked by the night's rain, had hardened around its knot. He caught one end between his teeth, and little Jhilmil came running. "Babu, if you take these bamboos away, where will there be shade for me to study?" In her hand was an old exercise book in which, the previous day, Mira had made her write 'equal' and 'unequal'. Nandu let go of the rope. "They say that from today no stage may be erected here. First we shall see the paper; then we shall think of a way to give you shade."

After the previous day's meeting, a municipal assistant had drawn a mark in red chalk on the strip of ground near the gate. The tarpaulins, bamboo poles and small cooking vessels all fell on the inner side of his line. The slip of paper said, 'Clear the passage for temporary drainage safety.' It said nothing about the distance to be cleared, the date from which the order applied, or whose authority lay behind it. Gauri Kapariya stood beside the mark, counting the folds of her tarpaulin. She asked the assistant, "When this red line is washed away by the rain, whose word are we to take then?"

"You people are always on the move anyway," the assistant said. "Stay somewhere else for two days." Gauri opened her account book. In it were the cost of repairing the tarpaulin five days earlier, the pegs driven in at night, and the clay hearth on which they kept their fire. "We move, but we are not the wind," she replied. "Some of us have sick people with us; some have children staying here for their examinations. The public way must remain open. But to say 'Move' without showing us where is not a complete measure for safety."

Shyam Mallik and Tara Binout arrived carrying the inspection cord. Looking at the chalk mark, Tara said, "Yesterday my chart gave the dimensions of the dangerous strip. This line goes beyond it." The engineer Aditi was summoned. She read the notice and made it clear that the technical team had called for further examination of the load and drainage at the narrow section; she had issued no written order to clear the whole expanse of ground at once. "But do not spend the night where there is a danger of collapse," she warned. Gauri agreed that the families would move away from that part, provided a safe edge was identified and the reason set down in writing.

Nandu faced another difficulty. His troupe had been invited to perform at the first cultural evening of the fish-and-makhana workers' fair, but the organiser's new notice made the children's presence compulsory for the entire evening. It also proposed halving the fee on the grounds that this was 'community entertainment'. Jhilmil had an examination early the following morning. Reading the notice, Nandu's wife Maina said, "If she dances until ten at night, how will she read her pages in the morning?" "This money will pay for this month's exercise books and rent," Nandu answered. There was calculation in his voice, not command.

Jhilmil sat beside a pole and opened her book. Covering each letter in turn with her hand, she repeated what she had learnt. Maina asked her, "What is it you want to do?" "I do not want to stop learning the beat of the dholak," the child said. "But instead of performing all evening, I want to go to school first. When I sing my song, I want to sing because I choose to." Nandu looked at her face. Until now the troupe's journeys and earnings had been his to decide; for the first time, Jhilmil was asking for a share of her own time.

As the bamboo was being pulled from the ground, a young man approached, swinging his mobile phone. On its screen was a brief scene from an old performance by Sajid Nat. "We'll use this scene in the town's publicity," he said. "We'll add the children's dance to it. If people contribute, the advertising money will be of use to everyone." Sajid himself arrived just then, carrying a camera and a notebook. At the sight of the red border of his stage curtain on the screen, he stopped. "That scene is my work," he said, "and I have no permission to give you the children's faces for publicity."

"But the video has already been circulating in the market," the young man protested. "What is the point of talking about rights now?" Sajid put his camera back into its bag. "Because it has circulated, may anyone who wishes sell it? My original recording was once wrongly joined to a photograph in the search for Mithun. Naira's inquiry separated the contexts. Since then I have learnt how many lives can be shaken by a single scene cut out of its place." Instead of handing over the original file, he asked the man to state in writing the purpose of its use, the period of use, and the limits of its audience.

A small crowd gathered. Someone asked, "Why hold back art from work being done for safety?" Sajid answered, "Why must a child's performance be sold in order to show a safety map? If you need footage of a public programme I have made, agree on a short extract, the performers' consent and the payment. I will not hand over the children's rehearsal files." Nandu added, "Whether our Jhilmil goes onstage will be decided after we have considered her school day. Her face is not a thing to be used in an advertisement."

When Naira arrived among the people, Gauri showed her the notice. Naira read it, but she did not stamp it as though it were an official order. Since her contract had been suspended, she was careful to distinguish her private assistance from government certification. "Write down three questions," she said. "Who issued this notice? What is the original safety measurement? And where will the affected people's objections be recorded?" A man immediately said, "Find out how many false names there are among these travelling people as well." Naira replied, "An accepted contact for the group is enough for an objection about a place to stay. There will be no public register of children's routes or the private names used in their homes."

In the palace of Kishkindha, in an age immensely distant from this one, Angada sat beside his father's mace. It seemed to him that the metal had not yet grown cold, though the time for mourning after the battlefield had already lengthened into days. Outside, preparations were under way for Sugriva to assume the throne. Angada asked his mother, Tara, "How am I to believe that the friend of the man who killed my father today will protect me tomorrow?"

Tara moved the mace away from the wall. "I am not ordering you to trust him," she said. "Vali has died; that is my grief. Sugriva will govern the kingdom; that is an event in the life of the people. Your life is not merely what remains after those two things." Angada said angrily, "Everyone will say that my father was wrong. Why, then, will they still identify me as his son?" Tara's eyes filled. "Because being a son does not mean inheriting blame. It means having a bond with memory. Your father's love for you was no falsehood; nor was every decision he made an act of justice."

Hanuman was standing at the threshold. He asked permission to sit beside Angada. The boy said, "You are Sugriva's ally. Will you listen to my question, or will you give me the king's answer?" "I shall listen to your question," Hanuman replied. "The reasons for the side I have served may also be questioned." Angada asked, "When the kingdom changes hands, who will bring grain to the homes of the soldiers who stood with my father yesterday?" Hanuman did not make an immediate promise. "That question must be put before the assembly," he said, "and the families whose names are entered for relief must be asked as well."

When Sugriva entered, Angada rose but did not bow in salutation. The palace attendants grew alarmed. Sugriva stopped them from moving him aside. "Angada," he said, "I have not come to take your father's place." Angada asked at once, "Why, then, do you take his throne?" Memories of defeat, exile and victory passed together across Sugriva's face. "If the kingdom were left without a ruler, the people too would be left unprotected," he said. Tara intervened. "The ordering of a kingdom and the winning of a child's trust cannot be accomplished in the same instant. Tell us plainly how much room your vow of friendship leaves for the families who have survived here."

Sugriva looked towards Angada. "I shall give you a place in which to learn the work of government," he said. "Only because I am Vali's son?" Angada replied. Sugriva fell silent. "Let training be his right, not a compulsory test of loyalty," Tara said. "He also needs time to grieve with his mother and to ask questions about his father." Angada asked, "And what if tomorrow I wish to learn, not the use of weapons, but the words of an envoy?" Hanuman smiled a little. “To be entrusted with words is a difficult art too,” he said. Angada took his hand away from the mace. For the present, the choice was still his.

At midday in Videhapur, a meeting was held in the old school veranda. Mira Mandal set a pile of exercise books before her. Jhilmil brought her reading book, and Jatan, the son of Reva Gulguliya, came with his lesson sheets. “I can show you last week’s attendance at the travelling school,” Mira said. “But it is not proof of formal enrolment. Those whose enrolment applications are still pending need separate receipts.” Nandu asked, “If we shorten the performance, the children will have time for study. But how are we to find the money for rent?”

Madhu arrived from the ghat committee with the measurement of the narrow passage. “There will be no stage behind the gate,” she said. “That is where the boats pass, and the warning bamboos stand. But for the first two hours of the evening a performance may be possible on the higher ground above the ghat, provided a safe pedestrian way is kept open for the crowd.” Aditi added, “This is only a temporary arrangement for a programme, not a certificate that the gate is permanently safe. A heavy stage or electrical wiring will require separate inspection.” The organiser’s representative said, “In two hours we shall have fewer spectators. The payment will fall.”

Nandu pressed a finger against the old leather of his dholak. “If the fee falls, we shall shorten the performance,” he said. “We shall not shorten the children’s time for lessons.” “Then we will not have the full number of dancers,” the organiser replied. Standing beside her daughter, Maina said, “Jhilmil, tell everyone what you want.” At first the child was shy. Then she said, “I will take part in the first song of the evening. After that I shall go home and write. If the performance starts late, I shall not take part.” For a moment the anxiety of lost earnings flashed in Nandu’s eyes. Then he said, “That will be my condition too.”

In the written agreement Nandu had the troupe’s two hours of labour, the hire of the bamboos and the cost of repairing the dholak entered separately. There would be no condition requiring the children to appear during school hours. In return, the organisers would not pay the additional fee for an all-night performance; the earnings Nandu had expected were reduced. Mira provided a copy of the school timetable, not a record of the children’s names and the routes their households travelled. Madhu marked out the safe ground and proposed conditional permission for one week. She did not make a decision about any permanent right to erect a stage.

At the same meeting Sajid spread out a small screen. The young man was ready to pay an advance for publicity, but on condition that, once he had bought the video, he could show it as many times as he wished. Sajid handed the paper back. “Such a sale would not be the end of my work,” he said. “It would be the end of my rights over it.” He wrote down two alternatives:

limited use of a short public promotional extract once separate consent had been obtained from the performers, or a fixed fee for a new recording made for the organisers. The original file, the children's rehearsals and the earlier wrongly cut scene were all excluded from any public bargain.

"Then I shall make a video on my own phone," the young man said. "Filming a public place is one question," Sajid answered. "A song performed on a stage, the performers' agreements and a child's identity are different questions. Let us first tell the audience whose images must not be recorded." Jhilmil laughed. "Could you show the hands playing the dholak instead of my face?" "If that is what you want, and the performer agrees, we can make an image of the hands at work," Sajid said. He did not switch on the camera.

Then Gauri's difficulty became the most urgent matter before the meeting. Two men had come the previous night threatening to remove the shelters beside the red-marked strip before nightfall. "I am not insisting on staying on the dangerous lower ground," Gauri said. "But whose field we should go to, at whose doorway we should light our fire—that cannot be settled for us by one person's order." She placed the receipt for repairing her tarpaulin on the table. The receipt was no proof of ownership of the land, but it did show that the families' belongings and labour could not simply be cast aside.

Reva Gulguliya rose. "My Jatan has only just learnt where the school is," she said. "Drive us one way today and another way tomorrow, and the teachers will say he does not attend regularly. I shall sign the objection with Gauri, but the route for my own family must be decided separately." Janaki raised the question of the health of Sarayu, an elderly woman in her troupe. The travelling families were not all of one community, one occupation or one itinerary. For the first time, their common question could be heard without its becoming pressure upon them to make one common decision.

Champa had come too. She was troubled by the rooms in Ruhani's shelter and by the notice concerning a private house. "If anyone needs a roof for a night," she said, "I can ask Ruhani what space is available. But the shelter's rules must first be read. We shall not enrol a family without its consent." "A shelter can help in a crisis," Gauri replied, "but I am not asking that my entire troupe become members of that household. I am asking for a hearing about a safe public route and a temporary place to stay." Champa lowered her eyes. She understood that behind a promise of one night's shelter, the old disagreements over keys and rules had not yet been resolved.

Aditi presented a temporary alternative. The ground behind an old warehouse, away from the gate, had not yet been certified 'free of danger' by technical inspection, but a proposal could be made for its preliminary examination. Gauri insisted that no children or sick people be sent there before inspection. A representative of the embankment said, "Our vehicles turn on that ground." "Then measure the routes needed by all three parties together," Tara replied. "You cannot complete one person's measurement by erasing another person's need."

A small working group was formed: a representative chosen by Gauri's group, Reva to represent her separate application, Janaki for her troupe, and one local resident. Ruhani's shelter was not automatically added to the list. Gauri had it recorded that the stopping places of every family would not be plotted on a public map; only the disputed safe route, the proposed alternative ground and the groups' contact details would appear. The official gave an acknowledgement for an inspection the following dawn. They agreed to vacate the dangerous red strip for the night, while a request to suspend the basis of any forced wholesale eviction pending inquiry was entered at the office. Its acceptance was not yet certain.

A gust of wind turned the pages of Jhilmil's exercise book in the veranda. She had written there: 'I shall learn songs and arithmetic too.' Beside the line, Nandu made a little calculation: two hours' earnings, fewer tickets, the cost of rent, the price of books. Seeing the deficit, he fell silent. "If we cannot earn the money for the books," Maina said, "we shall find other work next week. But we shall not fill this gap by keeping our daughter onstage all night." Instead of drawing a circle around the figures, Nandu put down a small tick. "Your examination is tomorrow morning," he reminded Jhilmil. "And yours?" the child asked. "Mine was today," Nandu replied.

Far away, evening settled upon Kishkindha. In Sugriva's assembly stood two elderly soldiers who had served Vali, hesitant and ill at ease. Seeing them, Angada asked his mother, "By what name are we to call these men? Yesterday they were my father's people." "They are still people of their own households today," Tara replied. "Those whom war leaves behind must not be spoken of merely as the defeated side." Angada said to Sugriva, "I shall learn the arts of arms, but I shall also ask whether these men's children have food."

Before the royal assembly, Sugriva vowed that the injured and bereaved families would be counted and help sent to them. But Tara insisted that the promise be kept distinct from an immediate proclamation of victory celebrations. "A household without grain needs food, not the sound of conches announcing a festival," she said. Hanuman spoke of the possibility of teaching Angada the work of an envoy. "I want to learn to listen first," Angada answered. He did not abandon his grief for his father; but neither did he command himself to make vengeance for his father's death the one purpose of his future.

That night in Videhapur, as a strip of red cloth was tied tightly to the warning bamboo by the gate, Gauri had two families of her troupe move temporarily to the safer edge. The final measurement of the ground had not yet been made; no one claimed a permanent right over it. Sajid kept the original recording in his closed bag and went away with the draft of a limited agreement. Nandu agreed to wait for Madhu’s permission slip before raising the poles of his stage on the proposed ground above the ghat. Watching the red cloth flutter, Jhilmil asked, “Will that flag be taken down tomorrow?” “After the inspection we shall know what must be moved, and where,” Gauri replied. “But if we set out in time for your examination, we shall be able to get along this path.”

On her way home, Naira placed three documents in separate envelopes: the agreement on performance hours and wages, the unfinished draft concerning rights over the video, and the acknowledgement of the temporary objection about shelter. None of these went into the file on the search for Mithun. No new suspect’s name was sent to Lata on the strength of that day’s crowd. From the kitchen Sarita asked, “Whose tomorrow survived today?” “For one person, two hours on a stage,” Naira replied. “For another, the right to keep the camera switched off. For another, a safe roof until the next dawn. No one has tomorrow’s certainty in their hands, but all three were able to put their questions into words.” Somewhere far away came the light beat of a dholak: its rhythm was a beginning, not an order.

Chapter 53 · Ruhani's Key

In the first light of dawn, Ruhani stood holding the rusted lock of the shelter's main gate. Water had entered it during the last squall of rain; the gate opened only after she had turned the key twice. Inside, Rukhsana was kindling the stove. Looking out, she asked, "If you are away again today, will everyone be left standing at the gate?" Instead of answering, Ruhani separated two keys of the same shape from her bunch. One belonged to the main gate, the other to the old storeroom; without a mark to distinguish them, they looked exactly alike.

"The work of opening a door does not make me its owner," Ruhani said. Sliding the pan aside, Rukhsana replied, "But if it is not settled who keeps the key, everyone will look for you whenever there is a problem with food or medicines, or a fire." The previous week the municipal office had acknowledged Ruhani as the contact person for temporary maintenance; she had still not accepted any document conferring permanent ownership. Yet every visitor asked her, "What is the order of the house?" It was in that question that the greatest danger lay.

The little windmill made of tarpaulin, tied to a post of the veranda, began to spin in the breeze. Champa emerged from the window with a glass of lukewarm water for her mother. The old woman had slept well the previous night, but the time for her medicine had changed again. "I want to go away for two days," Champa said. "I shall leave Mother with my sister and write down the medicine times. I need a break from the shelter's work all day long and the old trouble over my room." There was no apology in her voice, although an old trace of guilt for having made such a request lingered on her face.

"Does your mother agree?" Ruhani asked. From within, the elderly woman answered, "I shall go to my daughter's house. Let this daughter go and look at the river for two days—leaving work behind." Champa burst out laughing. For a very long time the only journeys that had taken her past the river landing were hurried errands between hospital sheets and papers, not a chance to look at the river itself. Ruhani did not make her fill in another box in the shelter's consent register. "If proof is needed for the leave," she said, "give them a copy of the medicine schedule, not the place you are visiting privately."

Meanwhile, Manjari, seated in the courtyard, was packing away her sewing basket. She had lived in the shelter for eight months and had said earlier that she was thinking of renting a small room near the market with a friend. Today she held an old five-hundred-rupee note and a slip concerning the rent. "I shall leave next Monday," she said. "The way back from the sewing shop will be shorter. But I do not want my name struck off the shelter's list as though leaving someone's charity were a crime."

"Have you seen the room?" Ruhani asked. "The water, the lock, the terms of the rent?" "I have seen it," Manjari replied. "The landlord wants an advance; I shall bargain with him. I am asking for the right to make my own decision, not for permission in place of a decision." At these words Rukhsana stopped blowing on the stove. "What if the next grant is reduced when a room becomes vacant?" she whispered. Ruhani did not evade the question. "Then we shall look at the conditions of the grant," she said. "We shall not keep Manjari's life as a number in a ration calculation."

By the time the sun was high, a small meeting had assembled in the courtyard. Rukhsana brought the ledger of food expenses; Zubaida arrived with the box of keys used for repairs at the bus stand; and Champa sat down after fixing the hours of her mother's medicines. Ruhani set two bunches of keys on the table. "The main gate, the communal storeroom and the emergency water tap must be opened by three different locks," she said. "The keys to private rooms will remain with their occupants. Two elected members should each hold a spare key to the gate for ordinary use, and when the duties change, the account of the keys should be drawn up afresh."

"'Elected' is easy to say," Zubaida observed. "How often will someone who has worked through the night hear another person calling in an emergency?" "I am in the kitchen," Rukhsana replied, "but I cannot be here every night either. The key for a fire emergency must be kept in a way that everyone's life does not depend on one person waking up." The three women then agreed to have two copies of the communal gate key made—one for Rukhsana, one for Zubaida. Ruhani would keep the original as the contact person, but would no longer be the sole custodian. No one would receive an unrestricted right to unlock private rooms.

"And the key to my old room, after I leave?" Manjari asked. "You will make the inventory of your belongings yourself," Ruhani said. "Hand over the key you have been using with a receipt for the transfer. That is not a notice forbidding you to return to the shelter." Manjari's lips parted slightly. "I was afraid that if the rented room did not work out, they would say here: you left once, so you cannot come back." "The rule for applying to return must be the same for everybody," Champa said. "But why should your new rented address be printed in the ledger?" The meeting agreed that a private address would not appear on the public list.

The sound of a wooden mat being dragged came from the doorway. Hiravati Kurariyar stood there with two bundles. The place where she travelled from one site to another weaving mats was in a back courtyard of the market, away from the dangerous strip by the gate; nevertheless, two men working for the contractor had threatened to remove the bamboo from her spot. "My customers meet me here," she said. "I am not insisting on going back onto the dangerous strip. But the safe corner where I lay out my work every day is called an encroachment, all of it, without anyone taking its measurements." She spread the dimensions of the mats she had woven and receipts from three customers across the table.

Tara arrived just then, returning from an inspection at Binout. She explained that the strip carrying the red warning and Hiravati's weaving place fell within two different sets of measurements. "I do not have the documents establishing rights over this rear part of the market," she said, "but we can ask the office what measurement is the basis for calling it dangerous." Hiravati had her name entered, with the condition that her customers' private home addresses would not be attached. Tara pronounced no decision. Instead, she had Hiravati's right to be present at the next inspection put in writing, and added a demand that the time she spent there should be paid for.

At noon came three beats of a dholak. Hari Natuwa arrived with his son Anshu. The cover of Anshu's exercise book had come loose, and Hari was fixing a thin strip of leather over its torn edge. "They have offered me two extra songs at the evening fair," he said. "The pay is good, but Anshu has practice at school the day after his examination." "Babu, do not give up your work," Anshu said. "My exercise book will keep its place." "Your examination must have a place inside me too," Hari replied, "not only inside your head."

"So what will you do?" Ruhani asked. Hari unfolded a small paper from his bag. The organiser's advance-payment slip specified a performance lasting the whole night. "I shall play for the first two hours, and let another adult performer take the later part," he said. "I shall not receive the full night's fee. I shall buy Anshu's books with what remains, but I shall not sell his night to pay for them." Rukhsana paid him separately for the food and did not enter the artist's labour as a donation in the shelter's register.

Anshu opened his exercise book and read aloud, "Look at the clock; learn to recognise time." "Then ask me at what hour my performance is to end," Hari said. "First you learn to tell the time," the boy retorted. Everyone burst out laughing. Hiravati picked up a slender strip of bamboo and fastened the cover of Anshu's book with it. "There is no charge for this," she said, "because it is a gift I give of my own free will. But that does not mean the next mat will be free." Anshu nodded solemnly.

Javed Qalandar arrived carrying a poster advertising the evening performance. Across the top were printed the words: 'The Animal Wonders of the Madari'. Javed folded the paper and laid it before Ruhani. "This time I have no animal with me," he said. "It was not easy for me to decide to give up the work I once did. To earn my living, I have made a new act out of the puppeteer's strings, shadows and my own voice." The organiser wanted to draw a crowd with the name of the old spectacle. Javed was asking for the new name of his art to replace that false advertisement.

He took two slender pieces of bamboo, a little cloth screen and a brass bell from his bag. Anshu sat on the other side of the screen. Javed moved his hand; from shadows rising and falling across the cloth there emerged the likeness of a bird in flight. Then the bird suddenly escaped from its own shadow—nothing remained but the empty screen. The child clapped. "Let the audience have the chance to understand what they are seeing," Javed said. "There can still be wonder; there is no need to keep a living creature captive."

"If there is no animal, fewer tickets will be sold," one of the organisers said. Javed did not smile. "Let fewer be sold, but let the advertisement tell no lies. And the artist must be paid for the design of the screen that has been made." Hari took him aside. "The last ten minutes of your act could fit into the space I leave after my two hours." Together they made a new, shorter programme, writing down their respective shares of the payment. This was no guarantee of success, but it was the first definite contract Javed had secured since abandoning his former livelihood.

Chandra Badi stepped forward from the back of the crowd, carrying her box of ankle bells. Seeing her name, the young man who printed the posters asked without thinking, "Women of your caste always dance, don't they?" Chandra put the box down on the floor. "I sing as well, and teach rhythm. And when I do not wish to dance, I do not dance," she said clearly. "My body will not step onto a stage at the command of your caste register." The young man tried to laugh off his remark, but Rukhsana asked him, "Why ask Chandra a question you would not ask a male artist?"

Chandra opened the box. Beside the ankle bells lay pages of songs written by hand and an earlier organiser's receipt for an unpaid balance. "I have the right to dance, and the right to say no," she said. "If I go onstage, I shall be introduced as I choose: 'Chandra Badi—Singer and Teacher of Rhythm.' Photographs, videos and the songs themselves require separate permission. And I will not sign another contract for a full night until the old arrears are cleared." The young man pencilled the new description into an empty corner of the poster. Chandra looked at it. "Not in pencil. Change the printing. People's eyes will not see a correction made in pencil."

Hearing of the performance, an employee of the municipal office came to the shelter with an application for temporary assistance with the building. "We need a single list of everyone who lives here, together with the holders of the keys," he said. "Then it will be easier to certify the relief." Ruhani invited him to sit down, but did not hand him the page. "We shall tell you who holds the keys needed for fire and water safety," she said. "But the keys to private rooms and the personal histories of the residents are not part of a public relief list."

"Then what if someone goes missing?" the employee asked. Naira had arrived meanwhile to help Hiravati read her application. She answered, "If an actual complaint about a missing person is made, there is a separate procedure and investigation. Treating every resident as the record of a potential crime cannot take the place of that procedure." She stated plainly that her government contract remained suspended: she was helping people read their papers, not issuing official orders. The employee claimed that the shelter's address had appeared in an old wage register for work on the gate.

Tara asked for a copy of the old register. The name of the same lane was indeed there, but the date preceded the hospital repairs. That line of the address showed a place to which materials had been delivered, not anyone's overnight residence. The original signature attached to the name written above it and the wage receipt were not available. "The same lane does not establish that the same person lived there," Naira said. "At present all I can insist on is that the names of the shelter's current residents not be linked to this old entry." No name belonging to an unidentified resident from the meeting was sent to the file concerning the actual search for Mithun.

The employee was displeased, but Rukhsana showed him the clearly marked inspection list for fire and water safety and the measurements of the rooms used in common. Individual private addresses remained outside the list. Instead of issuing a receipt, he agreed to request a copy of the original conditions governing the building. "I cannot decide the relief here," he said. "Then write 'Decision pending,'" Ruhani replied, "not 'Failure to cooperate.'" The employee's pen hesitated. At last, on the margin of the receipt, he wrote: 'Basis for requiring additional private details under examination.'

Hiravati sewed a strap onto Manjari's torn bag, and in return Manjari tied the loose threads along the edge of Hiravati's mat. Neither burdened the other with unpaid work: they wrote the value of the small exchange on their respective pages. Chandra sat there reading the wording of the new poster. "I shall sing," she said, "but there must be no verse in this programme that makes a woman's body an object of ridicule." Hari changed one line of a song. Javed took the bell from Anshu's hand and swung it himself. For a moment the courtyard became a genuine school of artists.

The next morning Hiravati went to the market's rear courtyard. Deep footprints marked the place where the bamboo had been taken away during the night. She had brought her bundles of goods, but her former right to sit and work there had not returned of itself. The office had given her a date for the hearing on the measurements. "Today I shall spread out a little work on this safe side," she told another craftswoman. "Everyone should attend on the day of the hearing, and bring an account of the earnings they have lost." There was no declaration of victory in the decision. It was a refusal to allow her labour to disappear without a voice.

Ruhani did not go to inspect Manjari's prospective room. Manjari went herself with her friend; Champa, when asked, merely read through a copy of the rental terms. They discovered that the water charge had not been written down. Manjari asked the landlord and had it added to the copy. The advance was not reduced, but a separate estimated monthly water charge was recorded. Her departure on Monday was settled. Her cot at the shelter was not immediately allotted to someone else: first there would have to be a list of needs, a schedule for repairing the room, and a date for replacing the cot.

On the first day of Champa's leave, three slips giving the times of her mother's medicines were handed to her sister. "If you like, I can accompany you as far as the path to the ghat," Ruhani offered. Champa smiled. "No. On these two days of leave, I shall choose my own way." She picked up her small cloth bag and went out. The elderly woman sitting on the cot said, "There is no greater paper of permission than a mother." Everyone laughed. In Champa's eyes there shone, after many days, a clear line of time kept for herself.

After noon Ruhani, Rukhsana and Zubaida tested the new keys to the gate. The main lock turned easily; the separate storeroom key would not fit it. The two elected members acknowledged in writing their copies and the limits of their responsibilities. They established a rule requiring two witnesses in an emergency, a record of the necessary action, and notification afterwards; where life was in immediate danger, rescue must come first, and the account of it later. This arrangement gave no one a right of routine entry into private rooms without consent. Ruhani's old special authority diminished, with the change duly recorded; some of her own weariness diminished as well.

That evening Hari gave his shortened performance. Anshu listened to the first song with his book open, then went home with Maina. Children applauded Javed's shadow-bird; no one looked for a real animal. Before her first song Chandra spoke into the microphone. "Listen to my name and my work as they are printed on the poster. I shall take a rest between songs whenever I wish." Some in the audience grew impatient, but once the singing began they found the rhythm. All four artists received the agreed first instalment. A date was written down for the remaining payment, which had not yet been received. From that first instalment Hari bought Anshu's practice book for the following month. Looking at the child's name on the cover, he said, "I ought to make this calculation before every performance."

Returning to the shelter that night, Ruhani saw the little windmill turning silently this time. Manjari sat on her cot, writing down the measurements of the window in her new room: a curtain would have to be sewn. Closing the food ledger, Rukhsana said, "Today the gate was opened twice while you were away." Zubaida replied, "Both times were recorded: once for work at the tap, and once to bring medicines." Ruhani laughed. "Once this house used to wait for me to return. Today its people are learning to wait for one another."

An empty cup had been left on the bench outside. Ruhani was lifting it to be washed when Manjari said, "That is mine. I shall take it to my next home." Ruhani placed the cup in her hands. "Of course you must take it," she said.

Manjari studied the fine crack inside it, as though some uncertainty about the life ahead could be glimpsed in so small a thing. Then she wrapped it in cloth and put it in her bag. The lamp in the lane beyond the gate came on; no one had needed to place the key to a private room in somebody else's hand.

Chapter 54 · Ritual Without a Presiding Authority

At dawn, outside the shelter's storeroom, a length of barbed wire caught in Rukhsana's sari. She was unloading sacks. The rice left over after the performers' programme the previous day was to be used in today's communal kitchen. But a new sign had been erected before the door: 'Relief Distribution: Approval of the Chief Coordinator Mandatory.' Beneath it, the space for a name was blank. Ruhani stopped, turning the key in her hand. "We decided nothing of the kind yesterday," she said. "Who is this chief coordinator?"

Keeping hold of the sack, Rukhsana answered, "Before writing down anyone's name, ask whether this is relief rice, rice received in payment for artisans' labour, or rice donated to feed the children. Whoever made that sign has put all three in the same bin." One was temporary municipal assistance; another, grain purchased from the market; the third, people's voluntary contributions. Instead of tearing down the sign, Ruhani leaned it against the wall. "Let whoever wants this order come forward and explain why," she said.

Dulari Rajwar was the first to arrive. In her hand was a thin ration bag containing two handfuls of gram and an old debt slip. The office distributor had told her the previous day that, if she wanted the next instalment of relief, she must first agree to relinquish her claim concerning an old cooperative loan balance. Dulari laid a finger upon the slip's right-hand corner. "The dispute over the paddy loan is one thing," she asked. "How has the grain meant for a hungry child become security for that debt?" Rukhsana let her set the bag on a low stool, but would not write 'debt forgiven' before reading the slip.

Just then Gurmeet Kaur dismounted from her bicycle. The previous evening she had collected two boxes of donated utensils and some cash for the communal kitchen. The donors wanted plaques bearing their names attached to the utensils. Gurmeet opened two pages of accounts: the objects received in the boxes, the municipal grant, and the actual payments made to the performers. "Putting a name on something does not make a donation transparent," she said. "Everyone must be able to see how much came in, how much was spent, and on whose decision it was spent." There was little reproach in her voice, but a great deal of resolve.

Before noon the following day, Durga Danuwar arrived from the forest's edge. Short lengths of bamboo were tied to her bicycle. A handrail for children was to be made at the right-hand corner of the temporary path near the gate. A member of the panchayat had said that work could proceed if the names of the families bringing bamboo from the forest were registered; yet neither the amount that might be cut nor the route to be used had been settled. Durga said, "I do not call the forest the courtyard of my house. But I know how many years this footpath has been in use. Let the paper say how much bamboo may be taken, from where, and for how long. Do not merely write down the people of my community as ‘forest cutters.’”

Madhuri Dangi entered the kitchen with her daughter. The girl had tied a scarf about her waist and was sorting makhana, fox nuts. Madhuri had brought a proposal for cooperative food production: flattened rice, roasted makhana and dried greens to be supplied to the school and the relief team. On the first page she had written the prices; on the second, the shares due to the women who would do the work. Rukhsana noticed that the male supplier’s transport charge had been included, while the hours spent by the women carefully sorting and drying the greens were called ‘domestic assistance.’ Madhuri crossed those words out with her pen. “When work done at home is sold in the market,” she said, “that work has a price.”

Four kinds of paper had gathered in a single little courtyard: relief grain, public donations, the bamboo path and food production. A municipal employee said, “If there is one chief coordinator, decisions will be easier.” Ruhani answered, “In an emergency, there may be one person to telephone about safety. But what is owed for food, permission to use the forest, and rights concerning a debt cannot all be altered by that one person’s signature.” The employee was offended. Gurmeet said, “We are concerned not with the title of a chairperson, but with the limits of that person’s signature.”

Long before this, at Udayana’s place of study in Mithila, a sheet had likewise lain unfilled. That age was not the same as the age of modern Videhapur. There a visiting Mīmāṃsaka returned at dawn, carrying the copy of his opposing argument that he had written during the night. In the courtyard there was no sacrificial wood, only palm-leaf manuscripts, a water vessel and two earthen seats. Before taking his place opposite the visitor, Udayana told his pupils, “Today we shall hear, not the answer, but first the objection in its strongest form. If we blunt the edge of a question before answering it, the sharpness of our answer will itself be lost.”

The Mīmāṃsaka unfolded his page. “I am not saying that a sacrifice takes place without human beings,” he said. “There is a sacrificer, there are officiating priests, the recitation of mantras and a prescribed sequence of acts. The question is why, for the religious fruit of these acts and the authority of the injunction that commands them, we must posit an additional, omniscient presiding being. The injunction makes its meaning known through its own prescription; it is possible to speak of apūrva, the unseen potency generated by an act, or of adṛṣṭa, the unseen factor, to account for its later fruit. If an individual will is required behind every act of understanding, what becomes of the authorless authority of Vedic speech?”

Udayana listened attentively. A pupil sprang up at once. “If apūrva is unseen, his doctrine is worthless.” Udayana stopped him with a gesture. “We forbade precisely this sort of reply yesterday,” he said. “Our own Nyāya tradition also discusses the unseen. The issue is not the existence of a word called adṛṣṭa, but whether what it explains is sufficient. Our guest says that no further conscious governor is needed for the operation of the injunctions governing action. Now examine the grounds of that objection.”

The visitor leaned back. “There is more,” he said. “If you ground trust in Vedic speech upon an omniscient speaker, by what independent evidence will you establish that speaker’s omniscience? And if you identify the speaker through the Veda itself, is this not mutual dependence? If statements of injunction are held to have been preserved in a beginningless tradition, why must we search for a first teacher at every imagined beginning?” Udayana had the three questions written on separate lines: authority, the ordering of consequences, and the renewed transmission of tradition.

The pupil Somesh brought an old metal bell. “The bell does not ring of its own accord,” he said. “There must be someone to ring it; therefore a sacrifice must have God as its presiding authority.” The Mīmāṃsaka placed the bell back in his hand. “In your illustration the action of the hand is visible; my question concerns the distant fruit of a religious injunction,” he said. “To turn an example into proof without understanding its limits diminishes reasoning.” “The courage to correct a false analogy is the first reward of philosophical disputation,” he added.

Without quoting a verse, Udayana stated the first principle of his response. “I object to the view that, as soon as knowledge arises, its truth must in every case be regarded as automatically beyond dispute. The signs by which error is distinguished from truth have to be examined. In the case of trustworthy testimony, the speaker’s competence, the absence of defects, and the relation to other means of knowledge matter.” The visitor immediately asked, “If the test rests entirely upon external grounds, where is the first trustworthy ground to come from? And does every human being, before acting upon something heard, undertake a complete inquiry into the speaker’s character?”

Udayana did not laugh. “Ordinary life does not proceed by reading an entire treatise on verification before every act,” he answered. “But when dispute arises, Nyāya asks what can support the validity of knowledge. Your proposal of intrinsic validity offers one way of securing a stable meaning; our account of validity established through external conditions opens the way to judging defects. This difference of opinion by itself has not yet established God. My larger claim requires further reasoning.” Beside the answer, the pupil acting as scribe wrote plainly: ‘Incomplete.’

Turning to the second question, Udayana said, “If we accept the creation and dissolution of the world, it becomes reasonable to ask how the tradition of knowledge could be set in motion at a new beginning. Merely assuming an unbroken human succession of teachers and pupils is not enough when the continuity of that very succession is disputed. At this point our position argues for the necessity of an omniscient teacher." The Mīmāṃsaka smiled. "But you cannot impose upon me your own accepted conception of creation and dissolution. You must first refute our account of beginningless human practice and the eternal relation between word and meaning."

In a voice of assent Udayana said, "Very well. Your premises concerning the world differ from mine. Until the intervening lines of reasoning have been tested, my conclusion remains a disputable doctrine, not a command binding upon everyone." He had the pupils record these words as 'the dialogue of today's disputation,' not as authenticated lines from anyone's original treatise. On his own page the visitor wrote: 'The question remains unobstructed; the answer awaits examination.'

In Videhapur, the sacks of rice had still not been opened by midday. But the children were hungry. Rukhsana said, "It would be no justice either to leave children hungry until the dispute over the accounts is settled." Gurmeet lifted the lid of a box and showed that the bag containing municipal aid had been tied separately. Dulari's old debt slip was not in that bag. They decided that the day's meals could not be withheld from children whose school attendance was verified, or from residents with medical needs. Two members would record what was received; the cost would subsequently be entered in the public ledger. No one's private debt would find its way into that line of the accounts.

Dulari telephoned the distributor standing near the gate. The voice from the other end was loud: "Sign the paper relinquishing your loan claim, and you will get tomorrow's rice." Dulari replied, "I will accept today's relief, and I will request a separate hearing on the loan account. Strike out the sentence about surrendering a claim in return for rations and give me a new copy." The distributor said, "Then distribution may be stopped." Gurmeet did not take the telephone from Dulari's hand; with Dulari's permission, she wrote down the date of the statement she had heard. Rukhsana set aside some of the rice she herself had bought for the children's meal, so that the dispute over Dulari's entitlement would not be concealed beneath a private donation.

Durga Danuwar brought two members of the forest panchayat to the site. Seeing the pile of bamboo, one member said, "The same rule applies to everything that comes out of anyone's forest." Durga showed him the narrow corner of the gate. "These four poles are left from an earlier cutting site; we need four new ones. I shall write down where the new bamboo will be cut, the quantity, and the time for replanting. But I will not agree that the panchayat should bar the people who bring the bamboo from entering, and put all the work in a contractor's name." Tara made it clear that a safety handrail required not only the proper thickness of bamboo but tests of its fastenings and the weight it could bear.

An elderly member of the panchayat said, “We respect your knowledge of the forest, but the risk on a public path is ours to bear as well.” Durga laid a pole along the ground. “Then your name will appear in the decision, and the name of my work will appear too,” she said. They measured twice. The panchayat gave temporary permission to use a limited number of the old bamboo poles; a day was fixed for marking the limits of new cutting on a map. Tara warned that this permission was not full safety certification for the gate. Seeing the written date, Durga breathed out softly: the payment for the work had been fixed that day, but the larger question of forest rights remained open.

Madhuri Dangi’s daughter Ananya sat with a plate of dried greens. “Mother, shall I write my name or everyone’s?” she asked. Madhuri said, “The names of those who did the work.” Three women had sorted makhana in the kitchen; a man had carried a sack from the market. The old slip recorded his transport charge, but the women’s time was entered as zero. Madhuri made all four enter their hours separately. One woman said, “I got up in the middle to breastfeed my child.” Madhuri answered, “Then we shall record less working time for you, but not none at all.”

Rukhsana, Gurmeet and Durga were called to taste a sample of the communal meal. There was too much salt in the makhana; Ananya stuck out her tongue and asked for water. Everyone laughed. Madhuri acknowledged the fault in the sample she had prepared, but would not let it become a judgement against the women’s skills. “We shall change the measure in the next batch,” she said. “The contract must state who bears the cost of a defective sample. Workers who followed the instructions will not have their wages cut in the name of recovering that loss.” Rukhsana placed an order for a small trial batch; the larger purchase remained dependent upon a later inspection.

Gurmeet’s donation register was laid before the meeting. One donor wanted his institution’s name on the food plates, but had also verbally stipulated that the kitchen workers’ wages be reduced from the money he had given. Gurmeet wrote to him: the accounts for donations and wages would not be mixed; a public acknowledgement was possible, but no donor could unilaterally alter what workers were owed. His reply had not yet arrived. The disputed money was not shown as spent.

The employee asked once more, “Then who is in charge of all this work?” Ruhani picked up the sign outside the storeroom again. “Two people will be responsible for the emergency alarm. Rukhsana’s team will be responsible for food safety, Gurmeet for the grant accounts, Tara and Durga together for inspecting the bamboo site. Dulari will pursue the debt claim in her own name. Everyone’s rights will not disappear into a single order.” In place of ‘Chief Coordinator,’ she wrote on the sign: ‘Work Accounts and Contact List.’ The municipal employee said, “That is not regular authorisation.” Ruhani answered, “I shall put that in writing too.”

When Naira arrived with a copy of the old wage register, Dulari showed her the debt slip. On one line were written the words ‘Voluntarily relinquished entitlement’; nowhere was Dulari’s signature to be found. The employee said that, had her name been entered on the blank line, distribution of relief would have been easier. Naira recorded the date of the copy, the page number and the source from which it had been obtained. “This establishes that the sentence exists,” she said, “but it is no evidence of Dulari’s consent. Her consent cannot simply be presumed. If there is written authority for stopping distribution, ask for a copy.” Dulari wrote her name on the slip requesting a hearing, not on the paper relinquishing the debt claim.

Meanwhile, Naira examined another document. On the back of the leaflet that had spread the child-abduction rumour, someone had written the number of a relief vehicle. Someone said that a former worker at the gate had also travelled in a vehicle bearing that number. Naira compared the two lists. The first number appeared on the vehicle receipt for a day of relief distribution; the second contained identical digits in an older register, but the digit giving the year had been torn away. “Matching digits do not establish that it was the same vehicle, the same passenger, or the same crime,” she said. The original receipt and the time of the actual complaint were requested. Without evidence, no driver, labourer or shelter resident was given a new name of suspicion.

That afternoon the argument resumed at the ancient place of study in Mithila. Somesh, the pupil, asked, “Master, if an omniscient governor is necessary, who bears the blame for people’s wrongful deeds?” The visiting Mīmāṃsaka added his own point to the question. “Responsibility for an act must rest with the person who performs what is enjoined. To posit a divine arbiter cannot mean that human wrongdoing is wiped away.” Udayana agreed that human duties and responsibility for observable causes must not be set aside. Yet he did not abandon his Nyāya position. “My claim,” he said, “is not that God performs every act of practical life. The question concerns the ultimate ground of the order of the world and the authority of religious speech.”

The visitor replied, “Then you must demonstrate it clearly. Merely calling something ‘the ultimate ground’ does not furnish proof.” Udayana told his pupil that the next day there would be a separate examination of whether Vedic statements possess validity intrinsically or through external conditions, and that the premises of the inference in favour of creation and dissolution would be set down. He cherished his answer; nevertheless, he returned the visitor’s copy without erasing a single line of the three questions. The two positions remained in different hands upon the palm leaf. Before the lamp went out, one dispute had been made clear; no one name had been granted the sole right to decide its resolution.

Evening was falling over the kitchen in Videhapur. Dulari's family received their meal that day; the old loan dispute was not over. Durga's four remaining bamboo poles were measured and stored in a safe place; permission for new cutting was not yet settled. Madhuri's sample was prepared again with less salt; the price of the first trial batch was entered alongside the names of all the workers. Gurmeet left the space for an acknowledgement blank beside the disputed donation. No one filled the empty line and thereby became everyone's master.

As they washed the pots, Rukhsana said to Ruhani, "Today the food was saved, but the papers have multiplied." Ruhani laughed. "Paper does not satisfy hunger. Yet how often, without paper, has someone been kept hungry while the accounts were settled in somebody else's name?" "Next time I shall measure the salt," Rukhsana said. Madhuri showed her the empty corner of her ledger. "And write down your own time as well," she said.

As she left, Naira read the new sign outside the storeroom. In small letters along its bottom line were the words: 'Record separately what is owed to those who work, and their right to refuse.' She closed the pages of her investigation. In her notebook was the date of her next appointment to take the real testimony of the missing child's mother. That mother's story could not be written from the day's rumour-filled leaflet. At the door Ruhani turned her key; no one's private room was opened inside, and outside the kitchen fire went out at its appointed hour.

Chapter 55 · The Missing Child’s Mother

At dawn, Lata took three tickets from a pouch of old clothes and spread them beside the hearth. One bore a station stamp; on another, the figure for the fare had run with sweat; only half the third remained. She smoothed it with her fingernail. Never before Mithun disappeared had so many scraps of paper gathered in their house. On the first page of her notebook was written: ‘Last seen at the market.’ On the second: ‘Time the report was made.’ The pages between were not blank, but no one had reckoned the hours spent searching or what that search had cost.

When Naira arrived, Lata banked the fire in the hearth. “Must I tell again what I told you yesterday?” she asked. Before taking a seat, Naira said, “Only if you wish. I have a copy of your first statement. I have come not to make you repeat it, but to fill in, in your own words, what was left out of those lines.” For a while Lata watched the pen in Naira’s hand. “Then write that I have missed three days of work to look for him. The time since my child went missing and the time in which the food in my house has dwindled are not the same thing. But both are true.”

Lata’s younger brother, who had gone into the oil shop and come out to find Mithun gone, stood beside a pillar of the veranda. His eyes were red, as though he had not slept all night. “It was my fault,” he said. “If I had turned at the door and looked sooner—” Lata stopped him before he could finish. “We shall reckon faults later. Tell us how many times you searched near the shop and whom you asked. Do not put down as something you saw what you did not see.” Her brother described the two routes he had retraced. Naira recorded his statement on a separate sheet from Lata’s; she did not merge their words into one account.

Lata took out the old missing-child notice. It already described eight-year-old Mithun’s blue kurta, the red scarf whose dye ran, and the broken strap of his left sandal. “People hear about the sandal and have shown me five different sandals,” she said. “At the sight of each one my breath quickens. Then I see that its strap is whole. How am I to explain it all by sending photograph after photograph?” Naira replied that these identifying particulars would be kept with the help desk and authorised search teams. The public leaflet would not contain the family’s full address, her brother’s name, or a collection of every misleading image. Lata agreed to those limits.

“I want the dates and times set in order,” Lata said. With a piece of chalk she drew four lines on the earth of the courtyard. The first stood for the market; the second, the search from the oil shop to the station; the third, the report at the police outpost; the fourth, the distant bus stand. Opening her notebook, Naira said, “The time you left the market is an estimate. The time stamped on the acknowledgement at the outpost is certain. We shall check the hours spent searching between them against the testimony.” “If the hour is uncertain, does that make my running about a lie?” Lata asked. “No,” said

Naira. “To call something an estimate is not to call it false. It is to make its limits clear.”

For the midday meal Rukhsana had ordered vegetables from the Rain market. Two members of Lata’s household had been added temporarily to the children’s meal list at the communal kitchen. Rukhsana came herself to fetch Lata, but, seeing the tickets by the hearth, asked, “Have they counted the bus fares too?” Lata did not smile. “The first day I went to four places on foot. On the second, the money I paid in fares could have bought oil for the house.” Rukhsana did not enter Lata’s expenses in her own ledger. “My kitchen register is for meals. If we hide what you have spent on the search inside it, tomorrow somebody will say you received every kind of assistance.”

At the kitchen Bhola Yadav stood with two cans of milk. His old credit slip accounted for four days’ milk, but the relief ledger acknowledged delivery on only two days. “If the milk is now to be given to the search team’s families,” the distributor told him, “put it down under relief.” Tightening the lids of the cans, Bhola said, “Record who actually received my milk. Did the people whose names bear the charge receive any? Last time two households went home without milk while the donors went on posing for photographs.” The distributor accused him of making a scene before the crowd. Bhola laid his payment slip on the table; he did not take away the cans.

Lata had arrived and was listening silently. Someone murmured that among those to whom Bhola had not given milk were also people “under suspicion.” Bhola turned at once. “Those households went without milk because their names were missing from the distribution list. I am not connecting that omission to the child-abduction rumour. You must not connect them either.” Naira examined the register. The line acknowledging receipt bore the distributor’s signature, not that of the child’s family. “Have the two recorded days of delivery verified,” she said, “and put in writing a proposal for immediate payment of what is owed for the other two.” Lata whispered, “When a name is entered wrongly, even a meal is lost.”

Bhola did not speak of his own household all at once. A little later his daughter came to wash the measuring vessels. “Babu,” she asked, “if someone asks me for rice, must I look at a slip first?” Bhola said, “Give a thirsty or hungry person water first. But do not forget who was meant to pay, or who did pay.” He told his daughter to put away the empty vessels and looked towards Lata. “I will not make you feel small by announcing, as an act of kindness, that I shall charge nothing for your household’s milk while Mithun is being sought. Whatever help I give, I shall give in my own name. What remains a debt will remain in the accounts.” For the first time Lata thanked him directly.

Outside the market, Poonam Chidimar was stitching a new border onto an old jute cover. She had received an order for the cover because the communal kitchen’s rice sacks got wet whenever it rained. A volunteer saw her old family name and asked eagerly, “Your family used to catch birds, did they not? Then perhaps you know something about the old wandering people who took children away from markets." Poonam pushed the point of her needle into the cloth. "I can tell you the story of my family's former livelihood. But I cannot attach to the search for this child a thing I have not seen."

She showed them two pages concerning her work. On the first she had written, from her own recollection, what her grandmother had told her about the old methods of catching birds, the seasonal paths they followed, and why the family had abandoned that occupation. On the second were the measurements of four covers made that day, the cost of the thread and the wages due to her. "Keep the first page as memory," Poonam said. "The second is my livelihood today. If you read my name and start looking for someone to blame for a vanished child, you will have read both pages wrongly." The volunteer lowered his head in embarrassment. With Poonam's permission Naira recorded the receipt for the work she now did; the family memories remained in Poonam's private notebook.

Watching Poonam sew, Lata suddenly asked, "There was red thread like that in Mithun's scarf. Have you seen—" She left the question unfinished. Poonam held up the border she had sewn. "There is red thread in countless scarves. If you wish, I can tell you how to stop the colour from running. But do not ask me, on the strength of this thread, about a child I am supposed to have met." Lata let the unfinished sentence lie and began watching the sewing. Poonam taught her how to separate two strands of thread. For a little while they were both occupied with the ordinary work of cloth, outside the language of a missing child and a wrongful accusation.

At the municipal help desk the old rumour-laden leaflet appeared once again. This time someone had written a new time on its reverse beside the number of a relief vehicle. "Look," cried a volunteer, delighted. "Now the time matches! This vehicle was near Mithun that day." Lata reached to take the leaflet, then checked her hand. "Whose eyes witnessed that time?" she asked. "Someone said it over the telephone," came the reply. Lata set the leaflet down again. "Without the caller's name, the time of the call, and the place of an actual sighting, you will send me wandering down a false road for another day." For the first time, the help desk entered those words of hers in its minutes.

Naira laid a copy of the original vehicle receipt on the table. The date of distribution was clear, but the box for the vehicle's return time stood empty. In the old register of wages for work at the gate there was a similar sequence of digits, but the year was incomplete. "These papers do not prove the two vehicles were the same," Naira said. "And even if it was the same vehicle, who travelled in it and whether the child was present would remain separate questions." "Then do not send a search team on the strength of this new time," Lata said firmly. The help-desk employee marked the new leaflet 'Unverified information' and suspended its public circulation pending independent confirmation. The existing plan to search the actual market-to-station route remained in force.

Behind that office Arun Barnwal arrived carrying a large, brightly coloured banner from his shop. In his family's name it announced a 'Child Assistance Fund.' An employee told him, "Just give the kitchen supplies. The papers concerning the old tax dues can be dealt with later." Arun's younger brother, who had come with him, silently opened the account book. The tax arrears on earlier business and the interest for late payment lay there before them. Folding the banner, Arun asked, "Will advertising this fund count as payment of my taxes?" The employee tried to evade the question. "Public service looks good."

Arun answered, "Public obligations are not cancelled in the name of public service. Whatever tax my shop owes, I shall pay against an official receipt. If I give to the search for the child, I shall give under a separate receipt, on condition that my name is not printed." "Then the money spent printing the banner is wasted," said his younger brother. Arun looked at him. "That was the cost of my mistake in advertising. Do not turn it into a relief expense." He went to the designated payment window and obtained an acknowledgement of his payment. He returned having separately recorded the question of an old tax assessment that was to be examined some days later. The enormous banner meant for the outside of his shop was folded and put away in a room.

Madan Raut arrived with the kitchen vehicle, and Arun and Lata met in the same doorway. Madan explained that a patient needed a seat to be taken for medicines, so the search team could not have the vehicle at that hour. A young man said to Arun, "If the vehicle from your donation fund runs, the child can be found sooner." Arun answered plainly, "No vehicle has yet been booked in the name of my fund. If I pay a fare, the receipt will show the real passengers and the real purpose. I will not stop a patient's journey and race after an abduction rumour." Lata, listening, said, "My search is not false either. But blocking a patient's road does not enlarge my right to search."

Rukhsana was calculating the cost of the day's meals. There were separate entries for leaf plates, oil, rice, greens, and the workers' hours. One of two baskets of vegetables had rotted after being caught in the rain. The market seller was unwilling to take the goods back. "The cost of today's food is not merely the rice that reaches a plate," Rukhsana said. "We must count what was spoiled, the transport paid to the person who carried it, and the hours of the person who cooked. But we shall not ask Lata's family for a single coin if the relief team pays for those meals separately." Gurmeet showed her the remaining grain already approved under the grant. The source of the rest of the money had yet to be settled.

"Rukhsana didi," a volunteer said, "a child is missing. This is no time for bargaining over prices." Rukhsana laid her ladle on the table. "I want Lata's son found as much as anyone. But if we cook free of charge day after day in the name of the search, who will put food in the homes of the women working at this hearth? Today we shall cook with the relief grain already approved. For tomorrow, we shall decide how many plates to make according to the contract we actually have." Lata stepped forward. "Do not cut anybody's payment in the name of my sorrow," she said. "You need not conceal the costs from me in order to keep me grateful."

In the afternoon, the help desk reopened the account of Lata's days of searching. Her notebook recorded two rounds on foot on the first day; three bus fares on the second; a day away from work, spent at the outpost and help desk, on the third; and enquiries at the station on the fourth. A volunteer wanted to add everything together and announce one large figure. Lata stopped him. "For tickets that have survived, put down their actual fares. For the walking, record the time, not imaginary transport costs. Call the wages I lost an 'estimate of loss,' not money received." Naira made three separate columns: expenses supported by receipts, time based on statements, and estimated earnings forgone. For the first time the paper showed Lata the full extent of her search.

Suddenly Lata asked, "Do the hours before I made the first complaint count for less?" "No," Naira said. "But the basis of verification is different. We shall take your brother's account, the oil seller's confirmation, and the time of the station report one by one." The help-desk employee took the seller's contact details and sent a message. Over the telephone the seller could confirm only that Lata's brother had come into the shop to buy oil. He could not reliably remember where Mithun had been at that moment. Naira entered that incomplete account as supplementary testimony, not decisive evidence. Lata was disappointed at first, then said, "Write down as much as he knows. I shall go on looking for the rest."

At the market Poonam arrived to deliver her newly made covers. Bhola stood there with the account of the milk still owing to him. Before everyone, the distributor paid a small sum: the price of the two days' milk whose receipt had been checked and confirmed. On the receipt Bhola wrote, 'Payment for the remaining two days under verification.' Before taking away his milk cans, he asked, "Why were some people's names left off the list?" The distributor replied that the municipal office would decide eligibility for relief. "Then that question must go to a separate hearing," Bhola said. He had received part of his money that day, but the inquiry into unequal treatment had not been closed.

Poonam's completed covers were the right size, and Rukhsana's team accepted her first consignment. Poonam had 'Sewing covers for sacks' written on the receipt. "You will not put down the old bird-catcher's name?" the volunteer asked again with a laugh. This time Poonam smiled. "My name will remain mine, and the work will be the work I do today. When I tell the story of the older work, listen carefully then." She thought of using her payment to buy pencils for her little girl's school, but did not yet enter that future purchase in her buying ledger. Looking at the tiny bell on Poonam's needle box, Lata said, "Mithun used to come running when he heard a sound like that." Poonam covered the bell with her hand. For a little while neither spoke.

Before evening Lata returned home from the market. Her brother was sweeping the courtyard. She noticed that one ear of Mithun's little clay horse had broken. As a small child he had painted it himself: blue in front, green behind, with no proper boundary between the colours. Without thinking, Lata laughed. She remembered Mithun making the horse gallop and saying, "This horse won't wear sandals, so its strap will never break." At the time she had laughed too as she gave him water to drink. Now the memory brought a laugh that lasted only half a moment before silence returned. "Shall I put this toy away safely?" her brother asked. "It belongs to my courtyard," Lata said. "It is not an object for the investigation."

Someone called from outside that a scrap of red cloth had been found beside the river. Her brother rose to run. For a few moments Lata looked at the plate inside the house and the clay horse. Then she went to the door. "Where? Who saw it? Who has the cloth?" she asked. The person bringing the message had no clear answer. Lata did not scold him. "If it is genuine information, take the place and time to the help desk. I shall not spend another whole night running about the riverbank on the strength of nothing definite," she said. She sent her brother with the messenger and remained at home, waiting for the telephone to ring.

Naira returned to the help desk and submitted Lata's revised account. It recorded the actual sequence of the four days of searching, the surviving tickets, her brother's separate statement, and the oil seller's limited confirmation. The attempt to attach a new time to an old rumour leaflet and turn it into an allegation of crime had been stopped in writing. The original register of twenty-seven names remained in Sarita's care; Tara was examining the water-lease land documents separately. No new suspect's name was entered in Mithun's file on the strength of either. The help-desk employee agreed to give Lata a written list of contacts at the station and market for the next day of searching.

That night, as she turned the pots upside down to dry, Rukhsana told Gurmeet, "Today's meal costs were covered. Tomorrow is uncertain." "Arun has paid his tax dues," Gurmeet said. "That does not automatically clear the kitchen's debts." Rukhsana entered only as many plates for tomorrow as the approved supplies would cover. Madan had left a separate slip for the vehicle used to carry a patient's medicines. Devvrat's name appeared on the page for that medical assistance, but no instruction had been accepted that would halt an inquiry into treatment in the name of someone's donation. Rukhsana folded the page and put it aside.

That night Lata filled Mithun's plate with rice again, without having washed it, but she did not place it at the door. She put the little clay horse carefully on a high shelf, where a gust of wind could not break what remained of its ear. Her brother returned to say that the report from the riverbank had not been confirmed. Lata did not blame him. "At dawn we shall follow the route agreed for the station," she said. Then, for the first time in many days, she served herself a bowl of rice. Somewhere outside a drum was beating, and for an instant she remembered Mithun's ungainly dancing. No new sign came after that memory. As she put the first mouthful of rice into her mouth, she slipped the two remaining tickets into a book for the next day's search.

Chapter 56 · Medicine Given in Charity

As the first window of the hospital dispensary opened at dawn, the dew on the glass vials shone white. Before getting down from her cot, Jamuna Devi sat for a little while with her feet planted on the floor. Three months earlier, when they had brought her here, her breathing had been so broken that she could not even answer her daughter Kanchan's questions. Now she could put on her sandals by herself. The happiness contained in that small act appeared in none of the hospital's ledgers.

Kanchan stood by the door with an old cloth bag. Inside were the prescriptions, their tickets for the journey home, and two photographs taken out of the account book. “Ma, why must you go all the way inside again just to say thank you?” her daughter asked. Turning her eyes away from the row of vials, Jamuna said, “You know who paid the fare when the first vehicle took me away. We should remember with affection the people who helped us. But bowing our heads at somebody's door will not alter what is written in the hospital papers.”

She had first been brought to the municipal hospital with a high fever and an infection in her chest. The doctors continued treating her; meanwhile, the costs of tests and medicines at a hospital elsewhere had been added to the bill. Devvrat's relief fund had paid the vehicle fare, the charge for making oxygen available, and some of the medicine bills. When Jamuna thought of how her life had been saved, she thought of the doctors, nurses, driver, and the fund's assistance together. She did not know that any one person alone had saved her. Nor did she make light of the help she had received.

In the courtyard outside the hospital, the second meeting of the communal kitchen's Food and Wages Day was to be held. The accounts would be read aloud: how much grain remained after the previous meal day, whose payments were outstanding, and how food would reach patients' families. Kanchan brought her mother there while Rukhsana was washing a large cooking pot. A thin band of sunlight lay across the damp courtyard. Rukhsana drove the smoke rising all around away not with her ladle but with a fan of straw.

“Jamuna Kaki! You've come on your own feet!” she cried, laughing. “And not carried on anyone's head,” Jamuna replied. “That is what we're celebrating today.” Rukhsana offered her a low stool, but Jamuna would not sit beside the great board bearing the donor's name. “I'll eat outside,” she said. “There's plenty of air here.” Her wish was so ordinary that Kanchan smiled.

Raghu Sahu was taking roasted chickpeas from the hearth of his roasting shop. A volunteer wrote on a slip: ‘Flattened rice, chickpeas and roasting received as donations.’ Raghu held out a roasted grain to show how hot it was. “Put the name of whoever gave the flattened rice under donations,” he said.

“But who donated the wood for my fire, the time spent roasting, and the wages for spreading the grains out twice and filling the baskets again? Has my work become a donation without anyone asking me?” He did not tear up the slip. With a red pen he divided the entry into three parts.

Chandrika Rai arrived then with light, jaggery-sweetened puas. The customers had still not fully returned to her sweet shop. Work in the municipal kitchen provided a real source of income, yet a day's crowd without an agreed price could force her to close her own shop. Unfolding a sheet of paper, Chandrika said, “Not every plate gets a pua of the same price. The patients whose doctors have prescribed a particular diet must not be given jaggery. Pua for children is one thing; rice and porridge are another. Don't enter the grant as though it were my profit.”

Gurmeet Kaur placed three account books before them: purchased provisions, provisions received through grants, and wages together with the vendors' legitimate profit. Chandrika pointed out a shortfall in the previous payment. “They said two hundred plates were prepared, but I supplied seventy puas. Who made the others?” Rukhsana explained that the other team had served flattened rice. “Very well,” Chandrika said. “Then enter my seventy. Put the other team's payment under their own names. Making my receipt larger won't increase the money I am owed.”

Meanwhile, a member of the hospital's medicine-distribution staff came into the courtyard. He carried a copy of a letter from the relief fund. The municipal inspection team was due the following week to examine the medicine stores and the receipts for vehicle hire, but an intermediary of the fund had proposed that the beneficiaries first hold a public meeting of thanks, and the inspection follow afterwards. The employee said hesitantly, “Some people want the value of this assistance to be recognised before the inspection.”

Jamuna rose from her stool. “I'll speak of its value today itself,” she said. “But why should the inspection depend upon the day I give my thanks?” The employee had no answer. He pointed out that the letter's final line used the word ‘coordination’; there was no direct order to stop the inspection. Naira, who had been delivering the list of contacts for Lata's next day of searching, took the slip. “Show us the original of this letter. Who made the suggestion, and has anyone accepted it? Those are two different questions.”

Kanchan tried to restrain her mother. “Money has been paid in your name. What if you need medicines again?” Jamuna pressed her daughter's hand. “If I keep silent out of that fear, then to whom will my life belong? The thanks for the medicine I received are mine to give. But I have no right to prevent an examination of public accounts.” Patiently, she explained that she would show her personal treatment records only to her doctors and duly authorised investigators. She would not recite her medical history into a microphone before a crowd.

Naira asked whether she consented to the sharing of a copy of the assistance slip. Jamuna gave permission for a limited copy showing only the dates, the heads of expenditure and the sums paid, not the private details of her illness. Kanchan put another copy in her bag. Naira prepared a page for the public accounts recording what the fund had paid for, the hospital's authorisations and the status of receipt verification. “Evidence of a donation shows that assistance was given for treatment,” she said. “It does not erase questions about other irregularities.”

Devvrat himself was not at the meeting. An assistant from his office came and said that tarnishing the name of the relief fund might mean the medicines of poor patients would be stopped. Having said so much, he fell silent. Chandrika asked, “Why would looking at the papers stop the medicines? If the fund's rules contain such a condition, show us a copy. If they do not, don't shelter behind the patients' fear.” Rather than answer plainly, the assistant said he would return with the original agreement. His words were not treated as a written instruction from Devvrat.

At the back of the meeting stood Suraj Chaudhary. He had brought palm leaves from home, along with the old tools for drawing sap from the palms. His father considered the skill of climbing the trees the family's only means of livelihood. Suraj had begun thinking of a new trade: a hygienically prepared, tested, non-intoxicating drink made from what the trees yielded, with its ingredients clearly identified for customers. But the moment he said that the work of tending the trees, climbing, cutting and filling bottles ought to be paid for separately, his father's face had hardened.

“Are you going to abandon the trade of your forefathers?” his father asked. Suraj set the bundle of leaves on the ground. “I won't abandon the trees, Babu. But I'll record the wages of whoever climbs them separately from the profit on a bottle of drink. Whether or not to sell an intoxicating drink cannot be decided by invoking family tradition as though that settled everything. We'll decide after considering tests, regulations and what I myself want to do.” His father's anger did not subside, but he opened the upper folds of the leaves and examined their quality. For the first time their quarrel reached the question of earnings and labour.

“Where will the money for new bottles come from?” Suraj's mother asked. “Work on the trees needs to be paid for today, not some other day.” Suraj opened his ledger. He entered separately his father's two hours of climbing, his own cutting and cleaning work, and the cost of samples of the thin bottles. “No large consignment for the first trial,” he said. “Only after the small samples have been tested will anything go to market.” His father took the ledger, studied it for a long time, and corrected the entry for his hours of climbing. It was not a complete victory for agreement. But for the first time the work done within the household had been given its own name in writing.

Just then Bela Turha arrived, with dust rising from the road-survey marks. The old red markings for the proposed road widening ran across her stall. Small bags for covering the mouth, twine for fishing nets, and covers used in the market were the goods from which she made her living. A municipal employee said, “The road will be widened. Your stall will have to go.” “Where am I to put it?” Bela asked. “That will be decided later,” came the answer. She stood still. “Show me the place first,” she said. “Then tell me the day I must move.”

People had gathered at Bela's stall, and a small argument broke out with the municipal employee. Naira asked everyone to stand a little apart. Tara Binaut brought the old survey papers. She made clear that the red line marked the limit of a proposed road, not a final eviction order. Bela produced her receipts for the weekly market fees. “This receipt does not make me the owner of the land,” she said. “But it does prove that I work here regularly.”

Bela asked to inspect two possible sites: one beside the school, where her stall might obstruct the children moving through the crowd, and another near the old peepal tree, where rainwater collected. She would accept neither without examining it. Tara invited Bela to tell the next survey team the actual width of her stall, but did not promise a final allotment in the market. Bela began a short list of places where her regular customers could be found. “Will people know where to look for me in the new market?” she asked. No one had an answer.

At noon a sack of grain for the meal and a bill for its contents arrived from Kamala Jain's household. Her family's shop supplied provisions, and some members of the family prepared special food on ritual occasions. One of the event's publicity workers suggested to Kamala that a religious declaration be printed on the donor board beside her business's name. Holding a copy of the bill, Kamala said, “The wheat came from the shop. Record its price and the discount. Why should what vows I observe personally, or choose not to observe, be attached to the receipt for goods sold by the business?”

Kamala's elder brother-in-law said from a corner, “People judge the family's reputation as a whole.” Kamala remained calm. “If it is one reputation, then keeping the merchant's prices honest must come first. The rules I observe about my own food are my personal decision. The right to sell goods in the shop does not depend on that decision.” Her younger niece felt a little more at ease on hearing this. Until then she had been afraid to say how she wanted to choose her everyday meals. Kamala did not settle the question of the girl's plate there and then. She merely said, “We'll speak at home, not over a publicity worker's microphone.”

Raghu came over again. The first consignment of roasted chickpeas had been used up. A volunteer asked him to supply a second consignment on credit. “It's for the patients' families. The donor will settle the account tomorrow.” Turning down the fire in his roasting hearth, Raghu said, “If there's no assurance of payment tomorrow, I'll give only what has been approved. I'll have to sell the remaining chickpeas in the market. Otherwise who will pay for the wood and the rent?” Jamuna looked at him and agreed. “Don't close your roasting shop in the name of keeping me alive,” she said.

At this, Chandrika grew alert in the middle of the meeting. “The fund pays for medicines and the kitchen distributes grain, but if wages are treated as something to think about afterwards in both places, how will the assistance last?” She proposed a three-day trial: meals would be cooked only for as many plates as had advance approval for provisions and workers' pay; the rate of profit would be made public; the cost of donated goods would be recorded as zero, but the labour of those who prepared them would not. Gurmeet and Rukhsana worked together on the wording of the proposal.

Outside, Kanchan urged her mother to eat something. Jamuna said the doctor had advised regular, light meals, so a small bowl of specially prepared dal should be set aside for her. Rukhsana invited Kanchan to see the kitchen, but Jamuna did not get up herself. “Today I'll sit a little and listen,” she said. Her wish was respected. For the first time Kanchan understood that her mother's recovery did not mean she must return immediately to work every day.

As evening began, the assistant returned with a two-page authorisation letter from Devvrat's office. The first page specified the financial ceiling approved for medicines and the payment dates. The second set out the option, not the obligation, of publicising the donor's name. There was no explicit clause deferring the inspection. Taking a copy, Naira said, “If the payments for food or medicine are genuine, we shall record them. But this letter does not prevent us from examining the accounts of the warehouse, the hospital and the vehicles.”

The assistant said, “And if the major donor becomes angry, what of future assistance?” Jamuna asked him directly, “Are you reporting something Devvrat has said in writing, or your own apprehension?” “My apprehension,” the assistant replied. Jamuna drew a long breath. “Then don't stop me from saying thank you. I'll write to him that his help reached me. I'll also write that the hospital inspection must go ahead. Both are truths of my life.” The assistant lowered his eyes a little, but promised to deliver her letter.

Aditi, a member of the inspection team, examined the entries on the page. She said only that the agreed vehicle fare, the actual duration of the journeys, the medicines received and the records of medicines issued from the hospital store would have to be reconciled. Jamuna's medical history would not be made public. The original distribution register would be requested from Aniruddha's hospital office. The earlier discrepancy over times in the linen register would not be used as an easy route to declaring the medicine receipts fraudulent. Each item would be examined on its own evidence.

On the help desk's paper Naira set down three independent headings: the search for Mithun; the accounts for hospital medicines and transport; and the public route by the gate and the water-lease land. Someone in the crowd wanted to say that a vehicle number seen earlier had also appeared on a medicine-hire slip. Naira asked, “Is it the entire number that matches? The date, the driver, the journey too?” The reply was that only the last two digits matched. She confined the information to a line marked ‘Unverified match’. No new allegation was entered against anyone.

When the communal meal began, Jamuna joined her hands before taking the first mouthful. “For the donation?” Kanchan asked. Jamuna laughed. “When I was suffering, you stayed awake all night. Your hands are in this mouthful too. I'll thank those who paid for the medicines; I'll also see that those who cooked the food receive their wages.” Kanchan passed two mouthfuls from her own plate to her mother. In the courtyard children were making little heaps of flattened rice and playing at mountains. Watching them, Jamuna laughed without fear for the first time in a long while.

While she was laughing, Kanchan's little son came running with a half-cooked pua. “Grandma, I made this,” he said. Rather than eat it, Jamuna took his hand. “You didn't mix jaggery; you mixed flour and water. Now ask Chandrika Kaki how many times the fire has to be tended.” Chandrika did not take the child near the hearth. She showed him a cool mould kept at a safe distance. In it he fashioned a round paper pua. Laughing, Jamuna wiped tears from her eyes. Kanchan did not ask what those tears meant.

After the meal, Rukhsana read out the final reckoning. All the plates approved for that day had been served. Written approval from the municipal office was still awaited for the proposed next three days. A payment receipt had been issued for Raghu's first consignment; no second consignment had been taken on credit. Chandrika's old receipt for seventy puas had been entered separately in the payment list. A payment date had been fixed, but the money had not yet reached her hands. Gurmeet also told the gathering why the proportion of the public subsidy appeared to be falling: work previously entered as free was now being counted as an actual expense.

As Suraj set off with his father, the older man said, “I haven't tasted your new drink, so I won't say it's good. But the price of the risk in climbing the tree must not be deducted.” A little relief showed on Suraj's face. Bela packed up her stall and put sketches of both possible new market sites among her papers. Kamala Jain bought a small box of food to take home, keeping the shop's discount and her own food expense separate in the payment. The four people's decisions had been made on the same platform, but none of those decisions stood in for another person's life.

Before leaving, Jamuna handed Naira a short letter. It expressed her unambiguous thanks for the medicines and vehicle fare provided through Devvrat's relief fund, from which she had benefited. Immediately after that came a sentence: 'I wish the details of my treatment to remain confidential; I do not support preventing an independent inspection of the hospital's public purchases and payments.' She did not turn the letter into permission for publicity. With Jamuna's consent, Naira arranged for a copy to be sent to the relief fund's office. The original stayed in Kanchan's bag.

Home again, Jamuna sat in the shade of the old neem tree. Kanchan put lightly salted porridge on the stove, and the child brought his paper pua to show his grandmother. Once, every sound in the house had seemed to call attention to the hour for medicine. Today there was the clatter of the stove, a child's insistence and the ordinary business of the evening. "Go to your work first tomorrow," Jamuna told Kanchan. "I'll take my midday medicine on time." For the first time, Kanchan could trust herself to leave her mother alone for a little while.

At the other end of town, Tara was filing the plan of Bela's alternative market sites among the public survey papers. A farm labourer looking at the drainage line there asked, "This line runs straight on paper. But where will you write down what a man knows whose feet sink into that field every day?" Tara opened a separate blank page. She did not answer him that night. The day's experience had taught her that gratitude for a life saved, knowledge of how to save a field, and the wages owed for work each needed a place of their own in which to be heard.

Chapter 57 · Janaka and the People

At daybreak, a bamboo measuring rod left on the embankment of a field suddenly sank a hand's breadth into the earth. Ramesh pulled it free, and the yellow clay clinging to its lower end gleamed in the first rays of the sun. Tara arrived carrying the survey papers for Binout. The evening before, she had told a farm labourer that she would record what he knew; today Ramesh brought her to the line along which, on paper, the water drained away easily, though beneath the surface a thin layer of sticky clay held it back. “Drawing a line is easy,” Ramesh said. “Step down here and see how hard it is to pull your feet out.”

Tara touched the ground with the edge of her shoe. Little water showed on the surface, but beneath the grass the earth was trembling. Ramesh had left two hours of his own work to show her this; Tara entered his name and the time. A municipal assistant asked, “Wages even for showing us this much?” Ramesh did not look at him. “If the time I lose from my work doesn't enter the accounts, this path will disappear again in the next rains.” Tara said, “Payment for today's knowledge of the site will have a separate entry. No decision about rights over the land will be made on the strength of this wage slip.”

A little farther off, Dhani Rajbhar had propped a strip of bamboo against the mouth of a small irrigation channel. The previous month a landowner, wanting to protect his own plot, had piled earth across the passage. With the channel blocked, water no longer reached the field Dhani had rented, while every rainfall flooded another family's courtyard. Dhani thrust his spade into the soil. “I don't own this land,” he said, “but the old route by which water reaches everyone runs through here. Who gave anyone the right to close its mouth merely because we have no ownership deed?”

Just then Sushila Mahto arrived with two little tins of seed. On each she had written the date, the name of the field and the day of sowing. She unfolded the company's glossy leaflet before Ramesh first, not before Tara. It promised that the new seed would give a certain yield even where water collected. Sushila said, “The results weren't the same on my two plots. But if I say on that basis that this seed is bad everywhere, I'll be delivering a verdict without testing it, just like this leaflet.” Her account book had curled page by page from getting wet; the figures remained clear.

Mahendra, the seed seller's representative, said, “The soil was not prepared equally, so the comparison is unfair.” Sushila agreed. “You're right. Water stood for three days in one plot and one day in the other. But your advertisement says ‘under all conditions.’ In my trial, five of eight rows bore ears of grain in one plot, and seven of eight in the other. These are figures from different fields, not a scientific conclusion. Write down that the claim needs independent testing.” After looking through her book, Mahendra drew a pencil circle around ‘under all conditions,’ but he made no promise of a correction on the company's behalf.

Pawan, a new trainee who had come with the representative, was noting the measurements of the fields. He asked Sushila, “Did you dry the paddy you'd harvested before weighing it for sale?” Sushila showed him her account of the two days spent drying it. Pawan said this was not enough to establish the seed's general qualities, but the categorical sentence on the leaflet should be examined again. Mahendra tried once to close Pawan's notebook; Pawan would not give it up. Sushila saw that a copy of her objection would now remain in the hands of one of the company's own employees.

Sushila's son Vinay was trying to catch an insect that hopped among the grass on the adjoining ridge. His mother stopped him. “The seed samples are there. Don't step on them.” Vinay sighed. “All of you count water and paddy. When I talk about our field at school, the teacher shows me pictures in a book.” Sushila put a small lump of wet earth into his hand. “Look at the pictures,” she told him, “but remember the weight of this lump as well. The two are not the same thing.” Vinay placed the lump on a leaf to dry.

That day, in the royal assembly of ancient Mithila, visitors were setting gifts of gold and silver before Janaka. Scholars had come to listen to a debate on knowledge. The king's patience was renowned far and wide, but behind the palace the share of a plough had become stuck in a field. A labourer carried the iron share to the court in his hand. The gatekeeper told him to wait until the ceremony was over. “The grain to be offered in the sacrifice inside that hall,” the labourer said, “comes from a field whose seed is rotting under water. If the news is late, a whole year's work will be ruined.”

Janaka summoned the man inside. A courtier, displeased by the interruption of the chanting, made his objection known, but the king went on looking at the earth adhering to the ploughshare. The labourer explained that the lines drawn across the field's surface were one thing, the ground beneath it another. “It is the king's field,” Janaka said. “Will calling it the king's change the course of the water?” the labourer replied. For a moment the assembly fell silent. The king's learning was still searching for an answer to this ordinary question.

A learned woman standing at the rear asked, “What is the test of the knowledge possessed by one who claims to know?” A scholar of the court began speaking of the self and non-attachment. The labourer did not know the worth of those words; the soil was still clinging to the ploughshare in his hands. The king instructed a servant to inspect the site with the cultivators and record how long the water remained in the fields. Yet at that moment no one in the royal assembly asked what rights the labourer himself had over the field belonging to his household. Between the reputation of Janaka's wisdom and the life of his people, that question remained unanswered.

In Videhapur, Meena Tharu held a document on which the ink was still quite fresh. An agricultural company wanted long-term leases from several families in the village. Its employees described the proposal to everyone as “an opportunity for progress.” While he was ill, Meena's father had agreed to take an advance, but the paper did not carry the consent of every member of the family. Spreading the sheet upon the ridge of a field, Meena asked, “When a lease in the company's name is written over the land where we sow, shall we ever be able to return to our own plot?”

“The rent will be fixed,” the employee said. “The company will manage the water.” Meena asked, “Will the rent be paid in a drought year? On what terms can the lease be ended early? And who will control this channel?” The second page said ‘managerial necessity’ but offered no clear answer. An uncle said, “Your father needs the advance, and you're holding things up with this talk of reading papers.” Meena replied quietly, “I need Father's medicines, but I will not hand over all our future harvests without measurement simply to pay for them.”

Meena did not tear up the paper. She kept a copy apart and gave the company's employee a written objection: no signatures until the family had discussed the matter and the meaning of its terms was clear. Her father was not pleased with this decision. There was worry over the cost of medicines in his eyes. Meena gave him the water vessel she had brought from home. “I'm stopping the lease, not the treatment,” she said. The words did not end the quarrel in the household; they made room, however, for an open conversation instead of secret assent.

Meena's mother sat on a low wooden seat, sorting strips of leaves. She asked only one question in the middle of the discussion. “If the company repairs the channel, who will put in writing that rainwater won't enter our house again?” Meena could not answer it. Her father had once worked there as a labourer and remembered the channel's old mouth. He pointed out two places where clearing the piled earth might instead turn the water towards the house. The family's experience, too, had become part of Meena's objection.

Before noon, Phoolmati Tiyar spread her old fishing net beside the channel. Its threads had torn in four places, but the turns and knots of its weave were exquisitely fine. Her former partner had reduced her share of the money from selling a net, arguing that she had not paid for its latest repairs. Phoolmati showed her old marks on fifteen of the knots. “I made this. Put the sale price of the net and the cost of the later repairs down separately.” The former partner stood by his own reckoning.

Vinod Kewart and two young fisherwomen arrived from the fish market at Sukatthi. Phoolmati proposed that they form a new net-making group, with separate entries for hours spent weaving, the cost of thread, repairs and each person's share in the sale of fish. One of the young women asked, “And if the net is kept in someone's house and somebody else uses it the next day?” Phoolmati laughed. “Then a little account book will have to travel with the net.” The first four names of the group were entered. The dispute over the old net did not resolve itself merely because this new paper had been written.

Very few people knew how to make one particular knot Phoolmati had learned from her mother. Sunita, who had joined the new group, grew disheartened as she tried to tie it. Phoolmati did not laugh at her mistakes. Slowly, she turned the thread once with her own hands, then returned the cord to Sunita. “When you've learned the knot, we'll record what your work is worth as well,” she said. Sunita opened a little notebook and wrote her name on its first line. The group's beginnings were not merely a protest against the old partnership, but a sharing of new skill.

On this side of the channel Dhani picked up his spade again. Phoolmati's new group would need the passage to carry their baskets of fish, but irrigation water had to reach the fields too. One landowner spoke of his fear that his embankment might break. Dhani did not dismiss it. “Your ridge must survive if my seedlings are to survive,” he said. “But a closed gate beside the trunk of a tree stops everyone. Call us all on the day of measurement.” Tara marked the proposal: temporary opening only under supervision; any decision on a permanent public route to follow a hearing.

Nandini Bhandari brought a damp gamhar sapling from her nursery. In her hand was a water ledger headed ‘Puraini.’ The name had survived in the nursery as an old local designation for a source from which water was brought. An employee asked, “Where does the Puraini River meet this place?” Nandini smiled. “In my ledger, this is the old name of a water source; this paper cannot establish the confluence of some distant river.” She showed him the dates written beneath the name and the payments owed to those who carried the water.

Sushila and Nandini argued over the price of the nursery plants. “Why is a sapling of the same size so much dearer than it was last month?” Sushila asked. Opening her ledger, Nandini showed her the cost of transporting soil, watering twice more, and paying the nursery workers. “I accept that your costs have risen,” Sushila said, “but the measurements for the two extra waterings are entered on the same line.” Nandini did not hide the paper. She promised to show the measurements the following day, but would not yet accept a lower price. Their disagreement remained alive alongside the price list hanging at the nursery gate.

Dev Gaine was taking out an old sarangi in preparation for the evening assembly. At the previous fair, someone had recorded one of his melodies on a mobile phone. Now an advertising agent for the agricultural company wanted to play it as ‘the song of the new seed.’ Dev asked, “What words will be added? For how many days will it be played? And where will my name appear?” “The tune belongs to the people,” the agent said. “How can it be anyone's exclusive property?” Dev held his bow still. “An old tune has many forms. But this performance, my voice, and the verse I composed are my labour. Hearing a single minute of it does not give anyone the right to use it for ever.”

With Dev was his niece Ragini. Playing an old performance of her uncle's on her phone, she said the song carried different rhythms for the water in the fields and the women's work of planting; the pounding drums of the new advertisement would change its meaning. Dev told her, “You understand the song, so finish your schooling first. You are under no obligation to sing with me.” The agent promised to put in writing a proposal for one new performance at a limited fair, with payment. Dev refused to surrender the recording without conditions; no final agreement was made that day.

To Ragini, the dispute meant something different from what it meant to her uncle. She wanted to use a song played at the village festival in a school play. Dev did not stop her. “You can learn it and sing it,” he said. “But you have no right to sell a recording of my voice today to another company, just as I cannot claim the rights to your picture.” Ragini decided to make a new melody for her practice. At that moment Dev smiled as he tightened the slack strings of his old sarangi with his own hands.

Tara spread the survey register before the assembly. One page marked the place where Ramesh's rod had sunk, another the blocked mouth of Dhani's channel, a third Sushila's seed trials, and a fourth Meena's objection to the lease. “All this paper will only make the work difficult,” the municipal representative said. Tara answered, “The work is difficult already. We should not conceal its difficulty by writing one word—‘development’—over everyone. Each person whose field, water, labour or livelihood is affected needs a separate time to be heard.”

The municipal representative wanted one joint order issued at once: open the channel, inspect the fields and obtain consent to the company's proposal. Meena rose. “I have no objection to inspecting the opening of the channel, but that does not mean I accept the lease of my land.” Dhani said, “I want public access, not to seize anyone's field.” Sushila added, “I'll provide the seed samples, but an independent examiner must verify the company's advertising claims.” Tara entered the three statements on separate lines. A collective decision did not mean that everyone had given the same consent.

Phoolmati came forward with the small register of her new net-making group. “If the channel is opened, where will the fish go?” she asked. “Their routes are different in the rains and in the dry season.” Vinod showed the market fees. Aditi, who had arrived after finishing an inspection of the hospital warehouse, said that the fish market's cost register might be relevant to the inspection of the channel, but a receipt for the hospital vehicle would not thereby become proof concerning water-lease rights. Naira agreed. She placed the papers about old nicknames and the search for Mithun in a separate, closed file.

The ploughshare that had been carried into Janaka's assembly at dawn lay in the open courtyard until evening. When the farmers returned from inspecting the site, the king asked them, “In whose field will the water remain?” There was no single answer. One household wanted the channel deepened; another said that would cause its well to dry up. The scholars resumed their debate on self-knowledge. Janaka did not stop them, but ordered the names of both farming households to be entered in separate registers. The king's renowned discernment was no final judgement upon their disagreement; it had merely opened a door through which they might be heard.

At the Videhapur meeting Dhani was at last permitted to clear a little grass from the mouth of the channel, and even that only in the presence of two families and under the supervision of an employee. The great heap of earth was not removed without inspection. Dhani received written acknowledgement of what was due for his time and the work of his spade; permanent responsibility for repairs would be decided later. Ramesh tied a short red thread to the spot where his rod had sunk so the mark could be found at the next measurement. “The thread is local information, not a substitute for an engineer's inspection,” Tara said. “But don't remove it.”

When Meena returned home, her father was awake on his cot. She gave him a copy of the lease and sat down. “Didn't you give the company a plain answer?” he asked. “I haven't said ‘yes’,” Meena replied. “I've put the questions in writing. Father, I cannot save the field if your treatment stops, and the treatment cannot go on if we exchange the harvests of the next five years for a paper whose meaning is uncertain.” Her father was silent a long time. Then he said, “Sit with me tomorrow and read the second page.”

When Sushila brought her seed tins home, Vinay's lump of clay had dried. As soon as he broke it, he found that the inside was still damp. “There can be water underneath even when the top has dried,” he said. Sushila laughed. “That's why we have to measure.” She did not ask her son to recite the day's results; she told him to watch the film of water at dawn for himself. Phoolmati, tying the first knot of a new net, was teaching her daughter that tightening a knot and letting it loosen were two different kinds of work. In both houses, knowledge of work was becoming not a family command, but an invitation to learn.

That night, before closing the survey register, Tara added a new page: who gained when water was held back, who suffered when it was released, and whose labour went unpaid while a decision was awaited. Nandini's ‘Puraini’ ledger, Sushila's seed trials, Dhani's public path and Meena's rejected lease remained secure in their separate papers. Outside, a light rain began. The first stream came down off the field ridge and divided in two directions. Tara stood beside the window listening to its sound. It was hard now to find a single line of causation; many hands had held back the water, and each hand had a story of its own.

Chapter 58 · The Web of Causes

When Ramani Bind lowered a slender bamboo rod into the water at the edge of Makhaniya Dabra, its tip lodged in the mud. She pulled it out; with the clay came a handful of rotting leaves and threads from an old sack. At dawn the water seemed motionless from one direction, yet a small current beneath the surface was turning the leaves another way. Tara stood on the Binout embankment, counting the markers. In her bag lay a sample of wet earth brought from Sushila's field the evening before. Today she had no wish to issue an order to open the pond's outlet merely on someone's word.

Rinsing the rod, Ramani said, “Some people here say that holding back the water will save the makhana; others say that releasing it will save the fish. But nowhere have they recorded together when the seeds were planted in the pond and how much water there was in the lowland fields at the time.” Phoolmati Tiyar, who had come with her, gathered up her dhoti, soaked to the knees, and began examining the makhana leaves. Another member of the new net-making group stood behind her. Phoolmati asked, “If the current is released here today, will there be a safe passage for dragging our new nets?” Ramani answered plainly, “I don't know. Measure the depth again first.”

Tara stretched the measuring cord along the embankment. Following Hira Sahni's advice, they marked the times on small stakes: the water level at dawn, at noon, and after rain. Jairam, a municipal employee, said, “The old map shows the outlet running straight. What will all this measuring change?” Tara pointed to a bend in the cord. “This stretch is straight on paper, not on the ground. If we cut through to straighten it, the first rush of water will enter Phulo's betel field. An old line is a place to begin work, not the end of a decision.”

Phulo Chaurasia arrived from her betel garden holding a twig of tender leaves. The wet bamboo supports of its overhead shelter had begun to sag. “I'm not in favour of stopping the pond's water,” she said. “But the earth they propose to raise for the new embankment will stand above my field. If the rain turns the current back against the betel roots, two years' earnings could disappear in a single night.” Jairam said, “If everyone wants the benefit, someone must make a sacrifice.” Phulo replied, “Write down who is to make that sacrifice, by name. Why choose my one field in the name of everyone's benefit?”

Just then Ramesh Kushwaha came down carrying an empty vegetable basket. He had already shown the others the place where the rod had sunk near Sushila's field. Now it was the tender bottle-gourd vines in his own beds that troubled him. “The first outflow may pass through my field,” he acknowledged. “But if five days' planting is drowned, on whose assessment will compensation be paid? If we're warned beforehand that the water will rise throughout the rains, we can change the crop.” Tara entered the present crop, the likely duration of standing water, and the measurement of possible damage under separate headings. On that page, the space for Ramesh's ‘yes’ or ‘no’ remained empty.

Devki Pal arrived carrying a bundle of wool, with two goats and an old ewe. At the sight of new bamboo stakes planted across the old livestock track beside the canal, the ewe turned away. Steadying it, Devki said, “If the pond water is held at this bend, I'll take the animals by the high northern road. But market carts race along that route. If a sheep panics and runs off, who will count its value on the map?” Her son Neeraj held a little balance for weighing wool. “If we go around,” he asked his mother, “will we reach the market in time?” She replied, “Arriving safely comes before getting a price. But will anyone record what the delay costs?”

Batohi Dhami came forward, unhooking his bamboo implement from a tree trunk. The old path by which he gathered honey ran beside the proposed embankment. “I need a way to reach the trees,” he said, “not permission to damage them in taking honey. The bees that arrive in flowering season must be protected if there is to be a livelihood.” One official associated him with old hunting practices and asked whether he would put up prohibited traps again. Batohi did not smile. “Write down all three things: I will take honey, preserve the trees, and catch no animals. The name of one occupation does not prove a different offence.”

Sabina Mirshikar stopped when she heard the last words of that exchange. Her bag held a net-mending needle, knotted cord and two receipts for repairs. A man who had asked her at the previous market to hunt prohibited animals in the name of tradition was there again. “If the old route opens,” he said, “the old work can resume as well.” Sabina looked him directly in the eyes. “Everyone ought to have the right to travel the old route. But I will not do unlawful work. Look at the earnings from my needle and my knots, not at my community's name.” She placed the receipt for her outstanding repair payment before Tara.

On the other side of Makhaniya Dabra, four women were sorting seeds. A child mistakenly stepped among the leaves, and its mother pulled it aside; the marshy ground looked ordinary enough from above. Wiping the child's feet, Ramani said, “Planting the seed, gathering from the leaves and cracking the dried makhana are the work of different hands. Yet the lease paper treats the person whose name appears on it as the one entitled to every benefit.” One woman showed the blisters on her palm. “If the wages for cracking the nuts are deducted in the name of repaying a loan, how much of my own labour remains mine?”

Paras Lal, an associate of the makhana contractor, said, “The money for the seeds was paid in advance, so the deduction is fair.” Ramani asked him to open his account books. The first page showed expenditure on seed, the second the lease of the pond, the third the advances paid to women workers. Tara asked why all three items had been combined into a single family's debt. Paras gave no answer; he said they would discuss it when the owner arrived. Ramani did not abandon the argument, but neither did she fill gaps in the original accounts with conjecture. The women wrote the dates on which they had each received money on separate sheets of paper.

At noon Nandini Bhandari came from her nursery with two earthen pitchers, a length of bamboo pipe and a notebook. She demonstrated that over the previous four days the quantities of water in two planted beds had been different. “These are measurements from my nursery,” she said, “not of the flow across the entire lowland. All I can say from them is that the soil on this side stayed damp longer. To calculate how much water will pass out, we need further tests.” Jairam said at once, “Then we can count the compensation for your land at half the price.” Nandini closed her notebook. “I shared measurements of water, not an offer to sell my land.”

Nandini's niece Kanchan had come with her and was floating a paper boat beside the pitchers. The boat kept circling in one place. “Why doesn't it go forward?” Kanchan asked. Nandini showed her a small rise of mud. “The current turns here, looking for its way.” “Shall I push it with my hand, then?” Kanchan asked. Nandini laughed. “A push will move the boat, but it won't open the mouth that's really blocked.” The little girl lifted out the boat and placed it on the dry bank.

When they reached the western lowland, they heard the sound of a foot slipping from an embankment. Ramesh Kushwaha caught a bottle gourd before it could roll out of his basket. When water lay here in the rainy season, there were opportunities for fishing and grazing livestock; after the water receded, people grew paddy and vegetables. Dhani Rajbhar stood on a narrow public path. “What is pasture this season will be a field the next,” he said. “If the decision to open the outlet is made by looking only at today's water, no one will ask what next month's planting requires.”

Ramani showed them an old mark left by her boat along the edge of the lowland. It stood high on the earth, where the water had reached in the last monsoon. “My boat came up to this place,” she said. “But that memory doesn't create a fishing-water lease for today. Our application to enter the women's names separately on the lease is still pending. What I am describing is the movement of water, not a final ruling on rights.” Tara recorded her statement with the date. Rather than erase the description ‘permanent waterline’ from the employee's older sheet, she added a note correcting it.

Sushila Mahto brought a new notebook from her seed trials. On its cover she had written ‘Bardari.’ Seeing the word, Jairam asked, “There's no river of that name anywhere on the map.” Sushila replied, “In my notebook, Bardari is the local name of the piece of field where I first sowed the seed. I've recorded how many days the water stood there. If anyone wants to establish another meaning for the old name from other sources, let them do so. I'm not identifying a river confluence from this entry.” She gave the distance between two rows of seedlings and the date of planting.

Saroj Kharkaut arrived with a bundle of thread for the new nets. Her cost book contained the word ‘Balthi.’ “In our group,” she explained, “Balthi is the name of a small team that sews nets in a separate place. When its figures are joined to those for Ramani's boat and Vinod's fish market, don't erase the workers' names.” An assistant at the edge of the lowland took Balthi to mean the main drainage outlet and was about to circle it in red. Saroj stopped his hand. “First ask what this name refers to on this page. One word does not make two places the same.”

Phulo Chaurasia showed three sides of her field in the measurement register. On one was a slope, on another the bamboo shelter, on the third an old footpath. “For two weeks of rain I can endure water along the slope,” she said. “But if, in the third week, the earth of the embankment is raised higher, the garden may take the full blow of the current.” Ramesh replied, “That's why I want the damage to my beds measured over the two-week trial.” “And in the dry season?” Tara asked. Ramesh thought for a moment. “Then some of the stored water must be available for farming, but the outlet used by the lowland fishers must not be closed.”

