Shankha and Silver

Not everything that glitters is silver, and not every name is a body—whoever takes a shell for silver takes a map for the village.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

ENTRY

Garh Narikel—a village settled in a corner of Mithila whose name will not be found on any great map, yet whose memory has lived for twelve hundred years in the roots of a tree. At the centre of the village lies Channa Grove, and at the heart of that grove an ancient peepal. Beneath its shade, through every joy and sorrow the village has known, a witness has always been present—one whom generation after generation has called simply “Budhba.”

Who Budhba is, the village has never fully understood. Some say he is a voice risen from the water-burial in Jori Pokhari: twelve hundred years ago a man left his body on the floor of the pond and left his name behind. But this much the whole village knows: Budhba carries every name in Garh Narikel, keeps every reckoning, and has taught every generation the same lesson—crocodiles eat bodies, not names.

And Budhba’s story, repeated by the village age after age, begins twelve hundred years before our own day, when Garh Narikel was still young. One evening, in a hall of disputation, philosophers gathered in the waning light of oil lamps around a question that looked small but opened into a depth without measure: if a man sees a shell from a distance and takes it for silver, what, precisely, is the nature of his error? Without knowing it, in that single question they were planting the seed of the whole story that would unfold across the next twelve centuries—a story of truth and illusion, name and body, crocodile and village.

For whoever takes the shell for silver takes the map for the village; whoever mistakes brilliance for truth mistakes the name for the body. That error—from the disputation hall of that evening to the tangled screens of the present day—is the root of this entire tale. And so Budhba’s story begins there, in that hall, where for the first time the question was asked with complete seriousness: what is illusion?

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

Sutradhara — master of the stage and narrator

Vachaspati Mishra — commentator, host of the disputation, defender of the established position

The Objector (the Sceptic) — a composite voice of doubt speaking for the assembly

The Nyaya Logician — defender of anyathākhyāti, the theory that error is the cognition of one real thing as another

The Prabhakara Mimamsaka — defender of akhyāti, the theory that error consists only in failing to notice a distinction

The Ritualist Mimamsaka — of the Bhatta and Jaimini traditions, holding that the Veda is concerned solely with injunctions to ritual action

The Council — murmurs and reactions from the assembly

Setting: a hall of disputation. At evening a servant enters carrying a lamp. In the dimming light he lays a length of rope beside the doorway and, a hand's breadth away, a small shell polished pale by years of handling—implements for an argument to which the assembly has not yet paid attention.

PROLOGUE

(The Sutradhara enters.)

SUTRADHARA: Every debate needs an error with which to begin, and here you have two of them lying by the door, if you care to look: a rope and a shell. Once, in poor light, a man took a rope for a snake and sprang backward with his heart hammering, though no snake had ever been there. Another reached down expecting a coin, took the shell for silver, and drew back an empty hand from the earth where delight had already promised him something.

Every school represented in this hall agrees that the man was mistaken. What none can agree upon is what happened at the instant of the mistake—where the silver was, if it was anywhere at all, while he seemed to see it. Vachaspati Mishra spent his life upon this very knot, because when one asks what illusion is and what the world is, the two questions prove, under examination, to be the same question asked twice. Keep your eye on the shell. It will not leave the stage until the debate has done with it.

Not all that glitters is silver, no; not every name is flesh;

Who takes a shell for silver takes the village for its sketch.

*From far away the gleam was seen; up close, the shell was known;
Who asked, 'What is this thing?' broke the spell that had been thrown.*

Illusion lives a moment; truth endures from age to age—

*Who has learned to ask the question will not call the shell his silver.
(Exit.)*

ACT I

The Voice That Says “I”

Can the Self Be an Object of Inquiry?

(Vachaspati is seated. The Objector enters and bows.)

OBJECTOR: Before you tell us, Acharya, that Brahman is fit to be inquired into, answer one difficulty—simple to state and hard to escape. Inquiry belongs to what is doubtful, or to what it is useful to know once doubt has been resolved. Yet no one doubts his own existence. Child, sage, beast in the field—every creature that has ever drawn breath knows itself as “I”, immediately, without proof, without a moment’s hesitation. If the Self is already the best-known thing in the world, on what ground do you propose to investigate it as though it were hidden?

VACHASPATI: You have put the objection better than many who bring it, and I shall not blunt its edge. It is true: no one doubts, “Do I exist or not?” But notice what you have proved, and what you have not. You have proved that something meant by the word “I” is known beyond doubt. You have not proved that we know what that something is. A man in a dark room may be certain that a face is looking at him and be wholly mistaken about whose face it is. Certainty of existence and knowledge of nature are two different achievements, and the entire dispute of this act lies in the space between them.

OBJECTOR: Then show me that space. What can be mistaken in the ordinary experience of “I”?

VACHASPATI: Consider what the word carries in common speech. “I am thin.” “I am going.” “I am blind.” Each “I” is fastened to the body. But if the body were truly the referent of “I”, a man who remembers the body of his childhood and inhabits the body of his old age—two bodies that across sixty years may not share a single hair, tooth, or particle of skin—could never say with the confidence with which he does say it: “I, who played in my father’s lap, now hold my grandson in mine.” Nothing continuously joins those two bodies except the “I” that claims them both. And whatever remains through changing things cannot itself be one of the things that changes, just as the thread running through the flowers of a garland is not one of the flowers.

OBJECTOR: A dreamer could answer you this way: in a dream I wore the body of a king, tall and jewelled; on waking I found this small and ordinary body again. If the dream-self differs from the waking self, your thread has already snapped.

VACHASPATI: On the contrary—you have supplied my example before I could deliver it. The dreamer wakes and says, “I am not a king;

I am a man.” It is the royal body that is cancelled by waking, while the sense of “I”, which owns dream and waking alike, is cancelled by nothing. A man who by yogic power assumes the form of a tiger does not, in that form, experience himself as other than the one who a moment earlier was a man. Body after body is put on and cast off like a traveller’s changing coats; the traveller is not thereby proved to be one of the coats.

OBJECTOR: Then, if not the body, let the senses be the seat of the “I”—for the eye that saw is not the hand that now touches.

VACHASPATI: And yet, without even a flicker of doubt, we say, “What I saw, I now touch”—one “I” joining two different instruments, just as a moment ago one “I” joined two different bodies. The senses are instruments of the knower; they cannot themselves be the knower they serve, any more than an axe can be the woodcutter who wields it.

OBJECTOR: Grant all this. I still do not see what remains to investigate. You have merely moved the “I” from the body to something behind the body. Call it consciousness and be done.