Devki proposed an arrangement for the livestock track: the high northern road when the rains rose, with carts required to slow down at market times; in the dry season, the footpath along the old canal. A shopkeeper said, “If animals come through, there'll be mud in front of my shop.” Devki replied, “I'll lay earth at the market bend at my own expense, but the stakes fencing it off must be removed. Give us a safe passage for two hours on the day we sell wool.” She also offered to give up the temporary use of one patch of ground where she sold her goods. Neeraj kept watching his mother's face: her concession would mean less space for his little market stall.

Batohi opened the mouth of his honey vessel and let them smell its fragrance, without pouring any into the water. “If the new fence for the embankment runs between the trees, I won't be able to bring my tools around,” he said. Manju, a woman assisting with forest work, replied, “There is a new beehive on one side of those trees this season. No route for crowds should be laid out there.” They inspected the place together. In the end they proposed conditional access for Batohi along the dry northern ridge during the trial: no cutting trees, no disturbing the new part of the hive, and entry only after a safety inspection. Batohi did not demand automatic restoration of the old route.

Sabina asked what the new mending work would pay. A municipal man told her, “People of your community have been making nets like these for generations. Think of it as service to the community.” Sabina took the needle from her bag. “I'll give voluntary service if I choose,” she said. “For the knots I spend six hours repairing, I want wages. And don't ask me again to hunt illegally.” Tara examined the receipt for the earlier net that the man still owed her for. Half the payment remained outstanding. Sabina had one condition entered in writing: she would stitch a new net once an order was issued, but would not waive what was still due for the old one.

For the annual ceremony of opening the water channel, people had first wanted to bring bright-coloured flags. This time the measurement register was opened before the flags were brought out. Dhani's cultivation, Ramani's fish, Phulo's betel garden, Devki's livestock and Batohi's honey: each of the five interests was heard separately at the meeting. Phoolmati Tiyar added that the new net-making group would not enter the pond without safe access. “How, then, are we to hold the festival?” the chair asked. Ramani replied, “Examining the channel and deciding who is responsible for it are part of the festival's work too. The drums can sound afterwards.” The children held the bamboo poles for the flags off to one side.

As the proposal for sharing seeds and water was being drawn up, Jairam demanded a single table showing how much water should be released during the rains and how much held back in the dry season. Nandini said that four days of nursery measurements could not determine the figures for the whole lowland. An associate of Hira Sahni wanted to set up a temporary gauge for measuring the water, but no major cutting through the old embankment was permitted without a test of the load its base could bear. Tara wrote down the sequence: first take measurements from a safe bank; conduct a second inspection after the water rose; decide in the presence of the affected families. The line marked ‘Permission to open today’ was left blank. Only temporary removal of debris from the small measuring opening was authorised.

Preparations for the fish-and-makhana labour fair came into conflict here as well. Paras Lal wanted to collect a passage fee at the pond landing, in addition to displaying the makhana lease. Ramani asked, “How does a receipt for a seed loan confer the right to levy a toll on a public path?” A representative of Vinod Kewart separately argued that the fee for entering the landing should be the same for small sellers bringing fish to be weighed. Tara set down three distinct hearing dates: one for access to the landing, one for the makhana lease, and one for the sellers' service fee. Paras did not withdraw his claim, but that day's attempt to combine all the rights on one sheet was stopped.

By evening, preliminary accounts of three chains of benefit had emerged separately. The blocked drainage held water in some higher fields, but increased waterlogging in certain lower ones. Receipts issued by the employee who collected fees at the landing did not fully agree with the old authorisation; the original order was demanded. In the production-loan papers, advances made to women workers and the loan for seed had both been entered in one household's name. Naira listened to everything and said, “All three lines of gain and loss may connect, but as yet there is no evidence of one person or one intention behind them. Wherever the papers are incomplete, ask for the full originals.”

A young man in the crowd said, “The makhana sacks must have come in the same vehicle that was caught at the hospital.” Naira immediately asked for the source of his statement. He repeated something his uncle had told him, but could give neither a date, nor a vehicle number, nor the name of anyone who had seen the sacks. Naira made the distinction explicit: “There is a separate register for the investigation into hospital supplies, and separate papers for the search for Mithun. Don't spread the child-abduction rumour again on the strength of a guess.” She did not pronounce Lata's name before the crowd. Because the original source of the young man's statement could not be found, it was recorded as unverified information, not evidence.

On the back of her measurement register Tara wrote down the seasonal conditions. First: no one was to cut open the channel alone when the first strong monsoon current arrived. Second: no permanent embankment would be raised in the western lowland without a joint inspection of its present uses for crops, grazing and fish. Third: separate registers would be prepared at Makhaniya Dabra for seed, gathering, cracking the nuts and loans. Fourth: the original authority for the landing fees would be examined. Fifth: any loss affecting Devki's livestock route, Batohi's honey path, Phulo's betel field and Nandini's nursery would be heard separately. No one could treat these conditions as a final decision on water rights.

Devki drew two soft strands from a small bundle of her wool and gave them to Neeraj. “Tie a red mark on this bamboo for the night,” she said. “Cart drivers will be able to see that animals turn here.” Neeraj tied the threads and asked, “Will we go to market tomorrow?” Devki looked at the empty pan of his balance. “We will, if the promise to slow the carts on the high road is kept. Otherwise the wool will be sold late.” She and Neeraj went back by the old bend. Her proposal had not resolved every problem, but they would no longer have to drive their animals into the marsh at another person's command.

Batohi fixed a time to inspect the site with the forest assistant before the trial at dawn. On her way home, Sabina folded the old receipt for the net and tucked it into her bag. She had not yet received a new work order, but she now had a written date on which she could demand the old payment. Nandini left a copy of her nursery's water measurements with Tara and kept the objection concerning the price of her land safe in her original notebook. When Phulo reached home, she tightened the lower row of bamboo supports around her garden with her own hands. The water might rise in the night; the page recording the decision mattered, but so did the knot she tied herself.

Back at the edge of the pond, Ramani asked the women how far tomorrow's gathering work would extend. “If the water rises suddenly,” one said, “today's seeds will be ruined.” Ramani took the wet sack from her hands and set it aside. “That is why there must be measurements, and the measurements must be announced in time. My name has not yet been added to the lease, but why should the news that the water is rising go out without reaching me?” For the first time, the women wrote down not only their working hours but also the time by which they must receive a warning. As the sun went down, a soft rustling rose among the makhana leaves. The day's labour was over; the inquiry was not.

At dusk, Tara and Ramesh stood once more beside the embankment. Ramani gathered her baskets and joined them. All three examined the pages bearing their signatures: when measurements would be taken during the rains, whose voices would be heard in the dry season, and who must be warned before any sudden release of water. “I won't give my field as a passage without compensation,” Ramesh said. Ramani replied, “I won't surrender my outlet without the names of those entitled to the fishery and the workers' details.” Tara said, “And I won't silence either of you with a single line on a map.” Entering the disagreement in writing had defeated no one; it had given the next conversation ground on which to stand.

That night an envelope arrived from the municipal office. Inside was a letter from the water committee on the opposite bank. Its members wanted a joint inspection, but stipulated that the names of their fields and homes must not be circulated publicly. Jairam proposed making a photocopy and sending it to every WhatsApp group. Tara stopped him. “First ask whom the senders have authorised to receive this message, and how much of it may be shared.” Naira kept the public request in a separate file, and the page containing private addresses in a closed one. Outside, the rain was growing louder. A way had opened for the voices of the people on the other bank to be heard, but those voices still belonged to them.

Chapter 59 · The Envoy's Conditions

The rain had softened the envelope at its right-hand corner. Instead of spreading it in the sun, Tara laid it between folds of dry cloth. Two words in the letter from the water committee on the opposite bank had been underlined in red ink: “Limited circulation.” Jairam stood with his telephone in his hand. “If we want the measurements to be public, the letter ought to be public too,” he said. Tara did not lift her eyes from the paper. “The measurements will be public. But why should anyone's home address, or who lives on whose land, be made public without their permission?” Outside, beside the embankment, the red thread tied to a bamboo stake had darkened as it soaked in the rain.

Early the next morning Naira separated the letter into two parts at the office. Its first page contained the request for a joint inspection, an account of the season's water, the difficulties of travelling between the banks, and the address to which a reply could be sent. On the second were the families' names, their house numbers, and the reasons for their fear. She made a copy of the first page; the second she returned to the original envelope and marked with the date of receipt. Jairam asked, “Do you trust these people?” Naira answered, “Trusting them and protecting their names are not the same task. First we must understand what the messenger has been authorised to say.”

The old footpath to the opposite bank passed through the bend at Simatirtha. In the last monsoon the decking of the little culvert had been washed away. Boats now made the crossing, but because the load assessment remained incomplete, they had no permission to carry everybody across in one journey. Hira Sahni pointed to an old plate hanging at the side. “For the outward trip there will be a separate boat carrying a lighter load. Whatever report is prepared, treat it as evidence of measurement, not as a certificate of passenger safety.” In the journey register Tara entered the boat's capacity, the boatman's wages, and the possible delay on the return trip as separate items. There was a cost to not going at all; the cost of taking the wrong road was greater.

That morning Shyam Mallik said the real request in the letter was only this: the families across the water wanted to know which way their children should run if the drainage channel was suddenly opened. At the previous meeting, compensation for damage to Ramesh Kushwaha's field and the lease on Ramani Bind's pond had been kept as separate questions. Yet for a warning to reach both banks within a day, information would have to pass from one side to the other. “If our map draws a line across their homes,” Shyam said, “they will have a right to see the map. But that does not take away their right to prevent its copies from travelling from phone to phone.”

On another page of the ancient story, a search party stood by the sea. They were heavy-hearted because no news of Sita had been found. Sugriva's deadline pressed upon them, and the sea stretched away before their eyes. Angada was courageous, but could not be sure that, having leapt across, he could leap back again. Jambavan went to Hanuman and reminded him of his strength. Hanuman faced not merely the trial of reaching the farther shore, but the harder work of returning with news. He carried Rama's signet ring, a token that could help Sita recognise the messenger; the token itself, however, was not Sita's reply.

Near Tara's office, Rekha Sahu, the lac-bangle maker, set three samples in her wooden box. One was a bangle shaped by hand; the second, a design traced to scale on paper; the third, a small machine-made trial of that design. The businessman who owned the machine had proposed a partnership: “My machine, your design, both our names in the market.” As she listened, Rekha folded away the sheet bearing her pattern. “Put a price on the machine's time,” she said, “but once a photograph of my pattern goes out, it can travel through a hundred shops. What sort of partnership would that leave us?”

Sitting beside Rekha, Pavitra Patwa folded back a third corner of the paper. “Have it written here that the photograph of the sample may go to a customer for the inspection of one pair. A fresh permission must be obtained before another mould is cut.” The machine owner objected. “Business will stop under so many conditions.” Rekha turned a piece of half-hardened lac over in her palm. “My business has stopped too. But if the price of a shape I have created once becomes zero for every consignment that follows, why should I make the next one?” In the end, they wrote a proposal for a limited three-month trial: the first sample fee payable in advance, the number of pieces produced to be recorded separately, and the original pattern book to remain with Rekha.

From the other side, Suman Tikulhar took two painted panels out of her chest. A circular emblem she had designed for a new marketplace had been reproduced by a trader in an advertisement without asking her. “I bought the panel,” he said. “Surely I can print it as well.” Suman placed the panel carefully upon the table. “The panel painted on wood may be yours. But you did not buy permission to put its emblem on a thousand posters.” She showed him her sample book, where the dates, customers, and agreed uses had all been entered.

Saroj Kharakaut arrived carrying a bundle of newly tied netting. At the last meeting concerning the pond, the member with the money had wanted to enter the whole net under his own name, although the women who stitched the knots had borrowed money to buy the thread. Saroj divided a sheet of paper into three sections: the cost of buying the yarn, the hours spent stitching the knots, and the risk of setting the net in the water and hauling it out again. “The larger the capital, the larger the share,” a man said. Saroj picked up an old, torn net. “Capital will receive its share. But the one who dives in to save the net—under whose household capital will you count that person?”

That day Saroj's group agreed, with the consent of five members, to make a small net as a trial. The cost of the thread would be paid first. Wages for stitching would fall due on a fixed date whether the net sold or not. Whatever profit remained would be apportioned with capital and risk entered separately. Two members did not agree with the whole set of rules. Their objections were written on the back of the page; the decision was not described as unanimous. Giving Tara the net's cost register, Saroj said, “If the people on the other bank give permission for their names to be seen, explain this to them: a fishing net may be held in common, but not by rubbing out the names of its makers.”

At midday Malati Koche arrived carrying water in a plain yellow container. Fine earth had settled at the bottom. The tap in the new settlement ran during the first part of the day; before water could reach the houses at the far end, the flow had thinned to a trickle. “They tell us to settle new families here,” she said, “but the next outlet in the pipe shuts off before the water reaches us. I shall write to the people across the bank that we can all contribute to the cost of sharing the water; but I want it made clear who is to receive payment for repairs, and when the tap will be opened.”

Jairam said Malati's hamlet was not mentioned in the water committee's letter; they should send the concerns of the other bank first. Malati tightened the lid of her container. “Our settlement stands on the edge of this very drainage channel. If you open the full pipe and send the water across, this queue will be left empty. I am not denying their suffering. But without hearing me, whose messenger can you be?” At her insistence, the letter to be carried by the envoys was amended to include the communal tap in the new settlement and the maintenance charge, though no private house numbers were added.

At that hour Phoolmati Pamaria was rehearsing a song on the school veranda. She had inherited the old song of the Simatirtha road from her mother. The invitation to perform described it as “Folk-song performance—contribution”; the line for the fee was blank. Padma sat beside her with the paper. Phoolmati crossed out a line of the song in which a Pamaria woman was made an object of laughter. A young organiser said, “If you change an old song, where will the people's identity remain?” Phoolmati replied, “My identity is not the repetition of an insult. My mother used to stop at that line. Now I shall sing different words.”

Padma prepared two versions of the song in translation: one offering a readily understood sense to listeners, the other accompanied by notes on the original words. Explaining the word “border” in her own notebook, she said that in one place it meant the boundary between fields, elsewhere the line of a district office's jurisdiction, and in the song the distance separating a person from someone beloved. Phoolmati had three separate entries made: her performance fee, the musicians' accompaniment, and credit for the translation. The young organiser was not certain he could meet the cost of the event. Phoolmati smiled. “I shall sing the song a second time, but first I shall hear the conditions under which I am to speak. The song will reach its listeners; its worth must reach them too.”

Durga Danuwar showed them a fragment of a song bearing the name Lakhandei, preserved inside her old notebook. Someone was taking it as an indication of a monsoon current and marking it on a new map. At the top of the page Naira wrote, “N36—Lakhandei; folk name/poetic expression.” “This is a song,” she said, “not a measurement of the river as it flows today.” Durga asked, “Then is my song of no use?” Padma answered, “No. A song tells us what a people remember. But to treat the ‘Lakhandei’ of an old verse and a particular stream on today's map as one and the same without checking the sources would do an injustice to the song as well.” Durga's name and her permission for the singing were entered in the margin of the notebook.

Before the journey, a telephone call came from the secretary of the committee across the river. Another question arose during that conversation. The committee wanted the visiting delegation to read only a translated summary; Shyam wanted to take the complete map. Tara proposed a distinction: measurements of the public landing and information about the present extent of flooding could be shared there, but the boundaries of private fields would be disclosed only in the presence of the people affected. The secretary replied that she would read these conditions to her members; she could not yet say that they had accepted them. After the call, Jairam made a face. Tara said, “We have not received an answer. We shall not send out copies as though permission had arrived.”

When Hanuman stood upon the seashore, the trust of his companions was gathering into a rising tide of encouragement. Jambavan did not merely tempt him with the prospect of glory; he reminded him how grave the undertaking was. The party's knowledge of where Sita was, and of the condition in which she might be found, remained incomplete. Rama's ring was a token that might lend credibility to the messenger's account; but whom Hanuman would first meet in Lanka, and how much he should properly say at that meeting, could be settled only by what happened after the journey began. No single proclamation could shorten the breadth of the sea.

When the modern delegation reached the landing, its first difficulty was not translation but a name. In the boatman's assistant's register, a member from the other bank had been entered under a surname by which the municipal list identified a different family. A young man claimed that the same family's name appeared in an old wage register. Naira laid both papers on the table. “The pronunciation is similar, but the house numbers differ, and so do the dates. Nor does this register identify the person who made the entry. Do not write that these are one and the same person until the original name register has been checked.” A certified copy of the original register was requested; the circulation of the rumour in copied form was stopped.

Someone raised the subject of the old vehicle again. “That must be the vehicle in which the child was taken away,” a man whispered. Tara did not throw the accusation into the crowd. Naira questioned the man separately: had he seen anything himself? At what time? What was the number? Who had witnessed it directly? He had only a third person's account. “There is a registered case concerning the search for Mithun,” Naira said. “If new facts come to light, we shall give them to the officer in charge. But today's visit to the water committee is not a disguised pretext for that search.” The boatman agreed to show the receipt relating to his vehicle. His willingness was not treated as a confession of wrongdoing.

On the stony bank at the landing, Malati met three women from the opposite side. They were explaining how often water came from their tap in the course of a day. Padma could not immediately understand one woman's words: in the local dialect, the word ber referred not to the hour at which water flowed, but to the queue waiting behind the tap. A mistaken translation could have started a quarrel between the two banks. “Hear the whole sentence first,” Phoolmati said, “and then translate it.” The woman explained again: bringing a pipe as far as the houses would require time and labour; they must not be charged twice in the name of distributing water. Malati set down her container and listened carefully.

The secretary on the opposite bank examined the signature on the first page of the letter, but the second page remained closed. “Our members' fears are not false,” she said, “but I cannot show everyone their house numbers. They have asked to be told at least one day before the drainage channel is opened.” Hira Sahni replied that, in very heavy rain, it would not be scientifically defensible to promise that a day's notice could always be given. There must be a separate system of immediate warning in the event of an emergency. The secretary wrote the question down. After she had spoken plainly of the real difficulty facing her side, some of the strain left her face.

At a brief meeting, the messenger's task was divided into three parts. Tara would carry the notice of public inspection; Hira's team would provide the water-level measurements; and objections concerning private families would be conveyed on separate sealed pages, only after the authorised members had consented. Jairam wanted to share a photograph of the decision at once. Padma turned the paper towards him. On it the secretary had written: “Permission from the members first.” Instead of taking a photograph, Jairam copied the public portion by hand into his notebook. The alteration seemed small to him, but the names of the households did not go out.

There, Rekha's little machine-trial sample and Suman's warning emblem were shown. A trader from the bank asked whether the committee could use Rekha's colourful spiral on its flag. “We shall make a different pattern for the committee's safety emblem,” Rekha said. “The pattern of this bangle is not for a flag.” Suman allowed her simpler sign to be used for warning boards alone. Both conditions were recorded separately in a notebook. The trader received no blanket permission to print either design. Actual work would begin only after the committee issued an order for its own specified use.

The women of Saroj's group opened out a small sample of netting at the landing. It was not a demonstration of how to catch fish, but of the strength of the knots and the differences in cost. A large buyer asked, “Wouldn't it be simpler to keep the accounts if all the money were paid under one name?” Saroj replied, “Our shares need not be made invisible merely to make the accounting simple.” Tara suggested separate lines for the proceeds of a communal net's sale, the investment in thread, and the wages of its five members. Saroj agreed, but added that the written agreement would not endure if the objection of the person who had opposed it yesterday was never heard.

By the time the afternoon was declining, Phoolmati began to sing. The rain had stopped; above the landing, the shadow of a neem tree fell across the stones. There was a road in the song, a longing to return, and the voice of a woman who, instead of repeating her name at every stopping place, asked for the way home. Where Phoolmati had removed the insulting line, she sang new words: “The road is mine, the voice is mine; listen to my news first.” An elderly woman of Simatirtha quietly kept time. Padma left her translation notebook closed. It was not necessary to explain every word in the middle of a song.

Before the return journey, the committee accepted two points in its written reply: it would send a small delegation for the inspection of the public landing, and it would seek permission from its members before circulating pages bearing names. But the first disagreement over the meaning of open access remained. Tara said a team measuring a public route needed the opportunity to inspect the places concerned. The secretary replied that some members of her committee were not prepared to admit an outside delegation beside their fields. Ramesh Kushwaha's compensation claim also remained unanswered. No one could yet say that an agreement had been reached.

Before the boat left the landing, Malati filled her container with a mouthful of water from the public tap on the opposite bank—not as a sample for testing. She bought a small sweet for her daughter from a third shop. “At least we were heard today,” she told Tara. “But there will still be too little water in our tap tomorrow.” “That is why we shall bring the page on maintenance charges and the tap measurements to the next meeting,” Tara replied. Malati laughed at that much. “A meeting is one thing. Watch people standing in the queue when it is time to fill their vessels, and the arithmetic looks different.”

Back in town that evening, Naira put all the pages in order. An authenticated copy of the original name register was still outstanding. News of the search for Mithun remained uncertain. The water-lease claim awaited a separate hearing. The water committee's public request was kept in a copy fit for circulation, the private list in a sealed envelope, and the receipts for the delegation's expenses with Tara. Jairam deleted a blurred photograph from his phone: unwillingly and by accident, it had caught the corner of the secretary's closed page. Naira watched and said only, “Now write down what you saw, and what you did not see.”

That night a line of Phoolmati's song remained in Malati's ears. When she reached home, she washed the bucket, set her daughter's clothes out to dry, and wrote down the time of tomorrow's queue at the tap. Suman closed the notebook of patterns inside her chest; Rekha checked the receipt for the first advance payment due from the new machine owner for testing her sample; Saroj tied a label bearing a separate name for each of the five members to the bundle of thread. Disagreement remained at the landing. But on that day no one's name, picture, melody, or pattern had become another person's property without permission. At the next meeting the question of opening the public path would arise again; this time it stood accompanied by the written conditions of every side.

Chapter 60 · The First Agreement Breaks

The line drawn in charcoal upon the damp bamboo board had spread in the morning water. Hira Sahni set the board aside instead of wiping the mark away with his palm. “Yesterday this line was used to show the breadth of the landing,” he said, “and look at it today: once it is wet, even its edge can no longer be distinguished. The measurement of land and the permission recorded on paper demand still greater care.” Tara lifted the bamboo board and placed it in the shade of the hut. The water committee on the opposite bank had appointed a time to meet again; the consent conveyed in the first envoy’s letter extended only to inspection. It had given no one the right to assume that the public path would henceforth stand open on every day.

On the veranda beside the landing, two tables were set facing one another. Jairam, the town’s representative, opened his file; Shabnam Khatun, secretary of the committee on the opposite bank, had an envelope stamped with the seals of her members. Shabnam had authorised the public map to be viewed, but wanted separate consent before the boundary behind a private field was marked out. “If we have to ask the owner of every field each time,” Jairam said, “the inspection will never be finished.” Without raising her voice, Shabnam replied, “And if you go in without asking, no one will accept your measurements even after the inspection is finished.” Naira wrote down the two statements on separate lines.

Ramesh Kushwaha put his basket of vegetables beneath the table. Inside, a few okra pods lay covered by neem leaves; the tips of two leaves had begun to yellow. “They say the watercourse is to be taken through the middle of my field,” he said. “Then why is the space for compensation blank? If the green crop on two kathas of land is washed away, the measuring team’s success will become my household’s loss.” Jairam replied that no decision had yet been made about a permanent canal. “Very well,” said Ramesh. “Then who has already given permission to cut into the earth in the name of a temporary inspection?” For the first time Tara turned away from the joints of the map and looked at the face of the man whose field was at stake.

Hira took out two lengths of cord in different colours. The first marked the dimensions of the old public footpath along which labourers had always walked after disembarking from the boat; the second marked the proposed inspection route along the edge of Ramesh’s field. He explained that a visual examination from the first path and the driving of stakes into the second were two different acts. “Looking at the water from a distance is the beginning of evidence. Driving stakes into a field is a physical intervention. Permission for the first does not automatically authorise the second,” Hira made clear. Shabnam explained the matter to her committee members in their local speech. Padma listened to the translation, then asked again about one uncertain meaning in the original wording. Whatever ambiguity remained was entered in the notes as ambiguity.

An elderly member from the other bank, Jagdish Jha, stood up in favour of an open route. His daughter-in-law was ill; when the rains rose, the small boat stopped running, and the detour along the public footpath meant that medicine did not arrive in time. “I own no field,” he said, “but where is the time we have lost, going round and round in search of a way, accounted for on this paper?” Shabnam supported him. Ramesh did not try to silence him either. “I have no quarrel with opening a route for a patient,” he said. “What I shall oppose is making a permanent road for vehicles across my field without payment, under the name of a patient’s route.” The single expression “open access” had concealed two very different needs.

Before noon the town’s legal assistant read out a draft. Its first line promised “unrestricted entry to all relevant sites for inspection and emergency services.” Shabnam laid a red pencil across the sheet. Ramesh raised his hand as well. “Unrestricted” meant that no one would have the power to prevent entry; yet the draft said nothing about what would constitute an emergency, who would draw the boundary between private and public ground, or who would pay if damage occurred. Jairam wanted the signatures first and the conditions added afterwards. “A person whose price is to be asked only afterwards cannot give consent now,” Tara said. For the first time, the page lay on the table unsigned.

A register was being prepared for the annual Phagun gathering, Public Recital–Open Accounts–Song. The organisers decided that the proposal arising from these negotiations in the rainy season should be carried to Phagun’s public stage. Rashid Bhat brought an old notebook of songs from his household; a municipal employee wanted to use his voice in publicity. “My family’s song is not the property of somebody’s office,” Rashid said.

Padma asked Rashid where the original song ended and his new composition began. He remained silent for a little while, then showed her the margin of the old notebook. “These four lines are my grandmother’s words. The next three are my own; I wrote them when the culvert had broken. They have become one song in performance, but it would be an injustice to call the whole thing an ‘anonymous folk song’ in a public recording without explaining that difference.” Rashid kept the question of his family’s consent separate. Permission was given for only one line to be read at the assembly. A condition was added that a recording of the complete song would require the performers’ written consent and an agreed fee.

Ramesh Ghasi came from the far side of the ground, tightening the leather strap of his instrument. A few adolescents were practising with him. In the organisers’ old expenditure register, the entry “Music—community service” showed a payment of zero rupees. Ramesh set his finger on the page. “My instrument does no less work than anyone's invited song," he said. "When the singer's name is announced from the stage, the accompanying musician's name should be announced too. And the price of rehearsal, travel and performance must not disappear behind the singing." Two schoolchildren listened to the notes from his instrument. He did not tell them to stop practising; he asked only that the organisers reckon with the work.

Karun Damai opened the torn edge of the instrument and showed them how an old knot had worked loose beneath the coloured cloth. "The wage for this repair is not the wage for performing," he said. "On the day I put the instrument's tone right, I shall not be playing on the stage; on the day I play, the tools of repair will remain at home." The manager wanted to enter the two charges on a single slip. Karun cut a piece of old cloth to show the measurements, listed the cost of thread separately, and said he would not give away the same day's labour twice. Listening to him, Ramesh Ghasi added, "Nor is it right to reduce a performer's fee by deducting the cost of repairs." Each made a separate entry for the payment due to him.

Farzana Churihar brought three pairs of bangles in the fold of her clothing. The first were fashioned by hand from lac, the second were of glass, and the third were machine-made goods bought in bulk. At the Public Recital fair there had been a proposal to sell all three for a single price under the name of "handicrafts." Farzana opened out the three categories separately. "Even when I have bought machine-made goods from the market, the customer ought to know what they are. The hand-fashioned lac bangles contain my time, my sweat and my design. Glass bangles carry a different risk of breakage." One woman chose glass bangles, another lac. Farzana respected each customer's choice; she opposed charging a higher price by putting a false name upon the goods.

A municipal employee said that all these matters of music and the marketplace were separate from the water agreement. Naira turned a page in her notebook. "Separate, certainly," she said. "But if the proposed agreement is to be read before everyone, we need a separate account of who pays for the labour of building the stage, playing the instruments, translating, and selling at the fair. None of this establishes anyone's rights over land. It does, however, establish the truth of the event." Tara decided that the public reading of the five conditions concerning water would have its own register of credit and payments for the stage. It would not be a legal part of the agreement, but a record of the labour involved in the gathering.

In the ancient story of Kishkindha, when the search parties had gone far away, Hanuman stood upon the seashore, conscious not only of the strength within him but of the responsibility it carried. He had Rama's signet ring. No one could determine beforehand in what order he would listen to Sita or tell her his message once she recognised the token. Jambavan had urged him to put his strength to use; but the haste of the searcher must not efface Sita's wishes. This question from the ancient story was no rule for a modern agreement about water. In that story a messenger was learning the limits of the trust placed in him; here two communities were setting down in writing the boundaries of their respective rights.

At the modern landing, one of Shabnam's committee members asked for the page of names inside the confidential envelope to be opened. "If the names are not shown, who will receive compensation?" he asked. Naira replied, "The identities of individual claimants will be examined at an authorised hearing. For a public reading, the field numbers, the kinds of loss and the number of objections can be given; home addresses need not automatically be disclosed." Shabnam said that some of her members were unwilling to make their names public because of threats made in the past. Ramesh favoured keeping the measurements of his own field in the open, but even he agreed that the decision to reveal someone else's private page was not his to make.

Hira pointed out an error in an old village measuring gauge. In one sample, the mark indicating water level was covered by a stain of paint; in another, the date was not clearly legible. "I cannot tell you the maximum capacity of the flow from these figures," he said. Jairam asked, "If someone is in immediate difficulty, does that mean nothing can be done?" Hira replied, "Rubbish can be cleared from a safe stretch of bank, but the mouth of the channel must not be cut open to change the flow without an inspection. Arrange the emergency warnings first." Tara wrote down that the five conditions for a trial must clearly distinguish the procedure for seasonal measurements from that for an emergency.

Then the real obstacle to an agreement emerged. The town wanted both the old footpath and the adjoining new inspection route declared public, so that its team could enter whenever it chose. A majority from the opposite bank acknowledged the old use of the footpath but insisted that permission from the owner must precede entry upon a private boundary. Ramesh demanded a written assessment of damage to his crop. Jagdish Jha continued to insist that the patient's route must not be obstructed in the meantime. For half an hour the wording changed—"open," "conditional," "emergency," "regulated"—but no single word could pay the cost of all those interests at once.

At mealtime Ramesh's wife came from the field. She wanted not merely to speak for her household but to find a way to reach the market and buy medicine for her little daughter. She opened a small bundle of okra and laid it on the table. "This is fit to eat," she said, "but if the field is flooded three days from now, the plants will rot. Will you measure the value of the crop by today's market price, or by the time I have spent growing it?" Ramesh was silent. An official said that estimated rates would be calculated according to the government's prescribed method. "Very well," Ramesh's wife replied.

“Show us the method, and do not let the wages of the women who weeded the field disappear.” At that Tara gave her a separate line on which to sign.

When the meeting resumed, Jairam pressed for one short sentence: “During the period of inspection, claimants shall not raise questions of compensation.” Ramesh pushed the paper away. His wife said that such a restriction would amount to a demand for silence while their crops were being damaged. Some members of Shabnam’s committee wanted to sign immediately in the hope that the town’s money would pay for a small culvert. Others feared that a right once surrendered would never be recovered. The secretary counted the small voting slips. Five members opposed the broad wording permitting entry; three were willing to consider it subject to conditions. The date of this count was recorded, but the decision was not printed as unanimous.

Naira took out a clean sheet and headed it: “First Agreement Unsuccessful: Five Possible Conditions for Consent to a Trial.” The first condition required separate maps of the public footpath, the private field boundary and the emergency route for patients; consent from the person concerned before entering private property; and a public account of limited safety work in an immediate crisis. Beside the word “consent,” Shabnam asked her to add “prior information,” so that families with little formal schooling could understand the notice. Ramesh objected that merely delivering information did not establish permission to enter. Naira kept the two statements separate; she did not hurry them into a false reconciliation.

The second condition required measurements in both the rainy and the dry seasons, gauges set in safe locations, technical verification and access to the original data, together with a written procedure for correcting an erroneous measurement. Beside his own name, Hira had the words “adviser on inspection, not arbiter of ownership” entered. The third condition required advance notice of any planned release of water, warnings in languages understood by the settlements, and a separate, immediate message in the event of sudden danger, specifying safe routes for children, older people and families with sick members. Malati’s communal tap and Jagdish’s route for patients had helped give rise to this condition, but their private addresses were not entered on the public sheet.

The fourth condition called for separate assessments of possible losses to field crops, women’s wages, livestock routes, nurseries, fish and makhana, and prohibited permanent excavation until the hearing of objections and responsibility for compensation had been made clear. Ramesh and his wife read the wording of that line once more. The fifth condition required a public account of expenditure and receipts for inspections, transport, craftwork, language assistance and safety work; restrictions on the circulation of pages bearing private names; verification of representatives’ authority; and rules for safeguarding original documents. To the last line Naira added: “Agreement to consider these five conditions is not an agreement itself, nor a ruling on any crime or on the ownership of land.”

Growing irritated, Jairam said, “Then what use is it? The news will have to say that the meeting was a success.” Naira answered, “Its success goes only this far: the parties who disagreed were able to set down their reasons for disagreeing. No agreement has been reached. How can the report say that one has?” Jairam wanted the brief press note to include the words “open access approved.” Shabnam herself struck them out. Tara recorded the time and counted those present; no one had signed an agreement. The parties acknowledged only that they had received the text of the five conditions. Two stamped copies were made, and the confidential envelope containing objections was sealed again.

Outside the landing, news had already spread through the crowd. One man accused Ramesh of blocking the way for patients going to the hospital. Jagdish Jha stepped forward himself. “Ramesh listened when I spoke about the time my sick relative was losing,” he said. “The disagreement concerns where the footpath ends and his field begins. No one has opposed the proposal to open a route for patients.” Another man claimed that Shabnam’s committee was hiding something inside the private fields. Naira made it clear that refusing to publish names did not prove that a crime was being concealed. The search for Mithun, the hospital’s materials register and the claim concerning the water lease remained, as before, in three separate files.

By the time the day arrived for that year’s annual Phagun celebration of Public Recital–Open Accounts–Song, the pages from the unsuccessful meeting had been opened again. During the intervening months, minor repairs had been made to the safe public footpath, but no agreement had yet been reached over unrestricted access to the private field. In front of the stage there was dry dust instead of wet earth, and local children were tying up coloured paper flags. The organisers decided that the five conditions should be read aloud first. Padma explained their meaning in accessible Maithili; Shabnam gave a summary in the language used by her committee. The seal on the page of private names was not broken in public.

At the open-accounts table, Rashid Bhat read a line of his song, but stopped the equipment before the recording began. “This part may be shared with the people present at the stage,” he said. “For publicity beyond it, my family’s and the accompanying musicians’ permission must be obtained separately.” The organisers showed him the payment slip. A performance fee for Ramesh Ghasi’s music was approved, along with the announcement of his name from the stage; a separate receipt was prepared for Karun Damai’s materials and labour in repairing the instrument. Karun touched its newly tightened fastening and signalled to Ramesh to bring it into tune. The music began, but the accounts were not closed.

Farzana set three boards outside her little stall: “Handmade lac,” “Glass,” and “Machine-made goods.” For each, the material, risk of breakage and price were clearly stated. Two customers first chose the cheaper machine-made bangles; a third customer’s daughter liked the colour of the lac. Farzana laughed. “You have chosen knowing the price. That is what pleases me.” She refused the request to dance on the publicity stage. The fair was a day for her to earn her living. Karun’s younger brother bought a pair of glass bangles for his mother, and Farzana wrapped them in a separate piece of paper. There was no obligation for everyone at a community gathering to perform the same role.

Ramesh Kushwaha stood behind the stage with his wife. Looking at the public accounts, a representative asked why the amount entered for damage to the field was still zero. “A zero here does not mean there has been no loss,” Ramesh’s wife said. “It means no payment has yet been made. Keep two separate lines: the amount claimed and the amount paid.” Tara had the register corrected then and there. Ramesh did not automatically open the way across his field, but he did grant permission for a limited stockpile of earth needed to repair the public footpath safely: one week, at a specified edge, without cutting the crop. On the sheet setting out the conditions measured by his wife were their separate signatures, hers and Ramesh’s.

That evening Tara separated two copies of the five conditions. One was for the public open-accounts register; the other preserved the sequence of original consents and objections. The sealed appendix containing private names was kept safely in a third place. Naira allowed only this sentence to appear in the press note: “First negotiations on open access unsuccessful; five conditions for joint testing recorded.” The file concerning Devavrat’s assistance to the hospital was not brought to that table; neither was the copy concerning the search for Mithun. Keeping records distinct sometimes gives justice room in which to work.

On the way home, Ramesh’s wife picked through the okra left from that day for her daughter. “We have allowed them to keep earth there for a week,” Ramesh asked. “Won’t that create trouble later?” She replied, “The boundary has been measured, the period written down, and they must ask for consent again. If trouble comes, we shall speak again.” She showed her daughter a tiny okra flower on the plate. Across the water, Shabnam’s boat moved patiently out towards the open current. The five conditions were in her bag; no one regarded them as a certificate of victory. When the old tale of Ganga’s condition opens next, this experience will remain in the reader’s mind: how far the unspoken part of a promise may reach into another person’s life.

Chapter 61 · Ganga's Condition

Far from Hastinapura, where the river curved, a footprint lay in the wet sand. A thin runnel of water entered it and then withdrew. Shantanu reined in his horse beneath the shade of a kadamba tree. Mist was rising from the far bank, and at the water's edge a woman was wringing the wet hem of her woven garment. Her hands moved with the certainty of someone who knew the river's ebb and rise. The king dismounted and went forward. The woman raised her head. They were seeing one another for the first time, yet there was no startled haste of unfamiliarity in her eyes.

"Who are you?" Shantanu asked. The woman replied, "If I tell you the name you ask for, will you have understood everything about me?" The king fell silent. She gathered water in her cupped hands and let it return to the river. "A name is where recognition begins, not where it ends," she said. The king renewed his request that she accompany him. Before accepting, she imposed one condition: he must not question the reasons for her actions, prevent her from doing what she chose, or address her with insulting words. If that bond were broken, she would leave. Shantanu heard the final sentence of the condition. He gave himself no time to understand how far the silence demanded by the words between might reach.

On her first day in the palace, the woman introduced herself as Ganga. The serving women in the courtyard dried her damp clothes, which still bore the smell of the river. At mealtime she did not ask for a large platter; she ate warm rice and vegetables from a bowl and listened through the window to the moving air. Shantanu liked these unassuming tastes of hers. One evening they sat together on the roof by the battlements. The king spoke at length of quarrels at court, and Ganga listened attentively. "Why do you never tell me about your day?" he asked. Ganga laughed. "Today I listened to the affairs of your court. In my day, a branch became caught against the river embankment. Three boatmen were needed to remove it. Do you know their names?" The king could not say.

Their affection deepened with time. Though she lived within the palace, Ganga did not abandon her path to the river, and after the affairs of the kingdom Shantanu would walk with her to the bank. When their first child was born, lamps burned in the palace and the serving women changed the cloth in the lying-in room. Shantanu felt the newborn's palm close around his finger. The whiteness of the tiny fingernails astonished him. Ganga held the child to her breast and gazed at him for a long while. Then, in a watch of the night, she took the baby in her arms and went towards the river. The guard recognised her and stepped aside.

When the king followed her, Ganga was standing knee-deep in the water. A small wave had touched her arm; there was no sound from the child. A question lodged in Shantanu's throat. Ganga looked up but spoke not a word that night. Summoning all the strength in his body, the king recalled the condition he had accepted: no questions, no restraint. He returned to the palace. A vessel of milk remained in the lying-in room, and a fly was beginning to settle upon its rim. Shantanu reached out and brushed it away. In that insignificant action he understood for the first time that the price of keeping a promise could be paid with the absence of another person's body.

Fewer lamps were lit in the palace when the second child was born. The king remembered the first night not with hatred but with fear and hope. He told himself that what had happened once would not happen again. With the baby held against her breast, Ganga went towards the river. Shantanu followed as far as the doorway and stopped. In the morning a maid asked him in which chest the newborn's clothes should be placed. The king lifted a lid and closed it again. He had no answer. Ganga returned and folded the cloth of the empty cradle herself. There was hardness in her face, but once her hand trembled. Shantanu saw the tremor without knowing what it meant.

Through the third, fourth and fifth births, the routines of court continued. Border disputes, taxes upon fields, boatmen's complaints, fodder for the horses —nothing stood still. But for Shantanu, time had divided into two parts: the days when he could feel a child's touch, and the nights when he could not gather the courage to ask the next question. He ordered his councillors to make the riverbanks more secure, yet did not think it proper even to question the guards about what happened in his private chambers. His royal commands reached across the city; they did not reach his own newborn children.

After the sixth child's birth, Shantanu said to Ganga, "I want the child's name entered in the records of the kingdom." She looked at him. "Will giving him a name protect his life?" she asked. The king answered, "How will people remember him without a name?" Ganga said, "Remembrance is greater than a name. But this question of yours is the beginning of asking why I do what I do." Shantanu pressed no further. That night he wrote only two words on a private palm leaf: "Sixth son." Not a single letter could bring back that child's life.

When the seventh was born, Ganga lingered a little longer. The baby had caught hold of her finger. She removed her gold bracelet and laid it beside the bed so that it would not scrape his cheek. Shantanu stood in the doorway. He wanted to say, I am with you, but stop doing this. All he said was, "The water is rising outside." "I have seen," Ganga replied. When night came, the seventh child too vanished into the river. This time the king did not watch from a distance; he knew what had happened from the smell of the river. His own part in the decision was becoming unmistakable within his silence.

Ganga carried a secret story that Shantanu had not yet heard. The ancient Vasus had been cursed to human birth for the theft, from Vasishtha's hermitage, of a sacred cow descended from Kamadhenu. Ganga had promised to release them through brief human lives. When she made that promise, she had not imagined the weight of those lives as a mother's body would come to know it. The seven children who had dissolved into the river's current were not merely a number representing freedom from a curse. Each had a different face; each time her finger had been left empty. Yet she had not shared with the king her reason for what she was doing.

One day, in the palace's little courtyard, Ganga was picking through rice with her hands. Shantanu sat beside her. "When does being a king seem difficult?" Ganga asked. Shantanu replied, "When my decision destroys someone's home." Ganga set a small stone apart from the grains. "And when you make no decision?" she asked again. For the first time Shantanu looked directly at her. He wanted to say that the condition restrained him, but he knew that accepting the condition had itself been his own decision. Neither of them answered Ganga's question that day.

When news of the eighth pregnancy came, fear and tenderness entered the women's quarters together. An elderly midwife said that this time she would tie the baby's cloth securely. Shantanu was troubled to hear it: how could a cord of cloth save a child from death? "If the question arises of stopping the mother's action, what will you do?" he asked the midwife. She looked at him not as a king but as a frightened father. "I shall look for the newborn's breath," she said, "and try to save whoever I can. I do not know the meaning of a secret vow." In that brief reply Shantanu found a courage that the long discourses of the royal assembly had never given him.

The night of the eighth child's birth was extraordinarily still. Shantanu pressed his ear close enough to hear the baby's heartbeat. This act of listening was not a kingly duty; it was the small work of a father. Ganga covered the child with the end of her sari and set out towards the river. This time Shantanu followed. On the sand his footprints at first mingled with Ganga's and then parted from them. Reaching the river's edge, he said clearly, "Enough. Not this child." Once the words had left his mouth, he knew that the vow was broken. But the child's living body was before him, and for the first time its protection had been spoken aloud.

Ganga turned. There was more profound exhaustion than anger in her voice. "You have abandoned your promise, Shantanu." The king said, "I have lost seven children. My silence did not protect them. If you have a reason, tell me; but I will not let another living child lose his life before my eyes." Ganga clasped the baby more tightly. "You had the right to ask questions," she said, "but you surrendered it in exchange for the condition. Now you have changed your decision. For this child I shall open another road into life."

Standing on the bank, Shantanu heard for the first time of the Vasus' curse and Ganga's promise to release them. She explained that seven of the Vasus were to have brief human births, while the consequence of the eighth one's actions required a long human life. The king listened, but the empty cradles of the lying-in room kept passing before his eyes. "If this was the rule, why did you not tell me before?" he asked. Ganga answered, "I concealed the reason for my condition. I too shall bear the weight of this decision." She told him the story of the curse, but did not ask him to regard the pain of the dead children as cancelled by that story.

"Where will the eighth child live now?" Shantanu asked. Ganga looked towards the mist floating above the river. "He must be taught knowledge, the use of weapons and the principles of conduct. You see your prince only as an heir to the throne; I want him to return with the ability to question." "Are you taking him away from me again?" the king asked. "Yes," Ganga said. "With me his life will be preserved and he will receive an education. You broke the condition on the day you stood up for his life. Now you must pay the price of enduring this separation as well."

The child slept against his mother's shoulder. The king wished to touch the tiny nails on his feet. Ganga did not stop him. Shantanu placed a finger against the child's sole, as though such a touch were testimony greater than any oath. "I want to call him by his name," he said. "Devavrata," Ganga replied. Shantanu repeated the name slowly. It could not settle the account of the first seven absences, but for the eighth child it became a form of address turned towards the future. Carrying him, Ganga disappeared into the river mist.

For many years Shantanu continued to govern his kingdom. Counsel about wars, marriage alliances, irrigation canals and the needs of his subjects returned again and again. Yet one question from the river remained fixed within him: which promise is it just to keep, and when does it become necessary to resist it? He did not turn the seven empty cradles into a proclamation of victory in the kingdom's history. Devavrata's name remained written on a private palm leaf. With time the ink of that name grew pale; the question did not.

One day, approaching the river, Shantanu saw that one part of its current had been arrested in an extraordinary fashion. With a dense rank of arrows, a young man was holding back the force of one branch of the river. He studied carefully the speed of each released arrow and the water's response. Shantanu stopped, astonished by his skill. The child's face had become a young man's, yet at the corners of his eyes a line of old recognition was beginning to appear. Ganga revealed herself there. She told the king that Devavrata had been educated in the Vedas, statecraft and the arts of arms, and recounted the names of his teachers and the attainments of his learning. Then she brought the young man before his father.

Devavrata bowed in greeting. Shantanu laid a hand upon his shoulder and for some time said nothing. This silence did not mean the terror of those seven nights; yet the empty space of the past between father and son remained within it. “Will you tell me the story of my childhood?” the young man asked. Shantanu said, “I shall tell you what I saw. What I did not understand, I shall not claim as knowledge of my own.” Ganga was listening from a distance. For her, the hour of leaving her son was different from the condition laid down at their first meeting: this time she did not forbid Shantanu to ask questions.

In Videhapur, during the week after the first agreement had broken down, Naira unfolded a neatly creased sheet of paper. Beside it lay a carefully preserved copy of the five conditions sent by Shabnam’s committee. The new sheet contained several lines copied from an old register of wages; with it had been deposited a separate receipt and one person’s written statement. Mahesh, who had been called to examine the sequence of the documents, remained standing in the doorway. “The three seem to point to the same thing,” he said, “but I am not going to join the names yet.” Naira drew out a chair for him.

The register contained the name “Mithua.” The second paper was an old boat-fare slip, bearing only the abbreviation “Mi.” before an amount and an indistinct date. The third was a statement by an elderly worker at the landing who said he had heard somebody addressed as “Mithu.” Naira understood that, on hearing the name of Lata’s missing son Mithun, someone would be eager to make the three records agree. But three questions remained unanswered: the date on the slip was unclear; the time referred to in the statement was uncertain; and no one knew who the “Mithua” in the register had been. These papers might offer a possible lead in the search for the child, not a confirmed identification.

When Lata entered the room, Naira first asked her permission. “I will show you three documents,” she said. “If you wish, you may read a private copy. I shall not attach this supposition to your son’s name in any public notice.” Lata took the papers in her hands. Straightening the wet corner of the slip with her finger, she asked, “Who had this slip?” Mahesh replied, “The name of the person who collected it is recorded, but there is no signature from the owner of the original.” Lata said, “Then ask that person first. I need hope, but I will not have you seize another child and bring him here by calling him my Mithun.” Her voice was weary; her decision was clear.

Aditi came into the room carrying a separate envelope of hospital supply records. Seeing Naira’s papers, she did not place it beside them. “Documents relating to the hospital’s public payments have a different original source and a different purpose,” she said. Naira wrote three headings: “Writing directly observed”; “Possible resemblance of letters and sounds”; “Unverified inference concerning the person’s identity.” The letters “Mithua” could be seen in the register. That the “Mi.” on the slip referred to the same person was not proved.

The old man's statement concerned a name heard, not a face seen. Mahesh entered the details of the custodian of each document on a protected sheet.

Tara arrived carrying the inspection map of the Binaut landing. She asked why the private names had not been entered on the public sheet of the five conditions. Naira replied, "If permission to publish has not been given, I will not treat silence as consent and print them. The agreement sheet belongs to everyone; protecting the source of this statement is a separate matter." Tara agreed, but added that the wages owed to people named in the labour register must not thereby be made secret. "Let their names remain protected," Mahesh said, "but the amounts on the receipts and the timetable for verification must reach the original claimants." A claim number and date for a reply were therefore recorded without making anyone's name public.

At evening Naira gave Lata not a photograph of the original slip but a written description of it and a list of questions. "You may make corrections to this list according to what you consent to share," she said. Lata folded the paper and put it into her bag. "If he turns out not to be my son, you will not stop looking?" she asked. "No," Naira answered. "The search will neither begin nor end on the strength of such a paper." Lata rose to return home. Mahesh accompanied her to the door, but even when asked for the source's name, Naira did not disclose it publicly that day. The memory of her earlier error in publication was making her cautious.

On the ancient riverbank, Devavrata, returning with his father, saw the city's great gate for the first time. The gatekeeper bowed to him as a prince. Devavrata halted. Rather than speak of what Ganga had taught him, he looked at the narrow footpath beside the palace. "Is there a way through this gate for everyone?" he asked. Shantanu replied, "The rules of royal business are different." Devavrata asked again, "And what of those who were not consulted when the rules were made?" Shantanu did not answer at once. His son's question recalled to him the silence of the night of his eighth child.

That day Ganga was moving away in the river's current. She carried three different burdens: the brief lives of seven infants, the long life of the eighth, and Shantanu's promise, broken only after so much delay. She had explained her condition, but she did not take upon herself the decisions that remained to the king and their son. Shantanu walked with Devavrata through the royal gate. He thought: I broke my silence once to protect my son; what future promise will bind him and me again? The answer lay in the decisions of the next generation of the royal house, not in Ganga's story.

That night in Videhapur, Naira wrote a brief note in the margin of her papers: "Accepting a condition, understanding a condition, and bearing its consequences are three different acts." The copy of the five conditions from the failed agreement remained safely behind it. The original envelope containing Mahesh's statement was still sealed, and a separate request had been sent to verify the date on the boat-fare slip. At home Lata put away Mithun's old clay horse. Her hope rested not on the resemblance of a new name, but on the right to keep searching. On both sides of the river the water flowed according to its own course. The price of a promise written on paper would now be measured by its consequences.

Chapter 62 · Bhishma's Vow

In the inner courtyard of the royal palace, Devavrata was unstringing his bow. A small bandage covered the fingers he had grazed while practising how to check the force of a river's current. Shantanu had brought him into the city and acknowledged him as his son; the courtiers had shown him the seat reserved for the crown prince. Yet that day Devavrata noticed that his father sat before a meal without touching a grain. The palace drums sounded at dusk, but neither music nor sleep reached the king's chamber. When asked what troubled him, Shantanu said, "My mind is weary of the affairs of state." His eyes were turned towards the river, where Ganga had once spoken the final meaning of her condition and departed.

Devavrata did not wish to burden the king with another question. Instead he summoned the royal charioteer aside. The man had accompanied Shantanu on his journeys for many years. "After which journey did my father's face change so greatly?" Devavrata asked. At first the charioteer sheltered behind the king's privacy; then he explained plainly that Shantanu had met a young boatwoman named Satyavati at a river landing. The prospect of marriage had pleased the king, but her family wanted royal rights of succession for any children she might bear. "Your place as crown prince stands in the way of that promise," the charioteer said. Devavrata asked, "What did my father say to me about it?" "Nothing. He valued your rights above his own desire." The answer deepened the son's affection for his father, but it also awakened an old fear of silence.

At dawn Devavrata went down to the river landing. The day's fish consignments had already gone to market, and empty baskets stood upside down in the sunlight. Satyavati was tightening a fresh bandage around an injured finger of her younger brother. Her father, who worked at the landing, was adding up the day's accounts with small wooden counters. He rose when he saw Devavrata, but Satyavati did not stop what she was doing. "Yesterday you heard my question," she said. "Today I have come to answer it," Devavrata replied. She tied the knot in her brother's bandage and sent him back to work. Her gaze rested not on the royal visitor before her but on the possible consequences of the words he had come to speak.

Her father had insisted that a son born of Satyavati should inherit the throne. Devavrata considered the royal council, the kingdom's old ceremonies of consecration, and the rights of father and son. "I relinquish my claim to the throne of Hastinapura," he said. "If Satyavati has children, I shall recognise their right to rule and protect that right." The ministers standing at the landing stirred at his declaration. An elderly minister, well versed in affairs of state, asked, "During the king's lifetime, the crown prince's authority lives not merely on paper but in the trust of the army and the esteem of the people. Who will witness your promise?" Devavrata answered, "All who hear it now. But it must also be written down and declared before the next assembly."

Satyavati's father set his wooden counters aside. Pleasure and anxiety appeared together on his face. "You may surrender your own right," he said, "but what if you have a son tomorrow? Who will prevent him from claiming the kingship despite the words you speak today?" There was more than greed in the question: the father knew how alliances could shift at court. Devavrata understood that relinquishing a claim in the present did not, by itself, prevent a dispute in the future. At a fish market, the bargain struck for the first boatload did not bind the price of the next; on a throne, however, the lives of many people were at stake. Seeing Devavrata fall silent, the father spoke again. "I will send my daughter to the palace, but I will not leave her children to an uncertain tomorrow."

Devavrata moved towards the water's edge. The cold river touched the grazed skin of his fingers. He remembered the years of his education—his time with Ganga, his master in archery, and the question he had asked at the palace gate after his reunion with his father: what happens to those who were never consulted when a rule was made? This time the rule was about to issue from his own mouth. He turned towards the gathering. "I shall not marry," Devavrata said. "I shall observe lifelong celibacy and devote myself to protecting this royal house; I shall claim neither children nor the throne for myself." After he had spoken, everyone at the landing stood motionless for a while.

The ancient telling describes flowers raining from the sky at this moment and the gods crying out the name "Bhishma." The royal priest would record the celestial spectacle as a sign of the vow's greatness. But what Satyavati's younger brother saw at the landing was simply this: this young man would never have a child of his own to call his child. The high councillors offered praise while the knot in the bandage bit into the boatman's wounded finger. Satyavati asked Devavrata, "Have you made this decision in the name of my condition, or of your own judgement?" Devavrata stopped short. "I have made it myself. I shall not place its burden upon you." Satyavati's expression softened a little. "Then do not call it the price of my marriage. If it becomes a price, one day someone will try to collect the debt of this sacrifice from my children."

The royal priest urged that mantras be recited at the announcement of the new name, Bhishma. Devavrata bowed and accepted the name, but ordered the charioteer first to carry written notice of his renunciation of royal office to the assembly. Satyavati's father asked, "And your own wish? Will it never change?" "A human being's wishes can change," Bhishma said, "but I have vowed to remain faithful to this one." The father lowered his head. He had secured the promise of a safe future for his daughter; the cost of the young man's entire life could not be reckoned with his wooden counters.

When Satyavati went indoors, it was not her mother but her little brother who asked first, “Sister, does this mean you won't have to row a boat any more?” She laughed. “If I stop rowing, must I stop understanding the water?” He held up his bandaged finger. “And what about me?” “Your wages will still be paid in your own name,” Satyavati said. “My marriage does not wipe away what is owed at the landing.” She told her father that the fishing nets, boats, and outstanding dues of their household must not all be entered under the king's name as part of her wedding gifts. Her father was startled at first, then agreed. This small domestic decision was quite different from the royal vow, yet Satyavati's own future depended upon it too.

By the time Devavrata returned to court, the news had already reached Shantanu. The king held his dish before him but could not swallow a morsel. “I did not ask this of you,” he said. His son replied, “You remained silent. I believed that my right was the cause of your silence.” Shantanu asked, “And if your belief was mistaken?” For the first time, a shadow of uncertainty crossed his son's face. “Then I made an irrevocable vow for a cause I did not know with certainty. But I accept it now as my own decision.” Shantanu remembered the night of Ganga's eighth son, when the delay in breaking silence had exacted so terrible a price. Today his son had given a meaning to that silence on his own.

The king granted his son a boon: death would have no power to compel Bhishma until he himself consented to the hour of his death. The court regarded it as an unequalled reward. Bhishma remained seated beside his father for some time. “The right to choose the hour of death is not the right to choose every day of life,” he said softly. Shantanu listened. His son said nothing more, but the king understood that this boon could not restore his son's right to marriage, children, or the ordinary joys of a household. Though father and son had met so many times before, never had they felt quite so alone together.

The following day, the declaration concerning succession to the throne was read aloud in the royal assembly. The elder councillors assented, but the commander of the army raised a question: if Satyavati's children succeeded to the throne, who would possess the authority to educate them and to decide how the army should act in wartime? Bhishma replied, “Officers of the state will serve the state's interests. I shall provide protection and education, not become its owner.” “And if the king disagrees with you?” “Then he shall remain king, with his disagreement intact.” Some listeners were reassured; others were sceptical. In government, a vow governed the conduct of one man. Without written rules for institutions, it could not of itself sustain an enduring order.

Satyavati came to the palace. On her first evening she went to the courtyard well, where a maidservant insisted on bringing her water in a vessel reserved for the royal family. “I can draw it myself,” Satyavati said, but the maidservant grew frightened. “If the queen lowers the bucket herself, I shall be blamed.” Satyavati left the bucket where it was, sat beside the woman, and asked which rules had been written down and which were obeyed only out of fear. On returning to her chamber, she requested time at court to hear an answer. Speaking of the boatmen in the family into which she had been born, she said that the comforts of the palace must not render the labour of her first home invisible.

For the first time, Shantanu sat with Satyavati in the palace garden without any ministers attending them. Cold water had gathered near the flowering shrubs. “Are you happy here?” the king asked. “Sometimes,” Satyavati answered. “But the court still displays your son's vow as though it were an ornament belonging to me. I fear that if I disagree with any decision, someone will say, ‘Even after so great a sacrifice?’” Shantanu gave no reply. She went on, “I married of my own free will. Your son's vow belongs to him. Judge my decisions by what I do, not by the account of his sacrifice.” This time the king spoke his agreement, though the fulfilment of those words would have to be tested over many days.

The years turned. Satyavati gave birth to Chitrangada and Vichitravirya. Once, in the rainy season, the boys made little paper boats inside the palace. Chitrangada marked his boat with a dot of gold-coloured paint, while his younger brother launched a plain leaf boat into a runnel of water. Bhishma stood beside their play, not as a guard but as a spectator. “Uncle, where is your boat?” Vichitravirya asked. Bhishma folded a leaf for him. The child asked again, “Why don't your children come and play with me?” Bhishma's hands stopped. He did not tell a lie. “I have made a vow that means I shall have no children.” The little boy did not understand; he simply placed Bhishma's boat beside his own.

Within the laughter of that household, the question of kingship continued to grow in silence. When teaching Chitrangada the use of weapons, Bhishma explained the conditions of defeat as well as victory. “If your victory lays waste to someone's field, the king must pay for it,” he said. The boy asked, “If you are not the king, why are you teaching me all this?” Bhishma answered, “My vow not to take the throne does not free me from responsibility.” Satyavati stood on the threshold of her chamber and heard their exchange. It comforted her, but she knew that the line between protection and decision would have to be drawn again when the boys grew older.

When Shantanu fell ill, the sound of physicians' footsteps became more frequent in the palace. One day the king summoned Bhishma to speak privately. “You gave your life for my happiness,” he said. Bhishma shook his head. “No, Father. I made a decision, and its consequences remain with me. If you call it the price of your happiness, you will turn what I did back into a debt you owe." Shantanu gazed at his son's face for a long time. "Then accept one thing: my silence was never an order to you." Bhishma answered, "And let my vow never become an order to silence those who come after us." That day father and son did not settle an account of blame. They shared a brief conversation about a difficult truth.

After Shantanu's death, the royal assembly fixed the day for Chitrangada's coronation. Bhishma himself brought forward the crown. Some councillors proposed that orders be issued in Bhishma's name until the boy came of age. Bhishma accepted administrative oversight, but stipulated in writing that responsibility must be recorded whenever the royal seal was used. Satyavati read every line of the proposal. "If my son is to be called king," she said, "he must have an education, the right to ask questions, and the means to change a wrong decision." Some councillors thought the queen was demanding too much, but Bhishma had her words entered into the minutes of the assembly.

In time Chitrangada began displaying his courage beyond the duties of government. He came into conflict with a Gandharva king who bore the same name, Chitrangada. The war dragged on, and in the end the king lost his life. When the news arrived, what remained in the palace courtyard was not the glitter of weapons but the memory of the two brothers' unfinished paper boats. The councillors came before Satyavati carrying the document of succession. She asked first about her son's funeral rites and the wounded soldiers. "The king has died," she said, "but who will look after the homes of the ordinary people who fell beside him?" Bhishma arranged assistance for the soldiers' families. Yet for all he did, he could not bring back the son whom he had helped to raise.

Vichitravirya was still very young. The royal assembly seated him upon the throne, but the heavy work of governing continued to come into Bhishma's hands. Again and again the same fear rose in Satyavati's mind: the future of this house had been reckoned in two sons, and one was gone. Bhishma had closed the path to descendants of his own for ever at that river landing. A minister asked him in private, "You perform the king's duties, but the name is his. How long can such an imbalance last?" Bhishma answered, "That is why our first task must be to make the king capable. If I alter my vow to conceal the weakness of the kingdom, I shall create a second problem."

One evening Satyavati summoned Bhishma. Beside her lay a little wooden bow from Chitrangada's childhood, its string broken. "My father sought an assurance about the future," she said. "For that future you closed one road through your life. Now Chitrangada is no more. What can I say with certainty about Vichitravirya's life?" Before answering, Bhishma took the wooden bow in his hands. "Nothing with certainty. I shall see to his safety and education." Satyavati asked, "When the question of marriage arises, where will his own wish have a place?" "It is my responsibility to understand that wish," Bhishma replied. Her eyes rested on his face for a moment. “Not only his,” she said. “The wish of the person he is to marry must have a place as well.”

That same evening in Videhapur, Naira was examining the public copy of the five conditions upon which the attempted agreement had failed. Tara arrived with a fresh document. It contained a proposal from the other side for testing the gate: “Open the passage first; the particulars of compensation and the safety inspection can be settled afterwards.” Tara set the paper on the table. “They say this is a condition of trust,” she explained. Naira asked, “Has the trust of the person who must yield a passage beside his field been put into writing?” Tara shook her head. “No. Ramesh's objection is still on the original page.”

Mahesh came in as well. He carried a receipt from the source of a wage register bearing the name “Mithua.” The letter stated that permission to examine the handwriting in the register was limited: the original page must not be made public under anybody else's name. Naira placed the letter separately from the papers concerning the search for Mithun. “I cannot change the name of somebody's child on the strength of my own guess,” she said. Mahesh asked, “And if the receipt is withheld, what becomes of the right to wages?” Tara replied, “The claim number, the amount, and the hearing date will reach the person entitled to them. Keeping a private name out of print must not close the road to payment.”

Lata had come to ask when the next search would take place. Naira explained that day's new information with care: the source of the register had been found, but the person's identity had not been established. Lata remained silent for a while, then said, “The belief that my son will come home one day keeps me alive. But I will not seize someone else's child in the name of that belief. You may write that in your records.” Naira bowed her head. Tara added to the previous page that no one's personal silence was to be counted as consent merely because a collective condition for opening the passage had been stated. At the end of the meeting they sent their reply: permission would not be granted to open the passage unilaterally before the safety inspection and the discussion of compensation.

In ancient Hastinapura, Bhishma was meanwhile consulting the ministers about a forthcoming marriage. Courts in distant lands held ceremonies in which princesses were to choose their husbands, yet the language of assemblies, lineage, and royal prestige often drowned out the princesses' own voices. News reached Bhishma of the marriage gathering for the three daughters of the king of Kashi. A minister said, “This alliance may be necessary to secure Vichitravirya's rights.” Bhishma asked, “Has the prince been asked what he wants?” “We shall speak to everyone,” the minister replied. “And the princesses?” No answer came at once. Satyavati's warning remained in Bhishma's memory, but the immediate crisis at court was driving him towards a hasty decision.

That night, after supper, Bhishma and Satyavati sat in the old palace courtyard where Chitrangada had once launched his paper boats. Inside, Vichitravirya was listening to music. Straightening the wick of a lamp, Satyavati said, “I do not want my son's future built by closing another woman's mouth.” Bhishma replied, “I cannot turn away from my vow.” “I am not asking you to,” Satyavati said. “I am asking whether, even as you keep your vow, you can hear another person's right to choose.” Bhishma remained silent for a long time. The vow he had made at the river landing was being tested again—not in battle, but by this question within the home.

In the morning the councillors set about preparing for the journey to Kashi. They oiled the axle of the chariot, inspected the horses' hooves, and shook the dust from the old standard. Bhishma gave his charioteer not an order for war but a list of what the journey required. He was thinking: I relinquished my rights for my father's happiness; I gave my time to protect my brother's kingdom. At what point does my authority end when I must decide another person's future? The journey did not stop for want of an answer. The chariot stood ready at the palace gate, while the lives of Kashi's three princesses had not yet been touched by any news of the decision being made.

As the day advanced in Videhapur, Tara said to Naira, “The agreement has broken down, yet the work has not stopped. But the five conditions we wrote must not one day become weapons against our own people.” Naira answered, “The test of a written promise lies not in its announcement, but in whether those whose lives it affects have the right to speak.” She entered the date of the receipt, kept Ramesh's objection concerning his field safe, and did not close Lata's search file. The chariot of Hastinapura and the gate of Videhapur did not belong to the same history. Yet in both places, if anyone mistook a vow of their own for a final solution, there might be too little room left to hear the questions of those who came after.

Chapter 63 · Amba's Time

Inside the royal palace of Kashi, turmeric had been set out in three brass trays. Attendants were arranging different flowers beside each tray; Amba herself changed the flowers around the largest. "The scent of these flowers gives me a headache," she said. The attendant grew flustered. Changing the flowers to suit a princess's taste on the day of her swayamvara was no great matter, yet every task was so tightly bound by rules that even an ordinary wish sounded like a command. Ambika and Ambalika looked at her and laughed. "How shall we recognise them when all the princes arrive?" Ambalika asked. "When one already knows the person one is looking for, there is no need to examine everyone else," Amba replied. Behind that answer lay an earlier meeting with Shalva and a private hope. Some in the household knew of it, but the royal assembly did not recognise it as a promise put into writing.

Her father's royal priest came to explain the order of the swayamvara: the gate through which each king would enter, the chamber where his weapons would be laid aside, the person who would place the garlands in the princesses' hands. Everything had been decided. "If I have already chosen someone," Amba asked, "at what point in these proceedings may that be said?" The priest smiled. "You will place a garland around his neck before the assembly. What could be clearer?" Amba asked again, "And if someone seizes me before I have had the chance to lift my garland?" Rather than answer, the priest began speaking of the preparations outside. The princess understood: the rules provided for a celebration of her choice, but no means of protecting it.

The swayamvara assembly filled beneath the afternoon sun. Ambika's eyes travelled across the great banners; Ambalika counted the soldiers' weapons. Amba searched the hall for Shalva's seat. He had come. Their eyes met, but before either could rise, the sound of the conch shells changed. A chariot bearing the banner of Hastinapura stopped at the entrance. Bhishma entered the midst of the assembly. He announced that he had come to seek the hands of all three princesses, not as brides for himself but for Vichitravirya. Protests broke out. Some kings laughed about his age; others mocked his vow. His face hardened. Yet in everything Amba heard, there was not a single word about her own consent.

The order of the assembly disintegrated in the noise of battle. The line of guards was broken, the chariot horses thrust forward, and Bhishma seated the three sisters in his chariot. Frightened, Ambalika clung to Ambika's arm. Amba drew back the curtain. "I came here to make my own decision," she said, "not to be told Hastinapura's." Bhishma answered, "The honour of a royal house will be yours." "Whose honour is it," Amba asked, "if it gives me no opportunity to speak?" The charioteer tightened the reins. The wheels began to turn, and the fragrance of the palace flowers fell away into dust.

Shalva pursued them with his soldiers. At a narrow turn in the field he fought Bhishma. The twang of bowstrings mingled with the panting of horses. Shalva's weapon broke; one wheel of his chariot sank into the ground. Bhishma did not take his life. Having won the battle, he went on. From behind the curtain Amba watched Shalva's defeat. She feared for his wounds, but a sharper question arose: who could grant a battle the right to decide her life? She thought that a man able to halt a chariot by the strength of his arms might also have stopped for a single moment to listen.

In Hastinapura a royal residence had been prepared for the three sisters. There was perfumed water, new clothing, and women waiting to welcome them. Amba accepted the garments and set them aside. On entering the queen mother's court, she asked to speak with Satyavati alone. "I had chosen Shalva of my own will," she said. "What happened in the assembly at Kashi was not my marriage. I ask permission to go to him." Satyavati looked at her for some moments. Something of the question she herself had asked at the river landing before her marriage sounded here again. "Your words will be spoken before Bhishma," she said. "No decision about your life shall be taken in your absence."

Bhishma rose as soon as he heard her. "I did not know this fact," he said. "Not knowing is itself a failing in the making of a decision," Amba answered. "How was I seen among the three sisters?" Bhishma had words for his vow, for succession, for the needs of the kingdom; Amba's question brought them to a halt for a moment. He went before the assembly, summoned the priests and guards, and it was announced that Amba would go to the king of her choice. A secure chariot and women attendants were provided for the journey. Ambika and Ambalika embraced their elder sister. "Where is your home now?" Ambalika whispered. Amba could not answer. She thought only that the answer to the question of home remained to be found.

At the gates of Shalva's city the guard asked who she was. Amba gave her name, and the guard stepped aside; yet she was made to wait before she could enter the court. Shalva sat with his injured arm bound in a dressing. At the sight of him Amba went forward. "I have returned," she said. There was relief in her voice: the kind of relief that comes when, after battle, travel, and humiliation, one finds one's own identity again. Shalva's expression remained hard. "You went in Bhishma's chariot," he said. "Did I go," Amba asked, "or was I taken?" Shalva replied, "He defeated me before all the kings."

"How did your defeat become my consent?" Amba asked. Shalva rose from his chair and turned away. He began to speak of what the people of the royal court would say, how the honour of his lineage could be preserved, and what name he would be called if he accepted a princess whom Bhishma had won. Amba listened to each objection. "When I chose you," she said, "you understood that I was a person. Now one man has defeated another, and by that fact I have become an object won in battle?" Shalva spoke of the pain of his humiliation, and Amba did not call that pain false. But she saw clearly that he wished to lay the burden of his defeat upon her body.

At last Shalva refused to marry her. Amba asked him once more, “If Bhishma had never fought you and I had come here on my own feet, what would you have done?” Shalva tried to say that things had been different before. “Then I am not the one who has changed,” Amba replied. “What has changed is the gaze of your society.” She left the court. At the gate an attendant asked, “Where shall we go now?” “First to the place where the decision began,” Amba said. The chariot turned again towards Hastinapura. The dust of the road no longer stung her in quite the same way, for within her grief the shape of a question was becoming definite.

Before Satyavati, Amba recounted Shalva’s entire reply. She omitted nothing: the old promise of love, Shalva’s defeat, his humiliation, and his final refusal. Vichitravirya was called into the assembly. “Your marriage was given as the reason for carrying me away,” Amba asked him. “Now Shalva has refused me. In what position do you see me?” Vichitravirya was uneasy. He had been told that Amba had given her heart to Shalva. He did not wish to enter a marriage in which his acceptance would become another name for Amba’s defeat. “I will not marry you against your will,” he said. “I am not asking for marriage at this moment,” Amba answered. “I am asking for an opportunity to make my position clear.”

Bhishma had said that his vow was unalterable. “You brought me away from my swayamvara,” Amba asked him, “fought Shalva, and then sent me back to him. Your will operated in all three decisions. What decision remains to redress the damage to my life?” Bhishma began explaining that he could not marry for himself. “I am not asking you only for marriage,” Amba said. “I am asking whose responsibility it is for what you called the protection of your lineage. Is there any road to justice for me outside your vow?” Bhishma searched for an answer. The rules of the royal court offered no clear remedy.

The royal priest proposed certain arrangements: refuge with one person, protection under another, a gift from some royal family. “I shall be grateful for food and shelter,” Amba said. “But a gift will not decide my objection.” Satyavati adjourned the assembly. Sitting beside Amba in private, she asked, “What is it that you yourself wish for now?” After a long silence Amba answered, “At first I wanted a life with Shalva. Now I want anyone who makes a claim over my life to be required to answer for it. Without that answer, I will not move towards another marriage.” Satyavati did not restrain her. She made travel arrangements available and supplied a written copy of the statement Amba had given before the court. It was not justice, but it was a small means of keeping Amba’s own voice from disappearing again.

After leaving Hastinapura, Amba went to many hermitages and royal gates. Sometimes her story was called a dispute between royal houses, sometimes the obstinacy of a woman disappointed in love. In one hermitage an elderly woman ascetic asked her, "On which day did what happened to you begin?" Amba named the day of the swayamvara. The ascetic asked again, "And your conversation with Shalva before that? Write down that day as well." She tied three separate knots in a strip of cloth: the first for Amba's own choice, the second for her forcible removal, the third for Shalva's refusal. "If these three are called a single event," the ascetic said, "the place where each person is at fault will disappear from sight." Amba took the knotted strip with her.

One king heard Amba's suffering but had not the courage to oppose Bhishma. In another court she was asked why she did not herself take up arms. "Who in your assembly teaches a woman to bear arms?" she asked. Laughter arose, but an elderly warrior remained silent. He told his disciple to provide the traveller with safe shelter for the night. Amba saw that there were people willing to help, but their assistance did not carry her question to the seat of power. Daily travel, finding food, explaining her name in strange places: in these her years were being spent. Even to obtain one day in a court of justice, years seemed necessary.

At a hermitage in the foothills of the Himalayas she met her maternal grandfather, Hotravahana. Seeing her face, the old man thought first not of greeting her but of her injuries. "You are weary," he said. "Have I come here as a princess," Amba asked, "or as your granddaughter?" "Here your own name is enough," Hotravahana answered. The next day he heard her whole story and said that Parashurama was regarded as Bhishma's teacher; his assistance might be sought. "Does being his teacher make his word automatically just in my favour?" Amba asked. A faint shadow of embarrassment crossed the old man's face. "No," he said. "But he has the capacity to hear the question. I cannot promise that his decision will be in your favour."

When Parashurama came, Amba bowed to him, but she did not lower her head as she told her story. She spoke first of her choice of Shalva, then of the breaking up of the swayamvara, Shalva's rejection, and the consequences of Bhishma's vow. Parashurama interrupted to ask, "Do you still desire marriage to Shalva?" "What would I gain," Amba said, "by compelling to marry me a man whose fear of humiliation is greater than my will? I want the person whose actions began this injustice to accept responsibility for them." Parashurama said he would first reason with Bhishma. Amba made herself clear once more: "Let me be heard. No settlement shall be made in my name of which I learn only afterwards."

Bhishma came and bowed to his former teacher. Parashurama asked why he had carried the three princesses away from their swayamvara and what remedy he had offered on learning Amba's wishes. Bhishma gave the account of the journey and of sending her safely to Shalva. "She returned," Parashurama said, "and the causes of that return are both your battle and Shalva's refusal." Bhishma repeated that he could not break the vow of his life.

"I recognise the strength it takes to keep a vow," Parashurama replied. "But you cannot bring the question of someone whose suffering you have caused to an end merely by invoking your vow." For a moment Bhishma's eyes turned towards Amba. In her face there was no anger, but the weariness of a decision that would not yield.

The discussion between teacher and disciple failed. Parashurama challenged him to battle, and Bhishma took up his weapons. Amba stood at a distance from the field. On the first day the shafts of the two bowmen brought leaves falling from the trees. On the second, injured horses were replaced. The days passed, with no clear sign of victory. The disciples wished to describe the conflict in the language of triumph. "For all the days that formidable weapons are wielded," Amba asked, "who will write down my question?" An ascetic gave her water. She unfolded her strip of cloth and looked at the three knots. The battle could not erase the first event.

After many days of conflict, the battle between teacher and disciple was brought to a halt. Some ancient tellings speak of divine weapons and a heavenly voice intervening. For Amba the immediate result was simpler: Bhishma remained alive, his vow remained unchanged, and no one had been able to give her a new path through life. Parashurama told her he had tried to the extent of his powers. Amba bowed. "I am grateful that you heard me," she said. "But my question has not ended because the battle was not won." The teacher did not try to stop her. Once again there stood before her the distance between a promise of justice and justice obtained.

That night Amba sat on the river sand outside the hermitage. Water was wearing away a tooth-shaped stone; a small current slipped past one side and found a path along the other. She looked at the weariness of her own body and remembered the land of her birth. Once she had been free to change the fragrance of the flowers; on that very day she had also possessed the right to choose the companion of her life. Yet the assembly had offered that right no protection. Now neither Shalva's door, nor Hastinapura's palace, nor Parashurama's battlefield held the answer that was owed to her. She tightened the third knot in the cloth. What society regards as a single night of humiliation, a woman pays for throughout her life.

Meanwhile in Videhapur, Naira was copying an old boat-fare slip onto clean paper. The ink had spread in one place on the original. The writing might be read as "Miṭhuā," though another reader saw "Mithuā." Mahesh said, "We now have three readings of one name. Shall we tell Lata all of them?" "We shall tell her the three possible readings," Naira replied, "but we shall not call any one of them the certain name of her son. We still have no original proof of the fare-payer's age or the date of travel." Tara set down the inspection list from the opposite bank. "Anyone to whom this name is attributed must have the right to show or not show their own papers," she said.

Lata came into the inspection room carrying a small bundle of Mithun's old clothes. "Three people read the name three different ways," she asked. "Where is my son in any of them?" Naira placed the paper before her. "We cannot yet say. It may record the fare for a consignment carried by boat. We can go further only when we have matched the original account book and its date." "But you will not close the search because the name does not match," Lata said. "No," Naira answered. Then Lata spoke more softly. "And you will not seize a child from someone else's home on the strength of my grief." She herself chose to hear even the possibility that went against her hope; her right to hear it was recorded there in the papers.

Tara added a line to the letter concerning the gate inspection: the fact that a collective representative speaks on a matter concerning someone's private field or home must not automatically be taken as proof of that person's consent. "A sixth condition after the five?" Mahesh asked. "All five are different forms of this very matter," Tara replied. "We need no new number, but room on every page for the affected person to speak." Naira placed the source slip in a closed file. The Amba of history and the Lata of Videhapur were not witnesses to each other's lives. Their time, their rights, and their wounds were different. But Naira resolved not to make room in her records for the error of writing the final meaning of a person's life while that person was absent.

Amba set out once more. She did not travel from hermitage to hermitage merely recounting Parashurama's battle. Wherever she went, she asked how the authority of armies had entered a ceremony meant to honour a princess's free choice; she asked why, when Shalva rejected her, there had been no institution capable of giving a decision. Some women gave her food; some elders could not answer her questions. She began to change the words in which she told her experience: not "defeat in love," but "dispossession of my own choice"; not "failure in the teacher's battle," but "justice left unfinished." These were not words accepted in every royal assembly of her time. But she refused to let her story be reduced to a title convenient to someone else.

The seasons changed again. Practising severe austerities in the mountains, Amba asked Shiva for an answer: why, when this injustice had begun within one life, was the road to justice barred within the boundaries of that same life? Ancient narratives say that Shiva granted her the boon of becoming, in a future birth, the cause of Bhishma's fall. Amba did not regard this promise as an easy victory. She understood that if justice required the span of a second life, the arrangements of the first must have been terribly narrow. In popular memory, the account of her decision to stand before the fire might be shortened to a tale of vengeance; yet her days had been filled with love, exile, questions, refusal, travel, and the search for justice.

On the final evening she gave the strip of cloth with its three knots to the elderly woman ascetic of the hermitage. "The first knot was my wish," she said. “The second was that I was not heard. The third was that, even after I had been heard, justice did not come. Do not tell anyone that I lived only to bring about another person’s death.” The ascetic asked, “What would you have people remember first?” Amba answered, “That my time was my own. They took it all away; I made time to question them once again.” Firelight fell upon her face. In that light the ancient account sees the end of one birth and the sign of another yet to come. But the story ending here is the story of Amba’s long question. The life and choices of the child yet to be born remain to be told.

Chapter 64 · Shikhandi's Decision

The first sound of dawn in the armoury of Panchala came from a blacksmith's hammer. The young Shikhandi stood with the broken head of an arrow in his hand. His teacher had told him to throw the arrow away, but he had asked, "If the iron point is still sound, why should we not fit it to a new shaft?" The smith seated him beside the forge and showed him where the grain of the wood had split, and why an arrow, once repaired, must first be tested with a gentler draw. The teacher's eyes widened. A child of the royal house was taught how to wield weapons, not the patience of those who made them. That day Shikhandi understood for the first time that reading the marks left by damage was work no less important than loosing an arrow.

In Drupada's palace, two accounts of Shikhandi's birth circulated. The king had been told of a boon from Shiva: a child connected to a woman's unredressed wrong in an earlier life would be born into his house. The royal family sent out news of a daughter's birth as news of a son. In Drupada's eyes this was a means of securing the succession and managing an old fear; inside the palace, the newborn lay in the midwife's arms, with no need to understand the royal proclamation. The queen said, "The child I am holding must first be given the chance to live." Drupada answered, "To live, one must have a place at court." There was a difference between those two sentences, and, as the years passed, Shikhandi's childhood took shape within that difference.

When Shikhandi was defeated in an archery lesson, another pupil laughed. "The prince has lost." The teacher rebuked him, but Shikhandi stopped him. "I lost because I let my left hand slacken as I drew the bow. I shall try again." That evening the queen saw the blisters on his palm. "Do you wish everyone to call you prince?" she asked. Shikhandi replied, "I have never been able to decide what everyone will call me. But perhaps I may still decide something of what I shall learn to do." The queen rubbed ointment into his palm. The question was not fully answered that night, but it now belonged to him.

The royal priest counted the days; the commander reckoned Shikhandi's prowess; certain ministers matched the date of a future battle against the old boon. Shikhandi had few opportunities to hear these discussions. Even so, one evening he asked Drupada, "If my birth is meant to answer an injustice of long ago, which day is my own?" Drupada had said, "The days of the royal house belong to the kingdom." "Does belonging to the kingdom mean having no wishes of one's own?" Drupada watched his child for some time. He saw courage in the one who asked, but found it hard to accept that such courage might choose a direction of its own.

That same morning in Videhapur, Ruhani was measuring a torn curtain on the shelter's outer veranda. A school theatre group wished to perform a scene from the Bhishma Parva. The organiser's leaflet announced: "Ruhani's Life: Today's Shikhandi." Ruhani put her scissors down on the table. "When did you hear the story of my life?" she asked the organiser. The young man faltered. "The audience needs an example it can recognise." Returning the leaflet, Ruhani said, "Amba's story, Shikhandi's story, and my life are three different lives. If you turn all three into one convenient name, you will hear none of them properly." The organiser promised to return with another title, but Ruhani did not yet give permission for the rehearsal.

Just then Tara arrived carrying an inspection file. A temporary strip installed for safety at the gate resembled the timber used in the hospital's old wing, but without Lalit's signature there could be no certification of its load-bearing capacity. Tara said, "A supplier wishes to inspect the materials himself. His name is Raghav Singh." Ruhani asked, "Is this a question of what the materials cost, or of the wing's safety?" "Both. And the papers for the two may be different," Tara replied. Ruhani kept the measurements for the stage's new curtain and the invitation to inspect on separate sheets. No one's right to their story and another's right under a contract ought to be written on the same board.

In Panchala, a marriage proposal for Shikhandi arrived from the royal house of Dasharna. The ministers regarded it as confirmation, before the courts of other kingdoms, of their proclamation concerning the succession. On reading the marriage letter, Shikhandi's first question was, "What has the princess been told about my life?" Drupada's face hardened. "What every court knows of your royal identity." "Whatever has been concealed within that identity will fall as a burden upon her life," Shikhandi said. The queen was aghast. No one at court had the courage to halt the marriage in time. Once again the fear of a royal house occupied the space in which a woman should have been free to decide.

When the princess of Dasharna arrived at her new home, she was shown the lofty palace, the chambers of weapons, and the splendour of the celebrations. Yet in the privacy of a conversation between husband and wife, the question changed. "I want to understand you," she said. "But how can I make a choice about something that was never told to me in my own home?" Shikhandi replied, "Many decisions about me were made without me. None of them could erase the reality of my life. But the truth was withheld from you, and I cannot deny that this was an injustice." Fear, anger, and disappointment appeared together upon the princess's face. She decided to send word to her father. Shikhandi did not prevent her.

When the message reached Dasharna, Hiranyavarman felt himself dishonoured. Weapons were gathered; messengers came and went more frequently. In his court Drupada ordered preparations for war in the name of defending the succession. An officer of the army said to Shikhandi, "Had the royal family's private affairs remained secret, there would have been no war."

Shikhandi answered, "Why should someone who never chose a secret be made to bear its burden? It is no wrongdoing to hear the princess's complaint." That night the queen reminded him that in war it was the food and water of ordinary townspeople that would first be destroyed. Shikhandi left the palace gates and went towards the forest. He was not merely fleeing another's punishment; he wished to make a decision beyond the clamour of the royal court.

In the forest he met a yaksha named Sthunakarna. At the yaksha's refuge stood an earthen water vessel, dry leaves, and a small wooden seat. Having told his story, Shikhandi said, "The difference between my body and my place in society has set two kingdoms moving towards war. Yet no king can answer the question that is mine." Sthunakarna asked, "What do you want of me?" Shikhandi did not answer at once. First he had to make clear to himself that the body, dignity, or right to life of another being was not automatically a means of resolving his own predicament.

Ancient accounts describe this encounter as an exchange of female and male states between the yaksha and Shikhandi. Having heard of Shikhandi's distress, Sthunakarna consented to lend him his maleness for a limited period and to take upon himself the femaleness associated with Shikhandi's birth. Shikhandi asked, "Is this exchange of your own free will?" "Yes," the yaksha replied. "But you must promise to return when the appointed time is over." Shikhandi accepted that promise not as a written royal command but as an obligation undertaken towards another person. The yaksha, too, had a life of his own here; it would not be right to erase it from the tale.

In one version of the story, Kubera is angered on learning of Sthunakarna's changed bodily condition. His curse is said to make the exchange endure until Shikhandi's death. The price of those words was different for the two parties. Shikhandi had found a road back to his royal life; Sthunakarna could no longer regain his former state at the time he had intended. Shikhandi asked, "When I have gone, who will come to learn how you fare?" The yaksha could not smile. "Let us begin," he said, "with someone remembering the promise he has made." Shikhandi did not simply charge a servant with bringing back news. He resolved to return himself from time to time.

On Shikhandi's return to Panchala, questions concerning his body became a matter of royal examination. Some versions of the tale say that the king of Dasharna ordered a secret test to dispel his doubts. Shikhandi understood the cruelty of this: an examination of the body had taken the place of truth within the marriage and the consent of the persons concerned. The immediate threat of war receded, but it could not therefore be said that the princess's earlier objection had been answered. In private Shikhandi told her, "If you wish to return, that choice will remain yours. I shall not claim possession of your life for the sake of peace between kingdoms." The princess decided to spend some time among her own people. That decision found no place in the victory proclamations of the royal court.

In a letter sent from her parents' home, the princess wrote of more than royal humiliation. She wrote that, among the choices she should have been allowed to make in her new home, what she needed first was time alone and the right to make her own decisions. Hiranyavarman read the letter with anger: he had soldiers at his command, but no answer to his daughter's own words. When Drupada heard the proposed settlement between the two kings, Shikhandi made it clear that agreement to prevent a war could not become an order compelling husband and wife to live together. The queen kept a copy of the letter in her chamber. At least here the voice of someone whose name was left out of the written history of the treaty would survive.

Shikhandi returned to the armoury. His first teacher had grown old; the blacksmith's son now wielded the hammer. Looking at an arrowhead, the young smith asked, "Prince, do you remember the repair we made long ago?" Shikhandi said, "I know one more thing now. The price of a weapon whose wound another person must bear cannot be calculated by the seller of iron alone." He ordered that the pupils also be taught how to dress an injured horse's wounds, how to account for water in war, and how to reckon the wheels removed from chariots. Soldiers loved to speak of his valour. Shikhandi, for his part, did not wish to abandon the small tasks that sustain life before a battle begins.

In Videhapur, Raghav Singh arrived near the hospital's baradari carrying a cardboard box of materials from an earlier job. Inside lay two rusted hinges, a sample of timber, and three receipts. "These are not accounts written by my nephew," he said at the outset. "They are receipts for goods delivered by my firm and stored in the warehouse." Aditi picked up one of the slips. It bore the words "old wing," but did not say in which room the hinges had been fitted. Raghav continued, "This is a receipt for delivery. It does not prove that the materials were installed in the proper place." Such candour might delay full payment to his firm. Even so, he was not prepared to fill in the blank line himself.

Lalit the carpenter held the timber sample in his hand. "This is old laminated wood. Putting a load on it when it is dry is not the same as doing so in the rains." Raghav stiffened. His supplier had told him the wood was water-resistant. "I shall provide the laboratory certificate for the description under which I sold it," he said. "But this little piece cannot establish the condition of the whole roof of the old wing." Aditi had the source, date, and recipient's signature recorded on two separate sample bags. For the first time in the dispute over the contract, Raghav acknowledged the limitations of incomplete evidence alongside his own commercial interest.

A young man accompanied Raghav, one whose ordinary work was carrying heavy sacks in the warehouse. He stopped and looked towards the hospital corridor, but Raghav did not press him to speak before everyone. “If you saw something yourself,” Naira said, “first write down the time and place in your own words. If you heard it from someone else, say that separately.” The young man replied, “I shall look at the papers when I get home.” Raghav said, “Look carefully. Do not fill a gap in your memory with a guess.” Raghav took a copy of the ledger for himself. In the days to come, the moral weight of this small act would grow.

At noon Ruhani went to the school’s rehearsal space. The new leaflet for the play now read: “Shikhandi: His Own Vow, His Own War.” But the instructor again insisted that Ruhani appear at the start of the performance and say, “I am the modern form of this character.” Ruhani refused in a quiet voice. “I am a person living in the present. My experience is not evidence about the historical or mythic body of Shikhandi. Tell his story in his own voice. I can help you examine the language of the performance and the children’s consent.” A girl on the stage asked, “Then will the hero be defined not by his birth but by what he decides?” Ruhani replied, “The story may become difficult. But that is a good question.”

For the battle scene, the teacher distributed wooden swords among the children. Some came forward to play Bhishma and others to play Shikhandi. A boy said, “Shikhandi only stood in front. It was Arjuna who shot the arrows.” A girl answered him, “Who decided to stand in front?” The instructor wanted to end the argument, but Ruhani said, “Let the question remain. We shall write down separately what each person did in the battle.” Three columns appeared on a sheet of paper: role, decision, and consequence. No child was required to disclose a private identity as a condition of taking part.

By the time the war of Kurukshetra approached, Shikhandi’s name had become surrounded by many retellings. Drupada’s house had allied itself with the Pandavas. In the reckoning of the army, Shikhandi had been assigned his share of chariots, horses, and arrows. At an assembly, a warrior whispered, “The hour has come to avenge the wrong done to Amba in her earlier life.” Shikhandi heard him. “You may listen to the story of my former life,” he replied. “But in the present, the food for my soldiers, the evacuation of the wounded, and the accounting of arrows are my decisions. Do not turn me into a figure waiting solely for another person’s death.” The warrior fell silent in embarrassment.

One evening before the battle, Arjuna came to Shikhandi’s camp. They were testing the tension of their bowstrings. Arjuna said, “The grandsire has vowed not to raise a weapon against you. That circumstance is decisive for the army’s plan.” Shikhandi answered, “If I am here only as an object to stay the grandsire’s hand, who will give meaning to my own part in this war?” Arjuna laid his bow aside. “Your chariot will move, and you will wield your weapons.

The responsibility for my arrows will remain mine." Shikhandi added, "And we shall not make the deaths of my chariot-horses or soldiers seem small by calling them a stratagem." They agreed. But the day of battle would put agreements of this kind to the test.

In his own camp, Bhishma spoke to his commanders about Shikhandi. He repeated his decision not to take up arms against Shikhandi, a decision founded upon the old account of his birth. An officer asked, "And if Shikhandi shoots arrows at you?" Bhishma replied, "I cannot change my decision." Here once more could be seen the long life of his vows. His refusal measured Shikhandi's ability in battle and his present existence by the story of an earlier birth alone. The consequences of that view for the conduct of the war would be grave.

At dawn on the tenth day, dust and the sound of conches rose together. Shikhandi checked the forward strap of his chariot himself and told his charioteer to prepare a place where an injured horse could be replaced. He advanced towards Bhishma. The army opened a path as he moved, allowing Arjuna's chariot to remain behind him. Shikhandi drew his bow and his arrows flew; Bhishma did not raise a weapon against him. From behind came Arjuna's arrows, inflicting the decisive wounds of the battle. A chariot axle broke, a standard bent, and Bhishma fell towards the earth—his body held above the ground by the arrows that pierced it.

One soldier made to proclaim at once, "Shikhandi has killed Bhishma!" Another cried, "Write it as Arjuna's victory." Shikhandi halted his horses and said, "Write what you saw. I advanced and loosed my weapons. Bhishma did not raise a weapon against me. Arjuna's arrows brought him down. To absorb one person's history into another person's name is not to tell the truth of war." His voice was very small beside the conches of victory, but his charioteer remembered those words. Shikhandi asked first for news of his wounded soldiers. The fall of the grandsire could not instantly send any child's father home.

Bhishma lay alive upon his bed of arrows. Shikhandi looked upon him from a distance. There was the memory of Amba's long question, but there were also the days of Shikhandi's own life: the blacksmith's furnace, Drupada's fear, the crisis of the marriage, the debt owed to Sthunakarna, the labour of the battlefield. He would not accept that Bhishma's fall could be called complete justice for Amba's life. He told his charioteer, "Let the names of every soldier from my chariot be entered in today's record of the battle. Let no one become merely a number in the account of Bhishma's fall." Shikhandi did not lay down his weapons; the war ahead was not yet over. But the decision of that day had been his own.

As evening descended in Videhapur, Aditi wrote three separate lines on Raghav's receipt: the fact that the materials had been delivered; the uncertainty about where they had been installed; and the absence of a safety test. Raghav stamped the first line with his firm's seal, but not the second. "I cannot testify that the materials were fitted in that room," he said. Mahesh asked, "Who, then, will inspect the records for the old wing?" Aditi replied, "First the original repair order, then the possibility of moving the patients, and the list of equipment. An order to empty a ward is easy to write on paper; every hour of such a move may be hard for the patients." Closing his box of samples, Raghav said, "I shall provide proof of what I sold, not a false promise that the hospital has been made safe."

At another table, Naira was placing the blurred slip bearing the name "Mithua" into its file. No new direct evidence had emerged concerning Mithun, Lata's son. She sealed the three possible readings of the name, the incomplete date of the fare, and the reported statements separately. On the outer veranda, Ruhani read the revised leaflet for the play. Her fear that her life would be turned into proof of an ancient character had eased somewhat. Shikhandi's ancient tale and the modern lives of these people were not testimony to one another. Yet the difficulty of keeping the name of one's own decision from disappearing beneath another person's signature was different in each place—in the hospital register, in the shelter's keys, and upon a chariot of war.

When Raghav reached home that night, his nephew was sitting with an old warehouse ledger open before him. "Uncle, the date of what I saw is on one page," he said, "but the signature on another page is not mine." Raghav did not ask him to write anything immediately. First he cleaned his spectacles and examined the corner of the page, where the shade of the ink changed. "Tomorrow we shall take the original register with us," he said. "You will speak of what you saw with your own eyes. And before that, we shall settle how to protect you from what you fear." He closed the book. There were still patients in the hospital's old wing; the hours of their lives could not be suspended while blank lines in a register were filled.

Chapter 65 · The Hospital's Old Wing

Water was dripping through a joint in the ceiling of the hospital's old wing. At first the drops were small—so small that the woman who cleaned the room merely set an empty bowl beneath them and went on with her work. Within half an hour the sound of the water striking the bottom of the bowl had changed. Salma, the nurse, moved the bowl aside and put up a yellow warning mark so that no one would slip in the dark. Beyond the window the sun was shining. Yet, seeing the wet ceiling within, nobody spoke of rain. No one yet knew which pipe or ageing joint the water was coming from.

In that same room, Sheetal Devi sat half-raised upon her bed. A tube for her treatment was fitted to her right arm, and her daughter was folding a blanket beside the pillow. "Are they going to close this room?" the daughter asked. Salma replied, "First we must find out how much of the building is unsafe. We are not going to pick up your mother and put her down in an empty courtyard." Sheetal began looking for her slippers. "I can walk," she said. Her daughter pointed to her feet: one was swollen. Wanting to walk by one's own strength and being able to walk safely were not the same thing.

For the third time Aniruddha unfolded the plan of the hospital's old wing. The western staircase was shown as wide upon the drawing, but over the years half its width had been turned into a storeroom for boxes of medicine. "I have twelve beds to account for," he told Salma, "but not beds alone. I need separate lists of who requires continuous equipment, whose treatment cannot be interrupted midway, and who cannot be lifted without two members of staff." An employee asked, "Then shall we send everyone to the new wing today?" Aniruddha said, "A vacant room in the new wing does not become a place where treatment can be given merely by standing empty."

Salma went from room to room drawing up her lists. Two patients needed regular assistance with breathing; an elderly patient had to be watched throughout an ongoing treatment, with the tube kept in place; and the mother of a child was asking to remain beside the bed through the night. Salma wrote no patient's name on the public inspection sheet. She kept the full particulars on a restricted page for the medical team. "We shall ask those who are able to answer before making decisions for them," she said. "When a patient cannot speak for themselves, there must be a way to inform the family or an authorised caregiver. Changing the name of a wing does not, by itself, save a patient."

By the time Aditi arrived with her inspection bag, the bowl beneath the ceiling was half full. She looked first not at the ceiling but at the time written beside the bowl. "The first mark was made after half past eight," Salma told her. "That does not tell us when the leak began." Aditi opened her earlier report. Some months before, she had described the blocked drainage behind this wing as a “defect requiring limited repair.” Reading those words again beside Tara’s and Hira’s measurements, she found them painfully inadequate. “I shall not cross out my first estimate and make it disappear,” she said. “I shall add the date of the new evidence to it.”

Raghav Singh came to the hospital carrying a cardboard box and the outer cover of his nephew’s warehouse ledger. His nephew was already standing at the door. In his hand were copies of the two pages he had seen the day before, but he was afraid of signing a statement about anything he had not witnessed with his own eyes. Raghav drew him aside. “First understand which documents belong to a public inquiry and which are private,” he said. “Remember the hours you were actually at the warehouse. For the sake of my firm, you need not say you saw something you did not see.” The young man drew a deep breath. The assurance that his account could be heard in full and in safety had yet to be secured.

Today Meena Sah carried no hammer, only three old receipts. She had left her sister in charge of the shop during the meal hour and come from her metalworking workshop. The hospital’s delivery note listed two metal vessels, a sample of shell-lime, and an “unspecified repair piece.” Earlier, the third mark on her repair slip had been mistaken for a third vessel, and an outcry had followed; when the original form was found, that mark proved to be a tax entry against her labour charge. Yet the delivery note still listed four items. “I returned two vessels after repairing their joints with my own hands,” Meena said. “Let no one put my name to a statement about how the third and fourth items were used.”

Aditi placed Meena’s two receipts and the hospital’s receiving stamp upon the same table. On the first document Meena had recorded when she handed the two vessels to the hospital’s carrier; the second bore the warehouse seal; the third carried an officer’s signature beneath the words “work completed,” but the space identifying the room in which that work had been done was blank. “Receiving materials, accepting that they have been used, and certifying that the work has been safely completed are three different stages,” Meena said. Aditi made that observation a new line in her report. Aniruddha, standing near a patient, asked, “If we misread the third document, have we been treating the old wing as safe on the strength of that mistake?” There was no immediate answer.

Gomati opened an old cloth bag stained with the sweat of the labourers’ group. Inside were copies of the dates on which they had carried sacks of lime and the tokens issued for their wages. “We unloaded all those sacks behind this room,” she said. “But we did not test whether they contained lime or some other mixture. Nor did we see whether the contents went into the hospital building or remained in the warehouse.” An employee suggested that, since the sacks had been heavy, there must certainly have been fresh repair work. Gomati objected: “A labourer’s body knows the weight. My back cannot tell you what mixture was put upon a wall.”

Lalit the carpenter arrived carrying an old wooden plank. Wood of this kind had been used for the hospital’s unloading ramp, and he had once been asked to certify it without a load test. He measured the width of the landing, then showed them a loosened edge of brickwork. “This ramp may have been made for a light trolley carrying linen,” he said. “But taking a heavy hospital bed, its tubes, and two staff members along the same route is another matter. I will not issue a certificate on the strength of what my eyes can see.” He still felt the old hurt of having lost a contract. Even so, he refused to reckon the worth of his signature as though it were merely part of the price of the plank.

Aniruddha went with his team to test the actual exit by the old staircase. When they turned an empty bed, its front wheel caught against the corner of the wall. Salma wrote down how much time the staff lost in freeing it. “The empty bed got stuck,” Aniruddha said. “With a patient, equipment, and an anxious family beside it, this route would be harder still. Do not record this demonstration as though we had moved a patient.” Another door was opened, but in that direction the ground above the laundry-water drain was wet. The water was plain enough to see; where it came from was not.

Behind the old wing, Urmila Rajak was unloading bundles in the washing enclosure. Her register already showed the difference between the time taken to bring linen from the ghat to the hospital and the time at which the supplies room acknowledged receiving it. Today a hospital employee told her that, because of the repairs, the laundry bags could no longer be left beside the old drain. “Then how far round must we carry them?” Urmila asked. “I shall observe the rule for delivering patients’ linen safely, but the extra distance and the labour it requires must be entered in the record.” After examining the kinds of bags, Salma marked a safe temporary place for them. The private identification marks on linen requiring special precautions remained inside sealed bags.

The narrow laundry drain, the water used for washing hands, the drops from the ceiling, and the water standing in the pit outside the old wing all seemed to come from four different directions. Aditi ordered separate measurements and samples for the four possible sources. An employee declared that the old shell-lime wall had absorbed water and that this must explain every problem. Meena explained, “My father told me the old story of making lime from shells. But to establish the properties of this wet powder today, or to call it the cause of a fault in the hospital’s construction, we need a test of the material. People’s memory gives us the name of a method, not verified proof of what it can do.” Aditi signed the application for an independent laboratory examination.

Out on the veranda, Kanchan had brought her mother, Jamuna Devi, to have her medicines checked. Hearing the talk of the old wing, Jamuna said, “The day my life was saved, not everything done in this hospital was worthless. But an account must be given of the wall that is leaking now.” An employee tried to show her the donor’s plaque. Jamuna shook her head. “I was ready to offer thanks yesterday, and I shall be ready tomorrow. Today ask how Sheetal’s bed is to be moved.” Kanchan served her mother some food. The story of a life saved and the investigation of faulty repairs did not cancel one another out.

By noon, after watching an empty bed stand ready for so long, Sheetal’s daughter had become impatient. “Will you go on discussing papers while my mother’s bed remains here?” Aniruddha took her to see a room. The new wing had a bed available, but there was as yet no suitable place for the equipment Sheetal’s treatment required. “Then what does a safe place mean?” the daughter asked. “A place where her treatment will not be broken off,” Aniruddha replied. “I am working out the proper arrangement with the team. Today we shall put our decision concerning your mother’s consent and supervision in writing.” For the first time, the daughter was going to receive a written answer from the hospital to a specific question.

At the municipal meeting, someone proposed simply locking the old wing and displaying a notice: “All patients transferred.” Aditi said, “Writing those words on a notice does not transfer a single patient.” Aniruddha drew three columns on the board: those who could remain for the time being in a part judged safe; those who could be moved as soon as the necessary arrangements and trained staff were ready; and those who must receive priority because they faced an immediate risk. Every name was kept on the restricted medical list; the public sheet contained only numbers and the arrangements required. “This plan is not an apology to be written after an accident,” he added. “It is the division of our responsibilities today.”

Raghav brought out invoices from his warehouse dating back four years. Wooden planks, metal hinges, and sacks of lime had been supplied on different dates. An earlier published summary had gathered them all together as a single instance of “complete repair.” “I sold the materials,” Raghav said. “Without documents, I cannot tell you who reopened an old sack after all these years or where the materials were installed.” Meena compared one date on his papers with her own slip. The date on the four-item delivery note, the date of Raghav’s timber supply, and the day Gomati carried the sacks were not the same. The differences did not prove theft; they weakened the heading that called it all “one job.”

Aditi obtained written authority from the hospital’s records officer before opening the old iron cupboard. In an inner compartment lay a grey file marked “West Wing: Temporary Repairs.” As she turned its pages, a thin slip fell out: an order to repair the unloading ramp, a note reading “retest after the season,” and a signature half rubbed away. The following page contained no result of any retest. “How long has this paper been here?” Aniruddha asked. The records officer said the file had come from the old warehouse, but the transfer register would have to be examined to discover who had placed it here, and when. Aditi returned the slip to its original position and had a certified copy made.

“Test it after the season.” Lalit read the words slowly. “That sentence does not mean a test was carried out after the season.” Aniruddha examined the part of the old work mentioned on the slip. Sheetal’s bed was not in that area, but the adjoining veranda’s exit ramp lay upon the same route. “This slip gives me a reason to clear the area,” he said, “but a practical route for moving patients must still be made.” Aditi took out a copy of her first report, the one describing a “minor repair defect.” “I shall correct my mistake,” she said, “but until we have the results of fresh tests, I shall not claim to know the entire cause.”

Seeing the word “season” in the note, Tara Binaut opened her measurement register. Of the three markers driven into the ground beside the old drainage channel, one now lay inside the warehouse’s newly extended wall. Hira Sahni’s measurements gave different widths for the channel’s course in the rains and in the dry season. “I shall not reduce the cause of the crack in the wing’s wall to a single line about drainage,” Tara said. “But if the water outside is held back, the time needed for an emergency exit may change. That measurement must be tested separately.” A municipal representative asked, “Will that much be enough?” “For now, we can use only the measurements we have,” Tara replied.

Before evening Salma called Sheetal’s daughter to the doorway. A place in the new wing had been made ready, with the equipment needed for treatment; a trained team would move the patient at the appointed time. The reason for the transfer was explained to Sheetal, and her questions were heard. Instead of tucking her slippers beneath the pillow, she handed them to her daughter. “Where shall I put these?” the daughter asked. “Somewhere I can put them on again,” Sheetal said. The bed was lifted slowly. Salma walked beside it for part of the way, then entrusted the patient to another nurse and wrote down the complete handover. Moving one patient safely did not amount to a declaration that every patient’s difficulties were over.

Meanwhile, at the laundry behind the hospital, Urmila had been delayed. The temporary route was longer, and the employees wanted a separate trolley to ensure that clean bags and those requiring special isolation did not travel together. Urmila explained that the change had obliged her to make two extra journeys. An administrator said, “In an emergency, everyone must cooperate.” Tightening the knot on a bag, Urmila answered, “I am cooperating. But because the reason is urgent, my time has not ceased to be work. If I am not paid, what woman will be willing to come along this route tomorrow?” Salma added the extra hours of carrying to the written order.

Meena did not lay a hand upon the iron grille behind the hospital; without testing it, no one could say how strong the metal was. She noticed an old brass tap in the washing room. The receipt for that tap was not hers. Unnecessary water running in the rains would make the patients' route slippery, so Aniruddha asked an authorised mechanic to shut off the supply. Meena submitted once more her claim for the proper payment due on her two repairs. "I shall give evidence in the inquiry into the materials," she said, "but withholding my wages will not bring the truth to light." Aditi had Meena sign a separate acknowledgement of receipt for the payment dispute.

As Urmila gathered up the empty bags, she remembered an old conversation with Rukhsana at the ghat: one day she would sit there without washing a single garment, and Rukhsana too would rest that day. Now her hands smelt of soap, and her eyes were growing numb with fatigue. "Have you eaten anything?" Salma asked. Urmila laughed. "Can a person live on registers?" An employee brought some rice left from Rukhsana's midday meal. Urmila asked for water from a safe tap to wash her hands, then sat and ate quietly for a little while.

Outside, the patients' families were sitting upon a low platform. One man was saying that the old wing would fall down that very day; another claimed that the money in the relief fund had been swallowed up. Naira did not belittle their fears. On a sheet of paper she wrote down what was firmly established that day: a leak had been observed; an original slip concerning temporary repairs had been found; there was as yet no evidence that the retest had taken place; one patient had undergone a planned transfer; the review of the others was continuing. "This list does not answer fear," she said. "But turning fear into false evidence will not make anyone safer."

Mahesh began reconciling the timings of handcarts in the hospital's old gate register. Urmila's morning cart, the sacks Gomati had carried years before, Meena Sah's vessels, and Raghav's planks appeared as four separate consignments. Naira saw that placing a discrepancy of a few hours on one day upon the same line as proof of repairs carried out years earlier could breed accusations no one had earned. She restored the sequence of the original dates and obscured private names wherever the copies did not require them. The restricted file concerning the search for Mithun lay in her other bag. No fresh evidence had emerged linking it to the hospital's materials records.

Late in the evening Aniruddha and his team again reviewed the condition of the remaining beds. For the elderly patient requiring closer monitoring, the necessary equipment and staff arrangements in the new wing were not yet complete; the demand that he be moved at once was therefore set aside. Temporary safety measures and constant observation were maintained in the part of the old wing where he remained, and an emergency alternative was established. As he signed the order, Aniruddha said, "Our work is not finished because a document says the building has been emptied. No one may discount the value of the time belonging to a person whose life depends upon this treatment merely for my convenience."

In her revised report, Aditi wrote that the old wing's construction history, the drainage, and the accounts for materials were interrelated questions, but the full chain of causation between them had not yet been established. The original repair order, the place where materials had been used, material samples, the course of water outside, and patient evacuation were entered as separate matters for investigation. She did not erase her earlier description of a "limited defect"; beneath it she added an explicit correction: "Previous assessment incomplete; detailed investigation required." Reading the report, Tara said, "Now the labourers' testimony is not hidden behind the paperwork. It is part of the inquiry." Aditi agreed, but left the space for conclusions blank.

On the road home that night Meena met Lalit. "Did you find the name of the third item?" he asked. "No," Meena answered, "but we found an old slip saying that the work was to be tested again afterwards. To treat a test whose result cannot be found as a successful test would be wrong." Folding the slip relating to the contract he had lost, Lalit said, "So long as a signature retains its meaning, perhaps the wages owed will be paid one day." "I too am still owed money," Meena said. "But Sheetal reached a safe place today. I shall enter that in my account, and tell my sister." They took different roads towards their homes.

That night the bowl in the old wing was emptied once again. The source of the water leaking from the pipe or joint had not yet been identified; the warning mark and the watch beneath it remained in place. In her new room, Sheetal asked her daughter to unfold the blanket brought from home. On the outer veranda, Urmila's linen trolley stood ready for the safe route it would take the following day. Aditi placed the certified copy of the original repair slip in the restricted file; Aniruddha wrote down the conditions for transferring the remaining patients. Turning from the doorway, Naira looked once more at the light within the hospital. Here, duty could not be decided by a single command. Beside every bed, someone was living the next hour of their life.

Chapter 66 · Krishna and Arjuna’s Pause

At half past five in the morning, the yellow warning strip hanging in the veranda of the hospital’s old wing began to flutter in the wind. Urmila’s empty linen trolley stood beneath it. She wanted to move forward, but removing the bamboo pole fixed beside the exit would mean stepping onto the wet floor within. The watchman showed her an order sheet: “Immediate and complete evacuation.” Urmila asked, “What is to be emptied—the patients, the linen, or the responsibility?” The watchman said nothing. The previous night Aniruddha had written that some patients would be moved once a trained team was available; this new sheet named no patients and made no provision for their care.

When Naira arrived, Aditi was arranging copies of the old repair slips to the right of the doorway. A municipal employee wanted a stamp put on the sheet at once, so that the dispute would not grow. “But there is danger,” he said. “There is danger, which is why time is running out,” Naira replied. “A lie will not save us time.” From inside, Aniruddha called out that Sheetal was in a safe room, but the staff and equipment needed to monitor an elderly patient were not yet fully in place. With a single stroke, the watchman’s order sheet erased that medical decision.

Long before this bewilderment, on the morning when the war at Kurukshetra was about to begin, Arjuna had asked for his chariot to be halted between the two armies. This was before Bhishma’s fall; for those who know the memory of his bed of arrows, time here was turning backwards. The conches had sounded, but there was still a pause before the first arrow flew. Krishna gathered the reins and brought the chariot to rest where Arjuna could clearly see the faces on either side.

Arjuna saw the standards first, and then the people beneath them: the bow of his grandsire Bhishma, the face of his teacher Drona, the armour of familiar brothers, the restless eyes of young soldiers who might never before have travelled so far from home. A charioteer was stroking his horses’ muzzles. Arjuna did not know the man’s name, but he knew that when the arrows began to fly, that man too would try to stay alive. The string of his own Gandiva began to feel heavy. “If I raise a weapon against those with whom I learned how to live,” he asked, “where will victory find a place in my life?”

Krishna did not immediately promise him victory. He looked at Arjuna’s hand: the bowstring had slackened, and his skin was wet with sweat. “You need not turn away from what you see,” he said. Arjuna watched the dawn light fall upon the blade of a sword and answered angrily, “Blood will flow in the name of dharma, and afterwards everyone will write the story of his own victory. I want no such kingdom.” Krishna let him hear the compassion within his own words; then he asked whether not wanting a kingdom and abandoning the work of resisting injustice were the same decision.

Arjuna refused to have the question mistaken for personal fear. “I am not afraid of Bhishma. I love him. To take up arms against my teacher feels like striking at my own education. If I win, how will the people of his household look upon me?” Krishna replied, “The responsibility borne by those you love must also enter your consideration. But if compassion removes you from every decision, into whose hands will you give the future of those you wish to protect?” Arjuna had no easy answer.

A wheel of the chariot had sunk halfway into the earth beneath it. Krishna spoke of the distinction between the self and the body, of impermanence, and of the limits of grief. Arjuna listened, but would not accept that the suffering of a dead body could be brought to an end merely by an intellectual distinction. “If I contemplate the self,” Arjuna asked, “will I hear the wounded man’s cry any less?” “No,” said Krishna. “The purpose of contemplation is not to declare that cry unreal, but to steady the mind amid fear and attachment.” A horse snorted beside the chariot, and their conversation went on beside the breathing of that living body.

Krishna explained the difference between action and attachment to its fruits. “If you imagine yourself entitled only to the outcome you desire,” he said, “you will abandon the work the moment an unwelcome outcome appears.” Arjuna asked, “Then who will answer for the consequences? Shall I loose my arrow and say its result is not mine?” Krishna’s eyes hardened. “To give up attachment to the fruit of action does not mean erasing the account of its consequences. If you are the author of your decision, no one absolves you of the judgment it requires or the harm it may do.” Arjuna repeated the distinction to himself, though certainty remained far away.

At moments it seemed impossible to Arjuna that such a long deliberation could take place between two armies. From the distant Kaurava ranks came the clatter of shields. “Why should so many people wait for my decision?” he asked. “What if there were still a way to avert the war?” Krishna recalled the failed embassy, the proposal to divide authority, and the history of refusals. But he did not say that every war becomes just merely because negotiations have failed. Arjuna returned to his question: a man might invoke the name of difficult duty to justify a private vengeance. Krishna did not ignore the possibility.

“I see my own attachment in the body of my enemy,” Arjuna said, “and justice in the bodies of my own side. What vision can correct that division?” Krishna urged him to examine his understanding, exercise restraint, and test his self-interest. “Before a decision is made, look at whom you are protecting, whom you are harming, and whether you are calling your anger a principle.” “Is all that possible in the midst of war?” Arjuna asked. “Perfect innocence does not come easily to an imperfect human being," Krishna replied. "Even so, to abandon reflection is not a duty."

That morning Arjuna also saw Shikhandi, a warrior fighting beside him whose life had been shaped by decisions made in royal assemblies. Shikhandi's part in the struggle against Bhishma would later prove decisive, but already Arjuna wondered who had listened to Shikhandi's own wishes. The thought did not ease his hesitation; it deepened it. Krishna did not claim to speak on Shikhandi's behalf.

Krishna raised the question of svadharma, one's own duty. Arjuna went on, "If the duty of a kshatriya meant nothing but fighting, why would I have so much to consider? If a single rule is imposed upon every circumstance, what purpose does human judgment serve?" Krishna replied, "To understand one's nature and responsibilities is not simply to put on a role as one puts on a garment. One must also have the power to examine the duties that role lays upon us." This did not give Arjuna complete assurance about his decision to fight. But for the first time he understood that the question of action could not be reduced to whether a hand was raised or lowered.

Bhishma's standard would not hold still in the wind. Arjuna touched the string of his bow with his fingers. "If I rise," he said, "I shall rise carrying not only my attachment, but also the possibility that my sense of justice is mistaken." Krishna did not demand a vow that he would never question again. He said only that inaction, too, leaves consequences in the world. Arjuna did not wish to remain a bowman seated behind the chariot. Yet for the first time the act of lifting his bow seemed to him not merely an emblem of courage, but a responsibility bound to the lives of others.

In later ages, this conversation was called a teaching on duty and action without attachment to its fruits. But on the morning of battle Arjuna first saw human faces and asked questions; Krishna did not forbid him to ask them. To treat that ancient crisis as a straightforward licence for violence in the present would be to erase the circumstances of the story.

Near the hospital entrance in Videhapur, a young man began showing Naira a line from that same war on his phone. "See? One has to be hard when doing one's duty," he said. He meant it as support for the proposal to force the patients outside. Naira did not snatch the phone from his hand. "The right to make a hard decision and permission to use force are not the same thing," she said. "We need to know which patients face what degree of danger, what safe alternatives exist, and within whose authority the decision falls. A fragment of a verse cannot become a hospital directive."

Aniruddha came outside. "I am not minimising the risk of keeping certain patients in that section," he said. "But disconnecting equipment and pushing beds away is no treatment either." The municipal employee held up his paper and said that if anyone obstructed the immediate evacuation, those on duty might have to use force. Salma answered, “An emergency evacuation requires a trained team, not the shoving of people who disagree.” The employee’s face fell. He, too, was afraid that if an accident occurred, his name would remain on the order.

A little way from the crowd stood a young woman in white, holding a closed box. The box bore the number of patient-dressing supplies inside and the date on which they were to be deposited. Her name was Devi Gond. She had come to the hospital early that morning for nursing training. Her mother needed care at home, and her family objected to her going out every day. Today she had been assigned to count clean materials under a trainer’s supervision. But when the watchman could not find her name in the duty register, he barred her from entering.

Devi showed him the seal of her training centre in the corner of the register. “This is my first day,” she said. “I am not asking for the right to touch a patient and treat them on my own. I want to learn, and write down whatever work the supervisor instructs me to do.” Salma counted the contents of the box and made out a receipt for the materials. When the trainer arrived late, Devi refused the request that the waiting time be entered as “voluntary service.” “Record the training hours separately,” she said, “and if the hospital assigns me additional carrying work, record that labour separately.” Her voice was quiet, but the words were clear.

Naira did not question Devi about her home, but Salma, looking through the training papers, asked, “Will staying here until evening cause you difficulty?” Devi paused. “It will be time to give my mother her medicine. My brother asks why I go on studying instead of staying to do the housework. I want him to sit with Mother for one part of the day so that I can finish my training.” “Are you making this decision yourself?” Salma asked. “Yes,” Devi said. “But the argument at home will not be settled on this veranda today.” She gathered her papers and went to her assigned place.

Inside, in the room on the right, an elderly patient had raised himself halfway from his bed. Hearing the pushing and shouting outside, he kept asking whether he was going to be expelled from the hospital. Aniruddha explained that his treatment would not be ended without a safe alternative, until a trained team and a place equipped for the necessary care were ready. Devi was counting supplies under Salma’s supervision. A member of the old man’s family asked her, “Are you a doctor?” Devi shook her head. “I am in training. Please ask Salma Didi and the doctor about treatment.” That small clarification spared the family from making a decision on the strength of a false assurance.

Outside, Tara arrived with her drainage-measurement notebook. On one page she had recorded two different levels at which rainwater collected behind the hospital. The municipal employee wanted her to certify at once that the old wing had become unsafe because of seepage from outside. Tara said, “I measured the depth of the water outside. I have neither the evidence nor the authority to certify the strength of the wall inside or a defect in the pipes. If my measurement is insufficient, measure again. I will not put on paper what I have not measured.” Aditi added the statement as a separate technical observation.

At one end of the veranda someone picked up a stone; someone else was talking about burning the order sheet. Naira went towards the young man. “Patients have to be moved along this passage. If you throw that stone, who will be hurt first?” His hand slackened. “Then what are we supposed to do? These people will not listen.” “We will demand the original order, have the safe alternatives written down, and enter your objection on the record. But no violence.” The young man laid the stone on the floor.

For the meeting, they chose an empty table in the hospital’s old medicine store. Naira set three sheets apart: the record of visible risks, the medical list for transferring patients, and the authority of the official who had issued the order. “I will not certify all three as true with one stamp,” she said. Aditi produced the temporary repair slip, which called for another inspection after the rains, but no proof could be found that the inspection had been completed. Aniruddha wrote down the needs of the remaining patients. For the first time, the municipal employee admitted that the language of his “complete evacuation” order did not match the arrangements actually available.

The order was rewritten: entry to the section under immediate threat would be restricted; patients would be moved in stages while essential medical care was maintained; trained supervision would be provided; families would be informed of the reasons; and a named officer would receive objections. The employee was reluctant to remove the word “forcibly,” but Aniruddha insisted that emergency procedures for saving lives and a general order to suppress opposition could not be covered by the same term. At last the paragraph was struck out, and it was agreed that a separate authorisation for safety enforcement would be requested. The hospital had not become safe overnight. At least it had escaped the false completeness of an order on paper.

As Devi’s work receipt was prepared, Salma repeated the count in front of her: twelve packets of clean dressings, two sealed boxes, and three hours of supervised practice. “I can certify that much training,” Salma said, “but payment approval for the extra carrying work must be obtained separately.” Devi kept a copy of the receipt. It showed the time the materials had been received separately from the time she signed. “If tomorrow someone says I distributed medicine in my own name,” Devi said, “this paper will show what I did and what I did not do.” Naira privately remembered the clarity of Devi’s register as knowledge earned through sweat.

After midday, Devi's brother arrived at the hospital. "Mother is alone," he said. "You are doing great service here. Who is going to serve the family at home?" Devi led him towards the shade of the veranda. "I have not abandoned home," she replied. "But if I give up training, who will pay for Mother's medicines next year? She needs you with her for two hours today. Tomorrow I will do my share for two hours." Her brother said he would discuss that arrangement again at home. It did not end their disagreement, but Devi did not sign a paper withdrawing from nursing training.

At about that time Lata came seeking news of the closed file concerning the search for Mithun. Three separate documents lay near the corner of the doorway: an old boat-name register in which a name could be read as "Mithua," a fare slip with an incomplete date, and an elderly person's account of something heard. The municipal employee asked whether they should combine the three and begin looking for a vehicle that had come near the hospital. "The reading of a name is one matter, the date of a fare another, and a voice someone heard a third," Naira said. "These three do not yet establish that the same child was present." "Then where will the search go?" Lata asked. Naira showed her a written application requesting the original, separate register from the boat landing, based on the times that could be established with certainty.

Lata wanted the news to travel far, but did not want an innocent family surrounded by false accusations. "If Mithun can hear me," she said, "let him understand: I am looking for him, not beating someone else in order to find him." Naira asked whether she had permission to make those words public. "Give the details necessary for the search," Lata said, "not my private words." Naira closed the papers. To print the voice of suffering as a public speech could itself be an act of violence.

As evening fell, Sheetal asked her daughter in the hospital room, "Did they find the bedding I left on the old bed?" Her daughter said that Urmila had cleaned it and put it away in a separate bundle. Sheetal spread out her blanket and looked at the tree beyond the new room. She could not entirely follow the news of the structural inspection, but her name written beside the door, the time of her treatment, and her daughter's chance to ask questions were real forms of safety. Aniruddha turned from this new room towards the old wing, where decisions about the remaining patients were still awaiting resolution.

Tara and Aditi checked their final measurements in the hospital's rear veranda. Aditi noticed that the place of a half-erased signature on the original repair slip differed from the place of the signature on the rewritten order. The discrepancy required investigation, but matching names did not establish that one person had written both signatures. Mahesh wrote down the procedure for requesting certified copies of the two documents. Naira said, "The paper I have actually seen is the first limit of what I can claim. Matching times may yield an inference; similar letters may suggest a possible identity. If anyone calls all three the same kind of evidence, I shall record my dissent.”

On her way home that night, Devi carefully tucked her training slip into her cloth bag. Her mother was sitting on the bed, waiting for her. Before her brother said anything, he put a pot of water on the stove. Devi did not tell her mother the entire story of the day’s work. “I had it written down which tasks I learned,” she said. Her mother asked, “Is your name there too?” “It is,” Devi answered, “and beside the work I do not yet know how to do, there is an empty space as well.” Her mother smiled. But the division of care at home for the following day had still to be decided.

From the direction of the distant landing came two blows of iron, separated by an interval. Mahesh suggested that perhaps the lock on the new gate was being closed. Naira would not record it as the sound of the gate without seeing its source. “Tomorrow we shall ask the people there,” she said. “What was decided today?” Mahesh asked. Naira showed him a copy of the new order. “The order to remove people by force has been changed. Safe transfers are continuing. Those are two different things.” The sound came again. Tomorrow they would ask who had heard what, who had seen what, and who had merely thought they knew.

Chapter 67 · Seeing from Afar

At the tea stall in the railway square, the first kettle of the morning was on the boil, but Fakira had yet to lift his glass. He unwound the wet cloth from his walking stick and wrung it out. It smelled of earth; the thin iron ring at the end of the stick had worked loose. The shopkeeper's son offered to fetch a hammer. Fakira shook his head. "We have no need of that sound today. People heard two blows in the night and have already made three stories out of them." The boy asked, "But you were over that way, weren't you?" Fakira replied, "Being in that direction and witnessing an event are not the same thing."

The previous day, on her way back from the hospital, Naira had heard two blows of iron from the distant landing, with an interval between them. Mahesh had guessed that the lock on the new gate was being shut. Without seeing the source, Naira had refused to enter his guess in the record. Today, as she set out to meet Aditi with a copy of the hospital's amended order, the tea seller called to her: "They're saying the old man who heard it also saw it." Fakira raised his head. "I may be old, but my statement hasn't grown old. Has someone changed it?"

In Fakira's shoulder bag lay a folded slip, with the half-circle of a blue stamp visible along one edge. That night he had been returning to the railway square by the lane behind the hospital. An employee had told him to have his account of the noise entered in the security register. Fakira had given the time, said what he had heard, and made it plain that he did not know the names of the people standing nearby. Once he had received the slip, he had gone to catch another train. Today someone read a public notice aloud to him: "According to a witness, two persons were seen breaking the iron gate." Those were not his words.

Naira asked permission before taking the slip in her hand. "Write down its number," Fakira said, "but don't put it in your own pocket. Once my original travel-pass papers were left at a window, and it took an hour for them to come back." Naira copied the number, the stamp and the time of receipt into her notebook. The slip said only "information concerning a noise." When the sentence published on the noticeboard was read aloud, Fakira repeated twice, "Two people? Seen? I said no such thing." Naira recorded the date and time of his denial separately.

"Where were you that night?" Naira asked. Fakira traced his route from the railway square to the old wing. "At the third turning in the lane there's a broken brick. My stick caught there, and I had to steady my feet. Then the first metallic clang came from far away. After a little interval, the second. The wind was coming from the hospital, though sound can travel against the wind as well. I saw no one's face, heard no vehicle's wheels, and do not know what iron object it was." In her notebook, Naira had placed a question mark beside the word "far": the actual distance remained to be measured.

"What did you touch?" Naira asked. "The lane wall, my own stick, and that loose brick at the turning. Not the gate," Fakira said. "When the iron tip of my stick struck a stone in the lane, I felt the vibration through my hand as well as hearing the sound. The two distant clangs carried no such vibration of touch. How, then, could I make a statement about the condition of the gate from what my hand experienced?" Naira divided a page into three spaces: what the ear had heard, what the palm had felt, and what the mind had inferred. The difference that would have disappeared if everything were forced into one line now stood in the open.

Fakira had to catch the midday train before noon. He asked for the time and said he must not be kept waiting from morning until evening merely to give evidence. "I earn my wages delivering passengers' bundles. My life record says 'dead', and my travel pass is still blocked. That false entry has already cost me a great deal of work. Must the people who want my testimony take the hours in which I earn my living as well?" Instead of arranging an immediate meeting, Naira agreed to a time in the afternoon. Fakira himself said the error in the papers had to be corrected; but the price of becoming a witness must not be his daily meal.

Aditi, Mahesh and an assistant to the security officer came to inspect the lane behind the hospital. When Naira arrived, she said, "The officer's name, duties and the time of the inspection must be on paper. Before anything else, Fakira will state what he needs in order to get there." Fakira asked, "Where the rubble has been piled, is there a safe way through for my stick?" The assistant said there was not: loose stones lay along the edge. Tara showed him the next safe stretch of path, describing its distance and turns without pulling him by the arm. Fakira went forward at his own pace. In that moment Naira understood that safe access for a witness was not a favour bestowed by an investigation; it was a condition necessary for the investigation itself.

At the first turn in the lane was a narrow drain running down from the old dispensary behind the hospital. Rainwater had collected there among rotting leaves. Pointing to a crack beside the wall, Aditi said, "There's an old photograph of this crack, but its present depth still has to be measured. The fact that an iron sound was heard in the lane does not establish that the crack appeared at that moment." The assistant said, "Wasn't the damage done on the very night of the explosion?" Aditi replied, "Who established that there was an explosion? And who established the earliest date of the crack?" The two questions remained there, beside the standing water.

Fakira stopped by the broken brick. "This was where I stood." Tara measured the distance from it with her feet and made a note, but Fakira would not sign a certified figure for an estimated distance. "Your measuring tape gives you a distance; my memory gives me the way through a dark lane," he said. "Good if the two agree. If they don't, don't alter the way I walked to make it fit the measurement." Mahesh underlined the word "approximately" in his own notes.

The security assistant struck an iron rail twice with a stick and asked, "Did it sound like that?" Fakira went still. This sound had come from close beside him; the clangs in the night had held distance, and an emptiness behind them. "I can't say. You struck it twice deliberately just now, so I heard it twice. We have no evidence yet of what was struck that night, whether someone struck it on purpose, or whether a loose cover fell." Aditi stopped the assistant. "If we carry out an experiment, we shall record the kind of object, the distance, the weather and the recording itself. Making an unplanned noise in front of a witness and inducing him to say 'that's the one' is not an investigation."

Near the hospital's rear window, an old iron plate over a drainage outlet shifted in its place. When the water rose, it was held down with a wooden support. Raghav Singh's materials invoice mentioned two such plates, while Meena Sah's repair slip separately listed two metal vessels. The assistant promptly joined these facts together. "Then was the sound made by the plate?" Mahesh checked him. "An invoice saying 'plate' does not mean that the plate in this lane came from that consignment. Whether the sound heard came from it is a third question." Fakira gave a small smile of agreement.

Near the watchman's house, a woman was filling a brass water pot. Naira stopped to speak to her first. The woman said that she too had heard the iron blows at night, but water had been dripping in her courtyard like a little waterfall, and she could not be precise about the interval between the first sound and the second. "I was putting the child to sleep on the bed," she said. "I saw no one running." The assistant stepped forward to write down her name. She stopped him. "If you ask where I work, I'll tell you. But don't read my home address out before a crowd." Naira offered her a safer means of contact for the testimony.

Meanwhile, a message arrived on a phone at the railway square: "Fakira saw the names of those who attacked the hospital." Sarita switched the phone off as soon as she had read it. When Fakira returned from his afternoon work and sat outside her house, she asked, "Did you see them?" "No," Fakira said. "But people keep placing the faces they need over my eyes." Sarita gave him a bowl of lentils. "Eat. After that, say again what you said before. A bowl of dal is not a bribe to change anyone's evidence." Fakira laughed. "If it hasn't enough salt, I'll certainly change my statement."

At the evening meeting, a municipal assistant brought a draft. Its first sentence read, "Suspicious persons were observed by the witness." Fakira stopped him in the act of reading. "Strike out the first line. There's a lie written beside my name.” The assistant said, “The form has a box for ‘seen’; there is no separate box for ‘heard’.” Fakira replied, “Then add a box. Or leave this one empty. A shortage of space on the page is not a shortage in my testimony.” Two people at the meeting grew restless; a swift conclusion seemed necessary to them. Naira did not photograph the draft. It mattered more that the procedure for correcting the original sheet should be written down.

An employee quietly told Fakira that correction of the old death entry on his travel pass depended on an officer’s approval, and that making so much trouble would not be good for him. Fakira was silent for a long while. Then he asked, “Do you have the authority to decide about my pass?” The employee said, “I am only here to convey information.” “Then don’t change the information in exchange for my testimony. The travel pass is being heard in a separate proceeding,” Fakira answered. He spoke softly, but for the first time the employee’s hand paused in the middle of writing. Naira recorded the words of the implied threat as neutrally as she could; she decided not to assign a definite motive to anyone without further evidence.

Mahesh requested a copy of the earlier oral statement. On the original register page, only three words of Fakira’s account could be seen: “night, two sounds.” After those words, someone had added “two men, gate.” The handwriting appeared different, but a difference in handwriting could not by itself identify who was responsible for an alteration. Naira asked, “When was this line added, and under whose authority? Give us a photograph of the original page, the register sequence and the work log.” The officer said a written reply would be provided the next day. Fakira insisted that the whole statement be read aloud to him before he was asked to sign it.

For the new statement he had them agree on four headings. First, “Heard”: the time and place of the two distant clangs that night. Second, “Touched”: the loose brick in the lane, the wall and the sensation at the tip of his stick. Third, “Heard later from others”: the rumour of a vehicle speeding away and the published notice. Fourth, “Inferred”: possible sources of the iron sound, without calling any of them evidence. Naira asked, “Have you said all four of these fully in your own words? Shall I read them back?” Fakira replied, “Read as much as you like; each time we’ll stop and check. Don’t turn me into a witness in a hurry.”

As the statement was being written, Aniruddha was wheeling a patient on a stretcher through the hospital veranda. The safety barrier beside the old wing was still tied in place; under the new order, transfer to safer rooms was continuing. When the vehicle’s iron wheels climbed onto the track laid across the floor, there were two short sounds. Fakira started, then smiled a moment later. “Here I have the source of two sounds right in front of me,” he said. Aniruddha replied, “And at another time. Don’t use the sound of hospital equipment to decide what happened at night." Fakira nodded. The hospital was going about its work; not every clang was a line in the record of a crime.

That evening Lata came to the hospital with a fresh application in the search for her missing child. She was distressed to hear that her son's name had been drawn into the rumour about the vehicle. Fakira told her himself, "I did not see a vehicle. I did not hear a child's voice. Don't run anywhere on the strength of what someone has written in my name." Lata looked at his face for a long time. "I only need one right road," she said. "How will I find my child by running down the wrong one?" Naira separated once more the indistinct "Mithua" in the boat-name register, the incomplete fare receipt, and the name the elderly witness had heard. Fakira's sounds that night established the identity of no one in any of those three records.

But Lata asked: if someone had heard a sound that might help in the search for her son, should all such information now be withheld? "No," Naira answered. "The information must carry its time, its source and its uncertainty. Refusing a false certainty is not the same as stopping a search." Fakira drew two scraps of paper from his bag, both given to him by the tea seller. One bore yesterday's train time, the other today's. "The time changed, but he didn't stop selling tea," Fakira said. "In the search for your son, too, take the parts that are solid and ask the next question. Don't make someone guilty out of my guess." The trembling in Lata's hands eased a little.

The security officer wanted Aditi to write a provisional conclusion: the old wing's window had been damaged at the time of the iron blows. Aditi said, "I have no definite measurement from that time. My earlier inspection recorded a small crack, and a further test was ordered after the rains; I have no proof that it was completed." She placed three documents separately: the old repair slip, a photograph of the present crack, and the new testimony about what was heard. "At the next inspection, the ground beneath the warehouse and the drainage levels must be measured again," she said. "But a sound heard tonight cannot change the date of that old crack."

Leaving the meeting, Tara went to the water mark on the outer wall of the hospital. Looking at her measuring notebook, she realised that the line she had earlier taken for the highest rainwater level might have been the edge of a limewash applied several days before. "I'll check it again," she said. "What looks plain to the eye may have a history of how it came to be there." Fakira listened. "The same with my ears. The sound in the distance was clear; its cause was not nearly so clear." Both paused over the comparison. Naira recorded that the two matters required separate inquiries.

The next day, an amendment sheet arrived with a copy of the register. The earlier copy had not been removed; beside it had been added: "The previously published account does not match the witness's statement; the portion concerning visual testimony is withdrawn." The claim that Fakira had "seen two people" was cancelled. He asked, "If the original page was wrong, why not tear it up?" Mahesh replied, "No. Both the original and the correction must remain, so the history of the error can be seen." Fakira laughed for a moment. "People are eager enough to erase my name. When I ask them to erase a mistake on paper, I have to stop them doing it."

On accepting the copy of the correction, Fakira had two further conditions written down. First, the public notice must not print the full details of his private movements; only the relevant time and a general description of the lane were to appear. Second, if he was needed to speak again, he must not be ordered to miss the morning train; the time should be settled beforehand with his consent. The assistant said, "Travel arrangements will be covered as an expense of the inquiry." Fakira asked, "Is that in writing?" The assistant prepared a provisional allowance slip, but payment had not yet been approved. Fakira kept the acknowledgement copy. It remained plain that he had not yet received the money.

On the far bank of the landing, two labourers loading goods asked Fakira what religious order of fakir he belonged to. He was accustomed to the question. "I am Fakira," he replied. "One clerk writes 'Sai Fakir', another 'Diwan Madar' in the register. Their words are not the whole of who I am. Do you need someone to carry your bundle, or someone to tell you a story?" The labourers laughed and asked the charge for carrying the load. Fakira first found out the rises and dips of the route, and then named his price. Half the wage in advance, half when the work was done: both agreed to those ordinary terms.

While the goods were being unloaded, a brass bowl slipped from one labourer's hand and struck the stones twice. Fakira turned his head at the sound. "After the first blow there's a ringing as it spins along the ground," he said. The labourer picked up the bowl and showed him that one side had been dented. "You knew it was that just by hearing?" he asked. "No," Fakira replied. "The spinning sound gave me an idea. You told me what the object was. Tomorrow, I'll say that a labourer told me it was a bowl. What I heard and what I was told each have their own place." The labourer's little boy was standing nearby. He tapped the empty bowl with a finger and burst out laughing.

In the evening, a little mango tree behind Fakira's house cast a patch of shade. A neighbour's daughter sat there every day, repeating her lessons. Today she asked, "When will your pass be opened?" "The office that blocked it will open it," Fakira said. "I haven't abandoned the application." The girl asked again, "When somebody's mistake is corrected, do all their troubles come to an end?" Fakira showed her the loose tip of his stick. "I'll tighten this myself; the office will deal with the pass; tomorrow's journey will have to be seen to tomorrow. Life goes on after one problem has been put right. It does not come to an end."

That evening Sarita was washing rice in an old vessel. Naira told her that Fakira's corrected statement had been accepted, but the entry declaring him dead had still not been amended. Sarita asked, "Two papers for the same man: on one his voice is written truthfully now; on the other he is still dead? What sort of accounting is that?" Naira replied, "The errors came from two different sources. Correcting one does not correct the other by itself." Sarita poured away the water. "Then the other door must be opened too. But don't forget that today Fakira earned his own meal."

That night Naira put three copies into separate envelopes: the original statement, the corrected sheet, and Aditi's unfinished inspection report. All the papers lay on the same table, but none could serve as proof of the others. Aditi asked over the phone, "I need to check the date on the copy of the old report I've been given. Does your amended testimony record the hour of the first blow?" Naira said, "It records a time recalled from memory, not read from a clock. I'll send it under that description." Aditi replied that the next day she would examine the original warning notice and the old map of the warehouse land together.

That night, walking home from the railway square, Fakira again heard a distant sound from the direction of the hospital. This time it was not one clang but many small ones—perhaps repair work, perhaps vessels in some vehicle. He stopped, rested the tip of his stick on the stone, and listened for a little while. Then he went on his way. He wanted to know where the sounds had come from, but standing watch all night over his guesses was not his work. If need be, he would ask tomorrow. In his bag, separately and safely stowed, lay the coins he had earned that day, the copy of his corrected statement, and the application for his travel rights, still only half restored.

Chapter 68 · A Copy of the Warning

As Aditi undid the binding of an old file on her desk, a small knot in the red thread snapped. She did not immediately lay a hand on the papers. First she placed the broken thread on a clean white sheet and counted the pages inside the file. At the top lay a copy bearing the seal of the municipal office, in the middle were pages in her own handwriting, and at the end was a copy whose marginal words had been struck through and written again. Outside the window, two labourers were examining where to set a ladder against the roof of the hospital's old wing, without yet climbing onto it. Aditi looked at the clock. Yesterday she had received Fakira's corrected testimony; today she needed to establish what the first written warning had said, and how much work had actually followed it.

When Naira arrived, Aditi spread three sheets before her. "This is the initial report bearing my signature," she said. "This second sheet is the office's abbreviated summary. The source of the third has not yet been established." Naira read the line on the first page: "Waterlogging beside the rear wall and a fine crack along the edge of the foundation; mandatory reinspection after the rains." In the abbreviated summary, the last five words were missing. In their place stood "Recommendation for routine repairs." Aditi spoke softly. "The difference occupies very few letters. But it is enough to change the order in which work is done."

"When was the first copy written?" Naira asked. Aditi showed her the date on the paper. The inspection had taken place just before the weather turned, when work had begun to cover the outer drain of the old wing. On the summary, the office's date of receipt belonged to the following month. Two digits were missing from the receipt sequence between the two dates. "I am not saying yet that someone removed them deliberately," Aditi made clear. "First I have to know who prepared the summary, which original was placed before that person, and in which register the instruction to reinspect was entered."

After a little silence Aditi read aloud the wording of her first inspection once more. She had called the crack "small" because there had been a thin line in the upper plaster and the foundation beneath had not been exposed. "The word 'small' was not the result of a measurement," she said. "I did not have the full equipment that day. That was why I called for a second inspection. My fault, too, is that afterwards I did not insist firmly enough on evidence that the office had completed it." Naira did not interrupt her. Acknowledging the limits of one's own earlier decision was not the same thing as immediately pronouncing someone else guilty.

When Mahesh came in, Aditi asked him to supply a photocopy of the original document. Mahesh said, "Is this warning the same thing as the hospital's repair slip?" Aditi shook her head. "The repair slip concerns work on a particular item and gives instructions for testing it again. My inspection called for examination of the outer edge of the foundation and the weight of water pressing against it. They may be related, but they are not one and the same document." Mahesh entered that distinction in his register. The iron sounds Fakira had heard at night could not be used to alter the date of this file.

Aniruddha telephoned. Two patients were scheduled for examination in the old wing that day. One had already been transferred to safety, but the alternative arrangement for the other patient's treatment machine was not yet complete. "If you carry out the inspection, don't block a passage we're still using," he told her. Aditi replied, "I'll first measure the ground outside. If we need to go in, we shall separately agree on the treatment team's consent and the procedures for keeping the patient safe." After she put down the telephone, she said to Naira, "It is easy to put a warning about danger on a blank sheet of paper. It is harder to account for the cost of keeping a hospital running."

On the hospital's old veranda, Jamuna Devi was opening her medicine box. When Aniruddha spoke of moving her to a new room, she first looked towards the window. "I can see the morning kachnar blossoms from here. Does the other room have a window?" Aniruddha said it did, but there was a high threshold at the rear door; a safe ramp would have to be fitted before she moved. Closing the lid of her box, Jamuna said, "I shall put my medicines and a safe way to walk before the tree. But don't lift my bed without asking me." Salma recorded the time of her treatment on a fresh sheet and arranged to inform her family. The hours required to obtain that consent did not automatically find a place in an external measurement report.

Tara had reached the warehouse's outer gate before the others. She carried a measuring notebook and two stout wooden pegs wrapped in cloth. On the strip of Purnadhar, last night's water had collected in one place, while beside it an old white border of lime shone in the sun. Before driving in a peg, Tara asked the employee's permission. "Not inside the enclosure," he said. "Even on the public strip outside, the exact boundary of the land is still disputed." "Then we'll set down temporary markers, not drive them in," Tara answered. "The need to measure does not change anyone's ownership."

Ratan Vanpar arrived just then with his old jute bag. The paper he had earlier shown, a copy in his father's hand, now lay straight between two plain protective sheets. The person accompanying Ratan was not his grandson but a young woman from the neighbouring house, who read documents aloud for him and ran a tailoring shop during the day. "She has come to read to me, not to decide in my place," Ratan said. Naira also asked the young woman for her consent. She said she needed to return before the afternoon's tailoring orders were due.

Ratan opened the paper and rested a finger on a worn, crooked line. “My father used to call this the old course of the Jibach. That was the name in our household. When I was a boy, shallow water would stand along this side for two or three days after the rains. But that line, as I remember it, cannot tell you the entire present course of the river.” Tara asked, “Where did you yourself once cross on foot?” Ratan pointed towards a raised embankment to the west. “I used to go there holding my father’s hand. I’ll tell you only as much of the distance as I can remember.”

The warehouse accountant came out from the inner counter carrying a key. Sweat stood on his forehead. “If you use this paper to declare the warehouse land part of the river,” he said, “where will our labourers keep the sacks? Who will pay the rent?” Ratan looked at him for a moment. “I haven’t come to break down your warehouse. I want to know whether this was my grandmother’s old footpath, and when and how far the water used to rise. Where people earn their living, count their work too. But don’t erase a watercourse merely because money is made there.”

Tara put three separate questions before everyone. First: where had the old drainage channel run? Second: what were the ground levels and the flow of water today? Third: what did the valid land-rights records now say? “The first answer will begin with memory and old maps, the second with measurements taken by instruments, the third with the revenue register,” she said. “No one answer can stand in for another.” The accountant asked who would pay for the inspection. Naira showed him the limits of the municipality’s written advance approval. There was still no authority to begin additional work.

Ratan took a little bundle of cloth out of his bag. Inside was his father’s old measuring cord, its knots set at unequal intervals. “I played with this cord as a child,” he said, laughing. “It frightens me to think that people may have divided fields with it.” Tara laid a modern measuring tape between two of the knots to compare the distance, but in her notebook she described the cord as “an indication of historical local measures, not a standardised measurement.” The young woman asked, “If your father’s things are made public, will his name be attached to them?” Ratan replied, “His name should be there. But copies may be used only with my consent.”

Naira understood why that sentence mattered. She asked Ratan whether the document could be photographed for the public inquiry. “Photograph the part that shows the measurements,” he said. “Don’t put the family names written beside those four fields on display at the crossroads. Some of their descendants now live elsewhere. Don’t settle their rights without asking them.” Naira wrote these limits on the consent sheet. The original would remain with Ratan; private names would be obscured in the authenticated photograph; a complete copy would be kept in the restricted inspection file. The young woman asked to be paid for the time she had spent reading. Ratan smiled. “This isn’t a favour to my family. It is an hour taken away from her sewing.”

The first line of measurement began not at the warehouse wall but at a fixed stone on the public path. Tara explained that the wall’s foundation might itself have shifted; it could not therefore be treated as the sole stable reference point. Following a method Hira had described earlier, they distinguished the bed beneath the water from the mud above it. One bamboo pole sank into soft soil; another met a hard layer. Recording the figures, Aditi said, “A depth measured to the mud and a depth measured to the hard layer are not two readings of the same thing.”

Tara proposed weighing and keeping a small soil sample. Aditi stopped her. “The laboratory number and collection procedure haven’t yet been approved. If we fill a container without entering it in the register, tomorrow it will be difficult to say at what depth the sample was taken.” Tara agreed, then marked three locations in her notebook: the exposed edge, the filled strip, and a position at a safe distance from the warehouse wall. The accountant insisted that a warehouse representative be present. Ratan wanted someone who knew the old local paths to be there as well. Both were allowed, although the technical collection of samples would be left to a trained team. That small decision lowered the voices of the disputants. For the first time, all sides could see that the method of investigation had to be written down beforehand.

As Ratan moved towards the western embankment, his dhoti caught on thorns growing beside the old footpath. The young woman bent to free it. The accountant immediately said that nobody had authorised entry into the enclosure. Ratan stopped of his own accord. “This path seems old and familiar to me, but there is wire here now. I won’t insist on going in merely because I remember it from long ago.” Tara showed him another route around the outside. Travel expenses and safe access were conditions for Ratan’s testimony, not a trial he had to endure to give it.

Then a warehouse labourer said that the water behind the building had never risen as high as his chest. “I’ve been unloading sacks here for ten years. I’ve never seen a river.” Ratan answered quietly, “What you saw in those ten years may be entirely true. My childhood is older than that. But where the water I knew as a child goes today—that must be measured.” Aditi recorded both statements, noting the period each covered. Not having seen a river was not accepted as proof of its complete absence; nor could an old memory properly be treated as a measurement of present flood depth.

Tara was holding down a thin map against the midday wind when an old debt letter concerning Suraj Gangota’s eroded field arrived from the office. The document contained an archival reference to a place called “Dhemura.” The area of the field and the outstanding loan had been entered in two different inks. Naira spoke at once. “We shall not connect this name to the old line of the Jibach and invent a confluence. Suraj's letter is evidence about cultivation and debt. The geographical question has its own procedure." Tara kept a separate copy of the letter.

Suraj himself had not yet arrived. His son had left the letter and said his father would come to the loan hearing the next day. "If our field has been destroyed," the son asked, "why hasn't the debt been destroyed with it?" Naira said that no answer could be given without examining the loan rules, the record of the loss and the family's claim. Beside the document they wrote: "Original loan register to be requested." The name Dhemura did not instantly turn the Purnadhar land into the family's property. But the economic burden of the vanished field had reappeared on paper.

A nurse from the hospital's inspection team sent word that the smell of stagnant water was growing stronger near the rear passage of the old wing. Aditi immediately telephoned Aniruddha. She did not abandon the site and run to the hospital; first she asked him to separate the emergency cleaning team's work from the route used for treatment. Aniruddha said the water had not reached the patients' rooms, although one corner of the outside passage was wet. Tara noted that the relative height of the hospital and warehouse grounds should be checked again against the same datum. A possible connection between their drainage systems remained a hypothesis, not a conclusion established by measurement.

Towards evening the municipal assistant engineer arrived. Looking at the original of Aditi's warning, he asked, "At the time you wrote only that the crack was small. Why do you now call such an old inspection the source of a major danger?" Aditi put her finger on the instruction in the margin of the report. "I am not calling it the proved cause of a major danger. What I wrote was: reinspect after the rains. We must establish the date on which this warning was received. Then we must establish whether a record of that reinspection exists." The official turned the page back again. "And if you find such a record?" "Then we examine the procedure followed in that inspection and what it found."

The official asked that the news report should not use the words "past negligence proved." Naira replied, "I won't write that either. A warning was issued—that is one piece of evidence. The necessary sentence was omitted from its summary—that is another. Whether the reinspection took place is still a question to investigate. Responsibility, intention and the complete chain of causes leading to harm require separate inquiry." Tara added that deciding the route of a drain without current measurements of the warehouse ground could heighten the danger. The official agreed to publish a notice of temporary restrictions and to seek written authorisation for the full survey.

Ratan had remained silent through the discussion. Before leaving, he asked the young woman to read aloud once more the four old field names on his paper. He could not hear one of the names clearly, and she offered two possibilities after studying the letters. Ratan shook his head. “If I declare one wrong name to be certain, I may change the history of that household as well.” Naira placed a question mark beside the name. An indistinct letter in an old document did not give anyone licence to reject a living descendant’s claim in haste.

As he gathered his papers, Ratan told the young woman that at the first rumble of thunder before the rains, his mother used to lift four things to a higher place in the house: a sack of seed, his father’s measuring cord, the medicine box and the child’s writing slate. “I used to think water would wash everything away together. But my mother said each thing needed its own way of being saved.” The young woman said, “Today your father’s cord might have been treated as a measurement if you hadn’t stopped them.” Ratan smiled. “I did not stop them. I said: write down the history of the cord; take the measurement with something else.” The bottom of his bag had split. The young woman took out a needle and thread and stitched the tear. Ratan offered to pay her, but she said, “This is a favour within the family. Payment for public reading work is another matter.”

As Ratan rose to go home, the employee stopped him at the gate to offer him a cup of water. “Your father’s map frightens me,” he said. “If the warehouse closes, where shall I go?” Drinking the water, Ratan answered, “The line my father drew is not an order to take away a labourer’s livelihood. If the use of this land changes, the question of the workers’ employment must be heard too. But if the watercourse is blocked, will pretending not to see it save anyone’s living?” The employee glanced towards the empty sacks hanging on a peg. Their anxieties were different, yet both their futures were caught beside the same wall.

Over the evening meal Sarita asked Naira, “How much of Ratan’s map was proved true today?” Naira said, “Today we established the rules for using the map. Measurement of the land has begun. All the questions about what is true remain.” Sarita placed a single grain of boiled rice in her palm. “Look. You can see whether this grain has swelled. But can you see inside it the debt on the field it came from, the price of water, or the hours spent by the person who cooked it?” Naira laughed. “You are making my report difficult too.” Sarita said, “Let the report be simple. Just don’t cut people’s lives out of it.”

That night Aditi returned to the office and examined the three pages from the old file once more. She put the original signed sheet and the copy bearing the receipt sequence in separate plastic sleeves, taking precautions against damp. The name of the person who had written the revised summary was blank, though the receipt stamp was clear. She did not fill that space with a name she merely suspected. In the first calculations of her report, the height of a foundation reference point had been marked “local estimate.” In the later summary the same figure had been described as “measured.” She recorded this difference in a new note beside her own signature.

Mahesh asked whether the original measurements should be withdrawn altogether. Aditi said, “If the original reference point proves wrong, the calculations must be corrected. But we must not erase the history of the old paper. Measurements actually taken then have only the standing they earned then. Incomplete facts from that day cannot tell us the depth of today’s ground.” Mahesh drew up a checklist: locating the original reference point on the site; finding the post-rain reinspection register; obtaining permission from the warehouse; tracing the hospital drain’s outlet; and securing safe routes for the patients. Empty spaces were left beside each task for the person responsible and the deadline.

Naira examined the wording of the safety team’s letter. The draft said, “Illegal filling by the warehouse caused damage to the hospital.” She replaced it with: “The possible connection between filling on the plot behind the warehouse, the old drainage channel and the hospital foundation is under investigation.” The official asked, “Will that make people cautious?” Naira answered, “For immediate safety, issue a separate, unmistakable warning not to enter the unsafe strip near the old wing. Declaring an uncertain cause to be a definite crime does not make anyone safer.” A revised copy of the safe-corridor map was sent at once to Aniruddha’s treatment team.

There was a proposal to call Ratan back the following day to give evidence. Tara pointed out that his knowledge had already been used throughout a day of measurement. If he was summoned again, he should receive proper payment for his travel and lost working time. Ratan heard the proposal over the telephone and said, “The original map is in my house. If I carry it about on a rainy day, the pages may get wet. If all you need is one unclear field name, I can read it over the telephone. But if the whole route must be examined again, give me a date in writing.” The office proposed a date for the next inspection; his reply was still awaited before final agreement.

Among the papers from Aditi’s old file was a small slip bearing the words “Look again” in her own hand. She turned it over and saw faint ink on the back: an employee had entered the date of receipt, but the space for a signature confirming that the inspection had been completed was empty. For a long time Aditi stared at that blank space. It did not prove that no inspection had ever taken place. Yet after so explicit a warning, the failure to find its record was itself a question the institution had to answer. She lengthened the list of places to search. She wrote no accusation against any single name.

At the next hour of dawn, outside the Purnadhar enclosure, Tara marked the first fixed reference point for the new survey with temporary yellow paint. A warehouse employee stopped on the route he used for carrying sacks, and Tara measured the width required for his daily passage as well. Ratan’s father’s map was not there that morning, but it might be possible to establish a safe way of reaching the embankment he had described. In the measuring notebook they wrote: “First fixed reference point established; direction of the old watercourse unverified; decision on warehouse land rights pending.” They were small words. But the time and labour of the people behind them were no longer concealed.

Returning from the hospital, Naira looked towards the warehouse wall. The old wooden board bearing the word “Purnadhar” had now been put in a safe place; the peculiar shadow cast by the sunlight there on another day was not visible now. She did not add the page from her private notebook to the official file. What had to be established here was who had written the earlier warning, who had received it, and where the evidence of subsequent action lay. She understood inwardly that an absent name on a page and an absent path on the ground were not absences of the same kind. The next inquiry would test the difference.

Chapter 69 · The Meaning of Absence

From early morning the sacks had been shifting in the Purnadhar warehouse, but in the little office it was an empty space on a form that held everyone's attention. Aditi's register of acknowledgements for the warning letter bore a date, a seal and the number of the original communication; the space reserved for the signature of the person who had carried out the reinspection was blank. Mahesh moved a finger towards the small rectangle, then held back his hand. Naira said, “A signature missing from the paper and an inspection never having taken place are not yet the same statement.” Outside, Tara was examining again the rain-dampened yellow of the temporary mark on the warehouse wall.

Half-closing a shutter of the window, Aditi said, “What frightens me is not the empty space but the haste with which people will fill it. Someone will write that the inspection took place; someone else will say that it never did. Let both sides first give the date, the employee's name and the source of the site register.” Mahesh showed them a list of the copies he had requested during the previous three weeks. The sheet was torn in two places. Whether a name had disappeared with the torn portion or the paper had merely worn away was unclear. Naira took an image copy of the blank space and left the original document in Aditi's custody.

Just then Suraj Gangota appeared at the doorway. He carried an old cloth bag under his arm; beside him, his son Harihar held two narrow strips of bamboo. Setting the bag on the floor, the father said, “I have found the papers for my field. I have not found the field.” It was not the voice of a man begging for alms. He wanted his case to be heard. Harihar said, “The dates on Father's debt keep advancing even now, but where rice once grew by the edge of Dhemura, boats are afraid to stop.”

Suraj drew two slips from the bag. The first bore the field's old land-account number, with particulars on the reverse of the seed and irrigation loans for which it had been mortgaged; the second calculated the sum outstanding after the last monsoon. Even though half the field had been eaten away, the full amount remained entered against the debt. “I'm not asking you to tear up the documents for my sake,” Suraj said. “I'm asking why the instalments should remain unchanged when the source of the harvest no longer exists. Look at the work I did alongside the account you keep of it.”

“Father,” Harihar burst out, “will showing them these papers bring the field back? Will the lender agree?” Suraj looked at him. “No. The hope of recovering the land and the demand to alter the debt are two different things. If I put them together, they'll dismiss them both with a single no.” Naira did not post the amounts from the slips on the public discussion board. She marked them “Private liability—to be checked against the original register” and placed them in a separate cover. Suraj's express permission was obtained for the hearing.

Tara came in from outside and opened an old map across the table. At one corner was a copy of the line drawn by Ratan Vanpar's father; at another, the blue dots of Aditi's present measurements. “There is an empty space between the two,” she said. “I have no right to fill it out of my imagination. Someone may say the old name of Suraj's field matches the strip where the Purnadhar warehouse stands. But a document bearing the name Dhemura establishes neither ownership of this plot nor its connection with the river's confluence.” Suraj nodded. “I have come for a hearing about the debt, not to seize land.”

The office assistant kept turning the papers over. He could not find Suraj's name on the old list. “There is no entry for your family in this year's register of beneficiaries,” he said. “How, then, can you apply in the name of a damaged field?” Suraj was silent for a few moments. Harihar rose to his feet. Naira did not take the application from his hand. Instead she asked the assistant, “Which scheme does this register belong to? Which year? And up to what date did it accept applications? Does a name's absence prove that the field never existed, or that the procedure was never completed in this particular list?”

The assistant's face reddened. “How am I supposed to make a payment to someone who isn't on the list?” “Whether payment is allowed may be a question of the rules,” Naira replied. “But that the person never existed, or that the land was never his—those are different conclusions. Please do not confuse them.” In the margin the assistant wrote: “Check earlier records, acceptance of application and variant spellings of name.” He did not strike out his original entry; he placed a new question beside it.

On just such an afternoon, centuries earlier, people assembled for a philosophical disputation in a garden in Mithila were moving their seats as the shade shifted. Opposite Udayana, an opponent was studying a question written on palm leaf. “You argue for an omniscient God,” the opponent said. “On what evidence does the necessity arise to accept the existence of one who is not directly apprehended, when action and the affairs of the world appear to proceed without him? If my failure to perceive him does not injure your position, is perception no longer necessary?” There was no mockery in the last question before the assembly, only the stern demand of knowledge.

Without closing the palm-leaf manuscript, Udayana answered, “Before you say you have not seen something with your own eyes, tell me what sort of thing it is, and under what conditions you ought reasonably to expect to see it. If a lamp standing before you is not visible in full light, the inference that it is not there gains strength. But if the thing in question has not been established as an object of the senses, how can its non-apprehension count against it in the same way as the lamp?” “That answer does not prove your God,” said the opponent. “Quite so,” Udayana conceded. “My argument so far only shows the limits of the proposed counter-evidence; it is not a positive proof.”

Another scholar asked, “Someone may deny your claim not by direct perception but by inference. Events in the world arise from causes, yet there may be many such causes. Why must there be one omniscient governing intelligence?” The opponent added at once, “Simply inserting the name of God into an incomplete explanation solves nothing. If the reason offered for an inference lacks invariable concomitance, the grandeur of its conclusion cannot remove the defect.” Udayana waited until the objection was complete. “The relation between reason and what it is meant to establish requires separate examination,” he said. “But any inference that seeks to establish an absence must submit its own grounds to scrutiny as well.”

The opponent lifted a small vessel with a clean bottom. “There is no oil here,” he said. “I look into it and apprehend an absence. Is that knowledge false?” Udayana looked inside. “No,” he replied. “Under suitable conditions you have learned that the vessel is now empty. But would it be reasonable to infer from this empty vessel that there is no oil anywhere in the city, or that oil has never existed?” The pupils glanced at one another. The subject was a little pot, yet the dispute had reached the place and time of an absence, and the means by which it could be known.

“So you too admit that non-apprehension can sometimes be a means of knowing absence,” the opponent said. “Yes, where the appropriate conditions and circumstances have been established,” Udayana replied. “Where they have not, ‘I have not seen it’ does not become ‘it does not exist.’” The opponent questioned him again about the conflict of verbal testimony, the limits of analogy, postulation and the independence of non-apprehension as a means of knowledge. Udayana kept their respective roles distinct. At the centre of the argument in his third stabaka lay the insistence that a claim to refute God's existence by such means must itself be examined. The opponent did not withdraw his final line: “The failure of a refutation does not lighten the burden of proving an assertion.” The gathering broke up that day with the disagreement intact.

Back at the window of the Videhapur office, Harihar's eye caught a name printed in still-damp ink. The ancient disputation was not evidence for his debt slip. Here, solid questions demanded answers: who had been appointed to prepare the register, under which spelling the name had been entered, and who possessed the measurements of the eroded field? From inside the bag Suraj brought out an old seed tin once used on his land. There were no seeds in it now, only three grains of red earth. “I have kept this earth not to bring back the field,” he said, “but so my son may understand that his father once farmed it.”

In the cooperative loan office adjoining the main room, the officer in charge, Kankalata, had opened the original ledger. Suraj had known her for some time. “The amount outstanding is in the book,” she said. “We cannot pretend it isn't there. But there is a procedure for applying to restructure the loan after last season's erosion. The loss itself must be established through a separate process.” “Then why,” Suraj asked, “have I received nothing for all these months except demands for instalments?” Kankalata opened an old file under her counter. The sequence recording receipt of his application could not be found. The copy Harihar had submitted bore the stamp of a different counter.

“Look here.” Harihar showed her two impressions in different inks. “I left the application on this day. Who can say I never handed it in?” Kankalata asked at which window he had left the paper. Harihar could point to the place but could not remember the employee's name. “This receipt of yours will be examined,” Kankalata said. “I can give you a new acknowledgement number today for the copy. But without an inquiry I cannot certify that the first application was accepted in time.” Harihar's anger did not immediately subside. Still, for the first time he was looking at an official acknowledgement of his paper.

Suraj asked that the debt be divided into three entries: principal, interest already accrued, and the penalty for delay imposed after the erosion. Kankalata drew three lines on a sheet. There were receipts for some of the repayments made from the field's harvest over earlier months; for others, none. “I don't want money I have paid to appear as owing a second time,” Suraj said. “Your receipts will be matched with the ledger,” Kankalata answered. “If there is a discrepancy, it will be corrected.” The lender had not yet agreed to compensate him for the loss. But for the first time the account of what he owed had become open to argument.

In the afternoon heat Suraj and Harihar sat beneath the shade of a peepal tree outside. “I'll go to Delhi to work,” Harihar said. “Let the field go. Where will we find room for so many papers in the place I'll be living?” Suraj wanted to stop him, yet did not. “Go wherever you wish, but don't bind my decision to your fear,” he said. “I will seek a hearing to reduce the debt. I will not write the dream of getting the field back into this file.” For the first time that day, although he still disagreed with his father, Harihar offered to pay the bus fare for the hearing of his claim.

Meanwhile, in the final acknowledgement section for Aditi's warning, an employee found an old visitors' register. It contained a number corresponding to the date on which the inspection team was said to have arrived. But the visitor's name continued onto the next page, which lay inside a locked chest. “Can we now say an inspector came that day?” Mahesh asked. “For now we can say only that a number was entered in this register,” Aditi replied. “Without the purpose of the visit, the person's name and evidence of work on the ground, it remains incomplete.” She requested written authorisation to open the chest.

Balai, a worker at the warehouse, stood beside the place where the old wooden signboard was stored. “In ten years of working here, I've never seen an open drain at that spot,” he said. Ratan had come from a distance, but no time had been set for his public testimony that day; he had only given permission for two indistinct letters to be read to him over the telephone. Naira recorded Balai's experience together with its time span. Not having seen something in ten years was significant testimony, but it could not close the history of an older channel. Tara did not drive a yellow peg into the new survey point; permission to enter the land had not yet been obtained.

After sunset Naira made three columns in her notebook: “Name,” “Receipt,” “Statement.” Under Name she recorded the different positions of Suraj's old land entry and the current relief list. Under Receipt she recorded the acknowledgement of the loan application and the incomplete old copy concerning boat fares. Under Statement she recorded the metallic sound Fakira had heard and Balai's limited experience of the site. She did not weave these separate papers into a single chain of proof. The file on the search for Mithun was secured in another cupboard, some distance away. A similar-looking name was not sufficient reason to open it.

Mahesh had just returned from meeting a local correspondent of a newspaper. The journalist wanted information about the obstruction of the hospital's outer drainage and the old warning. “The name has been removed from the government letter,” Mahesh said. “He says the report is incomplete without a name.” “A name is not always indispensable to the truth of an event,” Naira replied. “The accountability of a public official is one thing; the home of a witness who runs a risk is another. If publication of a name is necessary, the reason and consent must be recorded in writing. Even a surname, without proper checking, may identify a person.” Mahesh folded the draft in his pocket once more.

That night the cooperative's first amended reply reached Suraj's home. Kankalata had written that a proposal to suspend new penalties for late payment until the inquiry was complete had been placed before the committee; an accurate reconciliation of the principal and earlier interest would be heard within fifteen days. This was not final relief. Suraj asked his son to read the letter aloud. “Will someone come to collect the debt in the meantime?” Harihar asked. There was no explicit line about that in the letter. Suraj decided to write another application the next day to ask this still unanswered question.

At home Suraj's wife, Faguni, was taking a pot of bathua greens off the stove. “Have you forgotten even the hour for eating, talking about the field?” she asked. Suraj smiled. “I didn't find the field today, but the three entries of the debt were separated." Serving rice in an old bowl, Faguni said, "If the earth has been washed away, my two months of labour transplanting rice lie in that earth too. Where will my work be written into the hearing about the debt?" Suraj fell silent. He had not thought of naming his wife as a co-applicant in the next day's petition.

In the morning Faguni took out a little account she had kept of the seed work: how many days she had transplanted, how many she had weeded, how many she had carried meals to the edge of the embankment. "I was not the owner of the field," she said, "but my time went into it. My absence from the evidence register doesn't mean I did no work." Harihar laughed and said that his mother's notebook was more clearly kept than his father's accounts. Faguni looked him straight in the face. "Clear handwriting is no use if they won't let me into the hearing." Suraj resolved to go with her.

At the next hearing Suraj, Faguni and Harihar all went to the cooperative office. Kankalata could not yet say whether Faguni's account of her labour would count as official evidence for reducing the debt; she did, however, permit it to be attached to the particulars of the affected family's income and loss. "I won't say the drowned field will return of its own accord," Suraj said. "What I want is that instalment dates which cannot possibly be met should not be fixed on the basis of a harvest that no longer exists." In the margin of the meeting record was written: "Preliminary consideration of loan restructuring approved; actual measurement of erosion, old payment receipts and recalculation of family income still pending."

Kankalata signed the proposal. With Suraj's consent, his copy was placed inside the cloth bag. Outside, on the bench, Harihar was talking to some impassioned young men. One told him that if half the field was gone, half the loan would automatically be cancelled. "I won't say anything of the kind now," Harihar answered. "I want the written conditions for whatever remission may be possible. A declaration without evidence will only bring us fresh trouble tomorrow." Suraj felt proud of his son's reply, but no desire arose in him to bind the boy to farming as he himself had been bound.

At midday Naira returned to the blank signature box on the warning. Permission had arrived to open the chest, but the following page of the register was not inside. An entry said it had been sent years earlier to the repairs division. "We've searched this much and still not found it," the employee said. "Can we say it was destroyed?" Aditi stopped him sharply. "You can say it wasn't found in this chest. If you wish to say it was destroyed, show the register of destruction. Otherwise don't complete the story of a missing paper with your own guesswork." The employee added a new search number to the record of that answer.

Naira telephoned Mahesh to ask him to keep any press statement about the blank signature box restricted for the time being. "A draft had already gone to the newspaper," Mahesh said. "I've asked for it back. The editor says only the final copy will be printed." "Did the draft contain the direct witness's name?" Naira asked. Mahesh paused. "Not the full name, but hints about the address and family relationships. I'm sending a written request to remove them." "An assurance alone isn't enough," Naira said. "Get confirmation of the amended copy. Meanwhile, think about the safety of anyone those details could identify."

Aditi was copying the faint writing from the reverse of a document. Outside, the gatekeeper pulled his chair indoors; small drops of rain had begun to fall. Suraj's letter about the eroded field, the blank space for the hospital's reinspection and Mahesh's draft for the newspaper had all arrived on the same table in a single day, yet none was evidence for either of the others. Naira thought that an absence could be the absence of a thing, of a name, or of a record showing that a responsibility had been fulfilled. Fill all three with the same colour of ink, and guilt itself might be transferred—and an innocent person's life altered with it.

That evening, at the doorway of his house, Suraj placed the little empty red-earth tin in Harihar's hand. "Keep it if you're preparing to go to the city," he said. "Not yet," Harihar replied. "First I'll come to the hearing about Mother's labour and the restructuring of your loan. After that I'll choose my own road." Faguni was setting a light by the door. Far away a vehicle at Purnadhar sounded its horn once, but no one in the house speculated about whose horn it was or why it had sounded. One thing had been settled that day: without any promise that the field would be restored in full, the family could still speak on the terms of what was owed to them.

That night Mahesh lit the lamp on his desk and waited for the editor's answer. One page held a copy of Aditi's warning; another, his written request for a correction sent to the journalist. A short message appeared on his phone: "The printing copy has been closed; changes are not possible." Mahesh called again. Nobody answered at the other end. For the first time he wrote a line on the paper separate from the newspaper's deadline: "Risk of identification; immediate confidential contact with the family concerned is necessary." The evening's clamour had died away outside, but the empty place on the paper before him was no longer silent.

Chapter 70 · Mahesh's Night

Before dawn, the first newspaper landed upside down at Mahesh's door, one corner darkening with dew. His daughter was setting her school shoes on a stool to dry. She bent to pick up the paper, but Mahesh's wife reached it first. On the front page was a report about the drainage system. It did not name Mahesh; nevertheless, it printed together the description of 'a former employee connected with night work at the western warehouse beyond the railway line' and the direction of his home. Another line referred to an old ledger seen by a relative of a supplier to the hospital repair contract. His wife folded the paper. Milk was still coming to the boil inside the house, yet the words of the report had already crossed its threshold without anyone's permission.

Before reading the report, Mahesh looked at the clock. Their daughter had to be taken to school. His wife asked, "How many former night-shift employees of that warehouse live in this neighbourhood, with daughters whose route to school is also known?" Mahesh gave no answer. Naira's carelessness in an earlier citizens' bulletin had already made his identity recognisable. That post had been removed, but copies survived on people's phones. Now the new report pointed towards his house for anyone who read it alongside the old copy. The omission of his name had afforded no protection.

His daughter wanted to look for an advertisement for her school in the middle of the newspaper. Her mother did not snatch it away; she gave her a page separate from the report. "Which way would you like to go today?" she asked. The girl said she would take the usual route with her friends, but yesterday, near the market, two men had asked about her father. "I told them I was going to school. Was it wrong of me to say that?" Mahesh looked at his daughter. No short answer of his could lift the weight of her question. "You did nothing wrong," he said. "But you have no obligation to tell anyone who asks about my work." His wife added that the teacher would be given only the limited information the family had agreed upon; their daughter's name would not become a public example in the correction of a newspaper's mistake.

A brief message from the editor arrived on Mahesh's phone: 'It was not possible to stop printing; we will revise the online version.' Mahesh photographed the newspaper page and the time of the message and preserved them separately. He telephoned the editor. "Change the online passage," he said, "but who will account for the paper that has already reached people's homes? I want the right to see the original basis of this report. And do not describe it as testimony given with Mahesh's full consent." The editor replied that the name had been withheld in a matter of public interest. Mahesh said,

“When a person can be identified without his name, what protection have you given him by not printing it?”

At the factory beyond the railway line, Raghav Singh had been waiting since morning for his nephew. The young man had spent the night looking at two pages of the ledger: one bore his genuine acknowledgement of receipt; on the other, a mark purporting to be his signature did not appear to have been made by his hand. Raghav had summoned him to examine the papers, but when the young man arrived he carried a folded newspaper rather than the original register. “Uncle,” he said, “am I the supplier's relative in this report? People at the warehouse are saying I'll ruin the contract.” Raghav read the relevant lines first. The printed words were not his nephew's testimony, yet they contained enough clues for people familiar with his work to recognise him.

“What did you see with your own eyes?” Raghav asked. “The goods arrived,” the young man replied. “I recorded the date they were received. I did not see where they were installed. The second page carries a signature in my name, but I don't remember signing it, and the handwriting is different. That is all I will say.” Raghav did not press him to add anything. “Don't lie to save my contract,” he said, “and I won't pretend that your silence could save it. But before you give evidence, we shall ask for a written answer about your safety.” Relief mingled with fear in the young man's eyes; his uncle's business depended heavily on supplies to that warehouse.

When Naira reached the newspaper office, bundles of paper were tied up beside the front window. She had received an acknowledgement of her request for a correction the previous night, but the printed edition contained no such correction. On four separate sheets she laid out her original post in the citizens' bulletin, the time it had been taken down, the limited permission Mahesh had given, and the passages from the new report. “I read your earlier publication as a public source,” the editor said. “My mistake in making that source public did not give you the right to identify the person,” Naira replied. “But you also bear responsibility for your own editorial decisions.”

Without speaking, the editor took out a fresh page, a copy of which could go into the evening edition. He suggested adding the words ‘Identity unclear’ below the report. “That will sound like an invitation to readers to solve a mystery,” Naira said. “Remove the details that identify a private person, not the public facts. Keep the date of the hospital's original warning, the missing copy of the reinspection, and the question of patients' safety. Do not point readers towards a family's doorstep.” “Whose name, then, will the article carry?” the editor asked. “The name of the office whose public decision is under scrutiny,” Naira replied. “Not the name of a private witness.”

She insisted that both the correction and the erroneous printed text be preserved as part of the record. Yet no one sitting in that office was ready to admit that Naira's first post, sent to a municipal group months earlier, had itself created a risk. Beside her own name Naira wrote down the date of its original publication. Acknowledging her responsibility at the newspaper office was one thing; publishing a story of her own moral absolution without the family's permission was another. She stopped herself from doing the latter. To repeat Mahesh's private address in the correction would only repeat the wrong.

Kabir met Mahesh and his wife in the legal-aid room. Their daughter was at school. Her teacher knew only that on that day the girl must not be released to anyone else without written parental consent. Mahesh's wife laid on the table not the newspaper but a list of the family's necessities: their daughter's books, medicines, the route to work, drinking water for the night, the rent for temporary accommodation. “We need somewhere confidential,” she said, “but confidentiality must not mean that my daughter has to leave school.” For the request for official protection, Kabir made separate entries recording the dates of the threats, the messages on the telephone, and inquiries from strangers.

Mahesh showed him a copy of his previous application. It had an acknowledgement number, but no reply. Kabir made it clear that an order assigning security personnel, an assurance given over the telephone, and actual accommodation were three different things. “Must my name be included in the papers?” his wife asked. “Only as much as the process requires will be kept in a closed record accessible to authorised officials,” Kabir replied. “We will not put your full home address in a public application.” She consented, adding one condition in her own voice: Mahesh would not decide alone at their next meeting. Mahesh accepted it. His testimony had placed a burden on the family's life; he had no right to impose that burden on them unilaterally.

At noon Raghav arrived with his nephew. Kabir asked the young man separately whether he wished to speak in his uncle's presence. He looked first at Raghav, then said, “Let Uncle stay, but I will give my own answers.” The original page of his ledger listed four items of material; the following box for one of the items was blank. In the copy, that blank box appeared to have been filled in. The young man said he had seen the goods unloaded at the warehouse, not the repairs being carried out. “Are you certain that the signature on the second page isn't yours?” Aditi asked. “I want it verified,” he said. “It doesn't match my handwriting. But I don't know who wrote it, or when.”

Meanwhile, one of Raghav's former contracting associates telephoned. His voice was raised: “If the nephew talks, the next consignment stops.” Raghav did not put the call on speaker for everyone to hear. He ended it first and asked for a written proposal. The associate sent a message: ‘Further orders for goods temporarily suspended.’ No actual reason for the suspension was formally declared, but the time of the threatening call and the suspended order were recorded together. “I will calculate what the loss of the contract costs me," Raghav told his nephew. "I will not erase what you saw." "What if they dismiss me from my job?" the young man asked. "Then we shall take up your right to earn a living as a separate question," Raghav replied. "I will not pay you to keep silent."

Examining the original delivery slip, Aditi said that a list of 'four items' did not prove that all four had been installed in the proper rooms. Meena Sah's receipt for repairs to two vessels was a separate document; Lalit's refusal to certify the load-bearing safety of the timber was another. The warehouse workers' attendance register established where witnesses had been, not who was guilty. Naira kept the subjects of the three statements separate: a sound heard by one worker, goods actually seen entering by another, and the written instructions in an earlier report. Each could be checked against the others, but none could be used to fill the other's blank spaces.

In the middle of the meeting Mahesh's telephone vibrated. From an unknown number came a short message: 'Anyone reading the papers had better think of his home.' There was sufficient reason to understand it as a threat, but no one knew who had sent it. Mahesh placed the phone before Kabir. Kabir advised him to preserve the time and number of the original message and to attach a copy only to the authorised complaint. His wife laid a hand on the table. "This is no longer merely a matter of keeping the investigation confidential," she said. "How much longer before our home is protected?" No one could promise a definite time. The answer left her dissatisfied, but it was better than a false assurance.

That evening an officer at the police assistance desk accepted the application. Looking at the newspaper cutting, he said, "But no one's name has been printed." Mahesh's wife answered plainly, "Instead of a name, they have printed clues about our home, his work, and our family. People have already begun questioning our daughter." The officer added the details of the risk to the application, recorded that patrols would be increased, and issued an acknowledgement number. Mahesh asked whether there was also an order for direct protection at night. The officer said approval would have to come from above; it had not yet been confirmed. Kabir noted this incompleteness on the copy of the application.

When Mahesh returned home, his daughter was drawing a river in an old exercise book. A blue line ran between two houses on the page. "Is that a river or a road?" Mahesh asked. "Both," she replied. "I want there to be a bridge so I can go to school." Mahesh tried to smile. "Give her a chance to tell us what happened today," his wife said. The girl explained that her teacher had treated her like any other pupil all day, but a friend had said she had read something about 'your father's work' in the newspaper. Then she asked, "If someone tells the truth, does everyone have to know his family's name?" Mahesh took a long time to answer. "A person has the right to tell the truth. But there is also a duty to protect those who choose to take that road."

For the evening meal his wife had warmed the leftover lentils to go with rice. She opened the list of things they would need if they left the house. Someone had suggested that a relative beyond the railway line might put them up, but that relative had not yet agreed. Their daughter insisted that she would take only her books. Her mother said that clothes, medicine, and school papers would be needed as well. Mahesh asked whether he would be able to go with them. “You can make arrangements for the papers concerning the investigation,” his wife said, “but I too shall decide where we live. If we have to leave for somewhere else tomorrow at dawn, we must explain it to our daughter first.” There was less bitterness in her words than the hard resolve of a day exhausted by decisions.

Mahesh came close to making a small but consequential mistake. The editor telephoned a second time. “We can print a new clarification. If you give us your full name, the speculation will stop.” In anger, Mahesh wanted to say, Print my name, then; I have nothing to hide. His wife saw the notebook trembling in his hand. “Why must our home address become proof of your courage?” she asked. Mahesh changed his answer. “I do not consent to publication of my name. Investigate the hospital's public work. I will give my statement to those from whom I need answers through a closed procedure.” The editor accepted this much in writing.

At home that night Naira read through the draft of her letter again. Without visiting Mahesh's family that day, she had received a copy of a document in which his wife had written: ‘Until safety is assured, all public clues to our identity must be stopped. No future letter is to presume the family's consent.’ Naira thought of telephoning once, then saw that his wife had already given her answer in writing and did not call. She sent Kabir only information about the procedure: the online version had been changed, but the distribution of the original printed edition could not be undone; the decision on the request for protection was still pending. She preserved the original copy of her earlier publication. Remorse was no reason to destroy evidence.

Mahesh asked his wife and daughter to rest in the inner room. He rose to check the front door when a message came from Kabir: a renewed request for night patrols had been made, but no definite deployment had yet been confirmed. “Don't keep opening the door to look outside,” his wife said. “We are all worn out from looking at papers the whole day.” Mahesh agreed. He set together the empty milk vessel, his daughter's school water bottle, and the small bundle of medicine his wife had tied up. In the arrangement of these ordinary things, the house seemed not a temporary refuge but his own life.

Before midnight there came a loud knocking in the lane. Mahesh did not open the door. “Who is it?” he called from within. The reply came: “We want the old warehouse accounts.” “For matters of work, write to the office,” he said. “This is a family home.” Two more blows struck the door, splitting one of the wooden panels. His wife took their daughter into the inner room and dialled the number of the assistance desk. Mahesh stood behind the door, but at that moment he did not know how many people were outside. He named no one.

The latch held against a single violent pull. A heavy object was thrown from outside; it shattered the glass above the doorway and fell into the veranda. Mahesh stepped back, warning his wife, but a small shard of glass lodged in his left arm. Their daughter began crying in the inner room. Hearing the noise, two neighbours emerged from their houses. Footsteps outside quickened, and a motorcycle drove away into the distance. No one had seen a face clearly. His wife first secured the door from within and seated their daughter somewhere safe. Then she pressed a clean cloth against Mahesh's arm. He was alive and able to speak; the depth of the wound still had to be examined.

A woman from a neighbouring house used her phone to arrange help from the hospital. “Can you send a vehicle?” Mahesh's wife asked. “My husband has been injured. Please don't put our address in the public group.” The neighbour gave their location to the ordinary emergency number but sent no photograph to the neighbourhood group. “Don't look at my arm,” Mahesh told his daughter. “Keep your books with you.” “I won't look,” she replied, “but if you go, I'm going with Mother.” Her mother did not stop her. That night the centre of the family's decisions was not the author of a newspaper article but the three people inside the house.

In the hospital emergency department, Salma arranged for Mahesh's arm to be cleaned and the wound examined. The doctor said that the injury from the glass required treatment and observation. There appeared to be no immediate danger to his life, but the actual extent of the wound would be recorded after examination. A police employee asked for a general account of what had happened at the scene. Mahesh stated clearly that an attack had occurred, but he had not identified the assailants. A voice outside had said ‘warehouse accounts’, yet those words alone proved neither who had ordered the attack nor its real motive. His wife wrote down the exact words; she appended no conjecture to them.

When the news reached Raghav, he came to the hospital entrance without bringing his nephew. His eyes were tired. “Don't call your nephew here,” Mahesh said. “His name will be published again.” “He will make his own decision about giving a statement,” Raghav replied. “I won't prevent him. But I won't tell anyone which road he takes.” He knew that the threat to suspend the contract over the telephone and the attack on Mahesh's house had occurred close together in time. He did not take that proximity as definite proof that the same person or order lay behind both. Nevertheless, he placed the messages concerning his contract and a copy of his nephew's ledger in separate envelopes, to be kept safe for an authorised investigation.

Kabir brought a copy of the written request for protection to the emergency department. The previous application had been acknowledged; the account of the new incident and the medical note on the wound would be attached to it. An officer said that a senior official had been consulted about temporary protection. “I don't want to hear that someone has been ‘consulted’,” Mahesh's wife replied. “I want a written copy of the decision. We must decide now where our daughter is to spend tonight.” With her permission, Kabir began discreetly making contact about one possibility for temporary shelter. Agreement on the place had not yet been obtained.

Naira came to the emergency department and stood a little way outside. She did not go in and take Mahesh's hand. Kabir came out and told her the family was occupied with medical treatment and legal procedure. “Are the original papers concerning the publication safe?” she asked. “They are,” Kabir said. “But as yet they do not establish the complete chain of causes behind anyone's crime. There will be an investigation. Wait for the family's decision.” “I will wait,” Naira said, “but I won't conceal my responsibility for the first publication.” She wrote those words in her notebook, not in a public report.

Beside the emergency bed, Mahesh looked at the river his daughter had drawn. His wife had picked up the exercise book on their way out. The paper had been folded, and the ink at one end of the bridge had blurred. “I don't know whether I have managed to save the truth about the work today,” he told his wife. “But you two will decide matters concerning our home, not my testimony.” “Your testimony belongs to you, and the road by which we live belongs to me,” she replied. “We shall try to protect both. First, let us get through one safe night.” No one had won anything at that moment, but the voices of the family had come together again.

After midnight a message arrived from an officer: the immediate request for patrols had been accepted; approval for regular personal protection and confidential accommodation remained pending. Mahesh understood the difference. The original copy of his nephew's ledger was under seal, the uncorrected newspaper edition was preserved separately, and photographs of the scene of the attack had been requested for the authorised investigation. These were three distinct things. From the hospital window Mahesh looked at the darkness in a distant lane. He knew the night was passing, but the question of safety had not been resolved. Seated beside the bed, his wife wrote down not the name of a guard but the time of the next meeting. A blank space still remained on the page.

Chapter 71 · Death and Documents

Before the light of dawn had reached the hospital veranda, Mahesh's wife was reading the date written on the dressing around his arm. The paper gave instructions for cleaning the wound and the time of his next examination, but there was still no answer to the family's application for protection. Sitting at the edge of the bed, Mahesh tried to put on his kurta with one hand. His daughter stepped forward and fastened its buttons. Attempting a smile, he said, "I still need your help." She answered, "But you must look at my school drawing yourself." Neither of them laughed. All that remained between them was a small measure of trust.

His wife had arranged the night's papers in three folds. In the first were the medical prescriptions, in the second an account of the attack on their home, and in the third a request for a confidential place of residence. A hospital employee explained the discharge procedure, but there were no written security instructions about leaving by the public entrance. She telephoned Kabir. "I don't want reassurances. I want a vehicle and the name of the person responsible," she said. Kabir told her that consent for a temporary place was close to being obtained, but no security officer had yet been definitively assigned. She put down the telephone and looked towards Mahesh. "Then we shall not go home," she announced.

Mahesh agreed to that much. Into an old bag he put his spectacles and the river his daughter had drawn. Taking out a written statement, he asked, "Will this reach the authorised investigating officer through Kabir?" His wife read it. Mahesh had written plainly that the hospital's goods-entry register was familiar to him, but that he had not himself seen where the materials were installed. He had also written that, on the night their house was attacked, he heard voices outside but did not see the attackers' faces. Giving the paper back, she said, "Write only what you saw. Our daughter must not be made to pay the price of someone else's conjecture."

Kabir met them in a deserted hospital office. He counted the copies of Mahesh's original statement in front of him, gave him a stamped envelope as acknowledgement of receipt, and urged him not to remain away from his bed for long without medical permission. Mahesh said, "I am not prepared to write that I am safe simply because I am lying in a bed. I want an answer about the safety of the place where my daughter keeps her exercise book." Exhaustion showed on Kabir's face. He could not himself appoint security personnel, and he had to state that limitation plainly. He obtained the wife's consent once more to arrangements for the family's separate accommodation. Their daughter chose not to be present for this conversation; she wanted to sit in the hospital garden and finish her drawing.