VACHASPATI: Here is the second half of your original objection, and it is the sharper half. You were right that it existed; I was keeping it for its proper place. Inquiry is pointless where knowledge serves no purpose. But consider this: the “I” experienced by ordinary creatures is always experienced as limited—“I am in this room”, “I am small”, “I suffer this pain and not that one.” The scriptures that speak of the Self—Śruti, Smṛti, the ancient epics—describe something that shares none of these limits: infinite, indivisible, an unbroken plenitude of consciousness and bliss. Either the ordinary “I” and the scriptural Self are one reality misperceived, or they are two different things and scripture speaks falsely. If they are one reality misperceived, then everything turns upon that one word, misperceived—and until we understand what error itself is, we cannot know whether scripture or ordinary experience has the stronger claim upon truth. This is not a question already answered. It is precisely what remains to be investigated.

OBJECTOR: Then the whole structure you are about to build stands upon knowing what error is.

VACHASPATI: Exactly. I shall not take a single step toward Brahman until this question has been fought down to its foundations in this hall by every school prepared to give an account of it. Bring me the strongest opponent you have. I would rather lose this dispute honestly than win it by leaving the hardest part for later.

ACT II

The Shell in Half-Light

A Disputation on the Nature of Error

(The lamp by the door is made brighter. The shell lies where the servant placed it and is now visible to the assembly. The Nyaya Logician rises.)

NYAYA LOGICIAN: Since you have thrown open the assembly, Acharya, allow me to close the matter quickly. A man sees that shell in half-light and cries, “Silver!” Nothing mysterious has occurred. Silver is a real thing, existing somewhere in the world—in a merchant’s shop, perhaps, or as a coin in the man’s own memory—and his cognition has merely applied that real silver here, mistaking one real object for another. Nothing indefinable need be summoned. Error is simply anyathākhyāti: a real thing misplaced in cognition.

VACHASPATI: An orderly answer, Logician, and I shall examine it with the same order it deserves. First tell me: on your account, does his cognition grasp the shell at all?

NYAYA LOGICIAN: Only indistinctly. Its sheer “being-here” is apprehended, but its shell-nature is missed because of some defect in the eye or in the light.

VACHASPATI: And the silver he sees so distinctly—where, at that moment, is it really?

NYAYA LOGICIAN: In the market, somewhere else, as real as ever. His cognition merely reaches across the distance and, because of the defect, wrongly applies it here.

VACHASPATI: Ah! What extraordinary good fortune belongs to this poor cognition: it can reach all the way to a shopkeeper’s stall, seize a piece of silver, drag it across a town into this man’s hand—and yet we are asked to call the feat no more than an ordinary mistake of location. Consider what your own school teaches elsewhere: a defect may obstruct a cause from producing its proper effect; it cannot endow that cause with the power to produce an entirely different and alien effect. A dry sugarcane seed scorched by fire may lose its proper power, but it does not therefore produce a banana trunk. Yet you ask me to believe that a defective eye, prevented from doing its proper work—showing the man a shell—somehow acquires a wholly new power, the power to drag real silver across a city and set it in his palm. That is no modest defect. It is a miracle dressed in the humble clothing of “error.”

NYAYA LOGICIAN: (recovering) Then say only that the form of silver rises from memory and is applied here. The silver itself does not literally travel.

VACHASPATI: Then you have already abandoned “one real thing known as another”, which was your entire theory, and moved halfway into my house without paying rent. If this is only a form arising from memory and applied here, tell me plainly: is that form silver, or is it not? If it truly is silver, my first question returns in full force: silver cannot intelligibly be here, in a thing that is not silver, without the very contradiction you set out to avoid. If it is not truly silver, then you have quietly conceded everything I need, for that is precisely what I call indefinable—neither simply real nor simply unreal—and you have reached my conclusion by the scenic route, complaining about the scenery all the way.

COUNCIL: (A ripple of laughter, quickly suppressed.)

NYAYA LOGICIAN: (with dignity) I have answered this objection at length elsewhere, in the Nyayakanika, and I shall not stand in the chill of this evening to repeat the whole of it.

VACHASPATI: Nor need you. You have conceded the central point, and a disputant who has yielded the keep of a fortress need not surrender every outer wall before witnesses. Sit, my friend. You have argued honestly, which is worth more in this hall than winning.

ACT III

The Vanishing Distinction

Prabhakara’s Akhyāti, and Why It Fails

(The Prabhakara Mimamsaka steps forward, more cautious than the logician who spoke before him.)

PRABHAKARA: I have watched my colleague haul his silver across the city, and I shall not repeat his mistake. I need posit nothing so extravagant. What really happens when the shell is misperceived is this: two cognitions arise together—a bare perception of “here”, present and immediate, and a memory of silver seen long ago, awakened by the shell’s dim gleam. The defect lies only here: the man fails to notice that one is a present perception and the other merely a memory. He blends the two without marking their difference and speaks as though he had seen a single object. There is no third, indefinable entity anywhere in the story—only ordinary perception, ordinary memory, and an ordinary failure to keep them apart. Call it akhyāti: not false cognition at all, but a missing cognition—the missing awareness of a distinction.

VACHASPATI: A far more careful theory than the last, and I shall honour it with one sharp question rather than many hasty ones. On your account, is the perception “here”—bare, present, immediate—in any way false?

PRABHAKARA: Not at all. As far as it goes, it is simply and entirely correct.

VACHASPATI: And the memory of silver—is that, in itself, false?

PRABHAKARA: No more false than any memory. It correctly remembers silver seen before. The fault lies only in the blending, never in either component.

VACHASPATI: Then hear the difficulty this creates for you, and it is fatal, not merely inconvenient. The whole world, without exception, describes this experience in one sentence: “This is silver.” Not, “This is here, and separately I remember silver,” but a simple, unified, first-person claim of identity, uttered with exactly the confident grammar of “This is a pot.” If what actually occurred were merely two correct cognitions standing innocently side by side, unmarked as distinct, whence came the false claim that they were one? Two true things standing close together do not generate a false identity merely because their difference goes unnoticed. You have explained a failure to see distinction. You have not explained the man’s eager hand reaching toward the ground to pick up silver. Missing a distinction is a kind of blindness; reaching for a coin that is not there is a kind of belief. Your theory, for all its caution, gives me the blindness and quietly loses the belief along the road.

PRABHAKARA: (after a pause) The blending itself may be called the error, without positing any third entity beyond the two blended cognitions.