Towards noon, permission for temporary accommodation came through. The vehicle was to reach the closed veranda behind the hospital, for journalists had gathered at the main entrance. Mahesh's wife stated explicitly that their daughter must be seated safely in the vehicle first and that nobody was to take photographs. Kabir agreed a route with the hospital staff on that basis. The time was written down, but confirmation by telephone of the driver's identity remained suspended in uncertainty. "We shall leave when we have a definite name," Mahesh said. Immediately afterwards, a message came from an inner office: his signature was required on the original copy of the protection request.

His wife offered to take the papers herself. Over the telephone an office employee said that the injured applicant must appear once so that his signature could be identified. Kabir objected: "Bring the document to his bedside. Arrange a time to meet him." The employee replied that the officer was about to leave and a meeting was possible only now. Mahesh understood that otherwise another application would remain pending. "I shall go with Kabir only as far as that corner of the office," he told his wife. "You stay with our daughter." For a long moment she looked into his eyes. "Do not go beyond the limit you have just set," she replied.

The hospital's rear corridor was half dark even by day. Wooden crates, old cots and empty laundry drums stood along one side of the passage. Kabir walked to Mahesh's right so that his injured arm would not strike the wall. The office door was now shut; the employee had gone into another room. The two of them stood waiting. At that moment two people came swiftly through the narrow rear entrance. One called Mahesh by name. Mahesh turned to look, but before he could answer the first person shoved him towards the wall. In the second person's hand was a heavy iron object.

Kabir stepped forward, shouting, "Stop!" The sound of the blow reverberated inside the walls. Mahesh fell to the floor. Before Kabir could reach his head, both assailants had run towards the rear door. Kabir had not seen either face clearly; the fleeting impression left him only the colour of some clothing and a voice. Rather than give chase, he shouted for help, because Mahesh was not getting up. A ward attendant and two security guards arrived. "Clear the way. Call the medical team," the attendant ordered. Kabir laid the papers in his hand upon the floor and knelt beside Mahesh's head.

When Mahesh's wife ran towards the emergency room, their daughter was following her. At the doorway she stopped the child from going in. "This is not where you must stay," she said. "Telephone Dulari Aunty, but don't write our address in any public group." The girl dialled the number. In that small decision, amid her fear, she found something she herself could do. When her mother went inside, treatment was being given to Mahesh. The doctor said plainly that his head injury was serious and the outcome could not yet be predicted. The wife's first question was, "Was this caused by last night's wound on his arm?" The doctor answered, "No. This is a new injury. The two incidents will be recorded separately."

Time did not stand still. The bed was changed, medicines were brought, and the physicians made one small decision after another. Near the doorway, his wife kept her eyes on the hands of the clock. The words that needed saying were so simple—medicine, water, breath, again. The dressing from the previous night was still on Mahesh's arm, but it was the new blow to his head that threatened his life. Once she called him by name. Someone said that the doctors were at work and the family should stand a little farther away. She stepped back, but she did not leave that place.

As evening fell, a doctor asked Mahesh's wife to sit apart with him. She was told the time at which his death had been recorded. The doctor wrote a medical account of the grave injury caused by a violent blow; the formal processes of an inquiry into the death and a post-mortem examination would also be necessary. She managed to read the time on the paper, then closed the notebook. "Last night he was alive. There was a dressing over the wound on his arm," she said. The doctor repeated only this: "The fatal injury received in today's new attack will be investigated separately." She rose and went towards the door. Outside, her daughter was sitting.

"Where is Baba?" the girl asked. Her mother seated her beside her. She gave no promise that he would survive. "Baba will not come back now," she said. For a long while the child looked into her mother's face, then crumpled a corner of her half-finished drawing. "I fastened his buttons," she said, the words escaping her mouth. Her mother opened the girl's hand and smoothed out the picture. "Yes, you did. No one can erase that," she replied. When the child began to cry, her mother did not tell her to be quiet. Sitting on a chair outside the ward, they held each other together.

Naira learned the news from a brief message sent by Kabir. She did not go to Mahesh's house; his family was still at the hospital, where their public identification would once more put them at risk. At her desk she opened a copy of her first publication about Mahesh. The page contained a designation, a warehouse, and indications of the route his family took. Reading it, she recognised her mistake in putting these details together. The notice had been removed, but printed copies and forwarded images remained in other people's hands. She did not write down her private remorse and slide the paper beneath a desk-weight. She placed the original copy and the evidence of its publication time in separate envelopes.

The editor telephoned that night. "We can issue a joint statement," he said. "Write that we all acted in the public interest, and that unknown people committed the murder. Leave out the matter of your mistake for now." Naira was silent at the other end of the telephone. Then she said, "I will not turn the life of the man who has been murdered into a shield for my intentions. I published wrongly. I did not commit this murder, but the identifying clues I published made his identity unsafe. I shall say both things together.” “Will you take the blame upon yourself?” the editor asked. “Only as much responsibility as is mine,” Naira answered. “Those responsible for the crime must be investigated for their own actions.”

After notice of Mahesh’s death, the authorised team closed off the hospital’s rear corridor. While dictating the sequence of what he had seen, Kabir first struck out the words “red shirt,” because he could not remember the colour of the clothing with certainty. “There were two people, weren’t there?” an officer asked. “I saw two figures at close range,” Kabir said. “I saw the moment of one blow. The object in the other person’s hand was clear to me, but not the face.” An employee drew up separate lists of the registers left behind, the security guards’ duty assignments, and the cameras at the rear entrance that needed checking. Whether the camera had actually been working could not then be answered.

The envelope Kabir had dropped at the scene was recovered in the presence of police witnesses. Inside was the receipt for Mahesh’s statement; the original statement was already secure under seal in the authorised office. His wife insisted that, since a copy of the statement contained their home address, it must not be included in any public copy. The officer said private details would be kept separate for the security investigation. Kabir asked for that assurance in writing. Mahesh’s life could not be saved, but the question of his family’s future safety had not ended with his death.

The doorway where the first attack had taken place, the corridor where the second had occurred, and the hospital’s old repair register were three distinct sites of evidence. Repeating this distinction, Raghav Singh requested, through a lawyer, a time for his nephew to give an authorised statement rather than keeping him confined at home. “Uncle, you have lost your contract, and now Mahesh is dead. Will my speaking change anything else?” the nephew asked. “We shall not lie,” Raghav answered, “but who died here, and why, are not things I shall declare on the strength of somebody’s guess.” He was afraid, but he did not proclaim that the question surrounding his nephew’s original signature was the proven cause of Mahesh’s murder.

In the last watch of the night, Shashibhushan Mahapatra arrived outside the hospital mortuary. In his hands were thread for tying bamboo splints, the measurements for white cloth, and a small account book of labour charges. He was not a hospital employee but a private craftsman who supplied materials needed after death. On seeing Mahesh’s wife, he stopped some distance from the door. “I am Shashibhushan,” he said. “Someone told me there might be arrangements to make for cloth, bamboo and transport. I shall decide nothing without your permission.” “Where do you get the name you enter in your accounts?” she asked. “I do not make government death certificates,” he replied. “My account records only materials and labour.”

Shashibhushan showed her two pages. One set out the separate costs of bamboo, cloth, thread and a vehicle; the other listed the wage for his own work. He made it clear that the paper issued by the mortuary, the medical certificate of death, the police procedure and his trader's receipt were not one and the same thing. "If we do not write the name yet, can you hold the materials?" she asked. "Once written approval is received," Shashibhushan said. "If the name is not confirmed, I shall reserve the materials only against the family's acknowledgement slip; I will not attach a name to an unknown body and take money for it." She wrote her husband's name, Mahesh Mandal, clearly, but asked whether their daughter's name had to appear on the receipt. "No," Shashibhushan answered.

The next day Naira prepared a draft public letter. Its opening line named neither suspected people at the hospital or warehouse nor alleged culprits; it recorded Mahesh's murder and the decision not to publish private details without his family's consent. She then set out the date of her first civic bulletin, what information she had made public, and how it might have opened a path towards identifying him. She publicly apologised for the mistake and separately stated the editorial responsibilities of the newspaper and the institution. She did not claim to have ordered anyone's murder; neither did she write that she knew the source of any such order.

Naira read her statement at a public meeting of limited attendance. Mahesh's family members were not entered by name in the attendance register. "Mahesh has been murdered," she said clearly. "Responsibility for that crime lies with the people who carried it out and those who planned it. The information I made public had not undergone an adequate review of the risks to his safety; my mistake increased the danger that Mahesh could be identified. I accept my share of responsibility, but I do not declare any unproven person guilty of the crime." Someone in the gathering asked, "Then on whose orders was he killed?" "I do not yet know," Naira replied. "The original evidence remains to be examined."

The representative of an officer said that a public apology might affect the criminal investigation. Naira replied that she was not destroying any original investigative records, merely acknowledging her failure to verify what she had published. A student asked how such misinformation could be prevented in future. Naira proposed four practical rules: assess the risk of identifying a witness; obtain the family's independent consent; preserve the history of corrections made to published material; and do not append private home addresses to documents intended to serve the public interest. No one applauded on hearing the rules. An elderly man asked, "What will these rules give the man who could not be saved?" Naira took some time to answer. "Nothing now," she said. "They are work I must do to change myself, not recompense for his death."

Mahesh's wife did not attend the meeting. She was with their daughter, looking through copies of the medical papers. "Will everything Baba wrote go into the newspaper?" the girl asked. "No," her mother said. "Some papers will go to the investigation; some I shall keep; and some you may read when you are older." On the edge of her river drawing, the girl sketched a little boat. "This paper is Baba's," she said. Her mother took the picture but did not lock it away in a trunk; she left it on the table in their room. Even after his death, the child's drawing was her own possession, not evidence belonging to the state.

When Shashibhushan returned, two figures appeared on his receipt: the advance already paid and the balance due when the work was done. He had refused a suggestion that the grieving family be made to pay everything that night. "What if I want fewer things done?" Mahesh's wife asked. "Then you pay only for the materials actually used and the labour actually performed," he said. "The grandeur of a rite is not a condition of my trade." He did not ask to which caste Mahesh had belonged, or by what name his death would be publicised. On his receipt he wrote, "Materials ordered by the family of Mahesh Mandal"; he did not claim to issue a certificate proving the murder case.

Kabir brought Mahesh's wife the written acknowledgement of the criminal investigation. It listed the time and place of the incident, the sequence of treatment at the hospital, separate witness statements, and the objects collected for examination. A formal investigation into the murder had begun. But neither the identities of the attackers, nor the source of their orders, nor a possible connection with the hospital contract had been established that day. "And my family's protection?" she asked. Kabir replied that a renewed application had been accepted and temporary accommodation arranged, but the order appointing regular security personnel was still pending. He could hear the inadequacy of his own answer.

Mahesh's wife did not return to the old doorway of their house. She gave the key to a woman neighbour for a limited time only, to fetch clothes and the books their daughter needed. It was put in writing that no other papers in the house were to be disturbed without police permission. "Will you ever go back to that house?" the neighbour asked. "I will not answer that question now," Mahesh's wife replied. "First let my daughter sleep for one night without the sound of someone at the door." The neighbour offered to send them a hot meal, which she accepted; she did not, however, give permission for their family's story to be told in public in exchange.

At night, through the window of their temporary room, the girl watched a lamp shining far away. When her mother told her to sleep, she asked, "Will Baba's name remain in books?" Her mother answered, "If you want it, his work may be written down. But on the days when you remember him, you need not open a book." The girl fell silent. A little later she said, "I was frightened when they were changing the dressing on his arm. Today I understand that he was alive then." Her mother kissed her forehead. In the darkness of the room she remembered Mahesh without making him a hero or a symbol of testimony: an ordinary living man, boiling milk, letting his daughter fasten his buttons, watching the rain.

Elsewhere, the officer preparing a plan of the scene was asking Kabir just how much of the blow he had seen himself. "I was with him," Kabir said, "but I did not see the face of the first man who appeared behind him. I heard a voice, saw the direction of the blow, and saw Mahesh fall. To say more would be to turn someone else's story into evidence from my own eyes." The officer wrote down his words exactly. After the death, the temptation to fill every empty place in the story with someone's conjecture had grown stronger. Kabir made the difficult decision to leave those spaces empty.

Among the heap of documents from the day Mahesh died, there was one thing without any government seal: his daughter's drawing of a river. On the back, in small letters, Mahesh had written, "May the colours of this boat not wash away, even after the rain." Her mother read the line, then gave the picture back to the girl. The murder case, the public admission of error, the repair file and the application for safe accommodation had each begun to follow its separate course. But the girl still needed a school for the next day, her picture, and a place to sleep beside her mother in a new home. These questions about her life would not wait for any final conclusion to be reached on paper.

Chapter 72 · Sanjaya's Distance

Kabir held three sheets of paper. The first was a preliminary list prepared for the examination of Mahesh's death; the second, a plan of the scene; the third, a copy of his own statement. Sunlight entered through the window, but the glass of water on the table in the inquiry room was still untouched. Kabir placed a finger on a line of the third sheet. It read: 'The witness saw two assailants striking the victim.' He said, "That is not my statement. I saw two figures; at the moment of the blow, I saw only one hand and Mahesh falling. I do not know whether the other person struck him or not."

The clerk drew the paper towards himself. "You spoke of two people before," he replied. Kabir did not raise his voice. "Two people being present and both of them striking are not the same thing. Do not shorten what I saw into a different event." The statement was written again. The earlier sheet was not torn up; it was attached to the amended statement. Kabir checked the time and receipt number on both pages. For the first time, he felt how moving a single word could alter the attribution of blame for an entire event.

Mahesh's wife did not send their daughter to school that day. The teacher had asked for work to be done at home, but the child kept trying to read the line her father had written on the back of her drawing of the river. Her mother said, "You need not read this picture today. You can colour it, if you wish." The girl opened her box of blue crayons and asked, "Will Baba's name appear in the news again?" Her mother said, "Some news will be printed. But you and I shall decide what happens to our picture and our address." For the first time, the child laid her paper face down on the table.

When Naira met Kabir, he did not praise her public statement. He said, "It was necessary that you admit your mistake. But if the face of someone I did not see appears again in your report, all of it will have been for nothing." Naira replied, "This time I shall draw up a record of sources before writing the news. For what comes from you, the original statement; for what comes from the officer, the official copy; and for what is my inference, I shall say plainly that it is an inference." Kabir asked, "In whose voice will you speak the words Mahesh can no longer say?" Naira was silent for a few moments. "Not even in the voice of the papers he left behind may I add whatever I please out of my own mind."

In the assembly hall of Hastinapura, in an age long past, Sanjaya stood before Dhritarashtra. There was no dust of the battlefield upon his clothes, yet his voice was weary. The king's hand trembled upon the arm of his throne. "Bhishma?" was all Dhritarashtra asked. Sanjaya answered, "He lies upon a bed of arrows on the battlefield; life has not yet left him." The king asked again, "And my sons?" Sanjaya did not immediately recite a number. He understood that although news of war might begin with the grief of one family, it could not end at that family's threshold.

Before the war, Vyasa had bestowed upon him the gift of extraordinary sight. Through that divine faculty, Sanjaya could apprehend scenes from the distant field of battle and the order in which events unfolded; he was not an ordinary eyewitness, watching with his natural eyes from the royal court. Yet the scene made available to him and the meaning given to it were not one and the same. The dust of battle, the movement of chariots, the rain of arrows, and the falling soldiers could enter his account. But why should he claim to know, in a single breath, the whole inward decision of every warrior, the sorrow in the home of every unknown soldier who died, and the consequences of tomorrow?

"Did you see everything?" Dhritarashtra asked. Sanjaya said, "Your Majesty, I describe the scenes made available to me by Vyasa's grace. What I infer from the events on the field I shall not present as though I had seen it. And where I have not entered the depths of a person's mind, I shall not invent the hidden cause of that person's decision." Dhritarashtra bowed his head. The answer brought him less reassurance than a fuller weight of war. He was king; nevertheless, he could exercise no dominion over the lives of his sons.

Sanjaya began his account of the chariots on the first day. Banners stirred across Kurukshetra's vast expanse. The sound of a conch rose in one quarter and dissolved in another; yet not every sound upon the battlefield was a command. The beat of hooves, the cries of the wounded, and the calls of commanders mingled together. The king interrupted him. "Was that conch a sign of victory?" Sanjaya replied, "To hear the conch and to know the final outcome of the war are two different things. At that moment the war was beginning; victory had not been decided."

The wick in an oil lamp trembled inside a metal vessel at the side of the hall. Dhritarashtra asked Sanjaya to sit, but Sanjaya remained standing. The king's question concerned more than the strength of armies: he wanted to know whose orders had reached whose bodies. Sanjaya said, "Fatherly affection and decisions of state have both been part of your life, Your Majesty. If I recount only grief, the history of decisions will be lost; if I speak only of royal guilt, the suffering of this household will go unheard." The king listened to the faint trembling sound of the vessel and made no reply.

Dhritarashtra asked about his son Duryodhana. Sanjaya described the arrangements the prince had made, his approach to his teacher Drona, and the disposition of his forces. But he added one thing: not every soldier standing on the battlefield in obedience to the king's command shared Duryodhana's desires. One was there out of duty, another out of fear, another for the livelihood of a family. Dhritarashtra had no sight, yet amid these voices the presence of those unknown people began to trouble him.

Arjuna's chariot had halted between the two armies. Sanjaya recounted the conversation between Krishna and Arjuna to the king: why a warrior standing amid war trembles at the sight of his teachers, kinsmen, and friends, and how the question of duty cannot be resolved by command alone. Dhritarashtra listened without speaking. "Arjuna did, at last, take up his weapon," Sanjaya said, "but his first question had not been erased. He made his decision bearing the weight of that question." Hearing this, the king remembered the many days of his own long silence.

As Sanjaya reached the account of the tenth day, his voice grew quiet once more. Shikhandi's chariot stood before Bhishma, and Arjuna's arrows rained down. Bhishma held to his decision not to raise a weapon against Shikhandi. Sanjaya did not credit every arrow to one bow, nor did he dismiss Shikhandi as an inert shield. Bhishma's body, pierced by many arrows, came to rest upon a bed of shafts. "Did he die then?" Dhritarashtra asked again. "No," Sanjaya made clear. "He fell there; he did not die. He is still breathing."

Dhritarashtra shuddered. He asked whether Bhishma had been given water, who stood around him, and whom he remembered in the privacy of his mind. Sanjaya told what he could recount of events, but did not attempt to claim full possession of Bhishma's inward memories. The king grew dissatisfied. "Then you cannot tell me everything?" Sanjaya answered, "If I claim to tell everything, even what I do know will become less worthy of trust."

For a little while Sanjaya stood alone in a dark passage of Hastinapura. It would have been easy to conceal the king's responsibility behind the king's grief; it would have been just as easy, in speaking of his responsibility, to diminish his private sorrow. Sanjaya resolved to do neither. Returning to the hall, he said, "Your Majesty, I shall recount the course of the war. But the decisions that brought us to war are questions you yourself must ask." Dhritarashtra did not order him to be silent. That day the king felt clearly, for the first time, the limits of his own listening.

On Naira's desk in Videhapur there was no ancient manuscript belonging to Sanjaya. She had laid out three copies from a modern murder investigation. The first was a receipt acknowledging Mahesh's statement; the second, Kabir's amended eyewitness account; the third, the hospital register of entries and departures. Each recorded a different action on the same night. Mahesh's receipt proved that a statement had been submitted, not that every allegation in it had been established as true. Kabir's statement concerned a limited glimpse of the blow; the hospital register documented the time at which the injured man was brought for treatment.

It was not easy to find old pages in the hospital's records room. An employee brought out a thick file and asked whose signature they wanted. Aditi said, "Before a copy of any signature, we need to see the original sequence of the pages." Two pages in the middle had been placed in reverse order; setting them right did not change the recorded admission time, but clarified the order in which the entries had been written. Naira did not insist that the employee's name be put into her report. She wrote that the difference between the binding of the papers and the time of their entries remained a matter for official inquiry. The smell of the old file and the exhaustion in the employee's eyes were both part of that day's work.

Naira wrote separate dates above the pages. Comparing a copy made after the death with a contemporaneous document from the night of the first attack, they found a difference between the times shown by the clocks. Aditi said, "We have not established whether the hospital clock and the guard's clock showed the same time. If we treat a difference of five minutes as time unaccounted for in the crime, we may turn the investigation upside down." Naira recorded the question of testing the clocks separately. A colleague said, "Who will read such a small detail in the news?" Naira replied, "We cannot change the meaning of time to make a report easier to read."

As Kabir read his statement, he stopped at one passage. The clerk had written, 'The witness saw a person wearing red.' He had already asked on the first night for the reference to colour to be removed. "I do not know what effect the light had upon the colour," he said. "The bulb in the corridor was half broken. What looked red may have been some other dark colour." At this the clerk grew irritated. "If you strike out every detail, what will remain?" Kabir answered, "What will remain is the trustworthiness of what has not been struck out." Once more, the date and signatures of correction were added.

Mahesh's wife asked to meet Kabir separately. She did not wish to hear an accusation against anyone; she wanted to know whether her home was safe. "Will the public copy of your statement contain details by which my daughter could be identified?" she asked. Kabir replied, "The original is with the authorised investigation. I cannot myself issue orders about the public copy. But a separate application can be made to remove personal details." His wife read the application herself, did not have their daughter's name entered, and kept its receipt number in a small notebook. Bereavement had not taken from her the right to decide.

Naira's editor proposed a new headline: 'Eyewitness to Mahesh's Murder Reveals a Face'. Naira drew a red line beneath it. "No face has been revealed," she said. "The eyewitness saw only figures and part of a blow. If we use a headline like that again, we shall repeat our admitted error in another form." The editor asked, "What, then, shall we write?" Naira turned the paper towards him: 'Amended Testimony Distinguishes What Was Seen from What Was Inferred'. Displeasure showed on the editor's face; but this time the decision to publish a headline without examining the original statement was deferred.

That evening Lata came to Naira's office carrying a small bundle. Inside were separate copies of an old register bearing the name 'Mithua', an incomplete receipt for a boat fare, and an elderly person's account of what he had heard. Lata asked, "Is there anything here that can establish where my Mithun is?" Naira arranged the papers in order. "There is a similarity of names, but 'Mithua' may also be someone else's familiar name. The receipt gives neither the full name nor the complete details of the journey. The old man's statement concerns what he heard; it is not clear that he himself saw Mithun sitting in the boat."

From the bundle Lata drew a piece of the old red thread Mithun had worn. "This was on his wrist," she said, "but if I see a thread of this colour on another child's wrist, I cannot call that child Mithun." Naira listened. On the back of the receipt Lata herself wrote two questions: 'Who holds the original receipt?' and 'Who witnessed the date of the journey?' Her handwriting was still unsteady, but the questions were her own. She put the thread back into her bundle; she did not surrender it to any inquiry room as evidence.

Lata's eyes remained fixed upon the receipt. She read the Maithili numerals once, then the blurred date written on the reverse. "Should I go there and ask?" she said. Naira replied, "Before travelling, it is essential to find out who has the original receipt. You must not give up another day's earnings and set out on the strength of an incomplete copy, only to return with one more conjecture." Lata did not agree at once. "My son is missing. I cannot set aside the calculation of risk. But if I travel, I shall first write down whom I intend to question and what I shall ask."

When Tara arrived at the office, she had in her notebook a copy of the five unaccepted conditions for an agreement concerning the gate. Reading the water committee's letter from the opposite bank, she said, "On the journey across the border, the workers' words must be translated. But I shall not enter their names in the envoy's letter without permission." Padma insisted that the original language and the translation be kept in separate copies. "The words in the language a person spoke must be preserved first," she said. "What we explain in translation must not be allowed to become the original testimony." Naira recorded that the travelling party would agree separately with each person on the limits of any use of their words.

The investigating officer showed Kabir the plan of the scene. The old wing of the hospital, the rear door, and the bend in the corridor were marked upon the paper. Kabir indicated where he had been standing. The clerk drew an arrow pointing towards the warehouse. "Why that?" Kabir asked. The officer replied, "Our team's conjecture about the possible direction of escape." Kabir said, "Mark that possibility in another colour; do not put it into the testimony of my eyes." The arrow was not erased. It was labelled 'Investigative Inference' and placed in a separate section. A map of a route was not the same thing as identification of a criminal.

During the statement, an empty chair had been placed before Raghav's nephew. "May I get up and have some water?" he asked. The officer gave permission. When he returned he read the page, then pointed to his old signature beneath the words 'Materials Received'. "That is work I did," he said, "but it was not my responsibility to determine whether patients could remain in a half-built section." His voice trembled. Outside the door Raghav was worrying about the work he had lost, but he did not put his own defence into his nephew's mouth.

Raghav Singh's nephew was prepared to give his authorised statement that day, but stipulated that he must first see his original materials receipt. "The signature I gave was for delivery of goods," he said, "not for an examination certifying their safe use." The officer assured him that this distinction would be maintained in the statement. Raghav stood outside. His suspended contract had reduced the family's income, but he did not instruct his nephew to remember something untrue. The receipt might prove useful in the inquiry into Mahesh's murder; the time had not yet come to call it conclusive proof of an order to kill.

At noon Mahesh's daughter came home with a page of schoolwork. She asked whether she should tell the teacher the address of their new accommodation. Her mother telephoned the head teacher and requested that the information be kept in a contact register with restricted access. The child opened her drawing of the river once more. "I shall give this boat a new colour," she said, "but not the part Baba coloured." Her mother sat beside her. The girl herself was drawing the boundaries of her picture. Before so small a decision, the proportions of all the public reports seemed, for a moment, very slight.

That evening Naira wrote the opening paragraph of her new report. Three matters had clear primary grounds: Mahesh had been murdered, the police investigation was continuing, and Kabir had made an amended statement. Beyond these, she wrote that the identification of a face, the order behind the attack, and any possible connection with the materials register were still separate subjects for inquiry. This time the editor removed the family's private address. The link to the correction of Naira's first publication error remained in the report, but the route to the family's home did not. For the first time she saw that admitting an error and preventing a new one were two different kinds of labour.

At night the scene of Dhritarashtra's assembly hall rose once more in Sanjaya's account. The king asked, "When I hear of Bhishma's fall, is the scene my mind constructs true or false?" Sanjaya said, "From what you hear, your mind makes an image. I am responsible for what I say; but I am not a witness to every shape formed in another person's mind." Dhritarashtra was silent. Then he said, "Continue, then. But wherever you do not know, tell me that too.” For the first time, Sanjaya heard in the king’s command permission to endure incompleteness alongside truth.

Sanjaya took up his tale again, but did not invent the name of every unknown soldier on the battlefield. He spoke of Bhishma’s bed of arrows, Shikhandi’s active presence, and Arjuna’s shafts, and listened to the king’s questions. The king wanted to know the fate awaiting his sons. Sanjaya said, “The decisions of the next battle are yet to be made. Let us name clearly those who have fallen, and not enter the living, before their time, in the register of the dead.” These words brought the king no happiness, but they gave him one necessary discipline of news.

Naira’s last task at the office that night was to prepare four separate envelopes. The first held Kabir’s eyewitness statement and its correction; the second, the receipt in the materials register; the third, the questions concerning the name ‘Mithua’ and the incomplete boat-fare receipt; the fourth, the water committee’s letter to the envoy and the permission for translation. On each she wrote the original source, the date the copy had been made, and the conditions governing its use. None of this established anyone’s guilt, or found Mithun, or produced an agreement over the public passage. But now a gap in one item of evidence could no longer be filled by an imagined supplement from another.

As Tara was leaving, she asked, “When do we begin preparing to go to Simatirtha?” Padma said, “First we must make clear the boat fare, the place where we shall disembark, and the wages for language assistance. Until those three things are settled, I shall not ask anyone to come.” Lata gathered up the notebook containing her questions for the journey. Before going home, Kabir arranged for the receipt number of Mahesh’s wife’s security application to reach her, without making her address public. Night would pass; beyond the papers, people’s bodies, livelihoods, and fears remained real, each in its own place.

Before going to sleep in the new room, Mahesh’s daughter placed her drawing of the river not in her mother’s hands, but between the pages of her own book. As her mother put out the lamp, she asked, “Where have you kept it?” The girl replied, “With me. I shall look at it when I want to.” Her mother asked nothing more. As uncertain as the measured passage of water on the opposite bank, the way through this household’s next day was not yet open. But within the child’s small decision, no one had the right to tell the whole of her life in another person’s voice.

Chapter 73 · The Landing at Simatirtha

At dawn, Madhu Kevat was feeling along the damp joints of the boat's planking with her fingertips. The night's water had receded, but across the middle board a fine line showed, sharp as a sliver. She knelt, drew out an iron nail, and turned the split in the wood towards the sunlight. "No full sack is to be placed on this board," she told the boatman beside her. The travelling party had not yet reached the ghat. Madhu's day had begun long before there was anyone to wait for.

Above the path to the opposite bank, Tara Mallik stood with three bags. One held the measurement register and copies of the five conditions on which agreement had failed; another, a change of clothes; the third, folded papers protected against the spray aboard the boat. Padma had kept the questions in their original language in a little bag of her own. Lata carried a plain notebook. On its first page she had written: Who holds the original register bearing the name Mithua? Not one member of the party said aloud that Mithun would be found that day. Yet for Lata this was the first journey of its kind on which she herself had chosen the direction her questions would take.

As she untied the old rope from its mooring post, Madhu asked, "Do you want to be put ashore on the opposite bank, or will you need a vehicle to take you farther, as far as the post?" Tara said, "We shall land on the opposite bank and go on to Simatirtha. I cannot tell how long the inspection of the papers there will take." Madhu opened her ledger. The boat fare, weight of luggage, hour of disembarkation on the far side, and charge for keeping the boat waiting each had a separate space. Padma asked, "Who will pay for the time of the local woman travelling with us?" "The person whose work it is must be paid for it," Madhu replied. "Her voice is not included in my fare." Tara paid the boat fare in advance; Madhu gave her a signed receipt. Any additional waiting time would be payable separately, and only if it arose.

An employee at the temporary post beside the ghat held out a slip. "This is a visit in the public interest. Why, then, should there be no reduction in the fare?" Madhu asked, "Who will pay for the planks, the repairs, and the boatman's day? Whether I help in an emergency is for me to decide. A government announcement does not make my labour free." Tara asked to see the written approval from the collective fund. There was no signature on the employee's slip. He took the incomplete proposal away again.

An elderly man in the crowd at the landing needed somewhere to sit. Madhu first guided the traveller to a shaded stone, then showed Lata the bamboo handhold for boarding. When Tara started setting the luggage on the boat's planks, Madhu stopped her. "Weigh it first. The map of the road is in your hands; the measure of what this boat can bear is in mine." Tara remembered Hira Sahni's earlier warning: an incomplete measurement of a load was no proof of a safe journey. Together they opened a small bundle. Two unnecessary iron tools were left at the landing with a responsible custodian, against a receipt. That delay was the journey's first decision.

Just then Shanti Bote came back from the opposite bank and brought her small boat alongside. The friction of the rope had left red lines across her palms. She told Madhu that the previous day she had delivered two sacks to the landing-house on the far side, but the entry at the desk acknowledged receipt of only one. "I am asking for an accounting on my own behalf," she said. "Do not put what I am owed under the name of your party." Madhu examined her slip, but in her own ledger recorded only that Shanti had made a claim; she did not write that payment had been made. Today Shanti wanted to carry back a small consignment belonging to a family. For her, the border meant more than a journey: it was the next day's earnings.

Lata broke the silence. "What if, behind that register marked 'Mithua', I find Mithun's name?" Padma said, "Then we shall ask who was present when the name was entered, and what their source was. A matching name will not establish the child's identity." "I know," Lata answered. "But you need not explain to me every time that because I am his mother I will rush to a conclusion." Padma closed her bag. "You are right. You will ask your own questions. My work is to make the language understood, not to choose the answers." Lata looked towards the water again, but this time her notebook stayed open.

The landing plank on the opposite bank had slipped sideways. Madhu brought the boat close to shore but did not set the plank down at once. First she checked for hollows beneath the wet earth where the passengers would put their feet. As soon as Tara stepped ashore, her sandal sank into the mud. Lata burst out laughing. "We draw straight paths on paper," she said, "and the earth keeps its own bends." Tara laughed too. Madhu offered the bamboo pole, but asked Lata before trying to lift her. Once she was steady on shore, Lata herself picked up Padma's bag. The first stage was over. The border was still far away.

Under the roof of the landing-house an old signboard carried two names: "Gandak" and "Gandaki." Shanti Bote had come there to collect acknowledgement of her consignment. An employee said that the first name was used for the river water and the second for a trading address. Shanti shook her head. "That is how your office understands it. Both forms appear on my old boat-fare documents. Look at how old the papers are, and who wrote them." Padma noted both forms. She did not turn the signboard into proof of two separate rivers, nor did she settle any geographical correspondence.

Near a wall inside the landing-house, “Gohi” had also been written in black ink. Madhu showed them a page of her ledger in which that name appeared beside an old fare route. “Do not suppose this word means that all our boats travel on one and the same current,” she said. “We can know precisely what this slip means only when we find who issued it and the details of the route.” Tara kept Gandaki and Gohi as distinct names in the documentary record. For those whose daily labour lay upon the river, a mistake in a name was never merely a mistake on a map; it could become a quarrel over fares.

During a two-hour halt, slips were handed out near the post for names and addresses. Tara did not add Lata’s family’s private address to the public list of the party. She handed Lata the pen so that she could answer the question herself. An employee glanced at the paper and asked, “Why are three women travelling alone?” “Because we have work to do,” Lata replied. The question had nothing to do with any travel regulation. Once the inspection was finished, they went on to buy their tickets.

When the bus made its first stop at the outer market of Simatirtha, the smell of dust and hot spices filled the interior. The driver tried to load an unnecessary third sack. Tara showed him the weight printed on the ticket; he had been reading a luggage slip meant for another vehicle. Lata was about to lift a basket belonging to a child seated behind her when the child’s mother took hold of it herself. “That is my pot of curd,” she said. “People should ask before doing someone a favour.” A little laugh ran through the bus. The dispute dissolved into laughter, and the pot arrived safely in its proper place.

At the entrance to the market, Padma found Kumudi waiting to help with the languages. Shanti had written to her beforehand. Kumudi understood the local speech, Maithili, and the working vocabulary of offices across the border; apart from interpreting, she also kept accounts of goods traded in the market. Her first question was, “Do you need my time for the whole day, or for two meetings?” “Two meetings,” Padma replied, “and if more is needed, a new agreement.” Kumudi stated her rate. For a moment Tara thought the sum high. Kumudi asked, “Showing the way, listening, and then bringing words into correspondence—is all that a single task?”

Kumudi’s question made Padma revise her earlier assumption. On the journey the party had provided only one budget heading for an “interpreter.” Kumudi explained that the time spent conveying an office’s questions was different from the time spent preserving a craftworker’s answer in her own words; written translation would be another task again. “First let me hear the words of the question I intend to ask,” Lata said. “Do not shorten what I say to suit everybody else.” Kumudi accepted the condition. A receipt for the advance was prepared, the limit of two meetings written down, and it was agreed that disagreements over wording would be marked in the spaces left blank.

Their first meeting took place in a walled courtyard in the market. Sonmati Turi had propped up a bamboo frame; the cloth stretched across its centre fluttered whenever the wind reached it. Smaller and sturdier than the earlier school sample, this was a new frame. A merchant from outside had placed an order requiring every craftworker to supply twenty articles in the same colour and size. “Twenty articles belonging to whom?” Sonmati asked. “The bamboo is mine, the thread belongs to another, the pattern to a third. When something proves faulty, who will be heard?” The merchant’s representative said that one invoice under one name would make things easier.

Sonmati lowered the frame. “Easier for you, not for us,” she said. She added the names of two women craftworkers to the proposal, but did not sign on their behalf without their permission. She had the price of the first five trial frames recorded separately, along with the additional labour required if the pattern changed and the cost of return transport if the whole consignment was rejected. A young woman asked, “Will the order not be delayed if everybody’s name has to appear?” “It will,” Sonmati answered. “But once the work has begun, the delay caused by unpaid wages will cost far more.”

In another corner of the courtyard, Niru Kumal had set three clay vessels upside down. Dark marks from the old kiln showed on their bases. A supplier who had come to see her renewed his proposal for a collective loan: under the name of a producers’ partnership, all the village craftworkers would be jointly responsible for the whole debt. Niru did not even take the paper in her hands. “I will cooperate over safe clay, a shared kiln, and the days when goods are dispatched,” she said. “But why should I accept the old interest owing against someone else’s household without examining it?” The supplier replied that large-scale trade could not grow under such conditions.

Niru then turned over one of the vessels and showed him its base. “This broke in the last consignment. I reduced its price myself,” she said. “I am not running away from responsibility for a fault. But if I take on debts of other people’s that I have never seen, there will not be clay left for making new pots.” Sonmati proposed a small trial consignment. Niru agreed: the separate payment due for five pots, the recorded expense of using the common kiln, and credit limited to what she herself accepted in writing. The merchant deferred the larger order. Niru’s hands were empty, but the next day’s firing in her kiln had not been brought to an end.

Meanwhile Meera Banjara came round the slope behind the market, turning her handcart. In her bag were two receipts relating to the earlier dispute over transporting firewood and salt for the kitchen. This time another proposal awaited her: a partnership to deliver small consignments for Sonmati and Niru twice a week. Meera’s sister did not want all the family carts to depend on orders from a single market. She wanted to preserve her older relationships with customers along another route. Meera listened to both sides, then stopped the cart's wheel.

"My sister will take her own road," Meera said. "That does not mean she opposes my partnership." The merchant said that every vehicle belonging to the family ought to come under a single mark. "We are one family," Meera answered, "but the vehicles can carry separate liabilities." She had the two days for which her own cart would be available written down, leaving her sister's time blank. Her sister came forward herself. "On that day I shall go to the weekly market across the river. Nobody has the right to hold me back in someone else's name." The two sisters agreed to sign the new proposal on separate terms.

Meena Sarki unrolled her leather straps and laid them out. One was for securing a mule's load; the other was to be tightened at the side of a box used for carrying vessels. She showed the representative a wet strap that had slackened after being in water for a while. "If vessels are carried through wet conditions with this as it is, they will fall," she said. The representative was in a hurry. "All we need is a properly named receipt." Meena grew irritated. "The name on a receipt will not tighten the knot in a strap. Write down the trial load, protection from water, and responsibility for damaged goods first."

Meena unfolded a proposal from a group of leatherworkers across the border. They wanted a day's collaborative work to teach the measurement and stitching of straps, but the proposal gave the merchant complete rights over photographs of the samples and any new designs. Meena struck out that line. "Payment for every sample shown; fresh permission for the use of any new design made together," she said. Sonmati agreed that if a new strap were devised for fastening her bamboo frame, both their names would appear on the trial slip. A small alliance was formed. There was no large bargain yet.

Kumudi hesitated over two words while interpreting this discussion. In the merchant's language, the word for "responsibility" could mean either an obligation to make good a loss or merely a promise to deliver goods. "Which meaning did you use?" Meera asked. Kumudi repeated the original sentence and stated the two meanings separately. "I will not sign saying I have understood what I have not understood," Niru said. The representative complained that too much time had been wasted. "We are paying for the time," Padma replied. "Neither you nor we can afford a liability arising from the wrong word." A second slip was drawn up.

At midday Shanti Bote did not send food from her home. She came herself, carrying beaten rice, fried fish, and vegetables in small vessels. "This is for sale," she said. "The women of my household are not sitting there making free meals for travellers." Lata paid for her portion. Kumudi asked whether the food could be made with less spice. Shanti laughed. "But you belong here!

How has your tongue become such a foreigner?" In that small laughter, the line between insider and outsider loosened for a moment.

In the afternoon they met in the water committee's building. On an old wall hung lines of the drainage channel drawn by hand, with certain places left blank. A local woman stood holding her own measuring cord. "Your maps from Patna or Videhapur cannot tell me how the water drains away from my house," she said. "Where I have seen the water rise is my testimony; it is not a measurement. The measuring must be done again." "That is why we accepted the invitation," Tara replied, "so that we might hear your conditions." She placed her papers on the table without beginning to copy the lines on the wall.

When the meeting opened, Padma presented Kumudi's fee slip separately. The committee secretary asked, "Two payments because the same thing is spoken in two languages?" Kumudi answered for herself. "My work is not to say the same thing twice. It is to preserve what both sides mean. If you permit someone to speak, you must also arrange for her to be heard." The local woman added, "I shall speak about my home in my own language. The interpreter is not my representative; she helps my voice reach another person's ears." The secretary entered an objection on the slip, but the meeting was not stopped.

When her turn came, Lata asked her question. She showed the copied page carrying the name "Mithua," but circulated no photograph of any child. "In whose custody is the original register containing this name?" Kumudi slowly rendered the sentence in the other language. An elderly employee replied that he had seen a slip from the old boathouse, but did not personally know the person who had made the entry in the register. Padma repeated the original answer to Lata. "So the slip you saw and the name you heard about are two different things?" Lata asked. "I saw the slip," the old man said. "Whether Mithua was a child or an adult, I heard from someone else."

Someone at the meeting was about to declare that Mithun's trail had therefore been found. Lata stopped him. "That is not a confirmed trace of my son," she said. "But we have found a way to ask where the slip was seen." The secretary wrote down an official time for inspecting the old boathouse records, adding that there was no guarantee the original copy would be found there. Lata entered the date in her notebook. For the first time that day, the page held something clearer than an answer: a location that could be checked.

Tara opened the copy of the five conditions that had not been accepted. First came the timing of warnings: the local families said that the morning of a surveying party and that of people living in houses of unbaked earth did not run by the same clock. Second was responsibility for the water after the drainage was opened; third, compensation; fourth, access for everyone; fifth, a response to complaints. The secretary wanted the party to record agreement to all the conditions on the very day of the visit. "Today's meeting was an interview, not an agreement," Tara said. One man grew angry, but the woman from the village spoke: "We will not sign without looking at our fields." At that, the noise of the meeting diminished.

Before evening, Meera arrived with her cart outside the meeting-house. She needed the next day's measurements to carry Sonmati's five frames and Niru's three vessels safely. Meena kept one fastening of the leather strap with her for testing. "I shall stitch a second knot at home," she said, "and only then tell you what load it can bear safely." Niru wrote down the actual number of vessels on the paper, not an estimated number. Having received an advance for the first five frames, Sonmati decided to begin work that evening. Their alliance proceeded not through anyone's grand declaration, but through small, clearly defined limits on the work.

By evening the clouds had thickened. Madhu received only a brief message by phone: the travellers had landed safely, and the time of their return would be decided after they had looked at the weather. Shanti went home with the slip for her earnings; Kumudi left to attend to another customer. Meera watched her sister's cart take a different road, but did not try to stop it. Niru and Sonmati began choosing clay and bamboo for their separate tasks. The day of the families across the border had not begun with the visiting party, nor would it come to a halt when the visitors left.

Lata opened a fresh page of her notebook. It held three lines: the copied name, the testimony of the person who had seen the slip, and the appointed time for inspecting the original record. Nowhere was it written that "Mithun has been found." Nearby Tara checked the boat fare and the separate charge for waiting; Padma marked a disagreement between one of Kumudi's original words and her own translation. The next day's road was not yet wholly clear, but something had been settled by that day's landing: no convenience gained by one person's journey could give that person a free claim upon another's labour, language, or decisions concerning home.

Chapter 74 · Drona's Due

At daybreak in Simatirtha, Shanti Bote began to untie the wet rope of her boat from its bamboo post, then stopped. Tucked into her waistband was the unloading-house slip from the previous day: against the work of unloading two sacks, it recorded payment for only one. An employee coming up from the landing called, "Why bring up yesterday's business all over again today?" Fastening the rope to the post once more, Shanti answered, "Because yesterday I was not paid what I was owed. The boat will go out again today, but yesterday's earnings will not be washed away in the river." The employee carried a bundle of new permits. He said the right to ferry goods and the settlement of old payments belonged to different offices. "Then write down the names of both offices," Shanti said. "I will not waste a day at the wrong door."

Tara, Padma, and Lata had come to the landing to collect the letters arising from yesterday's meeting. Kumudi's time for two meetings had already been used; today she was due to attend to another client. Padma had preserved the disagreements over yesterday's interpretation, but made no claim to decide the wording of Shanti's application herself. Shanti handed her a blank sheet. "When I ask for my earnings, count the time my boat was held up as well," she said. "The hours spent waiting at the checkpoint are hours taken from my household." Tara asked whether obtaining a new crossing permit might make the question of payment easier. "First let them acknowledge the arrears," Shanti replied. "The permit concerns work still to come; the debt concerns work already done."

Long before that morning at the modern river landing, Drona's story had begun differently in the royal world of the Kuru line. The bottom of the grain jar in a small courtyard had become visible. Kripi tilted it and shook out two handfuls of grain; dry husks scattered over the table. Ashwatthama had returned that day after seeing neighbouring children holding vessels of milk. He asked his mother for food, not for milk, but Kripi understood the unanswered question in his eyes. Drona stood at the doorway. His hands knew the discipline of scripture and weapons; they did not know how to secure regular meals for his own child.

As Kripi washed the grain, she said, "The learning you have acquired is not worthless to me. But when the grain in the house runs short, we ought to know exactly what that learning entitles us to ask of whom." Drona answered quietly that Drupada had once been his fellow student, and in their student days they had spoken of being equals. Kripi asked, "Is the affection of schoolfellows the same thing as a promise upon the royal treasury, or as the food belonging to the people?" Drona said nothing. He had decided to go to Drupada; yet in that journey he had tied together his fear of humiliation and his child's need for food.

When Kripa heard the news and came to see him, Drona was replacing the string of an old bow. "Do you want a teacher's position, or a friend's assistance?" Kripa asked. "I want him to honour the promise he made," Drona replied. Kripa said, "One must establish the words of a promise and the circumstances in which they were spoken. Poverty is no disgrace. But you must understand for yourself the limits of the claim that poverty may give you upon another." Drona's face hardened. The question seemed to him an attempt to belittle a friend's gift. Kripa added, "Your skill is proven. Ask to be paid for teaching princes, and that will be your due for labour. To demand half a kingdom on the strength of a childhood promise is another matter."

When Drona came before Drupada in the assembly hall of Panchala, the doorkeeper looked first at his clothes. Drona introduced himself as Drupada's former fellow student. Drupada recognised him, but lacked the courage to acknowledge their former intimacy before his courtiers. "Companionship in childhood does not confer equality in the right to rule," he said. Within Drona, shame turned into a fiercer anger. He had not wished to leave his friend's house as a beggar; but Drupada, having erected that distinction between them, offered him no honourable path towards a conversation beyond it. A servant standing in the hall kept looking at the small bundle Drona had brought, though he had no right to speak on Drona's behalf.

After the assembly, Drupada told his minister in private that treating an impulsive promise of childhood as a command to divide royal land would be unjust to the people. The minister asked, "Why, then, did this argument require his public humiliation?" Drupada could find no answer. He had been defending the limits of his royal authority, but personal pride had entered into the way he declared those limits. He had lost the opportunity to send Drona away with food, a guest's lodging, and respect. No one in that assembly could then foresee how far the violence born of this humiliation might spread.

Kripa did not question Drona immediately upon his return. Drona gave a brief account of his journey and added his conclusion: "The friend who promised to regard me as his equal will now give me no respect without power." Kripa asked, "Will you then make your pupils pay you that respect?" Drona said, "I give them knowledge. Why should it be wrong to ask something in return?" "There is a boundary between recompense and revenge," Kripa answered. "Measure the worth of a prince's training by the ability he gains. The debt of vengeance for a teacher's humiliation is not fixed by the pupil's birth." Drona stood up when he had heard this much. His silence expressed disagreement, not consent.

When an offer of teaching came from Hastinapura, Drona demonstrated his skill with the bow. The princes' eyes shone with curiosity at the difficult art. On the first day he taught them how to hold the bow and to steady the breath before aiming at a target. When a young student failed, Drona corrected the position of his hand. His mastery in that moment was real; but that truth did not make every order he would issue in the future just by itself. Kripa watched from a distance. He renewed his proposal that training hours, the maintenance of weapons, and the remuneration due to the teacher should be recorded separately. Drona agreed to this arrangement, but he did not erase the account of Drupada's insult from his mind.

One evening Ashwatthama came to his father's training ground and asked, "What you teach me, will you teach the other boys too?" Drona laid a hand upon his forehead and said that the test of merit was demanding. The boy asked again, "Who will see the merit of someone who is never admitted?" Drona had no answer to give him then. From a distance Kripi called her son to eat. The grain jar at home was still not full, but there was now the prospect of new payment for teaching. Drona wanted to leave poverty behind, while also harbouring the thought of writing the old wound to his honour upon the futures of his new pupils.

Back in the present at Simatirtha, two windows of the unloading office opened before noon to receive Shanti's application. The first clerk said that permission to operate the boat was a matter for the local water committee; the second said that freight payment was the responsibility of the merchant who had ordered the goods. Shanti wrote down the two answers separately. "Your stamp is on the merchant's slip," she showed the second clerk. "It does not mean that I was paid. It does, however, confirm that the goods arrived here." The clerk turned the slip over and back. The ink in the line acknowledging receipt of one sack was unusually dark; the figure on the slip for loading the second sack was different. Shanti asked for a dated copy of the original goods-receipt ledger. Even today she would not set the boat free on the strength of a verbal assurance.

Meanwhile, on the veranda behind the office, Asha Bhumij was arranging receipts in a little tin box. It contained many scraps of paper, but the names of the members of a household were nowhere complete in one place. She was adding up the separate costs of temporary accommodation, transport, medicines, and lost earnings for families displaced from the mining area. Tara glanced at the papers and asked, "Will you be able to arrive at one total?" "Adding up a total is not difficult," Asha replied. "But I will not write that everyone was driven out at the same time, or that every loss arose from the same cause." She kept a separate line for each family's consent. Some had paid rent in outlying settlements; others had lived rent-free with relatives, but their children had missed school.

Asha's younger brother grew anxious when he saw the word "belongings" in the account. "Where have you written down my schoolbooks?" he asked. "Where books were lost, I shall record lost books; where schooling was interrupted, I shall record school days," Asha told him. "They are not the same loss." An elderly displaced man offered to be a witness. He had seen the vehicle when people left the area, but had not seen the belongings inside every home. Asha entered that limit into his statement. The first relief slip approved a sum for a few days' lodging; the official deferred a decision on permanent compensation. Asha accepted the interim sum, but not in exchange for surrendering the final claim.

Chanda Munda arrived on the veranda with a blue bag. A new letter had now entered the dispute over her attendance record at the construction site: a printed form requesting permission to return home. Beneath it a clerk had written that no certificate of departure could be issued without the "contractor's remaining approval." Chanda looked at the space for her name. "Why should a contractor's wishes decide whether I may go home?" she asked. The clerk explained that it was merely an office rule. Chanda replied, "I need his accounts for the wages he still owes me. But I have not placed my body, and the right to take it home, under his authority."

Chanda showed the blank spaces on the next slip to the two migrant labourers who had come with her. One was ready to sign without reading because his mother was ill. Chanda did not forbid him. She said, "First hear what is written here: 'All payments received.' If you have not received them, say so clearly in the empty space." The second worker said that his travel fare was a separate claim. Chanda prepared three separate applications for each of them: notice of leaving work, a claim for unpaid wages, and identity verification for the journey. The date of departure was fixed, but the dispute over payment remained open. Preserving that distinction on paper was Chanda's victory for the day.

At the edge of the market, Rafiq arrived carrying two documents of identity he had written himself. The first gave the name of his regional speech, "Surjapuri"; the second gave the community identity his family had preserved in its history for many years. The digital form demanded that both be entered in a single box. "If you write the dialect, the caste will be understood from it as well," the clerk said. Rafiq did not laugh. "If you speak Maithili," he asked, "can all your other identities be understood from that one word?" The clerk said the form had limited space. "Then record the shortage of space," Rafiq replied, "not a shortage in my identity."

Returning from work for another client, Kumudi heard Rafiq's request. She explained that in translation a single word for "language" could diminish the independent identity of a regional dialect, but she had no authority to change an administrative code. Rafiq wrote the original application in his own linguistic form; Kumudi made its purpose clear in the standard language, and no caste name was added automatically to either version. The official issued a written acknowledgement of the objection. On his way out, Rafiq said, “The digital form has not changed today. But there is now proof that I did not accept the false matching of my identities.” His young niece walked beside him, repeating two words with their particular pronunciations. Rafiq did not correct her; first he asked how those words were spoken in her home.

During the meal break, Lata asked when she could inspect the old boathouse records. An employee said that the original ledger could be seen in the presence of the investigating officer at the appointed hour; no public copy was yet available. Lata wrote the time in her notebook. She did not produce the old “Mithua” slip again, for pasting it everywhere would not reveal what the name meant. “Do you want to go today?” Padma asked. “I shall go,” Lata answered, “but first I will state my conditions for recording whatever I find there. A history in which a child’s name was heard is not the same as the whereabouts of my son.” Tara agreed that the expense of that day’s journey would be entered separately.

Maitri Shrestha came to the office with a folded copy of an old transport document. She was engaged in correcting an old error concerning the time of her family’s transport of medicines. This time she pointed to the name “Parola” on one page. “I want the original pronunciation of this name matched with its written form,” she said. “On another page one letter is different. I cannot say that this means there were two places.” The clerk proposed drawing a route from the old ledger onto a present-day map. Maitri refused. “Here we have a name in a record. To establish where the route actually lay, we need the information recorded by the issuing authority at the time.” Padma copied the name exactly as it appeared.

Another slip came from a journey involving the family of Nasima Shershabadi. At the top stood the name “Mechi.” Nasima had come to the office herself because the copy of the document had incorrectly truncated her family’s name. “I sew strips of paper to save old books,” she said, “but what is the use of saving the paper if the name of my home remains wrongly cut away?” The clerk said that the presence of “Mechi” allowed one to assume the journey had passed through a particular border checkpoint. “Where is that checkpoint’s stamp?” Nasima asked. There was no clear stamp. She supplied the actual date of her journey and the stopping places she herself had seen, but would not accept an entire route inferred from the written name alone.

Nasima’s adolescent daughter, who had come with her, was holding the slip. She asked her mother what would happen in the school admission register if the office could not write their names correctly in their own language. Nasima handed her a pen and asked her to write her name. The girl first wrote the form spoken at home, and then, separately, the spelling demanded by the official. Nasima asked that the two be entered not as mutually contradictory, but as related forms. Rafiq listened from one side. He did not draw Nasima's identity into his own box, and Nasima did not take Rafiq's linguistic claim and attach it to her own name. They faced an inconvenience in the same office, but the remedy each sought was different.

Shanti received the first reply to her claim for arrears in the afternoon. The unloading office acknowledged that two sacks had been entered in the landing register, but the merchant's freight-distribution account contained only one receipt. The officer gave her an interim acknowledgement: claim received, verification pending. Reading it, Shanti said, "Do not record this as payment." She submitted a separate application for permission to operate the crossing in the future, setting out the working days on both banks and the limits on how long the boat could be held. The officer appointed a time for inspection in the following week. Shanti accepted that much for the prospect of seasonal work with her boat, but kept the arrears slip in a separate file.

In the afternoon Asha brought a new table calculating the losses of displacement. Each row carried a different mark for "seen firsthand," "heard from the family," and "confirmed by receipt." One man complained that writing in this way would make his loss appear smaller. "No," Asha answered, "it will only make the claim stronger. Where there is no receipt, a person's experience will not be erased; the route by which that experience can be verified will be shown separately." She divided responsibility for delivering copies of the approved temporary-housing payments from house to house. An elderly woman said she could not attend their large meetings. Asha arranged to hear her at home; she did not take the woman's signature without her permission.

Towards evening, Chanda took copies of her three applications to the bus stand. She kept one account of the money needed for her ticket home, and another of what the contractor owed her. "If I go home, will I miss the hearing on my claim?" a fellow worker asked. "If you appoint a representative, have notice of the hearing sent to your home," Chanda replied. "If you must attend in person, apply to change the date. I will not let my decision to go home become a letter renouncing my claim." She did not buy her ticket immediately; first she obtained an acknowledgement number from the office. The journey the following dawn was still a possibility, but the contractor's verbal prohibition was no longer being treated as a written right.

In that earlier age at Hastinapura, Kripa came again one evening to Drona's training school and noticed a blank space beneath the schedule of instruction, where the recompense due was to be entered. "Why is this empty?" he asked. "A teacher declares his dakshina when the teaching is complete," Drona said. "He may declare it," Kripa replied, "but the pupil has a right to know beforehand the limits of the risk he will be asked to undertake." Before Drona's eyes the assembly hall of Drupada rose once more. "The account of my humiliation is still unsettled," he said. "Your humiliation is real," Kripa answered. "It does not follow that every pupil becomes a debtor to your revenge."

Drona did not stop the lessons that day. He corrected Arjuna's grip, gave a weaker pupil another chance, and set Ashwatthama to work oiling the weapons. There was proficiency in what he did, but the space for the teacher's recompense remained empty. In Panchala, Drupada was examining the register of his army's expenses and his subjects' taxes; he too had failed to grasp the full consequences of humiliating his old fellow student. Kripa's question displeased Drona, yet refusing to answer it did not destroy the question. The pupils might one day become soldiers in a future war; for now they were young people learning, whose labour, safety, and decisions had a value of their own.

At Simatirtha, when the first hour of night sounded, Shanti tightened her boat's rope and set off towards home. She carried two slips: one for the old freight charge, a claim neither rejected nor yet verified; the other appointing the date for inspecting her future crossing permit. Asha took away the accounts of her families; Chanda kept copies of her documents for the journey home; Rafiq safeguarded the acknowledgement of his linguistic objection. Maitri's paper bearing "Parola" and Nasima's bearing "Mechi" lay in separate envelopes: they had not been forced together into a single map. Tara and Padma preserved all these distinctions in their travel register, so that at the next inspection no inference could quietly become original evidence.

Once, in the evening crowd, Lata turned to look at the closed door of the records room. No new evidence about Mithun had been found that day. What she had gained was a definite time for examining the original register, and the clearer understanding that, just as the wages due for someone's labour could not be reduced for another person's convenience, neither could the search for someone's child. Closing her notebook, she said to Padma, "Tomorrow I shall look at the page numbers. Before the last digit, I shall read the first name." "And whatever we cannot read," Padma answered, "we shall leave blank." In the lantern-light of the checkpoint, the shadows of the papers stirred. Darkness lay across the river, but each person had brought the name of what was owed to them a little more clearly into view.

Chapter 75 · The One Last Digit

The iron nail that held the window shutter in place at the old warehouse by the railway square had worked loose. Naira pressed it down with her palm to stop the dust blowing over three piles of papers. The first contained public copies, with private details redacted, of the official correspondence relating to Mahesh's murder; the second, transport slips brought from Simatirtha; the third, applications for school and labour assistance. Seeing the final digit, '7', written in blue ink on top of all three piles, Kabir had telephoned the previous night. He had found the coincidence extraordinary. Naira released the nail and straightened a corner of the papers. "The same final digit does not mean the same account," she said. Kabir replied, "But why have all these papers come together in one place because of the same digit?"

Beside the tracks, the tea seller was taking a pan of boiling water off the fire, and the dull thudding of sacks being moved could be heard from a distance. Naira locked the original page of her earlier publication in a desk drawer. She had already acknowledged publicly her responsibility for publishing Mahesh's name in a misleading context; it now seemed unthinkable to link another person's identity to a mere number. She told Kabir, "First write down whose hands brought these three sheets here, on what day, and for what purpose. We can speak of the final digit afterwards."

The first slip belonged to Rajo Bhogta. Her application, sent the previous day for school supplies, had found its way into the wrong compartment at the railway-square assistance centre. On one side was proof of residence in her former village; on the other, a recent receipt for rent. In the school-assistance list, the final address code was seven, and the computer had entered two families' applications under a single serial number. Rajo herself arrived that morning carrying a small bucket. She had come about three different matters: notebooks for her child, water at her rented home, and the outstanding payment for transporting supplies. "What other inquiry is there?" Rajo demanded sharply. "My child's schooling is not a criminal document."

Naira found her a place to sit inside but did not raise the question of taking a photograph. Rajo unfolded the letter bearing her old address. She regarded it as the record of a house she had left, not proof of where she lived now. "I work here while my address keeps changing," she said. "If I cannot get assistance without the old address, the school will move out of reach for the very people building new homes." On the telephone, a school employee insisted that she enter one 'permanent' address. Rajo answered, "At present I have a rent receipt, a record of my child's attendance at school, and a neighbour who can testify. Read all three and tell me which is needed for which purpose."

The skin had peeled from Shiv's palms. Five attendance slips were tucked into his shirt pocket. On one, his name was written 'Dhāṛī' (धाँड़ी); on another, 'Dhāṛi' (धाँडि); on a third, simply 'Shiv'. Payment had been stopped in the digital wage account because of the difference in the final spelling of his name. When the contractor's representative again told him to 'prove his identity', Shiv did not fling the slips onto the table; he spread them out carefully. "Here are the signatures of the men who worked with me on the days I unloaded the sacks," he said. "Check the letters of my name again. Do not blame me for an error instead of paying me for five days' work."

Kabir noticed that Shiv's slip, too, ended in seven. But that was the number of an attendance token, not an address code from the school. He tried to signal this to Naira with his eyes. Naira stopped him and asked Shiv directly, "When did this token come into your hands?" Shiv said the contractor's foreman had given it to him on the first day. On the second day, the number on the machine-generated slip had changed, but the wage list had been prepared from a copy of the old token. The attendance book was still with the contractor. In her notebook Naira wrote 'Shiv's statement', not 'attendance book examined'. Shiv would not let the matter rest there. "Write that I am asking for the money," he said, "not merely for my name to be corrected."

People began gathering at the railway-square centre. Counting his glasses, the tea seller asked whether all the papers would have to be submitted at the same window that day. Rajo burst out laughing. "If there is only one window, start by opening the accounts of everything owed to the tea sellers." A faint smile touched Shiv's face as well. Naira ordered tea and paid for it. The tea seller, for the moment, had no use for the digit written on his mother's slip. As Rajo made this small observation, she rubbed dust from her eyes, as though, amid all the disputes, it was necessary to keep some other part of the day alive.

That same day in Simatirtha, Lata arrived at the appointed hour to examine the records of the old boathouse. The pages of a thick register had been darkened by the oil from many hands. The records keeper opened only the specified entries for one year. In one place there were letters resembling those in the copied name 'Mithua'; alongside them stood a serial number for boat equipment. Lata asked, "Is this a person's name or the name of a consignment?" The employee said, "I cannot be certain from this handwriting. The register is headed 'Boat Equipment'." Rather than write down a conclusion at once, Lata copied the heading and page number. The search for Mithun was not brought to an end by this page.

Padma sent Naira a brief message: the final digit seven occurred repeatedly in the cross-border transport pages, but the serial numbers belonged under different headings. She did not send a photograph of the original register, for permission had been given only to inspect it. Naira wrote back asking whose hand had made the copy that could be used publicly. Lata asked whether the message had been sent without details identifying her son. Padma showed it to her; there was no name and no indication of a home address. Lata breathed more easily but said, “Helping an inquiry is right. The search for my child will not become material for somebody else’s quarrel.” Padma wrote down her decision.

While Rajo’s and Shiv’s papers were being kept separate, the matter of a third application came up. At the school veranda, Rachana Dhimal was teaching four children to write words for their homes on an alphabet board. Some children from migrant families had returned before the rains; others had left again. The school’s regular attendance register demanded fixed names and entries, while Rachana was conducting weekly classes so that the children’s learning could continue through their journeys. She told Naira over the telephone, “My class has begun. I will ask for books and permission to use a room, but I cannot write down in advance which state these children will be living in during which month.”

Among the school papers Rachana read the name of a watercourse, ‘Tilayuga’, beside a copied map of the fictional Tilwaha. A volunteer wanted to declare the two names alternate forms of a single river. Naira stopped him. “Tilwaha is the name of the river within this town’s story. Tilayuga, or Tilayugba, belongs to a separate register of sources. A likeness in sound does not make the place, the boundary, and the rights to its waters the same.” Rachana said that what she needed was a route by which the schoolchildren could travel, not a map establishing ownership of the river. Yet if official papers wrongly conflated the names, a family might be marked absent at an address where it had never been expected to live.

The headmaster said that changing the language of the textbooks lay outside the school’s authority. Rachana answered, “Keep your textbooks. I will teach a class that explains their words in the language spoken at home. And make a way for a child returning after a journey to catch up with the pages missed.” She also set out her payment plainly: the hours spent teaching, the preparation, and the labour of sending messages from house to house. The headmaster had initially taken this to be voluntary service. Rachana told him that giving one day freely was one thing, teaching throughout the year another. At last a proposal was written down for the use of an empty room twice a week and for trial wages. Permanent approval was still pending.

At the railway square, a young man showed Kabir a list spreading across phone screens. It marked Rajo, Shiv, medicine transport, migrant arrivals, and school papers in the same colour. Its heading was ‘The Number Seven Network’. Such a correspondence could not be accidental, the young man insisted. For an instant Kabir felt the old haste rise within him. If he published the list, his name would be counted among those leading the investigation. He showed it to Naira. She asked, “Did the person who compiled this list consult the original accounts, or only the pictures people shared?" The young man replied, "All the pictures came from people." "Then it is a list of pictures," Naira said, "not proof that the accounts are the same."

The young man's friend objected, "Mahesh has been killed. Now are you calling every piece of evidence a coincidence in order to protect yourselves?" Naira's expression hardened. "Mahesh's death is a verified event. Who killed him, what the motive was, and which records are connected with it—those are three questions requiring three separate answers. I know the cost of my first mistake. I will not put another family in danger by joining names without verification." The young man asked, "Then do the numbers tell us nothing?" Naira answered, "Numbers can raise questions. Without knowing their sources, they cannot deliver a verdict against anyone."

Near midday, Amir Kulhaiya arrived at the centre with a small business ledger. He helped migrant workers send their earnings home; letters and money did not always reach their families on the same day. An earlier message involving Nasima's family had convinced him that an incorrect form of address in another language could change the person to whom money was paid. Now a broker had put forward a proposal: Amir should hand the families' money to a private intermediary, who promised to deliver it faster using one 'shared code'. The proposal sheet, too, ended in seven. Amir sat down. "Who bears the price of such speed?" he asked.

The broker displayed his stamp, but the stamp was not a receipt acknowledging payment. Amir gave a woman from one of the families a chance to put her questions over the telephone. She said that on the previous occasion the money had arrived in the name of a male relative, although she was the one who managed the household expenses. Amir asked the broker whether he would put in writing each recipient's independent consent, the exchange rate, the service charge, and the arrangements for returning money after a failed transaction. "A business cannot stand on so many details," the broker said. Amir did not laugh. "Then this business will not be conducted with our people's money," he replied. He set a day for comparing authorised transfer methods for three families and rejected the proposal to hand over their cash collectively to a private intermediary.

When Amir opened his ledger, Kabir could see how different the digits were. Rajo's seven was an address code; Shiv's, an attendance token; Amir's, the final mark on a proposed transaction slip. On some of the other papers the '7' was not an identifying number at all but a page number. Yet the shared list called them all 'matching identification numbers'. Naira gave Kabir two pens of different colours: one for details established from an original source, the other for information merely reported to them. Kabir asked whether they needed a third colour for words translated from another language. "Yes," Naira said, "if the meaning of the words changes."

At the medicine-transport centre in Simatirtha, Maitri Shrestha had opened an old receipt from her family's papers. After noticing a variant reading of the name 'Parola' the previous day, she now needed to examine the dispatch note for a new consignment of medicines. In the original Nepali document, one word marked the date on which the goods had been 'released for departure'; the Hindi translation had rendered it as 'received'. Because of that difference, the local hospital maintained that the medicines had arrived, while the carrier said the consignment was still on its way. Maitri recorded separately the seal on the boxes, the departure of the vehicle, and the hospital's acknowledgment of receipt.

An employee showed her the figures on his computer. The entry with a serial number ending in seven was marked 'complete'. "The software says the goods have arrived," he said. Maitri asked, "Which employee opened the medicines and counted them?" No one answered. The hospital storekeeper was telephoned; he said he had received notification of the consignment, not the boxes themselves. Maitri insisted that its status be entered as 'verification pending'. The employee protested that changing an old entry would disrupt the accounts. "To save a false account," Maitri replied, "you can make medicine reach its destination on paper, but not reach a human body."

Maitri was not herself a translator, but she did not regard the labour of interpreting transport terms as something to be had for nothing. Before asking Kumudi to come, she inquired about her available time and remuneration. Kumudi arrived after finishing another job. She carefully compared the three sentences in the original language, the dispatch order, and the receipt slip. She stated plainly that correcting the translation did not prove the boxes had actually arrived. Maitri signed the corrected statement, and Kumudi entered her own name as translator. The storekeeper decided that on the boxes' arrival he would check the count, the medicine names, and the condition of temperature protection; until then they would not be entered in the receipt register.

Seeing the name Panar in Maitri's letter, an assistant proposed changing it on the map to another sound-form used in the local speech. Rafiq had come to the same office for a copy of his earlier application concerning his linguistic identity. "The sounds I hear in my Surjapuri speech need not always be written in one form," he said. "But the sound I speak cannot establish the location named in a document from another district." In a note, Kumudi kept the original spelling of Panar distinct from Rafiq's spoken form.

In the afternoon a call came from the railway square to the cross-border centre. Naira asked Maitri who owned the original receipt and which portions could be made available in a certified copy. Maitri said that she could send the corrected translation, but not the box-seal register without the office's permission. Naira read aloud the wording of an application seeking that permission. Maitri laughed. "Before you draft your letter, remember that I am running about trying to get the medicines onto the right route. Do not stop my work for the sake of your investigation.” Naira agreed at once. The time of an inquiry and the time of medicines could not be measured by the same hands of a clock.

Another message reached Rajo from the school. Her application was about to be removed from the assistance list as a ‘suspected duplicate’, because the computer held two addresses with the same final digit. Rajo went to the school herself. She showed the headmaster not the paper leaf her daughter had made, but the attendance register. “This child studies here,” she said. “She no longer lives at that old address.” The school employee said resources were scarce and checking each differing address took time. “Then write down how long the checking will take, and arrange interim assistance as well,” Rajo replied. “Do not place the burden of an error on the child.” In the end the school authorised temporary use of books for one week and fixed a date for verifying her residence. The final decision on the full assistance remained outstanding.

News also came from Rachana’s school. Two families had agreed to the mother-tongue class, but a third wanted its child not to speak the language of home, for fear of ridicule. Rachana sat apart with the mother and asked which words came most naturally to the child. At first the woman was silent. Then she said she wanted to change the language in which the child was taught, not abandon the language of her home. Rachana altered the programme: first shared pictures and counting, and then answers in whichever language the child chose. The class became a place for learning, not a performance in which a child had to cast off shame before an audience.

At last the contractor’s account for Shiv’s unpaid wages reached the centre. The foreman brought a copy of his signature. On two slips the letters of the same worker’s name differed, but the dates of work and the number of sacks agreed. The automatic reason for withholding payment was the variation in the name; it was not evidence that someone had deliberately stolen Shiv’s wages. “Whether the cause is a machine or a human being,” Shiv said, “the sacks I lifted all day were real.” Naira demanded a written decision from the contractor. He ordered payment of the three verified days’ wages and instructed that attendance for the remaining two days be checked with two members of the work team. Shiv took the receipt and counted. “Not half,” he corrected them. “Three days’ wages. Let the other two days remain written down.”

When the contractor’s representative asked whom they should blame for the error, Shiv said he did not yet know. “The slip tells us that the form of my name changed,” he said. “Whether somebody changed it deliberately or it went wrong in the writing needs a separate inquiry.” Naira attached particular importance to that distinction, for it raised again the question of when and how Mahesh’s name had circulated through the old warehouse papers. But there was still no direct source connecting the error in Shiv’s payment to Mahesh's death. Finding the same kind of carelessness did not establish the same perpetrator.

Kabir opened the shared list on his phone again. Its original heading could now be changed. He wrote: 'Final digit seven in separate accounts; three verified sources, two unconfirmed copies.' Naira asked, "Is there any need to make this list public?" Kabir thought for a while. "No. Once it is public, people will see the digit before they see the distinctions," he said. He restricted access to the list, recorded the permission given by the owners of the original papers, and removed Mahesh's family details and Rajo's address. His old eagerness for news was still alive, but this small act of restraint was his own decision, not an order from Naira.

As evening approached, Amir met the three families at the centre. An elderly woman was expecting money for her grandson; a migrant young man was sending funds for his mother's medicines; and a woman from the third family explicitly insisted on receiving the money in her own name. Amir explained that they could discuss the matter together without needing a joint account. Each receipt would separately record the sender, recipient, fee, and arrangements for refunding an unsuccessful transfer. The elderly woman asked whether so much writing would not cause delay. "It will take longer," Amir said, "but less time than the delay caused by money arriving in the wrong place." The families chose the authorised route for payment. The broker's demand for an advance remained rejected.

Far away in Simatirtha, Maitri's boxes of medicine finally arrived on the evening vehicle. The seal was found intact before the storekeeper, but one slip concerning temperature control was unclear. The decision on whether the medicines were fit for use was left to medical testing. Maitri obtained a separate receipt for the freight; she did not claim to issue a certificate of the medicines' quality. As Kumudi prepared to go home, Maitri paid her for that day's work. Rafiq spoke the Panar word in his dialect once more, but no one drew a public map on the strength of the sound. That day's useful correction had been made not on a map, but in the meaning of a sentence in the office records.

Returning from the records room, Lata told Padma that the heading 'Boat Equipment' on the old page containing 'Mithua' had weakened the supposition that the entry referred to a person. Padma asked, "Then will the next inquiry stop?" Lata answered, "No. Someone who has not lost a child may feel relieved when one page ceases to offer a lead. I need to know whose hand made that slip. But I will not have somebody else's boat accounts seized in Mithun's name before we know." She filed an application for lawful access to the original copy. In the slow pace of this search lay the firmness of her decision, not defeat.

In the darkness at the railway square, the boy closing the office was testing the lock on the outer door. Rajo went home with coloured paper for her daughter; Shiv walked towards the market to buy rations with the wages for three days; Rachana was preparing pictures for her next class; Amir was keeping the three families' receipts separate. These were outcomes of their own days, not appendices to a single mystery. Naira left one sheet on the table: 'Final digit seven; differences of source confirmed; connection with a crime unverified.' Below it were four empty spaces: original register, handwriting, time of entry, and who benefited. She knew that these spaces did not yet yield an answer about motive.

As Kabir tightened the nail in the window, he asked, "Shall we meet here again tomorrow?" Before putting out the light, Naira replied, "When the authorised answer about the original papers comes. Until then, Rajo's books, Shiv's remaining wages, and the actual examination of Maitri's medicines must continue." The wind no longer entered, but the sound of the trains outside went on. In her register of corrections, Naira wrote only this: even when the number is the same, the person, the object, and the event are not necessarily one. The search for justice in Mahesh's death continued without interruption; to refrain from carelessly joining another innocent person's name to that search was the difficult decision she had earned that day.

Chapter 76 · After Ekalavya

At dawn Pratima Rajvanshi stood beside the wall behind the school, an old bamboo pole in her hand. Three arm's lengths from the wall, beside a newly planted iron stake, two pupils had begun playing marbles in the earth. Pratima did not tell them to move. First she pointed out the thin red thread tied to the stake's tip. "Who tied this thread?" she asked. "Two men came yesterday evening," one child said. "They said a big shop would be built here." Pratima listened, but did not mistake a child's report for a surveyor's order. She opened her notebook, entered the stake's distance from the wall, and looked towards the old gate through which the children came to school in the rains.

As the headmaster arrived to unlock the school, Pratima showed him her map. "This is the copy preserved in my family," she said. "I have always heard at home of an ancestral gift of land. But we must check the original register to find which part of this ground, if any, stands recorded in the school's name. For now I am asking only whose authority placed an iron stake outside the wall." The headmaster said that a shopkeeper's representative had approached him one day, but the school had given no written consent. Pratima asked him to preserve dated photographs of the children's footpath and of the open ground used by the school. She did not wish him to rush into declaring the land private property either.

Rajo Bhogta arrived at the gate with her daughter. In her hand was the acknowledgement for the application struck from the assistance list the previous day. She asked Pratima whether the new stake meant that the path behind the school would be closed. "We do not know yet," Pratima answered. "And if someone intends to close it, we shall ask by what right." Rajo said, "Whether my daughter receives assistance is a separate decision. But her way to school must not be blocked." Rather than bury those two different demands in a single petition, Pratima proposed writing two letters.

Inside, Rachana Dhimal was drawing pictures for the children along the blank edges of old newspapers. Rajo's daughter chose a boat. "What do you call this at home?" Rachana asked. The word the child spoke was different from the word used in Rachana's own household. Instead of correcting her, Rachana wrote down both. In that moment Pratima understood that a claim over school land was not merely a dispute about title deeds. The continuity of the learning taking place in this open room was also at stake. Yet a child's two words could not establish the legal boundary of a plot of land.

At about the same time, a message came from Sarita in Videhapur. She was arranging to return Ramvati Khatwe's old letter, saved through the rainy season, in accordance with Ramvati's permission. Ramvati was seated outside the Simatirtha office. She had identity papers issued in two places: one bearing the name of her family's former home, the other spelling her name differently after marriage. Turning his screen towards her, the clerk said, "One of these must be wrong. You choose which one to keep." Ramvati asked, "Will choosing wipe out my earlier life? In whose name shall I claim the wages still owed where I worked before?"

The shifting of a border had not changed the work of her hands. In the paddy-planting season she worked in the fields; in winter she mended clothes. But one register had added her post-marriage address, while another retained the identity under which she had worked in the first place. The employee said it was an ordinary correction of a name. Ramvati opened a little cloth pouch and took out the receipt for her first wages. "This bears my former identity," she said, "but I was the person who did that work. If you treat the names as two different women, the money will disappear. If you erase the newer paper, how is my daughter to give her mother's identity at school?"

Before proceeding, she asked Ramvati whether she needed help understanding the document's words or wished to write the application herself. "I shall speak for myself," Ramvati replied. "Keep the same question alive in both languages." Kumudi read aloud the expression used in the original paper's other language. In one place it said "return"; on the printed form, the same matter had been rendered as "new migration." On hearing the difference, Ramvati dictated three lines: recognition of her earlier work, her present residence, and the continuing claim to her wages. She had her objection recorded to treating any one of these as a substitute for the others.

Outside the office Ramvati received Sarita's letter. Damp had made the corners of the old paper fragile. On it Ramvati recognised the signature she had used when she had stayed for several days at Sarita's home. Over the telephone Sarita said, "It is your paper. I kept it; that gives me no right to write its meaning for you." Ramvati asked permission to attach that old signature as evidence in the present application, while making it explicit that the letter alone did not establish the validity of both identity papers. The office accepted her application. A decision on the correction would await the original issuing register.

Long before these modern documents, at the edge of an ancient forest, Ekalavya stood examining a broken bowstring. The wound on his thumb was old, but stiffness still troubled his hand in the mornings. That day a new girl came with the adolescent boy who was learning from him. The girl's mother made vessels from bark, but her daughter wanted to learn to read the forest paths and tie the safe knots used in nets. Ekalavya did not place a bow in her hand. He first asked, "What is your name? And whose wish is it that you have come here?"

The girl said her name was Jhumki. "My mother sent me," she replied, then paused and added, "But I want to learn. I want to show those who say my hands are not made for this work.” Ekalavya set a length of cord before her and made no inquiry into her ancestry. “Tie this knot first. If you do not know, say so. Pretend to know and the rope will break.” Twice Jhumki tied it the wrong way. On the third attempt she stopped and noticed how the wet end of the cord was leaving slack as she pulled it tight.

The elderly cord-maker, who had earlier spoken to Ekalavya about accounting for the value of teaching time, watched Jhumki at work. “Your school has more pupils now,” she said to him. “But I am still paid the old rate for my cord.” Ekalavya replied that the cord for the new pupils had been taken from the common store. “Where in that store,” the old woman asked, “are the names of those whose labour filled it?” Ekalavya opened the old bark ledger. One leaf recorded a portion of the adolescent boy’s first earnings, but nothing about the cord-maker’s hours. He called for a fresh leaf and asked the woman to explain how her work should be measured.

Meanwhile a hunter came down the outer forest path. “Pupils will come to you because of your name,” he said, “and hearing that name, they will pay a teacher’s gift.” Ekalavya stretched the fingers of his injured hand. “The price of that name has already been paid,” he said. “I cannot now cheat the children who come here.” The hunter objected: “Are you a teacher, or a seller of rope?” The old woman intervened. “Who will provide another rope when one breaks? Skill has a price here, and so does the thing made.” The hunter walked on without answering, but Jhumki had heard his contempt.

“My mother can give less grain to the store than other people,” Jhumki asked. “Will that mean I can learn less?” Ekalavya did not immediately promise that everything would be equal; the common store had been half empty the previous month. He sat down with the older pupil and calculated how much grain each learner could contribute, who needed materials, and how many hours he himself could teach. He entered the amount due for the older pupil’s time spent in training. If Jhumki’s mother could not provide grain, perhaps she could teach the measurements for making bark vessels. But before counting that as an arrangement, they would ask the mother herself.

During practice that day Ekalavya gave Jhumki a piece of bamboo and held it away from the target. “Measure this with your eyes, not with a knife,” he said. Jhumki estimated the distance between two nodes, but failed to see a fine crack beneath the bark. When she bent the bamboo, the thin wood snapped. “If you hide a mistake,” Ekalavya said, “someone else’s hand may be hurt. We shall enter the cost of this broken piece among today’s teaching expenses. Deliberate waste would be another matter.” For the first time Jhumki discovered that admitting an error did not mean being turned out of school.

At dusk Jhumki’s mother came. Before taking her daughter home, she asked Ekalavya, “Who was your first teacher?” Ekalavya briefly told her of the clay image and his decision to give his thumb; he did not hide the old wound.

"Then did that teacher count you among his pupils?" the mother asked. Ekalavya took time to answer. "I accepted him as my teacher. His recognition and my acceptance were not the same thing." The mother said, "If my daughter studies here, will her name be entered in the bark ledger?" Ekalavya handed Jhumki the writing implement. Jhumki made the first mark of her name herself, and the old woman wrote beside it the account of the materials used for her teaching.

Ekalavya had no need to declare Drona's knowledge false; he knew the cost of the decision made upon his own body. Before nightfall he made the new pupils practise listening for signals from those walking ahead on a forest path, instead of taking aim with arrows. For the first time Jhumki recognised, from a considerable distance, her mother returning with the bark vessels. The older boy, hearing her identify the figure correctly, said, "That will not catch a fish." "If Mother does not lose her way," Jhumki replied, "there will be a fire burning at home this evening." Ekalavya said nothing to that answer. The day's outcome in his school was not an arrow striking its mark but a safe way home for three people.

In present-day Simatirtha, that same afternoon, the seventh envelope was opened again on the veranda of Binu Darai's house. Money from it had paid for repairs to the roof; one portion had gone towards her father-in-law's medicines; and her husband had said on the telephone that some of it remained in savings in her name. But in the account papers only the male head of the household was named as recipient. "I am not saying that every rupee earned must be given to me," Binu said. "I am saying that the share sent by agreement for my expenses and savings must not be left at another person's mercy."

Amir Kulhaiya came carrying the separate receipts he had prepared the previous day for three families. Binu asked him about a fourth transaction, her own household's. Rather than beginning with the sum, Amir first asked who had the right to see the recipient's papers. Binu explained that her husband was working abroad and that not everyone at home had been told how much the remittance service had deducted in fees. Amir suggested a separate written instruction for the relevant portion of the money, to be drawn up with the consent of both Binu and her husband. He entered only what the existing accounts established. "And if my husband does not agree?" Binu asked again. "Then the disagreement will remain in writing," Amir said. "I shall not invent your agreement."

Binu's mother-in-law, who oversaw the drying of the household paddy, heard them speaking. "When money comes into the home," she said, "it belongs to the home." Binu did not deny it. "It belongs to the home," she answered, "but decisions should also reckon how much work is done there, and by whose hands." She opened her small notebook and showed that repayments on the loan, medicines, and the girl's schooling had already been given priority. The quarrel was not about hiding money. It was about giving her name a place in the decisions. At last the two women agreed to ask for explicit instructions naming the recipient of the next remittance. Their dispute over past expenses remained unresolved.

Amir's envelope also contained an old migration paper bearing the word "Fariyani." He put the slip carefully aside. "This name appears in the place field of the original document," he said. "I cannot yet check its geographical limits. Let us first see through which service the worker's money passed, as this slip records." They copied the amount on the old paper, its issuing authority, and the date of receipt into separate entries. Amir thought that the document might help families living across the border reconstruct the history of secure remittances. But a single place-name was no warrant for drawing an entire route.

That evening Somri Hembram arrived at the school with a contract and two lengths of heavy thread. Three workers accompanied her, and a child. The contractor had sent papers for work at a new location, but not every member of the group understood the language in which they were written. "Last time we had four questions," Somri said. "Now we have written answers, but in the translation the sentence authorising deductions from wages for 'breach of discipline' has been left out." Maithili first asked where the document had come from. Somri showed the original and the workers' jointly signed authorisation empowering her to take it to a translator—not to sign on anyone else's behalf.

The contractor's agent said the opportunity would soon be gone; all this passing between languages was causing delay. Somri asked, "If an accident happens where we are to work, who pays for the hospital? Where does it say so here?" The agent answered that such arrangements were understood verbally. Somri turned to her fellow workers. "Does a spoken promise sound the same to everyone?" One of them said he did not even know the accommodation charges. Somri did not fold away the papers. She said she needed time to consider the new offer, but had not yet consented to deductions she could not identify.

When Kumudi arrived, Somri asked whether the principal terms could be read aloud to the workers in the Santhali spoken at home. Kumudi acknowledged that she could not herself provide an authoritative Santhali translation of every term. Somri proposed seeking help from a literate member of the group and a trained language assistant at a distance. "I shall speak," she said. "They will check the words. But the final consent belongs to each worker." Kumudi recorded the differences between the Maithili wording and the administrative language. Separate time and payment were agreed upon for checking the accuracy of the Santhali text. The translator's contribution would not vanish under the heading "free service."

When the child climbed down from someone's lap and began knotting one of the thin threads, Somri gently stopped his hands. The contractor's seal was fixed to that thread. "It is a counting mark for the consignment," she said. "Give him another thread to play with." His father took a little coloured cord from his pocket. Somri remembered the days when her mother, before going out to work, wrapped bread in cloth and kept count of her hours without any paper. She wanted the time worked by her own group now to appear in written records, so that the children would inherit more than memories of exhaustion. But that wish was not an order to this child to become a labourer.

On another call the contractor warned that the contract might be cancelled unless it was signed at once. Somri answered plainly, "You must put the period of your offer in writing. Our people will decide once they understand it in their own language. If you refuse us time, do not put the blame for losing the work around our necks." One young man in the group grew frightened: there was a debt at home. "Anyone who wishes to go today is free to decide," she told him, "but go on the basis of what you have actually read in the paper." The young man took his copy away to telephone home before signing. The other two workers chose to wait until the translator could meet them. Their choices were not all the same.

In Maitri Shrestha's transport room, the temperature slip for the evening vehicle's boxes was being checked again. Among that day's papers was an old family transport document bearing the name "Lalbageya." Along one edge a distance was noted in Nepali; along the other was a Hindi translation made later. An officer, in a hurry, said there was no need to name the translator: the original already carried a seal. "The seal on the original tells us about the history of the shipment," Maitri replied. "Why should we erase the work of the person who explained the difference between the languages?"

Kumudi was unavailable. Another language assistant named a fee over the telephone, and Maitri agreed, specifying the limits of the reading she was authorised to request: the written form of the place-name, the unit of distance, and the kind of goods dispatched. The assistant confirmed that "Lalbageya" was written there, but warned that a present-day road could not be identified from it without confirming the date and original route. Maitri entered the assistant's name along with that qualification. The incomplete results of the boxes' temperature checks were kept separate: correcting a transport record did not establish the quality of the medicines.

The headmaster showed Pratima a written reply from the local land-records office. The original survey register had been called for to verify the boundaries of the area used by the public school; the school had not yet approved private construction there. "We must not write that construction has been stopped forever," Pratima said. "But while the inquiry continues, the children's path must remain open." The headmaster accepted responsibility for maintaining a temporary footpath beside the school gate. Pratima did not want an advertisement celebrating her family's old gift. If the conditions of that gift had been intended to protect public use, she wanted them examined openly.

Rachana was gathering the children's exercise books. Rajo's daughter had filled her picture of a boat with two colours—one for the name used in the language of home, the other for the name in her school textbook. "Will it be wrong if I write both?" the girl asked. "Sometimes a place or a word may have different forms," Rachana said. "If someone wants to understand, tell them where each word came from." Yet this habit of keeping distinctions in writing was useful beyond the schoolroom as well: in the wider world of records, it could protect people from needless accusations.

That night Naira received four brief notices in Videhapur. Ramvati's application had been received; a decision remained pending. Written agreement from Binu's family had been requested concerning her share of the money. The translation review of Somri's contract was incomplete. The original register for the school land claimed by Pratima had been called for. Kabir proposed writing a news report. "The subjects may belong together in an article," Naira said, "but do not turn the papers into links in a single crime." On her first page she looked again at the four empty boxes she had reserved for original sources in the investigation of Mahesh's murder. No new direct evidence of that event had been found that day. The boxes therefore remained empty.

For a moment Kabir said he would like to hear the story of Drona and Ekalavya. Sarita sat behind them, filing a copy of Ramvati's letter. "A story may help me understand Ekalavya's wound," Sarita said, "but it cannot decide the case of Ramvati's two papers." Naira did not repeat her words. She read the next words of Ramvati's message: "I will not give up the wages owed for my earlier work." Outside the room Shiv Dhandi had come to ask whether there was news of the remaining two days' pay due to him. Naira could tell him no more than the contractor's new acknowledgement number. He decided for himself what he would do the following day.

Before the last bus of the night, Ramvati placed both her identity papers in one bag, but gave each its own cover. At home Binu showed her savings notebook to her mother-in-law; Somri wrote down the place where the workers would meet for language assistance the following day; and Pratima kept a copy of her request that the iron stake with its red thread near the school gate be safely fenced off rather than removed. In the ancient forest, the first mark of Jhumki's name was drying on Ekalavya's bark ledger. The question they held in common was no more—and no less—than this: who would write the conditions under which a person might enter to learn, earn, or teach; and who would have the opportunity to change those conditions once written?

Chapter 77 · Trijata's Message

In the Ashoka Grove of ancient Lanka, Sita was examining the veins of a leaf. A yellow leaf, wet with the night's dew, had torn between her fingers; in another, the green fibre running down its centre was still strong. She wondered whether, when the watchwomen changed shifts, she might use that fibre to mend the torn edge of her garment. Outside the grove, metal vessels rattled against one another, and one voice told another that grave news had come from the battlefield. No name could be distinctly heard. A little later, a watchwoman repeated those indistinct words as though their meaning, and the outcome they foretold, were known to everyone. Sita laid down the leaf and rose. The news had grown larger in the confidence of the person repeating it than in anything that had actually been said.

One of the watchwomen came close. "Give up waiting today," she said. "There is ill talk in the palace about the one for whom you wait." Her voice held more weariness than compassion. "Who saw it?" Sita asked. The watchwoman looked away. "Men have returned from the fighting." "Did you see them?" "No. The men on guard at the gate said so." Sita asked again, "And from whose mouth did the men at the gate hear it?" This time the woman made no answer. She had no permission to argue beyond the hours and duties of her watch. Tightening her grasp upon the shaft of her spear, she walked away. Sita did not feel humiliated; nevertheless, the words she had heard remained suspended within her.

Trijata came along the path behind the grove just then. She carried two little earthen bowls in the crook of her arm, one filled with water, the other with the thin gruel left from boiling barley. As she set them down, she saw Sita's face. "Has the news reached you already?" she asked. Sita did not answer. Trijata spoke of her own accord. "I heard it when I was returning the eating vessels in the palace's inner courtyard. Two servants were saying to each other that the news from the war was changing. I saw no letter in their hands. I heard the name of a soldier, but I do not know whether he had seen the battlefield with his own eyes." Having marked the limits of what she knew, Trijata fell silent.

"If you are so uncertain," Sita said, "why have you come to tell me?" It was a hard question. Trijata looked towards the water. "Because some of the watchwomen are stating it as certainty. I thought you needed to know, before hearing that certainty again, what grounds there were for it. And I do not wish you to surrender the judgment of your own heart merely because you trust me." Sita motioned for her to sit. The barley gruel was growing cold, but Sita could not bring the first mouthful past her throat. The days of waiting had worn her down. In such exhaustion, even an unconfirmed report could strike like a blow.

A faint drumbeat sounded from one end of the grove. A company of watchwomen stood and looked south. “I hear the drum as you do,” Trijata said. “But the beating of a drum does not tell me whether this is victory, defeat, or mourning.” Sita turned to her. “What I see is the earth of this grove, these trees, and your face. The condition of the one I love is not contained in any of them. If I give fear the place of news, I sell my own judgment into the hands of a tale someone else has made.” She drank a mouthful of the barley gruel. She had no appetite, but neither would she abandon the work of keeping her body alive.

“What would you wish to hear first,” Trijata asked quietly, “if an opportunity for verification comes later?” Sita answered, “What the person who went there saw with his own eyes; how far he travelled; of which hour he speaks. Let him not claim to have seen what he did not see.” Trijata nodded. She had a dilemma of her own: to question the source of what she heard in the palace might be counted an act of insubordination. Yet to carry words unquestioned could injure a woman held captive. She did not profess to shoulder every danger by herself. She said only that, if clearer news came from outside during the next watch, she would try to understand it, and that, if she could find no source, she would say that too.

Sita was silent for a while. Then she lifted the torn leaf. “If I try to stitch my garment with this vein, it will break. I shall use what has held, not strain what has failed until it passes for something dependable.” Trijata showed her the thread in her hand. Together they tied a small knot along the torn hem of the cloth. While they were thus occupied, a watchwoman returned to say that no written order had arrived from the palace. Sita did not pronounce that absence good news. She understood only that she had as yet no sufficient ground upon which to make a new decision.

Towards evening Trijata sang softly two lines she had learned at home: “Though the drop of dew may never last till morning, the earth remembers thirst; the hand stretched out within the darkness keeps the warmth that is its own.” It was no prophecy. Trijata herself said that a song could not disclose the state of a battle. For the first time in many days, Sita managed a faint smile at the last note. She had found no assurance in the song, only the presence of another human being seated beside her. The struggle beyond the grove was not diminished by that companionship. But within the decisions she must make, there was a little less room for the unsupported certainties of others.

In contemporary Videhapur, on the following morning, Amala Sarbariya was untying a knot of red thread on an office veranda. On the corner of a page returned with yesterday’s application, the wrong name had been written beneath a blue seal. That single error had brought three different consequences to three families: assistance for one child’s schooling had been suspended; a second family had been asked to submit its labour register for verification once again; a third could no longer find its old receipt number in the queue. Amala had brought the papers together in one bundle, but had made a separate inner cover for each. She would not allow the convenience of a collective petition to erase the individuals whose cases it contained.