VACHASPATI: Then the blending is either itself a cognition—in which case, a cognition of what, if not of something answering to “silver-here”, which is precisely the indefinable object I am arguing for and you are trying to evade—or the blending is no cognition at all, in which case it cannot explain why a man’s eager hand moves toward the earth, because a hand is not moved by what is in no way known. You have built a very fine wall around the shell, my friend, and left a door open at either end.

ACT IV

Neither Real nor Unreal

Establishing the Indefinable, and Its Consequence for the World

(Vachaspati rises and steps down from the teacher’s seat so that he stands level with the assembly.)

VACHASPATI: Two schools have honestly tried to explain the shell without paying the price I demand, and both have quietly paid it later in small coin. Let me now say plainly what I think occurred when the man reached for silver that was not there, and let everyone test it as severely as the other accounts have been tested.

The silver he saw was not real. Had it been real, his cognition would properly have taken the form “shell”, or, at the very most, “silver, back in the market”—never “silver, here”. No true thing can be itself and at the same time be located where, by hypothesis, it is not.

Nor was the silver merely unreal, sheer nothing, like the horn of a hare or the son of a barren woman. Absolute non-being never enters experience. Not once in the history of the world has anyone reached eagerly for a hare’s horn believing he saw it glitter on the ground. Whatever shone for that man was something—something sufficient to move his hand.

OBJECTOR: Then say it was both real and unreal at once and complete the contradiction honestly, instead of inventing a third word and hiding inside it.

VACHASPATI: I cannot, and here is why, as plainly as I can say it. “Real” and “unreal” are not two shades on one scale that a thing may mix as grey mixes black and white. They are direct contradictories that exhaust the field between them: to affirm one is, in the same breath and under the same relation, to deny the other. One and the same thing cannot be both affirmed and denied in the same respect without the sentence collapsing into noise. Thus the silver was neither wholly real, nor wholly unreal, nor any coherent mixture of the two. It was anirvacaniya—indefinable with respect to that opposition: appearing with the full vividness of reality, supported by nothing that could preserve it as real, and vanishing the moment a steady light corrected the sight.

OBJECTOR: A pleasing formula for a coin that was never missing from anyone’s purse. Why should I trust it as a key to anything larger than a shopkeeper’s shelf?

VACHASPATI: Because the same threefold test, without changing a word, applies to the entire world in which you stand while asking me that question. Think of a mirage. A traveller crossing hot sand sees water shining ahead—not mere memory, for he sees it now before him; not simple truth either, for if a thirsty man runs to it and tries to drink, he will find sand in his mouth and nothing more. The water is there in precisely the way the silver was there: vivid, located, unattainable, indefinable. Now carry the argument one step farther and you reach the very point toward which this whole inquiry has been built. What you call your body; the senses with which you argue against me; this hall, this lamp, this evening itself—all are new, arising and changing before our eyes, just as the water of the mirage was new at the instant the light fell upon the sand in that way. And all are superimposed, as the mirage-water and shell-silver were superimposed, upon a ground that does not itself change: the one conscious Self that was present, unaltered, in witnessing your childhood body and is present in witnessing the body you wear tonight. The whole visible, tangible, arguable world stands to the Self as the silver stood to the shell—not ultimately real, for a steady vision dissolves it without residue; not simply unreal, for here we both are, using it in order to argue.

OBJECTOR: (quietly) Then when the shopkeeper corrects the fool in the market, the fool's sight clears, and the shell becomes only a shell again—you are telling me that this is a small, ordinary rehearsal for the one correction through which all of us must sooner or later pass.

VACHASPATI: That is exactly what I am telling you. This whole discipline—this whole Bhamati, if you permit an old commentator to name his own book in his own hall—is nothing more than the lamp being corrected, patiently and little by little, so that when at last we look steadily at what we have spent our lives calling silver, we may see, without panic and without loss, that it was a shell—and that, being a shell and nothing else, it could never have been the ground of our happiness.

(A long stillness. Prabhakara and the Nyaya Logician look at one another but do not speak.)

EPILOGUE

(The Sutradhara returns, lifts the shell from beside the door, turns it once in the lamplight, and sets it down again.)

SUTRADHARA: No one in this hall tonight has argued that the man was right to reach for silver. The dispute concerned only where the silver was while he was mistaken. Follow that dispute to its end and, in the smallest costume, it asks one of the largest questions philosophy knows how to ask. Vachaspati Mishra did not invent the shell. Every tradition represented in this hall inherited the same old example, turned in the hands of centuries just as we have turned it tonight. What he did was refuse to let anyone leave the assembly until he had said clearly what he thought was happening in the half-second before the error was discovered. If you go home tonight turning that question in your own hand, the play has done what the commentary that inspired it was written to do.

This chapter follows the central epistemological argument of the opening, adhyāsa, section of Vachaspati Mishra's Bhamati: an analysis of the experience of "I"; the three classical accounts of illusion—Nyaya anyathākhyāti, Prabhakara akhyāti, and the Advaitin account of anirvacanīya-khyāti, established here through the examples of shell-silver and mirage-water; and the extension from the status of a single mistaken perception to the status of the whole visible world in relation to the Self. It does not enter the later discussion of the four Brahma-sutras—athāto brahmajijñāsā, janmādy asya yataḥ, śāstrayonitvāt, and tat tu samanvayāt—which raise distinct questions about the definition of Brahman and the authority of the Veda, and which could rightly require another act of their own. The dialogue is a literary construction shaped around the argumentative structure of the text; the Nyaya Logician, Prabhakara, and the Objector are composite voices for positions tested and answered in the commentary, not portraits of named historical persons.

BHAMATI

Stories, Narratives, Illustrations, and Quotations

The assembly grew quiet. Standing among the disciples and the villagers, the Sutradhara said in a low voice, "Now hear the old illustrations that lie at the root of this disputation. They are no one man's inheritance; whoever hears them may understand." And he began to tell them one by one.

Water from the Highway and the Current of the Ganga—Just as water from the road, falling into the current of the Ganga, becomes purified, so the paltry words of people like us become sanctified when joined to the work of the Acharya.

The Divine Body in a Dream and the Tiger Assumed by Yogic Power—A person who, in a dream, assumes a divine body and enjoys pleasures suited to it wakes, sees himself furnished with a human body, and says, "I am not a god; I am a man." The divine body is thereupon cancelled, yet the substratum of "I-ness", distinct from the body, is experienced without cancellation. Likewise, one who by yogic power becomes a tiger experiences the identity of the Self despite the difference of body. The body, therefore, is not the substratum of "I-ness."

Crystal and the Hibiscus—A crystal is known to be distinct from a flower; yet because of its perfect transparency, the reflection of a red hibiscus upon it produces the illusory experience of a "red crystal."