The assistant sitting at the veranda table adjusted his spectacles. “There are slight differences in the letters of everyone’s caste name,” he said. “If we standardised them in one place, the work would be easier.” Amala drew closer. “We can discuss a standard form. But first tell us why one household’s correct name was attached to another household’s account. Are you going to correct an error, or exchange the people themselves?” The employee turned the page. The application number was right, but a letter had been cut from the name on the computer-generated list. A young man sitting near Amala had come to the office from his business selling lantern oil. He had no assurance that he could take another day off. He wrote down the fare he had spent on the journey there.

Amala read the joint petition aloud before them all. This time its lines disclosed no one’s private family circumstances. The principal demands were a separate comparison of the original handwritten entries with the printed copies, written reasons for any alteration to an individual record, and preservation of the original date of receipt for every application previously returned. The assistant warned that submitting a collective list might cause the earlier applications to be entered afresh at the end of the queue. Amala refused. “Our time has already been spent. You cannot call the months lost through your error a new application and set the count back to zero.” She prepared two copies of the petition, handed one to the office, and required the time of receipt and an official seal upon the other.

The dispute was no longer merely about letters. A ward representative offered to sign on behalf of them all, so that the women would not have to come back repeatedly. Amala did not refuse his assistance, but drew a boundary around his authority. “Come with us. Help us make copies. But if we are each writing our own names, you must not put down one signature in place of all of ours.” The representative was uncomfortable. Then he volunteered instead to take the papers to the photocopying centre himself. Amala recorded the time, the cost of the copies, and the day of their return. No record was corrected that day. A written order was issued, however, to locate the list from which the error had arisen, and the former places of all three families in the receipt sequence were provisionally protected.

Hira Meche arrived in a small room behind the same office, carrying a folded copy. A document beside which he had earlier caused the words “I did not understand the language” to be written had now been sent to him again. Showing him his signature on the copy, a contractor’s representative claimed that he had already agreed to an alteration in the use of the community road. No one had previously read the proposal to Hira in his mother tongue. “This is my hand,” he said plainly. “But whether its meaning was explained to me is still to be established.” The representative asked mockingly, “Can the writing of a hand tell a lie?" Hira replied, "Why do you suppose that a mark made by the hand proves what the mind understood?"

A committee employee wanted Hira to sign a fresh form at once, declaring that he withdrew his earlier consent. Hira would not fill out that page immediately either. "Unless I am told what the first document was intended to do, what exactly am I withdrawing in the second?" he asked. The language assistant who had accompanied him was separately noting the date and the limits of the proposed work. A fan droned without ceasing in the little room; a dusty measuring cord lay beside the desk. Hira picked it up. "If the road is diverted through here, which way are my freight vehicles to reach my home? Where is that question written on this form?" He also rejected the suggestion that the cost of a written translation should be treated as another person's unpaid service.

The interpreter read the first page sentence by sentence. After a sentence concerning a "temporary trial of the route" came the words "no objection to long-term use." Hira remembered hearing the first sentence, but did not claim to know whether the second had been read to him. The contractor argued that both pages bore the same date. "The sameness of a date is not testimony that its meaning was understood," Hira answered. In the end, his written request to suspend implementation until a further hearing was accepted. This was not a complete cancellation: the validity of the earlier consent remained undecided. On his own copy Hira wrote clearly: "Disputed consent; verification of translation pending."

When Amala saw Hira on the veranda, she asked whether he needed copies made of his application. Hira smiled. "I will pay for the copies. But do not fold my case into your community's corrections of names." "That is exactly what I want too," Amala replied. Each kept the separate acknowledgement of receipt for their own papers. Amala's concern was with applications suspended because of altered letters; Hira's struggle was over the meaning attributed to his supposed consent. Recognising the difference did not weaken their support for each other. It prevented officials, for their own convenience, from registering every grievance under a single heading.

Nasima Shershahbadi came to the threshold of the new school with a box of bookbinding needles in her bag, for sewing torn edges of paper. She had undertaken a week's repair work for the school library and had also come to apply for admission for her adolescent daughter. The girl gazed at the alphabet chart hanging on the right of the new compound. "Mother," she asked, "will they hear the way I speak here and laugh at me again?" At her former school, some children had mimicked the sounds of her home language and laughed. Nasima offered no false assurance. "If they laugh, I shall write to the head of the school," she said. "I shall not advise you to abandon your education."

At the admissions window, the clerk began to pronounce Nasima's name and faltered. Two men standing behind her began imitating its last syllables.

Nasima turned straight towards them. “If you want to learn my name, ask me,” she said. “You need not keep mangling it for amusement.” The children waiting in the queue fell silent. The clerk explained that the register allowed only a limited set of letters for names. Nasima showed the difference between the form written in her household and that in an older government copy, making clear which page required which correction. She asked that the original pronunciation of the girl’s name be retained in a note in the admissions register, so that it could be reconciled with the official form used by the education department.

The headmistress called her into the office. Nasima first showed her a book from the library with its binding broken. “You would not throw this book away merely because it is torn,” she said. “Nor should you dismiss the labour of understanding a child’s language as a ‘problem’ to be removed.” The headmistress explained that the rules required a transfer certificate from the girl’s previous school, and that the certificate had not yet arrived. Nasima asked how her daughter’s attendance would be safeguarded in the meantime. They agreed upon written interim permission: the girl could sit in class from the following week, while the final admissions entry would depend upon verification. The written complaint about mockery of her language was also registered separately. No child was publicly named as responsible before an inquiry.

On the school veranda, the daughter wrote her name herself for the first time on a trial page of the register. Nasima did not move her hand over the letters to alter them. She also asked the hours of the evening adult-learning class for herself. The skill of binding paper was her livelihood; learning to read the pages was a different education she wanted. The headmistress said that the class was presently meeting in a small room, and that the rules for formal enrolment still needed checking. Nasima took a form for herself without claiming that her studies had already begun. As they stepped outside, her daughter said, “Today I was given a place for one day.” Nasima replied, “Mark yourself present in that day’s place. I shall gather the papers that give you the right to the next.”

Meanwhile, at the room near the railway square, Naira and Kabir received Rafiq’s two-line phonetic transcription. The river-name spoken by a member of one family was “Sa-ura” (सउरा); an older official copy recorded “Saura” (सौरा). Someone had urged them to declare the two slips merely two settled spellings of the same word. Rafiq said over the telephone, “What I heard, I wrote as ‘Sa-ura.’ The other paper says ‘Saura.’ Their pronunciations may be related; I have not established that they refer to the same actual place.” Naira recorded separately the date of the original paper and the circumstances in which Rafiq had heard the name. A translator was commissioned to prepare a copy showing both readings, with the translator’s name and remuneration recorded.

“If the two names might be the same,” Kabir asked, “why not place a single mark on the map?” Naira slid the paper towards him. “Seeing the name of a river in a record and identifying a particular watercourse on a map are two different tasks. Do not slip the second into the folder for the first.” Rafiq added only that the date beside the river-name on the family’s travel document was incomplete, and that the issuing mark on the official page still needed examining. The agreed fee for language assistance at Simatirtha was a separate matter. Kabir struck “proven match” from the draft on his phone and entered “examination of variant readings.” The ink of the deletion had scarcely dried.

That day another name appeared in Binu Darai’s savings notebook: “Seer” (सीर). It was written along the edge of an old paper concerning her migrant earnings, connected with the place where payment for a consignment had been withheld. A relative suggested that the meaning of Seer might correspond to another river-name written farther down. Binu did not immediately answer. She brought out the remittance slip and looked at it: it gave a date, a sum of money, and the recipient’s name, but there was no map beside “Seer.” “It may be the name of a small place in its own right,” she said. “Do not attach it to another stretch of water and change the story of my withheld money.”

Binu made separate copies of both pages. Since the previous day she had been raising the question of a woman’s share of income sent to her family. Today she decided that, even before the spelling of Seer was settled, the party responsible for payment must give a written reply. Her mother-in-law sat in a corner peeling potatoes. “So much running about for a small name on a paper?” she asked. Binu answered, “If the name is wrong, the money may go the wrong way. But even when the name is right, the money will not arrive by itself.” Her mother-in-law took the notebook, examined the date, then gathered the potato peelings and said, “In that case, first write down the name of the person who owes it.” Binu wrote that name in its proper place.

At evening Naira gathered the reports from the three directions. Amala’s collective application had been received; the original register was under examination. The meaning of Hira’s consent remained disputed; a date for the renewed hearing was still to be fixed. Nasima’s daughter had interim permission to attend class; verification for final admission was pending. Rafiq’s bilingual copy of the river-name had been made, and “Seer” on Binu’s earnings paper had been kept separate. Kabir asked whether he might give them all one common theme. “In the news, ask the question they share,” Naira answered. “Who claims that another person understood? But do not tie all these papers into the thread of a single conspiracy.” The original file of the investigation into Mahesh’s murder lay closed and separate on that table. No new direct evidence in that case had emerged that day.

Before boarding the evening vehicle to look for the old list, an office employee telephoned Amala. He said that all the families might have to appear again to have the errors corrected. Amala was tired. At home she was tending a lit cooking stove, pushing the rice husks further into the fire. “First compare the copies of those families’ correct records that you already have,” she replied. “Call those whose signatures or testimony are needed, and give them a date. Do not make everyone abandon a day’s work and stand in line on the strength of a guess.” For the first time the employee acknowledged that the office ought first to count its own errors. Amala put down the phone and tended the stove’s heat. This time at home, too, was part of the price of her petition.

Hira paid his language assistant the first instalment of the translation fee, agreeing that the remainder would be paid after written verification. He knew that even if he lost at the new hearing, he would need a copy of the grounds for the decision. Nasima stitched a length of coloured thread to the edge of her daughter’s exercise book, so that she would recognise her own things at a distance on the first day. Before catching the night bus, Rafiq looked once more at the slip bearing the two spellings; Binu wrote the date on which she would demand her money beside the letter marked “Seer.” No single piece of news had brought relief to those four households. Each, however, had been able to choose the next small task that was theirs to undertake.

In the old Ashoka Grove the watch changed again at night. Trijata was walking towards the distant palace; she had not promised Sita that the truth would certainly be found before dawn. Sita touched the knot she had tied in the thread that day. She was resolute, but not at ease. Who said what to whom inside the royal household, and who would be made to pay for it—those answers lay outside the grove. For now she confined her resolve to this: she would call what she had heard something heard, what she had seen something seen, and what she did not yet know she would not give the shape of a verdict. For her, that interval was no surrender. It was the stern discipline of waiting.

Chapter 78 · Mandodari's Home

Before dawn, in the royal household of Lanka, Mandodari stood at the door of the provisions room. The rim of the bronze measure used for rice had split; she turned the vessel over to see whether grains had caught in the crack. More guards had been posted after the night's reports of battle, and the steward was saying that food must be saved for those inside. Mandodari first asked for the account book. How hunger was to be apportioned within a household had become, for her, a question to be faced before the royal command.

An elderly woman who distributed the meals said, "Your Majesty, those in the outer quarters whose family members have been wounded have been told that today they will receive half their share." Mandodari asked, "On whose orders?" The old woman had no answer: she had heard it said when the night watch changed. The steward declared that the city gates would remain shut, and that reducing everyone's ration was proper if the stores were to be protected. Mandodari told him to open his ledger. Yesterday's quantities stood unchanged against the plates of the royal family; opposite the names of the outer servants there were only empty lines. "If there is truly a shortage," she said, "begin the reckoning with my plate. An empty line will not satisfy anyone's hunger."

A guard's wife came inside to change the dressing on her wounded husband. The sentry stopped her, saying that nothing could leave without fresh permission. Mandodari ordered the supplies to be given to her, but also had the name of the treatment and the quantity entered in the record. The wife asked, "Will this writing get my husband his treatment, or will they question me all over again at the next change of watch?" Mandodari was silent for a moment before that question. Then she said to the steward, "Put a mark of receipt in this woman's hand. The command given in the royal household and the way a person is treated at its gate must not become two different things."

When Trijata entered the courtyard, the wakefulness of the entire night showed on her face. Mandodari called her into an inner room and asked, "What news was given to Sita?" Trijata said that accounts of the battle heard from a palace servant were spreading through the grove as settled truth. She herself had not gone to see the battlefield; she possessed no direct testimony from a soldier. "I told Sita precisely that," she added. "She said she would not pass judgment in her own mind on the strength of something no one there had seen." Mandodari listened to the answer in silence.

A young woman of the royal household, one of whose kinsmen had gone to war, asked impatiently, "Why does a captive woman need the true news?

She belongs to the side that has brought this calamity upon our house." Before answering, Mandodari made Trijata sit down and drink some water. "She did not come into this house of her own will," she told the young woman. "We cannot lay the blame for the war upon someone brought here by force. If I pronounce Ravana's decision innocent merely because of my relation to him, I shall inflict the harm upon everyone a second time." The young woman lowered her eyes, but her own fear did not lift. She said that every blast of the conch outside made her dread the death of someone she loved. Mandodari took her hand. She gave her no false promise of reassurance.

A little later a messenger came from the royal council. In the circumstances of war, he said, movement within the household was to be restricted, and the names of suspect servants kept apart. Mandodari asked what "suspect" meant. The messenger replied, "Those who ask too many questions." She felt the violence contained in the words. "A person's question is not a crime," she said. "If something has been witnessed against someone, record the event. The doors of this household shall not be closed to a person merely for asking."

She met Ravana that same day in an inner passage. He was hurrying towards the council chamber. "Sita is here," Mandodari said, "but bringing her here was not a decision made by all of us whose lives depend upon this household. Send her back. And do not punish with fear the families of those who went to war at your word." Ravana replied harshly that bending before an enemy would offend the dignity of the kingdom. Mandodari said, "If a kingdom's dignity is built upon keeping one woman prisoner, where in it is there room for the children of my house?" Ravana gave no answer. He went on down the passage.

Watching him go, Mandodari recognised the limits of her power. By issuing orders she could change the provision of medicine, food, and rest; she could not overturn the king's decision with her own hands. Returning inside, she summoned two women—an elderly distributor of food and another who carried messages to the homes of wounded soldiers. She told each to keep her own accounts. She assigned that responsibility not as a favour bestowed by the royal family, but as a right belonging to their work. If either chose to go outside, food would still be provided for her tired journey.

Trijata rose to return to the grove. Mandodari did not press her to stay; she asked what Trijata herself wished. "What I have heard," Trijata said, "I can report as something heard. But I will not take the count of grain I have seen inside this royal house and turn it into a report from the battlefield." Mandodari gave her two thin flatbreads and a small vessel of medicine. "Give them, by your own judgment, to whoever you see needs them. Do not proclaim an act of charity in my name." Within the inner household, at least, work had begun to fill the empty entries in the food register.

That same dawn, at the school in Videhapur, a sheet of paper lay half folded behind the glass of the noticeboard. When Asad Syed turned the key to open it, a mosquito trapped inside flew out. Beneath the name of the school the paper stated that, in the case of the missing child, information concerning a “suspect itinerant group” had been received from a local source. The sentence carried no receipt number, no name, and no date on which it had been checked against the school’s first notice. Asad remembered that the school had originally done no more than urge the administration to protect the child and act upon verified information. This harsher line had been added afterwards, by someone else.

At that hour Mohan Kanjar was fitting a strip of iron around the wheel of his handcart at the edge of the market. His first customer of the morning had turned back halfway along the road; another, who had ordered a wooden chest delivered to his home, had telephoned to ask that Mohan not bring the cart near his children. Hearing such fear spoken aloud made Mohan angry, but he did not abandon his cart in the middle of the road and begin shouting at people. He had kept the three repair slips he possessed on the day the first accusation was made. Now he was speaking for himself to each of the people who had originally issued them.

When Mohan went to the shop selling iron fittings near the bridge, the shopkeeper said, “I can put the date in writing, but how would I know when you went to the other market?” Mohan asked, “Show me the page of your sales ledger for the axle and pin you supplied for my wheel. That is what you actually saw.” The shopkeeper opened the ledger. Opposite one date were the price of the axle, the slip number, and the account of the payment. He gave Mohan a signed copy, but wrote no testimony about any time or place beyond his own knowledge.

From there Mohan went to Sajid Nat. The original footage of the school’s drama rehearsals was stored in Sajid’s camera; several children’s parents had already set limits on how it might be used. “My cart can be seen in the picture,” Mohan said, “but that picture is being used to circulate my name through the market. How can there be an investigation without spreading the whole scene abroad?” Sajid agreed to show the date of the original file and permit the school’s designated inquiry team to inspect it securely. “The children’s faces will not be made public,” he said plainly. Mohan agreed.

Lata also came to the school. Since returning from Simatirtha she had received two replies concerning the search for Mithun: in the old boathouse register, letters resembling “Mithua” appeared under a heading for boat equipment; there was still no basis for treating the word as a person’s name. Lata did not open her notebook before Asad. Instead she asked, “If you change that paper, will you remove the search for the missing child as well?” “We will not remove the search,” Asad answered. “We will separate it from the accusation made against a community without evidence." "I want the search," Lata said. "Not a cheer for the arrest of the wrong man."

The headmistress asked Asad for the school's original notice register. He showed her that the first public notice had been written on an attendance day and that its sequence was recorded in the school's dated ledger. The "local source" cited by the disputed sheet was named nowhere, nor was there written permission to use the image. "Then take this sheet down at once," the headmistress said. "It must be taken down," Asad replied, "but there must also be a public correction of what went out in the school's name. Removing a sheet from behind glass does not erase its words from people's telephones." The headmistress authorised him to prepare a corrected statement.

At the same meeting a parent objected. "A child is missing, and all you do is correct words!" Asad did not ask the parent to sit. He answered while they were both standing. "To find the child, we need times, places, and statements from those who actually saw something. If we choose a criminal by looking at a community, the search will go down the wrong road." Lata turned towards the parent. "My child's name is not a screen for your anger," she said. "Tell us what you saw; if you heard something, tell us where it came from." The parent had an audio message but admitted not knowing whose voice it was. The message was set aside for examination; it was not pronounced testimony.

Asad began to write the public statement. In its first line the school accepted responsibility for the false collective accusation published on its noticeboard. The second said that neither a blurred image nor anyone's community identity could establish an accusation of child abduction. The third asked people to give the appointed investigator whatever direct information they possessed about the child's whereabouts, including time and place. "Shall I write that Mohan is innocent?" the headmistress asked. Mohan himself replied, "Write that the basis of the accusation was false. You have not investigated every road I travelled that day. Do not issue a verdict on my whole life in my name, all at once."

The new statement was read outside the school. A young man displayed on his telephone an older, shortened video in which the false line from the paper was already travelling from person to person. "That will not disappear," he said. "No," Asad answered. "That is why the date of the correction and its full text must remain public too. Whenever someone shows the old line, there should be a way of showing them the new one." Mohan pushed his cart away. Some customers were still standing at a distance; a public statement could not, in a single instant, heal the wound dealt to his livelihood.

In the afternoon market, Kamlesh Khatik's bamboo chest had become damp, its lid left open. Inside he had kept, separately, a length of red tape bought for a stage, the cord used to fasten it, and two old bills. The previous day a trader had again said that a consignment containing red cloth resembled someone's suspicious goods, and that "the Khatiks" were involved in such trading. Kamlesh straightened the weighing scale standing at the shop entrance. "Cloth can be of the same colour," he said, "but where is the proof that its price, measurements, seller, and use are all the same?" The trader could say nothing definite beyond the colour.

Kamlesh brought out two pages of his accounts. One recorded the date on which the stage cord and tape had been purchased; the other recorded the carriage fee for delivering the materials to a school programme. The seller on the first bill and the recipient on the second receipt were different people. "These are the accounts of my goods," Kamlesh said, "not the truth about every consignment in the whole market. But it is unjust to attach everyone's name to an accusation without examining the goods in question." He also wanted the limits of confidentiality concerning his customers' names put in writing.

A member of the market committee looked at the figures and said that the purchase bill showed five yards, while the school's receipt showed four. Kamlesh unrolled a strip of cloth. "One yard of the edge was folded over for strength; four yards were used on the stage," he explained. Meera, who had carried the school's materials earlier that day, said that she had seen the number of bundles, not the measurements inside them. Asking for the school craftworker's measurement ledger, Kamlesh told her, "Do not say you saw what you did not see merely to support me."

The craftworker arrived before evening. His recorded measurements mentioned four yards in use and the remaining folded edge, but neither the colour of the thread nor the shop from which it had come. "Part of my purchase and its use can now be matched," Kamlesh said. "Do not place responsibility for some other unknown consignment in the market upon my head." The market committee's convenor accepted a copy of the individual purchase record and proposed in writing that the notice making the collective accusation be removed. The decision was deferred, because they still had to discover who had issued that notice. Kamlesh kept a copy of the postponement.

Meanwhile, Meera Banjara's sister was tightening the fastenings on four sacks of dried provisions on a small handcart. The name "Supain" appeared repeatedly in her old route notebook—sometimes as a customer's mark, sometimes beside a minor stopping place along the road. A new trader suggested that if every cart joined the same transport partnership for the week, carriage charges would fall. Meera had already agreed on two days' terms for consignments belonging to Sonmati and Niruk; her sister was unwilling to give up either her old customers or control of her own time. "The saving from a collective rate is not payment for closing my road," the sister said.

Meera opened her notebook to show the trader that the old entry marked “Supain” had a date beside it, but no authenticated map. “In my family’s accounts it is the name of a place along a route,” she said. “We cannot use that to make an official determination about the course of a river, a boundary, or a confluence. But it can help us look for a customer’s receipt.” Her sister quoted a separate carriage charge for her four sacks. The trader warned that anyone staying outside the partnership would pay a higher rate next time. “Write down the price,” Meera answered. “My sister will decide.” The sister did the reckoning, chose her own route, and obtained a written agreement on the carriage fee.

Under the awning outside lay Sonmati’s bamboo frame. Meera measured it and checked once more the two days committed to her own partnership; she did not add her sister’s cart list to her ledger. “Won’t keeping so many accounts separate lead to quarrels at home?” Sonmati asked. Meera laughed. “There will be a quarrel when one person’s earnings disappear under another person’s name.” Still tying the sacks, her sister said that when they returned in the evening, they would both eat a meal cooked on the same hearth.

At the office across the border, Ramvati Khatwe took two identity papers from her bag and placed them on the table, one after the other. One described her family of birth in one form; the other used a different spelling after her marriage. On the first day of examination, the officials had kept both originals for comparison; Ramvati had been left with only the deposit receipt. Today she had come to demand the return of the originals and a written reply concerning the error. The clerk said that the file was still open and therefore the papers should be left in the office. “If I cannot take my originals with me,” Ramvati asked, “how am I to prove who I am at the next place?”

On one of them the word “Santi” (साँती) appeared beside a reference to Ramvati’s first journey. The clerk guessed that it was a corrupted form of another river’s name, and that it would be best to correct it automatically. Ramvati stopped his hand. “That word is on my old paper,” she said. “First look at the original source: the place, the route, and the purpose for which it was written. Do not change my family’s identity merely because two sounds resemble each other.” She submitted an application asking that “Santi” be preserved as an independent archival entry. No one there had verified its actual geographical location.

The clerk said that returning the originals would leave the office’s inquiry incomplete. Ramvati showed him an alternative she had prepared: a copy certified in her presence, the page numbers of the originals, and a date of return recorded on the deposit receipt. “If you wish to investigate, keep authenticated copies. Why must the real papers I have guarded all my life remain shut in a room for an indefinite time?” she asked. A senior officer was called. After comparing the originals, he returned both papers to Ramvati, although the administrative reconciliation of her identities was still incomplete. On the acknowledgment she had the words “Originals returned” entered, not “Dispute resolved.”

Outside the door Ramvati sat down in the shade and first straightened the creases in her papers. She did not open in that office the old private letter Sarita had returned to her. On the telephone she told Naira only this: both originals had been returned safely, “Santi” remained a separate entry, and the correction application was still under examination. Naira wrote down the news but did not ask for the full address of Ramvati’s parental home. The day’s success was a limited one for Ramvati; sometimes the preservation of a limited right is enough to make the next struggle possible.

For the evening meeting in Videhapur, Naira, Asad, and Kabir sat at a narrow table. Asad set down three separate copies: the school’s original notice, the falsely added line, and the corrected statement. The slip from Mohan’s shop ledger and the conditions under which Sajid’s original recording might be examined remained separate. News of Kamlesh’s measurement register had come by telephone, but without a copy of the original Naira wrote “reported” in her notebook. “If we call all these papers a single story?” Kabir asked. “They may tell the story of one city,” Naira replied, “but that does not mean the causes of the offences are one and the same.”

Lata received a copy of the school’s correction. She read the entire page, then wrote beside one line, “The search for Mithun continues.” Asad asked whether this should be added to the school notice. “Let a notice keep to its own limits,” Lata said. “Give the dates of the search, the investigation schedule, and the next contact officer on a separate sheet. My son’s name must not become an exhibit in the correction of a false accusation.” She did not demand the right to inspect Sajid’s recording herself; she said that the designated officer should examine it with the proper permission.

As night fell, the new statement was placed on the school noticeboard. Instead of tearing up the old sheet, the school kept it in its record file marked “Incorrectly published copy.” Asad’s responsibility had not ended: he did not know how many telephones still held the old short video. Mohan’s dated slips had yet to go before the interim inquiry. The proposal to withdraw the collective accusation against Kamlesh still awaited signatures. Meera and her sister had chosen dates to deliver goods by two different routes; Ramvati had put her original papers back in her bag. Not every fear had been dispelled in anyone’s home. Yet that day some people had managed to keep their true names, their work, and their questions separate from other people’s guesses.

Chapter 79 · The Resemblance of Faces

At dawn, beneath the railway bridge in Videhapur, Sarayu was shaking out a wet mat. The night's rain had soaked so deeply into its layers that, each time she shook it, a muddy stream ran from its edge. Janaki was separating the ashes from the cooking hearth. Just then Sarayu's granddaughter came towards them, covering the screen of a phone with her finger. “Is this a picture of my grandmother too?” At the child's question, Sarayu let the mat fall. On the screen two blurred women's faces had been pasted side by side: the first cut from an old scene at the forest gate, the second taken somewhere behind a goods vehicle. Underneath were the words: “Look, this is the same group taking away another child.” In the second picture it was not even clear whether the shape was a child or a sack.

Janaki took the phone into her own hands but did not let the girl look at it again. She had read the school's written correction the previous evening. It withdrew the false accusation against the group; yet now, with a new comparison, the old fear had returned. “Who has the right to measure my face?” Sarayu asked. Janaki replied, “Who gave the person holding a cropped picture that right? But what we need now is an answer from the originals of both pictures, not from our anger.” Two young men in the group urged her to seize the phone. Janaki stopped them. Confiscating one phone would not erase the copies already spread abroad.

Naira was standing at a shop near the railway square, about to buy tea. As soon as Janaki's message arrived, she left the tea and came. Sarayu's first question was, “Will you print my name in a document again?” Naira answered, “If you do not wish it, we will publish neither your face nor anything identifying your home. But we shall draft a correction of the false charge with your consent.” Janaki set out her own wishes separately: no new photographs; an answer to the public accusation at a public meeting; and no removal of the file on Mithun's disappearance from the investigation to which it belonged. Naira agreed. She noted when and to whom the two pictures were now being circulated, but did not assume that the creation time shown on a phone was the time of the event.

Sajid Nat arrived at the school office with his camera and a small, old memory card. His first recording was of a rehearsal for the school play, showing Mohan's handcart and a red curtain. The second was an old recording of travellers at the forest gate, whose original was on the phone of the young man who had filmed it that evening. Sajid did not know whether today's composite image had been cut from that recording. “I can show you what my camera recorded,” he said. At a table inside, Asad Syed set out three documents separately: the school's first notice, the false accusation that had been published, and the correction issued yesterday. None of the three required anyone's face to be displayed.

The young man brought his original phone. He feared that everyone would turn him into a criminal. Janaki said, “You have already acknowledged that you made a recording at the forest gate. If you do not know who added the false caption, say that you do not know. But do not name anyone merely by claiming that the footage you have matches the second picture.” He played the entire original recording. It showed the wet gate, Durga's bundle of bamboo, Tulsi's grain cart, and two families from Janaki's group passing through in the evening light. There was no incident of a child being seized in that recording, nor was there the new image of a goods vehicle that had subsequently circulated.

At the meeting a man said, “But the face is exactly like Sarayu's. How can comparing faces be false?” Meera Mandal approached him. “If the resemblance is so exact, specify the particular feature being compared,” she said. “The cloth over the head, the angle of the nose, the stoop of an elderly body—is that enough to declare two people one and the same? In the example of the gavaya, a resemblance described by another may offer a way to recognise an object. But here, to identify a person, we need the date, the place, an unbroken recording, and independent testimony.” Meera had discussed upamāna, knowledge through comparison, in the children's classroom before. Now she understood that a lesson's example could not, by itself, prevent public humiliation unless the work of establishing evidence was done as well.

Padma took responsibility for tracing the original of the second picture, but made it clear that she had no right to open the entire contents of anyone's private phone. A market trader who had forwarded the circulating image showed her only an older message containing that image, captioned “unloading goods.” The trader claimed the photograph had been taken two days earlier. “Were you the one operating the camera?” Padma asked. He said he was not. “Then we must see the original held by the person from whom you received it,” she said. The trader grew afraid before naming his source: he too might be held responsible for the false accusation. Janaki said, “Do not make the name public. Let the investigators obtain the original.”

By midday word came that the picture was from an old loading yard beside the cattle enclosure at Sukathi. A woman unloading goods had a brightly coloured cloth wound around her head; seen on the small screen, she had been called Sarayu. The woman did not consent to the public release of her real name. She was prepared to give her account directly to the designated investigator, for the picture was now damaging her own livelihood as well. “Do not turn my face into a means of excusing another woman's supposed wrongdoing,” she said. “That would be wrong too. Look at the day I worked, the unloading receipt, and what the photographer says. Correct the error wherever it lies.”

The photographer of the original picture was found near the old thatched shed of the cattle enclosure. On his phone was a short, unbroken recording: baskets being unloaded, empty sacks folded, the woman wiping the sweat from her forehead with her own headcloth. Beyond the doorway stood a new weighing scale, and the enclosure's bookkeeper produced the receipt for its installation. The date was checked not against the bookkeeper's assertion alone, but against the labouring woman's hire receipt and the sequence of the original recording. The scene was not the evening incident at the forest gate; neither did it show a child being taken away. Nevertheless, the source of the composite image—the phone on which the two faces had been joined—remained to be investigated.

On the meeting paper Naira wrote one word: “Resemblance.” Underneath she wrote: “Not identity.” Padma added that correcting this error of identification from an image did not amount to establishing every fact about either woman's life. Sarayu said bitterly, “You are all writing things down, but when will my granddaughter go back to school?” Meera gave the time of the next day's class and asked the girl's mother which route would be safe. Janaki said the families themselves would decide the children's route; under the school's rules, their names must not be removed from the class register.

That same evening, before the hearing on the fish-market contract, Vinod Kevart was drying old weighing slips that had stuck to the market boards. Since morning, the smell of fish and water from melting ice had been rising in his stall. The wholesale contractor's vehicle stood in the shade, while the small sellers' baskets sat in the sun. Vinod's daughter tapped the base of a basket with a bamboo sliver and asked, “If they write down our names, will we get some shade?” Vinod said, “Our names are on the application; a share has not been granted yet. Today we must make the question of that share clear.” He put the water-soaked slips in a separate bag, as though rescuing accounts that had been running away from him for months.

The committee secretary first read the old contract aloud: the contractor would pay a deposit and, in return, have priority in choosing spaces. Small sellers appeared under a column marked “incidental charges.” Vinod asked how many people were meant by “incidental.” Phulmati Tiyar had taken an hour off from her work on fishing nets to attend. With her were two young women who received separate wages for cleaning and selling fish. “Baskets are sold in my name too,” Phulmati said, “but making nets is paid labour. When deciding who has a share in the market, do not treat the purchase price and the payment for work as the same thing.” The secretary at first objected to writing down so many names. Four separate slips obliged him to pause his pen.

The contractor said that he paid for repairs to the market's drain and roof himself. Vinod did not deny the expenditure. “Show us the repair bills,” he said, “and tell us which account receives the daily fees paid by the small sellers. If we contribute to the costs of the contract, why are our names absent from the facilities it provides?" The contractor laughed. "Will you people open a separate market of your own?" Phulmati answered, "If we did, we would have to arrange the customers' approach, the weighing facilities, and the disposal of refuse all over again. We want rules for our rightful share here."

Vinod displayed four columns in his own accounts: fish bought at dawn, carriage, market-board rent, and the day's spoilage. For the first time the committee understood that the small sellers were not demanding a share under the name of profit; they were asserting a claim to the money remaining after their expenses had been deducted. One member proposed allocating two corners of the permanent shade by lottery. Before agreeing, Vinod asked, "Will only those who pay a wholesale advance be allowed into the draw, or those who pay a daily fee as well?" Instead of answering, the secretary looked at an empty line on his paper. A new category would have to be written there.

A young fish seller said, "I come for two hours a day. If I must pay a whole day's market-board rent, there will be less food at home." The contractor replied that separate accounting for two hours would be difficult. Vinod showed an old record of a half-day's sales, but did not present it as an established rule. The committee accepted a proposal to identify three boards for part-time spaces on a trial basis for one week; final approval of the measurements, cleaning arrangements, and fees was still pending. Vinod and Phulmati took a copy of this partial written decision. Neither called it a complete victory.

Along the market road came Gita Kori with folded fabric samples tucked under her arm. She did not stop at Vinod's hearing. She had arranged to speak with a fellow loom worker across the border to reconcile the company's outstanding payment. Urmila Rajak had earlier been careful not to confuse the colour of Gita's cloth with the sample of hospital linen. Gita now carried the note recording that comparison and the company's original order, tied separately in a piece of cloth. Stepping onto a stone, she remembered for an instant the clatter of her loom. Remembering the length of a bolt of cloth was easy; counting the buyer's deferred promises was harder.

The call with Saraswati, her fellow weaver across the border, began with a silent picture message. Saraswati could read the company's letter in Hindi, but recorded her loom's daily wages in Maithili and in the language of her home. She first sent Gita two questions: did the delivered cloth match the weave sample specified in the order, and had the company's mark been placed on the selvedge with the weavers' consent or without asking them? Gita spread out her mother's old measuring cord and replied, "The measurements match. I did not authorise the label. But changing a label alone will not cancel the money still owed."

When the company's local representative arrived at the meeting, he said that part of the cloth had not been sold and that therefore the entire payment had been withheld. Gita said, “The sales ledger will show what happened to the unsold goods. My terms for wages were written down earlier—when I handed over the cloth.” Opening her account book, she showed two separate heads: the cost of buying yarn, covered by the company's advance, and the weaving time for which Gita and her companions were owed their own wages. Saraswati sent a copy of her document by phone, recording receipt by the purchaser across the border, but the authenticity of the signature still had to be verified. Gita marked it “copy of receipt received,” not “payment confirmed.”

The representative asked, “Will involving people from across the border help this business?” Gathering up her measuring cord, Gita said, “Listening to the person whose hands sent the goods and the person who received them is not the ruin of commerce. I shall neither pressure my fellow worker to become a witness nor declare every bolt of the company's cloth stolen property.” Saraswati agreed to file a written claim under the rules of her own country, but stipulated that the customer's private name must not be disclosed publicly. All three parties then agreed in writing to exchange dated copies of their accounts. No money had been paid; but the questions of who owed the wages and who must carry out the examination no longer went unnamed.

On her way home, a cart driver showed Gita Yusuf's detained bundle tied with red cord. “This is cloth too. Might it belong to your company?” he asked. Gita read the label from a distance but refused to touch the bundle. “A similarity of colour, a similarity of vehicles, and the name of the material—none of these makes it my cloth,” she said. “The owner of those goods must open the original records. What is owed to me cannot stand in place of what is owed to someone else.” She saved the message Saraswati had sent for the next day's hearing; its full contents were not to appear in any news report without Saraswati's prior consent.

At the eastern edge of the market, Farida Qureshi was lifting the lidded chest of her meat stall. For ten days other sellers had been saying that the food at her shop was unhygienic and that no one should buy goods from “Qureshi people.” Some echoes of the school's false accusation had reached the market, but no one could say clearly which customer's complaint had begun this boycott. Farida's customer numbers had fallen. Rather than go begging for justice at someone's doorstep that day, she had submitted a written application to the municipal health inspector.

When the inspector arrived, Farida did not shut her shop. She showed him the clean water, the vessel for washing implements, the covers, and the arrangements for keeping goods cool. The inspector produced his thermometer and sanitation checklist. He said that the inspection would be judged by prescribed standards; community names and rumours were not items on the form. Farida replied, “If you find a fault, write it down and I shall put it right. But the rules for inspecting all the shops around me must not be turned into a finding against me merely because of my caste or religion." She also asked for an official receipt for the inspection fee.

One customer said that something bought there yesterday had smelled unpleasant. Farida did not interrupt him. "Write down when you bought it, what kind of goods they were, and where they were kept," she said. The customer could not recall the whole day, but thought the purchase had been made sometime after noon. The inspector recorded this as a complaint, not as a finding from his direct inspection of the shop. He found that a cleaning strip in one corner of the chest needed replacing. Farida replaced it immediately and entered the date of the correction on the inspection sheet. That small fault did not justify the general boycott.

The president of the market association said that a boycott was a matter of people's personal choice. Farida objected. "Whether a customer chooses to buy is that customer's affair. But if the association labels my shop 'bad' without an inspection and tells everyone not to come here, that is no longer preference. It is an organised accusation." She asked the president to show the old notice. The paper bore no testing date, no sample of the product, and no signed complaint. The president would not himself agree to remove it. Another member proposed waiting for the formal inspection report before deciding.

On the inspector's preliminary form some arrangements were marked satisfactory, one improvement was required, and the laboratory result for the sample was still pending. Farida accepted that limited conclusion. When a journalist called, she refused to say, "My shop has been declared entirely blameless." "Give them only what the report says so far," she said. "I have corrected the fault that was found; the rest of the examination is unfinished. Let those who issued the boycott order show the grounds on which they did so." Two shopkeepers in the association favoured removing the collective-boycott notice before the next meeting, but the president's signature was still missing.

The public hearing that evening took place beneath the broad-canopied tree at the railway square. Janaki wanted only adult representatives seated there: no child's face, name, or stopping place on the journey was to be spoken of before the crowd. Padma began by reading out the origins of the two images and a list of their cropped portions. The original forest-gate recording concerned an old dispute over passage in the evening; the other original showed goods being unloaded in a loading yard. Neither established Mithun's presence or showed a child being taken away. Sajid again insisted that the photographs from his play be kept separately; its red curtain had previously been described as suspicious cargo.

A young man asked, "If the two original pictures are different, who is guilty?" Naira said, "What I can state now is that the accusation against Janaki's group based on these faces was unverified and wrong as a public allegation. Discovering who joined the two pictures is a separate investigation. And if you have facts concerning Mithun, take them to the office where the first report was registered." Lata came to the hearing, but did not recite the description of her son's clothes once again in front of the crowd. She asked, "Now that the old confusion has been dispelled, has a date been fixed for the next step in the search for my child?" A worker at the help desk answered by giving her a written time.

Janaki said, "Withdraw the words 'child stealers' from the accusation against our group. Do not merely write 'there may have been a misunderstanding' and leave everyone under suspicion again." The school's headmistress, Asad, and the market representative prepared a joint correction. It stated plainly that the available viral images and the purported match between faces did not constitute evidence linking Janaki's group to the abduction of a child; the accusations made on that basis were withdrawn. The investigators' separate missing-person file would remain open. Janaki listened to the whole text and signed it, but did not consent to publication of all the members' names together.

Sarayu sat silently beneath the tree. Someone said, "Surely you feel relieved now?" Pointing to the fold of her wet mat, Sarayu answered, "Earlier, strangers in the market would ask the price of my wares. These past few days they have seen my face and turned away. The paper has been put right—but when will the buyers' eyes be put right?" Janaki rose with her. They themselves decided to go to another market at dawn; no one would determine their travelling route in the name of sympathy. Meera set the children's writing board firmly in place once more.

That night Naira opened her notebook to three sections. In the first was the written retraction of the false public accusation against Janaki's group; in the second, the time-bound next steps in the search for Mithun; and in the third, the separate claims and disputes of the market—Vinod's provisional board, Gita's unpaid wages, Farida's unfinished inspection. Looking at the register, Kabir asked whether the fact that fish and cloth were sometimes carried by the same vehicle might reveal a connection. Naira said, "To investigate a possible connection, we shall request the vehicle's loading slips. Shared wheels do not mean a shared crime." Yusuf's bundle with the red cord still had not been opened.

As Janaki served the evening meal, she called her granddaughter to sit beside her. The little girl asked, "Is Grandmother's face Grandmother's again?" Sarayu smiled. "My face was never anybody else's," she said. "Other people put the wrong name on it in their papers." Far away, the railway wheels clattered. At Lata's home a covered plate was still waiting for her child; a new date for the search had been written down, not an answer. That night Janaki packed the belongings for her group's next journey. The struggle to reclaim one's identity and the search for a missing child could go on together, without either swallowing the other.

Chapter 80 · The Weaver's Second Ledger

At dawn Yusuf Ansari was bent over his loom, joining a broken thread of the warp. As he pressed the tiny knot with his fingernail, he heard a vehicle outside, but did not raise his head. After returning from the market the previous night, a customer had asked for his white length of cloth back. The man had grown frightened on hearing that even genuine merchandise had been detained because of another bundle tied with red cord. Yusuf had already spent the customer's advance, and before going to sleep he had stitched a second, thin ledger into the middle of his old account book. On the first page were the measurements of cloth woven, credit taken for thread, and wages; on the second, the carriage of the detained consignment, the shop's stamp, accusations received, and the cost of the inquiry. All night the two pages had lain pressed against each other, but the goods recorded on them were not the same.

Before leaving for the training room, his son put his small bag of tools in the courtyard and asked, “Abba, why have you sewn two accounts together? Earlier you had written the bundle with the red cord down separately.” Yusuf said, “Writing them separately and proving that they are separate are two different things. I must open a way for what I wove to reach its customer. I must stop what I did not weave from being sold in my name.” His son showed him the first photograph of the cloth on his phone. He said that if the photograph included the mark of the join at the edge and the date, comparison would be easier. Yusuf accepted the suggestion, but said the photograph should assist the account, not take the place of touch. His son did not leave without drinking his tea; his mother had put bread in his bag.

Urmila Rajak came and stood outside the shop. In her hand was not a count of the hospital sheets she had washed, but a receipt from her own washing place. “If everything loaded onto one vehicle is given a single name, my washing will be called theft too,” she said. “Tell me which page is needed at today's hearing. I will write down the water and cloth work I actually saw; I will not say what was put onto the vehicle afterwards.” Yusuf urged her to submit only a certified copy of her laundry register. The two agreed to bring their original account books to the hearing and to surrender copies only against an officer's receipt. They also resolved to request written permission before anyone untied the red cord, and not to open the bundle before noon.

Three tables had been set up that day in the storeroom behind Sukathi's cattle shed: one to establish ownership of the goods, the second to compare transport slips, and the third to hear complaints. Naira had arrived early and prepared a list showing whose pages were to go to which table. Mahendra, the driver, had brought his damp transport slip in a plastic cover. “Because everything was loaded onto the same vehicle, they have made me the driver of one single crime," he said. "I can tell you where I stopped. How am I to know whether the cloth inside was woven or printed?" Instead of filling the blank spaces in his times from her own guesses, Naira told him to ask for the checkpoint entry register. It recorded the vehicle's arrival, not the origin of each load.

Once permission had been given to break the seal on the first bundle, Yusuf spread out the length of cloth. There, among the threads, lay the little earth-coloured join his fingers would have recognised even without seeing it. In the photograph taken by his son, a measuring tape had been placed beside the join. The customer's original order specified the width, length, and ordinary intended use; it said nothing about hospital approval. The customer who had come to testify produced his purchase slip and said that he had ordered the cloth for curtains at home. The officer asked, "Can you identify every join in the cloth?" "No," the customer answered. "I recognise my order and my advance payment. Let Yusuf explain the weaving." The limit of his evidence was recorded.

The second bundle bore the same shop stamp, but its white label carried an added assertion that the goods had been approved for hospital use. Shekhar, who had once traded with Yusuf, said, "Perhaps those words were written at the warehouse. No one meant to hurt anybody." A senior hospital employee, accompanied by the warehouse clerk, made it clear that the register produced contained no entry showing that an institutional approval letter had been issued for this particular consignment. He displayed not the hospital's records for an entire year but the relevant period and the letter-number entries. "I can say that I have not found an approval in this record," he said. "From this page I cannot say who printed the label, what cloth is inside the bundle, or whether all the hospital's other materials are secure."

Shekhar argued that every trader used marks resembling government seals. Naira asked him, then, by whose authority the word "approved" had been printed. Shekhar said that the instruction had come by telephone from the warehouse, but he could not remember the name. Yusuf asked that this claim be entered in the written statement: an account of a telephone call was not proof of an order. In the presence of the authorised goods inspector, two independent witnesses, and the custodian, the outer label, stamp, and weight of the bundle tied with red cord were recorded. It was not yet released for sale. The reason entered for its detention was "distribution under an unverified claim of approval," not "theft by Yusuf."

"When, then, will my genuine bundle be returned?" Yusuf's voice rose. The officer in charge of inspection said there was ambiguity in the joint transport slip: releasing the first consignment might make tracing the second harder. Yusuf laid his second ledger before him. "Your work is to investigate. Feeding my family is work too. If the grounds for detention do not apply to the first bundle, issue a written order for keeping it, and put your reasons in that order." The customer added that the workers waiting to hang the curtains at his home had been sitting idle because the cloth was late. The officer compared the two sets of pages again. The owner, measurements, and order for the first bundle had been identified; its journey in a shared vehicle was the only suspicious connection that remained.

Mahendra showed a photograph of a patch of lime that had remained on the floor of his vehicle. "Look at this," he said. "Both bundles were put in the same place." Yusuf replied, "The wheels and the floor shared a road; they did not share ownership." For the first time Mahendra openly spoke of his fear for his job. If he began issuing separate receipts for each consignment, the vehicle owner might deduct the extra cost from his hire. Vinod Kewart, who had come over a dispute about fees at the fish market, said, "Enter the cost of preparing separate papers under the transport charge. Don't leave the driver's shoulders bearing the blame for the goods." The officer recorded a temporary arrangement requiring separate loading numbers for future consignments.

Rahim Mansuri sat on the threshold of the hearing room, folding a mattress cover. He had been accused of hiding stolen hospital materials in a consignment of four sacks of fluffed cotton. On the previous occasion he had shown a register for the fluffing of seven mattresses, but three customers had taken their goods away themselves. Today he had brought a receipt written by the grandson of an elderly customer, the transport record for the four sacks, and a separate bill for new cotton. He did not bring his mattress into the middle of the table and tear it open. "It would not be right to rip apart the cotton and covering without the owner's permission," he said. "If you need a sample for evidence, call the owner."

A member hearing the complaint asked whether Rahim's sacks had not been seen at the turning behind the hospital. Rahim read out his appeal, in which the date of the accusation differed from the time at which his four sacks had been unloaded. Mahendra said he had driven until very late that night. He had stopped near the turning, but could not remember whether the sacks had been unloaded there. Rahim did not make this lapse of memory into proof that Mahendra was lying. He asked only that the objects, their owners, the labour, and the stopping places be examined as four separate matters. His appeal was received and attached to the complaint register. No final order withdrawing the accusation was made then.

From the doorway Rahim's wife told him over the telephone that customers' advance payments for cotton for new mattresses had diminished. Rahim assured her that the appeal had been filed; he did not say that business had returned to normal. His wife told him a decision she had made from her own accounts: beginning the following day she would accept small orders to restore the stuffing of old household mattresses, but she would not send merchandise by the vehicle under accusation until separate loading slips had begun to be issued. "This time the two of us will set aside the cost of the slips together," Rahim said. His wife replied, "The cotton dust goes up my nose too. Why should my name be absent when the expenses are decided?" Rahim fell silent and wrote her name in the margin of his copy of the appeal.

Sakina the dyer arrived when the sunlight falling across the dyed cloth was casting a green patch on the white wall. She opened two leaves of her sample book. The first recorded indigo; the second, a green-and-violet shade requested afterwards in writing by the customer. Between them were the washing time and the quantities used for dyeing the fabric again. The trader's representative said the bill had increased because she had made accounts for two orders. Sakina placed a small piece of thread in his hand. "There was one length of cloth, but the labour was done twice," she said. "I am not saying I sold two lengths. You are saying that the second dyeing somehow became free."

The date on the customer's written request for the change was clear, but the thumb impression upon it looked irregular. The representative questioned the impression. Sakina said she had herself heard the customer ask for the change, but that it would be proper to call the customer to verify the written consent independently. She did so. The customer acknowledged both the original order and the request for a different colour, but explained that there had been concern that the earlier dye would fade in sunlight. Sakina showed a half-length she had kept for testing. A whole season had not yet passed to establish the dye's long-term durability. Here the specimen was evidence of workmanship, not a guarantee of the future. Eventually the customer proposed paying part of the wages for the changed colour immediately and settling the balance on the test date.

"Does that mean the debt on the first bill is cancelled?" the trader asked. Sakina drew a vertical line in the margin of her account. "No. The old amount due, the price of the new dyeing, and the question raised about the quality of the colour are three matters. Record the disputed part as disputed; do not erase payment due for work that has been accepted." In the customer's presence she recorded the part-payment, adding the date for the balance and the limits of the objection. The customer took his copy away. Sakina opened her book again and saw that the sample of the earlier colour was safe between the pages. Preserving evidence had required no humiliation of the customer.

Meanwhile, at the Khatāl fish market, water from melting ice was running towards the feet of the weighing scales. The earlier decision to give Vinod three part-time stalls for a week was being put into practice today with a measuring cord. The contractor's accountant said that two stalls were unusable because of standing water. Phoolmati Tiyar arrived with a coil of fishing net tucked beneath her arm. "The water at dawn is not the water at noon," she said. "Putting down a cord once and declaring the place bad is not a measurement." Vinod took off his sandals and went to the water's edge. Mud was oozing from a corner of the drain, but no one had measured how deep it was.

An employee of the committee drove a slender reed into the mud to measure its depth. The readings differed at four points; at the first there was fine silt, and at the second the water from the ice had made the ground slippery. Phoolmati demanded that the cost of cleaning the market be recorded separately from the charge for using a stall. “Water from washing fish, rainwater, and water from melting ice may come from different places,” she said. “Look at the drainage before placing the blame on anyone.” Vinod pointed out two vendors who carried customers' credit slips home with them. If the market ground was measured incorrectly, the earnings of the part-time sellers on the following day would not be protected.

The contractor showed his bill: wages for digging the drain, carriage for removing silt, and repairs to the roof. Vinod said the bill had indeed been produced, but it did not account for the daily cleaning charges already collected from the fish sellers. The committee secretary recorded a decision to maintain the temporary stalls for one more week and arrange for an independent new measurement of the drain. Those four readings did not establish from whose field the silt had come or the full nature of the water body. Phoolmati wanted the names of two young women who sold fish for short periods to be entered in the stall list for their respective dues. Their signatures were collected; the contractor's final agreement was still outstanding.

Lakhan Satar was unloading wooden planks on the slope beside that market. He and two companions had repaired the temporary passage for movement after the rains the night before. In the proprietor's accountant's book, “voluntary community service” was written opposite all three names; yet the contract bill had charged separately for their labour that same night. Lakhan still bore a pressure mark on his forehead from lifting the wet planks. “We did the work for the community, and that is true,” he said. “But calling what we were promised charity in order to wipe it out is not right.” He did not merely want his own name corrected; he wanted his two companions' working hours recorded as well.

The proprietor said the replacement of the planks had been voluntary because everyone using the landing had benefited. Lakhan asked, “Then in whose name have you entered the wages on your bill?” The accountant said it was a general item in the contractor's bill, and no actual payment was necessary. From his bag Lakhan took out the weighbridge slip for loading the timber, bearing the time of entry that night and the warehouse mark. The slip established the time of the work, not the wage rate. Chandru and Bela, his companions, each said separately that the rate had been promised in their presence. Lakhan gave them an independent chance to put that testimony in writing; he did not write their voices down under his own name.

Bela disagreed with the proposal that all three should be entered as having worked an equal number of hours. “I unloaded the planks, but in between I went home to see my sick child,” she said. “My time was shorter; my share of the work was not. Record separately how long each person worked and what work each did.” Lakhan did not try to silence her. Before the accountant two kinds of reckoning were opened: hours and work performed. The old verbal promise about the rate lived in the separate memories of three witnesses, but no written acceptance of it had yet been found. Lakhan submitted the group's collective claim and applied for the entry “unpaid” in the wage register to be formally marked as disputed.

Gomati told a clerk who had come with her that the word “community” did not turn everyone into one labourer. Chandru's household expenses, medicine for Bela's child, and Lakhan's work loading planks were different matters. As the clerk wrote the names, he tried to leave Bela as no more than “Lakhan's companion.” “I have a name of my own,” Bela said. “I will tell what I heard, not Lakhan.” The accountant wrote down her name. It was decided that the proprietor's original bill and register would be produced on the appointed day. Until then the three would keep receipts acknowledging their testimony. No one announced that their wages had been paid.

After noon Naira, Yusuf, and Mahendra returned to the storeroom. The employee preparing the separate loading slip examined the proof of ownership for the first bundle and said the cloth Yusuf had woven could be released. Yusuf read the paper before doing anything else. By mistake it had been printed with the words “all associated goods released from inspection.” He refused to sign in the margin. “I want permission only for the number I wove on my own loom,” he said. The employee prepared the slip again, specifying the measurements of the cloth, the customer's name, the distinctive seal on the second bundle tied with red cord, and a separate statement that its detention remained in force.

Mahendra now encountered another difficulty. The vehicle owner said that the time lost in preparing separate loading slips would be deducted from Mahendra's daily wage. He went not straight to Naira but to Vinod. “You calculate the hire for stalls in the market every day,” he said. “Who will enter the hire of my time?” Vinod showed him an empty space on his own slip. Mahendra recorded separately the reason for the lost time, the actual waiting, and the vehicle owner's instruction. “Give the people who are fixing my share of the fish market this page as a separate matter,” Vinod said. “Do not let your wages be cut in the name of my dispute.” Mahendra had found a place for his own application.

As Yusuf was leaving with the first bundle on his shoulder, Sakina came up to him. “The cloth has been released,” she said. “And the second ledger?” Yusuf smiled. “The second ledger records expenses I have not recovered.” Sakina replied, “The old payment for my dyeing is still owed too. Making the right papers does not open a customer's purse by itself." Together they considered the question of the shared transport charge on the old vehicle. Yusuf said he would pay whatever transport charge was genuinely attributable to the first bundle; the cost of detaining the second should not fall on him without cause. Sakina would accept no deduction from the wages due for her dyeing. Both understood clearly the need for separate accounts for two lives that had travelled the same road.

When the first length of cloth reached the customer's home, a young woman of the household came into the courtyard carrying the measuring tape herself. As she measured the height of the curtains, she said, "My window is small. I shall keep the cloth left over for work of my own." Yusuf watched with pleasure as the fabric reached the use for which it had really been made. His son was returning from training. He saved the number of the new receipt on his phone, but told Yusuf, "You don't want the customer's private name published. I won't publish it." Yusuf answered, "Explaining the accounts of a piece of work and selling the story of everyone's home are two different things." For the first time his son did not photograph the second page of the ledger.

At dusk in Khatāl, Phoolmati and Vinod were marking a small bamboo board for the drainage of water. The two young women marked a place at their short-time stall, though it still had no permanent shade. "Two days selling nets and a week's place in the market will not meet a household's expenses for the whole year," Phoolmati said. "But once the rule is written, it becomes easier to ask questions later." Vinod's daughter watched the last piece of ice of the day slip into the water. "Is that ice water going into the river?" she asked. "I cannot say without checking where the drain leads next," Vinod answered. "All I can see with my own eyes is that this water is gathering in this hollow."

Before returning home, Naira looked at a separate page in the investigation file on Mahesh's murder. His name had not appeared in any original document at that day's commercial hearing. In Lata's notebook the next date for checking on the search for Mithun had been entered; nothing warranted sending the stamp on Yusuf's bundle as evidence in the search for the boy. Yet some names of stopping places on the transport slips appeared to match places along the route recorded in an earlier missing-person application. Naira entered this comparison as "a possible question for investigation." Goods and people travel along the same roads; that ordinary fact does not establish an abduction.

Yusuf opened his account books one last time. In the first ledger, part of the payment for the cloth delivered to the customer had now been entered. The debt for thread, his son's training fee, and the losses of the days gone by still remained. In the second were plainly recorded the identity of the detained bundle, the hospital's limited document concerning the absence of approval, Shekhar's incomplete statement, and the date of the next inspection. Yusuf did not write “crime proved” beside anyone's name. A night wind entered beneath the roof of the loom shed. With thin lengths of cord he tied the two ledgers separately. Behind that separation, a way had opened for someone's innocent merchandise to move, while a sale made under another's unverified claim of approval remained stopped.

Far away, the lamps at Khatāl were going out one by one. The fish sellers lifted their baskets and turned homeward; they would meet again at dawn to settle the next measurement and allotment. In her house Lata sat touching the fold of the first kurta Mithun had worn; today she had received no more than confirmation of a fixed time for the next inquiry. Among the transport slips Naira had kept apart, one question remained: in whose name had the unverified stamp of approval been placed, and who had actually sent the goods? An examination of the merchandise might answer that question. There was no basis, however, for saying that the answer concerning the missing child would be the same. On the road that had once seemed one undifferentiated darkness of suspicion, at least two separate directions could now be discerned; the people concerned still had their work to do, each along their own way.

Chapter 81 · The Child in Another Place

That morning the tea-seller was cleaning not the glass of his little oil lamp but one leg of his table. The corner of a slip wedged beneath the leg had grown damp; as soon as he pulled the paper free, the table began to wobble. Naira stood waiting for her tea. Her attention fell on a half-effaced phrase in blue ink—“Next Stop.” The tea-seller hastily gathered up the paper. “An old bus-fare slip, sister. It was helping to keep the table level.” Naira left him to it. There was dust upon the road, the smell of raw milk in the air, and beneath the rear wheel of a bus the morning sky lay reflected upside down in a puddle. Not every scrap of paper here was a clue; but today Lata was coming to this very bus stand to meet someone.

When Lata arrived, it was not Mithun’s maternal uncle who accompanied her, but Kamli, an elderly neighbour. She had stayed awake all night to write down once more the measurements of the blue kurta Mithun had worn, though today she did not take the paper out. A message had come from the local help desk: in records recovered during the search for another child, a contact location at the bus stand had been found. The information explicitly said that this lead did not establish Mithun’s whereabouts. Lata lingered over that line. “If the news is about another child, why have you called me here?” she asked. Naira said, “Because a witness says the office of the intermediary whose name you heard last time used to be on this road. But it is a name heard from someone else. Coming here does not mean accusing anyone.”

At the rear entrance of the bus stand stood two officials, a child-protection worker and a woman clutching a small red bag. The woman was Chameli. Her twelve-year-old daughter, Gunja, had left home eleven days earlier and not returned. An acquaintance of the family had said there would be an opportunity for education together with some light work, but Chameli had given no written permission. She had first looked for her daughter among relatives in the neighbourhood; a missing-person report was filed four days later. Today she had received confirmation of the place where her daughter was, though the formal process of bringing her safely home was still under way. “I haven’t come to seize anybody,” Chameli said. “I want to know who prevented my daughter from coming back of her own free will.”

The child-protection worker first made it clear that Gunja’s statement would not be read aloud at a public table. An investigating officer placed papers along the edge of a separate copy. Gunja had been found in a sewing room where the attendance register called her a “new assistant” instead of using her name. The dates in her own account, the room’s entry register and the two stage-by-stage receipt slips issued from the bus stand corresponded. On the first slip a signature recorded that she had been handed over to an adult as an “assistant”; on the second was an acknowledgement of receipt by the person responsible for the sewing room. No document was found establishing the child's consent or her guardian's permission. The officer had secured the original register; examination of whose signatures on the copies were genuine was still pending.

"Then trafficking has been proved?" Lata asked in a single breath. The officer replied, "We have a first corroborated sequence showing a child taken from one place to another for labour without her guardian's permission. In her statement she says she was not allowed to go home. On that basis a criminal investigation has been opened. Who played what part, who used deception, and whose guilt will be established in court—those are still separate questions." "And Mithun?" Lata asked. The officer answered plainly, "Mithun's name does not appear on either slip. At present there is no basis for connecting him with the children in that room." Lata lowered her face but remained standing.

Chameli opened her bag and showed the old school exercise book she had brought for her daughter. Along one margin Gunja had embroidered a flower in blue thread. "She knew how to sew, so everyone will say she must have gone to work of her own accord," Chameli said. "Wanting to learn to sew and wanting to be kept shut away in a strange place are not the same thing." The child-protection worker said Gunja had spoken clearly on precisely this point: she wanted to learn to cut cloth, but she had never agreed to leave school or place her earnings in another person's hands. Gunja had also asked to see a teacher she knew. The officer recorded that request as a need relevant to the child's rehabilitation, not as evidence to be used in someone's speech.

The person Lata had heard they were searching for had once occupied premises in the lane east of the bus stand. There was no nameplate on the door, only four marks where adhesive had been. Inside were a torn stack of cash-receipt forms on a table and an old chair. The owner said the office had been rented and its tenant had left two days earlier. "Where has he gone?" Lata asked. "I don't know the address," the owner said. "Even the final instalment of rent is outstanding." Naira asked permission to examine the owner's tenancy register. The document contained a contact name, but the last two digits of the telephone number were blurred. She did not propose treating the owner as a witness to a crime merely on the strength of that name; a request was made for the original register to be lawfully examined through the investigating officer.

Lata went inside and touched the chair once with her hand. "Could Mithun have sat in this chair?" The question escaped her without deliberation. Naira did not invent an answer. Kamli, silent until now, said, "Chairs can be the same colour, and a child's path still be different. I don't want someone to search for my grandson's name here and write it in without proof." Lata looked at her. It brought tears to Lata's eyes to see how carefully the old woman guarded the right to speak Mithun's name, not merely her own. In her notebook she wrote down the office's location and beneath it added, "No evidence of his actual presence."

As they came out of the lane, a bus employee stopped them. He said that a few days earlier he had seen a thin girl with a man, carrying a sewing bag. An officer took him aside and asked when. First he said Tuesday, then Wednesday evening. When the vehicle register was examined, he admitted that he could not remember the day with certainty. Hearing a description of Gunja's clothes, he said, "Yes, something like that. It must have been her." Chameli hurried forward. The child-protection worker intervened: "Tell us first what you saw. Do not add what you heard today to your memory of what you saw then." His statement was recorded as "possible sighting; date uncertain."

While the officials were gathering their papers, a small group of three labourers came up from behind the bus stand. In Kedar Bauri's hand was not a wooden plank but an old work-time slip. With him were Jugal, Phulwa and Shambhu—the people who had repaired the relief veranda and whose wages had been withheld under the name of "service." For days Kedar had been collecting separate accounts of each person's hours, tasks and agreed rate. Today they had come to submit their collective claim at the contractor's temporary office. Seeing the police at the stand, Shambhu began to draw back. "They'll ask for our names and addresses again," he said. Kedar replied, "Standing behind a wage claim is not the same as standing in a line of accused persons."

Lata recognised Kedar. Last time, as he repaired a broken plank in the relief room, she had seen blisters on his palm. "When you were working with the contractor's men, did you ever hear anything about that intermediary?" she asked. Kedar did not close his ledger. "I have heard the name," he said, "but I do not know whether my contractor and the person who took the child away are the same man. We must not make taking workers to a job and taking a child without permission the same thing merely by using the same words." "I asked for a name, not to declare anyone guilty," Lata said regretfully. Kedar replied, "Good. Then let us keep each other's papers safe from being mixed together."

At the sight of the collective claim, the contractor's accountant said the work had been done voluntarily during the flood. In her account Phulwa had recorded the hour when they had lifted the panels of the sinking veranda. "The food in the relief room was free," she said, "but no one asked us to give our sweat for nothing. Jugal, Shambhu and I all heard the agreed rate." The accountant said there was no such rate in his register. Kedar answered at once, "That is why we have brought our papers. If our names are missing from the register, we want to see the register. Do not turn us all into one labourer by writing 'migrant'." Shambhu gave a tally of working days two fewer than Phulwa's. The collective claim recorded that difference instead of concealing it.

The accountant proposed paying a small lump sum if they would withdraw all their papers. Jugal wanted to agree immediately. A message about medicine had come from his home. Phulwa objected. “How much of whose dues will this money be taken to settle? Once we sign, will every remaining demand be closed?” Kedar pushed the document forward. “No one will make a quiet settlement in all our names.” In the end the accountant gave the offer in writing and entered their application in the receipt register. Kedar did not treat the offer as payment; he added a separate request for an advance to meet Jugal’s immediate need. The dispute over what was owed remained alive, but its reckoning was no longer left to the air.

At that moment a young man, seeing the labourers, said that the office behind the bus stand arranged employment and that perhaps news of the girl could also be found there. Kedar stopped him. “Let the investigators examine the number we were given for work. It would be wrong to call everyone who offers work the same intermediary without checking.” Naira did not take an informal copy of Kedar’s slip. He authorised an official comparison of the number, on condition that the full particulars of their wage claim remain outside the inquiry. The officer made a separate acknowledgement. The care taken over this gave Lata the sense that the search was climbing another step, but to leap without a foothold remained dangerous.

On the other side of the stand, Durga Gangai was setting down her basket. In the past, a large trader from the market would take her mixture of makhana and flattened rice on credit and never return with a proper account. Today she had come not with little packets but with two bags of different weights. The gingery fragrance of makhana and the warmth of roasted flattened rice were unmistakable amid the dust of noon. The old trader’s accountant called out, “Nothing for us?” “The earlier debt is written down,” Durga said. “From now on I shall supply this consignment against an agreed price in advance. I will decide the limit of your credit myself.” The accountant turned away and went to another shop.

The new buyer Durga had come to meet ran a small team delivering tea and food around the bus stand. When Rukhsana first tasted her mixture, she had asked how much salt it contained. Now she asked about customers’ preferences and how long it would keep without spoiling. “My customers have long journeys,” Rukhsana said. “If the flattened rice goes soft in a damp bag, why should I pay the price?” Durga opened two lidded samples. One had been sealed since yesterday; the other had been made that morning. She did not conceal the difference in flavour. “Sell this consignment between morning and evening,” she said, “and if it does not sell, reduce the quantity rather than reducing the price of the next batch.”

A teenage employee of Rukhsana’s tea team asked, “Why are so many people gathered at the stand today?” Durga answered, “One mother has had news of her daughter. Everyone else has come about their own business.” The girl said that the week before she had seen a woman leading a little girl by the hand onto a bus. Rukhsana asked her carefully, “When? Which bus?” The girl fell silent. “I didn’t recognise anyone’s face,” she said. Durga did not praise her for speaking the truth. She simply said, “If you want to have what you saw recorded, go to the officer. Don’t change your memory by mixing in what you have heard from the crowd over the last two days.” The teenager decided to give her statement after finishing her food-serving shift.

A message arrived on Lata’s phone from an unknown number: “The child will be found across the river. Send the fare first.” The message contained neither Mithun’s name nor the time of any sighting nor a shred of proof. For a moment Lata began counting the money in her pocket. Kamli did not restrain her hand. “If you send the money, tell me before you do,” was all she said. Lata showed the phone to Naira. Naira advised her to preserve a screenshot of the number and forward it through the official contact; Lata herself decided not to send money immediately. “It isn’t for the sake of the money,” she said. “I will not shut my eyes out of longing for my son.” Her voice was heavy; there was no display of heroism in her decision.

Before leaving, Chameli asked the child-protection worker once more when Gunja would be coming home. The worker explained the procedure: a health examination for the child, confirmation of safe contact with a guardian, and arrangements to hear what Gunja herself wished. “I am her mother,” Chameli said, “but let my daughter tell in her own words what she has endured. If every official asks her the same questions over and over, what will become of her?” The worker agreed that unnecessary repetition should be prevented. Repeating her home telephone number, Chameli added one more line: “She has asked for her school exercise book. Please tell me in good time when she needs it.”

At the afternoon meeting, only a single sentence from Gunja’s letter was read to Chameli, with the child’s permission. Gunja had written that the woman who ran the place addressed her by name when handing out sewing thread, yet had confiscated the slip bearing her home address from her pocket. The first part of that statement concerned Gunja’s daily experience; the second was an allegation to be investigated. The investigator secured the original page of the letter. The circumstances of two other adolescents found in the same workshop were being investigated separately; the officer refused a suggestion that they all be folded into a single story and displayed as a public tally of “rescues.” Chameli silently put the exercise book back into her bag.

Before evening, the original page of the office tenancy register was opened for authorised inspection. Beside the word “contact” were one identification, a second signature and a third date. The handwriting of one name on this page appeared to resemble the contact name written on Gunja’s first receipt slip; similar handwriting, however, was not conclusive proof of the same person. What had been confirmed so far was that the two original slips recording Gunja's movements had been issued from the same contact location, establishing the first documented link in the child's unauthorised transfer for labour. Examination of the original signatures, telephone records and firsthand statements continued in order to determine the tenant's responsibility and the roles of the others involved.

When Kedar's group came out of the office and sat beneath the bus stand's awning, Jugal took out the prescription for medicine needed at home. "If I'd received even a small advance, I could have caught the evening bus," he said. Phulwa took two leftover rotis from her bag. "We came here for our papers, and now we're hungry too," she said. Shambhu asked with a laugh, "Shall we enter our mealtime in the wage register as well?" Kedar replied, "If we had eaten in the middle of work, we would. Today we have come to demand our rights, so we shall pay for our own food." Then he handed Jugal a written copy of the request for an advance. His family's emergency had not been postponed in the name of the collective dispute.

Meanwhile Durga returned to Rukhsana's team to see how the first bag was selling. Three travellers bought the flattened-rice-and-makhana mixture; one said the dried ginger was too strong. Durga wrote the objection in her notebook. The money for the three packets sold had immediately been entered with Rukhsana, and Durga could clearly see the advance due to her. "Shall we make the second consignment milder?" Rukhsana asked. "Not everyone wants the same taste," Durga replied. "We'll make two smaller quantities, but first we must work out what they will cost." She had heard about the dispute over measurements at Khatal; now, keeping her own eyes upon her weights, she went to drink water at the tea-seller's stall.

Before going home, Lata went to Chameli. Chameli did not recount Gunja's entire statement; she said only that her daughter was in safe care. "Will you be able to sleep tonight?" Lata asked. "We shall see when my daughter comes through her own doorway and eats something of her own choosing," Chameli replied. "I do not yet know what they have asked her, or how frightened she is." "We have not found where my Mithun is," Lata said. Chameli did not put a hand on her shoulder. Instead, she drew a clean sheet of paper from her red bag and gave it to her. "Write on this when you need to. I too had to learn to write things down."

The first evening bus had gone by the time Kedar, Phulwa and Shambhu were ready to leave, so they waited for the next. Jugal returned to the office for a reply to his request for an advance; he received no written approval, but the receipt number of his application was in his pocket. Kedar said that the date of the next meeting should be given to each remaining worker separately, and that no one should be made responsible for another's fare without being asked. Phulwa telephoned home to say that she had received no wages, though the claim had been registered. From the other end came a child's voice:

“Mother, shall I keep some rice for you?” “I’m coming,” Phulwa said. “You eat your roti first.”

As the officer filled in the last page at the help desk, he tied threads of different colours around two files. In one were the register relating to Gunja’s transfer, her protected statement and the original records from the place where she had been made to work; in the other were the pages concerning Mithun—the market, the oil shop, the broken strap of his sandal, and the application about the contact. “If a place-name matches, a comparison can be made,” Naira said, “but write down the absence of a match as well.” The officer recorded, with the date, that Gunja’s case had reached a corroborated link in the investigation but that nothing here had established a connection with Mithun. Nor had the separate documents concerning Mahesh’s death even been brought to this table.

That night Lata sat on the threshold of her kitchen and washed Mithun’s plate. Until then she had covered a portion of rice on it every day and set it aside. Today, in its place, she laid a little piece of blue cloth left over from the measuring of his kurta. It was not that her waiting had diminished. She wanted only to release food from the captivity of waiting. Kamli put porridge on the hearth. Lata opened her notebook and wrote down the next time she was to examine the oil shop’s credit page. The new office address was in the same book, and below it a boundary set down in clear letters: “No evidence that Mithun was seen there.”

Far away at the bus stand, Rukhsana’s team was washing its empty vessels. Half of Durga’s first consignment had sold; the price and flavour of the remaining stock would be reckoned anew at the following dawn. The wages owed to Kedar’s workers remained entered as outstanding; the process of bringing Gunja home was not yet complete. That night’s achievement was the gathering of corroborated records tracing a child’s unauthorised transfer for labour, giving the investigation its first firm path. But the doorway of Lata’s house was still without the sound of Mithun’s footsteps. Gunja’s truth belonged to Gunja. To turn it into an answer about Mithun would be to lay a second injustice upon the first wound.

Chapter 82 · Maithili's Page

As soon as Maithili opened the desk drawer, a fine fibre of old paper caught beneath her fingernail. She lifted out the wooden casket kept inside and set it upon the veranda. At the bottom of the casket, between folds of cloth, lay two layers of papers: in one, leaves from a manuscript in Ishan's clear hand; in the other, writing faded to a misty blue, with Maithili's annotations advancing along the margins. It had not rained the night before; nevertheless, she first tested the window latch, then spread a dry cloth over the table. Few visitors came into this little room of the house. Today Harimohan Pathak was expected, Ishan would be present, and for the first time Maithili would read aloud, in her own language, pages written by her own hand.

Sarita peered in from the kitchen. "Don't open the casket on an empty stomach," she said. "Just a moment," Maithili replied. Sarita did not laugh at those words. She knew how often learned people, promising "just a moment," consumed not only the hour appointed for a meal but also the time of the person who cooked it. She set down a plate of flattened rice and warm milk, yet touched none of the papers. "Shall I shut the door, so that dust won't settle on them?" Maithili asked. "Shut the door," Sarita said, "but leave this little window open for air. In the afternoon, the sunlight comes in low from this side." Only then did Maithili notice that even the light in this room had been arranged through another person's daily attention.

Inside the casket's lining lay an old measuring tape and a cotton towel. When Maithili lifted the towel, a thin note, separated from between two leaves, slipped out. She did not immediately declare it part of the book. It bore figures for the purchase of materials, an incomplete date and three letters. When one was eager to establish a name, it was easy to make such a fragment mean more than it could bear. Instead, she placed it in a separate envelope. Harimohan had spoken of bringing a magnifying glass to examine the order of the original leaves, differences of ink and the marks along their edges. For now Maithili had only her memory: on which day she had written a revision, and on which day the written page had passed into Ishan's hands. Her recollection was precise in its details, but the dates were not equally clear everywhere.

Ishan entered carrying his worn teaching satchel. The exercise sheets damaged by water on the school veranda had still not been prepared anew; Harimohan had sent him a list the previous day. "Why have you summoned me so early?" he asked. Maithili arranged the leaves before him. "Because when someone asks who wrote a paragraph submitted by one of your pupils, you open the page and look. For years, when I have asked that question about my own paragraphs, I have been offered nothing but my memory. Today there are two pages." Ishan sat down. He looked at the neat handwriting and recognised it at once. “This is my first draft,” he said. Maithili placed the other leaf before him. “And this is the copy of the corrections written afterwards. Do not dismiss it as merely a note in the margin of your draft.”

The first leaf contained a discussion of the distinctions among the means of valid knowledge. At one point the relation between the example and the inference drawn from it had been left unclear; on the second leaf an objection from the opposing position had been introduced, and the reply altered. Maithili read the relevant portions of both versions, one after the other. “Here your sentence said that because the same outcome had been observed, the same cause could be taken as certain. I asked: had the possibility of other causes been excluded? After that, a new condition was added to the example. That was not merely a comma.” “We discussed that objection,” Ishan said. “And so,” Maithili answered, “I am not claiming that all your knowledge belongs to me. My question is who reshaped the written argument, and in what form that person’s name will appear in the book.”

When Harimohan arrived, he examined the corners of the leaves before taking them into his hands. “Not with bare thumbs,” he said, producing a clean piece of cloth from his bag. His eyes came to rest on the revised argument. “The philosophical objection matters,” he said. “But a manuscript leaf proves, in the first instance, that a particular hand wrote these words. To establish credit for co-authorship, we must also know the history of the leaf.” Maithili agreed at once. “Finding that history is part of what I am asking,” she said. “Do not turn the absence of its history into proof of my silence.” “Shall we begin, then, by comparing the handwriting?” Ishan asked. “Handwriting, dates, the sequence of drafts, and the testimony of those to whom the pages were read,” Harimohan replied. “Each must be considered separately.”

Maithili opened an old notebook. Before one entry were the words “Objection again”; below them, in ink of another colour, was an instruction to change the example. “That notebook has comments of mine as well,” Ishan said. “It does,” Maithili answered. “And I shall not erase them. What you wrote should be read under your name. What I wrote should be read under mine.” Looking at the two colours of ink, Harimohan cautioned them that a difference in colour alone could not determine the order of dates. Maithili accepted the warning. She did not conceal the uncertain date on the leaf she had herself written. She was prepared to risk making the weaker points of her own case public in order that the truth of her claim might be tested.

Three soft knocks sounded unexpectedly upon the wooden door. Farid slipped off his wet sandals at the threshold and came in. He carried neither a rhythm-practice notebook nor a musical instrument, but a school-admission application and the shop’s weekly accounts. He had been looking for Harimohan to ask about lesson times. “If this is not a good time to sit inside, I'll wait outside," he said. Maithili invited him in, but moved the leaves a little to one side. "These are original documents in dispute; no photographs without an examination," she made clear. Farid nodded. "I came to understand one line of my application," he said. "The shop's ledger is in my pocket, and no one is going to read that without asking either." Harimohan promised to set aside a separate time for both of Farid's papers.

Farid's family had long been engaged in sorting goods for the market and selling them. His father wanted him in the shop during the afternoon arrival of customers. Farid wanted to attend the school's evening classes and learn to teach rhythm, but he did not wish to flee from the obligations he bore towards his family. He had therefore divided the seven days in his notebook: the shop's accounts in the mornings, turns unloading stock on certain days, and fixed hours for lessons. His father had said, "If you keep the accounts, you will learn the finer points of trade." Farid had answered, "Yes, but learning the trade must not be an excuse for leaving my studies unfinished." Today he needed the school clerk to acknowledge the agreed hours in writing.

"Why does this application mention your family's consent?" Harimohan asked. "I am an adult," Farid said. "Meeting the requirements of the course is my responsibility. My family's agreement is needed for dividing up the work at home, not as a substitute for my right to enrol at school." Harimohan read the form. In small letters it specified "Evening Study," but an office worker had treated it as an application for the ordinary daytime classes and sent it back. "Submit a written request to distinguish the two timetables," Maithili said. "Your work for the family must not become a reason to declare you unfit for school. But you must account for the hours you undertake in your own name." Farid wrote the correction into his application.

Meanwhile Sarita came to collect the plates. She stopped short when she saw the leaves spread across the table. "How old are these?" she asked. "Very old," Maithili said. "Some of your notebooks are from that time too." Sarita did not immediately bring out her notebooks. "The accounts I wrote and the arguments you wrote are not the same thing," she said. "But in those days, while I was carrying meals in, I would also be asked to make copies. We can sit down and look at that separately one day." Maithili opened her mouth, then closed it. She had come forward today to claim her own handwriting; to use Sarita's notebooks as supporting evidence for her claim without Sarita's permission would be another instance of the old wrong. "You choose the time," she said. Sarita carried the dishes away.

On a separate sheet Harimohan wrote three headings: Original Argument; Proposed Revision; Editing and Copying. "These will not decide the matter in themselves," he said, "but they will show what kinds of work were done." Ishan placed a finger on his initial discussion. "I prepared the structure of this argument about the means of knowledge, its original definition and its first disputation. After Maithili's question the example was changed. But the sequence by which the revised example led to a new conclusion was something we examined together, sitting side by side.” “Then you yourself see that two names may be necessary?” Maithili asked. “I see participation,” Ishan replied. “The extent of co-authorship still needs to be compared against the evidence.” That limited admission was not a complete victory, but for the first time the matter was no longer merely “a discussion at home.”

Harimohan’s discomfort came from another quarter. In the public school, his name was associated with opening the door to learning; pupils would sometimes hold up a page from a book and ask how one person alone could make a decision about its authorship. “If I issue a certificate of co-authorship today,” he said, “tomorrow either Ishan or Maithili might ask for it to be reviewed.” “Then write down the procedure by which the decision is reached,” Maithili replied. “Acknowledge precisely as much as the evidence establishes; mark whatever still needs checking as ‘under verification.’ But do not look at the title page of the first edition and tear up all the other papers.” Harimohan recorded the numbers of the leaves on another sheet, adding no new marks to the originals.

At that moment Naira arrived outside the house. She was returning from the child-protection office, where the arrangements for Gunja’s safe return and the examination of the oil shop’s ledger in the search for Mithun were being handled separately. Maithili called her in. Looking at the pile of papers, Naira asked, “Are all these going to be made public?” “First the copies must be checked,” Maithili said. “Then we shall decide. Tell me: whose permission is needed to make copies of original pages?” “Where ownership or private information is involved, it would be wrong to circulate copies without the permission of the people concerned,” Naira replied. “But permission alone does not prove authorship.” Ishan smiled. “Every argument in this house comes down to the rights attached to a piece of paper now,” he said. “Questions of rights in papers arise from the lives of those who write them,” Naira answered. “Paper cannot pronounce the verdict by itself.”

For an instant Maithili wanted to ask Naira for news of the discussions about Kabir’s birth. For several days people had been saying that the family’s old list of names contained a confidential note about a birth. There had even been a proposal to make public the circumstances of Kabir’s birth and upbringing on the strength of a word or two in that list. Maithili spoke plainly. “My pages raise a public question about credit for authorship. Kabir’s private birth records will not become an example in my argument without his consent. Just because there are papers in both cases does not mean they may be opened under the same rule.” “The decision is his to make,” Naira said, and went no further. “And Sarita’s papers concerning the twenty-seven names will not be brought here.” Harimohan entered this boundary separately in his register.

Showing Naira a copy of his application, Farid asked, “If the school hours change, must I write down how much money I shall still contribute at home?” “First compare the promise you have made to your family with your father,” Naira replied. “Write down what you earn, but do not enter wages in your own name for days on which you did no work.” “That is why I’ll work one morning in the shop in exchange for two evenings,” Farid said. “My father has agreed verbally once already. I need the division of time in writing.” “And the money for your own books?” Maithili asked. Farid took a small pouch from his bag. “These are two payments I received for teaching rhythm,” he said. “I’ll buy my first book with them. I’ll keep my regular contribution to the household separate.”

After midday Maithili and Ishan slowly returned to the old question. Harimohan read a passage and asked, “Who first wrote the objection that follows this sentence?” “Maithili raised the question,” Ishan said. “And Ishan wrote the first form of the answer,” Maithili replied. “But the three lines pointing out a further difficulty in that answer are mine.” She opened two notebooks and showed where the relevant references stood. Harimohan did not quote the objection in isolation; he noted only its page and line positions. In that way, the risk of taking half a sentence, unexamined in the context of the complete text, as someone’s final philosophical position was reduced.

From Ishan’s satchel came a copy of a handwritten list. The date when the first writing had been completed was clear at its head, but the date of the subsequent revisions was given only as the name of a month. Maithili searched inside her casket and found a letter written in that month, in which she had told Ishan that they needed to talk again about the proposed example. The language of the letter was private, and in part domestic. She decided that the whole letter would not be laid open before the gathering. Harimohan would examine only the portion necessary to compare the date with the related page; afterwards he would read his written account of the examination to them both. Ishan agreed. Their consent did not resolve every question in the private relationship, but it established a boundary for the inquiry into credit.

A teenage schoolgirl came to the veranda to collect an exercise sheet. Harimohan told her to wait outside, for the fragile original leaves were spread across the table. He caught himself immediately and asked, “Have you come for the copy of your lesson exercises?” “Yes,” she said. He took a separately printed sheet from the cupboard inside and gave it to her. “How much must I learn before I can read all these?” the girl asked. “The exercises you are doing today are the first steps,” Harimohan replied. “Use copies so that the original manuscript is not harmed.” Maithili smiled. “Protect the pages,” she said, “but do not shut the classroom door without need.” The pupil departed with her exercises; for a moment the argument inside the room had touched the ordinary time of a child’s education.

When the evening sunlight fell slantwise upon the veranda wall, Farid returned with his father. His father had left the board of his weighing scales at the market. He spoke hesitantly. “Will the accounts of our household be settled here?” Maithili gathered up her own leaves. “No. The decision belongs to you two. Sit with Harimohan to discuss the school timetable.” Farid looked towards his father. “I’ll take responsibility for the shop in the mornings,” he said. “On the two evenings when I have classes and the customers begin to crowd in, you can employ someone else for half the time. Let us decide that person’s wages first.” “Out of whose profit will those wages be paid?” his father asked. Farid offered a small part of his earnings from teaching, but did not promise to shoulder the entire cost that belonged to his father.

His father grew angry at the proposal. “I’m not stopping you from studying,” he said. “But if the shop stands with no hands to work in it, who will meet the family’s obligations?” “Count the work I shall do keeping the books on five mornings,” Farid replied. “My earnings from teaching will pay for my books, and I shall contribute a fixed amount at home. I won’t promise anyone more than that.” He showed his father the actual sales figures for the preceding two weeks. For the days on which he had been away, he had not written the wages against his own name. For the first time his father looked at that clean, empty column. “You’ve left it blank,” he said. “Because I did not work on those days,” Farid replied.

Harimohan laid the two timetables side by side. In place of four evenings of school, it might be possible to arrange introductory lessons on two evenings and one morning before a holiday, leaving Farid to practise on his own during the other two hours. The school had not yet given its final approval. Farid and his father put an agreement in writing: for the first month Farid would contribute a fixed share of what the family was owed, keep the shop’s accounts on the appointed mornings, and discuss a new division of work when examinations drew near. His father added a condition: “Ask before assigning extra work.” He signed, but signed the paper agreeing the hours, not Farid’s school-admission form in place of his son. Farid was glad of that distinction.

After Farid had gone, Ishan asked, “If a family can set out an economic agreement in writing, why have I been so afraid to make a list of my own contributions?” Maithili did not hastily accept this question addressed to himself as an apology. “Because the moment you made such a list,” she said, “the sole authority that stood beside your name might have had to be examined again. And on my side too there may be matters for which I have a strong memory but not an equal weight of written proof. We must account for both.” Ishan counted the lines of his neat original draft. “I am prepared now to surrender the pages for written examination,” he said. “The final word about revising the published text must still come.”

Harimohan prepared a brief record of their agreement. It listed the external identifying marks of four leaves, the number of the copies selected for registration, where the originals would be kept, the names of those who would examine them, and whose permission would be required to make further copies. In the space for contributions he wrote: “Handwritten revisions by Maithili submitted; examination of authorial participation continuing.” Ishan’s original composition was explicitly recorded as such. Since the leaves were still being examined as evidence, no immediate order was made to print a new name on the title page of the published book. Maithili stated clearly that this provisional register was not final justice; nevertheless she signed it, because for once the question had not been left in the darkness of a spoken understanding.

Naira, meanwhile, was preparing to go home. A message came from Lata: a time had been fixed for inspecting the oil shop’s debt ledger; no direct evidence of Mithun’s presence had yet been found. Naira sent back only confirmation of the hour, adding no conjecture. “Do you see anything alike in your investigation and my dispute?” Maithili asked her. “When different questions are forced into a single document,” Naira replied, “wrong answers begin to take shape. But it would be just as wrong to make my investigation evidence for your argument.” Maithili agreed. She wrapped her leaves in their cloth again; Naira put her telephone into her pocket and went out.

Sarita was baking rotis over the hearth behind the house. When Maithili went there, Sarita asked, “Did the pages survive?” “They did,” Maithili said, “and we found a way to have them read as they ought to be.” “Aren’t you going to ask when I shall open my notebooks?” Sarita asked, putting down the wooden tongs. Maithili answered not with a display of affection but with attention. “I shall ask—but not now. You are tired today. Tell the account of the work you did in your own words. I shall not take your time merely to fill the empty spaces on my own page.” Sarita turned another roti. Whether the answer had brought her relief, Maithili could not tell.

Stepping outside, Ishan saw Farid and his father walking on the far side of the road. Farid held the school application, while his father carried the shop’s ledger. There was enough distance between them to make it seem that they walked separately. A little farther on, however, the father stopped and showed Farid a customer’s list of goods sold on credit. Farid paused and explained some of the calculations. Ishan looked at the copy of the list in his own hand. Today he had become ready to write Maithili’s name beside the revisions she had proposed; turning that acknowledgement into the next edition of the book still remained to be done. He had confidence in the work that was truly his, and with that confidence the difficult apprenticeship of recognising another person’s labour had begun.

That night Maithili placed a blank sheet between the two copies on the table. Harimohan had written the date of the next examination upon it. At one corner of an original leaf lay an old line she had drawn, marking where the bridge between cause and conclusion had broken within a sentence. She felt the desire to run her finger along that line, but did not touch it. The leaf was no longer merely an object of her memory; it was material held safely under examination. From the kitchen outside came the faint sound of Sarita washing utensils. Maithili opened the door. “Leave the dishes,” she called. “I’ll wash them in the morning.” From within, Sarita answered, “In the morning I shall show you some pages. The dishes will be finished tonight.” When Maithili put out the lamp, that promise was not a celebration of victory. It was the appointed hour of another, more difficult listening.

Chapter 83 · Sarita's Labour

At dawn, when Sarita drew the blowpipe away from the hearth, a half-burnt coal rolled out of the ashes and onto the floor. She picked it up with the tongs and put it back into the fire. Water was boiling in an earthen pot, but she took care that not a drop should fall on the blue-bound notebook resting on the bench behind her. Today she had to fulfil the promise she had made to Maithili yesterday. First she took the rice off the fire and banked down the embers; only then did she wash her hands and open the notebook. Its first page recorded measures of rice, oil, and lentils. On the seventh, lines of prose began without warning. For whom had these two kinds of writing, in the same hand, been set down? Sarita was ready to answer that question herself.

Maithili arrived a little before the appointed time. The moment Sarita saw her, she said, "Sit on the veranda, but first hold down the lid of this pot for me." Maithili set aside her papers and grasped the lid. Hot steam brushed her fingers, and she snatched her hand away. Sarita burst out laughing. "Didn't I tell you yesterday that you would be washing the vessels in the morning? Your hands will have to learn work from the very beginning of the day." Maithili laughed too, but when she saw water bubbling over the rim she asked for the tongs. Their small laughter came naturally to them both. Then Sarita laid two dry boards upon the table: the old notebook on one, today's accounts on the other. "Don't be in a hurry to fold my story into their dispute," she said.

On the notebook's seventh page lay part of a passage of questions and answers, with spaces between certain words and a red stroke along the margin. Maithili immediately recognised it as a copy of a portion of Ishan's first lessons. "On what day did you make this copy?" she asked. Sarita shook her head. "I won't give you an exact date yet. It was the paddy season that year, but the season I remember is not the same as the date on the paper. Look here: first I wrote kāraṇa, 'cause'; later I replaced it with hetu, 'reason'. You read it aloud, and I wrote it down. Whether the change came at your suggestion or from something I understood myself, we shall need another page to establish."

Beside the copied text in Sarita's notebook were two small ration accounts. At times she had cooked for Harimohan's school; at others she had found cloth to dry books or put written pages back into their proper order. One page recorded the number of meals eaten by five people. Below it stood the entry: "Four pages written out twice." Sarita said, "One day water dripped in from behind and the ink spread. You were all at your lesson. It took much longer to dry the wet copy, and then I asked about the letters that had disappeared and wrote them out again. I did not understand and correct everything on my own. I should have kept a separate record of the names of those I consulted. I haven't found that page yet."

Maithili took out an old printed book. Ishan's name appeared as its author at the beginning, and at the end was a brief acknowledgement: "Assistance from the household." Sarita did not immediately place her finger upon those words. "That line belongs to the time when you were writing," she said, "but it contains no reckoning of the days I spent. I do not claim to be the author. I say only that the pages advanced through the cooking, the copying, and the search for examples. I cannot call the ideas you changed your own way my ideas." "Then your name should have appeared in the acknowledgements—" Maithili began. Sarita interrupted her. "The name matters. But first listen to the work."

She drew a thin sheet from inside the notebook. It gave the sources of three examples: old water measurements from the village pond, weights recorded at a warehouse, and payments due at the landing. Sarita had seen the first with her own eyes. The second she had heard from Rukhsana. The third was copied from somebody else's notebook; she had never seen the original. "You took all three into your teaching together, calling them 'the practices of ordinary people'," she told Maithili. "I asked then whether the third example was true. You said it would serve well enough for an explanation. That answer stung me. I feared it might be wrong, but I was in no position to change a line in the book." The whole of that day did not return to Maithili's mind, but she recognised the manner of the answer she had given.

"I did say it would do," Maithili murmured. "Yes," Sarita replied, "and inside that 'would do', the question I had asked was buried. Now the credit for your handwritten arguments is being examined. This is an opportunity for me, but my account must not become evidence in support of your side. I can say that I gathered examples, pointed out certain false comparisons, and made some copies accurately. Look at the pages to discover which objections brought changes into the book." She marked off the material she had witnessed directly, the things she had heard, and what had been copied at another person's direction.

Just then Lakshmi Jhangar appeared at the door. Her bag had been soaked in an earlier rain, but this time the papers inside were protected on both sides by oiled sheets. "I went yesterday to the place you told me about for comparing the copies," she said to Sarita. "Two more pages turned up, but the owner's ledger still hasn't been opened." Sarita invited her to sit. "This is your work," she said. "I can read it aloud, but the decision will be yours." Before opening the bag, Lakshmi said, "No one is to photograph anybody's private papers in this house. I need a copy of the petition I wrote, not every story about my grandfather." Maithili put her phone into an inner pocket.

On one side of the copy of Lakshmi's old labour contract was the length of the working season, on another the arrangements for lodging, and on a third the quantity of grain advanced. The document bore no clear signature acknowledging a debt, although the office was describing the wages owed as a “family debt” instead. Lakshmi had become cautious after seeing the case of Shiv Dhandi’s wage slip. “I want what my ancestors earned,” she said, “but I will not create a false claim and place somebody else under an obligation. The word ‘family’ is written here, but the space for the individual’s name is empty. My grandfather’s name is on another sheet. I will join the two only when the original register has been found.” She copied the figures she could actually see into her own notebook.

Sarita handed Lakshmi an old receipt from the place where the papers had been bound. It said only “two copies”; it gave no serial numbers for the original pages. “Your copies will have to be examined once more,” Sarita told her. “Whether this torn corner was already torn in the original, or was damaged while copying, is something the copyist must tell us.” “He said before, ‘They’re old papers—what is there to examine?’” Lakshmi replied. “Today I shall ask him to write down the date and the source of the pages.” Someone in the family wanted to lodge a complaint at once. Lakshmi had already decided her reply: not without an acknowledgement of receipt, and no entry lacking the date on which payment fell due would be described as a “proven outstanding amount.”