Trees on a Mountain and Blades of Grass—In the judgment, "I am in this dwelling and I know," the all-pervading Self is apprehended as limited, just as to a person standing on level ground the vast trees on the summit of a high mountain may appear no larger than blades of grass.

Kalakshi, Svastimati, and Devadatta—In the cow named Kalakshi one recognises the cowhood previously perceived in the cow Svastimati. Likewise, when Devadatta, first seen in Pataliputra, is later seen in Mahishmati, the very same Devadatta is recognised in another place. Both are veridical cognitions.

The Yellowness of a Shell and the Bitterness of Sugar—The same account applies to experiences such as “the shell is yellow” and “sugar is bitter.” The process is described thus: the yellow colour residing in bile, brought into relation with the exceedingly clear ray proceeding from the eye, is experienced apart from the bile; the shell too is experienced, but because of a defect in the sense-organ its whiteness remains obscured. The yellow colour is not experienced as unrelated to the shell. Because that non-relation is not apprehended, a relation of common locus, previously observed in experiences such as “a heap of yellow gold” or “a yellow wood-apple”, is superimposed upon yellowness and shellhood, and the person says, “a yellow shell.” The experience “sugar is bitter” is to be explained in the same way.

Shell-Silver and the Double Moon—Such falsity is established not only in the doctrines of seekers after truth but in ordinary experience. Hence the commentator says, “Our experience in the world is of this kind: a shell appears as silver.” “But this is not silver” completes the first statement. Granted: experience confirms an illusion in which one thing appears in the form of another. But where two things are in truth one and undivided, an illusion of difference is not ordinarily seen. Whence, then, the illusion of difference among individual selves that are non-different from the conscious Self? The commentator answers: “Though there is only one moon, it may appear as though accompanied by a second moon.”

The Chain of Blind Men—Mutual dependence among all three will avail nothing; as the saying goes, “A blind man holding a blind man’s hand falls at every step.”

The Road to Gandhara—Śruti says, “It is to be heard and reflected upon”; and, “The learned and intelligent man reaches the land of Gandhara”—that is, the person who has a teacher receives assistance through his own understanding.

Bhrigu and Varuna—Bhrigu, the son of Varuna, went to his father and said, “Revered sir, teach me Brahman.” From there the teaching proceeds: “Desire to know that from which these beings are born, by which, once born, they live, and into which at the end they enter; that is Brahman.” This is a decisive statement on the subject. “From bliss indeed these beings are born; by bliss, once born, they live; into bliss they enter”—this too is decisive.

The Rope and the Snake—A statement of fact such as “this is a rope, not a snake” removes fear born of illusion; in the same way, knowledge of the truth that the Self does not possess the attributes of saṃsāra removes the illusion of being bound to saṃsāra.

The Sage Vamadeva—Śruti strengthens the point further: for one who has seen the homogeneous reality of Brahman, what delusion and what grief can remain? On seeing Brahman, the sage Vamadeva immediately understood: “I became Manu; I became the Sun.”

Sanatkumara, Who Leads Beyond Grief—“You are my father, who carries me across ignorance”; “I have heard from those who know the Self that the knower of the Self crosses beyond grief. I am in grief; carry me beyond grief”; “Sanatkumara led him beyond darkness.” Such passages of Śruti teach that the fruit of knowledge of Brahman is simply the removal of the ignorance that obstructs liberation.

The Boatman and the Still Middle of the Sea—Remaining in his boat, the boatman leaves behind the changing shore, masses of foam, and restless waves and reaches the wave-less, quiet, clear, stable, unchanging middle. Yet the individual self is not different from Brahman; it is Brahman itself. What, then, can the individual self attain, and by what means? Attainment presupposes difference. Even if the individual self were taken as different from Brahman, all-pervading Brahman would already and eternally be attained. For this reason the objection is answered by the words “even while appearing different from its own nature.”

The Two Birds—The individual self is the subject of the notion “I”, the agent of cognition, and the experiencer of the fruits of action. The mantra says: “One bird eats the sweet fruit; the other does not eat but only watches.” The bird that eats the fruit is the individual self; the one that does not eat is the witnessing Supreme Self.

Sumeru—“Mount Sumeru, king of mountains, is the dwelling place of Indra and the other guardians of the worlds, of Siddhas, Vidyadharas, Gandharvas, and hosts of Apsarases; it is formed of golden rock washed by the waters of the Mandakini falling from Brahmaloka, and made delightful by gardens fair as Nandana and by the voices of crystal-like birds at play.”

The Dravida, Devadatta, and the Birth of a Son—A Dravida who does not know the meaning of the Arya language sits at Devadatta’s house beside the royal road on his way to the city. He knows that the birth of a son is a cause of joy to a father. Accompanying a messenger, he reaches Devadatta in the city. The messenger offers a cloth moistened with saffron-water in which the infant’s feet have been washed and says, “Devadatta, may your prosperity increase; a son has been born to you.” At once the Dravida sees Devadatta’s hair stand on end, his eyes and face opening like fully blossomed lotuses. He infers the joy arisen in Devadatta, and also infers that the statement just heard is the cause of this joy, which did not exist before the words were spoken. He understands that the sentence communicated a meaning capable of producing joy, for a mere utterance that taught no joy-producing meaning could not itself have produced joy. No other cause of joy is visible, while the birth of a son is known to be such a cause; he therefore concludes that this is what the messenger announced. The same pattern is to be understood in cases of fear, grief, and the like.

The Old Man and the Child Who Learns—On hearing, “When fever comes, eat wholesome food,” or, “Do not give your ring to a snake,” an elderly man takes wholesome food, or abandons an inclination he had to give away the ring. Watching this, a learning child infers that the elder’s engagement and withdrawal are caused respectively by desire and aversion. The elder’s engagement and withdrawal are independent acts produced by desire and aversion, just as the child knows his own to be.

The Wealthy Householder—A wealthy householder has a sense of ownership toward his wealth and therefore fears that it may be stolen. But if the same man renounces the wealth and is freed from identification with it, the fear that it may be stolen no longer remains in him.

The Man Who Wears Earrings—Likewise, one who wears earrings experiences pleasure through identification with the wearing of them. But when the same man removes the earrings and is freed from that identification, the pleasure born of wearing them is no longer present.

The Lion, the Post, and the Shell—In an animal possessing a mane and a distinctive form, coexistence and concomitance establish “lion” as the primary meaning of the word and the corresponding cognition. When a man possesses ordinary leonine qualities such as ferocity and courage, the same informed speaker may apply the word “lion” and the lion-cognition to him secondarily. But in someone who does not know the difference between a lion and a man, the word and cognition belonging to one thing arise in another not figuratively but through error. In the dusk, when its distinctive features are unclear, a post may be taken as “this is a man”; here the post becomes the object of the word and cognition “man.” In the same way, for an unknown cause, the word and cognition “this is silver” arise in relation to a shell.