Looking at Lakshmi’s papers, Maithili asked, “Could you leave this copy with me? There is a similar difficulty in examining copies of scholarly writing.” Lakshmi looked at her for a moment. “My grandfather’s wages are not an example for your philosophy,” she said. “You may learn the procedure, but don’t copy my papers and take them to your meeting.” Maithili understood the carelessness of her question. “You are right,” she answered. “I shall not use the contents of this document. If I need to learn how a source can be protected, I shall ask about the general procedure without names.” Lakshmi gathered her bag together and asked Sarita whether she could send an inquiry by post and save the bus fare to the office.

Sarita examined an old receipt from that office. “Check the method of submission by telephone,” she advised. “Don’t post an original paper without confirmation.” Lakshmi herself called the office on its published number. The person who answered said an application seeking information about the source could be submitted with a copy, but that inspection of the original would require a separate appointment. Lakshmi wrote down the time, the telephone number, and the words she had heard. She decided to take her papers home, leaving with Sarita only a fresh copy of the application to read. “I can endure the quarrel at home for a few more days,” she said, “but once an incorrect amount is entered as payable, it is hard to have it corrected.”

When Lakshmi had gone, Maithili turned her face towards the window. The scent of chillies drying in the breeze drifted into the room. Sarita lifted the lid of the cooking pot to look inside. “Did that hurt you?” she asked. “When I demand my own right to what I have written,” Maithili said, “I remember the limits of evidence. But the moment somebody else opens their papers, I begin to see them as material for my argument.” Setting out the plates, Sarita replied, “If you have understood it today, you will ask next time. The same thing happens to me. Someone comes to have a name corrected, and I start looking into the other columns of their accounts.” The froth on the lentils slowly subsided.

After the meal Sarita opened her written exercise sheets again. One contained an example: if two households possess identical weights, that does not establish that their grain came from the same source. “I first had occasion to say this,” Sarita explained, “because two sacks at the market weighed the same, but the grain in one household was damp and the other’s was dry. I spoke of what I had seen. You wrote it down for discussion. In the sentence that finally appeared, my sacks were still there, but my name was nowhere.” Maithili looked at the relevant passage in the book. The words had been fashioned by Ishan; the original observation behind the example might have come from Sarita. The surviving written sequence did not yet prove it conclusively.

“If you had seen the scene yourself first,” Maithili asked, “should your name have been given as the source of the example?” “At the very least,” Sarita said, “someone ought to have asked me where my observation was to be printed. I might well have agreed. But I had not put my experience into the sentence used in the book. Whether the questions you raised changed the argument is something the two of you must examine. Keep the category of my work distinct.” Maithili asked permission to write a summary of Sarita’s statement on a sheet of paper. “Read it aloud to me first,” Sarita said. “Then only as much as I accept may be copied.” Maithili did not put pen to paper until Sarita’s spectacles had been found.

Harimohan arrived in the afternoon to see the condition of the original pages. Beside the book on the table he found old rice accounts and slips recording the sources of the copied examples. “Which documents are we to take for examination?” he asked. Sarita laid three things before him: the copy of the written pages, the accounts of food and cloth expenses, and the list of sources for the examples. “The handwriting in the first is mine; the ideas need not be,” she said. “The second records labour and expense. I have never found a complete written account of what was owed. The third distinguishes what I saw, what I heard, and what I took from someone else’s papers. Do not combine the three and make them a certificate of authorship.” Harimohan wrote down the particulars. The originals stayed where they were.

He asked whether anyone had proposed a statement of contributions before the book went to press. Maithili recalled a small meeting held on the day she was presiding. Sarita had prepared the meal on time and arranged two copies of the original pages. When the acknowledgements were read, Maithili had said, “Assistance from the members of the household.” Sarita had been sitting in the back row. She had not protested that day. Maithili looked at her now.

“I saw the empty space where my own name should have been,” she said, “yet I gathered all your work into a single word. I could have allowed a detailed public account to be given. I did not. That was my silence, not Ishan’s decision alone.”

“Do you remember this incident,” Harimohan asked, “or is it written in somebody’s register?” “The programme of the meeting may have survived,” Maithili replied. “What I said that day is a memory. Compare it with whatever records can be found.” Sarita said, “I did not protest because I had to remain there to settle the cost of the meal. I wanted to return home without causing discomfort to those who were on the platform. Do not call my silence complete consent; but do not say, either, that I demanded credit there and then.” Harimohan recorded their statements separately. For the first time Maithili was able to speak of her own carelessness without adding a sentence in her defence.

Ishan arrived towards evening. Sarita did not hastily gather up the papers at the sight of him, but she kept beside her the page headed “Permission to Examine the Ledger.” “Is there something I may see?” Ishan asked. “There is,” Sarita replied. “I copied the writing on these four pages; they can be compared with the originals you wrote. But I will not offer you the food accounts as proof of credit for your book.” Ishan recognised the handwriting on the first page. “Why were the errors corrected in the notebook?” he asked. “Some at your instruction, some at Maithili’s,” Sarita said, “and once or twice I raised a question because of something I had understood. To find out how each error came to be corrected, we need the original copy.”

Instead of drawing the notebook towards himself, Ishan asked Harimohan what permission had been given. Harimohan told him that inspection would extend only to the pages Sarita chose to show. Still confident of his original authorship, Ishan said, “The central exposition was mine. I shall not equate the labour of copying with the writing of an argument.” “Neither do I,” Sarita replied evenly. “But there is a value of its own in the copying without which the pages would not have survived, and in the questions asked about the sources. This is not a gift of a name. It is recognition of work.” Ishan fell silent. Maithili did not immediately write anything down, mistaking his silence for assent.

Meanwhile Naira came by to return a spool of sewing thread she had taken from Sarita’s house. Seeing her mother surrounded by papers, she asked, “So the notebook has been opened today?” Sarita laughed. “It has—but not the original sheet of twenty-seven names I gave you. Its key is still where it was.” “I wasn’t even asking about that,” Naira replied. “I have a separate office list to examine now in the search for Mithun.” Sarita took off her spectacles. “Then let this notebook remain a history of the work done in this house, not a shortcut into somebody else’s private investigation.” Naira saw one line recording the hours her mother had spent working. “You were writing until night that day?" she asked. "The lentils boiled over that night too," Sarita answered with a smile.

Lakshmi telephoned again. The binder had agreed to provide the source numbers of the original pages from which the copies were made, but needed another day. No written answer had yet arrived from the office. Lakshmi had decided for herself that the following day she would submit a signed petition, asking that the dues for lodging and the wages due for labour be examined separately. "If you need the fare, tell me how much first," Sarita said. "I've made provision for the bus fare," Lakshmi answered. "What I need is your time to read the papers, not money for the journey." After putting down the telephone, Sarita compared the time needed with the hours set aside for her sewing. If she was to give time to another person, the hours of her own livelihood needed a name in the accounts too.

Maithili and Harimohan drew up a short register of work. It had five separate columns: the days Sarita had cooked; the pages she was known to have copied; questions about revisions; sources of examples; and permission to inspect documents. Dates that were uncertain were left blank. Where no receipt for payment could be found, they wrote "awaiting evidence," not "unpaid." "Will you turn into a debt even the days when I worked of my own free will?" Sarita asked. "No," Harimohan answered. "You must tell us the difference between voluntary service and work requested of you." Sarita entered two days of shared meals provided without charge and set apart three days of copying undertaken at someone's request.

When the question arose of what was due for those three days, Maithili wanted to pay the money at once. Sarita stopped her. "If you want to pay, first verify the account of the days. Some work was paid for at the time, some money for materials remains owing, and the question of the examples I supplied will not be settled by money alone. If I accept a donation without an account, tomorrow somebody will say Sarita took payment to keep her mouth shut." Maithili closed her bag. "I shall look for the programme of that meeting," she said, "and whatever public acknowledgement of contributions is needed, I shall read the proposed words to you first. If you disagree, that too will be recorded." To this Sarita agreed.

Outside, the sun was setting, and red points of light from the hearth glimmered on the earthen floor of the veranda. Naira was arranging the plates when Sarita told her, "Teach Maithili how to make the round rotis you never manage to make yourself." Maithili laughed. "Yesterday I couldn't even hold a lid. Today I must sit an examination in roti-making?" Naira handed her the rolling pin. The first roti resembled no map of India. Sarita looked at it and said, "This map proves nobody's title to land, but there is nothing wrong with it as food." All three laughed. The roti did not puff up on the griddle, but, cooked slowly layer by layer, it became fit to eat. After that laughter, nobody opened another paper or brought out another piece of news.

After the evening meal Ishan read the old line of acknowledgements in his book once more. He picked up a pen as though to write something, then set it down. “Today I have listened,” he said, “but the form in which each kind of work will receive public credit must be decided after examination.” “Tomorrow I have cooking and sewing again,” Sarita replied. “I cannot sit in meetings every day. Keep my written copy safe, and tell me when I am to be heard.” Maithili, who had once regarded other people’s time as freely available, now asked for a written agreement about the hour. Harimohan fixed a brief time for the next hearing; Ishan undertook to bring the original pages recording his own contributions.

After everyone had gone, Sarita put the blue notebook back in its box. Today she had not tried to place her name where someone else’s stood. She had only made certain that her copying would not be lost inside another person’s silence. She tied the notebook’s loose thread into a firm knot. On her way out, Maithili turned once more. “Tomorrow I shall make the rotis,” she said. Sarita smiled. “Do—but ask me whether I like eating them.” Understanding the weight of that simple question, Maithili walked home. Ishan’s original argument remained secure; the register of Sarita’s work had been opened; and Maithili would now have to answer for her old silence not only in words, but in the way she acted.

Chapter 84 · The Teacher's Acknowledgement

As Ishan brushed the dust from the binding of an old book, a blue stain came away on his fingers. He wiped the paper with a white cloth, but the thin line of colour would not disappear. Perhaps the ink had spread when the volume was bound; perhaps someone had touched it afterwards with wet hands. At present he could establish neither possibility. Three bundles lay before him. The first contained his original exposition in manuscript, the second two printed editions of the book, and the third the school's letters prepared in answer to questions from students. Since returning from Sarita's house the previous day, he had spent the night putting the papers in order. Today, before Harimohan, he had to lay out not merely a defence of his position but the limits of his own work.

The shade of the tree in the courtyard had not yet reached the parapet of the well. Ishan read the old notations in the margins of his original pages. In one place he had set down the order of the means of knowledge; in another, the relationship between the reason offered in an inference and the proposition to be established; in a third, the conditions under which an unfamiliar object might be recognised through comparison. Those lines were in his hand, as the early notebook and the students' lesson notes attested. But beside one page stood a question in Maithili's handwriting: "Why infer a single cause from an identical mark?" After that question, the example in the printed work had changed. Ishan could see that his name alone, written on the page, could not tell the whole history of the alteration.

Maithili had arrived before him on the veranda of Harimohan's school. She had with her the five-column register of work prepared the day before with Sarita's permission. One narrow column recorded the days on which meals had been cooked, another the copying of pages, a third suggestions for revision, a fourth the sources of examples, and a fifth the limits of what had been inspected. Opening his bag, Ishan said, "I have brought my original pages. I shall open them for everyone to see." "Everyone?" Maithili asked at once. "Sarita's written notebook is not among these. Show your own pages, but her permission must be sought separately for hers." Ishan checked his hand. It seemed necessary to him that, in announcing his own generosity, he should not once again gather another person's rights into his own possession.

Harimohan straightened the writing board and laid three objects apart: Ishan's early notebook, a copy of Maithili's handwritten revisions, and the printed book. "Whatever we say today, we must also say what our source is," he insisted. "This is not a judgment by a court. We can examine the letters written on a sheet of paper. To determine when an idea first entered someone's mind, we need further evidence." Maithili kept the original of her revised page in its box and laid out only the copy she had authorised for inspection. Ishan selected those passages of the book in which the original argument had remained unchanged. His presentation was precise: he also demonstrated the sequence of proposition, reason and example from old exercise sheets used at his school.

“I wrote the first form of this question,” Ishan said, “and I conducted discussions of it with my students. Until the day Maithili raised her question, the fundamental principle was the product of my own thought.” Maithili conceded the point without irony. “I do not dispute that. The claim I make for my page is not that you knew nothing. But when I showed you the weakness of the example, you put its revised form into your book. Nowhere was my question acknowledged. Why?” She wanted an answer to that question not from the colour of a photocopy, but from Ishan’s own words. Harimohan raised his pen, yet added nothing on their behalf.

Ishan turned the pages of the printed book. In the first edition, the equal weight of two sacks had been offered as an indication that their contents came from the same source; in the later edition, the distinction between equality of weight and identity of cause had been made explicit. “I had already felt that something was unsatisfactory here,” he said, “but it was only after Maithili’s question that I decided to change the example. If that change was not acknowledged, the responsibility is mine.” He stopped for a moment. “That does not mean Maithili wrote every printed line. Nor does it mean this page would have taken the form it did without her.” “This is the first time,” Maithili said, “that you have spoken my name as the reason for the change.”

“Where can the dates of your first and second editions be established?” Harimohan asked. Ishan showed him the inside pages. The years of publication were printed there, but not the precise date on which the manuscript had been revised. The school attendance register mentioned a lecture on the subject; its date established a connection with the topic, not the birth of every sentence. Maithili wrote two reference numbers on her small sheet. “That is why my handwriting matters. But I, too, may be mistaken when I try to remember the day on which I wrote a page.” Each of them marked a limit beside the evidence they had supplied. Formerly they would have regarded such admissions as intellectual defeat; today there was no going forward without them.

Footsteps sounded in the courtyard, and Sarita appeared. She carried not her notebook of copied pages but a little sewing bag over her shoulder. She had left a garment belonging to her first customer of the day unfinished and would have to return to it within an hour. “I have come for a little while,” she said. “I have put the lentils on the fire. Naira will watch them, but she has work of her own.” Harimohan wrote down the new time limit. Ishan asked Sarita, “Will you tell us what you remember after looking at the four old pages you copied?” “First tell me,” Sarita said, “are you giving me time so that you may listen to me, or are you trying to save your book with what I have written?” The question was not harsh. It was direct.

Ishan glanced at Sarita’s sewing bag, where a thin little tin held her broken needles. “We must not confuse the two,” he replied. “If the original exposition is truly mine, evidence will protect it. But I must also acknowledge the harm done when I failed to value the labour here. By writing ‘assistance from the household’ in the old book, I compressed your copied pages, the hours spent cooking and the sources of the examples into one vague sentence. That was wrong.” Sarita looked once towards Maithili. “Ishan, that is not a complete account of what I contributed,” she said, “but you have begun to recognise the mistake. Now I need it stated on paper, not merely regretted.”

Harimohan proposed that they write beside each old item the kind of claim it could support. Sarita raised an objection. “I want cooking to be included in the list of labour that sustained the writing. But it would not follow that because I cooked the food, the argument became mine. When I saw something with my own eyes, my experience is the source of that example. When I heard it from someone else, that person must be named, or the uncertainty about the source must be stated.” For the first time, Ishan listened to her entire sentence without interruption. Harimohan opened a register with separate headings: original writing, suggested revisions, copying, firsthand examples, reported examples and arrangements for materials. No final stamp of ownership was placed beside any of them.

Mangari Gorait came in from the other end of the veranda. Two streaks of wet earth marked her cotton scarf. At the closed factory beside the forest, a new gate was being built against the old wall, and the sorting and cleaning workers of her group had been barred from entering. She had not brought people to break locks or wield sticks today. She had brought three lists signed by her group and old wage slips. “Are you examining copies of papers here?” she asked. “We are comparing certain pages,” Harimohan replied. “If your business is different, it will need its own time.” “Seven people in my group are owed money,” Mangari said. “Four have come with me today. A single word like ‘employment’ will not contain all their accounts.”

Ishan drew a low stool forward for her, but Mangari first called in the companions waiting outside. Prema unfolded her attendance slips for the days she had cleaned; Bholu’s work had been inside the factory’s sorting shed, and his period of service was different; Saroj said that she had been called to remove materials for two days even after the closure was announced. The seventh member was absent through illness and had asked to see the slip before authorising anyone to submit a claim for his dues. Mangari brought their papers together on the same table, but recorded each person’s permission to have them copied separately. “I am the group’s representative,” she said. “I do not become the group itself.” Hearing her, Sarita remembered the register she had prepared the day before.

Mangari placed a receipt before them. At the top was the factory's old stamp; below it were the words "group payment." The spaces for the bank account and for the name of the person who had received the payment were blank. The guard at the gate had said that the owners had settled everyone's account. "What does this receipt prove?" Mangari asked Harimohan. "It proves that a paper bearing those words exists," he said. "Its authorised source and whether the money was actually paid must be examined separately." "Not a single rupee has come into my hands," Prema said. "Nor mine," said Saroj. "But if someone enters an amount in all our names, our statements that we did not receive it must also be recorded one by one."

On Mangari's document, "sorting supervisor" was written beside her name, but the space for the payee on the receipt was empty. What the gatekeeper had said was only a report she had heard; the receipt did not prove that payment had been made; and to infer payment here because it had occurred under an earlier contract was merely an analogy. Ishan explained all three distinctions, then immediately fell silent. Looking at him, Mangari said, "You may explain the distinctions, but you will not decide the price of our work. We must demand an account from our former employer." Ishan nodded. At this point the teacher's knowledge had become useful by recognising its own limits.

A message came from a guard who had returned from the factory gate: the new manager would meet only a representative. Mangari objected. "A representative may go, but each worker's claim will remain in the original application, not only in a copy. We shall not write 'consent obtained' for the member who is ill without that member's consent." She divided the day's application into two parts: wages unpaid up to the closure, and cleaning or carriage work required after the closure. The cost of safety equipment bought by workers with their own money went into a third, separate list. "And if the office closes today?" Prema asked. "A receipt number will not mean our work is finished," Mangari replied, "but tomorrow we shall have a paper on which to base what we say." She had chosen to pursue the dispute without needlessly closing every possible way forward.

Sarita looked at the clock. She had to return to the kitchen. Turning to Ishan, she said, "The payment due for my three days of copying has been entered on paper, but the source of the money has not. We still have to compare the dates on which I received earlier payments. Mangari is taking away the accounts of her seven workers herself. I am not leaving my pages here." "If I name an amount today," Ishan said, "I may make another mistake before the accounts have been examined. But I shall not withdraw from responsibility for the work undertaken at my request. I will sit with you and agree upon the value of your days." "Include," Sarita said, "the time I shall lose by setting aside other work to give you those days."

Maithili then showed them the register of contributions she had prepared. Beside her name were the words "questions leading to revision and arrangement of examples,” but it did not specify the changes made on each page. “I regard this as incomplete,” she said. “But where a sentence appears in your book under your name alone, an acknowledgement of my contribution can be written now.” Without picking up her page, Ishan wrote on his own paper: “The question leading to the revised example was raised by Maithili; the original argument is Ishan’s; the handwritten pages remain subject to comparison.” Beside the sentence Harimohan added: “Preliminary public notice, not a final determination of credit.” Maithili read it. “That is the first accurate sentence,” she said, “but it is not the whole account.”

Ishan lifted the book from the table and reread the passage in which “assistance from the household” had been printed. “By leaving unnamed the people who maintained the house, dried the papers, brought the meals and copied the writing,” he said, “I gave the reader an incomplete history. The deprivation of credit is a fact; I bear my share of responsibility for it.” “You can say that publicly, can you not?” Harimohan asked. “I shall,” Ishan replied. “But if the declaration erases the distinctions within Sarita’s contribution, that too will be an injustice. She has not herself claimed authorship. I shall not make her an artificial co-author merely to ornament my remorse.” Having heard that much, Sarita lifted her sewing bag onto her shoulder.

“Do not turn me into an ornament,” Sarita said. “The wages I have earned, the time I have lost and the examples I have witnessed raise three different questions.” She then asked Maithili whether the old programme of the meeting would be found the following day. “Harimohan has the key to the box where the records are kept,” Maithili replied, “but we can say which day’s papers have survived only after looking.” “Where they have not been found, write ‘not found,’” Sarita said. “That is all I have to say before I go. Naira’s time in the kitchen is hers as well.” As she went out she smiled at Mangari. Neither gave the other’s struggle a new name by borrowing her own. They merely asked each other the bus fare.

When the veranda had emptied, Uday asked, “Teacher, if your mistake becomes public, will the boys and girls at the school still trust you?” Ishan did not immediately reassure him. “Some students will be disappointed,” he said. “Others may understand that a teacher can be questioned. They must test separately the subject I have taught them. Admitting that I have erred as a human being does not make the principles of inference false. Nor does my understanding those principles make it impossible for me to err.” Uday wrote down his question of the day in his notebook; Ishan did not stop him. Outside, two new pupils were waiting for the school bell.

As the day began to fade, Mangari returned. She held an official acknowledgement number, but the third page of her copy had not been stamped. “They accepted two applications,” she said. “They told us to submit the claim for safety equipment under a separate number. I did not add the claim of our sick member without that member’s signature; we have arranged a meeting tomorrow for that.” Prema opened a small plastic bag wrapped in her scarf. Inside was the purchase slip for a pair of safety gloves that had worn out. Mangari placed it in a separate envelope. “This proves that the equipment was bought,” she explained. “It does not yet prove that the owner ordered the purchase.” Then she set off for home. Her claim had made its first entry into the public record, but the wages remained unpaid.

Seeing the acknowledgement number, Maithili said, “Mangari has obtained a small measure of progress, but the factory has not opened and the wages have not been paid.” “That is precisely why her decision has substance,” Harimohan said. “She has asked not for someone’s kindness, but for an obligation to answer.” “My letter carries a similar danger,” Ishan replied. “People may read it and think the matter is over. We must make clear that acknowledging words, paying what is owed and doing justice to authorship are separate stages.” Maithili put a finger on the empty margin of his page. Ishan added a sentence: “This preliminary statement shall not be taken as the final settlement of any dispute.” The weight of those words seemed greater to him than that of his own name.

Farid came to the evening class and marked his attendance. When Ishan began the lesson on inference, a student named Uday raised a question. Ishan chose another example: the equal weight of wet and dry grain does not establish that both have the same history of production. He said that the source of the example, which involved Sarita’s experience, was still under examination; for the present lesson it would therefore be treated only as a hypothetical sentence for testing. “Then if the person who originally supplied the information is not present,” Farid asked, “can a teacher make it an example by which to test a proposition?” “Yes,” Ishan replied, “but it must be identified as hypothetical, not as an instance directly witnessed.” The classroom fell silent not by command, but in thought.

When the lesson ended, Ishan pinned the preliminary letter to the school noticeboard. He did not remove his own name. He added an acknowledgement of Maithili’s contribution and set out the distinctions in Sarita’s work. Beneath the notice were the time at which comments would be heard and the place where objections could be lodged. Two students read the letter and went away without speaking. A young man stepped forward and asked when the final decision on authorship would be made. Ishan stated plainly that he could not give a definite date. He showed only the next date Harimohan had noted for locating the sources of three documents. Another student said he had read the old edition and asked permission to compare the differences between the pages. Ishan regarded the request not as a favour done to him, but as a legitimate question.

At home Sarita was taking the pot of lentils off the fire when Maithili arrived carrying a small piece of dough for bread. “I promised to cook today,” she said. “Then wash your hands first,” Sarita replied, “and see whose time it is at the griddle.” Naira sat on the veranda with her investigation papers closed. She had no wish to thrust either the original page of the twenty-seven names or news of Mithun into her mother’s mealtime. Ishan arrived a little later, but when he asked permission to serve the rice, Sarita told him to fetch a pitcher of water instead. Performing a small household task did not discharge the old debt. No one in the family pretended that it did.

After the meal, Ishan read a copy of the letter aloud to Sarita. She stopped him halfway. “Do not write ‘invaluable assistance’ here,” she said. “When you call it invaluable, its price vanishes. Write ‘three days of copying, separate arrangements for meals, and the sources of examples.’” Ishan changed the wording. Sarita pointed to the next line. “For anything I said I had seen with my own eyes, ask me to confirm the source under my name. Do not record as my firsthand observation something I heard from Rukhsana.” Ishan preserved that distinction on the page. Meanwhile Maithili was rolling out the bread. One edge of the dough remained thick when she laid it on the hot griddle; she asked Sarita whether it ought to be rolled again.

When night had deepened, Ishan put his original notebook back into his bag. The argument on its first page was still his; the historical responsibility for the revision on the second still called for examination shared with others; and the anonymous thanks printed in the book awaited another reading. He understood that to be a teacher meant more than teaching truth: it meant making room to hear the questions of those whose voices had been suppressed within his own book. Yet this understanding did not settle his debts. The account of Sarita’s three days, Maithili’s claim page by page, and the unpaid wages of Mangari’s seven workers remained open in their separate notebooks. Ishan extinguished the lamp, but placed the second copy of the letter on the table where it would be the first thing to catch his eye in the light of morning.

Chapter 85 · Radha's Labour

In the outer settlement of Hastinapura, the first light of dawn fell upon the veranda where Radha was cutting narrow strips of cloth to wind around the bands of a chariot wheel. Still damp with the night's dew, the cloth shrank beneath the knife. She drove a small peg into the ground beside the hearth, dried the strips before doing anything else, then measured their width. The previous day Adhiratha's chariot had jolted along the city's uneven roads. Unless the looseness of the wheel was corrected today, the horse would tire from the strain of pulling it, and the work that brought in their hire might be lost. Radha marked a knot in the cord she had made with a dab of lime. She wanted the measure of her labour, too, to be remembered.

Karna came out of the house carrying water in an earthen bowl. A fine cut from a bowstring crossed one of his fingers. As Radha took the bowl from him, she noticed the wound and rubbed oil into it. "Who taught you to hold it that way yesterday?" she asked. Karna lowered his eyes. "I tried by myself. The target was far away, and my arm trembled." Radha did not sternly forbid him. "Before you fix your gaze upon a distant target, learn the strength of the string," she said. "And when your hand is cut, do not make the treatment of it a matter of shame." Karna remained silent. He did not want to repeat the words he had heard in the market: what use was archery to the son of a charioteer? But his silence concealed nothing from Radha.

Adhiratha entered the courtyard with the metal rim of the wheel in his hands. "The royal storehouse paid only half of today's wages," he said. Radha showed him the new strip she had prepared for the repair. "Being paid half does not mean the reckoning for the whole work has vanished. This week I sold my share of the grain to buy barley for the horse, oil for the wheel, and thread for the cord. Those expenses must be entered separately in the ledger." Adhiratha began to laugh, then grew grave. For years he had supposed that money spent on the household was not money that needed an account of its own. Yet it was Radha's purse being emptied that had made the chariot's wheels turn; that he could not deny.

Radha handed two fresh strips to Dhairi, an elderly woman of the settlement who did sewing. Dhairi told her that when a horse was turned in a narrow part of the city, the band sometimes caught behind the wheel. Taking heed of what she had seen, Radha altered the length of the cord. "Then was your first measurement wrong?" Karna asked. "The measurement I took was right for that wheel," Radha replied, "but Dhairi has seen another difficulty when the chariot is moving. To change a measurement is not deception; it is respect for new knowledge." Dhairi asked to be paid for her thread. Radha counted out the money she had set beside the hearth and gave it to her. She would not bind a worker in the chains of reciprocal favours merely because they called one another helpful.

Karna helped lift the front wooden frame of the chariot. When he bent to fit the metal rim into place, Adhiratha stopped him. "It is still hot." "I am not afraid," Karna said. "It is not fear you need," Adhiratha answered, "but the sense to protect your body. This chariot is my livelihood; your hands are not meant for this chariot alone." For a little while the words astonished Karna. The people of the city had already tied his future to the circumference of a chariot wheel, yet his father could see such different possibilities in those hands. Radha paused in her work and watched them both. More than pride, she felt anxiety: where would the money come from to feed and educate such possibility?

At midday a messenger arrived from the city. He told Adhiratha to reserve his time for a royal journey the following week, but could not state what the work would pay. Radha came out from the veranda and asked whether meals and the hours spent waiting through the night would also be paid for. The young man was taken aback. "You do not drive the chariot," he said. "I keep the account of what it takes to put that chariot on the road," Radha replied. "Adhiratha will settle his wages himself. The cost of the bands, barley and repairs supplied from this house must also be included." The messenger could promise nothing definite. On a blank leaf, however, he noted the day of service and the need to ask again about the rate. Radha knew that a note was not a promise of payment. It meant only that nobody could simply take their time away on the assumption that it was freely available.

Looking at the leaf on which his mother had written, Karna asked, "How much do we know of the story of my birth?" The sudden question stilled the thread between Radha's fingers. She could tell him what she remembered of the first day he was brought into her home. She had no right to fill in what she did not know before that memory began. "I know the fear and the cold of the day I first took you into my arms, and the sound of your crying," she said. "I do not know all that went before. And this too is true: from that first day until now, whose arms have held you, whose food has nourished you, and who has watched through the nights when you were ill." Karna asked nothing more. His question had not ended; for the first time, he had found room within it for more than one truth.

Radha opened the basket of grain. She remembered half a line from a song she had sung to Karna when he was small, but not the words that followed. This time she sang the unfinished song and laughed in the middle of it. From outside, Dhairi began to supply the missing tune, though hers was different again. Neither woman quarrelled over which version was right. Karna took a piece of bread from his food bowl and laughed with them. Radha thought that it was necessary to count the cost of labour, but not every happiness in a day could be made an entry in a ledger. During that small interval there was no question of a king, no verdict about birth: only a loose wheel made firm and an open doorway to a home.

Videhapur, 2039. From early morning, sheets for drying paddy had been spread before the old grain warehouse. Kiran Raut was working a small winnowing tray to separate the husks. He had first swept the open ground: after the rain, the grains might otherwise become mixed with the swollen earth. The village sharecroppers had been told to accept a new schedule of loans, headed “Consolidated Dues.” Kiran looked at the sheet and put down the winnowing tray. The landowner’s name stood on the field lease, while the seed advance and the cost of transport had been added to Kiran’s share. He would not endorse three different relationships with a single signature.

Kiran asked his daughter Rekha to fetch the account book from the house. She came with her schoolbag, inside which was an old pencil box. Sitting beside the drying sheet, she ruled three columns as her father instructed: the share of the harvest, the debt for seed, and transport charges. “Must the landowner first show us the document for the deduction he has written against my name?” Kiran asked. “I can draw the lines,” Rekha said, “but I have no authority to declare the account correct.” There was something of her classroom lessons in her voice. Kiran laughed, but filled the empty spaces himself. He was unwilling to turn his daughter into a witness to a debt she knew nothing about.

An employee of the community weighing station said that part of the paddy deposited at the warehouse had already been handed over to the landowner, so a deduction in the new account was perfectly ordinary. Kiran showed him the old weighment slip. It recorded the weight of the consignment on arrival, not any agreement about the division of the crop. “If the paddy arrived, I accept its weight,” Kiran said. “But how much belongs to whom cannot be proved by this slip.” The employee summoned the landowner’s representative for midday. Kiran had no wish to reopen his dispute over title to his family’s land here; for today he wanted only the debt added afterwards to be shown as a separate item. Nor would he allow anyone to hold up his sacks at the warehouse door: the time for drying that grain was passing.

Behind the warehouse, under the broken roof of a building site, Ratan Bhuiyan was lifting a lime-whitened brick to examine it. When the rain had come in, the papers from his old contract had become wet on that side of the shed. He approached Kiran to ask whether the breeze from the winnowing tray might help dry them. “A loan has been entered against my name, though I never even saw the money,” he said. Instead of drawing his own papers closer, Kiran cleared a corner of the drying sheet for Ratan’s documents. “My account is a separate matter,” he made plain, “but we can share a place to lay out papers until they dry." Ratan spread the leaves without a word. He did not mistake the offer for Kiran's automatic support in his dispute.

In Ratan's old bill, the wages of those who carried earth and the items for tools purchased in the contractor's name were printed in the same sequence. The contractor's clerk laughed. "Your name appears on both pages, so the debt is yours." Ratan laid out his working tools before the man: a hammer with a cracked handle, an old rope, and a small notebook in which he counted bricks. "Look at the mark on the hammer I made with my own money," he said. "The contractor's inventory lists an iron spade. When did that spade ever come into my hands?" The clerk could offer no definite answer. Ratan submitted a written request to see the original authorisation of the sum entered under his name. He made no announcement that the debt had thereby been cancelled.

The landowner's representative, whom Kiran had asked to attend, arrived and examined the warehouse weighment slip. He kept talking about the sacks counted on a particular day, but would not produce the earlier date of the seed purchase on which the alleged debt depended. Kiran proposed that whatever portion of the paddy was undisputed under the accurate weight slip be released that day, and that no further debt be added to his share until a receipt for the contested deduction could be found. The representative was reluctant. The warehouse guard pointed out that if the paddy were held back and became damp, both parties would suffer. At last a temporary mark was placed on the weighed sacks, and the statement of deductions was sealed in a separate envelope for a later hearing. Kiran's way to market had not been closed, but the dispute over the debt remained open.

In a narrow market lane, Lakshmi Kathbaniya set an empty bottle upside down on the bench of her shop. A customer wanted a broken lid replaced; Lakshmi was prepared to supply one only after checking the correct size. Just then the newly appointed chair of the well committee came in carrying a thick file. "You supplied both rope and lids to the same committee," he said, "so your responsibility has been entered under the joint losses on the repairs." Lakshmi did not prolong an argument before her customer. First she settled the price of the replacement lid, then opened the committee paper. Sales from her small shop and the cost of communal construction were two documents that did not belong together.

Lakshmi rested her fingernail on the line of the account where the supply of goods was recorded. "This is the receipt for what I sold. Just below it, someone has written 'jointly liable for the committee's debt.' On what day did I make such a promise?" The chair said that the previous committee had treated everyone as a member. "Being a member, selling goods and becoming a debtor are three different things," Lakshmi replied. "When the wooden lids in my shop are sold, their price is due to me. That does not make me answerable for the failed repairs to the well wall." She took back her original receipt and asked where the additional sentence on the copy had come from.

Meanwhile Ratan came to the market to ask the old price of tools. Lakshmi offered him not tea but a stool to sit on first, and showed him the measurement for a new hammer handle. Ratan asked whether she would give him a written bill for the purchase. Lakshmi wrote one at once. "Tomorrow somebody may claim that all of us shopkeepers were partners of the contractor," she said with a smile. "They put a loan against my name on the strength of somebody's assurance," Ratan answered. "Today I asked whose signature that assurance bore." Each understood the difference between their grievances. For the moment, all they arranged was how to exchange copies of the relevant papers: Ratan would keep a copy of the price of his tools, and Lakshmi would safeguard her shop's sales register.

Kabir came down from the legal-aid room and entered the market. In his bag was the acknowledgement slip for Mangari Gorait's wage application, but without Mangari's permission he did not open that document in the present dispute. Kiran showed him his sheet with the three columns. Kabir's first question was, "Which part of this page do you authorise the investigators to see?" Kiran chose the figures for his share of the crop, not the page of household expenditure written by his daughter. Ratan read out his application asking for the original acceptance of the contractor's debt. Lakshmi submitted a written request to investigate the source of the line added to the committee receipt. Kabir did not turn the three of them into one collective 'list of victims'. He explained that they faced different offices, different responsibilities, and different routes by which evidence could be obtained.

A short message from Naira appeared on Kabir's telephone: Sarita had still not decided whether to open the original page containing the twenty-seven names; the question of the copy and the original lay within the boundaries she herself had set. Kabir read the message and put his phone away. Ratan asked whether, since he worked in law, Kabir could have every document corrected immediately. Kabir laughed. "I can show you how to request a document. Whether the truth is established depends on the documents, the people concerned and the hearing." As he spoke, he remembered the old papers of his own family: knowledge of a birth, decisions about upbringing and the rights of a household could not all be settled by a single application. He did not use other people's papers as a place in which to resolve his private concerns.

That evening Kabir went to Sarita's house. In the outer room Naira was shutting away a copy of Maithili's revisions; her mother's notebook of collected copies had not been opened that day. Sarita was heating milk over the hearth. "Have you come to see an old page bearing somebody's name?" she asked. "No," Kabir said. "Today I have a question of my own. If the history of those who brought a child up is scarcely recorded on paper, does that mean the life they lived is any less real?" Sarita lifted the milk from the fire and put a lid on the vessel. “Because there is little on paper, memory does not become false,” she said. “But neither does having a memory give us leave to write out the contents of a document we have never seen. Before you ask for someone’s story, give that person permission to tell it.”

Kabir said that certain old matters were being discussed with Subhadra, but Subhadra had her own reasons and her own privacy. How could he reconcile his desire for information with those rights? He was not sure. “When Subhadra chooses to speak, you may put questions to her,” Sarita replied. “Making her speak before a public assembly would not be a service to truth. And the woman in whose home you grew up—her labour through the nights does not disappear the moment a birth record is found.” Naira added nothing. Kabir’s thoughts and the affairs of his family did not strike her as raw material for an investigation.

Kabir recalled a scene from his childhood. On a rainy day the schoolbag kept dry inside the house had somehow become wet; the woman who raised him had stayed awake late, drying the pages of his exercise books one by one. He could not remember the date, but he remembered the smell of damp paper and a handful of paddy placed in a corner. He did not claim absolute reliability for the recollection. “I will ask her about that day again,” he said. Sarita smiled. “Yes. And if she tells you it was someone else who dried those books, give your memory another place to stand. Love need not diminish when a memory changes.” After a moment, a gentler light came over Kabir’s face.

That same evening, in the settlement outside Hastinapura, Radha unwound the new band around the wheel and inspected it. If the little corner sewn by Dhairi had been rubbed too hard, there was a danger it might tear. Adhiratha had taken the chariot out and brought it back. The wheel had turned freely. Karna’s eyes shone. Radha bent close and touched the stitching by the wheel. “The work has succeeded,” she said, “but tomorrow the dust of the road and the weight it carries will test it again.” This time Adhiratha entered in his ledger not only the price of the band but also the money Radha had spent on barley. No royal order had made him add that sum. A question raised within the household had obliged him to write it down.

Karna was about to step outside with his wooden bow, faded by the sun, when Radha called him back. “What for?” he asked. “Eat first. If you practise on an empty stomach, you will only worsen the injury.” “I want to prepare myself for a greater target,” Karna said. “Let the target be of your own choosing,” Radha answered, “but the right to eat at the proper time is not a prize for someone else to award.” She served coarse bread and greens on his plate. Adhiratha showed him a better way to hold the bow, but did not claim to be his teacher. Karna put the bow down and sat to eat. The question of his future remained; the hunger of that night was satisfied.

In the evening darkness Dhairi came to collect what remained due to her for the narrow strips she had sewn. Radha asked, “For the long strip that must be stitched tomorrow, shall I bring you the measurements, or will you go yourself?” Dhairi told her what she preferred: she would go in person. When measurements were changed on another person’s say-so, she was the one who had to do the work twice. Radha accompanied her to the doorway. As she saw the first star in the sky, the final line of the old song suddenly returned to her. She hummed it; Dhairi joined in, and then both realised that their words were different. They burst out laughing. Radha held on to that laughter. Amid the labour of the household, she too needed a little interval of freedom that was hers to choose.

At the next dawn in Videhapur, a copy of Kiran’s warehouse slip arrived in a separate envelope. The box authorising release of the undisputed paddy had been filled in; beside the contested debt stood the words, “Original document yet to be examined.” Kiran had the sacks loaded onto a handcart. Ratan copied the receipt number for his application seeking the original authorisation of the tools into his notebook. Lakshmi filed a written objection to the additional sentence making her liable for the committee’s debt and kept a separate receipt for what her shop was owed. These three outcomes had exposed no common enemy, nor had everyone’s debts been cleared. But now nobody could write their silence down as a single, joint consent.

After returning home, Kabir took a cloth bag, its threads fraying, from the bottom shelf of an old cupboard. It contained his exercise books from his student days, a leaflet from an old school programme and a small cloth handkerchief. On one paper the name of the woman who had raised him was written clearly; on another, the space for a name was blank. He did not pick up a pen to fill it. He shook the dust from the handkerchief and laid it apart, resolving that he would hear the history of those things from an older member of the family when that person had the time and wished to tell it. Whether Sarita would open the original documents she had laid aside on the following day was her decision. Nor had the ledger of Kabir’s own upbringing been made empty merely by the mystery of someone else’s birth.

Chapter 86 · The Original Page

As Sarita lifted the lid of the brass box, a thread caught beside her fingernail and snapped. She did not throw the old thread away; she laid it beside the low wooden bench. Inside were a sheet of paper folded into narrow sections, a dried flower petal and a small receipt. For several weeks Naira had been watching the place where her mother kept this box, but today, for the first time, Sarita herself had chosen the moment to bring it out. First she half-closed the window shutter. There was light enough to read the writing, but not enough for anyone outside to see the table clearly. “I will show you the original,” she said, “but you will not take it away. And the fold I have kept over one name will not be opened yet.” Before sitting down, Naira shut her telephone inside her bag. Today the first act required to earn her mother's trust was to do nothing.

Sarita did not unfold the entire sheet. She opened the first two of its three folds; the last remained covered by a small piece of paper. In the old lines of ink, the handwriting was dark in places and faint in others. Four names had been written in a different colour, and Sarita had said before that they had been added later. Naira took out her earlier copy. The final space on it was already blank, with Sarita's instruction written on the reverse. The twenty-six visible names in the original and the twenty-six names in the copy agreed in number, but one letter in the third line had been transcribed a little differently. Sarita looked at it. “This may be an error in your copy. When a letter in the original is unclear, it is not right to write down a whole name as though you have understood it.” Naira put a question mark beside the line. She did not alter the name.

“Are the four names in the other ink still four different mysteries to you?” Sarita asked. “I still do not know whether all four were added for the same reason,” Naira answered. Sarita said quietly, “No. On one day a woman came with an application for a correction; on another somebody said a family's name had entered a different page. The other two incidents were separate. Where would I have found ink of exactly the same colour every day?” She seemed about to smile, but the smile did not come. Among Naira's older notes was an inference she had written down: Same colour of ink, same occurrence. She drew a thin line through it and wrote beneath it: Difference in ink observed; reason to be investigated separately for each name.

In the cloth bundle Sarita had kept another slip. It was an admission receipt from a time when someone had gained entry to an office only after trying for three days. A time and a number were printed on it, not the result of any hearing. Naira had copied its particulars before. Today she asked, “Should I compare the serial number on this receipt with the order of names in the list?” Sarita answered, “That comparison may be a question worth investigating. But even if the numbers match, that will not prove the person's words were accepted.” In her voice was the weariness that comes from witnessing innumerable small defeats on paper. “I did not write these names to identify criminals. This was a record of the work of people whose voices were stopped halfway through.”

Ramani's voice came from the doorway. She had come from the landing to borrow a rope for drying fishing nets, but saw that papers were being examined inside. Sarita covered the sheet at once. Naira rose and went out. On Ramani Bind's hand was a fine cut from a wet net. “There is to be a survey at Barki Pond today,” she said. “At first they said only the male leaseholders would decide the path to the landing. My nets go down into that water, but my name is not on the paper. I have brought a letter from my mother's family that mentions the Gangi. I have kept it not to turn it into a river map, but to understand something about my mother's people.” Naira glanced towards her mother. Sarita answered from within, “If you are going to read a document, first understand the person's right to the name. What concerns me lives in my house. The pond's business belongs at the pond.”

Beside Naira's first copy was an old date. On that day Sanket had come to the house to replace the cover of a damaged telephone, and Sarita had refused to open the final fold. Naira fitted the dates together in her mind: her mother's page had been written first; a copy of it came afterwards; but none of her old notes established when the printed list circulating outside had been made or who had made it. “I want to establish who gives the copy I am looking at the right to call itself the original,” she said. Running a finger over an old scratch on the box, Sarita replied, “The original of the page written in my hand is this one. Putting an official seal on a piece of paper does not make the letters formed by my hand belong to somebody else.”

Before noon Sarita told Naira of a small decision. She would allow the visible part of the original to be recorded on a sheet in the presence of them both, but the original would not leave the box. The copy would state only the date of inspection, the condition of the folds, the twenty-six legible entries and the final space that remained covered. Any record requested from the office must not be given the status of Sarita's privately held original. Naira repeated her mother's words in her own language so that nothing might be misunderstood. “You already have a copy,” Sarita asked. “What have you learnt today that is new?” “A difference in one letter, my mistaken inference about the colour of the ink, and the fact that you are allowing someone to examine your page, not giving it away.” Sarita nodded. Neither the key nor the authority over the paper had slipped from her hands.

At the landing of Barki Pond the water looked clear that day, but a green film clinging to the third step was ready to send a foot sliding. With a bamboo pole Tara Mallik was testing the depth of the mud beneath the water in three places. At two points the pole sank as far as her knee; at the third it met a solid edge of brick. Aditi wrote observed here on the measurement sheet, not average depth of the entire pond. Fishing nets were drying to one side, and empty baskets stood on the stone washing platforms used by the women who laundered clothes. A contractor displayed a slip and announced that the lease was held by his party, so the next forty cubits of the landing would remain closed. Ramani asked, “Where in the lease is the portion of water for fishing defined, and where does it prohibit people from using the path down to the water? Those are not the same line.”

Urmila could not set down her bundle of washing near the platform. She stood with the wet weight balanced on her shoulder. Ramani offered her the wooden bar from her net, so that the bundle might rest on it for a moment. The contractor's strongman called for a rope to be drawn farther across the landing. Tara stopped him. “The measurements are not finished. The rope will go no farther.” Ramani opened half a page from an old lease. A man's name stood in the first section; the second was incomplete. “An application has already been submitted to enter the names of the women who fish with me. You show us this old half-page and put off answering it.” The contractor said a collective lease operated only in the name of the head of the family. Ramani understood how the labour of weaving a family's nets and the name in which its rights were held had been made into separate things.

Renu Gondhi arrived from the shallows. She laid down the acknowledgement slip for her earlier objection to the fencing of the pond, but would not allow it to be inserted into Ramani's file. “My appeal concerns the enclosed path,” she said. “Ramani's question is the share of women in the common fishing rights. Combine them, and somebody will reply that the matter has already been decided.” Renu also had an old page from a letter written by a relative on her elder sister's side, mentioning the place-name Dhauri and the handwritten account of a witness who had seen a lease. She made it clear that the name in the letter proved neither the course of the Dhauri nor its connection with the pond nor its boundary. It showed only that the name had been used in the family memory of an old lease dispute. Aditi entered the two documents under separate source headings and stopped a proposal to draw a conjectural line on the site map.

Ramani spread out the letter from her mother's family bearing the name Gangi. In one corner the delicate letters of her mother's handwriting conveyed news that the price of some fish had arrived and urged that her daughter's share should not be forgotten. As she read, Ramani's voice softened, but she immediately explained what the letter was worth. “This is a document of my life. It does not establish the boundary of Barki Pond. But my mother called me by the name of a person with rights. Here, in the lease, I am merely a woman of somebody's household.” Tara asked whether she consented to placing the letter in the public register. “Not my mother's whole letter,” Ramani replied. “Write that an application has been made to include women's names. If necessary, I will show the part containing the date.” Naira remembered the confidential page at home, but did not bring it forward as an illustration in place of the question of rights Ramani was asking in her own name.

The measurements provoked a fierce dispute. The contractor's representative wanted to declare the rope stretched from the western landing towards the shallows to be the boundary of the lease. Tara pointed to the survey sheet. It showed only the straight-line distance measured during today's inspection, not a boundary established by law. Three old stakes were seen in the mud; two moved when touched, one was firm. Urmila showed them the narrow footpath by which she reached the washing platform, and explained that in the rains she could not walk there with a load when water filled the path. Aditi measured it immediately. In the open section there was room for only one person with a bundle to pass at a time, and the obstruction was marked separately by the measurement taken with the pole. She entered passage obstructed, not the entire landing unlawful.

“I shall not stop selling my fish today,” Ramani told the representative. “But if you close the women's way to the boats inside this rope, how will we lower our nets tomorrow?” “I have paid the rent,” the contractor answered. “Show us what you paid for,” Ramani replied. “A receipt for payment does not confer a monopoly over every use.” Then she gave three women who fished with her the opportunity to state their names. One woman was absent, and Ramani refused to add her name to the application without her consent. Tara recorded an interim decision for that day's inspection: the new rope put up during the survey would be removed, the way to the washing platform would remain open for the present, and a formal hearing on rights would follow only after the complete original fishing lease and its missing annexure had been examined.

At the municipal office, a copy of the report on the landing was placed before Rama Karna. The original lease was not on the officer's table. There were only two computer-printed pages, one column headed Licence, another Family Representative. The space where Ramani's name should have been was empty. A senior assistant whispered, “Just change this much: write that the family's consent has been obtained. We can collect all the signatures afterwards.” Rama stood up from her chair and checked the date at the top of the slip. “When consent has not been obtained,” she asked, “whose order authorises us to write in an official copy that it has?” “The work is urgent,” the assistant replied. “I shall not treat urgency as a substitute for a written order,” Rama said. “Bring the original lease. Until then, the status of the application as received will remain exactly as it is.”

At the office, Naira raised an unrelated matter with Rama. Sarita's handwritten page of twenty-seven names was not a government original; it was the original of a private list. The authenticity of the altered copy circulating from the office had yet to be examined. Rama left two separate spaces clear on her desk. “The owner of a paper and the person who made it are not necessarily the same,” she said. “Your mother's handwritten original is in her home. Do not turn it into a government file. As for this office copy bearing a seal, I cannot add or remove anybody's name without seeing the original entry.” Naira asked why five differing identities appeared in the office's sealed copy. “First we shall look for the original entries and the orders authorising the changes,” Rama replied. “A change may also have been made to protect somebody. That is a possibility too. For now, all we have observed is a difference.”

Rama had the circulating copy brought from the cupboard. Its third page had repeatedly been shown during disputes at the office. A number was printed at the top, but the file to which that number belonged could not immediately be found in the original receipt register. Naira counted the lines of names against her copy. In one, the relationship to a father or guardian appeared to have changed; in another, one identifying description had been replaced by another. Altogether they marked five entries whose differences required further examination. The fold covering the twenty-seventh name had not been opened, and Naira made no claim that this place had been compared. “Five discrepancies have been found,” Rama said, “not five crimes.” She wrote an acknowledgement of the copy being kept securely in her office, and an application was also made to inspect the original register.

Meanwhile Rosie Lalbegi came to the office about wages due for her cleaning work. In the computer entry against her name, an assumed religion and an occupational category had been placed in the same field. “Everyone's details are filled in like that,” the clerk said. “Why do you infer from my contract to carry away this office's refuse the account I give of worship and household tradition within my community?” Rosie replied. “Cleaning this office is my occupation today. Where, and in what terms, I declare my religion is my own right.” She wrote a correction application herself. Rama accepted it, without falsely promising that the original entry would be changed on the spot. “If I have an acknowledgement number, I can come back next month about my attendance,” Rosie said. “But my wages must not be withheld while the field for my identity remains empty.”

Near the office door, Rita Ekka was carefully drying a wet sheet of paper. In a fresh debt-recovery notice, her surname had been joined to another person's name, and on the same page a signature was attributed to her as guarantor. She had once been a witness to an application concerning repairs at the river landing; she had not borrowed the money. “Whose debt am I supposed to repay?” she asked. The recovery agent said that the family's traditional name matched. Rita placed the date on her witness slip beside the date on the recovery notice. “A match in one letter of a name does not make a signature mine. Show me the original agreement and the borrower's acknowledgement of receiving the money," she said. Instead of providing the page, the agent suggested that she photograph it. Rita refused. A photograph without an established source would not prove her objection.

Rama took a copy of the recovery notice from Rita but did not call it a government-certified agreement. She wrote explicitly: Copy presented by claimant; original to be requested. "The old document on which I gave evidence is in my bag," Rita said. "I will not leave it here yet. Let whoever has authority to ask for it first do so in writing." Naira saw that Rita, like Sarita with her protected list, was withholding a paper, but for a different reason. It meant neither that the debt had been forgiven nor that the recovery claim was valid. Rosie left with an acknowledgement of her correction application; Rita went away without a certificate of clearance, carrying instead her demand to see the original agreement. Rama put the two files in separate cupboards.

After half the day had passed, Naira returned to Sarita. She brought only a blank printed comparison form, not a government list of names. "What happened at your office?" Sarita asked. "Ramani's name was missing from the pond lease, but we have not seen the original annexure. Rosie filed a correction concerning her identity, and Rita asked to see the original debt agreement. The copy of our list that is being called an official record is also awaiting examination." Sarita stretched out her tired legs. "Do all these pages look the same to you?" she asked. "No," Naira replied. "But everywhere the mistake has been to act without asking the person to whom a document belongs." Sarita got up and began gathering the ash around the hearth.

Sarita looked at Naira's form. No one had filled in names by guesswork beside the five altered entries. "If I call back the person whom I saw asking for a correction," she asked, "might that put her in danger?" Naira did not answer at once. She did not know whether all five changes had been made from the same wish or under the same pressure. Someone might have changed a name for safety; someone else might have discovered a change made in their absence; a third person might not yet know their details had been altered. The language of the first approach would have to be different in each case. "I will not make anyone's address public," Naira said. "First I shall record their separate consent to being contacted and what inquiry each person wants undertaken." "Then my page will open a road for you," Sarita said, "not break down somebody else's door."

Before the evening meal Sarita changed the cloth lining her box once more. Naira did not touch the key. "I have heard of five entries with different identities," she said, "but that is not the guilt of five people. If an identity has been changed, the questions of cause, consent and safety must come first." Sarita answered, "I had no authority to alter anybody's name in the list of twenty-seven either. What I wrote was an account of what I had heard or seen. My list cannot tell you who was given the order to change an official copy." For the first time she added a sentence in her own handwriting to the new comparison sheet: Private original list shown for examination; permission for complete publication not granted. She wrote the time beside it.

As night deepened, a message came from Tara Mallik. The new rope stretched beside the washing platform at Barki Pond had been removed, and a written request for the complete annexure to the fishing lease had been submitted to the office. Rather than put her boat away, Ramani was preparing to take her nets down to the water at dawn. The original agreement for Rita Ekka's alleged debt had not been found, and Rosie's application for correction of her identity had merely been acknowledged. These were all incomplete results; yet in each case it was becoming clear who would have to answer on the following day. In her notebook Naira entered the sources of the letters beside the river-names Gangi and Dhauri. She did not pronounce either name to be a river now identified on a map.

As Sarita lowered the lamp, she asked Naira, “What have you written now in that third line of your copy?” Naira opened her notebook again. “Where water had made the letter indistinct, I had filled it in by conjecture. Today I marked it as uncertain.” “Good,” Sarita said. “But I must answer for the word I changed myself. I will not put the blame for my mistake on you.” Naira could see an old mark of alteration on her mother's handwritten sheet, though she could not say when it had been made. Sarita allowed a brief note at that point: Accepted by the writer as her own revision; date unknown. The twenty-seventh name beneath the fold remained unseen.

When Naira stepped outside, damp air from the pond carried the smell of fish and of nets drying. Inside her mother's house, the original sheet had been returned to the brass box. Naira's bag contained only the comparison sheet for the twenty-six visible names, its final space blank and the limits on disclosure clearly stated. She thought that finding an original page was not an ending, but the difficult beginning of deciding how far any person's account might be trusted. Along the path Ramani was teaching her daughter how to tie the knots in the nets for the morning. “Will they write my name too?” the girl asked. “I have submitted an application,” Ramani replied. “When the answer comes, I will show it to you. Meanwhile I shall teach you how to measure a net, because the people who write our names will never do our work for us.”

Chapter 87 · Five Altered Identities

For the second time Nasim Idrisi threaded his needle, pushing his spectacles up onto his forehead. Five little bags of white cloth lay before him; at the mouth of each a strip was folded to precisely the same measure, though the linings were of different colours. He had chosen those colours to distinguish the bags, not to stand in place of anyone's name. Outside the tailor's shop, the tea seller was pouring boiling water from a tin vessel. Amid the sound, a young man arrived with a telephone in his hand. “I want a photograph of your customers' ledger. There's talk of five names having been changed. Who are these people you sewed for?” Nasim stopped the wheel of his sewing machine. “Because the cloth passed through my hands, must I give you an account of their lives as well?” he asked.

The young man introduced himself as a volunteer with a local information group. He carried an extract from a page of the municipal office's records, in which differences in names or terms denoting relationships had been marked beside five entries. Beneath them somebody had written in red ink: Gang of people using assumed names. The moment Nasim read those words, he drew the cloth close to himself. “Which document proves there is a gang?” The young man replied that all five alterations appeared on the same list. “Five kurtas stitched in the same place don't mean that five people live under the same roof,” Nasim said. “Look at the differences in the list; don't invent a whole category of crime out of them.” The young man lowered his telephone, but slipped the extract into his bag.

Nasim remembered the message Naira had sent the previous night. Sarita's private original sheet contained twenty-seven names; the twenty-six places left uncovered were being checked, while the last fold remained closed by Sarita's own decision. Five differences of identity could be seen in the municipal copy, but the original orders for those changes, and the dates on which they had been made, were still being sought. Nasim had never embroidered children's names onto the bags he had once made for the school kitchen; he remembered well the mistake of treating a customer's measurement book as if it were a public attendance register. Today he was making five new bags to protect the papers of five independent individuals. The bill for the tailoring was ready. Confidentiality was not a gift handed out for nothing: it was a definite condition of his professional responsibility.

When Naira came to the shop at noon, Nasim showed her the bill: separate charges for the cloth, thread, lining and stitching of all five bags. “Who will pay this?” Naira asked. “Not the people whose documents they are meant to hold,” Nasim said. “If the investigating committee has asked for them, let it put the expense in writing. But the bill will give the numbers of the bags, not the private names of the customers.” Naira agreed. Rama Karna had sent word from the office that the receipt sheet for the altered copy had been found, but the signed authorisations attached to it were not all together. Before approaching the five people, a question still had to be settled: what should each person be asked, and in what form should the answers be kept?

They did not choose the room behind the tailor's shop. Customers listening to the sewing, young workers, and people standing outside the door could always overhear what was said there. The small municipal reading room had a door that could be closed from within, although the building attendant would know that someone was receiving visitors at that hour. Naira sent each person a separate message: an invitation to meet, not an order; attendance alone would not be taken as consent to make a name public. Two wished to come in person, another two chose different times, and the fifth permitted a conversation by telephone. Rama said that the official verification would proceed independently; what was said at a private meeting was not to be entered as a substitute for a formal statement to the authorities.

Sugandha was the first to arrive. Instead of a piece of paper, she had a stem of bel leaves caught against her palm; on the way to the reading room she had bought the leaves near the temple for her sister. “I will not speak my old name aloud here,” she said. “You may write the name under which I have worked since leaving home. But if you join my former address to that name, the people I escaped will be able to reach me again.” Naira asked whether she had lodged a formal complaint against anyone. “I have a copy of my statement,” Sugandha replied. “But don't write down my fear as a crime already established by an investigation. What I tell you of my own experience is my testimony; what the office verifies is the office's responsibility.”

On the reverse of the sheet Sugandha had a condition written down: her current name must remain on the attendance and wage-payment registers; the connection with her former identity was to be viewed only during authorised verification; and her place of residence must not appear on any public list. She did not want the change of name to cost her the wages she had already earned. “Shall I write your new name against your clothing measurements too?” Nasim asked. Sugandha laughed. “Take my measure from my body, not from my name. I'm the one who'll wear the clothes, not the people looking for me.” Nasim folded the note and put it inside a bag. All that was written for the public notice was: Statement of first individual received; limits on publication specified by the individual concerned. No former name appeared.

Zahir came for the second meeting. Mud was caught in the pedal of his bicycle, and the strap of his right sandal was tied together with thread. He had formerly carried goods through the market. At the labour broker's office his attendance had been recorded under another name, after which it had become difficult for him to claim what he was actually owed. “I didn't change my own name,” he said. “Someone told me it was written like that for safety. Nobody told me what name was being put into the wage ledger.” Naira made clear that, for the moment, this was Zahir's testimony; without seeing the broker's records, they could not establish where the instruction to change his name had come from. “Does that mean my wages will stay unpaid?” Zahir asked.

“I'm not saying they should be withheld,” Naira answered. “But we must find out whether the money was paid to someone else under the wrong name.” Zahir supplied two slips for consignments he had carried and the names of fellow workers who could identify him on three days. He also expressly forbade the publication of his colleagues' addresses. His decision was that the name he currently used at work could be used in the municipal inquiry, but not the name of the neighbourhood in which his old home stood; and every copy supplied must identify clearly the source of the original paper. Outside, the bell on his bicycle rang again and again. When he came out of the reading room, he tightened its loose screw himself.

Nasim paused when he heard the third person's name. Devaki had submitted a written request to have her mother's name entered in the space for a guardian, although the copy in circulation still carried her father's name. One clerk had described the alteration as a “new identity”; another called it “concealing an old identity.” Sitting by the window, Devaki said, “I have lived with my mother, borne the expense of her treatment, and it is to that address that my letters reach me. I will state, with evidence, how my relationship with my father is to be recorded. But I do not want to be frightened every time by having letters sent to his house.” Her mother's name was not spoken aloud there. She placed the necessary papers in a sealed envelope.

The question sent by Rama for verification said, Father changed. Devaki struck out those words and had them replaced with The distinction between a contact person and a guardian's details. “I am not asking to erase the register of my birth myself,” she said. “But I want the right to decide into whose hands a letter is delivered.” Naira rewrote the page. The alteration did not change anyone's ancestry; it recorded a request to keep the address for public correspondence separate from the original record of private relationships. Devaki read the new page and signed it herself. By then the evening light had begun to fall obliquely across the red floor of the reading room.

The fourth person, Mangala, did not come to the reading room. With two friends she was weaving bamboo mats in a shared workshop behind Barki Pond. Naira went there at the time Mangala had chosen. Mangala did not stop working; as she pushed the last strip into the weave, she said, “Here people know me by the name under which I work. At the relief camp a different name was written down, and they said it was for my protection. But if people later begin to say that I took relief twice, who will look at the papers?” She had fastened the camp receipt into her ledger. Nasim offered her a bag, but Mangala said the iron-bound chest in the workshop was safer for the present.

Mangala made one distinction plain: there were two receipts bearing different names, but she had received payment only once. The other slip recorded a check on attendance, not a payment. She showed them both, but did not surrender the originals. “I want to be freed from the public accusation, not to have my story told from house to house,” she said. One of her friends, gathering up the edge of a mat, asked how long the evidence would have to be kept safe. “Until the investigators give me a receipt for taking it, it stays here,” Mangala answered. She could give Rama a signed, concise statement; she did not authorise the publication of the names of customers or neighbours.

The fifth voice came over the telephone. The name she wished to use was Kamli. Naira did not ask permission to put the call on speaker so that everyone might hear it; she held the telephone to her ear, wrote down each sentence, and read it back in turn. Kamli had previously supplied a temporary name to obtain a slip for medical assistance. Now people were displaying the medicine register bearing the old name beside the assistance letter bearing the new one, accusing her of having taken treatment meant for somebody else. “I received the medicine,” Kamli said. “Have its quantity and dates checked. But why should the page describing my illness circulate through the market?” She was willing to disclose the hospital she had attended only for authorised medical verification.

Along with her limits Kamli raised one further question: if the investigation found an error, would her former name be printed again on the correction notice? Naira said she could not settle that question over this telephone call; they would ask the office for a written arrangement. “Then do not call my voice an official statement yet,” Kamli said. “I am ready for an inquiry, but first tell me three things: where the papers will be kept, who will read them, and which name will go outside.” Naira copied those three questions word for word. The fifth bag remained empty. Nobody ordered it to be filled.

By evening Naira and Nasim had returned to the municipal office. The powerful breeze from the fan on Rama Karna's desk made the corners of the papers flutter. She weighted them with the lid of an inkpot, then read Naira's brief notes. The five individuals had expressed five separate wishes, but those wishes did not yet establish the legality of the five procedures by which the office had altered their entries. “I need answers to three questions,” Rama said. “What was in the original entry, who had the authority to change it, and was notice given to the person concerned?” Naira corrected her notes, making two columns: Reason as stated by the individual and Evidence of an official alteration.

At that moment a crowd gathered in the outer veranda of the office. A shopkeeper waved the red-marked extract in his hand. “These five changed names must be cleared up. If a person's identity is secret, the accounts of that person's relief and wages will be secret too!” Voices rose around him. “Ask how much money was spent, who approved it, and on what date,” Nasim said to him. “But why insist that, before the accounts can be understood, you must know the door of the woman who has withheld her home address for her own protection?” The shopkeeper said the public had a right to know the whole truth. Rama came out onto the veranda. “A public account of expenditure and the private details of a person at risk are two different records,” she said. “The office's duty is not to sell the contents of a private file.”

The young man who had been carrying the extract around was also in the crowd. Nasim reminded him of the question he had asked that morning. The young man said the red lettering was not his and that he had received the photograph from another group. “What if I've forwarded it?” he asked. “Then you have taken part in circulating it,” Naira replied. “But this extract still carries no proof of its date, the original file or the signature. It shows five altered entries, not five proven crimes.” On his telephone the young man wrote a correction below the earlier message: Reasons for alterations under investigation; private names not published. He had no account of all the places the extract had already reached. This was a correction, not complete control over its circulation.

Savitri Sardar had been standing in a corner of the same veranda for a long time. In her hand were a relief slip from her old village and an entry for the temporary residence she had occupied after the flood. An employee said that once the new village's name had been entered, recovering the dues outstanding from the old village would be difficult. “I moved to another village,” Savitri said. “I did not become another human being. Nor is a change of village proof that somebody is using a false name.” She showed two dates on which she had sought food and an unfilled distribution slip from the first camp. Against one date the document said Present, not Amount paid. She wanted her new village address to be corrected in the current relief register, but did not want the losses from earlier months crossed out as though they had automatically been settled.

Rama could issue separate acknowledgements for Savitri's two applications, but could not yet give a decision. Savitri attached evidence of her present village to the first application and a copy of her attendance on the earlier relief day to the second. “Write on the receipt: Earlier claim for assistance under consideration,” she said. An assistant again suggested entering the new village against the old page, so that two different dates would be absorbed into a single address. Savitri refused. “The date on which the rains came, and where I was living then, have not changed,” she said. Rama left the old record as it stood and attached a separate amendment sheet. No stamp was put on it to imply that the earlier relief claim had been automatically accepted.

A voice called from outside that Vinita Kesharwani had arrived with her household account books. From the grocery shop at the crossroads she extended credit for sixteen kinds of provisions. Turmeric stained the wooden weighing box in her shop, and rice dust clung beneath her fingernails. A man of the family who accompanied her said, “All the household's credit belongs in a single account. Separate signatures will only multiply the trouble.” Vinita laid two ledgers on the desk: one for goods purchased in her own name, the other for the family's shared business. “The debts I approved are mine to account for,” she said. “But if you put another person's liability against my name, show me the old receipts.”

The man protested that splitting the accounts would destroy the family's standing. Without speaking, Vinita opened an old sheet bound with red thread. Beside one date was the man's signature, yet half that same amount had already been entered in Vinita's own ledger. “Am I to pay the sum twice for the sake of our reputation?” she asked. The shopkeeper admitted that, when the copy was prepared, the total from the family ledger had been entered again in a separate account. Final reconciliation of the amounts was still outstanding, but he acknowledged in writing that the duplication of a single debt would be examined. Vinita opened a fresh credit page under her own name, setting its limit and the payment date herself.

Nasim asked Vinita's advice about the price of one of the cloth bags. “If you've supplied cloth, write down who is to pay for it,” she said. “The person whose documents go into the bag doesn't thereby become your customer.” Naira listened. An employee proposed putting the expenses of the five private conversations, the copies of Savitri's two applications, and the correction of Vinita's duplicated debt under a single item in the committee's fund. Vinita stopped him. “Where the charges are separate, the liabilities are separate. Don't use the cost of bags made for confidentiality to cancel a debt owed to my shop.” That short sentence showed Nasim a clear way to have his bill paid. The committee treasurer issued an approval slip for the payment; it contained none of the names hidden inside the bags.

Late in the office day an old covering letter belonging to the government's copy reached Rama. It said Restricted circulation for reasons of safety, but the individual orders authorising all five changes were not enclosed. In a corner of the sheet were two employees' initials and a date that could not be read clearly. “With this letter before us, all our office can say is this,” Rama said. “At some point somebody proposed restricted circulation. It has not yet been proved that all five entries were changed by the proper procedure.” Naira agreed. She did not copy into her public summary the fragments of names that could be read on that paper. Rama issued the next written order to search for the original, but invented no date by which it would be found.

When Naira went to pay the rent for the reading room, its owner asked, “How many people came?” “I am paying the full rent for all the hours for which we took the room,” she replied. “I have no consent to give you a list of the visitors.” Without argument, the owner wrote out a receipt for the money. Picking up the dried stem of bel leaves left by the window, Naira remembered Sugandha's hand. Not every little thing in a life becomes evidence. Some things belong simply to a person's day's work, a meal, or the memory of someone dear. She put the stem in the rubbish bin. There was no need to call it a preserved specimen and turn it into a trace of somebody's private story.

When she reached home that evening, Naira told Sarita the results of the day. She read out no names, describing only the differences in the five people's consent to publication and the absence of the government's original papers. Sarita was kneading flour; the dough clung stubbornly to one hand. “Did you meet everyone on the very first day?” she asked. “Three came to the reading room, one met us at her workshop, and one spoke by telephone,” Naira said. “It wasn't possible to have everyone sign the same sheet.” Sarita smiled. “That's right. A person chooses even the place in which to say what is hardest in the heart. And don't write zero in your summary for what someone has not said.” Naira did not turn her gaze towards her mother's closed box.

Naira prepared brief entries for five separate records of consent: what each person had been asked, through which means, what part of the answer could be shared, and what still required examination. Not one old name, neighbourhood, illness or original signature appeared in the public summary. In the register for documentary examination, the five discrepancies in the office's records were marked separately; she did not insert into that register the twenty-six exposed names and the covered twenty-seventh place on Sarita's private original sheet. Merging the two layers would add nothing to the evidence; it would merely violate the limits set for protection. What the first meetings had established was the right of all five people to make independent decisions, not final proof of why the office had altered their entries.

In the courtyard Kabir was cutting away a loose thread from the binding of an old book. Naira saw that the lamp in the inner room had grown dim. “Did you get an answer about anyone's name today?” Kabir asked. “Not an answer. I discovered the limits governing how an answer may be given,” Naira said. “One person wants the right to work under a name; another wants to keep her home address hidden behind it.” Kabir closed the book against its binding. “The examination of the fourteen discrepancies is tomorrow, isn't it?” he asked. Naira nodded. “Yes, but I won't call fourteen differences one mistake. If a changed name protects somebody today, declaring the entry wrong tomorrow could bring the harm straight back to that person.”

As Nasim closed his shop that night, he saw that the young man's corrected message had reached the information group, but two copies of the first red-lettered extract were still circulating. He sent the young man a short reply: My customers' ledger is not public material. If you want an account of the expense, ask the committee for the bill, not for the measurements of somebody's clothes. Then he gathered the fallen threads from beneath his sewing machine and sat down to record the measurements for the next day's work. Some of the five bags had been filled, others remained empty; no one else would decide whose bag belonged to whom and make that knowledge public. Outside the window, leaves fell from the neem tree. Inside, the clean page of the ledger bore only prices, dates and names of jobs—his own livelihood and the boundaries of other people's lives, each kept in its rightful place.

Chapter 88 · Fourteen Discrepancies

The wet shoes left in the veranda of the municipal office were making small marks of mud on the white floor. Stepping carefully around each mark, Naira made her way to the iron cupboard. Rama Karna had weighted down the covering letter found the day before with a wooden ruler, lest the fan's draught tear its half-burnt corner any further. “You said fourteen,” she asked. “Fourteen people, fourteen names, or fourteen mistakes?” Instead of unfolding the document, Naira picked up fourteen plain slips laid beneath it. “For now, these are fourteen cases in which discrepancies require investigation. In some, the facts do not agree; in others, the meaning of a field has been misunderstood; in still others, the document conferring authority is missing. We cannot give fourteen human lives the same treatment merely because we have put them under one number.”

Rama wrote “Original” on the first slip in blue ink. Naira stopped her. “Write down the source before calling anything an original. Sarita's handwritten list is her private original; the office copy may be the original of its own register. Those are not the same sheet of paper.” Rama let the ink dry and added “Source examination” above it. As the clerk Devshankar untied the thick string around a file, he said, “Settle them all with one correction order. Send out a letter and close the matter.” Rama pointed him towards the open complaints box beside the doorway. “Will a single order restore the account of someone wrongly entered as dead? Will it make a person safe whose home address must be withheld, if we write that person's name for everyone to see?”

Outside the window an old woman selling Darbhanga-style flattened rice was shaking rainwater from her shop's tarpaulin. Naira divided her fourteen slips into four piles: handwriting and matching; rights and classification; transactions and attendance; and access and protection. “These four piles are routes of inquiry, not decisions,” she said. Rama put a fifth, blank sheet beside them: “Disputed facts—no final order.” Just then Renu Gondhi's voice sounded in the veranda. Before coming in, Renu slipped off her wet sandals and left them at the dry edge of the steps, holding the map in her hand against her chest for fear it would be soaked.

Renu had brought the first measurement slip from the previous year, a photograph of the rope stretched across the path to the landing, and the acknowledgement number of her appeal. “At first they told me the lease was private, so I couldn't go down by the back shallows. Now I hear the whole pond has been included in the lease,” she said. Ramani Bind came in behind her, carrying a knot from a fishing net, not a printed manifesto. “I am speaking about my share of the fishing rights. Renu is speaking about the path by which she reaches the landing. The people asserting claims over those two things are not the same,” Ramani explained. Rama spread out the office's small map. A red line ran along its edge; the annexure to the old lease was not there. Renu bent to study it and then asked, “Does the mere sight of a red line amount to an order closing off the place?”

According to the survey employee, the rear enclosure had been closed to prevent accidents during the rainy months. “If that was a safety rope,” Renu asked, “which page specifies how long it is to stay, and the alternative way out?” The employee had no answer. He showed them a separate message from the private leaseholder describing the matter as “unauthorised entry”; the message was dated after the rope had been put up. Ramani said, “Putting a warning on the steps for people's safety is one thing. Handing the key to the entire landing over to a private person is another. I too need a place to spread my nets. But I will not purchase my right to fish at the price of Renu's right to walk there.”

From the records officer Ramani requested a complete copy of the old fishing-water lease, the original signed page, the map annexure, and the conditions of renewal. The officer offered a short abstract—the leaseholder's name at the top and the fee beneath it. “You cannot see the landing breathe in an abstract,” Ramani replied. “I want to know where the boundary of the fishing right ends, where the condition governing women's shared participation appears, and where the public right of passage lies.” She asked for a receipt for the copying fee. She was ready to pay the actual cost of the copies herself, but the documents must be complete. Rama accepted the written application and issued an acknowledgement.

Renu added a sentence to her appeal: while her request for removal of the enclosure awaited a hearing, arrangements for a separate safety inspection should be made, without treating ordinary access to the landing as already closed. Anita Chaupal, who had been sitting in the veranda, asked, “Will they hear your complaint only when Ramani gets the annexure to the lease?” “No,” Renu said. “I am giving them the date on which my passage was obstructed, the testimony, and the photograph of the rope. The question of how far the lease extends is another investigation. The two hearings must not spend months waiting for each other.” Rama issued two separate acknowledgements. For the first time Renu saw “Public Access to the Landing” written plainly at the top of her application. Her voice had not been lost in the crowd of papers headed “Fishing-Rights Dispute.”

Anita took from her bag a copy of a social-category register with a dark blue cover. The category added after her name on that page did not match the application she herself had completed. “People look at that field and decide what my life must be,” she said. “How many places must I go to explain myself, between the person who entered the mistake and those who believe it?” Devshankar said, “In the old list, people from a family with the same name appear under another category.” Anita interrupted him. “How does another member of my family's document become evidence about me? First bring out my original application. Give me the written rule specifying what proof is required here. Do not open a public argument over the name of my community.”

Rama searched the file. The applicant's signature appeared on the next page of the original application; the classification field seemed to have been filled in later, when the record was entered into the office computer. The digital history showing who had filled it was not immediately available. Naira wrote clearly: “Difference between original application and computer entry confirmed; responsibility for altering the entry under investigation.” Anita wanted the hearing on her scholarship application not to be held up by the mistake. Rama initiated an inquiry into arrangements for a temporary slip reading “Classification Under Dispute,” not a final certificate. There was little relief in Anita's voice, more determination. She asked who would receive a copy of the corrected register—and who would not.

Niranjan Kisan arrived at the other window. The sun had drawn fine lines across his face; a small packet of seed was tucked into the bag holding his papers. In the old bank-linked register, “Kisan” formed part of his family name. In the new digital form it had slipped into the field for occupation. The names therefore failed to match, and the account for his payment had been deactivated. “Change the occupation and it will be all right,” the clerk said. “It is true that I farm,” Niranjan replied. “But when you put a word belonging to my name under occupation, you erase me as a person. Changing the occupation may mean that tomorrow's payment is held up again.”

He laid down a short printed bank statement and an old cooperative-society membership slip. His name was written the same way on both. As the clerk began to read aloud the last four digits of the account, Niranjan stopped him. “Do whatever matching you have to do inside. If my account is spoken aloud across the veranda, who will know whose money is being discussed?” Rama prepared a request for an authorised name-matching letter from the bank. Without it, the municipal office could not claim that correcting the word in its own register would lift the bank's restriction. Niranjan added one last request: the bank must receive the acknowledgement of his objection before the date of the next seed grant.

As the three people were leaving, Naira saw that no single stamp of “mistake” could be placed on them all. Renu wanted a hearing against the obstruction of a pathway; Anita wanted an incorrect classification amended; Niranjan wanted a separate field for a person's name and for an occupation. An acknowledgement of an objection was not the right itself, but it could fix the next date on which that right would be heard. Beside her fourteen slips Naira added a new column: “Time-sensitive harm.” For Anita, the date her application would close; for Niranjan, the seed subsidy; for Renu, the season when the waters would rise. “If we leave out time,” Rama said, “justice in the file will, through delay, become injustice.”

In the afternoon Nasim Idrisi came carrying the cloth bags. He did not open all five of them before Rama. First he presented the sewing bill for the inquiry committee and asked whether a copy of the payment order would be placed in the public file or kept within the accounts. “Write the person's name as well,” the records officer suggested, “and the expense will be justified.” “The justification for the sewing lies in the bag's dimensions, the cloth, and the committee's written order,” Nasim said. “Not in a client's private affairs.” Rama recorded acceptance of the materials and service on the bill, not the names that might be placed inside the bags. On her own slip Naira wrote:

“Search continuing for the original orders authorising renaming for reasons of safety.”

There were four questions in Naira's first pile. In the first, a letter indistinct in the original had been made definite in the copy; the remedy was not to replace the letter by guesswork, but to obtain permission for a protected reading from the writer and mark the uncertainty. In the second, the two stamps “Present” and “Payment Received” at a relief camp had been treated as evidence of a single payment; that required checking against distribution receipts. In the third, the village where a flood survivor had first sought refuge and the village where she now lived had been entered under one date; Savitri asked that two entries be made according to their respective times. In the fourth, two papers bearing different names, produced by Mangla, had given rise to an allegation of claiming benefits twice, although the details of one recorded payment still required reconciliation. Beside each of the four slips Naira wrote down a separate source. Not one carried the words “Fraud proved.”

In the second pile were three forms of misclassification. Anita's social category had been wrongly added; that required comparison of her original application with the computer history. Niranjan's family name had migrated into the occupation field; that required an authorised reconciliation of names with the bank. Rosie Lalbegi's self-declared religion had been inferred from the work she performed; correcting it would begin with an independent declaration completed by Rosie herself. For a moment Devshankar said, “Isn't there a form for correcting the name in all three cases?” “In one,” Naira answered, “the spelling of a name is wrong; in another, someone's name has been turned into an occupation; in the third, a person's religion has been invented from her labour. The form may be the same without the question being the same.”

In the third pile lay testimony that Zahir's attendance had been recorded under another name; Vinita Kesharwani's duplicated credit entry; the page that had turned Rita Ekka's testimony into security for a debt; and Kamli's protected identity in the medicine register. Proof of the transactions was needed in all four matters, but a medical page could not be opened for discussion at a community assembly without permission. Rama wrote: “For attendance: employer's original list and worker's dates; for credit: reconciliation of the two ledgers; for debt: original agreement and examination of signatures; for medicines: authorised confidential clinical reconciliation.” Naira added two questions concerning protection to the fourth pile: who could see Sugandha's former address, and when administrative permission for the five altered entries had been given. In neither kind of case did the absence of evidence constitute permission to breach confidentiality.

Rama counted the fourteen slips. “Four, three, four, two—that makes thirteen.” Naira looked towards the window. The absence of the complete lease sought by Ramani and the private enclosure line drawn on Renu's map had remained on one slip, though the two claims were different. She picked up the fourteenth slip: “Distinction between the fishing-water lease annexure and public access.” Rama recorded that two independent applications would be attached within this case, and the disposal of one must not be taken as approval of the other. “A bamboo rope and a cloth bag are different things, however you count them under fourteen,” Ramani remarked from the doorway. She had returned because the office seal had been omitted from her copying-fee receipt.

A new clerk saw the fourteen slips and asked, “Were fourteen mistakes found in one list?” Naira corrected him. “These are fourteen discrepancies requiring examination across various related registers and cases of disputed claims. Sarita's private original list of twenty-seven names has not been absorbed into them. Its twenty-six visible lines and one protected line remain separate. Nor are we going to call the office's five altered identities five separate crimes within these fourteen.” The clerk flushed, but changed the heading on his sheet to “Discrepancy Cases, Not a List of Guilty Persons.” “That sentence must appear in the public copy too,” Rama said. “No personal names or abbreviations suggesting guilt are to go outside.”

At that moment a man arrived from the crossroads, describing himself as the leaseholder's representative. He had a photograph of a stamped document in his hand and demanded to see Renu's appeal. “Where is your letter of authority?” Rama asked. “My employer's name is on the map,” he said. “Seeing a name does not by itself entitle you to read someone else's complaint,” Rama replied. “You will receive notice of the public hearing, but not the original of her personal testimony.” The representative raised his voice. Fish prices at Barki Pond, he said, would fall, and theft would increase unless people were kept out. Ramani stepped forward. “If a fishing net has been stolen, write down the date and lodge a complaint. Don't use an imagined thief to cover up the question of the right to walk to the landing.”

In the photograph he had brought, the lease fee was legible on one half of the document; the annexure defining its boundaries had been cut off. Ramani did not ask permission to take the photograph onto her own telephone. “I will obtain the complete copy from the office. I cannot found my claim on half a photograph,” she said. Looking at a red mark of mud on the office floor, Renu remarked, “That is mud from the shallows. Has anyone even swept the steps down to the landing today? They use safety as an excuse for closing it, and do nothing to make it safe.” Rama drafted a letter requesting a joint inspection date from the municipal roads team and the fisheries branch. She did not conclude in that letter that the enclosure was either lawful or unlawful.

Niranjan had not gone home. He had sat beneath the office neem tree, making call after call to the bank. He was told that an officer's signature would be needed to reopen the account blocked because of the confusion over his name, but the bank officer would have to see the papers first. Niranjan came inside again. “I will not open a new account under another name,” he said plainly. “All the transactions of my old account, my share of the crop, are there. Correcting a wrong field must not erase the past.” Rama explained the limit of her authority: she could forward an application to correct the original municipal register, but she could not order the bank to reactivate the account. Niranjan accepted the letter with that limitation stated in it and resolved to attend that week's meeting of the agricultural cooperative himself.

Anita received a stamped copy of one of the two versions of her written objection, but sat down again when she read the stated reason: “False caste declared.” The words placed the blame for an administrative mistake upon her. “I have made no false declaration. Your register added the wrong category,” she said. Beside the stamp Rama wrote a correction: “Conflict between applicant's original particulars and office entry; cause unknown.” Anita read it carefully for two minutes. She wanted the unwanted classification removed, but not at the price of officials going from house to house to interrogate the community. Rama made clear that the confidential annexure would be preserved for authorised examination, not pinned to the public noticeboard.

Afternoon was fading beside Barki Pond. Renu returned to the rope, which someone had removed in the night and someone else had tied up again. Two children came running towards the landing, then stopped for fear their feet would sink into the mud. Renu showed them the safer path along the firm paved edge and warned them of the slippery ground. Her appeal against a private enclosure did not mean that anyone should step into the shallows before they had been measured. Picking a thin leaf from the mesh of her net, Ramani said, “When we get the copy, we will look first at the boundary of the bank, then at the fishing share.” Her daughter examined the knot in the rope and asked, “Whose is this?” “We shall ask the person who tied it,” Ramani answered. “And listen to the one who needs to pass.”

In the evening Naira went to the municipal public reading room. The young man from the day before was sitting there once again with his phone. A photograph of the red excerpt was still circulating in his group; this time people had begun writing “Fourteen Guilty Names” beneath it. Naira showed him the public heading of the fourteen cases, not the private documents. “So these aren't fourteen people?” he asked. “No,” said Naira. “In some cases there are two documents concerning one person; in others one service involves several people; in some, permission to examine the evidence is still outstanding. Join two numbers together and make a portrait of a human being out of them, and the correction itself becomes another rumour.”

In a corner of the reading room, a woman who had once been Sarita's pupil was teaching her daughter the multiplication tables. Seeing the paper clipping, she asked, “If there is a mistake in a list, does somebody die?” Naira paused before answering. “Sometimes a wrong entry can stop someone from receiving medicine, a livelihood, or an entitlement. But it would be wrong to say without inquiry that every error has caused a death.” “My daughter's name was entered wrongly at school,” the woman said. “I spent a whole month running from place to place. One day the teacher corrected it. But who will give her back that month of learning?” Naira wrote down the question without recording a register number. Every experience had its own measure; it could not be used as a pretext for increasing the count of fourteen cases.

When she reached home, Naira read Sarita a copy of the public summary. Skimming the froth from a pot of red lentils on the hearth, Sarita said, “You have got your count of fourteen right. But will those who brought complaints have a chance to read the answers?” “Each application has its own acknowledgement and the next date is written down,” Naira replied. “We will not send a public letter to someone whose page is private.” “And my twenty-seventh layer?” Sarita asked. “There is no new conjecture about that today,” Naira said. Sarita put the lid back on the pot. The smell of the lentils had warmed the room.

Rama remained in the office that night. She laid a heavy sheet over the fourteen slips, recording in order: which original had been inspected; which account was testimony alone; which order was missing; which officer was responsible for answering; and on what date the applicant could expect information. She left unchanged the protections surrounding the five altered identities. With Renu's and Ramani's two independent appeals, a complete annexure to the same fishing-water lease had been requested, but each answer would go to a different person. The validity of Anita's incorrect category would be examined separately from Niranjan's bank-and-cooperative reconciliation over his name; their next dates remained different. Small corrections had been made that day. Final resolution, and the question of responsibility, remained.

As Rama went to close the window, she noticed an old covering sheet concerning a death notification protruding from the cupboard. The list described someone as “Dead,” yet a slip showing active transactions had been attached to it; the actual recipient of the payment was not clear from the document. She would not squeeze it onto the last page of the fourteen cases. This new comparison needed its own examination of sources, person, and dates. She placed the papers in a separate grey folder and wrote, “Not a declaration that the person is alive; reconciliation of death notice pending.” The sight of an active account belonging to a dead person did not bring the dead back to life; nor could anyone be named a criminal without first establishing that a living person had been wrongly entered as dead. The first star had appeared outside the window. Two lamps were still burning in the office.

Before dawn Ramani was still mending the knots of her net. Half-asleep, her daughter asked, “Mother, will they write my name in that lease today?” Ramani stroked her head. “Today I asked for the whole document. I did not sign what I had not seen. Tomorrow I must speak again about the path and the net.” The girl lifted the circular mouth of the net in her small hands; the thread tightened a little round her fingers. Ramani loosened the knot. Outside, a breath of wind raised small ripples on the pond, and one end of the tied rope moved soundlessly. Cutting it would have been easy. What remained was to write plainly who had a right to which path.

Chapter 89 · Four Living, Four Dead

Before the municipal office windows were opened, Rama Karna set two shallow, tray-like lids upon her desk. One held blue slips, the other ochre. She had not taken home overnight the death notification and the account of active transactions discovered inside the grey folder. These were papers belonging to a government cupboard, and responsibility for their safekeeping rested with the office. When Naira arrived, Rama did not immediately pass her the first sheet. She began by reading out two headings: “Declared dead, personally alive” and “Death confirmed, account still active.” Naira said, “In one group we must correct an error; in the other we must investigate transactions. If we interchange the headings, we shall turn the living person's very body into grounds for suspicion, and a dead person's name into that of a culprit.” Beyond the window, the veranda was filling with the smell of yellowing paper.

The first blue slip concerned Sarita Das. Her name and identifying number had been entered in a death notification, yet she had appeared at a public meeting to object in person. The office's acknowledgement of her written statement was also in the file. The second slip concerned Fakira, whose access pass at the railway crossroads had been suspended on the grounds that he was dead. Fakira was alive, with his voice, his walking stick and the earnings of his day's work; but a copy of his old pass could not, by itself, restore his status. Rama wrote: “Physical presence and personal statement received; order cancelling death entry not received.” Naira added that the public portion of Sarita's statement at the meeting and Fakira's occupational permit had not originated from the same source.

The person named on the third blue slip was a woman living in the relief settlement. She had made repeated journeys to the office to prove that she was alive. Today she had brought, in a cloth bag she had sewn herself, receipts for medical examinations on two separate dates. She did not consent to having her name made public, but agreed to have her identity and signature compared before the investigating officer. “My medicine was stopped, and so people took me for dead,” she said. “But why should a prescription be the only way for me to prove that I am alive? Give me somewhere to speak for myself as well.” Rama placed her statement in a sealed cover and noted the date on which the office was to decide. As the woman lifted her bag, she said she had sewing to finish that day; this hearing could not be allowed to swallow her whole life.

The fourth blue slip concerned a young man who carried bundles at the bus stand. Payment had stopped when a death mark was entered beside a date in his wage register, though he possessed separate receipts for work done after that date. Rama asked whether he would accept making an application for a “new birth,” without any evidence, merely to have someone remove the mark. The young man did not laugh. “The wages I earned in my old days will not be transferred to the name of a new man,” he said. He requested that the location of his stand be concealed in the public account, because his former contractor had been calling him ever since he demanded his arrears. Naira prepared three separate requests on his behalf: for the original wage register, the work receipts and the digital history of the date on which the death mark had been entered.

Naira's hand stopped as she opened the first sheet from the ochre pile. Sarita's husband's death certificate was seventeen years old; a recent hospital medicine-distribution slip had been issued in his name. Two stamps were visible: the medicine had been prepared and it had been collected. But the signature of the person who collected it was not on this copy. Naira wrote, “Death document independently verified; recipient of distribution unknown.” It would be senseless to declare her husband's death a falsehood merely to make the new slip correct. It would be equally wrong, on the strength of the slip alone, to accuse someone in the dead man's household of stealing medicine. Rama set aside a separate letter requesting certified copies of the dispensary's original distribution ledger, the code of the person who authorised the issue, and the recipient's signature.

On the second ochre slip, regular deductions of interest appeared against the old savings account of a deceased labourer. His family had submitted a copy of the death certificate, but the deductions had continued under an automatic standing instruction. Naira said, “The transactions are continuing—that is true. But if a machine goes on deducting interest by itself, it does not prove that someone has withdrawn money with their own hands.” The third sheet showed rent being deposited on a fishing lease after the lessee's death. A family member said that they had paid an old amount due. That statement required verification, but the deposit did not automatically turn the deceased person's name into a false identity. The fourth ochre slip recorded a fee for the “release of an item” from an old pawn account. The receipt showing into whose hands the item had actually passed was missing.

Beside the eight slips Naira wrote eight separate descriptions of their status. Each blue case concerned the effect of a death mark upon a living person; each ochre case concerned recorded activity after a verified death. The fourteen discrepancies remained a separate matter, as did Sarita's list of twenty-seven names, kept locked away at home. Rama counted: “Four living, four dead.” Devshankar asked, “So eight crimes?” Naira turned to him. “Eight questions, with eight paths of investigation. Only the court and the competent investigators may count crimes, and only after the evidence.” She also recorded the instruction that the names of the deceased were not to be published without their families' consent. Light from the window had climbed onto the corners of the papers, but the empty space between the blue and ochre piles remained wide.

That day, beside Rajinar, Sudha Rai stopped the unloading of bamboo posts brought for a school veranda roof. Two workers already stood with tools for digging the holes. A schoolteacher, having heard the public announcement of the donation, had come to offer thanks. But the proposed boundary of the gift ran across the narrow path regularly used by two tenant families and their children. Sudha said, “I do not wish to withdraw my gift. But if we plant these posts today and narrow somebody's everyday passage, I shall have done nobody a kindness.” The teacher asked when he should announce the date for building the veranda. “When those who use the land I wish to give have been heard,” Sudha replied.

One of the tenants, a woman carrying a bundle of dry wood for the evening hearth, saw the bamboo posts and said, “A veranda is a good thing. But I take my handcart around this bend, and when my mother-in-law is ill we carry her out on a cot. It is easy to tell us to use another path; in the rains that way goes under water.” A member of Sudha's family said that paying rent did not confer permanent rights over land. Sudha interrupted him. “We shall examine the papers to determine the nature of those rights. But to write a false deed of gift without measuring how people actually live and move here is another matter.” She fixed a meeting to measure separately the needs of the schoolchildren, the tenants and the builders of the veranda. Their names were entered not on the publicity board announcing the donation but on the acknowledgement sheet for the hearing.

Sudha herself struck out a line in her first declaration: “Unconditional donation of the entire parcel.” In its place she wrote, “Proposed use subject to examination of tenancy and rights of passage.” The teacher was disappointed, for the school had already fixed the day for a public inauguration. From the initial sum she had set aside for the gift, Sudha paid the day's wages of the workers whose time had been wasted, but she did not pay the entire construction bill for work that had not been done. The tenant woman asked whether she could speak for herself at tomorrow's meeting if her husband could not attend. Sudha answered, “It is you who walk that path. Your words need not wait for someone to represent you.”

On the other side of the market, Basanti Pan was examining a line in a government copy of her identity record that linked three different words. The self-description in her family's old application had become, on the new computer page, one field labelled “accepted equivalents.” The clerk said the entries Pan, Sawasi and Panar were connected to benefits under a single category; too many questions would delay her certificate. Basanti replied, “The benefits code belongs to your accounts. The identity I speak aloud will not be erased for your convenience. First write down the word I use; then show me the rule governing your official category.” In her hand was a small bag of bael leaves she had brought for a niece who sold them in the market. She could not abandon a whole day's work over the dispute about her official identity.

For the first time, the clerk preparing the copy showed her two separate fields on his screen: “Applicant's self-stated identity” and “Office classification.” The first field could be filled in, but when the certificate was printed the government term appeared again. Basanti told him, “Then keep my words in the original record and register my objection to the printed term. For now, I want an acknowledgement of verification, not a false assurance.” She asked another woman, who was about to sign her application in haste, to have its lines read aloud. The woman thanked her and said that she wanted her own name explained correctly, not Basanti's identity for herself. Basanti smiled. “That is precisely why I want everyone's page to remain separate.”