The Snake’s Cast-Off Skin—As the skin shed by a snake lies dead and discarded upon the anthill, so this body lies. What remains is bodiless, immortal life: Brahman alone, light alone.

When the illustrations were finished, the Sutradhara remained silent for a while. Then he said, “Now hear the sayings that Śruti, the sages, and the śāstras have carried from age to age.” And one by one he began to recite the old utterances.

In an injunctive sentence, a word's meaning cannot differ from its primary meaning. Where what follows is connected with what precedes, the earlier position is weaker, as in the context of the original rite and its subsidiary action. Where two cognitions arise successively without mutual dependence, the superiority of the later cognition over the earlier is known. Absence is merely another positive entity considered in relation to something else. At any time a person apprehends the existence of a thing as true or false either in relation to that thing's own nature or in relation to something else. Absence is only being in another form, nothing more, for no separate entity of "absence" is established. Brahman is truth, knowledge, and infinite.

A blind man holding a blind man's hand falls at every step. When That is illumined, all things are illumined; by Its light this whole world shines. One who desires heaven should perform the Jyotishtoma sacrifice. Injure no living being. One who wishes to destroy his enemy by an abhichara rite should perform the Shyena sacrifice. Adhyāsa is cognition of a thing in a form that it does not possess: the appearance elsewhere of something previously seen, in a form resembling memory.

Therefore, now, the desire to know Brahman. Om and atha—these two words first issued from Brahma's throat; therefore both are auspicious. Discipline of the mind, practised for a long time without interruption and with reverence, gains a firm foundation. Having known that One, the learned Brahmin should cultivate wisdom. Blessed is the one in whom the forty-eight purifying sacraments have been completed. Having discharged the three debts, a person should set the mind upon liberation. Brahmins desire to know It through the study of the Veda, sacrifice, and the rest.

Not by action, not by progeny, not by wealth, but by renunciation alone is immortality attained. A person of purified understanding beholds Brahman through meditation. When sin has been exhausted, knowledge arises. For the sage who wishes to attain yoga, action is said to be the means; for one established in yoga, tranquillity is the means. Or one may pass directly from student life into renunciation. Having been a householder, one may become a forest-dweller; having been a forest-dweller, one may renounce. Having studied the Veda according to rule, begotten a son, and performed sacrifices according to one's means, one should set the mind upon liberation.

The twice-born who desires liberation without studying the Veda, begetting offspring, or performing sacrifice falls into a lower state. Or one may renounce from the student stage, the householder stage, or the forest-dwelling stage. On the very day dispassion arises, one may renounce. Endowed with tranquillity, self-restraint, withdrawal, endurance, concentration, and faith, a person sees the Self in the Self and all things in the Self. I have drunk Soma; I have become immortal. That from which the origin and the rest of this world proceed. The knower of Brahman becomes Brahman.

In the beginning there was Being alone, dear one. Desire to know that from which all these beings are born, by which, once born, they live, and into which at the end they enter; that is Brahman. From bliss indeed all these beings are born; by bliss, once born, they live; into bliss they enter. Sadeva somya idam agra āsīt. Ekam evādvitīyam. Ātmā vā idam eka evāgra āsīt. This Brahman is without before or behind, without within or without.

This Self is Brahman, the experiencer of all. Immortal Brahman alone is in every direction. Tat tvam asi. Aham brahmāsmi. Ayam ātmā brahma. So long as one is embodied, the complete cessation of pleasure and pain is not possible. Pleasure and pain do not touch the bodiless.

The wise person, though dwelling in the body, knows the Self as bodiless, stable amid the changing, great and all-pervading, and does not grieve. This Self is without breath, without mind, pure. Tell me that which is other than dharma and other than adharma, other than what is done and not done, other than past and future. The one who knows Brahman becomes Brahman. On seeing the higher and lower Brahman, his actions are destroyed. The knower of Brahman-bliss fears nothing from any quarter. O Janaka, you have attained fearlessness.

Knowing the Self as “I am Brahman,” one became this entire world. The knot of the heart is cut, all doubts are destroyed, and actions grow exhausted. I became Manu; I became the Sun. You are my father, who carries me across ignorance. I have heard from knowers of the Self that the one who knows the Self crosses beyond grief; I am in grief—carry me beyond grief. Sanatkumara carried him beyond darkness. It is other than the known, and beyond the unknown as well.

How shall one know That by which everything is known? Know as Brahman that which speech does not reveal, but by which speech itself is revealed—not what people worship as an object. The one who thinks, “I know It,” does not know It. The seer of sight cannot be seen; the hearer of hearing cannot be heard; the thinker of thought cannot be thought; the knower of knowledge cannot be known. One bird eats the sweet fruit; the other does not eat, but only watches. The wise call the Self joined with body, senses, and mind the enjoyer. One God, hidden in all beings, all-pervading, the inner Self of all, overseer of action, dwelling in every creature, witness, consciousness, one and without qualities.

It pervades all: luminous, bodiless, without wound or sinew, pure and untouched by sin. The Self is to be seen; the Self is to be heard. When all this is the Self, by whom and whom would one see? By whom and whom would one know? By what could the knower be known? If a person knows the Self as “I am That,” for desire of what, and for what purpose, would he suffer along with the suffering of the body? Knowing this, a person may become wise and fulfilled, O Bharata. By Its light all else is illumined; by Its light this entire world shines. There is nothing higher than the Self; It is the boundary and the supreme goal.

Things are not dear for the sake of the things themselves; all things are dear for the sake of the Self. As the skin shed by a snake lies dead and discarded upon the anthill, so this body lies; what remains is bodiless, immortal life—Brahman alone, light alone. Though there are eyes, it is as though there were no eyes; though ears, as though no ears; though speech, as though no speech; though mind, as though no mind; though breath, as though no breath. The one who knows both vidyā and avidyā together crosses death through avidyā and attains immortality through vidyā.

Having said this, the Sutradhara folded his hands and bowed to the assembly. “What you have heard, reflect upon; what you have reflected upon, live,” he said, and fell silent.

The Argument for the Self

The one who says “I” has his own breath for witness—the pond asks no one how deep it is.

— Garh Narikel

(An original dramatic composition in a prologue, four acts, and an epilogue, built upon the structure of philosophical argument.)

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

Sutradhara — opens and closes the play

Udayanacharya — the Nyaya philosopher of Mithila, defender of the existence of the Self

Kshanabhadra — a Buddhist monk-logician defending universal momentariness and Vijñānavada; a composite fictional character representing Buddhist positions examined in the source text

The Disciple — Udayana's pupil, who gives voice to the assembly's questions

The Council — the learned gathering, nodding at times in agreement and at times in doubt

Setting: a royal hall of disputation in Mithila. Lamps burn even by day. A ghatika-yantra, a water clock, measures the time allotted to each speaker, in keeping with the rules of ancient debate.

PROLOGUE

(The Sutradhara enters and bows to the assembly.)

SUTRADHARA: Before the debate begins, one salutation—not to the Supreme Lord whom argument may prove or fail to prove, but to that reality which no argument can either bestow or take away. What you are about to hear is not history. Udayana lived; his opponents live only upon his pages, as the shadow of an arm raised before a lamp is nothing apart from the lamp and the arm. I have gathered those shadows into one robe and one voice, and named him Kshanabhadra—"fortunate in the moment"—because he speaks for every teacher who held that nothing endures, that there is no one within who looks outward, and that the word "I" is merely a habit mistakenly taken for truth.

The dispute you are about to hear asks the same question in four chambers: Who is the one who asks? Is there someone who suffers, remembers, is bound, and may also be freed—or is there only a river that mistakes its own waves for banks?

Water clock, begin. Let each side speak in turn, as the rules of disputation require, and let no one claim victory until the other has received his full measure of time.

Who says "I," his own breath bears witness;

The pond asks no other how deep its waters lie.

The Self may be asked for proof, yet the Self is proof itself;

What is seen within asks no witness from without.

Breath by breath the witness stays, the sense of I remains—

Who has known himself is freed from another's testimony.

(Exit.)

ACT I

The River That Is Not There

A Dispute on Universal Momentariness

(Udayana is seated in the teacher's chair. Kshanabhadra enters, joins his hands, and takes the seat of the objector. The Disciple sits near Udayana's feet.)

KSHANABHADRA: Acharya, let us not spend the water of the clock on ceremony. You teach that behind these eyes sits an unmoving seer, the same from the child who fears the dark to the old man who no longer fears it. I teach the opposite: whatever is real arises in a single moment and perishes in that same moment, and in its place arises something new, resembling the old only as one puff of smoke resembles another. What you call "one flame" is a hundred flames greeting one another so quickly that no eye can see where farewell ends and greeting begins. There is no single seer. There is only seeing, then another seeing, each time new.

UDAYANA: Then I ask the question for which debate was made: what is your proof? Not poetry—proof.

KSHANABHADRA: Whatever is real is momentary. The jar on your shelf is momentary—you too will admit that it eventually breaks. And the disputed thing—the Self, the word "permanent"—is said to be real. Therefore it too must be momentary.

UDAYANA: (To the Disciple.) Do you see the form of the argument? I am shown a jar that breaks and asked to conclude, by an unestablished resemblance, that a Self—which no one has ever seen breaking—must break as well. This is not proof; it is a wish dressed as inference. Tell me, Kshanabhadra: where is the invariable relation between "being real" and "lasting only one moment"? A jar that endures for years is no less real, while it endures, than a spark that lasts an instant. You have shown an example. You have not shown a rule.

KSHANABHADRA: The rule is shown thus: capacity and incapacity cannot exist in the same thing at the same time. A jar, one moment after firing, is capable of holding water; before firing it was incapable. If the very same jar were both capable and incapable, you would have planted a contradiction in one seed. Only if each moment is its own distinct thing does the contradiction disappear.

UDAYANA: Now we have reached the root of the matter, and I thank you for arriving so quickly—the water clock rewards an opponent who is swift more than one who is merely cautious. Say it plainly: when you speak of “capacity,” do you mean the act of producing the effect itself, or merely the power to produce it, present before the act?

KSHANABHADRA: ...The power. A seed is capable of sprouting before it actually sprouts.

UDAYANA: Then hear the snare you have tied around your own foot. If capacity were the act itself, your reason would dissolve into your conclusion—you would be proving momentariness by citing an act that already presupposes momentariness, which is no inference at all but repetition. So you rightly chose power. Yet a power does not expire in one instant. A seed kept in a granary is capable of germination in the sense that nothing in its own nature forbids germination; it has merely not yet met water, warmth, and soil. Does its capacity vanish in every moment in which it is not sprouting? If so, no seed could ever wait for rain. But seeds wait through season after season, and remain seeds throughout the waiting. Your “capacity,” then, must be something that endures through the interval before its exercise—and that is precisely the kind of persistence you deny.

KSHANABHADRA: Say instead that each momentary seed hands its capacity to the next moment, as a torch is passed from runner to runner, each runner new though the flame appears continuous.

UDAYANA: A relay race requires a course upon which the runners are ordered—some reason why the capacity of this moment passes to that next capacity and not to some disconnected moment in another field, another country. You have smuggled persistence in through the back door of your metaphor while showing it out through the front. And there is a second wound, deeper than the first. You say a thing must perish because it necessarily perishes—that destruction requires no other cause, being simply the nature of existence. Then tell me: a stone standing ten years in the sun has, on your account, secretly become ten thousand stones, each destroyed “by its own nature,” while no hammer, weather, or other cause need be noticed. Does it not strike you as strange that a theory made to explain change ends by requiring no explanation for the one change—destruction—that matters most?

KSHANABHADRA: (After a pause.) You press upon a difficult joint, Acharya. I do not concede it. The ending of a momentary thing is not “caused” in the same sense as its arising, precisely because existence and impermanence are not two things.

UDAYANA: Then you have not answered the difficulty; you have named it “identity” and hoped the water clock would run out before anyone noticed. It has not. Still, I shall not pull at this tired point any longer—a disputant, like a physician, must know when the patient has understood the diagnosis. Let us leave it not refuted by force, but unproved—never actually shown—and move to your second pillar, which is grander and will fall with a greater sound.

ACT II

The Hall of Mirrors

The Rejection of External Objects: A Dispute on the Claim That Nothing Exists Outside Mind

(The lamps are adjusted. Kshanabhadrā rises and begins to pace, more animated now.)

KSHANABHADRA: Then grant me this, Acharya, since you prefer plain questions: when you dream of a garden, is that garden outside you?

UDAYANA: No.

KSHANABHADRA: And yet while dreaming, the garden appears just as external as this hall appears to you now. In the one respect that matters—the experience of outwardness—waking cognition and dream cognition are alike. If the experience of outwardness can occur in a dream without any external object, what compels you now to posit an external object behind that experience? Perhaps this entire assembly, this water clock, even my robe, is one long dream not yet ended: cognition paints itself in the form of an outside because such projection is its nature, and no outside is needed to supply the colour.