At noon Sharda Kasaudhan was turning the pages of an old ledger in her family's pawnshop. Her elder brother, seated by the window, was considering joining the names of two customers on one combined slip. Sharda did not snatch the book away. Instead, she pointed out the dates: on the first pledge, the principal; on the second, the woman who owned the pledged item; on the third, the charge for redeeming it. In the first, an item of interest had been entered twice; in the second, “family” stood where the woman's name should have been; in the third, the signature acknowledging the return of the article was absent. “If we open up the old books,” her brother said, “people will think the shop is not even being run properly.” Sharda answered, “To keep it running, we need a ledger. We do not need a false one.” She prepared three separate customer acknowledgements and set aside the double-charged interest under a temporary heading for disputed amounts.

When the first customer's payment details had been checked, Sharda admitted that the additional interest entry was an accounting error. Even after correcting the slip, she asked whether the customer preferred the overcharged amount returned in cash or deducted from the principal. The customer chose cash. Sharda paid it and handed over the corrected receipt, but she did not mark the other two pledges “settled.” Her brother asked whether this ledger contained any old pledge still operating in the name of a dead person. Sharda said, “I do not intend to write that a dead person is alive merely because an account appears active. First we shall examine the original death document, ownership of the pledged article, and the signature acknowledging its delivery—each separately.”

Just then Nahid Moghal arrived carrying a bag of documents belonging to her mother's family. She had not come to Sharda to settle the sum of a pledge; she wanted to understand the limits of consent regarding a share of land. An old letter inside the bag used the name “Livari” for a river in reference to her maternal village. It described a field beside a river, but could not establish where that channel ran on a present-day map. “This letter comes from my mother's side," Nahid said. "If anyone records a decision about mortgaging this share without me, I shall stop it." Sharda told her she could authorise even a copy of the letter if she wished, but ownership of the family pledge and verification of the relevant signatures required a separate, duly authorised procedure.

Nahid drew the cord of her bag tight. "I shall not leave a copy now," she said. "First I will ask my family which part of the letter may be shown. Nobody is going to make the entire address of my mother's family public merely on hearing the name Livari." On the blank application sheet Sharda wrote only: "Consent regarding maternal share disputed." She did not press for a photograph of the entire document. Leaving the shop, Nahid stopped at Bina Kalar's stall at the market bend and counted out the price of two small bottles herself. The papers concerning her home were uncertain; this small act of buying and paying was her own decision.

Meanwhile the municipal office had received preliminary information about the four active accounts of deceased persons. In the second ochre case, the bank confirmed that the recurring interest deduction was the result of a standing instruction; no withdrawal of cash by a human being had yet been established. On the third sheet, the person who had deposited the fishing-lease rent had offered to supply a separate receipt, which had not yet arrived. In the fourth, the original receipt for the redeemed pledged article was reported missing, making it impossible to say to whom the article had been handed. In the first case, the hospital had still not sent the original register for the medicine distributed in Sarita's husband's name. Naira wrote "Inquiry continuing" against all four, but entered a different condition beside each.

Differences had also emerged among the four blue slips. The original minutes of the public meeting in Sarita's case bore an official seal. The railway service office had sent notice of the suspension of Fakira's pass, but it was unclear in which department the original death mark had been entered. The woman from the relief settlement again confirmed her presence before an officer, while the young porter's old wage receipts had been submitted for inspection. The private addresses of the third and fourth persons did not appear in the public summary. As Rama handed out acknowledgements, she asked each person into whose hands the reply should be delivered. Sarita herself said, "My reply into my own hands. Why should proof that I am alive be laid upon my daughter's head?"

That afternoon Naira noticed a small and unsettling detail. Even after Sarita's first objection to the death entry, one office copy showed the mark "Dead" entered again in an update. The update details specified "selected manually," but the file contained no history of the authority to select that mark, the reason for doing so, or who had ordered it. Devshankar said, "That looks deliberate." Naira stopped him. "We can see a deliberate action in the fact that someone manually selected the mark again after the objection. We have not established the connection between the person, the purpose and the order.” Rama issued written instructions to preserve the original computer change log, the access permissions of the responsible user and the update order for that day, so that nothing could be erased again before the investigation.

Outside, someone had told a junior newspaper reporter that accounts belonging to eight dead people had been discovered in town. The reporter came to Rama with his notebook. “Eight people still earning money after they died?” he asked. Rama showed him only the public summary on her desk. “Four living people were recorded as dead; four people who truly died have activity entered under their names after death. To call both groups eight dead people is wrong. And a bank entry showing activity is not the same as someone actually receiving money.” The reporter asked whether he could have photographs. Naira replied, “Who has given anyone the right to turn the private injury of people struggling to establish that they are alive into a picture?” She asked him to read the date and the limits of the sources stated in the public summary.

Towards evening Sudha returned to Rajinar. With the work suspended, the bamboo posts lay drying in a pile. The tenant woman had brought her child. Looking at the posts, the child asked whether the veranda would not be built after all. Sudha showed them the proposed path marked out on the earth; this time the turning space for a child's cart had also been traced in lime. The child pushed a toy wheel along it, only for it to stick at the bend. A craftsman said, “The width may be correct on your paper, not on a toy's wheel.” The woman answered, “The bamboo frame of a cot is bigger than this. Let us take the real measurements tomorrow.” Sudha arranged for a fresh measurement the next day; the announcement of the gift remained conditional.

On her way home, Basanti unfolded the acknowledgement of her application. The printed official equivalent was still there, but a separate line now recorded the identity she had stated herself. It was not the final certificate, yet the words she had spoken were no longer outside the office's scrutiny. Her niece opened the bag of bael leaves and asked whether their price would be paid now or tomorrow. Basanti counted out the money. “The account for the leaves belongs to today; the question of identity to tomorrow,” she said. Preparing for the next day's work, she put a small mark in the corner of her old ledger. She did not intend to let the labour of her trade disappear into the shadow of a dispute about her name.

Supper was being cooked at Sarita's house. Naira had not brought home the open papers from either the blue or the ochre pile; she had only the public summary and a copy of her mother's application. As she stirred salt into the lentils, Sarita said, “When you say four living, I understand that I am one of them. But my husband's death must not become a falsehood for somebody else's convenience. Medicine was collected in his name: ask who collected it. Do not declare him alive and cancel the papers that acknowledge me as his widow.” Naira agreed. Sarita then asked which officer would provide a written answer about the repeated “Dead” entry and when the correction would be made. Naira gave the date of the inquiry; she did not promise a particular result.

Kabir arrived while they were there. He wanted to send a message asking to meet Subhadra, but when he saw the public death-notification sheet on Sarita's table, he asked, “Who decides how far one may go in telling the story of another person's life?” Serving the meal, Sarita answered, “First, the person whose story it is. And whoever listens must first ask which part is theirs to use.” Kabir said that his wish to see the old records of his birth was held in check by Subhadra's privacy. Sarita offered him no name or date. “Give her the opportunity to state her own conditions,” she said. On his phone Kabir asked Subhadra only when they could meet; he did not ask her to write out and send her story.

Before closing the office for the night, Rama prepared separate correspondence for the two piles. In the blue cases: personal appearance by the living individual, the original history of the erroneous death entry, interim steps to restore essential services, and a date for the reply. In the ochre cases: confirmation of death, the source of the active transaction, the actual recipient, and verification of the rights of an authorised heir. Sarita's list of twenty-seven names was not made an appendix to either. Naira saw that on each of the eight slips at least one question now required an official answer in writing. Yet nobody's guilt had been proved; the history of any death had not been altered; and the four erroneous death marks had not yet been removed by formal order.

As Rama extinguished the last light, she looked through the window. Damp air came from the direction of Barki Pond. The shadow of Ramani mending her nets on the ghat and Renu's demand for a public pathway still awaited separate hearings. Sudha's deed of gift and its passageway, Basanti's own spoken name, Sharda's corrected interest and Nahid's unopened maternal-family letter each remained where it belonged. On the paper the four blue and four ochre marks stood clear; but it would have been wrong to compress the time of living people and the rights of the dead person's family into a single colour. Rama tied the folder shut. At dawn those seeking answers would come again. Their time had belonged to them all along; now the office would have to account for it.

Chapter 90 · Subhadra's Condition

Subhadra put a little thin oil into the clasp of the old brass-bound chest and turned the key. The lid was still caught from within. With one hand she pressed down the wooden rim; with the other she lifted the chest open. The cotton pouch inside had faded, but its knot had been tied with care. Instead of untying it, she first wiped down the two chairs standing against the wall of the room. Kabir was coming to sit with her today. She had given him time to hear his questions, not to open every sealed page of her life. On the table, the shadows of neem leaves swaying beside the window stirred. On a small slip of paper Subhadra wrote: "Conditions for Speaking." Seeing the words set down, she felt her voice grow a little steadier.

Kabir arrived a little before the appointed hour. He brought neither fruit nor books, only a plain cloth bag containing his own notebook and a bottle of water. Seating him on the veranda, Subhadra asked, "Tell me first, in your own words, what it is you want to know." Kabir did not rush. "I want to learn the truth behind the blank space in my birth papers. But I cannot cut the story of the home where I was raised out of my life. The time for telling is yours. I only need to know how I should put my questions." Subhadra looked at his empty hands. She was glad he was not casting his eyes towards the chest, but she did not allow that pleasure to soften her conditions.

"The first condition," she said, taking up the slip, "is that nothing said today will be recorded. If anything needs to be written down, ask my permission first. Second: without my permission, no one is to show another person any name, address, date of birth, or photograph of an old letter. Third: wherever I choose to stop, the right to decide when we begin again will remain mine. Fourth: you have the right to ask questions; you do not have the right to publish the answers immediately." Kabir listened to every word. "Would these rules prevent me from writing down my own memories?" he asked. "No," Subhadra replied. "Your memories belong to you. But you must not publish a private story I tell you by passing it off as your own recollection." For the first time, even their disagreement had been spoken aloud between them.

"If something you tell me reveals a fact about my own life," Kabir said, "how am I to verify it?" Subhadra was silent for a while. From beside the brazier indoors came the fragrance of roasted makhana. "Verify the fact," she said softly, "but do not go knocking at another household's door with that name without asking me. Do not make someone who is still alive suddenly answer for a part of their past. If documents must be examined as evidence, I shall decide which copies may be shown and to whom. The need for truth and another person's safety must both be placed on the same table." Kabir said he would write his questions in sequence and show them to Subhadra first. The condition was recorded, but no definite date was set for her answers.

At Subhadra's request, Naira came in the afternoon. She had not been invited into the sitting room; she sat on the veranda, there only to confirm what kind of copy each person was permitted to see. “When you are investigating,” Subhadra asked, “will you not photograph a private document as soon as you find one?” “I shall first record its original source, the permission given, and the purpose for which it is to be used,” Naira replied. “The need to use it in a news report would have to be established separately.” Subhadra read out her four conditions. Naira suggested one qualification to the final sentence: nothing would be made public without permission, but if evidence were demanded through lawful process, separate advice would be sought. Subhadra added the amendment in her own hand. She wanted her conditions to protect privacy, not to become a weapon for concealing falsehood.

Just then a message came from Kamala Thakur at the market. The elderly woman who had claimed that an old bracelet belonged to her maternal family had brought the original pawn receipt to the shop that day; the young man had also brought the account of a business debt. Kamala wanted Naira not as a witness to the dispute but solely to verify the time at which the copies of the receipts were made. “You may go,” Subhadra said. “Nothing said in this house is to find its way into that shop's papers.” Kabir made ready to rise, but she stopped him. “There are still questions I have for you. Do not take what I have not said today and turn that absence of an answer into proof of somebody's suspicions.” Kabir sat down again. Subhadra gave him a copy of her written conditions. The chest containing the papers remained shut.

There was no fire burning in Kamala's shop, only a small blue lamp by whose light the metal of the jewellery could be plainly seen. The elderly woman laid the bracelet upon a red cloth. The crooked flower worked on its inner surface was precisely as Kamala had seen it at their first meeting. The young man spread on the table the account of a loan taken by his father. “It was a debt of the household,” he said. “The ornament was kept at the shop, so I shall repay the principal from its sale.” The elderly woman did not reach for it. “Find out who benefited from the loan. Find out separately who owned the bracelet.” Kamala opened a ledger from her old register. The weight and date of pawning were recorded, but the space headed “Head of Household” did not contain the name of the object's owner. Neither party's claim had yet been fully established.

Kamala had two copies prepared. On the first she recorded the elderly woman's claim of ownership, her memory of a gift from her maternal home, and the bracelet's distinguishing mark. On the second she recorded the debt, the amount, the signatures, and the dispute over who might be liable to repay it. “If you separate the two papers,” the young man asked, “won't you delay the decision?” “If I put them together,” Kamala answered, “it will be easy to sell someone's property without ever hearing that person." The elderly woman supplied the name of a living witness from her maternal family, but forbade anyone to record that person's telephone number without consent. Kamala issued a fresh receipt for keeping the article in her custody and imposed a temporary hold on its sale. She neither seized the ornament and handed it to the elderly woman nor cancelled the young man's debt. It was then that the elderly woman looked, for the first time, not at the ornament but at her own name upon the receipt.

As Naira was leaving the shop, Kamala asked her, "How many women's possessions have disappeared under the habit of writing 'Head of Household' on a piece of paper?" "We cannot calculate that from this one bracelet," Naira replied. "But it would be wrong to dismiss the question raised by this bracelet as a mere family quarrel." Gathering her brass weights, Kamala said, "I am a goldsmith. I can test whether a metal has been adulterated; I cannot test its owner's rights by the colour of the metal. For that, we need testimony, deposit receipts, and a hearing." She herself decided not to give the shop key to anyone who sought to wrest the elderly woman's ornament away through financial intimidation. To Kamala, the price of respecting another's privacy was a cost of doing business, not merely a moral lesson.

In the municipal registry room, Nilima Nurang was lifting the transparent cover around a copy of her marriage record. The paper named her father and husband, but there was a rubbed smear of ink where the name of a woman from her maternal home should have stood. She had submitted her first application months earlier and still kept its acknowledgement number. "A woman's family of birth is identified through her father," the clerk said. "Why make fresh trouble?" Nilima did not rise from her chair. "My birth record carried the names of two parents. When the marriage copy was made, one name disappeared. I am asking for that entry to be restored as it stood in the register. No one's marital status will change because of it." Her voice was composed, though the corner of the paper trembled slightly in her hand.

Nilima laid out separately the recorded sequence of the original entry, the maternal name printed on the wedding invitation, and an old guardianship letter signed by her mother. The clerk tried to treat all three as the same kind of proof. "An invitation is a statement printed for society," Nilima said. "The original register is an official entry; a letter from my mother's home is a personal statement. Each serves a different purpose." She had her application worded "Restoration of an Erased Name," not "Addition of a New Name." An elderly employee seated nearby explained that written permission would be required to bring out the bound volume of the original marriage register. Nilima took an acknowledgement of that procedure. She received no order correcting the record, but for the first time her request had become a formal records-correction case rather than a "routine family request."

Beside the village field on Nilima's marriage paper stood another name, that of a local watercourse: “Nima.” An assistant immediately began marking a river on a map. Nilima stayed his hand. “My mother used this name when she spoke of the village. I have not yet established which channel it referred to, or in which season. The word is on the paper; do not make a fixed boundary out of it.” Naira noted the source of the entry and its date. The presence of the word Nima on that page was directly verifiable; the actual river course or confluence could not be settled from the document. Nilima wanted the name from her mother's home restored, but she did not want the geography of that home's memory imprisoned within a mistaken map.

Into the same registry room came Tulsi Donwar, carrying two villages' papers wrapped in coarse matting. The first concerned the old boundary and debt entry of a field lost to river erosion; he had already shown it to Naira through Suraj Gangota. The second concerned his family's shared rights of use in another village, where new signatures and the names of older witnesses were recorded separately. Seeing the address on the first sheet, an office employee told him to take the second away. “A lease from one village cannot wipe out my path in another,” Tulsi said. “And the debt on the eroded field is still in my hands. Just because sand has covered it, the field does not grow back in the bank's ledger.”

Tara Mallik had been called to the sandbank to measure the boundary. The sun was directly overhead. Along the river, the wet sand was deep in some places and hard in others; where the surface looked level from a distance, the pressure of a foot brought out a fine gleam of water. Suraj Gangota pointed towards the old embankment. “There used to be rice here, and over there in the lowland we tethered the cattle.” Tara unrolled her measuring cord but said, “What I measure today is the ground as it stands now. The old field's dimensions are in the records; evidence of the shifting bank will be needed separately. Even if the land forms again, questions of possession and debt will not automatically become one and the same.” For the first time Tulsi himself took hold of the end of the cord.

A cart loaded with sand became stuck on the sloping approach to the landing. Its driver wanted the survey team to move back behind the vehicle. Tara gathered in the cord where it would have been difficult for the wheels to move under their load, but she did not leave the choice of measuring points to the driver. A boy was sorting sand nearby; the wet earth was subsiding around his feet. Tulsi told him to climb onto the dry rise first. “If the cart stops, I'll be paid only half my fare,” the boy said. Tulsi gave him water from his bag, but did not presume that a rescue entitled him to take over responsibility for the boy's wages; he raised the question of payment for the lost time with the driver. Tara briefly recorded the dispute in the inspection note. Accounting for the river's erosion meant more than marks on a map: it meant the risks borne by those who earned their living there every day.

In Tulsi's papers from the second village, names appeared beneath two separate headings, “Balan” and “Bhutahi Balan.” The clerk casually reached for a pencil to strike out one of them and make a new combined name. Tulsi stretched out his hand to stop him. “These papers belong to two different times. First establish what each name referred to, and from what source the other paper was drawn.” Tara explained that the available names provided no basis for declaring a single, definite river channel, confluence, or boundary of rights. Tulsi wanted someone to read the evidence of his older interests in the second village; there was no need to invent a false geography to do so. The employee accepted copies of both source documents with the application and assigned a separate date for examining the boundary.

In the evening Kabir came again to Subhadra's house. He brought a short list of questions written out beforehand. At the top were the headings “Name,” “Time,” and “Who May Be Told”; beneath them was a question about his date of birth, but no guessed answer. Subhadra read the questions one by one. “The question of the name must be deferred for now,” she said. “As for time, I must first examine my old papers. And the third question—who may be told—I shall not settle that in a single day.” “Do I need permission to speak to the people who brought me up in my own home?” Kabir asked. “Your own home belongs to you,” Subhadra replied. “But when you receive something as a private memory from me, do not change its source and tell it to them as though it came from elsewhere.”

Kabir felt that Subhadra was not inviting him even one step farther in. “If all these rules continue for very long,” he said, “I shall be left alone with my questions.” For the first time Subhadra leaned forward from the back of her chair. “I, too, had to live alone with what I had to say for a very long time,” she replied. “That does not give me the right to silence you. But neither does your restlessness give you authority over the history of my body.” Kabir lowered his eyes. He heard in her words not privacy alone, but her weariness and the cost of choices she had once been made to bear. Instead of offering an apology, he said, “I shall ask again when we may talk. If you do not speak today, I shall not record your silence as an admission of guilt.”

Subhadra did not open the chest. From a table drawer she took out only an old envelope, on which a name had been written in unfinished ink and a blot obscured the place for the date. The paper inside remained sealed; Kabir did not touch it. “Look,” she said, “the existence of a name is directly visible, but the meaning of the whole letter is not yet known. There is an old dispatch slip associated with this envelope, but it still remains to be established whose house was written on it. And there is something I myself may tell you after some time. Its value as testimony will be that of firsthand experience, not automatic confirmation of every document.” Kabir heard the difference between the three levels of evidence. He did not lean forward to read the name. For now, what mattered was that Subhadra should be able to keep the boundary she had set herself.

“If you tell me something later,” he asked, “will I be able to fill the blank space I saw in my old foster-care record with that answer?” “Understand first why the space is blank,” Subhadra replied. “Sometimes a document is incomplete because the person writing it did not know. Sometimes it is incomplete because someone was not allowed to write. Those two causes require different kinds of proof.” Kabir remembered drying the rain-soaked bag of the woman who had raised him. “I do not need a birth slip for that memory,” he said. “But I shall ask her about it too, so that I remember it accurately.” Subhadra asked after the woman's health. Kabir said that these days she spent her time on the veranda, giving Tulsi water. Subhadra smiled.

When Naira returned, Subhadra showed her only the page setting out their consent, not the substance of their conversation. Beside her signature she wrote: “Kabir may put his questions; each use of any part of an answer requires separate consent.” Kabir added in his own hand: “I shall make clear the source of any memory or old document that I discover independently.” Naira gave each of them a copy. She made no note of any private birth details for herself. “What we have written gives me the right to my own time,” Subhadra said. “But if fear comes over me later, it would not be right for me to drive you away and silence you at every meeting. I shall tell you a day when we may meet again.” Kabir accepted the promise not as an adequate answer, but as an adequate beginning.

Across the market, Kamala locked the pawned bracelet in a secure compartment before closing her shop for the night. The elderly woman's claim of ownership and the young man's debt papers were in separate envelopes; the date of the next hearing was written on each. Nilima Nurang sent the acknowledgement of her application to her maternal home, but did not write that the register had already been corrected. Tulsi Donwar left his sand-wet shoes outside and spread out the papers from the second village to dry. His debt had not diminished that day; but the immediate attempt to erase his claim in one village on the strength of an address from another had been stopped. In three separate homes the same kind of night had arrived: a small and difficult chance to speak for oneself about one's own name.

On their way back, Naira and Kabir were held up in a narrow lane. An elderly bookseller was dragging his shop bench inside. Kabir helped lift the wooden bench, while Naira rescued two books from the threshold before they became wet. “Is there still room for books in your house?” the bookseller asked. “I'm thinking of putting up two shelves in the little room,” Kabir said. “But one of them will hold not Naira's archives, but the books she chooses for herself.” Naira laughed. “And there must be a separate shelf for your old notebooks. The greatest right in that room, though, will belong to the window: it must let the air in without letting the pages blow away." The bookseller promised to give them measurements from some old timber.

As they crossed the lane, Naira asked, "After hearing so much today, are you disappointed?" Kabir walked a little farther before speaking. "I received no answer," he said. "But today I understood that even waiting for an answer carries a cost in another person's life. I used to hope that one name would explain every year behind me. Now I see that the little days spent by those who raised me are not made smaller by that one name." Naira matched her pace to his. She suggested they might make a short journey somewhere by train the following month, if their work allowed it. Kabir proposed a destination, but the trip was not settled. "First the shelves in the room," Naira said, and smiled.

When they reached home, Kabir opened an old book and slipped between its pages the note on which he had written the required thickness of the shelves. Naira removed a leaf caught in the window. That night their conversation contained neither the twenty-seven names nor the count of eight death notices, nor any immediate solution to a mystery. Kabir set water for tea on the stove; Naira washed two cups and put them ready. In the lamplight the imagined lines of the empty shelves showed clearly against the room's wall. "We'll keep our shared books here," Kabir said. "Whose name shall we put on the shelf?" Naira asked. "Let us put the books there first," he replied. "Whoever wishes to read should be able to find a place." The tea came to the boil. A soft wind entered from outside, and the window stayed open.

Chapter 91 · A Convenient Error

At dawn Sarita was setting little metal water cups upon the four corners of the old receipts spread over a woven mat. During the night rain had blown through the window; the papers had not become wet, but the fold of one sheet had lifted. She pressed it flat with her palm, taking care not to run her fingers over the ink. The outer paper bore the acknowledgement number of her petition to be recognised as living; the sheet inside recorded the unpaid wages for three months of transcription work. Amid the smell of rice cooking in the kitchen, she put the two into separate envelopes. “First,” she said to herself, “I shall look at the papers for the work that my death made easier for someone else.”

When Naira arrived, Sarita offered her a low wooden seat before offering tea. “They said the money for my copying work was withheld because my name was in the column for the dead. But the expense of the work I did must have found its way into some register.” Naira asked whether the receipt for the arrears was an original or a copy. Sarita brought out three papers of different colours: an acknowledgement bearing the date on which she had handed over the work, an old account of the lines she had transcribed, and a new status notice from the office. The first two were her own papers; the third bore an official seal. “I am asking for what is owed to me for my work,” Sarita said. “But I will not call anyone a thief on that basis alone, not until I have seen where the money went.”

The previous year, a small undertaking had been organised to make the old documents salvaged from the flooding of the municipal library legible again. For three months Sarita had transcribed lines that remained visible beneath the water stains; she had also arranged for other people to read and verify some of the pages. This was not the separate three days of copying she had done on Ishan's philosophical manuscript. The library undertaking had its own register of daily attendance, pages delivered, and remuneration approved. Sarita had still not received a complete copy of that register, but she had the dated acknowledgements in her pocket. “When a name becomes wrong, does the work vanish too?” she asked Naira. “The work itself has survived,” Naira replied. “We shall examine the papers and ask for an answer.”

Among the eight slips Rama had divided into two piles the previous day, Sarita's name still appeared as “dead” in the blue group. Fakira's erroneous marking, the case of the woman from the relief settlement, and that of the young man at the bus stand were separate matters; the ochre pile concerned investigations into active accounts belonging to people who really had died. Naira first explained this distinction to Sarita once more. “Your husband's death seventeen years ago, and the question of new medicines being dispensed in his name, belong to a different record,” she said. Sarita agreed. “If we tie that question to whether I am alive, two injustices will become one convenient excuse.”

White limewash was flaking from the municipal accounts room that day. A folded newspaper had been wedged beneath one leg of the table to stop the ledger from sliding. At Rama's request, the accounts assistant first produced the register arranged in order of payment acknowledgements. Three instalments had been approved for Sarita's earlier transcription work, but in the column for actual payment, opposite her name, stood the words “status closed.” Beside it was a new paper: “Incomplete transcription and editing completed through an external service.” A sum covering three months had been included in the bill submitted by the organisation run by Girdhari Sah, which administered the service contract. The ledger alone could not establish whose account had actually received that money.

“Girdhari Sah's organisation?” Sarita asked. The assistant smiled. “First the work stopped; then it was done through a private agency. The rules provide for that convenience.” Gripping the edge of the table, Sarita said, “On what day did the work stop? I handed in the last page of that month with my own hands.” She showed him her acknowledgement. The assistant's silence did not make him guilty, but it placed two claims to the same work before them. Rama asked for the bills for all three instalments, the bank payment notices, the original delivery register, and the order by which the status had been closed. “Convenience describes a procedure,” she said, “not a cause.”

Naira understood that the death marking had prevented Sarita from receiving payment, and that after this obstruction an outside organisation had become eligible to be paid. But an order on paper was needed to establish the link between those two events. Girdhari Sah was sitting outside the office; the voices of the women and men sorting paper in his small printing shop could already be heard. He came inside in response to Rama's written notice. “I was told to carry out as much copying work as the approved bill covered,” he said. “I did not declare Sarita dead.” “I have not accused you of that,” Sarita replied. “I am asking whether you supplied new pages in place of those I delivered, or whether my written pages were counted again to make up your bill.”

Girdhari first placed a copy of the work order upon the table. Its date was later than Sarita's final delivery. The order said “remaining work,” without clearly specifying the pages concerned. An employee who had accompanied him explained that a bound bundle had arrived from the office; it had been cut apart and fitted into another binding. “I cannot say how many new letters we wrote,” Girdhari said. “The bill was based on a count.” Naira then asked for two versions of the same page. In the copy kept safely at Sarita's home and the copy deposited by the organisation, a crooked mark in blue ink appeared in precisely the same place. It indicated a sequence of copying, not conclusive proof of theft.

Rama laid two blank sheets on the table. On the first she wrote, “Payment for Sarita's labour withheld”; on the second, “Payment for an external service approved for Girdhari's organisation.” Sarita herself added a third line: “Whether the material covered by the two jobs is identical or different—to be checked against the original pages.” “The ledger has already shown who benefited from the convenience,” she said. “But why someone repeated the death marking is another question, still unanswered.” Girdhari agreed to submit his position in writing and instructed the employee not to throw away whatever remained of the original bundle. There was anxiety on his face; Rama did not record that anxiety as testimony of a crime.

Before noon the bank's payment acknowledgement arrived. Two instalments under the external-service contract had been deposited into Girdhari's organisation's declared account; a third had been approved, but its disbursement could still be stopped. A few days before its payment date, Sarita's status as dead had been selected again, manually. Naira set the two dates side by side, drawing no arrow between them. “We now have direct evidence of who received this sum,” she said, “but proximity in time does not establish who originated the order.” Sarita drew a deep breath. “I shall ask him to his face. I want no hidden advantage, only an account set down in writing.”

Girdhari was called in again. He was shown the bank's seal, but the private account number was kept out of the public proceedings. Deducting from the approved amount the costs of sorting labour, paper, binding, and transport, he explained that the balance would remain as business income. He acknowledged that his organisation had benefited by that amount. But he said the unpaid dues of an individual copyist were not a matter covered by his contract. “Then do not turn this into a quarrel between two sums of money,” Sarita said. “If you rebound my pages, layer upon layer, you are entitled to payment for that work. The office's obligation to pay me for the words I transcribed does not thereby come to an end.”

Sunlight was moving across the building's veranda. Chetan Bhat sat with a bundle of papers wrapped in old cloth beside his knee. Returning from a performance of genealogical songs in the town, he had come to this office. In exchange for hearing him sing the family histories, a household had given him an old slip of paper. It bore a name resembling Sarita's, but the date of writing had been lost with a torn corner. An acquaintance had told him that showing the slip would unravel the mystery of today's entry declaring her “dead.” Instead of approaching Naira first, Chetan asked Sarita, “Do you wish to look for something about yourself in this paper?”

Sarita looked at the writing along the outer edge. “It does not carry enough marks of identification to establish that it refers to me,” she said. “Who owns your paper?” Chetan explained that the family had given him the old letter and slip as part of his payment for singing their lineage, but had said nothing about a right to sell their private letters. He grew uneasy. For years he had received, in return for his singing, sometimes grain, sometimes cloth, sometimes the histories of families. The value of a sheet of paper was not the same as the right to the life recorded on it. Chetan decided not to make the original slip public without written permission from those who had given it to him. For the moment there would be an examination of the paper's texture, ink, and date, with access restricted to its source and purpose.

Naira did not ask him to sing. She asked whether the organisers of the performance had issued him a receipt for his remuneration. Chetan showed her a small slip: two hours of singing, with travel expenses recorded separately. “If this paper was received as a gift,” Rama asked, “why is its value absent from the receipt?” Chetan had no easy answer. “Because at the time I did not know its value. But I understand now that before another person's old memories become my earnings, I need the giver's consent.” He decided to ask for the receipt to be amended. He would meet the family and have the gift, the material entrusted to him, and the right to make copies defined separately.

At the other end of the veranda stood Nahid Moghal, shielding an envelope containing papers about land belonging to her mother's family. On an earlier occasion she had registered a dispute over consent at Sharda Kasaudhan's pawnshop. Today she had received a letter from two brothers on her mother's side, proposing to mortgage the land to repay an old debt. The letter stated “family consent,” but Nahid's signature was missing. One brother said over the telephone, “Your share is small; we shall pay you when the money comes.” Without taking the telephone from her ear, Nahid replied, “Whether my share is small or large is something I shall examine in the documents. Do not record my consent as an assumption.”

She went with Sharda to the registry room. The title deed, the new mortgage draft, and an old letter from her maternal village were laid out separately. The old letter mentioned the Liveri; no attempt was made to use that name to fix the measurements of a present-day river. Sharda said that entering a loan in the pawnshop's ledger did not transfer ownership; the competent authority would decide whether a mortgage was valid without the permission of a person holding a share. That day Nahid rejected the proposal to sell her share, but fixed a time to examine the account of her family's outstanding debt. Her condition—that nobody could write down her consent on her behalf—was entered on the acknowledgement of her application.

Anupama Sen arrived carrying a bundle of letters from an old chest in her mother's family home. The papers carried the scent of camphor from the bottom of the chest. In one of the letters written in Bengali script, a Maithili word had been added in pencil; on that basis alone an elderly member of the family had assumed the entire letter could be made a public record here. “These were my grandmother's letters,” Anupama said. “The people whose names appear in them still have living descendants. The originals will remain in my care; I shall consider which lines may be copied for public use.” She had come to see whether there was a connection with the period of Sarita's transcription work, not to offer a definite answer.

Naira gave Anupama a separate table at which to read. She did not immediately hurry to interpret the Bengali lines herself; Anupama first established the dates of the letters and the relationship between their writers and recipients. One letter mentioned expenses incurred in repairing books at an old shelter school; it named no one associated with a present-day death entry. “It would be wrong to look for today's accounts-office order in this letter,” Anupama said. “But the old school's ledger may establish who possessed copies of the books.” She wanted a certified copy of two lines relating to book expenses to be made, with the details of the private household concealed and the source and limits of use stated on the copy.

At that moment Chetan did not ask to see Anupama's papers. He was washing his hands at the tap outside; the old rhythm of his singing ran through his mind, but he had no wish to raise his voice today. “Would the family whose slip is in your bundle know me?” Anupama asked him. “Possibly,” Chetan answered, “but to link names without knowing would be to make the same mistake again.” They decided to draw up separate letters requesting permission. The occurrence of a similar name in a genealogical song, a family letter, and an official death register did not establish that all three concerned the same event. It did, however, allow the people involved to place conditions upon the use of their papers.

Girdhari returned to the accounts room. Two workers employed by his organisation had said their wages would be held up if the entire payment were stopped. Sarita could see them standing outside; one woman kept opening and closing her empty lunch tin. “Investigate the disputed portion of the contract income,” Sarita told Rama. “But do not deduct the attendance or wages of the workers who actually sorted those papers.” At first Girdhari took this as support for his own position. Sarita immediately added, “I am not declaring you innocent. I am speaking about their labour.”

Rama had no authority to order the seizure of money or to pronounce anyone guilty. She prepared separate recommendations for the competent officer: immediate recalculation of Sarita's unpaid remuneration; suspension of the external contract's third instalment pending verification of the work actually done; a page-by-page comparison of the first two instalments; preservation of receipts for wages actually paid to the organisation's workers; and a request for a safeguarded copy of the original digital record of changes to the death status. Girdhari filed a written objection to the cancellation of the entire contract on the evidence of a single page. Rama attached his objection as well. A date was set for a hearing, not for a verdict.

For the first time Sarita spoke while looking directly at the contractor. “There is a bank slip showing that your account received money. There is an official seal showing that my arrears were withheld. Putting these two facts together, I ask: whose work was made easier by keeping me dead?” Girdhari was silent for some time. “I got the contract,” he said. “If your name had remained active, perhaps I would not have received some of the work. But I did not change the marking.” “Write down as much of that statement as can be verified,” Sarita said. “I shall leave the rest as a question. I will not sell the evidence that I am alive in order to manufacture a crime against someone else.”

A restricted envelope arrived before Rama. It contained the time of the notice recording the manually selected change in death status and a code identifying the user section. But the device's identity, the individual employee's login, and the chain of authorisation were incomplete. A technical assistant said that several employees worked at the shared terminal; a timestamp could not identify a person. Naira wrote that there was a measurable time at which the copy had again been marked “dead”; the user-section code was administrative evidence; the person who gave the order was still unknown. Sarita read this incomplete answer aloud and demanded that the original history of the changes be preserved.

That evening Nahid answered another call from her mother's family. This time her brother said that delaying the mortgage would increase the interest on the loan. “The debt worries me too,” Nahid replied. “That is why tonight I am asking for a full account of the amount. If I can arrange help tomorrow, I shall offer it on terms concerning my own share. But do not put my name to a decision about the family's land on a document I have not read.” After ending the call, she asked her mother in which seasons the old fields had yielded an income. Her mother could not remember each year, but spoke of the old practice of sowing seed after the floodwater had receded. Nahid did not turn her mother's memory into a precise measurement for the document.

Before returning home, Anupama left a copy of two lines for public use at the office. Private names had been concealed, the date of the source was recorded, and permission for use was limited to comparing expenditure on books. Chetan did not leave his slip behind; he had a date entered for seeking the family's permission. Each of them retained some papers, and each made a different decision. Sarita saw that today neither had been compelled to disclose private papers at another person's instruction. “What would you do,” she asked Chetan, “if a person's name in your song were changed?” “First I would ask how the song's remembered account differs from the old paper,” he said. “What I do not understand, I will not turn into certainty in the song.”

When Sarita reached home, she did not sit down in a mood of overwhelming triumph. She warmed the roti she had kept for herself; just then a child from next door came to borrow a bowl of sugar. The child asked whether her name had been corrected at the office that day. “Not yet,” Sarita said. “But the people who said my work had stopped will now have to look at the pages I handed in.” “Then will you write again?” the child asked. “I will. But first I shall collect what is owed to me.” She blew on a hot piece of roti and gave it to the child. For a little while, amid the clink of the cooking ladle, the heavy sound of the written objections dissolved into the rhythms of the household.

Naira was returning from Rama's room late that evening. At the corner of Bajrang Chowk, someone was once again distributing printed leaflets repeating the old viral accusation against Janaki's troupe. A young man said that the news about Sarita's account had exposed the “entire network” of child abduction. “The investigation into this account concerns payment for Sarita's labour and the contractor's benefit,” Naira said clearly. “The separate correction of a public accusation against Janaki, already shown to be false, is still under way. The evidence of Gunja's unlawful transfer is a separate matter. The search for Mithun also remains open.” The young man said it was easier to put everything into a single report. “Strangers pay the price of easy news,” Naira replied.

That night Sarita wrote a short note on the back of her first acknowledgement: “While my death status was kept in place, an external copying contract became eligible for payment; two bank instalments reached the organisation's account; the name of the person who selected the death marking again, and the source of the order, remain unverified.” She signed beneath it. This was an accusation, but it began with two established facts and ended by stating plainly the limits of the evidence. She did not fold the paper away in the chest with the old documents. She placed it in the file for the next hearing, so no one could say that she had chosen silence in exchange for the work she had done.

Far away, in Rama's office, a faint smell of dust lingered after the ceiling fan had been switched off. The request to verify the third instalment lay on the officer's desk, while the demand for the original record of changes remained sealed in another envelope. Rama knew that the officer might try tomorrow to dispose of the matter as a mere accounting error; the contractor might ask why payment should be stopped when work had actually been performed. Both questions would have to be heard. But Sarita's claim to be alive was no longer merely a vague “objection.” It now stood in direct relation to the acknowledgement of her labour, the arrears withheld from her, and the evidence of whose account had received the money.

Chapter 92 · The Unravelling of an Accusation

At dawn Janaki was reweaving the broken edge of her bamboo mat. When a thin strip of bamboo pierced her finger, she pared its splintered tip smooth with a knife. She meant to spread the mat out at the evening market; for a week now, customers had been stopping halfway towards her stall and turning back. Sarayu had hung her damp floor rug over a wooden railing to dry. Caught in the same railing was another printed leaflet: two cropped faces, and between them, in large letters, an accusation of child stealing. Janaki did not tear it up. She looked at the shopkeeper's imprint and the date of printing on the reverse, then put the paper away in a dry cloth. “The old accusation was withdrawn, but a fresh leaflet was printed only the day before yesterday,” she said. “The question now is not simply whether I am innocent. Who will pay the price of this lie?”

By then Sarayu had already changed the route she took through the settlement lanes to sell her rugs. In front of the granddaughter who sat beside her at the shop, a customer had asked where she kept the children. Back at home the girl had repeated those words as though they were a question in a game. Sarayu told Janaki, “I have the paper recording what was said at the hearing in my bag. But who will take down the new leaflet on the shopkeeper's door?” “I shall go to the shop myself,” Janaki replied. “Whoever put up the old accusation must put the proper correction in that very place. I will not make every woman in our troupe stand up and show her face again.” She straightened one end of the rug. For the first time that day, the edge of the cloth lay perfectly even.

As they entered the printing shop at Bajrang Chowk, the trimmed corners of sheets of paper crunched beneath their feet. Mahato, the press owner, wiped the ink from his hands and said he merely printed the copy he was given. Janaki placed two papers on his table: the earlier joint correction issued by the school and the market, and the fresh accusation printed the day before yesterday. “The correct text of the first paper reached your press,” she said. “Why, then, did you print the second without checking?” Mahato looked towards one of his workers. The worker said the second order had come from a local publicity group. The owner maintained that the language of the correction was difficult, whereas a headline designed to provoke fear was simple. “Who gave you the right,” Janaki asked, “to make other people's lives difficult for the reader's convenience?” She requested, in writing, that the printing order book be preserved for inspection and that the number of leaflets distributed be disclosed.

When Naira arrived, the owner's hand came to rest on the ledger. “Those are my private customers' accounts,” he said. Naira did not demand that the book be opened before everyone. Instead she submitted a written request for preservation, specifying that the order slips and payment receipts for the dates in question should be kept safe. “The identity of those who spread the accusation is a matter for investigation,” she said. “Throwing every one of this press's customers' names into the marketplace would be another wrong.” Mahato signed the acknowledgement of receipt. Janaki put a copy of it in her bag. For the first time, the formal path towards correcting the false leaflet had been written down at the very place where it was sold.

A brief hearing was arranged on the school veranda before noon. Asad Syed brought certified copies of the school's earlier notice and of the public retraction. Sajid Nat placed the original footage of his theatrical rehearsal, the unbroken recording at the forest gate, and the account of the original footage from Sukathi's loading yard in three separate envelopes. His coloured curtain had been a stage property; it had been described as a screen behind which children were hidden. The three original recordings came from different places and different days. The complete source of the equipment used to join the two faces in the new leaflet was not yet in their hands. But there was no need to reopen the question of whether the accusation's principal basis was false: the original recordings showed no incident in which Janaki's troupe took away a child.

One of the school parents asked, “Then is it also a lie that a child has gone missing?” Looking at him, Janaki said, “Mithun is missing. That is the suffering Lata knows firsthand in her own home. Documents have been found concerning Gunja's removal to work elsewhere without permission. And our troupe was called a band of child thieves on the strength of two photographs spliced together: that accusation has been shown to be false. Do not use any one of these three things to erase the others.” Standing at the edge of the veranda, Lata loosened her grip on the cord of her bag. “Why must my son's file be dragged into the public correction again?” she asked. Naira assured her that the correction would identify the category of incident, not Mithun's clothing, the family's address, or private leads in the search.

A member of the market committee proposed that Janaki submit written certificates of good character, accompanied by photographs of every member of her troupe. Sarayu rose from her chair. “The people who accused us already displayed our faces,” she said. “Now, to clear the accusation, must we put our faces on display again? Did anyone ask the people whose photographs were printed the first time?” The committee member fell silent. Janaki made it clear that the correction should be published, the old leaflets withdrawn and those posted in shops removed, but that the full identities of the women, children and itinerant families must not be made public. Asad amended the wording of the proposal. The committee agreed to the revised version, and a separate application number was assigned to the claim for compensation.

At that moment a message arrived from Chameli at the child-protection office. The arrangements for Gunja's return home were not yet complete, but the first permission for safe contact with the girl had been granted. Chameli did not want her daughter brought before the hearing that day and presented on a platform as “the child rescued from abduction.” Janaki herself telephoned her. “I am taking back my own name,” she said. “Let your daughter keep her voice in her own hands.” Chameli asked whether a separate investigation against those responsible would proceed on the basis of the confidential statement. “It is proceeding,” Naira said. “The conclusion reached at this gathering will not become a verdict in that investigation.” Chameli put down the telephone and decided to buy a new cover for Gunja's exercise book, rather than give a statement to the media.

In the child-protection officer's room, a different task was under way. Certified copies of the original register from the former rental office at the bus stand, the transport slip recording Gunja's handover to the first person, and the receipt book of the sewing room had been laid out for comparison. The register carried the name of the rental office's contact; the first slip bore the same contact identifier, and the second recorded receipt at a specified destination. According to the officer, the sequence of slips, their dates, and the places of receipt corresponded. Examination of who had personally written the signatures, and of the criminal responsibility of each participant, was still in progress. But the separate route of intermediaries by which the girl had been taken from the contact office to the sewing room was no longer merely a rumour.

An employee immediately declared, “So we can say the trafficker has been caught.” The senior officer stopped him. “The two slips, together with the office's record of receipt, establish that a route of intermediaries existed,” he said. “Determining which person intended what, who practised deceit, and who kept the girl in a particular place is a separate matter requiring proof.” The owner of the rented premises agreed to supply his receipts for outstanding rent, but said plainly that he had not seen with his own eyes who sat in the office every day. Gunja's protected statement would remain with the investigators; no part of it would be sent to the market hearing.

When the child-protection worker returned from seeing Gunja, Chameli had come out onto the veranda. With permission, the worker told her only this: Gunja wanted to go back to class, but she did not hate sewing, and she also wished to know how her earnings had been accounted for. “Do not make what she learned into the mark of a crime,” Chameli said. “If she picks up a needle when she comes home, let it be because she chooses to.” The worker wrote down the time of the next visit. A separate demand was recorded that neither Gunja's safe return nor her education be left waiting for the conclusion of the court proceedings.

Lata came to the officer to look at the papers. She had feared all along that, if Mithun's name did not appear on Gunja's slips, the officials would turn their attention to other business. “Does the period during which this office was rented include the day my son went to the market?" she asked directly. The officer wrote out the time interval: some overlap was possible, but there was no direct trace of Mithun being there. "Then examine again the original statements about the oil shop at the market and the torn ribbon," Lata said. "Do not make up my son's story out of this girl's papers." She was now matching the times in her own search for herself. Kamli put some water in her bag. That was the extent of the help she offered: no hurried words of reassurance.

Outside the office came the light, repeated knocking of iron. Nazir Sikligar sat on the stone platform, repairing the loosened iron fitting of a farmer's hoe. During the night someone had written in charcoal above his shop: "MAKES WEAPONS." The words had spread after an initial police inquiry, prompted by a driver's account of a slip bearing the phrase "iron repairs" among a consignment of weapons. Nazir did not stop working. "First look at what is actually in my hands," he said. "A slip that does not carry my name cannot make my tools proof of my guilt."

Nazir took three old receipts from a small pouch. The first recorded the charge for straightening the teeth of a sickle and a ploughshare; the second concerned the fastening on the handle of a field hoe; the third, the joining of a metal plate used in a kitchen. He had entered separately the customer's name, the day of the work, the dimensions of the object, and the amount paid. An inspector asked whether someone who worked with iron was also capable of repairing weapons. "The possibility of a skill is not the same thing as the work recorded on these three receipts," Nazir replied. "Bring me the original waybill for the consignment you are investigating." He made the plate, the receipts and his ordinary tools available for inspection, but lodged an objection to being labelled a "criminal" on the strength of conjecture.

Nazir's apprentice, Batesar, said that a customer had brought him a broken lock for repair the day before yesterday, and that he had photographed it on his telephone. Nazir stopped him. "Do not send a picture of the customer's whole house to the news people," he said. "If an image of the item repaired and a copy of the bill are sufficient for the inquiry, give them that much." Batesar then concealed the identifying details of the house in the photograph, obtained the customer's permission, and attached a copy of the signature of the person who had collected the lock. When the inspector left Nazir's shop, no object had been seized in support of the allegation about weapons. The origin of the anonymous consignment slip bearing the word "repairs," however, remained an open question. Nazir counted out his apprentice's wages for the afternoon; an investigation was no reason to withhold the pay for his day's labour.

Two lanes away from the ringing of iron, Bina Kalar was emptying the cash drawer in her small shop. The prices of bottled goods, oil, salt and soap were entered in separate columns. That day the question of the old weighing scales in the courtyard of her ancestral home had arisen once more. Her brother had said that the share in the house should remain in the hands of the man who ran the household; if Bina wanted a loan to expand her shop, she must take it herself. It was then that Bina had, for the first time, demanded a written account of her ancestral share, the ownership papers, and the family's expenditure. When her brother came to the shop today, customers were standing in the doorway. Bina finished taking their payments and giving change before offering him a chair. A family dispute did not leave a customer's money hanging in the balance.

“The shop is already running under your hand,” her brother said. “Why do you need money for your share as well?” Bina took three pages out of the cash drawer. “The shop was built with my savings and what I borrowed,” she said. “My share in the house is another matter. If that share gives me the capital to rent another room, I shall expand my business. But even if I do not receive it, I shall not surrender my right in the house.” Her brother said that the expenses of their father's illness had also been charged against the old house. Bina did not dispute those expenses. She asked instead that the actual medical receipts, the debts apportioned among family members, and the documents of ownership be kept distinct. In the end they fixed a date for providing a copy of the family accounts, not for deciding on a payment in cash for her share.

That evening her wholesale supplier arrived. He said he would advance the money for opening another shop, but on condition that Bina buy oil and soap from no one else for three years. Bina read the terms and handed the paper back. “I need goods,” she said, “not a mortgage on my freedom to choose where I buy them.” The merchant warned that he would reduce her discount. Bina arranged to obtain prices from two smaller wholesalers; this might mean postponing the opening of her new shop. That night she counted the modest sum in her cash drawer and entered in her ledger: Share in the house not received; independent purchasing options still open. The value of the right she had claimed had yet to come into her hands.

Vibha Agrahari came to Bina's shop to buy a bottle. Her medicine delivery vehicle had been stopped a little earlier. An urgent order from the hospital listed the needs of five patients, but the approved stock available in the warehouse could not meet the entire demand. Vibha showed Bina her statement, in which purchase price, transport, storage costs and selling price were entered separately. “Everyone says I should give up my profit,” she told her, “but who will pay the driver who gets the medicines there on time? And if I keep the whole profit, two of the families will not be able to afford the treatment.” Bina left her scales for a moment to study the paper. “Do not conceal what things cost,” she said, “and record separately whatever help you wish to give.”

When Vibha reached the hospital dispensary, the pharmacist first checked the batch numbers and expiry dates against the stock register. On one box, the label pasted outside did not match the distributor's slip inside. Its sale was stopped, and the reason entered in the inspection register. It was agreed that the remaining quantity from verified batches would be allocated according to the urgency of the patients' needs, in an order authorised in writing by the physician. Vibha said that decisions about dispensing belonged to the physician, while her own accounts would show the purchase prices and how far she could reduce what she charged. She offered to forgo part of her profit for three families in need, and separately asked a local fund to make a contribution under a written assistance arrangement. The medicine was not described as “free”; both the supplier's costs and the relief received by the patients were recorded.

On seeing the box with the mismatched labels, an assistant in the dispensary said it must be the very consignment mentioned at the office dealing with the transfer of children. Vibha stopped him at once. “A mistake on one label does not make me a criminal. If there is to be an investigation, bring the complete consignment papers,” she said. The assistant withdrew his words. Nevertheless, in response to an official request from the investigators, Vibha agreed to provide copies of the box's external markings, the date it entered the warehouse, the serial number of the transport slip, and the seal placed on the consignment withheld from sale. The original box would be kept safe, and its medicines would not be dispensed. One discrepancy was not allowed to become an excuse for stopping the distribution of verified stock; nor was permission granted to sell the uncertain box.

As Vibha left the hospital, she heard the announcement of Janaki's public meeting to correct the accusation, and stopped. A young man in the market was saying that the transport identifiers on the child-transfer slip and the medicine box matched, proving that all the organisations belonged to the same network. “Which identifier on which slip?” Vibha asked. The young man showed her only a message being passed from one person to another, not an original document. “If the same location appears on the transport papers, it will be investigated,” Vibha said. “One truck may carry legitimate medicines, while somebody else may misuse the same company's name. Travelling by the same route does not establish shared guilt.” She put the paper concerning her withheld box aside for the officer by name; she did not wave it about on the platform.

The meeting to put the record right took place in the evening light. Janaki sat in the front row without going onto the platform. Asad read aloud the full wording of the old accusation, then gave the dates of the earlier correction issued by the school and the market and of the newly printed leaflet. Mahato, the owner of the printing shop, had come as well. He did not have the full identity of the person who had placed the order, but admitted that even after receiving notice of the correction he had printed the accusing leaflet again without verification. He undertook to submit the number of copies printed and a list of the places where they had been distributed by a specified time. “I do not want beautiful sentences of apology,” Janaki said. “I want the truth put where you disgraced us.” A member of the committee entered her words verbatim in the minutes.

A member asked Janaki to write on the notice herself that every accusation had been false and that the real intermediary had been caught. Janaki separated the two demands. “Our troupe was branded as child thieves on the strength of an edited video. That evidence was misleading, and the accusation was false. I will sign that correction,” she said. “Separate documents have been found concerning Gunja's unauthorised transfer. The court has not given its decision. If we write someone down as a criminal in advance, we bring the hammer down on another life.” The officer nodded in agreement. The documents concerning the intermediaries' route would remain subject to judicial investigation. Gunja's statement was not read on the platform, nor was Mithun's name used to create a sensation.

The committee's written decision dealt with three matters separately, each within its proper sphere. First, within the limits of the committee's authority, it issued directions to stop the sale and public display of the old false leaflet and to post a correction with equal visibility wherever the accusation had been distributed. Second, it accepted a separate application concerning the financial losses suffered by Janaki's troupe, covering market-stall charges, lost sales and testimony; the amount of compensation remained to be determined. Third, it recorded that the original registers and receipt slips in the independent child-protection investigation were to be preserved within the authorised investigative process. No liability was assigned to the press's customer without a hearing. Janaki listened carefully to every word and collected the acknowledgement herself.

For a moment the old question rose again from the crowd: “If the troupe is innocent, then who is the intermediary?” Lata turned towards the people. “My Mithun is missing,” she said. “I will not find my son by deciding in my heart that someone must be guilty. Investigate the part played by whoever is named on the slips. But the way to my child is not written on those papers.” Her words did not still the crowd; some people were holding up their mobile phones even then. Yet Janaki and Lata stood on the same platform and each took a separate acknowledgement for her own application. In people's hands there were now, at least, two different papers—two different rights.

Sarayu spread out her rugs once more and waited for customers. Two women asked the price; a third began to murmur about the earlier accusation. Sarayu showed her the correction but did not tell the whole story of her life merely to make a sale. “Look at the knot in this strip,” she said. “It will not come loose when it gets wet. That is what the price is for.” One customer bought a rug. Janaki watched from a distance. It was the money from a single sale, not the full restoration of anyone's dignity. Even so, Sarayu could set aside enough to buy flattened rice and jaggery for her granddaughter that evening. In the market, something made by her own hands was sold again under her own name.

Before shutting his shop, Nazir asked Batesar what work remained for tomorrow. “The loose plate on the rice-husking machine, and the latch on Ramji's gate,” the young man replied. Nazir kept copies of the receipts. The accusation about weapons would not disappear in a day, but the inspector's recorded report now clearly described the ordinary repairs completed that day, the customers' confirmations and the unsubstantiated nature of the allegation. Bina entered in her night ledger the date on which she expected the ancestral papers. Vibha matched the acknowledgements for medicines dispatched according to the physician's authorised order, and checked the seal on the box with the mismatched label herself. All three had obtained a result concerning their work; no single investigation had answered the other questions in their lives.

That night Naira read the child-protection officer's list of receipts. Two stages of the intermediary route by which Gunja had been moved were now linked by evidence. Yet one serial number from the transport papers had also been raised for comparison with the slip on the withheld box of medicines and with another page referring to an anonymous consignment described as “iron repairs.” Naira did not immediately write anyone's name beside the matching digits. The original shipping records and the receipt issued to the lawful owner were needed for the next examination. She closed the file. Outside, in the market, the corner of the new correction notice fluttered in the wind, while Sarayu's mat lay spread on the ground beneath it. The accusation whose foundations had fallen apart had been explicitly corrected that day. The evidence concerning the route along which a girl had truly been carried away without permission was proceeding in a separate file.

Chapter 93 · The Link Between Consignments

On the rear veranda of the hospital, Madhav Rauniyar wiped his hands on his cotton towel before touching the rope tied round the crates on his cart. The night's dew had made the wood slippery. The label on top of one crate bore a medicine's name in blue ink; the bundle inside carried the seal of a different distributor. The box with the mismatched labels, which Vibha Agrahari had set apart the day before, was still in the locked storeroom. Madhav had brought three other crates associated with that consignment, which the hospital had ordered returned. “Sign the slip now; the goods can be examined afterwards,” the pharmacist said. Madhav tightened the rope once more. “I will not sign for the return of something I haven't inspected.”

The smells of damp phenyl and hot tea mingled on the veranda. A nurse came out from inside with a request to make approved medicines available for five patients. “Since yesterday's hold, we're running short of the medicines the patients need,” she said. Madhav knew that returning the goods would tie up the money needed for fresh purchases. When Vibha arrived, the two of them opened the crates beside the stock register. “First meet the patients' needs from the approved stock,” she said. “Keep these crates separate for examination. A patient's need cannot be made a reason for accepting defective goods.” The nurse breathed more easily, but asked for the day's arrangements for medicines to be put in writing.

When Naira reached the hospital, two young men outside the door were repeating the same story on their phones: the slips for medicines and iron repairs bore matching numbers, and therefore every blacksmith in town was involved. A little way off stood Harinarayan Sharma, with an iron fastening he had brought for the axle of his old handcart. He heard them but did not quarrel. Ajit's face was flushed. “Babu, will you let them photograph you again?” he whispered. Harinarayan replied, “I have the papers recording the measurements of my work. If I am given a chance to say what the photograph does not show, I will. But first we must find out what goods were actually seized.”

Three separate bags had been placed in Rama's room that day. One held the hospital's supply slips; the second, the receipt for Yusuf Ansari's detained bale of cloth; the third, the seizure inventory for a metal chest previously sealed by the police. The police's written preliminary inspection recorded that metal components relating to unauthorised weapons had been found in that third chest. Their definitive technical identification and origin remained under investigation. Naira did not pile the bags one upon another. “The recovery of weapons-related material is a fact recorded in this inventory,” she said. “But there has been no inspection establishing that Yusuf's cloth or Madhav's medicines were inside that chest.”

The officer compared the transport codes written at the heads of all three slips. The same short number appeared on the outer sheets, but the consignments' own numbers were different. Mahendra, the cart-driver, was called in. Putting his finger on the edge of an old register, he said, “That number wasn't assigned to my vehicle. It belonged to the counter where the person booking the goods made the arrangements. The vehicle number is in another line.” He pointed to a blank-looking space where water had blurred the date. An employee began to describe all three as goods transported on the same day, but Mahendra stopped him. “First look at their separate dates of entry. The same number may have been used again at one counter.”

Rama called for the original register of the goods depot's booking counter. In the first recorded entry, the order to transport the boxes of medicines had come not from the hospital but from an outside distribution agency. In the second, the signature of the person who collected the sealed metal chest was indistinct. In the third, a bale of cloth had been loaded in Yusuf's name, but the name of the person who attached the external acceptance strip was missing. An anonymous slip marked “iron repairs” on its reverse had also been added to that office's register, without any craftsman's name. One common feature emerged among the slips: the booking fees had been deposited at the same intermediary counter, and the office stamp of the recipient who took the payments was the same. Naira had the page numbers and dates entered in the record. She did not add the words “same owner.”

“An intermediary counter means an intermediary person?” Harinarayan asked. “We will request the attendance records separately to establish how many people worked there in shifts,” Rama replied. Ajit immediately asked why a chest of weapons was being connected with Yusuf's loom. Yusuf, who had come to collect the outstanding payment on his first length of cloth, said quietly, “If my yarn and someone else's iron were weighed at the same weighing depot, that doesn't make my loom start producing iron.” Both men were having to explain once again the identity of the things by which they earned their living.

Before asking to see Yusuf's separate ledger, Naira sought his permission. Yusuf showed her the sales entries in the first account: the length of cloth woven for household curtains had already reached its customer, but the credit taken for the yarn had yet to be paid off. The second account recorded the rejected acceptance strip tied with red cord and the delay caused by the warehouse inspection. “Question the person who made the stamp that ended up attached to my name,” he said. Naira replied, “The origin of the stamp will be investigated. Unless some new, concrete reason emerges, there will be no fresh hold on the sale of your lawful cloth.” Yusuf left his ledger open. He asked whether he could have that formal assurance in writing, for another customer had telephoned to say that his goods might be stopped again.

Just then Mahendra Mahaseth arrived with one of his old measurement slips. People in the town, hearing the name of his wholesale business, had assumed that he owned the warehouse in question. But his ledger gave separate costs for the drums of oil and sacks of pulses measured from the first day of the month to the last. “No goods of mine went out on the date shown on the booking slip being circulated under my name,” he said. Seeing Mahendra the cart-driver, an employee laughed. “Both of them are named Mahendra. That's where the confusion came from.” Mahaseth answered without hesitation: “A shared name does not conduct my business transactions. Look at my signature, who owned the goods, and the amounts paid.” The cart-driver, too, laid his wage slip separately before them.

Since the previous evening, Binod Jaiswal had been searching for the stamp of his small shop. A customer from the neighbourhood had told him that, because the old occupational designation “Suri–Kalwar” appeared in his records, his business and Mahendra Mahaseth's must belong to the same branch. Binod showed the receipts in his purchase ledger for two crates of bottles and household supplies. The sum was small, but the parcel charge bore the stamp of that same counter. “I ordered goods through this counter. Does that mean a crime is to be written against me?” he asked. “No,” Naira said. “It means your receipt can provide an independent check on the dates when the counter was operating.” Binod agreed to provide a certified copy on condition that his private customers' names were concealed.

On opening the depot's old ledger, the officers found that Binod's small purchase and the booking for the chest connected with the offence had taken place in different weeks. The numbers on the receipt stamps, however, ran consecutively in the same register. No corresponding number was found for the goods attributed to Mahaseth. The inspector revised his earlier sentence: in place of “connected with Mahendra's warehouse,” the record now read “connected with the intermediary's booking sequence.” Mahaseth breathed more easily, then asked, “Which copy am I to show the customers who stopped trading with me because they thought me guilty?” The officer agreed to issue a limited public correction. No one promised to make good the losses caused by the damage to his reputation.

Harinarayan spread out his row of tools. The first line contained hooks for lifting drainage grilles; the second, pins for a handcart axle; the third, clamps for securing the wood of a loom. He demonstrated the use of each. During the earlier inspection, four ordinary tools had been examined and not one seized; Ajit was holding up a certified copy of that report. “If this unidentified metal chest is to be displayed against my shop,” Harinarayan said, “find it in my receipts.” The police officer acknowledged that no stamp belonging to Harinarayan, nor any issue slip from his workshop, had yet been found on the chest. The independent inquiry into the source of its metal would nonetheless continue.

Ajit asked the police inspector how many times work that had proved innocent would have to be examined again. The inspector did not respond with a long lecture on the law. “If new material evidence appears, there will be questions to ask,” he said. “We cannot keep presenting an old photograph from a phone as a fresh seizure.” Ajit had his little three-plate rattle in his hand. He made no attempt to show it to the police. He did not think it right to turn his small invention into a spectacle merely to defend his father's workshop. Quietly he tied up his bag and left for his training.

A representative of the distributor came to Madhav Rauniyar as he stood beside his cart on the veranda. “If you return all three crates, the hospital's dues will be reduced,” the man said. “You won't be able to sell our goods a second time.” This was a new condition for Madhav. Showing him the number of crates he had counted twice, he said, “The hospital itself has rejected these goods. If I save today's loss by selling a bad batch, it is a patient's body that will pay the price tomorrow.” The representative produced an old price list. Madhav opened his accounts and entered the original purchase, transport and return costs separately. He was preparing a claim that stated the reasons for his loss.

Vibha stepped forward and asked the pharmacist whether the contents of the detained box had been described as “counterfeit” without laboratory testing. “No,” he replied. “Distribution was suspended because the label did not match the distributor's slip.” “Then write that, and no more, as the reason for my return,” Madhav said. “Bad packaging and a medicine proven to be substandard are not the same thing.” The representative softened a little. He agreed to give a written acknowledgement, though he said he had no authority to refund the money immediately. In the pharmacist's presence, Madhav had photographs taken of the exteriors of all three crates. No patient's prescription or identifying details entered the camera's frame.

At that moment an assistant came running in with the news that the weight of the metal chest held by the police matched the weight recorded for an old consignment in the hospital's medicine depot. If the weights were identical, he declared, the goods must have passed through the same hands. Naira stopped him to ask, “Apart from the equal weight, is there the same seal, the same measurement, the same entry in the goods ledger?” The assistant shook his head. Harinarayan did not lift the iron in his hand. He merely said, “A hoe weighing five seers and a sack of seed weighing five seers both weigh five seers.” The assistant was embarrassed. Rama decided that his remark belonged only among the questions requiring further inquiry, not in the final report as a finding.

In the afternoon the former clerk of the intermediary transport counter was summoned after being given notice. The elderly man fitted a magnifying lens with trembling hands and examined the sequence in the register. “This stamp was used in my day as well,” he said, “but the counter then operated in two shifts. The number belonged to the office; the signature belonged to a person." The officers asked him for the names of the former employees. He supplied four names, but could not remember one date. Naira left that omission as a blank in the record. The clerk identified two acceptance slips carrying his own signature. He was unwilling to claim as his own the blurred signature visible on the slip for the chest connected with the offence.

Rama then compared the edges of the police's original seizure inventory with the hospital's dispatch slip. Both papers recorded advance freight payments on the same day under the stamp of the same intermediary office. The amounts differed, but the pages of the receipt ledger were consecutive. Independently turning the pages of the original register, the inspector marked the consecutive entries; no final expert examination had yet established that they had not been added later. Nevertheless, the original ledger produced before them, the bank's records of the freight payments and the gate's time register together showed a substantial connection through use of the same booking intermediary. "A connection has been established," Naira said. "What has not been established is that one and the same person ordered both the medicines and the weapons-related material."

Suddenly Yusuf asked, "What will happen to my bale tied with the red cord?" The officer said that examination of the origin of the stamp on its rejected acceptance strip would proceed separately from the booking inquiry. The questions concerning the cloth's actual weave, commercial ownership and right of distribution were already on record. The written copy imposed no fresh restriction on the length of cloth that had been released; the disputed bale remained in secure custody. Yusuf's expression brightened as he read the page and thought of the possibility of paying off his debt for yarn. The second bale was not yet free, but the first length of cloth had not been pushed back beneath the shadow of suspicion.

When Binod returned to his shop, a customer said that after so much controversy he would never again order goods through the same transport counter. Looking at the receipt for a new consignment, Binod replied, "I have made genuine purchases through this office. That does not mean everything it ever did was right. But if suspicion alone makes me throw away all my old stock, who will pay my debts?" His wife was counting the evening's small change in the open cash drawer. She interjected, "Find out what another carrier charges, and fix definite dates for whatever payments remain due. Trust in business does not work with closed eyes. It works with open accounts." Binod began writing down the rates of alternative transport services.

Examining the freight details for his warehouse, Mahendra Mahaseth explained that he had brought in no weapons-related goods through the old intermediary during the preceding month. The inspector wanted to seize all the available ledgers. Mahendra asked for a specific order; the employee agreed instead to certified copies for the limited dates in question. "I am not obstructing the inquiry," Mahendra said. "But the private information of every customer in my business must not be exposed so that someone can sell it again." He posted a new notice at his warehouse gate: no goods would be loaded without separate entries for the type of goods, the sender and the person collecting them. The clerk raised the question of payment for this additional work. Mahendra made a written proposal to fix a separate rate for it.

As Madhav turned his cart to return the three crates, an elderly woman stood at the corner of the road asking for medicines for her grandson. "If there are medicines on your cart, give me some now," she said. Madhav folded his hands. "These goods are going back because they need checking. You need medicine, but not from these crates." Vibha explained how ordinary medicines available from the hospital's approved stock could be obtained and led the woman to the prescriptions counter. The woman asked why shopkeepers were entangling themselves in so much paperwork. "So that the route by which your grandson's medicine can be trusted remains clear," Vibha said. Gathering her prescription in her hand, the woman went inside.

By evening three separate statements had been recorded in Rama's room, from the police investigator, the hospital pharmacist and the municipal receiving clerk. The fact of the seized metal chest and its contents would remain within the police's jurisdiction; examination of the medicine labels belonged to the health department; and the accounting of improper bookings or payments belonged to the administrative inquiry. An employee proposed writing in the joint press release that "the hospital's medicines and the weapons belong to the same gang." Naira objected. "What we have seen directly is one intermediary counter and certain links in the payments. The organisation of any gang, who issued the orders, and with what purpose remain to be investigated. If we write a false sentence, innocent people's livelihoods will be stopped again." Rama struck that line from the draft.

Outside the town, where Janaki's troupe was selling its rugs, only half the news had arrived. Sarayu saw a young man combining the transfer of children, weapons and medicines into a single image. She showed him the correction issued the previous day. "The accusation against us has been dismissed. Why, then, is my photograph in this leaflet again?" The young man said that all the incidents seemed connected to him. "Things seeming connected and proof that they are connected are different," Sarayu replied. "Ask the price of my rug. My face is not an object for investigation." The young man agreed to remove the image but did not promise to check the source of his information. Sarayu counted the full proceeds of her sales and put them into the pouch set aside for the household's debts.

Lata arrived at the child-protection office at a separate appointed time. Her first question was whether the confirmed route of intermediaries in Gunja's unlawful transfer for labour might offer a lead in the search for Mithun. The officer said that the name of the booking office on Gunja's slip could be examined again as part of the transport inquiry, but so far there was no direct match with Mithun's name, appearance or the day he had gone to the market. Lata wanted the shared office's staff list preserved, so that the time register could not later be destroyed. The officer accepted her written request for preservation. Lata rose to go home, but sent word to Chameli, Gunja's mother, that the work of restoring the girl's education and bringing her home safely must continue independently.

At the evening forge Harinarayan was tightening a loose ring on the rattle Ajit had made. Nandlal's old ploughshare was still lying in a corner, for the customer, frightened by the rumour, had withdrawn his order. “Will what was written today make him come and collect that share?” Ajit asked. “Perhaps, perhaps not,” Harinarayan replied. “But this paper gives me grounds on which to speak for the work my tools do. After a man has been falsely suspected, it takes time for customers to trust his work again.” He left a thin coating of oil on the ploughshare, as though the absence of the customer were no reason to dishonour the work.

At home, as he set fine threads upon the warp, Yusuf answered his son's telephone call. The young man said that the stamp of the shared booking counter was visible in photographs on his phone as well; he wanted to put all three pictures in one folder and send them to the police. “First get the owner's permission for each photograph,” Yusuf said. “I will give you the image of the stamp on my bale. Someone else's medicines and the police's evidence do not come under the authority of a folder on my phone.” His son agreed. The young man’s mother was puffing up flatbreads over the stove. “Opening account books all day doesn't make the amount of yarn you owe any smaller,” she remarked. Yusuf laughed, then measured the yarn left over from the day's work and set it apart for a new order.

The last papers reached Rama's desk as the evening birds were changing direction towards the eaves. One notice required the original seal of the intermediary office, the shift-workers' records and the freight-payment pages to be preserved. Another directed that unnecessary restrictions on legitimate commercial consignments be lifted. A third called for technical testing of the hospital's box with the mismatched labels and for the deadline for settling payments on the returned goods to be recorded. Naira read the pages and added only one sentence: “A shared booking arrangement is evidence of a connection, not a conclusion of shared criminal responsibility.” The date for the next inquiry was fixed, not a verdict of guilt. Outside, a cart-driver was turning over his handcart to shake off the dust, while inside the hospital new arrangements were being made to provide approved medicines to five patients.

On the way home Naira met Kabir. He had to fix the date of his next meeting with Subhadra and had written the questions he wished to ask in a small notebook. He asked Naira whether the truth had been found that day in the dispute over the hospital boxes. “We found the truth of some connections,” she said, “while the truth of some ownerships was already there. We did not make them one and the same.” Kabir remained silent for a little while. The page recording the permission he had received at Subhadra's house lay in a separate fold of his notebook. “I too will find answers to some of my questions,” he said, “but the rights of the person whose life is being told must not be cut out of the middle of the story.” They went their separate ways. At night the sound of iron fastenings ceased, but the wood of the loom went on sounding softly.

Chapter 94 · The Rights of a Guardian

Kabir sat beside a heap of yellow earth spread across the courtyard of the old house, measuring with a slender strip of bamboo the square stand on which the lamps would be placed. On the veranda, the mother who had raised him was wiping the clay lamps with a thin cloth. One had a crack along its rim. Setting it aside, she said, “It will break as soon as we pour in the oil. We shall use it to hold flowers.” Kabir smiled. In this house, before a broken thing was thrown away, someone considered what other use it might serve. His mother asked, “Are you going to Subhadra again today?” “She herself has given me a time,” Kabir replied. “When I return, I'll finish the stand with you.” His mother looked into his eyes but did not repeat her question.

Kabir wrote the measurements for the stand in an exercise book from his student days. Inside were two old receipts for school fees and, along the edge of a page once soaked by rain, a child's words of thanks addressed to his mother. Picking up the receipts, Kabir asked, “You have kept these papers even now?” His mother laughed. “If I hadn't kept them, who would tell you the date of your first prize?” After a pause, she added, “It isn't only the papers that make me remember dates. You had a fever that day, and still you came home carrying your medal.” Kabir put the receipts back. The incomplete record of his birth and the abundant memory of days such as these were two different things; the absence of one did not diminish the existence of the other.

At Subhadra's house the chairs stood exactly where they had been placed during their first meeting. The brass-bound chest, however, was no longer in the locked room; it stood in a corner of the sitting room. Subhadra first shut the door from inside, then invited Kabir to sit and placed on the table a copy of the four conditions she had written. “I shall tell you certain things today,” she said, “but once you have heard them, you have every right to criticise my decision. This single day does not give you the right to know everything else about my life at once.” Kabir did not hurry to reassure her. “First I'll listen,” he said, “and then, if there is something I don't understand, I'll ask.” A cycle-rickshaw bell rang outside and faded into the distance. In the stillness of the room, the rhythm of Subhadra's breathing could be distinctly heard.

Subhadra took from the chest the cotton pouch whose knot they had spoken of before. She laid in front of Kabir not the original letter it contained, but a carefully preserved copy, turned face down. Before allowing him to read it, she said, there was something she needed to say in her own voice. “I gave birth to you,” she said softly. “I say this as testimony from my own experience. If, on hearing it, you immediately ask for documentary proof, that is a reasonable demand. But do not regard what I say as a lie merely because I have remained silent for so many years.” Kabir's hand stayed motionless on the edge of the table. The name he had refused to entertain on so many nights were now being spoken aloud by a living voice.

Kabir did not immediately call her Mother. Nor did Subhadra put him under any pressure to use that name. She explained that at a difficult moment in her life a decision had been made to place the child in the care of another family. She possessed letters from that period, an incomplete indication from the hospital and a dispatch receipt, but not yet a certified copy of the complete official birth register. “Why I let you go, who knew, and what part each person played—I shall answer these questions in order,” she said plainly. “Some things I experienced myself; others I heard from people. I do not wish to turn the two into one story.” Kabir asked, “What was the family who raised me told at the time?” Subhadra acknowledged that she was not a complete witness to what they had been told.

With a finger Subhadra pointed out a faint impression of ink upon the copy. “This is the writing from the letter inside the old wrapping; the date has become a blur. The dispatch slip bears a mark of receipt, but that mark alone does not prove that the letter reached the right person.” Kabir did not photograph it with his mobile phone. “Which part may I examine independently?” he asked. “Today, this copy, with names and addresses concealed,” Subhadra replied. “I shall be present on another day for examination of the original. I will not disclose the full address without the permission of the person whose privacy is involved in this letter.” In his notebook Kabir recorded the source of the material he had been permitted to see, but not the personal names.

“I accept your account of my birth,” Kabir said. “For me, your testimony is an important truth. For what is entered in the government register, I shall obtain separate evidence. But there is one question I want to ask now: will what you have told me make my place in the home and property of the family who raised me any less?” Subhadra shook her head. “No. I gave you birth; they gave you their days and nights. Examine what the law says in its documents, but no one can take away what you owe them.” “It is not only a debt,” Kabir said, “but a claim to inheritance as well. If my name is in the old documents, I shall not erase it with my own hands.” After that sentence they both fell silent.

For the first time, Subhadra did not close the lid of the chest completely. She asked Kabir what came first to his mind when he remembered the woman who had raised him. Kabir spoke of a rainy evening: the wet pages of his exercise book had been laid out separately to dry; a handful of paddy had been set upon them to stop the wind carrying them away; night had fallen, but his mother had not dozed. “I cannot tell you the date of that incident,” he admitted, “but I can still remember the smell of those pages.” Subhadra listened without speaking. “I wasn't there that day,” she said at last. “I have no claim upon what I did not witness. Whatever name you call your mother in your own heart, I make no claim upon that form of address.”

As he was leaving, Kabir wished to add a line to Subhadra's consent document: ‘The account of birth given today may be used privately, but not published publicly.’ Subhadra read it and asked what he meant by ‘privately’. Kabir explained that he needed the right to speak with the family who had raised him, but would not share Subhadra's address or images of her documents. After considering this, she wrote: ‘Kabir may tell his foster family what he has learned about his birth, in his own words; publication of my letters or personal details will require fresh consent.’ Both signed. Naira was not present; Subhadra wanted this first conversation to remain between the two people concerned.

That afternoon the front wheel of a passenger vehicle had been raised at Irfan Khan's repair shop. When a fingernail scraped the brake drum, black dust fell away; the inner surface of a worn bushing showed an uneven sheen. The driver had already said that the vehicle served the hospital route, and that leaving it idle for a single day would cost him two days' hire. Irfan demonstrated the wear with a steel gauge. “I haven't merely listened to a noise,” he said. “What I've seen after opening this wheel will go into my inspection report. I accept responsibility for the earlier repair to the axle; but if I declare this faulty brake safe and let the vehicle go, the patient sitting in front will become part of the risk I have taken.”

The driver telephoned his employer. A voice at the other end told him to write ‘reinspection’ and release the vehicle. Irfan read out his report: which components had been opened, where wear had been observed, what repairs were necessary, and which checks had to be made before the vehicle could carry passengers again. He did not testify that the earlier defect had been caused deliberately. “I won't have my vehicle repaired at your shop any more,” the owner said. “That is your decision,” Irfan replied. “But I cannot turn what I have seen into anger.” When the call ended, his apprentice asked, “If the customer goes, what about our wages?” Irfan opened a new ledger, with separate entries for payment due for inspection and payment due for repairs.

Under a nearby tin roof, Salim the horseshoe-maker was sorting wheel nuts. His old tool chest held a hammer for fitting horseshoes, a small pair of pincers and nails in two sizes; his new one contained a borrowed torque-measuring tool, a lamp for examining brake cables, and a training notebook. An acquaintance asked, “Will you abandon your ancestors' trade? If there are no horses left, does the name of the horseshoe-maker disappear too?” Salim lifted an iron horseshoe in his hand. “The name doesn't disappear. The craft within it changes. The heat of a wheel, the joining of metals, the effect of weight—I learned all these while fitting shoes. But I won't inspect a motor brake on the strength of old skill alone. New study is necessary.”

Salim filled out an application to become a trainee at a small vehicle-service centre. His earnings would fall during the training, so he told his old customers he could inspect their cart wheels two days a week, but stipulated that he would issue no motor-vehicle safety certificate without completing the training. An elder in his household was indignant at first. “You have a fully trained hand for making your own horseshoes. Why become someone else's apprentice?” “I shall keep that hand,” Salim replied. “But when a person's life depends on a journey, it isn't right to call myself a master of the vehicle's workings without learning them.” After a while the elder carefully put the old hammer back in its chest. It was a silent assent, though not an absence of anxiety.

Looking over Salim's application, Irfan warned him that workshops in many places bound workers to an indefinite period of unpaid ‘learning’. “Read the conditions governing hours, safety and allowances,” he advised. Salim showed him the entries for days of practice and the training fee payable. He requested an amendment: after a specified period there must be a qualifying test and a certificate showing that he was competent to use the tools. The instructor was reluctant when contacted by telephone, but Salim said that unless the condition was written down, he would not leave his old work only to be stranded halfway. Eventually written acceptance arrived. Salim placed a copy of the form in his tool chest and asked Irfan's permission to watch a real brake inspection.

Soon afterwards the driver of the passenger vehicle returned to the yard outside Irfan's workshop. He explained that the owner had assigned another vehicle to carry the hospital patient, but there was still pressure to load festival supplies onto the old one. “Taking the passengers out doesn't make the defect in the axle go away,” Salim said. “Driving an unsafe vehicle under the name of a lighter load isn't right either.” The driver telephoned an acquaintance who owned a handcart. Salim examined the wheels of that old cart and issued a written receipt identifying the parts found to be sound. The festival goods went by another, safer route. Irfan understood that writing down a fault, rather than merely driving away a customer, could sometimes be a way of placing responsibility for the work where it properly belonged.

In the grocers' lane of the market, Harish had opened three bundles in front of his shop. Their outer wrapping bore a well-known trademark, while the small packets inside carried different names for their contents, printed in inferior ink. He had already noticed the first sign of this mistake at the dyer's shop; now, when the wholesaler's original invoice arrived, the discrepancy became clearer: the number of bulk sacks did not correspond to the number of packets inside. Harish would not allow a customer to sniff or otherwise try the sample he had set aside in a tin. “An unknown substance is not to be tested by putting it in the mouth or on the body,” he said. “Sales from this consignment are suspended for now.”

A customer said he had bought from Harish a raw ingredient bearing that name for making soap, and intended to use it at home the next day. Harish consulted his sales record and stopped him. “Bring back any packet marked as belonging to this consignment. I'll refund the price or offer proper goods in exchange. Whether the wholesaler reimburses me is a claim I shall pursue afterwards.” “Why should you bear the loss?” the customer asked. “Because the goods left my shop,” Harish answered. “But before accusing anyone of the faulty packaging, I need evidence of who made it.” He did not put the customer's telephone number on a public list; instead, he arranged to notify each person separately.

Harish's assistant hesitated while preparing the return slips. What proof could be offered to customers who had taken goods on old credit accounts, without an invoice? Harish opened the credit ledger and checked the quantities and dates against the names, but pointed out that not every packet sold on the same date was suspect. He allowed customers to bring the original empty packets into the shop and posted a written notice promising to accept returns wherever the available identifying marks matched. “What if large numbers of people turn up with new packets?” the assistant asked. “Check the weight, the markings and the ledger,” Harish said. “But don't withhold a genuine customer's money out of fear.” Eight packets had been returned by evening; notices were sent about the rest.

Meanwhile, at the house where Kabir had been raised, the clay lamps had dried. His mother was drawing fine lines of red ochre across the newly plastered courtyard. A girl from the neighbourhood arrived with two garlands of mohariya flowers. His mother put the price of the flowers directly into her hand. “Keep them as a festival gift,” the girl said. His mother smiled. “I'll pay you for your work. If you wish to give me a gift afterwards, I'll accept it.” Kabir stood at the door watching. After hearing Subhadra's account, nothing here seemed strange to him; rather, the familiar words and gestures had become clearer. His mother did not ask him to submit that recognition to another test. She only asked whether he would eat first or finish the lamp stand.

After the meal, Kabir asked permission to tell her what he had learned. His mother stopped washing the dishes, wrung out the cloth and laid it aside. Kabir said that Subhadra had today given firsthand testimony that she had given birth to him; the original records remained to be examined, and no copies of private papers would be released without consent. There was no unmistakable sign of sorrow on his mother's face, nor of astonishment. She drew a long breath. “I remember the day you came into this house,” she said. “I didn't witness the day of your birth. If I claim to have seen what I did not see, I would be doing harm to your own life.” Kabir said, “I want you to tell me again about that day—only as much as you truly know.”

His mother took from an old cupboard a red-bordered handkerchief wrapped in cloth. “This was with you on the day you came,” she said. “But I don't know which house it was first made in. You used to develop a fever very quickly then. The receipt for the medicine bought in your first month is still in the exercise book.” Kabir examined the handkerchief. There was no name on it. His mother said that a neighbour had known something about those earlier days, but that it would be wrong to enter the woman's name or an assumption into a register without asking her. “I do not own the first day of your body,” she said, “but I am a witness to the years in which I raised you.” Kabir took her hand.

Kabir himself raised the matter of the small plot of land belonging to the household and the plain ancestral ledger kept in the cupboard. “If I ever apply to have my name corrected,” he said, “I shall not quietly surrender the rights I hold in this family's records of care and inheritance.” His mother replied, “First see copies of what the documents say in law. My wishes, the old accounts and the rules of statutory inheritance may be three different things. For whatever is rightfully yours, I shall go with you.” Together they opened the cupboard and placed copies of the old property papers, documents relating to his upbringing and school records bearing the guardian's signature into separate folders. No new name was filled into any blank space.

Kabir drafted a letter seeking private advice on the records. In it he wrote that he had obtained direct oral testimony concerning his birth, while verification of the original written evidence was still pending; that independent documents recorded his residence, schooling and long-standing family ties in the home where he had been raised; and that he required appropriate legal advice on personal inheritance, correction of his name and privacy. His mother read the letter and altered only one line. She preferred ‘mother who raised him’ to ‘foster mother’, but did not want a dispute over a name. “We can leave the legal category in the letter,” Kabir said. “At home I shall go on calling you Mother.” That one sentence eased a little of the long weariness between them.

When Naira came in the evening, Kabir did not recount the whole of his private conversation. He told her only that he had received significant firsthand testimony about his birth and was sorting the papers needed to safeguard his family's rights. “Do you need help with the verification?” Naira asked. “I need help understanding what kind of documents these are,” Kabir replied. “But I won't give you the source of Subhadra's private letter without her consent.” Naira accepted this. Her investigations over so many days had taught her that closeness was not a key that opened every door of an inquiry. From her bag she took a simple empty folder, on which Kabir himself wrote ‘Records of Upbringing’.

News also came from Irfan's shop that the vehicle with the defective brakes had been taken to another mechanic because its owner feared losing customers. Irfan did not claim to know what inspection the other mechanic had carried out. He gave one copy of his signed inspection report to the vehicle's owner and another to its driver. In his warning he specified the limits of his examination; he did not invent an official order prohibiting the vehicle from the road. Salim watched the inspection exercise with his instructor and remarked that the true value of a repair was sometimes measured by the price of letting a customer go. “That's not its only value,” Irfan replied. “If tomorrow someone brings another vehicle for safe repairs, the livelihood continues.”

Kabir went himself to Harish's shop to collect the turmeric and ajwain ordered for the festival. Opening his sales ledger, Harish told him that these goods came from a different, tested consignment; the packets with counterfeit printing were being returned. As Kabir placed the items in his bag, he asked, “How much will these returns cost?” On a lower page of his notebook Harish showed the cartage, the replacement goods he had supplied and the expense of returning the packaging. “The loss is mine,” he said, “but I have kept my claim against the wholesaler separate. The finest-looking printed name no longer means the finest goods.” Kabir took his receipt for the payment. It was a small consequence of exchanging trust that came ready-made for trust that had been tested.

For the festival, small niches were set up in two corners of the courtyard. Kabir's mother wanted all the lamps arranged in one even row, but the children insisted that lamps of their own making, each a different shape, should stand among them. “Let the places of the people who made them be seen as well,” Kabir said. His mother laughed. “Then I'll put that crooked lamp I saved in the middle. It's cracked, but it will do nicely for flowers.” The women of the neighbourhood brought oil, wicks and water, each separately. If one household brought more than the others, it was not proclaimed as a donation; whatever was offered was accepted simply. Laughter and the sound of work flowed together through the courtyard.

Kabir's questions had by no means grown fewer. He felt the weight of the next page of Subhadra's testimony, the handwriting on the old letter, the hour of his birth, and the name that had never been spoken. Yet that night he closed the notebook in which he kept his questions. Handing him the wicks for the lamps, his mother said, “The garland is a little short this time. Shall we make another?” Taking up the garland thread, Kabir replied, “I'll make it. But tell me first, does the doorway look bad if the garland is short?” “No,” his mother said. “The door will remain open. Whoever comes should find light inside. That is enough.” Without speaking, Kabir tied the thread. In this courtyard he had no need to produce new evidence of his place.

Chapter 95 · The Order to Kill

Before unlocking the warehouse at dawn, Shashi Mahuri separated the two crooked brass rings on his bunch of keys. One key belonged to his spice warehouse; the other to a room he had rented three months earlier to the office of a transport intermediary. Rainwater from the night had crept in beneath the door. Spreading an old sack on the floor, Shashi told the watchman, “Write down the time whenever anyone asks to see a document. I will not claim, in my own name, the right to open a tenant's belongings.” An authorised notice had reached him the previous day. It required access to the warehouse; it was not an order to confess to a crime.

When the investigating officer arrived, Shashi first produced the original rental agreement. The first page specified the room's dimensions, the second the monthly rent, and the third the ordinary rules for storing goods. An annex prohibited handing the room over to another party without written permission. “You knew nothing of the consignments inside?” the officer asked. “In the first month I saw wooden chests and empty baskets,” Shashi replied. “Later the tenant put a new lock on the inner door. I lodged a written objection and received no answer. I have a copy. How am I to testify to what I never saw?” Alongside the rent receipts he placed the acknowledgement number for his objection.

On the warehouse's rear wall, a square patch of limewash was whiter than the rest. A noticeboard had once hung there. Someone had taken the board down and stored it in another room, but four nails remained in the wall. The inspector photographed them. Shashi said he did not know when the board had been removed; the difference in colour could not tell him that. The watchman opened his duty register. One night it was not the tenant's usual employee but Shekhar himself, the shift supervisor from the intermediary's office, who had asked him for a key at midnight. The watchman had refused. Only now, during questioning, had he heard of another entrance through which the room could be reached.

In the municipal records room, Naira laid three folders on a table. The first concerned Mahesh's death and the investigation into the attack; the second, the warehouse tenancy and the intermediary's transport operations; the third, an instruction issued by Devvrat's office. Rama held a certified copy of the original receipt register. “I don't want one story here,” Naira said. “I want the histories of three kinds of responsibility: who said what, who did what, and who benefited from the consequences.” Rama added another line: “Finding the name of someone who profited is not the same as finding the signature of the person who gave the order.” Shashi's rent receipts were set apart at a corner of the table.

The document from Devvrat's office had come from an old file of the hospital assistance fund. That fund really had paid for Jamuna's medicines and transport; the beneficiary's letter of thanks had also been preserved. But the new page was not about distributing assistance. It belonged to correspondence concerning inspection of material brought in from outside. It stated that the warehouse's old entry register must not pass into unauthorised hands, and that office procedure should be followed before the dispute was allowed to escalate. At the bottom was a mark of approval from Devvrat's office. The inspector made clear that the seal and signature still required independent examination, though the original file's receipt number corresponded to an entry in the office's outward-dispatch register.

Beside that page lay an internal note drafted in Shekhar's office: ‘Ensure that the outcome of stopping Mahesh's testimony is secured.’ An employee asked what it meant. Naira objected to changing its words. “We cannot decide from this line alone whether it instructed someone to intimidate him, hold up an application, speak to him, or use violence,” she said. “But the fact that someone put in writing the objective of stopping Mahesh's testimony deserves investigation.” Rama recorded that the note had been found in Shekhar's office, did not bear Devvrat's signature, and could not reasonably be treated as a word-for-word copy of Devvrat's original letter.

Shekhar's former accountant was summoned. Pain in the old man's ribs made it difficult for him to sit for long, and the officer allowed him to stand from time to time. The accountant said that Shekhar had handled freight deposits, night-time warehouse bookings and accounts with outside contractors from the same room. “Some orders he gave himself,” he said. “Others came by telephone from above.” The officer asked what he meant by ‘above’. “I didn't hear any names,” the accountant answered. “If you want to put down a guess, you won't get my signature.” His voice was tired, but he did not wish to repeat the mistake he had made during an earlier inquiry.

A small sheet of paper was taken from a sealed police evidence box. It was not a page torn from the original cash ledger in Shekhar's office but a separate expense voucher that had been attached to it. It recorded two instalments, their payment dates, and an internal heading: ‘night pressure’. Both dates fell close to the first attack on Mahesh's home and the later fatal incident. The amounts matched withdrawals shown in bank records, but the full particulars of the recipient account still awaited authorised confirmation. Naira wrote: money moved; a heading was entered; the dates corresponded. Whether the money had been paid for murder was a question for further evidence.

Meanwhile, a coil of wire was found in a rear room of Shashi's warehouse. The inspector did not pronounce it the weapon used in the attack on Mahesh. It might perfectly well have been an ordinary length of tool wire. Beneath it, however, lay a folded receipt bearing the receiving mark of Shekhar's office and the words ‘rear door’. Shashi showed them the plan attached to his rental agreement. The rear portion was not included in the tenancy. “If that part has been opened, I will not wash my hands of responsibility," he said. "But first measure it. Don't shut down my main warehouse and take away my workers' daily wages." As the inspector sealed the room, he specified an authorised route by which the bundles of spices could still be removed from the front.

When Mahesh's wife came into the inquiry room, her first question to the officer was, "Who will be standing outside my house?" More than the story told by the new evidence slip, she needed to know her daughter would be safe on the way to school. The officer showed her a copy of the written arrangements available. Having read it, she said that the previous 'assurance' had not prevented an attack. This time the names of the security personnel assigned and the times at which emergency contacts could be reached must be written down. Naira rose to speak, then sat again. Mahesh's wife was capable of putting the questions of her own life into words. Time was set aside for her testimony; it was not turned into the dramatic opening of a news report.

She held firmly to the part of her last conversation with her husband that she wished to recount. Mahesh had repeatedly said that seeing a register of materials, or hearing someone's name, did not identify the person who had commissioned a murder. He had spoken to his wife of his fears, but she had never heard him say, 'Devvrat will have me killed.' "Now everyone wants to write their own conclusions in his name," she said. "I will not testify to words he never spoke. But I will not let go of the question of why written protection was not provided after the threats." The officer recorded the two points separately.

When Shabnam Malik arrived at the municipal service room, a new employee saw her family name at the door and stood up. "Madam Malik, I've sent in the man you recommended," he said. Shabnam was startled. "I haven't recommended anyone." In the employee's register, someone claiming to represent the 'Malik office' had sought permission to photograph documents from the investigation. The original entry pass bore no authorised officer's signature, only a shiny printed strip. Photographing the strip, Shabnam told the officer that her surname had been turned into an administrative authority. The time of the entry and a list of the files shown to the visitor must be preserved.

The employee was afraid he would lose his job. Shabnam asked him directly, "On whose instructions did you show the file?" "I saw the name strip," he answered. "The man inside said he had come from a major donor." Shabnam said, "A donor's name, a family name, and official administrative permission are three different things. Admit your mistake, but don't write down that you identified someone you never actually saw." The head of the service room ordered the entry details to be preserved. It was not yet certain whether any document had been removed from the file. The mistake of granting access, however, was entered in the public register, with responsibility for it recorded.

Shabnam also produced an old page of voluntary-service expense vouchers. She had always insisted that the name ‘Malik’ did not make her a government representative. This time her words became the subject of public suspicion. Someone suggested she might have agreed to the arrangement beforehand—why else would the family's name have been used? “Someone can steal my family name,” she said quietly, “but not my consent. Give me a chance to speak for myself.” She had a public notice drafted: no permission to enter issued in her name, or on the strength of her family's standing, was valid; genuine applications must carry the seal of an authorised official.

Before evening, the police interviewed a former driver from Shekhar's office in a separate room. Twice he drank water while setting out, in order, what he had personally seen and heard. After the first attack, he said, Shekhar had been furious and had declared, “If he hasn't understood the warning, this man must not be left alive to give his statement.” The driver identified the words as a threat he had heard Shekhar utter, not as an event he had witnessed with his own eyes. The officer asked whether anyone else had been present. The driver said he had seen two colleagues there, but did not know whether either had heard the words. His statement was recorded, and his identity was not made public.

The driver's mobile phone contained the original file of an old voice message. Its timestamp appeared to place it two days before the incident, and a voice could be heard saying, ‘We won't give that man another chance to reach the office.’ The driver claimed the voice sounded like Shekhar's. The inspector said that the digital file's time, integrity, and voice identification required independent verification. A secure copy of the phone's complete contents was made; the message was not transferred to any journalist's phone. As Naira began writing the words ‘order to commit murder’, she stopped herself. The meaning of what had been heard was terrifying, but technical confirmation of the speaker's identity and the context remained outstanding.

There was other evidence, however, that was not merely a matter of sound. On a page of the rental ledger, Shekhar himself, acting as an authorised employee, had approved the night-time movements of two individuals through the rear of the warehouse. The gate watchman's time register and the payment voucher corresponded with this. An initial examination of separate camera footage by the police suggested that those people had been seen near the time of the fatal attack on Mahesh; no conclusive identification of their faces had yet been made. The officer was explicit: there was a substantial link between the organised night-time arrangements and the payments, but it remained to be fully proved who had struck which blow at the scene of the murder. Even so, the old account of Shekhar as merely a clerk who arranged the movement of goods could no longer stand unchallenged.

Shekhar was formally notified to appear and give a statement. He requested the presence of a lawyer, and a time was fixed. One employee wanted his failure to appear immediately to be reported as an admission of guilt. Rama objected. “Exercising the right to give a statement is not a confession. And if you have the original ledger, the money trail and evidence of the secure route, present them properly. Don't build an entire accusation on silence.” Naira saw that these words might make the investigation not slower but more durable. Shekhar answered a call from one of his employees and gave a date by which he would send his written account. No answer had yet arrived.

Meanwhile, a letter came from Devvrat's office. It said that Devvrat had supported preventing unauthorised distribution of documents concerning the hospital's public construction works, but had given no order for violence against Mahesh. Three legitimate receipts for charitable payments accompanied the letter, recording assistance to patients, including Jamuna's treatment. Naira did not throw the letter away. She asked whether, after the original letter had been issued, Shekhar had received any separate telephone or verbal instructions; the office said it would check its contact register before answering. It would be wrong to declare the denial truthful before an independent inquiry, just as it would be wrong to treat charitable donation receipts as proof of a violent order.

Devvrat himself did not attend the next municipal meeting. His representative said, “Our office's work is social service. Allegations like these will bring assistance to patients to a halt.” Aniruddh, occupied with arranging patients' treatment, replied, “I acknowledge the value of the medicines that reached them. But aid given in the public interest grants no one the right to silence a person's testimony.” He did not, as a doctor, assign responsibility for murder to Devvrat; he merely stated in writing that patient assistance and safety inspection were two independent administrative matters. The representative requested that continuing medical assistance should not be interrupted. That request was recorded in the meeting.

Naira placed two instruction sheets from the offices side by side. One concerned controlled access to public documents; the other was Shekhar's internal note about the ‘outcome of stopping testimony’. The officer prepared a list for separate examination of the papers, inks, signatures and dispatch sequences of both. “Suppose,” Naira said, “the higher office gave an order to withhold papers, and an intermediary took it as permission to intimidate someone. Responsibility would then have to be examined in two places. If, on the other hand, the higher office expressly consented to violence in a conversation, looking for proof of that would be a separate undertaking.” Rama added a third column: who had actually benefited from the violence, and who knew it was being done.

At the back of the warehouse, Shashi and a labourer were drying soaked sacks over the heat of a brazier. The investigating team had taken away a few metal samples; Shashi obtained a receipt for each. A time was set for legal advice on the proposal to terminate the tenant's agreement. Parvati, one of the women workers, said that four days of her wages must not be held back on account of someone else's crime. Showing her the cashbook, Shashi said, “Rent on the room they have closed and your wages are not the same account. You dried those sacks; you'll be paid for that work today.” Parvati counted the money and said she needed to buy salt for her household. The payment was not turned into a news story about the proprietor's generosity.

As Mahesh's wife helped their daughter with her schoolwork, she heard a question: “If someone threatened Papa, have they caught that person?” Her mother said, “They've found some papers during the investigation. But who is guilty must be established according to the rules. You don't have to tell anyone who asks about our life at home.” “And Papa?” the child asked. Her mother placed an old one-line note of his between the pages of the book. “He won't come back. We don't have to wait for documents to know that.” The girl was silent for a while, then resumed the unfinished mathematics problem. For her mother, this small ordinary moment and all the difficult statements she had made that day belonged to the same life.

As the afternoon drew towards its end, the investigating officer read the first interim findings. Mahesh's murder was an established criminal act; the conclusive identification of those who had carried out the physical attack and each person's part in it remained under examination. The note about exerting pressure, the night-time entry arrangements and the chain of money linked to Shekhar's intermediary office were under evidence-based investigation; the indications of a violent decision were strong, but the statements and digital sources required formal authentication. An instruction from Devvrat's office to prevent unauthorised circulation of records was available; there was, as yet, no explicit written order to commit murder. The inquiry into that instruction's actual intention, subsequent communications and knowledge of the intermediary's actions continued. Naira understood as she listened that intensifying the investigation of one person did not mean another had already been cleared.

The amendment to the entry register in which Shabnam Malik's name had been misused was also recorded that day. Shabnam did not want anyone's private address published because of the wrongly granted permission, but she was equally unwilling to conceal the failure to verify identity. She prepared a limited public statement: ‘Entry was permitted on the strength of a prestigious surname; there was no written authorisation from the person concerned.’ She took pride in her family identity, but made it clear that a surname could never be the sole evidence of trustworthiness. The time-based inquiry into precisely which documents the visitor who had come to take photographs had accessed was scheduled for the following day. Shabnam agreed to attend in person.

In the evening, Naira offered to read her draft report aloud to Mahesh's wife. “I'm not an editor,” the woman said. “What you publish in public is your responsibility. But I will check whether you've removed anything that identifies my daughter or our home.” Naira gave her a copy of that section. She struck out two details: one identified the school, the other indicated the direction of her temporary residence. She added nothing to the account of the murder investigation. “You mustn't turn my life into evidence for your inquiry,” she said. On the page Naira had given her, the wife signed beside the lines she had deleted—the first time she had done so—and her consent extended only to those limited changes.

That night Naira changed the headline of her report. She had first written, ‘The Murder Order Exposed’. Then she wrote, ‘Links in an Intermediary's Violent Decision: Separate Inquiries into Instructions and Benefits’. Her editor asked who would read such a long headline. Naira chose a shorter one: ‘Three Questions About the Murder Order’. In the report, the facts corroborated by the original ledger, the driver's recorded statement, the written denial from Devvrat's office, and the unanswered questions about the contact register were kept in separate paragraphs. No picture was published of someone whose face had not been seen. That night, for the first time, an effort was made to write of Mahesh's death not merely as a tale of darkness in a warehouse, but within the precise limits of the responsibility borne by the living.

As a final task, Rama showed Naira a sealed sheet. It was not Sarita's original list of twenty-seven names. It was a copy of an old payment schedule associated with that list, on which red ink distinguished which entries could be shown to whom. Rama said that one intermediary's receipt number found during the day's murder inquiry corresponded to a sequence in the schedule; a matching sequence did not mean a matching person. “Tomorrow Sarita herself will set out the original sheet, the actual receipt, and the limits of permission given by those whose names appear there,” she said. Naira returned the page. The day's decision had opened the way to a deeper investigation of one intermediary; it could not, without asking, contain the whole story of twenty-seven people's lives.

Chapter 96 · Reconciling the Twenty-Seven

Before opening the brass box, Sarita wiped away the dust that had settled along its bottom. The rain had stopped beyond the doorway, but drops were still falling from the mango leaves. She set the box on the low wooden bed and asked Naira, “Who will be there today?” Naira counted not names but roles: Rama would examine the original office documents; two people would verify the testimony; and Sarita herself would explain what she had written. “As a journalist, I won't be looking at everything,” Naira added. “I'll keep separate even the notes concerning anything I have no permission to publish.” Sarita lifted the lid, but paused before turning back the final fold of the paper. “That condition must be stated at the meeting too,” she said.

Steam from the rice boiling in the kitchen drifted through the window and spread across the courtyard. Sanket had laid out two plates for the midday meal. He knew that papers would be examined at his mother's house that day, but he had not asked whose names were written on them. “Shall I take the food to the office?” he asked. Sarita said, “Go to school first. Protecting your mother's work doesn't mean doing everyone's work in her place.” Sanket put down the plates and picked up his books. Naira watched him leave. Sarita did not want the ordinary course of a child's day brought to a halt in the name of guarding twenty-seven names.

At the municipal records office, Rama Karna would not permit three tables to be pushed together. On one would lie Sarita's private handwritten list; on a second, the government's working copy, the receipt register and the old payment schedule; and on a third, the consent documents and the results of the reconciliation. Nowhere was there a public noticeboard displaying the names. The gatekeeper kept an attendance register, but no reason was entered for the witnesses' visits inside the building. Rama adjusted the window shutter and said, “Some matters will be decided here, while in others we shall establish a connection. Even what we establish may have to go for further examination. It isn't our task to declare anyone innocent or guilty.”

On the first page of her notebook Naira had already written three words: original, testimony, transaction. Sarita cautioned her. “Be careful with ‘original’. This is my original handwriting, not the government's original entry. Sometimes I wrote down a document I'd seen, sometimes what somebody told me, and sometimes my own inference—all on the same sheet.” She pointed to four places where the lines of ink differed. “These weren't corrections made on a single night. I went back and wrote on four occasions, for four different reasons.” Rama recorded that account without inventing dates. The folds in the paper, the differences in the ink, and Sarita's recollections each had their own limits as evidence.

As soon as the matter of the five altered identities arose, the old experience of the reading room came back into view. Nasim Idrisi had delivered the protected consent forms for all five people in a sealed bag. One person had authorised publication of a present name, but not the former one; another had authorised only the correction reference number; a third wanted the mother's name entered in the register but excluded from any news report. Rama said, “These five lines cannot all be printed in the same fashion. If the government copy stamps them all alike, we shall be making the same mistake again.” Naira agreed. Her report could mention the number of people involved, but not their private addresses.

Rahina Thakurai came in from the veranda, knocking the mud from her sandals at the threshold. There were two little stains of blue ink on her fingers from her copying work. She had previously gone to examine an incomplete stamp in the register of wages owed by Mangari Gorait's closed factory. Today she had been called because, for a time, she had worked making copies in the municipality's old transcription room. When Rama began to write down her particulars, Rahina said plainly, “Don't give my testimony credibility on the strength of some man in my family. What I saw on the page will bear my own signature. About what I didn't see, I'll remain silent.”

Rahina's paternal cousin was standing outside the office. That morning he had told her at home that speaking of an old mistake would harm the Thakurai family's livelihood. Rahina had not argued with him. She had served rice to her daughter, tied up her bundle of copying work, noted the hours of the legal-aid room, and left. Now she said to Rama, “I have to pay the fare for another job. Hear my full statement first, or I'll lose this evening's copying work.” Rama glanced at the office clock and made her the first witness. Alongside personal risk, the hours by which a living was earned had their place in this inquiry.

Rahina recalled a copying room she had seen three years earlier. The wire used for drying papers had broken, and the employees had laid old bundles on a wooden platform. She had been given a numbered list to copy. In five places, instead of names, the words ‘For correction of identity’ appeared. Beside one line was the mark ‘Not for publication’, which she herself had not made. “I didn't see the original applications that day,” Rahina said. “But I still have the receipt number for the copy I made, and the receipt for my work. Those words of warning were missing from the version printed later.” What she held out was not a press cutting, but her wage receipt.

An assistant immediately asked, “So the warning was removed deliberately?” Rahina looked at him. “Don't put that conclusion into my mouth. I didn't see the words in the printed copy. Whether someone removed them, or it was printed from another master, the machine's source register will tell us.” Rama compared the receipt number on the wage slip with the office's transcription register. The number matched; so did the date of the work. But the column for the authorising instruction was blank. Rahina insisted that the blank be recorded in her statement. The strength of her testimony lay not in filling that empty space with imagination, but in marking where it was.

Sarita's hand reached the last fold of the paper. Even then she did not turn it towards everyone. “This line contains the present identity of a living person,” she said. “Making public the name that person adopted after leaving an earlier life would put their livelihood and safety at risk again.” Rama first opened the consent document. The person's chosen representative was present in a separate room for a limited verification before Rama and Sarita. Naira closed her notebook and went outside. The longing to read the final page of a story did not seem to her more important than another person's safety.

Outside the door, Naira took a cup of tea and sat beside Rahina. Of her own accord, Rahina spoke about her home. “My cousin says the family's name will be spoiled. But in the year when I made fifteen trips to the office to get my copying wages, did the family name get my account opened for me?” Instead of answering, Naira asked, “May I publish your statement?” Rahina thought for a while. “You may print my own name and what I saw while doing the copying. Not which school my daughter attends, or who the men in my house are. Those things are not proof of my testimony.” Naira wrote down the boundary exactly as Rahina had set it.

After the limited verification inside, Sarita folded the sheet again. In a separate sealed record, Rama preserved only the attestation that the current identity in the twenty-seventh entry, the relationship acknowledged by the person concerned, and the status of any necessary transactions had been checked with that person's consent. No public copy of the former name was made; the representative's signature did not appear in the public summary. “I can now say that all twenty-seven entries have been accounted for,” Sarita said. “But I won't say that all the secrets of twenty-seven lives have been revealed.” Rama replied, “The result of a reconciliation and the whole story of a life are not the same thing.”

Beside one entry Sarita had written ‘returned’. Naira had originally understood this to mean a return to employment. Today, with the woman concerned having given permission, Rama heard its actual meaning: someone had come to the relief office for a second time after the flood. The woman's name had been entered on her first visit, but no money had been paid. A new receipt was opened on the date of her second visit. “Then the first claim stands cancelled,” an officer said. The woman objected. “I came back. I didn't surrender my right.” Rama struck out the assumption of cancellation and retained both dates. Lowering her eyes, Sarita said, “When I wrote them, I didn't understand that those two words could carry so much weight.”

A small strip identifying the evidence was placed beside each of the other twenty-six entries. In some cases, a person present had given the dates of their own work; in others, an old receipt bore a receipt number; elsewhere, the payment register showed a sum of zero. Zero did not mean that no work had been done, nor that the debt had been extinguished. It meant only that no payment appeared in that particular register. When Naira came back inside, she asked, “How can we call the reconciliation complete where no transaction is recorded?” Rama said, “There we'll write, ‘No evidence of payment; claim to be dealt with separately.’ Reconciliation doesn't mean everybody has received their money.”

That day, a line in red ink on the old schedule brought a new difficulty. A receipt number found during the murder inquiry at Shekhar's intermediary office matched a number in this old copy. “Then it's the same transaction!” an assistant exclaimed. Sarita interrupted him. “The numbers match. The things they refer to haven't been shown to match.” Rama called for the old ledgers from both files. One recorded the cost of transporting a bundle; the other, a fee for examining a copied booklet. The sums and dates were different. The common format of the numbers might also have arisen from the office's numbering system. Rama classified the coincidence as ‘Relationship under further examination’, not as a fresh accusation in the murder inquiry.

After midday a low, repeated tapping of a hammer on iron came from the back gate. Sumitra Kami arrived carrying three metal fittings in a wooden box, together with an old receipt. One sample had a double groove for holding a rope in place. After she had demonstrated that design, a similar shape had appeared on the drawings for new materials under a local contract. Sumitra had not sought to prohibit its use outright. “First find out whether someone copied my lines, or arrived at the measurements independently,” she said. “But when my drawing appears among the contract papers, why should the account of the name and the labour leave me out?” From the bottom of the box she took her original sketch, stained with oil.

An official remarked that nobody held private rights over the design of fittings for a public gate. Sumitra did not reply at once. She drew two forms on a sheet of paper: one an ordinary right angle; the other showing the dimensions of her groove and the turn that stopped a rope from slipping. “A right angle isn't my household property,” she said. “But I have a claim concerning the testing of these measurements, the sketch I made, the sample of the new fitting and the use of my name in selling it. I haven't certified that the bridge is safe. If somebody installed my sample without testing it, responsibility for that is another matter.” The official's easy answer—that everything was public—foundered on that distinction.

Naira asked Sumitra whether she might take a photograph for the newspaper. “Photograph my hands and tools,” Sumitra replied, “but not the complete dimensions of the original groove yet. Let there first be a written acknowledgement and an agreed fee for training.” She also asked that the name of her assistant, Chhotalal, be entered; he was owed separate wages for grinding the metal. Chhotalal would have preferred to remain silent, but Sumitra told him, “I won't add your hours to my name. The work you've done must be paid for in your own right." The assistant wrote down his working hours. Authorship and the earning of a livelihood were not allowed to lose their value by being swallowed into a single dispute.

Rama examined the receipt for Sumitra's old sample. The office register contained an entry for the same date, but the space for the maker's name on the new contract drawing was blank. That much correspondence was established, and no more. Rama recorded a provisional decision: use of the new fitting would be suspended until inspection was complete; the original sketch and the office copy would be secured; a separate committee would carry out technical testing; and Sumitra's name and claim would be entered into the record immediately. "At least this time the evidence that I made it won't disappear from the papers," Sumitra said. Before signing, however, she had it read aloud that remuneration for training and producing the sample would be determined at a separate hearing.

Rahina had heard the last part of the discussion. As Sumitra came out, she said, "Your groove and my copying work reach the table only when somebody else begins putting them forward under their own name." Sumitra gave a faint laugh. "Then I ought to write my name down early—but I ought not write down what I haven't seen." Rahina asked whether she could buy a small metal plate from her; a corner of the wooden chest at home had broken. Sumitra named a price. She did not sell the sample, but promised to make a new, ordinary fitting. Amid the arguments, the useful making of everyday things went on.

Back in the records room, Sarita examined the reconciliation sheets for the twenty-six openly examined entries. She had explained the reasons for the four changes of ink; proper consent had been recorded for each of the five altered identities; fourteen administrative discrepancies remained separate cases in their respective files; and the slips concerning four living people wrongly marked dead, and four people genuinely deceased whose accounts were still active, remained separate too. A young clerk asked, "Five, fourteen and eight make twenty-seven. Shall I put that in the summary?" Rama expressly forbade it. "A numerical coincidence isn't evidence. These are groups drawn from different registers. Some people may figure in two cases, and some may not be on this original list at all. Don't make a false genealogy out of arithmetic."

Naira stopped at the word 'verified' written below one entry. "Verified what?" she asked. "The person, the work, or the payment?" Sarita answered, "Earlier I wrote down the names I heard. Now the documents, testimony and position regarding money have been placed alongside each entry. But I have no right to say that a person's whole life has been verified." Rama composed a new heading: 'Reconciliation of entry relationships complete; dues, corrections and the outcome of allegations remain separate.' The heading carried discomfort as well as relief. A claimant for unpaid wages would still have to visit another office, but their name would not be trapped in an accusation without foundation.

Meanwhile, the sheet concerning Sarita's own withheld remuneration came before them again. Accounts confirmed that two instalments had been paid to the external contractor, Girdhari Sah. But the full equivalence between the work Sarita had done and the work performed by the outside organisation still had to be measured against the original submissions. “The question of recovering the payment stopped because my name was marked as dead is separate,” Sarita said. “By reconciling these twenty-seven entries today, I am not giving up what I am owed.” Rama issued a letter requesting a copy of the payment officer's separate order. Proof that Girdhari had benefited did not establish that he had authored the false mark of death.

An employee preparing the office's new copy asked why a photocopy of the openly examined portion containing twenty-six names should not be attached. Rama showed that public verification could be served by recording the date of direct inspection, the sealed examination record and the categories of evidence available. Once a complete image of the names was circulated, there would be no means of recalling it. Sarita herself raised the question of cost: paper for a separate secure copy, a box in which to store it, authorised inspection, and notice of the right to appeal would not be provided free of charge. Rama drafted a request for departmental funds. The written proposal stipulated that the expense of these safeguards must not be placed on the private witnesses.

When Rahina's statement received its official receipt stamp, she breathed more easily. But the sight of three missed calls from her paternal cousin on her phone saddened her. “What will you say at home?” Naira asked. “That I said what I saw, and didn't claim to have seen what I hadn't,” Rahina replied. “My family's agreement matters to me, but testimony isn't family property.” She slipped the folded acknowledgement into an inside pocket of her bag. That evening she had to listen to her daughter's lessons, and there was the possibility that tomorrow her hours at the copying shop would be cut. She decided to ask that very day for a written accounting of her wages.

The draft public statement was read in the evening light. Naira wanted people to understand that the examination of the twenty-seven entries was complete, but that no public list of their names would be issued. One member said, “Then the public won't know anything.” Sarita replied, “The public will know what procedure was followed, how many entries were examined, what evidence exists, who is responsible, and the date of the next hearing. Truth doesn't grow larger because everybody is told where a frightened person lives or finds shelter.” Rama included the procedure, expenditure, reference numbers for necessary corrections, and the avenue of appeal in the public summary. The documents disclosing private identities would remain separately sealed.

During a short break, Rahina sat on the veranda floor and added up the figures in her account book. Having spent two hours at the office, she would have to finish part of that day's copying work before evening. Rather than panic, she first sent her customer a clear notice of when it would be ready. Sumitra sat down beside her and showed her fingernails, blackened by her work. “My marks are made on iron,” she said, “and yours in ink. Neither is easy to wash away.” Rahina laughed. She did not pay an advance for the ordinary metal corner fitting to be made for her daughter's chest. Sumitra said payment could be made after the fitting was ready and had been measured. Neither woman called the other's labour a favour.

Aniruddha telephoned from the hospital. Part of the consignment of medicines with inconsistent labels was still being held for inspection, and it was proving difficult to find a vehicle for transferring patients. Naira understood that reconciling the twenty-seven entries would not, by itself, resolve the hospital's material difficulties. Rama made no announcement of a new agreement over the telephone. She said only that the timetable for patients' medicines, vehicles and drainage would be presented separately at the next day's meeting of the parties concerned. Even after a decision concerning old evidence, new arrangements were needed for the next day of living.

At that moment Sumitra was putting the metal samples back into her box. A young man said work on the new gate would begin at dawn. “Not before the measurements have been checked,” she said firmly. “That doesn't mean the work must be stopped for ever. First show evidence that the temporary plank is safe. If it isn't, set down another route for travellers.” The young man complained that so many inspections were inconveniencing people. Closing the lid of her box, Sumitra said, “When the plank gives way, will you remember the names of the people who suffer? Arrange to pay for safe work on time.” Instead of answering, the young man went to summon the inspector.

Before returning home, Sarita took back her private sheet from Rama. The sealed record of inspection remained in the office; the original handwritten list would go back into the brass box. Rama counted it through: the necessary reconciliation of all twenty-seven entries was complete; the conditions governing publication of five identities were recorded separately; hearings concerning disputed payments remained pending; and the way was open for orders to correct the registers. Naira wanted once more to look at the final sheet, then drew back her hand of her own accord. Her mother asked, “Do you trust it now?” Naira said, “Trust has grown not because I've seen the sheet, but because I've accepted the limits of the examination.”

When she reached home, Sarita put the pot of rice back on the fire. Sanket had returned from school and was writing a difficult word on his slate. Kabir had come to show them a fresh slip from a creditor concerning the wooden shelf. Naira told him that she had no wish to tell the whole story of the day's papers at home. He smiled, folded away the slip, and asked Sanket what the word meant. Sarita placed the box on the upper shelf. This time she did not bind the brass lid with new string. She laid across it an ordinary strip of cloth, whose knot she herself had the right to undo.

Writing the final line of her report that night, Naira kept the private summary of the twenty-seven separate from the pending letter in the murder investigation. The question of Shekhar's conduct and Devvrat's instructions still required evidence before any judgment could be reached. The order to correct the false mark of death against Sarita's name had not yet been fully carried out. Mithun's trail was being pursued elsewhere. But one task had genuinely been completed that day: the relationships, testimony and available record of transactions for twenty-seven entries had been reconciled, without hanging any living person's concealed name up in the marketplace. Naira closed her notebook. In the days ahead, people would again ask the price of loyalty, promises and standing by one another. The resolve of this night was simply that no one would claim authority over another person's trust without permission.

Chapter 97 · Shalya's Allegiance

On the wheels of the chariot travelling from ancient Madra towards Kurukshetra, Shalya was brushing away the dust with his own hands. The leather had swollen in the night dew, and the charioteer said the axle would have to be oiled before they reached the next halt. Shalya let him attend to it; first he asked how many carts of grain were following at the rear of the army. This company, setting out to support the Pandavas in war, consisted of more than royal chariots. There were grooms, metalworkers who repaired equipment, cooks and foot soldiers. Their weary bodies would bear the first weight of the political word Shalya had given.

Nakula and Sahadeva, the sons of Madri, were his nephews. The two had not been brought up in the same household courtyard during their childhood, yet the memory of his kinship through their mother had carried Shalya a long way. A young soldier asked, "We were told the road led to the Pandavas' camp. Whose splendid resting place is this, then?" Vessels of milk and ghee stood near the entrance. No one answered. The officer receiving them said only that a tired guest first comes to know his hosts through the meal they provide. Shalya did not go straight inside. He first asked the woman carrying water whether enough would reach the carts at the very back of the column. "The order covered only the first chariot," she said. "I have asked for another pitcher for the rest." Shalya instructed that its cost too should be entered in the accounts.

Within the encampment were spacious awnings, spotless seats and fodder mixed with salt for the horses. An elderly attendant from Madra laughed and said, "Yudhishthira has thought of everything." It was a supposition, not an identification. Shalya did not immediately challenge it either. He was satisfied to see clean bandages laid ready for washing wounds in one room; in another, a young assistant who had arrived late had received nothing to eat. Rather than tell the boy to eat from his own plate, Shalya had the kitchen superintendent bring him the portion allotted to him. He did not want anyone's right to wages or food transformed into an act of charity.

At the end of the meal, the chief officer of the reception came forward respectfully. Shalya said he wished to offer his thanks in person to the king who had provided such hospitality. Honouring the customary obligation, he gave his word that he would not disregard any reasonable assistance asked of him in return. Everyone seated nearby heard the promise, though no name had yet been spoken. One soldier smiled and mentioned Nakula; a momentary hardness crossed the reception officer's face. Shalya noticed the change of expression, but before he could speak, Duryodhana himself entered from behind the outer curtain.

"The hospitality was mine," Duryodhana said. Triumph rang in his voice; there was no note of apology. The vessel of water in Shalya's hand did not tremble. He set it down slowly beside his seat. "Then why was I given no opportunity to know who had made these arrangements?" he asked. Duryodhana replied that hospitality was not offered by asking which side a guest belonged to, and a king's word did not diminish after he had eaten. Shalya said, "A debt incurred by accepting a meal and the choice of a side secured through deception are not the same thing. If you wished for help in war, you should have said so to me at the outset." The reception officer lowered his eyes. Food still lay on the serving plates.

Duryodhana made his demand explicit: Shalya and his army were to join his side. Unease spread among the commanders of Madra. One pointed out that Shalya's nephews stood with the other side; another said that to turn back now would break a king's promise. Shalya raised a hand and silenced them both. He told Duryodhana, "The promise you have received was spoken by my own mouth. I know what it weighs. But do not suppose that this burden has wiped away my judgment, my old ties, and every injustice I have witnessed." One of Duryodhana's attendants took this for an unnecessary condition. Shalya continued to make clear what his promise did, and did not, mean.

An elderly counsellor, who had served Shalya almost as a minister, stood at the far edge of the assembly. Before him the treasurer placed the account book for the reception. Gold, food, gifts and fodder for the horses had all been added into a single reckoning. Shalya asked, "Whose consent has been promised in this book on behalf of these guest soldiers?" The treasurer showed him that most of the attendants had not marked receipt for their own meals; the portions for the group had been collected under a commander's seal. "How, then, can this reception amount to the freely given military consent of them all?" Shalya asked. Duryodhana invoked the traditions of a royal invitation. Shalya requested permission to keep the expense ledger with him.

Duryodhana wished to avoid discussion of the old humiliation in the royal assembly. Shalya would not let the subject pass. Reports of the game of dice and Draupadi's humiliation in the court had reached Madra; he had not personally witnessed every detail of those events. "What I have not seen myself, I cannot claim to have seen," he said. "But where the question was the defence of a woman's dignity in an assembly, the advantage gained by remaining silent cannot become your kingdom's account of justice." Duryodhana argued that in the exercise of royal duty, conflicting claims might also be decided through war. Shalya replied, "The decision to wage war may be yours. I gave no promise to call the humiliation of an innocent person just."

Shalya's personal attendant called him aside. The horses needed an additional day of rest after the interruption to their journey, and the commanders did not know where they were now to submit the accounts for their own provisions and medicines. Shalya saw a new difficulty. When a king abruptly changes sides, the livelihoods of cooks and grooms change along with those of armed men. He told his treasurer that the dues owed to the people of Madra would remain as before; the unused supplies from the reception camp would not be divided up as private rewards; and anyone with a legitimate reason to return home would have that reason heard. His army was now an instrument of a decision, not merely a company enticed by pleasures.

That evening Shalya had two separate messages prepared for Nakula and Sahadeva. Each explained the reasons for his decision; neither claimed that his nephews had agreed to it. A messenger asked, "Shall I tell them Your Majesty had no choice?" Shalya replied, "To call it compulsion would conceal the part I myself played in choosing. I recognised the deception, and I decided to honour my word. It is for me to bear the sorrow of that difference." Before the messenger departed, Shalya ordered that the letters be delivered securely, not turned into broadsheets spreading news of the war.

On the other side of the camp, the cooks from Madra were weighing the grain that remained. A representative of Duryodhana declared that it was all now part of the Kaurava stores. The head cook objected: the dry grain brought from Madra and the food received as hospitality were in separate heaps. Shalya went there himself and had both amounts counted. "A change of political allegiance does not change the original owner," he said. The representative silently took a copy of the tally, while some of the soldiers, watching, understood that the dispute between gratitude and entitlement which had occupied the royal gathering existed beside the cooking fires as well.

At night Shalya walked to the place where the horses were tethered in the Madra camp. The smell of oil and wet grass hung in the air, together with the distant cough of a sentry. A young soldier asked him, "My king, must we now believe that everything said by the side we have joined is right?" Shalya answered, "No. A soldier's discipline and the murder of his judgment are two different things. If an order comes to break the rules of war, we must call to account the person who gave that order." That was as much as he could say; he did not possess an answer for every hour still to come. At dawn he confirmed his decision to turn the chariots towards Duryodhana's camp, but resolved to take his dissenting voice with him.

The next morning, in a hospital in the modern town, Aniruddha was lifting the two front wheels of a stretcher to inspect them. The rainwater outside the corridor had not dried; plastic and fallen leaves had caught in the drainage grille. One wheel kept lodging in a crack in the floor, so the patient transferred during the night had had to be taken through another doorway. The reconciliation of the twenty-seven entries had been completed on paper the previous day, but the hospital floor was exactly as it had been yesterday.

Aniruddha told a nurse, “Settle the patient’s route first. Obtaining the key to the storehouse won’t make this floor level.”

Outside the hospital gate, Tara and Hira Sahni were wrapping their wet measuring rods separately in lengths of cloth. Near a tree on the old footpath, the water mark had been half erased. Hira said that the place treated as zero in the last official survey was not at the same level as the village’s traditional marker. If the two were converted into one figure without verification, the safe route would be shown incorrectly. Tara was pressed for time. “Patients are being held up while we wait for the inspection,” she said. Hira answered, “Then measure the route usable now separately from any order to alter the permanent flow of water. When the rod is planted beside the post, I shall first show everyone the marks on the ground.”

Five things were laid on the table for the midday meeting: a sealed key box from the storehouse, the timetable slip for the patient transport vehicle, two copies of the local water-level measurements, the community kitchen’s expense ledger, and the rules governing the public copies of records. The sight of that table reminded Naira of the unfinished sheet from the first attempted agreement. Consent had broken down then over a demand for unrestricted entry across private field boundaries. Now an official had written on a fresh page: ‘Facilities unanimously agreed for disaster management.’ Without signing, Shabnam Khatoon asked, “Where was this unanimity obtained? Our committee hasn’t even taken its vote today.” The secretary’s pen came to a halt.

Devvrat was present at the meeting. He had questions to answer about the management of his storehouse; his earlier instructions were recorded in a separate file in the inquiry concerning Mahesh’s death. For the moment he said, “Let us find a way to release immediately whatever part of the medicines and safety supplies has passed inspection.” Aniruddha asked who would authorise the release, who would take responsibility for the consignment labels, and whether the gate leading to the vehicle would be opened. Devvrat named three different offices in reply. Hearing this, Tara said, “If there are three names, write down three times and obtain three signatures. A patient cannot go from office to office.”

Shabnam laid out the objections of the committee from the opposite bank. On the map, the short way round a vehicle could take beside Ramesh Kushwaha’s field in that village had not been marked in the correct colour. Ramesh’s wife came to the meeting herself. Old scars from weeding marked her palms. Placing a finger on the paper, she said, “If you cut through the boundary of my field today and call it an emergency route, who will I ask to pay for the damage tomorrow? I don’t want to hold up a patient. But did you first inspect the open stretch of the old footpath?” Hira showed her two alternative sets of measurements. One path was feasible for people carrying a patient on foot, but not for a heavy vehicle.

In the heat of the meeting, a clerk hurriedly proposed that people from every household should provide ‘free service’. Ruhani, who was temporarily organising the delivery of water and simple meals from a nearby neighbourhood, interrupted him. “Two vessels of cooked rice will go from my home today. That is my own decision. But tomorrow, when fifty people need feeding, don’t enter zero in the budget by calling women’s labour free.” She placed before them separate calculations for rice, fuel, washing utensils, the journeys made by those delivering the food, and necessary dietary restrictions. An employee suggested that writing down caste beside each name would simplify distribution. Ruhani replied, “Count the need for food, not caste. And keep the list of patients’ medically prescribed diets confidential.”

For the first time that day, Naira did not take out her camera. The committee members’ private statements of objection, the protected identities among Sarita’s twenty-seven entries, and Rama Karna’s restricted inspection records were still kept in a separate cupboard. To those asking for a community copy, Naira said, “Everyone has a right to public receipts and the total expenditure. That does not give anyone the right to circulate a photograph revealing a living person’s concealed name.” Rama proposed a procedure: preserve the official original, prepare a separate community copy with names redacted, and disclose the reference number of every appeal. The committee was discussing policy here, not reopening the private affairs of the twenty-seven entries.

Rama Karna arrived at the meeting-room threshold carrying an old decision paper divided into numbered clauses. The first failed agreement had confused ‘permission’ with ‘giving advance notice’, treating the two as if they meant the same thing. Now an employee again wanted to write a provision permitting entry across a private field boundary on the strength of proof that notice had been sent. Rama recorded her objection. Ramesh’s wife said, “Hearing about it an hour beforehand does not mean I consented.” Shabnam asked for three separate clauses to make the emergency alternatives plain: ordinary work, immediate measures to save life, and accountability for any damage afterwards. She wanted people to understand their objections before they signed this time.

A young hospital nurse placed a small metal plate on the table. It was an old part used as a temporary grip on the stretcher ramp, and a proposal to replace it appeared in the printed list. Technical testing of Sumitra Kami’s new grooved prototype was still pending. The nurse asked whether, in the meantime, they should use some handmade, untested substitute. Aniruddha said no. Sumitra herself answered, “My claim to rights over my design does not establish that it is safe for use in a hospital. If the old approved plate is sound, inspect it and use it. The new prototype must go to the laboratory.” Her assistant, Chhotalal, made out a wage receipt for the work of tightening a loose screw on the old plate.

News reached the room that the wheel found wet and faulty that morning had still not been repaired. Irfan Khan came from his small repair shop. He wrote down the cost of replacing the wheel and said that hospital staff must first inspect the old defect in its axle. An official suggested that he ‘repair it as a donation’. Irfan replied, “I will examine it first for the patient’s safety, but there will be a receipt for my labour. Fitting a new wheel to a defective axle is no service.” In the meantime, arrangements were made to use the hospital’s other stretcher, which had already been tested. A little relief appeared on Aniruddha’s face, though the water in the canal had not fallen.

Outside the meeting, the rain began to fall harder again. Hira and Tara led a small inspection party along the safe part of the public footpath. Ramesh’s wife went too: she wanted to see both the boundary of her field and the route a patient would take. Hira matched the old water marks between two stakes. A narrow stream ran beneath an empty stretch of planking. “Not a heavy vehicle,” he said, “but one patient can be carried across this section by four bearers, if the mud is cleared first and safety attendants stand on both sides.” Tara recorded how long the work would take, what the bearers would be paid, and the signal at which the crossing must stop. She limited permission to one inspected transfer.

A little after midday, Jagdish Jha’s daughter-in-law needed to be transferred for an examination. As the nurse sought the family’s consent, she explained that the patient would go by the longer route; they would not cut across a private boundary belonging to another village. Jagdish wanted the vehicle to come straight to the house. His daughter-in-law spoke for herself. “I need my medicine on time. If the inspected foot route is safe for a stretcher carried by hand, take me that way. Don’t publicise my name; inform my family at home.” One family member stayed behind; another accompanied her. The bearers stopped where the footpath was broken, Hira checked the width once more, and a few moments later the stretcher reached the other side. It was the successful transfer of one patient, not proof of a permanent road open for unrestricted use.

On the transfer slip, Tara entered the time before the names of the four bearers. Two were labourers from the river landing; two were trained hospital attendants. An official told the workers called away from the landing on their day off that payment could be considered later in an emergency. Tara said plainly, “The rate will be written down before the work. An emergency is not a reason to reduce it.” On behalf of her committee, Shabnam asked again whether the bearers had been told what signalled a low or rising water level. Hira pointed out the red cloth hanging beneath the walkway: it was the sign to turn back as soon as the water rose there. The precautions taken for this single use of the route were not an authorisation for regular transport.

At the same time, another vehicle was held up outside the town storehouse, waiting for a separate consignment of medicines. An inspection paper arrived from Devvrat’s office, but the employee authorised to open the sealed door was absent. A young attendant proposed breaking open the key box. Aniruddha stopped him. “Medicines whose labels are under investigation cannot be taken to patients without permission. But holding back supplies already approved also puts people in danger.” Over the telephone, Devvrat said he would come in person and fix a time for a limited inspection. Tara entered his words alongside the date; she did not record the assurance as though the storehouse had been opened.

At the brief evening meeting, Shabnam struck out ‘unanimous’ on the first page and had ‘disputed proposal’ written in its place. Devvrat acknowledged that the five matters—the storehouse, the patient, the measurements, the food and the community copy of the records—required separate lines of responsibility. Ruhani submitted the receipts for that day’s actual food expenses, but requested a separate wage rate for the collective kitchen arrangement proposed for tomorrow. Rama recorded the date on which the rules for copies would be examined. Hira signed the temporary safe measurement for one stretch of the footpath, not a certificate for the entire drainage system. Shabnam said, “Some work was accomplished today. If we call it a complete agreement, tomorrow’s objections will be suppressed again.”

Naira crossed out the first headline she had written: ‘Road Opened on Five Conditions’. In its place she wrote: ‘One Patient’s Route Opened; Five Conditions Still Under Review’. Sarita gave Naira a small container of food she had brought from home; it contained no secret office papers. “Eat today,” she said. “Tomorrow, attend to those whose hearing is tomorrow.” Naira stood by the doorway listening to the water outside. The stream seeping through one hospital wall had still not stopped, and the storehouse remained locked. Alongside the day’s small success, the unfinished work made itself heard just as clearly.

Chapter 98 · Vibhishana's Path

In the royal residence of ancient Lanka, Vibhishana was tightening the lid of the water jar set beside the threshold of his home. A night watchman had opened it to drink but had gone away without replacing the lid. A little boy came barefoot into the courtyard and asked, "Father, may I go up to the roof today to see the sea? Yesterday you said the boats could be seen a long way off." Vibhishana did not lift him into his arms; first he moved him into the shade beside the jar. "There are many guards on duty today. We shall go in the evening, if it is safe." The boy asked again, "Who will say whether it is safe?" Vibhishana had no immediate answer.

Inside, his wife was setting apart two measures of grain: one for their household, the other for the attendants whose families were working on preparations for war. The supply of rice issued from the royal treasury had been dwindling for three days. "The watchman said that anyone who leaves home will lose their share from the treasury," she told him. Vibhishana asked whether the watchman had seen the order himself. "He only heard it," she replied. Both understood that a threat passed on by word of mouth could inspire genuine fear, but that did not establish where it had come from.

Before going to the royal assembly, Vibhishana summoned an old attendant. The man said that the decision to keep Sita confined in the Ashoka grove had stirred resentment even in the soldiers' homes, but he would not name anyone. Vibhishana did not think it right to press him for names. His opposition to Sita's having been brought there by force did not depend upon anybody's secret identity. He resolved to say in the assembly, in his own name, that holding a woman against her will was not the defence of a kingdom but an injustice within it.

As soon as the ringing of the bell ceased in Ravana's assembly, the commanders began proclaiming their preparations for war. An officer gave the number of enemy soldiers across the sea with such certainty that one might have thought he had inspected every rank himself. Vibhishana asked, "Which messenger brought that count? Is it a direct enumeration or an estimate?" The officer fell silent. Ravana declared that speaking of the enemy's strength diminished the courage of the assembly. "Assurances that have not been examined do not make courage," Vibhishana replied. "I favour removing the cause of injustice before there is war."

He urged that Sita be sent back with honour. Ravana called this fear on his brother's part. Several members of the assembly laughed; others lowered their eyes. Vibhishana did not raise his voice. "Being your brother cannot make every decision of yours right," he said. "It is not the throne that is being insulted: it is because of this throne that all these lives have been placed at risk." Ravana spoke in rebuttal of royal authority, but gave no answer to the question of Sita's consent.

A warrior in the assembly accused Vibhishana of passing information to the enemy. In support of the charge he could produce no messenger, letter, or direct encounter. Vibhishana answered him: “I am expressing my disagreement here, in this assembly, before you all. And here an accusation is being manufactured against me about something supposedly done in secret.” In his anger Ravana ordered him to leave the court. Vibhishana understood the consequences: he had separated himself not by taking up arms but by speaking, yet the guards of the royal palace might recognise no distinction between the two.

When he returned home, the boy asked whether his father had forgotten their evening visit to see the sea. Taking off his sandals, Vibhishana said, “I shall be going far from home.” The boy looked towards the water jar. “Then who will fill it?” Vibhishana looked at his wife. She did not stop working. “I shall fill the jar,” she said, “but first we shall talk together and decide who is to remain in this house, and who is not.” There was anger in her words, and an insistence upon her own authority. Vibhishana acknowledged that the punishment for his political dissent could not simply be imposed upon his family.

He opened a bundle of cloth and separated the pages recording household dues and wages still owed to the servants. “If you take these papers with you,” his wife said, “who here will be able to show proof when people ask for their earnings?” Vibhishana left the original ledger at home. He took only what he needed for the journey and letters for messengers concerning his family’s safety. He did not promise his wife more than lay within his power. The decision to dissent was his; the protection of his family was not wholly within his control.

At the small door behind the royal palace, a guard barred his way. He had known Vibhishana since childhood, but the young man’s duty had now changed. “I have orders that no goods marked as belonging to the royal stores may leave with you,” he said. Vibhishana showed him his empty palms. An elderly messenger accompanying him urged him to take the royal seal, which would secure him prestige on the far shore. Vibhishana left the seal at the gate. “Prestige built by stealing documents will earn no trust,” he said. The guard opened the door at last, but did not raise his eyes when they parted.

On reaching the shore, the small band of companions who had come with him wanted to press forward. Two said that, once they entered the camp across the water, they would certainly be taken for enemies. “The people in that camp have not yet promised to accept us,” Vibhishana said. “We shall ask for refuge, and listen to their answer.” He stated openly why he had left his side, but did not offer the secret routes used by ordinary households in Lanka, or the names of captive servants, as goods to be traded. He told his companions too not to sell information about innocent people in order to save themselves.

Across the sea, in Rama’s camp, the soldiers readied their weapons at his arrival. Sugriva and several other commanders were uncertain what to do.

That Ravana's brother should appear suddenly with his companions could not, without examination, be made a reason for trust. A sentry told him to halt at a distance. Vibhishana stopped there and explained why he had come. He said that he had opposed his brother's unrighteous conduct and now sought shelter. Yet the fact that these words had been heard was not, in itself, proof of his inward intentions.

Rama listened attentively to the objections of his companions. One said that admitting the newcomer might expose the camp's plans. Another said that turning him away could imperil the life of a person already in danger. Rama decided in favour of offering the stranger refuge. He made clear that the shelter required to preserve a life would not be withheld until every test of allegiance had been passed; but access to the army's confidential plans, its night watches and anyone's secret duties was another matter altogether. Refuge and military authority remained two separate things.

Bowing, Vibhishana said that he and those who had accompanied him would obey the rules governing food and rest that applied to everyone. Rama asked, "Where is Sita? Tell us only what you have yourself seen." Vibhishana kept what he had heard in the royal household distinct from what he knew directly. In haste a guard demanded a map of every secret gate in Lanka; Rama stopped him. A boundary was established there and then: Vibhishana's refuge and protection were not to be purchased at the cost of increasing the danger to ordinary families in Lanka.

At his first meal in the camp that night, Vibhishana remembered his little boy's question: Who will fill the jar? Far off, the glow of Lanka's fires and the preparations of its armed men flickered in the darkness over the sea. His new shelter had not put an end to the labour of his household or the fears of his wife and child. A young man among his companions asked, "My lord, you have left your own people. Whose people are you now?" Vibhishana said, "I refused to support what I saw to be wrong. But that decision does not erase what I owe the people I have left behind." He took his first mouthful of food. Nothing had been won in that moment; a difficult path through life had been chosen.

Videhapur, 2039. At the rear gate of the hospital, Tulsi Tajpuriya stood turning the front wheel of his goods vehicle to measure it. News of the drivers' strike had arrived, and there was a risk that the appointed times for transporting two consignments of medicines and a patient to another treatment centre that day would come to nothing. The tarpaulin rolled up on the roof of the vehicle was wet from the night's rain. Tulsi first checked the air in the tyre. For a journey of that distance the vehicle had to be sound; a driver's agreement alone was not enough.

The strike had not been ordered unilaterally by the vehicle owners. The drivers had stopped work in protest against three months of unpaid risk allowances, payment for night journeys, and the practice of making drivers bear the burden of repairs after accidents on the damaged culvert. A young driver named Jamir stood holding a sheet of paper. “If we put all the vehicles back on the road in the patients’ name,” he said, “tomorrow the owners will ask why we called a strike at all.” Tulsi did not interrupt him. “We must keep our demands valid,” he said, “and keep the hospital’s essential route open too. We shall put the two matters down separately in writing.”

Aniruddha came out of the hospital and explained that Jagdish Jha’s daughter-in-law had completed her first transfer, but two other patients might need to be taken for further examinations on time. He named neither patient publicly. One needed special observation; ordinary transport might be available for the other. Tulsi asked plainly, “Let the doctor make a separate list of those whose transfers are indispensable. We will not carry warehouse goods under the pretence that ours are patient vehicles.” Aniruddha agreed that any emergency instruction would be entered on a medical slip, not made into publicity.

Hira Sahni and Tara arrived at the gate carrying two maps of the drainage system. Hira showed them the mud still adhering to the measuring rod from the previous night. “A vehicle may pass under this culvert, but the flow of water has still not been measured. Adding weight on the wet surface is dangerous.” Tara said that the old proposal to use a detour across the private field boundary could not be put into effect without Ramesh’s family’s consent. At the previous meeting only a slip giving notice had been drawn up; notice was not permission. Tulsi marked the edge of the map in red, but did not treat his mark as official approval.

The drivers’ meeting began on a raised platform as the water receded. To the right stood a woman nurse from the hospital; Jamir and Tulsi were in the middle; to the left Ramesh’s wife stood pointing out a new water mark on the embankment of her field. The transport contractor’s representative said, “If an exception is made for a patient today, tomorrow it will be made for every load.” Tulsi replied, “Then write down that you will not extend the limits of this exception.” The representative fell silent, for a written restriction would not offer convenience to one side alone.

Ramesh’s wife had laid bundles of seedlings in her field. “I cannot see the sun’s path at night,” she said. “If a vehicle climbs up here, the embankment holding the seedlings will wash away. If my land is opened in a patient’s name without my consent, I shall be the one to bear the loss.” Aniruddha asked whether she would allow herself to be present when a safe alternative route was measured. She agreed. “Let them measure, not enter. Ask me again about entry.” Tara put in writing that permission to witness the measurements was not consent to use the land.

There, too, a woman driver named Paro opened the old pages of her duty register. Twice she had been sent out at night to carry injured people, yet the extra payment had been entered under the goods-carriage account. “I am not afraid of emergency journeys,” she said, “but when my signature is described as voluntary service, the accounts for my family’s rations no longer add up.”

Jamir read out the dates on her slips; the contractor's representative promised to bring the original attendance register for those days. Paro said she would take part in a trial run if the vehicle was suitable and payment was recorded in writing, but first she wanted a copy of the register.

During the vehicle inspection, Irfan Khan reported a minor defect in Tulsi's rear brake. "You can still drive at low speed as far as the hospital, but replace the part before any longer journey," he said. Tulsi and Jamir looked at one another. Running a dangerous vehicle during a strike might make for a story about sacrifice, but it would not make the patient safe. Showing them a list of sound vehicles available, Irfan suggested a smaller vehicle belonging to another driver. Trained staff would have to check whether it could accommodate a stretcher: a mechanic's estimate was not medical clearance.

Ruhani, who was in charge of the community kitchen, arrived carrying two thin rotis and a vessel of hot dal. People had been sitting at the strike meeting since morning, and it was time for the nurses' shifts to change. Before serving the food she said, "This kitchen runs on voluntary donations, but the wages of the women who cook will be entered separately." A representative laughed and said that so much accounting was hardly appropriate in an emergency. Setting down his plate, Ruhani replied, "The hunger of people in need does not wipe out my accounts." No one refused the food; the receipt book remained on the table as well.

Shabnam came to the meeting with a copy of the papers from the first failed agreement. She read aloud that five questions—patient transport, drainage, access to the warehouse, the labour of preparing food, and public records—were still being examined separately. An assistant from Devvrat's office wanted to turn this exception to the strike into an advance announcement of a 'second agreement'. "Opening a patient-care route for a single day does not break the seal on the warehouse or mend the drains," Shabnam said. "Write down only what has actually been agreed." Rama Karna added words to that effect in the public copy.

Tulsi had three conditions written down. First, only emergency transfers certified by a doctor and specifically identified life-saving supplies: no detained consignments, nor those whose labels were still under examination. Second, each driver's independent consent, a safety inspection, and written payment of the normal fare and risk allowance; undertaking this journey would not be taken as withdrawal of the strike's original demands. Third, if a public route was unavailable and private land had to be used, explicit permission must first be obtained from the person concerned. "And the hours?" Jamir asked. Tulsi added, "A trial from six tomorrow morning until noon, followed by another meeting."

The contractor said the rate of the risk allowance had not yet been fixed. Jamir produced an old payslip. "Let the previous written rate apply to tomorrow morning's journey," he proposed, "and let the arrears for the disputed months remain a separate claim." Having examined the accounts, the contractor conceded that payment had to be promised in writing for this specified exception. Before entering names in sequence, Tulsi asked each driver separately, “Do you agree?” Two refused; their names were taken off the list. Three accepted on the stated conditions. There were fewer volunteers, but the meaning of consent had become clear.

Inside the hospital, a nurse was explaining the procedure to the daughter of an elderly patient. “If these meetings go on and on,” the daughter said, “who will stop the clock on my father’s breathing?” Aniruddha told her that the physician would determine the time of transfer according to the patient’s condition. If treatment there was safer, the mere availability of a vehicle would not mean that he must be sent away. The daughter entered a hospital room and took her father’s hand. The strike outside was no small thing beside her anxiety, but she was at last being given accurate information about her father.

Near the warehouse, a representative from Devvrat’s office arrived with two lists of medicines. The first contained approved supplies whose inspection was complete; the labels on the second were still being examined for inconsistencies. He wanted to combine both lists on a single emergency slip. Aniruddha noted limited availability against the first list and asked for a copy of the order directing that the second remain sealed. Naira took a few photographs to document the difference, but kept the patients’ names and the drivers’ private telephone numbers out of her camera’s view. Shabnam said that the medicine lists must not be made into an allegation of guilt in the investigation of Mahesh’s murder.

As the afternoon waned, Tara, Hira and Ramesh’s wife walked from the hospital to the public bend in the road below. Where rubbish had been cleared away, water began to flow for a little while, but the broken wall of the main drain was still holding it back. Hira stood the measuring rod upright; the readings before and after were recorded. “Today’s clearing has made one corner of the vehicle route safe,” Tara said. “It has not completed the drainage work.” Standing on the field boundary, Ramesh’s wife looked at her seedlings. A small current was turning towards them, so she herself settled with a labourer what he would be paid to repair a temporary bamboo barrier. She received a written assurance that half the cost would be met from the public-drainage allocation.

During the brief trial in the afternoon, a hospital guard wanted to hang a sheet bearing the word ‘Consent’ at the vehicle gate. It named no driver and carried no signature from the hospital officer responsible. Rama stopped him. “This is a notice, not an agreement,” she said. Paro arrived with a copy of her receipt: her outstanding pay had been entered separately in the previous month’s list, and the fare for the new trial journey had been recorded under another heading. Only then did she put her name down for duty. “Now the problem is solved,” an employee exclaimed happily. “We have a vehicle time for today,” Paro replied. “We still do not have three months’ wages.”

In the evening Tulsi returned to the raised platform where the strikers were meeting. Of the three drivers who had agreed, one had a vehicle found unsuitable for a stretcher when its medical dimensions were checked. That driver was removed from the roster without penalty. For the other two vehicles, the names of the drivers, nurses and responsible officers were recorded separately. “Two vehicles are not enough,” Jamir said. “It is true that they are not enough,” Tulsi replied. “But putting down a faulty vehicle as a third will increase the number on paper, not the safety.” No one applauded. They merely wrote the list again.

As Naira wrote her report, she avoided making one event out of the old story of Shalya, Vibhishana’s seeking refuge and the present-day drivers’ strike. No one in the town had directly witnessed those ancient decisions. For the events of the present she had written pay rates, vehicle-inspection slips, measurement marks and signatures recording consent. Her first headline read: ‘Strike Broken, Route Open for Patients’. She struck out ‘Strike Broken’. The new headline was: ‘Strike Continues, Limited Route for Patients’.

When Tulsi reached home at night, his little daughter was turning the washed dishes upside down to dry. “Father,” she asked, “will you go to the hospital tomorrow, or sit with the drivers?” “I shall check the vehicles at dawn, then the two sides will meet,” he said. His daughter asked who, then, would stitch her torn school umbrella. Tulsi took it into his hands. One end of a metal rib had come loose. Saying he would fetch some fine thread, he sat down on the roof. The work of a household did not wait upon any public agreement.

At dawn the next day a list was posted at the gate: two vehicles fit for the trial, their designated drivers, the hours during which patient services would operate, written responsibility for payment, and a prohibition on entering private land. A separate date was fixed for the next hearing on the drivers’ original strike demands. The full cost of replacing the hospital wheel had not been approved; the main drain remained blocked; the inspection seal on the warehouse had not been removed. Yet for the first time, when a nurse asked what time an essential vehicle would be available, she received not a guess but an actual availability confirmed by signatures. Tulsi shut the bonnet and went to wash his hands before his next task.

Chapter 99 · Kumbhakarna's Awakening

Inside the western rampart of Lanka, jars of oil were being brought before dawn to the door of the vast chamber set aside for Kumbhakarna's sleep. An elderly attendant, looking at a blister on her finger, told a newly arrived soldier that the smoke from the torches had grown too thick inside. She put out a torch herself. "If we are to wake him, there must still be air to breathe," she said. On the faces of those waiting for the door to open lay the weariness of war, not the impatience of celebration.

The first sign that sleep was breaking in the chamber was not a roar but a cough. As Kumbhakarna turned over, a metal vessel placed beside his bed fell to the floor. At the sound of water he opened his eyes and spent a long while trying to recognise the attendants. "What day is it?" The old attendant standing near him said that the situation at the city's outer posts was deteriorating and the king wanted him present at once. Kumbhakarna asked again, "I am not asking how many days I have slept. What has happened in the meantime?" He sat up. "And the people in our homes? Who will tell me how they are?"

When water was brought, he saw that the pitcher was half empty and that two young men working inside were trembling. Kumbhakarna did not order that soldier to stand; he pointed instead towards the food vessels. The old woman said that those occupied with preparations for his awakening had had no rest at night for three days. Kumbhakarna pushed away the thin platter of rice set before him. "Let those who woke me eat first," he said. The guard stared in astonishment. Those who had sacrificed their own sleep to turn a sleeping body into an instrument of war had no place in the court's reckoning of exhaustion.

Ravana's messenger reported that Vibhishana had left the royal household and joined Rama's camp. For a while Kumbhakarna's face remained still. "Why did he leave?" "Betrayal of his brother," the messenger replied. Kumbhakarna did not accept this as an answer. He asked separately about Sita's captivity, the dispute in Ravana's assembly, and the gathering of troops on the far shore of the sea. Some of what the messenger related he had heard in the assembly himself; some had come from the mouths of guards. Kumbhakarna recognised where conjecture entered the account. Yet the news of Vibhishana's departure recalled their old disagreements. It did not seem impossible to him that his brother had found the courage to state his dissent before the royal court.

The passage leading to the royal residence had been propped up in two places with fresh timber. Near a small heap of rubble, five children were collecting rounded pieces of stone. A soldier ordered them away, but one little girl replied that her mother worked there during the first watch and she was looking for her mother's stiff, worn sandals. Kumbhakarna moved the girl to one side and asked her name. "Will my telling you my name help find the sandals?" she asked. The sandals were not found. He gave the guard the task of removing the rubble safely; he offered the girl no firm promise of reassurance.

Mandodari met him outside the royal assembly. Instead of royal ornaments she held a small list tied with thread: which households had wounded people, where the supply of grain had been interrupted, which attendant was going about her duties after leaving her own child behind. "His Majesty wants your strength," she said, "but war also takes place in the bodies of those at home." Kumbhakarna stopped to read the list. Mandodari said it was incomplete; no news had come from houses that could no longer be reached. "What you have told me was not lost in my sleep," Kumbhakarna replied. But even after reading it, the choice before him had not become simple.

Ravana had walked behind his throne, as though he wished his brother to hear him standing rather than seated. "The city is in peril," he said, "and you ask about food and rest?" Kumbhakarna replied, "Stopping people from eating in a time of peril does not diminish the enemy." Ravana's gaze hardened. He uttered Vibhishana's name as though a single disagreement were an assault on the entire royal house. "If our brother is wrong, oppose him," Kumbhakarna said. "But first hear what he said." Ravana remained silent. Outside, a war conch sounded, yet its note could not fill the silence between them.

Ravana said that Sita had become a question of Lanka's honour: to let her return would be a declaration of cowardice. An old scene from a royal feast rose in Kumbhakarna's mind. That day a servant had broken a vessel and, out of fear, tried to conceal his fault. Kumbhakarna had spared him punishment in return for telling the truth. Now he said to Ravana, "An act begun in injustice is difficult to abandon when you have named it honour. Difficulty is no proof of righteousness." Ravana reminded his brother that the crisis was at the gate; there would be time to preach afterwards.

Kumbhakarna turned his eyes away from his brother for a moment. "If I do not fight," he asked, "who will protect the vulnerable people of my city?" Ravana answered by speaking of the soldiers' oath. "And if it was your own command that brought this war here?" Kumbhakarna asked again. Ravana grew furious at the question. He did not threaten Kumbhakarna with exile; he said that his place was in the front rank of battle. For an instant Kumbhakarna thought of the path Vibhishana had taken across the sea. But he resolved not to borrow his brother's path merely to spare himself the pain of making his own decision.

He spoke plainly. "To hold Sita here without her consent was wrong, and remains wrong. I will not call the war that began for this reason a righteous war. But I shall go with the defenders of the city. I shall give no order to strike the wounded, those who have laid down their arms, or families hiding in their homes. Whoever I can save, I shall save." Ravana said that the battlefield allowed no time to remember such distinctions. "Then the burden of deciding is heavier still," Kumbhakarna replied. He understood that stating his restrictions would not stop the actual violence of war; his very presence among the soldiers would strengthen the campaign whose cause he believed to be wrong.

Leaving the assembly, he met a young commander who had selected a route of attack for him. On the map, the mark denoting a small village had been rubbed out and replaced with an arrow for the troops to pass through. "Were there people living within this mark, or only empty houses?" Kumbhakarna asked. The commander said that half the villagers had fled. As to the remaining half, he had no information. Kumbhakarna drew the erased mark again. "Send a messenger first. Do not treat a village as empty on the assumption that its people are absent." He added, "I have heard what that will cost. But I will not act as though I know what I do not know."

In the soldiers' camp, the bandage around a wounded man's knee had come loose. Kumbhakarna told the attendant to stop his hand. "Until the physician arrives, only cover it with cloth," he said. Food left from the earlier feast had reached the camp, but the woman distributing it asked to whom the share due to a dead soldier's family should be given. "We shall count after the war," said the commander. "Feeding the family tomorrow is a question for today," she replied. Kumbhakarna ordered a trustworthy officer to make an actual count of the families; it was not right to wait until morning for a full account of the soldiers' deaths.

As night deepened, the wheels of war chariots were being inspected at Lanka's gate. Kumbhakarna took up his weapons. The attendant who had put out the torch at dawn came bearing water. "You have woken," she said. "May we sleep now?" Kumbhakarna replied that the next watch was being brought in to relieve the guards. The old woman then asked, "And you?" For a little while he did not answer. "I am going into a war that began for a wrongful cause," he said at last. "Now I must not turn my face from the responsibility for what I myself shall do." His departure was a decision, not proof of innocence.

Videhapur, 2039. Morning rainwater had collected beneath the edge of the paved strip in the lane behind the hospital. Kamlesh Dabgar was sweeping down the water trapped at the edge of his thatched roof. Inside his little shop, strips of iron for fastening broken pitcher handles, a cobbler's knife and lengths of thread hung separately. There a man sent by the landlord pushed a new rent notice towards him, its figures written in red pencil. It demanded the increased amount from the third month onward, or that he vacate the premises within seven days. Kamlesh did not sign it.

During the previous year's dispute over the clay ground, Kamlesh had kept separate accounts of rent and customers' unpaid balances. Now the school fees of his two children and the medicine for his elderly mother depended on the money kept in a single chest at home. A meeting of the community forum had been arranged with Shabnam, but to make his customers' names and addresses public would destroy their trust. Kamlesh separated two sheets: the first set out measurements, rent, the repair space and payments; the second contained descriptions of customers' personal belongings. He chose the first sheet for the public meeting.

Devi Gond reached the hospital half an hour before the appointed time to inspect her training register. Her duty roster recorded the inventory taken on her first day and the work performed under Salma's supervision, yet opposite three shifts that week someone had written 'Absent'. Devi brought the bus-fare receipts for those days, a copy of the training centre's attendance record and the hospital's goods-receipt numbers. An office assistant told her that, since her mother was unwell, it would be proper for Devi to leave her studies and stay at home. "Which doctor decided my mother's treatment," Devi asked, "and in which register is the order terminating my training?" The assistant was not qualified to answer the first question, and he had no document for the second.

Leaving home, Devi had been turning over in her mind their conversation of the night before. The old pain in her mother's right leg had grown worse; even walking to the hearth was becoming difficult. Devi's younger brother had said that household work was more important than a 'woman's education'. Her mother had tried to take off her bangles and give them to Devi, as though they would have to be sold to pay for the training. Devi had returned them. "Your medicine and the cost of my training are two separate questions," she had said. Quietly, her mother had asked, "Then who will give me my midday medicine on time?" It was a practical question; an encouraging sentence alone could not solve it.

In the hospital's inner veranda, Urmila was checking the list of new patient transfers. Two inspected vehicles were available under the strike's limited exception, but the main drainage channel was blocked. One patient's stretcher could not make the first turn. Urmila asked Devi to count the outer dressings; her instructor had not authorised her to lift patients without supervision. Devi counted seventeen cloth dressings where there should have been eighteen, and recorded the shortage. An employee whispered, "If one is missing, write eighteen in the register. It's an emergency." "If we hide the shortage," Devi replied, "we shall have to search again when the next patient needs them." Salma signed her supervisory verification in the margin.

Meanwhile, on the community platform at the clay ground, Kamlesh laid out his rent sheet. The landlord's representative argued that the opening of the road to the hospital had raised market land values, and that the landlord was therefore entitled to increase the rent. Kamlesh read out the dimensions of his shop: its small thatched roof, the corner that flooded in the rains, and the drain whose cleaning he had paid for himself. "I shall pay the original rent," he said. "But when half the shop is under water, why must I pay three times the amount without a written measurement?" Shakuntala Pandit, standing nearby, said, “Show the receipts for everything. The repair of my vessels and his rent do not belong in a single account.”

Rama Karna, seated on the platform, said that a dispute over the rent of a private building could not be settled by a majority vote on a public platform. Whether fees were being imposed for the use of a community path and drainage system under cover of a rent increase, however, was a public question. Kamlesh read the third line of his sheet: ‘Contribution towards road improvement’. No measurements of repairs or approved expenditure had been supplied by the owner. In the municipal measurement book, repairs to that small drain were listed as proposed, not completed. Tara compared the dates on the two papers. They corroborated Kamlesh’s contention that a charge had been added to the rent notice by describing proposed work as already completed; the underlying dispute over ownership and rent nevertheless remained unsettled.

The landlord’s representative threatened Kamlesh, saying that people who complained on the platform would find no customers coming to their shops next time. Kamlesh stood and picked up the pitcher whose handle he had only half repaired. “The thread and the hours I have spent joining this handle are my work,” he said. “If you wish, I shall set out my legal claim in writing. But I will not hand over the private ledger of customers who trust me with broken vessels from their homes.” A young man demanded their names. Shabnam said that a list of customers’ private possessions was unnecessary to substantiate a public claim concerning rent. She entered the reason for refusing in the meeting minutes.

When Devi’s shift ended, her brother arrived at the hospital on his motorcycle. He said in the veranda that if their mother did not receive her medicine on time, Devi would be blamed. Devi asked Salma what would happen to the certificate due the following week if she abandoned a scheduled training shift midway. Salma said that regular attendance was required, but the rules for leave to provide care at home were separate. Showing her brother those rules, Devi said, “You take responsibility for giving Mother her medicine this afternoon. I can change my shift tomorrow morning, but I will not give up my training.” At first her brother refused. Then their mother herself spoke over the telephone: “You must learn how to give the medicine too.”

The bitterness between Devi and her brother did not disappear at once. Their mother said she would look after her own prescriptions and that her voice, too, would count when the family divided the hours of care. In a small notebook Devi wrote down three possible arrangements for help at home: her brother at midday, Devi in the evening, and paid help from a neighbour for two days, subject to her consent. Her brother asked where the money for the neighbour would come from. Devi admitted that her actual training allowance was still unpaid; from the money available at home that day, her mother agreed to pay for assistance over two shifts. No one treated women's unpaid labour as the foundation of the solution.

Kamlesh's rent dispute became entangled with the hospital question at the platform meeting when a municipal employee proposed clearing the strip of repair shops to widen the lane temporarily for patient vehicles. Hira Meche arrived with a measuring rod. "The chief obstruction to turning the vehicle is not this shop," she said. "It is the rainwater and the immovable stones piled at the bend. If there is an official survey of this place, show us the original plan first." Kamlesh was willing to discuss limited use of an alternative passage at stated hours, but rejected permanent eviction. The need to move patients was real; that need did not automatically extinguish every private right.

He said that one of the two vehicles certified for a trial that day had reached its appointed patient ten minutes late because it had had to go round the outer edge of the flooded area. "Write down the ten minutes," she said. "There is no basis for saying the water has completely drained away." Kamlesh proposed lifting a narrow, temporary wooden panel in front of his doorway, provided the actual route for patient transport was measured first, the hours of use were written down, and the municipality accepted responsibility for closing the panel again. This limited cooperation was not conditional on relinquishing his permanent rights to the shop.

At this suggestion Shabnam halted the meeting. "These are two documents," she said. "One is temporary permission for the hospital's emergency route; the other is a private dispute over rent. They must be signed separately." Kamlesh gave agreement in principle to the first, subject to the measurements on site and the hours being fixed; on the second, he filed a written objection demanding the calculation of the new charge. Makan-Rama entered the date the document was received in the public forum's receipt register; this acknowledgement did not amount to the landlord's consent.

After midday, Devi's training included supervised care for an injured driver. Under Salma's direction she arranged the materials for removing a bandage, then asked the patient's permission. "Is this your first time?" the driver asked. "I am in training," Devi said. "Salma Didi is here. If you would rather I did not do it, another trained member of staff can." The driver consented. Devi's hands trembled once as she put on the fresh dressing, but Salma stopped the procedure and explained the sequence again. The patient's wound was examined in time; both Devi's error and its correction were recorded on her training sheet.

In the veranda, a hospital administrator told Devi that, since her family objected, she should leave the training and send someone else in her place. Devi placed her register and the supervisory signatures before him. "Disagreement in my family does not make me unfit for training," she said. "If I have broken an attendance rule, record it according to the rules; otherwise give me the grounds for removing my name in writing." The officer made no decision that day, but authorised a review of the three shifts incorrectly marked absent and handed Devi the schedule for the following week. Devi copied it into her own notebook: an earlier shift had already disappeared on the strength of a verbal assurance.

At the second session that evening, Hira and Tara measured the corner of the repair shop. They found that removing the outer panel of the doorway would create room for one wheel, but would do nothing to repair the damaged wall of the main drain. The municipal employee acknowledged the distinction in his measurement book. Kamlesh estimated the labour cost of removing the temporary panel. One representative suggested that he should do it free as a community service. “If wood is cut by my hands, its price must be entered,” Kamlesh replied. “If I wish, I can donate my own share separately.” Two small copies of the measurements and costs were made. The temporary permission was set aside for dawn the day after next, when the actual need for medical transport would be assessed again.

When Devi arrived at her mother’s room that night, her brother had given the medicine on time, though he had spilt half the water. Their mother laughed. “Next time put a bowl underneath.” Her brother grew irritable at his own mistake. Devi instinctively began to pick up a cloth, but her mother stopped her. “This time he will clean it.” Her brother took the cloth and wiped up the water. This small change at home was no resolution passed by a council. Devi laid her training sheet by her mother’s pillow; seeing the red mark against an error, her mother asked, “Have they crossed out your name in red ink?” “No,” Devi replied. “It shows me where I have something to learn.”

At the night meeting Shabnam again spread copies of the five outstanding questions from the old agreement across the table. Temporary consent for hospital patient transport had not repaired the drainage; payment for preparing meals, the warehouse seal, and objections concerning public copies still required explicit decisions. The landlord was summoned to the hearing on Kamlesh’s rent dispute, with the original agreement and the statement of expenditure underlying the new fee. An assistant from Devvrat’s office wanted to add one line: ‘All parties are cooperating.’ Shabnam struck it out and wrote, ‘Limited proposal for one temporary route; other objections remain.’ Devi telephoned from the hospital to say she had received the training timetable, but the false entries of absence still had to be corrected.

When Kamlesh returned home, the join in the pitcher he had been repairing had dried. He gently filled it with water to test it; a single drop escaped. The pitcher was not wholly repaired, but he could now see where more thread was needed. His mother asked, “Will the shop remain?” “It has not been taken today,” Kamlesh replied. “The rent question remains, but my objection is on record.” His mother held a packet of medicine. She asked whether he would return the pitcher to its customer tomorrow or test it again. Kamlesh emptied it and turned it upside down. “I shall test it again,” he said.

Far away, a timetable for patient vehicles was posted at the hospital gate, and water remained trapped in the main drain just as before.

Chapter 100 · The Second Agreement

In the veranda of the municipal office, Urmila was turning over five sheets of paper soaked by the morning rain, trying to dry them. Water had dripped all night through a split corner of the roof; the times of the patient vehicles on the first sheet had blurred, but Tara had copied them out again from the previous day's original register. In a bamboo basket beneath the table lay an empty earthen cup of curd and some sticky leaves. The office attendant said the meeting would be delayed by another half-hour: Devvrat's car was held up at the city's other gate. Shabnam rose from her chair and went to the door. “The day has already begun for the people this meeting is meant to serve,” she said. “If the hour changes, tell those who have come. Do not leave the old time on the paper.”

Outside, Tulsi Tajpuriya stood holding a sheet with the names of his drivers. During the limited trial the night before, two vehicles had arrived at the appointed time, but one had been held at the gate for ten minutes; the mud along the drainage channel was still soft. Jamir, one of the drivers, showed the soles of his shoes. “I managed to pull the vehicle free,” he said, “but don't charge the responsibility for this mud to my insurance.” A nurse from the hospital, overhearing him, said that ten minutes could alter the course of someone's treatment. They agreed that the delay had been real. The question was who would bear the cost, and who had the authority, to prevent another.

Inside the office, Shabnam unfolded a copy of the first agreement. Beside its five conditions were the signatures of dissent from the first meeting, which an official press note had once described as a 'unanimous decision'. Rama Karna laid a clean sheet on the table—not as a proposal to tear up the old objections and write a new agreement in their place. “The new page will answer the first,” she said, “not replace it. Wherever there is no agreement, we shall write 'pending'.” Devvrat's assistant asked whether the outcome of the meeting would not then appear weak. “It isn't the paper that's weak,” Rama replied. “It's the work that remains unfinished. Letters cannot cover it up.” Naira wrote the first line in her notebook: 'Second meeting; first objections preserved.'

When Devvrat arrived, the warehouse inspector and two representatives of the traders accompanied him. He explained his lateness, but immediately said that the public statement must also record the assistance already provided to the hospital. Aniruddha, who had supervised the evacuation of patients overnight, replied, “There is a separate receipt for that assistance. On this page we need an answer to how quickly the patients can be taken out safely.” Before Devvrat could speak again, Shabnam motioned him to sit. The vacant chair facing him bore no person's name: its label read 'Responsible representative of the warehouse'. This particular responsibility was being kept distinct from his roles on other committees.

As soon as the first condition was read aloud, Tulsi's drivers objected. The proposed words were: 'Vehicles shall remain available whenever required.' Jamir asked, “Who decides what is required? How many vehicles? And when will the drivers rest?” Tulsi laid down the inspection slips for the two approved vehicles from the previous day. “Two vehicles took part in the trial up to noon. For now, any official declaration of availability must be confined to specified hours,” he said. Describing the patients' condition, Urmila reminded them that only a doctor could certify the need for a transfer; the transport committee must not make patients' names public. One employee favoured the words 'at all times'. Aniruddha asked him, “Do you have drivers and safety clearances for all those hours?” The employee had no answer.

The clause on patient transport was finally revised. On a doctor's certified request, a journey would be arranged within a fixed period, with the name of an available, inspected vehicle and a consenting driver recorded; any delay would be entered with its cause and the actual time. The ordinary fare, night-risk allowance and rest hours for the drivers would be kept in a separate register; the old arrears that had led to the strike would not be wiped out. A trader said that under such conditions there would not be enough vehicles. Without raising his voice, Tulsi replied, “Write down how many we have. Find a safe alternative for the rest. Writing four on a sheet will not turn two vehicles into four.” For the first time Urmila sat back with relief, though she knew that a time entered in a register did nothing in itself to lessen pain in a human body.

For the second condition, Tara spread out the damp map. Hira Meche compared its markings with the red marks made during the night's measurements. The water had begun to move after temporary debris was removed, but it had collected again beside the broken wall of the main drain. The municipal engineer proposed cutting through Ramesh's field embankment to give the water a straight course; repairing the channel that way would be cheaper. Ramesh's wife, who had come with a packet of seed, set her hand on the map. “Cheaper in your accounts. Who will count the erosion of my field?” The engineer said that in a public emergency private objections could be heard later. Shabnam asked him for the written authority for that assertion. He had no order he could show them.

Ramesh's wife gave two dates concerning the embankment: when the grass had been cut, and when the water had changed direction. She did not have complete title deeds to the land in her name, but she was present because her cultivation was affected and the question of who could grant permission had to be heard. Tara explained that the public pathway's width and the private field boundary appeared on the same map; even a preliminary survey before agreement did not confer permission to enter. Hira used a wooden rod to demonstrate the depth inside the public drain. A small blockage of stones could be cleared there without touching the private embankment. The engineer asked for more time to submit a complete plan. The meeting authorised one limited part of the work, not the plan as a whole.

Just then Paro Pattharkatta came in carrying a heavy bag. There was an old white scar on her left wrist; the bag held samples of two kinds of stone and several different chisels. The municipal contractor wanted her to cover the damaged drain with a thick stone slab and sign a certificate of 'complete structural safety'. Paro placed her samples on the table. “I can cut away the loose edges, make the surface level and fashion a safe slope. I don't calculate the load borne by soil that's being washed out from underneath.” The contractor muttered, “Then refusing to do it now means the work comes to a standstill.” “Doing it the wrong way,” Paro said, “means it will collapse again.”

Paro produced a receipt for a sample job she had done earlier. It recorded a day's wages, not responsibility for an entire bridge. She would not accept the attempt to place approval of a whole drainage structure upon a small artisan's name in the new contract. Lalit Vishwakarma, who had lost a contract after questioning an earlier slab inspection, examined the samples. Stonecutting, the placing of supports and the structural load test, he said, belonged to different stages. Paro made her decision at once: she would accept a small, safe repair job based on recorded measurements, provided the engineer took written responsibility for testing the ground and her wages were fixed in advance. She might lose the contractor's larger commission. But her chisel would still move on terms she had chosen herself.

The third condition, access to the warehouse, caused the greatest commotion. The inspector presented two lists. The first contained medical supplies that had passed inspection; the second, medicines held back because their labels did not match, together with other consignments still under examination. Devvrat said that removing the items on the first list would at least reduce the hospital's shortage. Aniruddha acknowledged that need. But in the inspector's draft, both lists came under one order of 'emergency release'. Rama picked up a red pencil. “One list bears a mark showing the inspection is complete; the other says testing is continuing. One seal does not make them equal.” Devvrat said that complicated procedures would leave the people needing the supplies waiting. “If the wrong medicines are delivered,” Aniruddha replied, “their suffering will be greater still.”

The warehouse workers' representative asked who would pay the wages of those guarding the sealed goods when the gate was opened for a limited period. The first proposal had not addressed the question at all. The inspector said that the guards were government employees. “We are not government guards,” the worker replied. “We will count the bundles inside, close the locks again, and we want wages for that time.” Shabnam added another line to the copy: the presence of the examining officer, the hour of entry, serial numbers of items removed, an account of the resealing, and payment with the workers' signatures. Devvrat's assistant called it a device for increasing costs. An elderly warehouse watchman said, “Tomorrow you'll ask me whether the night lock was opened. That is why today's hour must be written down.”

For the fourth condition, Ruhani set not her notebook but two lidded containers on the table. One contained a portion of that day's leftover rice; the other, a measured quantity of uncooked lentils. “The register shows exactly how much was cooked,” she said, “but the part that accounts for all the hours the women spent at the stoves is blank.” A representative of the municipal donors' association proposed making public photographs of the donated meals. Ruhani asked which families had consented to having their children's hunger photographed. The representative tried to change the subject. “Put donations in the list of donations,” Ruhani said. “Don't hide the wages of the kitchen behind a line of blessings.”

A young cook who had come with Ruhani said that during her night shift a neighbour looked after her child, and that getting home cost her two fares. She did not threaten to stop work; she wanted a complete account of what she was owed. Devvrat proposed that money from one donor's fund should cover three days' grain for the meals. Ruhani agreed to that much, but insisted that the cooks' rate per shift and the cleaning workers' wages be secured from a separate fund. No one was to presume that service would continue automatically after three days; there would be another meeting and a fresh agreement. For the first time, the paper had three separate columns: donations, purchases and payments.

Sona Kathautiya was waiting at the door. Two slips for her unpaid cartage were still awaiting the signature of an old handcart operator across the railway line. An activist from one of the donors' groups urged her to speak at the meeting as a 'selfless helper'. “First pay the cartage and labour for the day I delivered those two bamboo frames,” Sona replied. “If I choose to give something of my own, record that as a donation.” In her bag was an old receipt grey with dust. She had also brought a proposal for a new delivery: bamboo boards for the hospital's temporary safe passage, this time with the freight charge and the risks of transport written down in advance.

Someone asked whether it was proper to think of profit in an emergency of this kind. Sona put down her bag. “My handcart man has been asking for his fare for three days. Whether his son can go to school is an emergency too,” she answered. After examining the slips, Rama said that the other party would have to be notified so that the true amount of the old arrears could be reconciled; if Sona wished, she could register her request for payment now. Sona signed. She fixed a separate rate for transporting the new bamboo boards and stipulated that her photograph must not appear on the donors' association's poster without her permission. “Those who want credit,” she said, “should take credit for what they themselves have given.”

Meanwhile an old transport slip made out in the name of Bedhi was produced. Sona said that this name had been given to her as the location of a job; she had delivered the goods using the stopping place written on the slip and the driver's spoken directions, not by observing the bend of a river. A municipal assistant asked whether Bedhi was the river that met this drainage channel. “I don't know,” Sona said plainly. “The name on the paper is the name of a place in the records. I have not seen the streams join with my own eyes.” Tara recorded the name in the river register separately from the address on the transport slip. No map of an unverified confluence was drawn merely for the contractor's convenience. Sona did, however, come away with one thing clear: in claiming her arrears she could not change the place name on the slip and add it to the account of another village.

The weary voices at the meeting rose again as soon as the page concerning the fifth condition was opened. The administration wanted the public copy to read 'All parties agree'. Shabnam read out the limited decisions reached under each of the five headings. Silence among those present could not be treated as consent. Naira wanted to write a summary for the newspaper, but she had no permission to publish the private details of patients, workers or the warehouse. Rama proposed three separate documents: a public copy, an authorised copy retaining the signatures and objections, and a private annex restricted by consent. None of the pages from the failed first meeting would be removed.

Devvrat's assistant said, “If the old objections remain attached, business confidence will suffer.” “How long can confidence endure if mistakes are concealed?” Shabnam asked. This time Devvrat himself silenced his assistant. He said that whatever responsibilities his office accepted should be written down with dates and signatures; the earlier sum given in hospital aid should not be presented as an achievement of this agreement. Naira recorded his statement, but did not regard his new signature as proof of innocence regarding the old instructions under examination in the investigation of Mahesh's killing. The two official sets of papers belonged to different matters. Devvrat did not challenge that distinction; nor was his silence described as an admission of guilt.

By noon a written draft had been prepared, but one new sentence appeared in fine print: 'Permission to use necessary private property along the route of emergency repairs shall be deemed implicit.' Ramesh's wife opened the page and found the sentence. “Because I sat here, my permission to use my field has somehow been given?” she asked. The engineer said that such language was customary in standard forms. Tara struck it out and wrote that inspection, emergency passage and permanent construction each required separate permissions, and that every proposed use of private property required a prior written decision from the person affected. Beside her name Ramesh's wife had the words 'Use of field embankment refused for the present' entered. The deletion of that sentence made the document's real intention clearer than the original wording had done.

Paro Pattharkatta then read the new short contract for safe repairs. The municipal inspector proposed assigning her only the marking of the broken edge and the preparation of stones suitable for placing a temporary slab in a safe location; the engineer would certify the load-bearing capacity. Paro looked at the scar on her wrist and asked who would have the authority to stop work if the water rose again while she was working. “I shall give the order,” the inspector said. “I am the one who uses the chisel,” Paro replied. “My feet will feel the rising water first. I want the written right to give the signal to stop.” At last a clause was added allowing work to be halted when a safety objection was recorded.

Paro signed the proposal for the first payment at the meeting, but fixed the time for bringing out her tools only after half the agreed amount had been paid in advance. At this, the contractor threatened to give the larger contract to another artisan. “A large contract will not fill my daughter's notebooks,” Paro said, “if the blame for a fallen slab is laid at my door.” Before going home she arranged a day with Lalit to inspect the new measurements. Lalit said that he would promise nothing beyond the limits of his own work in wood. Their small partnership rested on respect for one another's experience, not on responsibility for a structure neither had seen.

Rama read out the final wording of all five conditions once more. The first specified a limited number of vehicles, fixed hours and a risk allowance; the second, identified safe work inside the public drain and a separate objection to using the private embankment; the third, controlled access to inspected warehouse supplies under seal and separate wages for the workers; the fourth, donated grain for the kitchen and payment to its labourers; and the fifth, a public copy, a register of objections and protection for the private annex. Shabnam had the responsible office, the date of inspection and the means of notification in the event of failure entered beside every heading. The words 'unanimous agreement' were not written. The document was called a 'second working agreement within specified limits'.

Signatures were still needed from all concerned. The traders' representatives would not agree to opening all the warehouse locks, but accepted a limited period for releasing inspected supplies. The drivers attached a separate objection concerning the outstanding payments from their strike. Ramesh's wife examined the map and acknowledged notice of the work within the public drain, but recorded again her objection to the use of her field. Sona signed the new freight rate without removing the page claiming her old arrears. Paro signed the register for her small, safe repair, not a certificate of safety for the entire structure. Signatures accumulated on the document, but the limits of each signature became clearer too.

As the papers were being sealed, a small argument broke out outside the office. A man from the donors' association suggested garlanding people at the inauguration of the agreement. Lifting two empty cooking pots, Ruhani said, “Ask whoever would pay for the flowers. My kitchen has no oil left for tonight.” Sona asked which account would provide the advance for tomorrow's delivery. An official assistant wanted to photograph the newly signed papers, but Shabnam first ordered the private names to be concealed in the public copy. Instead of preparing a celebration, people were gathering their slips for the work they had to do next. The scene was not one of despair. Here, in place of competing for credit, one could hear the names of payments owed.

Before evening, the first small piece of work began on the public section of the drain. Hira drove in a measuring rod, Tara recorded the new measurements separately from the old markings, and Paro marked only the places where it was safe to remove the loose stone along the edge. No heavy slab had yet been laid. A young man said that by morning the drain would be open. Paro looked at him. “Work has begun today,” she said. “The full path for the water to escape has not yet been made.” A little bubble rose from the mud inside the drain; no one in the crowd heard it burst. But Hira saw that the water on the measuring rod remained at the same level.

At the hospital gate, Tulsi's two vehicles stood in their assigned places. Urmila compared her watch with a nurse's. Each patient proposed for transfer the next day would be assessed separately; someone who needed treatment there was not to be moved merely because a vehicle was available. One patient's mother asked whether the water inside the hospital would be stopped. “Work has begun on the drain outside,” Urmila replied. “What is dripping inside the hospital still needs to be examined. I'll tell you when the time is certain.” Hearing this, the woman sat down beside the bed. The truthful limits of work meant more to her than an empty assurance.

Naira was preparing to go home with a copy of the public document when Urmila, putting away an old pen, asked, “At next year's urahi, will you get into the water, or will you measure water on paper again?” Naira laughed. “If I get in, will you come to rescue me, or write down the time first?” “First I'll see whether you really need to come out,” Urmila said, “or whether you've gone into the water for no reason. Then I'll give you my hand.” Both laughed. No drum for the urahi was beating anywhere. They were only talking about the next year's communal festival of cleaning the water bodies, and imagining that perhaps they might find a couple of hours for themselves.

Urmila said that if there was a separate arrangement for the hospital laundry by then, she would actually take a day off. Naira said that she would choose one day off from her next series of reports. “Will there be any days left for you?” Urmila asked. “No one knows how many days are left,” Naira replied. “But why must we always write half of the day we have today in someone else's name?” Urmila rose with a smile. She picked up the thermos she had left on the table. The tea inside had gone cold, but they drank a sip each all the same.

When the municipal office closed that night, two copies of the five sheets were placed in separate boxes. The public copy would be posted the following morning; Rama kept the original, with the objections attached, in her authorised register. Shabnam checked the next date for the measurements once more. Devvrat's office had signed for its responsibilities, but his earlier instructions and the file investigating Mahesh's death remained where they were. The consignments held back inside the warehouse were still under seal. Sona put the acknowledgement of her cartage claim into her bag; Paro wrapped the edge of her chisel in a cloth. Outside, near the hospital gate, two vehicles stood in their places, while the water in the drain still stirred slowly. The second agreement was not a bridge built over that water. It was a promise substantial enough to be measured and tested tomorrow—and challenged if it broke.

Chapter 101 · The Patient's Time

At five forty-two in the morning, a third drop fell from the ceiling into the brass bowl in the hospital laundry. Urmila had not counted the first two; she had been opening a bundle of linen. The third fell directly onto the edge of a freshly washed sheet. She lifted the bundle and set it on a dry bench. Beyond the window, the courtyard water had not drained away all night. Mud had choked the channel towards the gate, while inside the laundry a separate trickle came through an old joint. On the first page she wrote two distinct headings: 'Water flowing in from outside' and 'Leakage inside'. To call both things one fault might make the cleaning quicker, but it would not make the repairs right.

A public copy of yesterday's five-condition agreement hung at the hospital gate. Beneath the first condition were the words 'two inspected vehicles'; the sentence said nothing of the combined weight of medicines, patients, relatives and linen. Urmila compared the hands of the clocks. The one on the wall was five minutes slow; the nursing room's was two minutes fast. She called Aniruddha. "If three clocks give us three different times, in whose name shall we record the patient's delay?" Aniruddha reconciled the two registers against the time on his telephone, but also had the wall clock's error entered into the record. Erasing an error would not, by itself, correct the time to which someone had testified yesterday.

In the first bed, the elderly Saraswati Devi held her daughter-in-law's hand. She had been struggling to breathe since the night, and the doctor did not consider her condition stable. In the next room little Rehana could not raise her injured foot; sweat had gathered on the shoulder of her mother, Anwari. A medical decision had already been made to send the third patient to another centre after examination, but the medicines being administered and some equipment would have to accompany the patient. Standing between the three beds, Aniruddha said, "Someone who needs immediate care here will not be sent away simply because a vehicle is waiting. And before we send anyone, we must speak to the centre that will receive them."

Urmila took out cords of two colours: one for the bundles of washed linen, the other for bags of used linen. While crossing the wet floor of the laundry, a trainee put both kinds of bag on the same trolley. Urmila stopped the trainee's hand. "This isn't an accounting problem about too little linen. It's a matter of patient safety." The trainee was frightened; the work had continued without a break since the night. Instead of leaving the trainee with a reprimand, Urmila called for an empty trolley and gave the young worker two minutes to drink water. Then she counted: seven washed sheets, five clean covers, and four bags of used material. The two sheets that had got wet were not included among the clean supplies available for use.

Tulsi Tajpuriya's two vehicles arrived at the gate. Looking at the mud on the tyres, Jamir said the first vehicle would become stuck at the bend by the drain. Madan Raut arrived at the same moment in his small vehicle, having promised to take the schoolchildren to school. The watchman assumed that a third patient vehicle had now been found. Madan shut the vehicle's rear hatch. “I haven't taken the children to school yet. If you want me to carry a patient, first put in writing who is responsible for getting the children there safely by some other means.” The rear bench of his vehicle was folded down; unfolding it would not automatically turn the vehicle into medical transport.

Madan had the headmistress called on the telephone at the meeting table. Seven small children were waiting at the appointed turn in the road in the village behind them; two of their parents had already gone to the fields. The headmistress said she could send a teacher to the turn, but she could not put all the children into one rickshaw. “It's an emergency,” a man said. “The children can walk by themselves for one day.” Madan's voice hardened. “Heavy goods vehicles go fast along that half-mile of road. I have given my word to take those children. Leaving them stranded on the way would be a wrong as well.” For a while the committee studied both maps, one of the school entrance and the other of the hospital gate.

In the end the headmistress decided to send two teachers to separate turns in the road and notify the children's families. Madan would complete his first journey to the school; meanwhile the patient's medical assessment would continue. Madan's first fare would be paid from the school committee's account, and the hospital's second journey would be entered in a different register. No teacher was assigned an extra shift without notice under the name of a ‘donation’. Madan wrote the scheduled school arrival time in his notebook and started the engine. Watching him go, Urmila grew a little impatient, but the hospital's clock could not swallow up the schoolchildren's time.

Haricharan Paswan stepped forward. His contracted vehicle had carried empty medicine crates at dawn; the seats and floor needed cleaning again. An employee said that, since a patient had to be transported, it was enough that “the vehicle is empty”. Haricharan pointed to a broken catch inside it. “If the bench shifts, the responsibility for the patient will land on my head. Inspect it first.” Jamir, Tulsi's driver, and the hospital employees examined the places where passengers could sit safely. Haricharan proposed that for the time being his vehicle carry only inspected equipment, necessary supplies and a patient's family's approved belongings—not seriously ill patients until a doctor and transport inspector found it suitable.

Haricharan's ledger had separate columns for the driver's attendance at dawn, petrol, cleaning and hours lost waiting. The contractor's representative proposed paying half the fare in the name of service to the sick. “I can reduce my own share of the profit,” Haricharan replied. “I cannot cut a driver's night in half.” A young driver, who had been standing for three hours without rest, noticed that ‘idle’ had mistakenly been written beside his name. Haricharan handed him a pencil. The young man entered the actual hours of his shift. The correction did not instantly restore his exhausted body, but the register now recorded the reason another driver had to be called.

By seven o'clock Salma Sheikh had opened the temporary service desk. Anwari held out her daughter Rehana's registration papers; one digit of the identification number differed in an older copy. The clerk at the window said no transfer slip could be issued until the records matched. Supporting the girl's foot, Anwari asked, “Shall I take my daughter home so that I can get the papers corrected?” Salma first called the nurse. Having ascertained the need for medical examination and relief of the child's pain, she said plainly, “Correcting an identification record is one task; treating a patient is another.” She arranged a provisional, individually issued treatment slip. The girl's full name was not posted on the public list at the gate.

The clerk warned Salma that questions would be raised about such a provisional slip when the bill was prepared. Salma knew the terms of her month-to-month appointment at the desk; an allegation of error could put her livelihood at risk. Nevertheless she lodged a written objection: ‘Urgent medical need must not wait for correction of identification details.’ Rather than sign, the billing officer wanted to give verbal approval. “If I am putting this in writing,” Salma said, “the answer should be in writing too.” With Anwari's permission she placed only the essential documents in a private envelope; there would be no photograph identifying the patient for a public gathering.

At seven twenty-seven Aniruddha ended a call to the other centre. A bed had been assigned there for one patient; the entry to be used and arrangements for continuing medication had been confirmed. Urmila read through the inventory of supplies. An assistant said that one bottle was unavailable at the hospital and could be procured from the market after the vehicle set off. Aniruddha refused. It would not be right to send a patient onto the road while leaving the responsibility for ongoing treatment incomplete. The journey would not begin without confirmation of suitable available supplies from the pharmacy, directions for their use and the agreement of the receiving centre. The objection cost eight minutes; those minutes were entered not as ‘unnecessary delay’ but as time required for safety.

In one place the water in the veranda was now more than two fingerbreadths deep. At the rear door, Hira Mech measured it with a short stick and showed that the water outside was holding at the level where the drain's outlet was blocked. The place where water dripped inside the laundry was different: a roof joint and a damp wall. Tara marked the two boundaries on the plan in different colours. An employee wanted both entered as ‘the ordinary effects of rain’. Hira showed him the difference between an old, dried stain on the wall and the fresh line left today. “Rain is one event,” she said. “Whether a joint has broken calls for another examination.”