UDAYANA: A pleasing turn, and an old one. Its fault is this: from the fact that some cognitions are objectless you argue that all cognition may be objectless. But a house does not become imaginary merely because some houses are painted upon theatrical cloth. More than that: how do you and I agree this afternoon that dream and waking are sufficiently different to be compared at all? You yourself distinguish them. You will not leave this stage believing there is no floor beneath you, though in a dream you might. That very distinction is a cognition of the difference between two kinds of cognition, made from a standpoint that is not exhausted by either. What is it, if not the report of something that dreaming cannot supply and the world can—a stable object that remains available for testing, correction, and return?

KSHANABHADRA: Say that the “difference” you speak of is only a difference of clarity and coherence within cognition itself. Cognition illuminates itself, as a lamp needs no second lamp in order to be seen. What you call “an external jar” is nothing more than this: cognition assumes for a time the form of jar-ness; nothing outside cognition is needed to account for that form.

UDAYANA: Then tell me this, Buddhist. You and I look at the same jar in the same moment and report the same shape, the same weight when lifted, the same sound when struck. If each of us were only self-illuminating cognition, our two “jars” would be two private paintings without a common canvas. Chance would have to explain their agreement—and that chance would repeat at every meal, in every market, in every hall such as this, for every person who has ever lived. I find it simpler to admit the jar. Consider also your own inference—the very argument you are giving me now. It depends upon my mind receiving a cause from outside itself: your voice entering my ear and addressing a hearer whom you take to be distinct both from the sound and from your own mind that produces it. If nothing lies outside cognition, to whom are you still speaking, and through what medium?

KSHANABHADRA: (A long silence; murmurs in the Council.) You have found the seam in the robe, Acharya. The very act of debate presupposes another side beyond my own stream of cognition, which Vijñānavada cannot admit without embarrassment. I concede that this pillar breaks, though I do not yet concede that the whole house has fallen. One room remains that you have not entered. Even if the external world stands, must any Self stand behind its perception? Perhaps there is the world, and there is its appearing—arising and ending—and no more: no owner, no seer, only seeing, self-luminous and ownerless, like a line of lamps lighting one another without a single lamp-keeper carrying a torch behind them.

UDAYANA: Now you have named the true battlefield, and I shall gladly meet you there, for that is the true destination of this entire inquiry.

ACT III

The Knower Behind Knowledge

On the Reality of the Self

(For the first time Udayana rises from the teacher’s chair and steps down to Kshanabhadrā’s level—a traditional sign that he will now argue not from authority but from evidence alone.)

UDAYANA: Kshanabhadrā, set aside for a while every scripture, every school, every inherited word, and answer only from what is given in this very moment. When you say, “I am tired,” or “I understand,” or even, “I deny that I exist”—what does the word “I” report?

KSHANABHADRA: A convenient fiction. A name that the stream of cognition applies to itself out of habit, as a river is given a name although there is no single thing called “river” apart from the water.

UDAYANA: A fiction, you say—but a fiction must still be uttered by someone, or believed by someone, or at the very least belong to someone. The cognition “I exist” is not like the cognition “the sky is blue,” which may in principle be doubted, disputed, or corrected by better sight. Has any person, waking or dreaming, learned or unlearned, ever doubted his own existence at the very moment he formed the thought of it? You cannot construct the denial “I do not exist” without the “I” whom your sentence attempts to erase still standing behind the erasure and speaking it.

KSHANABHADRA: Every grammarian teaches that a word need not name some entity standing behind it. “It is raining” names no separate “rainer.” So “I know” need not name an I that knows; perhaps there is only knowing, upon which grammar dresses an unnecessary agent.

UDAYANA: A fair reply, and I shall not treat it lightly. “It is raining” indeed names no separate rain-maker. But attend closely to the difference between the two cases, for here lies the root of the matter. I can show you that the grammar of “it is raining” is convenient by pointing to falling water and asking, “Where in this, apart from the rain, is the rainer?” No one will be found. Raining and the falling of water are the same event, with nothing left over. Now apply the same test to knowing. Show me my cognition of the jar and ask: apart from knowing, is there an agent for whom the knowing occurs? The next time you learn a fact you did not wish to hear, watch yourself. One part of the event is the arising of knowledge; another, distinguishable part is resistance—the wish that it were otherwise, the ownership of the discomfort. We say, “I cut”: cutting is one thing and the cutter another; the iron does not own the wound it makes. So too with “I know.” Knowing is an act, and every act we have ever examined, by the clearest evidence, requires an agent distinct from the act—one already present when the act begins and remaining when it ends. The sickle grows blunter after cutting, but the cutter is not destroyed by the cutting.

KSHANABHADRA: Then let the “agent” be merely the body, or the aggregate of senses and intellect working together. There is no need for a Self beyond the cooperation of the five skandhas.

UDAYANA: Then ask yourself why no body serves as the self-awareness of every person. If self-awareness grasped the body merely as body, my hand should say “I” of your hand as readily as of mine. In its bare physical nature a body carries no distinction by which it can divide itself precisely into billions of private claims of “mine.” Something must already present this body as belonging to the knower before the knower can say “mine” of it—and that recognition cannot arise from the body itself without circularity, for the body would first have to be known as “one’s own” in order to explain how it comes to be known as “one’s own.”

DISCIPLE: Acharya, may I ask what troubles me? Suppose the Self is real. In cognition, how do you distinguish it from the stream of experiences it is said to own? A crowd is nothing over and above the people who compose it.

UDAYANA: A good question—and, if a disciple may forgive the comparison, better than more than half the objections raised in this hall. Consider memory. Today I remember the taste of a mango from my childhood twenty years ago. The tasting was one event, gone decades past, its instant destroyed beyond recovery. The remembering is another event, now, in a body older and altered in every visible detail. For this remembrance to be my remembrance—not merely a report about some stranger’s vanished pleasure, as alien to me as another man’s diary—one thing must have been present at the tasting and remain present at the remembering, binding the two moments into one person’s history rather than two unrelated persons’ events. A crowd, once dispersed, remembers nothing; no crowd remains that could remember. Yet I remember. A momentary cognition wholly destroyed before the next arises can no more explain this bridge than one wave can remember the shape of a wave that broke upon the bank an hour before it was born.

KSHANABHADRA: (Quietly.) Some of our own teachers speak of an alaya-vijñana—a store-consciousness, a concealed continuity beneath the momentary flashes at the surface—precisely to bear this weight.

UDAYANA: Then, Kshanabhadrā, I welcome you halfway across the hall already. You have just described, in Buddhist robes, precisely what I have called the Self throughout this debate: something that endures beneath and behind the passing flashes, is not identical with any one of them, and is required to explain memory, ownership, and even the possibility that you have addressed me as the same hearer from the beginning of this debate to its end. Change the name if you wish. Once the reality for which the name was fashioned is admitted, I shall not quarrel over the name.

ACT IV

The Silence Beyond Argument

On the Self as the Ground of Liberation

(The water in the clock is almost spent. Kshanabhadrā has returned to his seat, subdued but not defeated.)

KSHANABHADRA: Grant, Acharya, that I accept your Self—enduring, remembering, distinct from the body and from the bare act of knowing. One question remains, and it is the question that first sent me to a teacher in childhood, before I ever heard the word “momentary”: why is there suffering, and is there any way out of it that does not require an invented story? You have won me a Self. Have you won me a Self worth keeping?

UDAYANA: That is, in the end, the only question for which both our traditions were made. Everything before it was merely the clearing of the ground. Consider: if there is no Self, only a self-illuminating stream, then no one is bound and no one is freed; every teacher who taught a path out of suffering was instructing an empty room to leave itself. But if there is a Self—something that remains between error and correction, sleep and waking, the tasting of the mango and its remembrance thirty years later—then that continuity makes liberation more than a word. The same Self that mistook itself for the body, and suffered through that mistake, can unlearn the mistake and thereby be freed from suffering—not by vanishing like one of your momentary flashes, but by remaining, at last rightly, without the old illusion. There is nothing in a wave that can be liberated; only water enduring long enough to notice that it was never merely one wave can be freed from that error.

KSHANABHADRA: And the order behind this—the law by which knowledge frees and ignorance binds, the fact that inquiry of this kind can be trusted—you will ground it in some further being, will you not, in a Creator? I have heard that your road leads there from here.

UDAYANA: It does, though the water clock will not allow us that whole road tonight, and a wise disputant stops before he has worn out his welcome. I shall say only this, and let it be tonight's last word, not the conclusion of the matter. An order that makes the mind capable of knowing a world no mind created is either an endlessly repeated accident, or it bears the marks of intention—just as the measured letters upon this hall's pillar are either accidents of weather, which no serious person would believe, or the work of a hand that meant something. I hold the latter view. Whether I have proved it to your satisfaction belongs to another day and another full water clock. Tonight it is enough that you do not leave this hall certain that there is no one who can leave it.

(Kshanabhadra rises and joins his hands—not quite in defeat, but with that particular respect one disputant offers another who has taken his argument seriously enough not merely to reject it, but to dismantle it with care.)

KSHANABHADRA: I came into this hall to empty out the Self, Acharya. Now I cannot even empty out the question of who it was that came.

UDAYANA: Then the water clock has done its work. Go and sit with that question longer—that too is a discipline. A well-fought debate does not end in one man's silence; it ends in better thinking by both.

EPILOGUE

(The Sutradhara returns as the lamps are lowered.)

SUTRADHARA: Thus the debate ends, though the question it examined does not. It has been asked in every age by every thinking creature who has ever stopped in the middle of a sentence and wondered who, after all, was speaking. Udayana's answer was not the final word in the centuries that passed beyond this stage. His opponents returned in other robes with sharper instruments, and they will return again after this performance. That is not philosophy's defeat but its work. If you leave this hall with the question not settled but sharpened, then this play—like the treatise from which it borrowed its bones—has done its work.

(All characters exit.)

This chapter follows the four principal movements of Udayana's Atmatattvaviveka: the critique of universal momentariness, the critique of the denial of external objects (Vijñānavada), the positive proof of the Self principally through self-awareness and memory, and the treatise's turn toward God and liberation. Kshanabhadra is a composite fictional character giving voice to positions of several Buddhist logicians examined across the work—including Dharmakīrti, Ratnakīrti, and Jñānashrī—not a portrayal of any one historical person.

STORIES, ILLUSTRATIONS, AND QUOTATIONS FROM THE ATMATATTVAVIVEKA

Stories

The assembly grew quiet. Standing among the disciples and the people of the village, the Sutradhara began, in a low voice, to tell the old stories.

The Fool and the Elephant at the Palace Gate—A fool saw an elephant standing at the gate of the royal palace and began to speculate: “Is this darkness swallowing a radish? Or a thundering cloud that pours lightning? Or a kinsman, because the Acharya says that one who accompanies you as far as the palace gate or the cremation ground is kin? Or the shadow of something that only appears to stand upon the earth?” Then he cut down his own imaginings one by one. “Not darkness, for darkness would not slap with two winnowing-fan ears; not a cloud, for a cloud has no four pillars; not a kinsman, for a kinsman does not swing a great staff; not a shadow, for a shadow does not swallow hundreds of human heads. Therefore it is nothing.”

Would such speculation, and the refutation of each speculation, abolish the reality of the elephant? Or should another fool, who merely says, "What is, is," be considered more trustworthy?

The Housewife with Lentils in Her Mouth—This defence of cognition's self-awareness is like the condition of a housewife who tried to please her husband with her mouth full of lentils, but could not conceal the smell upon her breath.

Blue and White Pigeons, Amla, Cotton, and Crystal—Suppose that of two pigeons, one blue and one white, the blue pigeon is regularly fed milk and the white pigeon the juice of jamun fruit; their offspring may then become white and blue respectively. Thus mere origination from a thing does not by itself determine the nature of what follows. A cognitive series arising after the experience of a blue object may possess a distinction absent from a series without blue-cognition; analogies of this kind occur elsewhere. The fruit of an amla tree watered with milk may later grow sweeter. Cottonseed watered with lac-dye may abandon its whiteness, take on a red colour, and carry that colour into the flower. But cognition and memory are not like this. Even when crystal lies beside a hibiscus or another flower, it does not take the flower's colour as its own and remains clear; likewise, cognition, though affected by its object, remains cognition as such.

The Newborn Child's First Movement—If the body itself were conscious, a newborn infant could not make its first movement, because without desire and aversion no effort is possible. Desire cannot arise until there is recognition that a certain object produces a desired result; and such recognition cannot arise without memory of the invariable relation between that object and the pleasure it brings. Yet the infant has had no such experience in this life. The body that experienced the relation belonged to a former birth; once that body has become ash, the new body that replaces it cannot remember the previous experience.

The Exorcist and the Snake-Bitten Man—How, then, does one versed in serpent-lore remove poison without touching the body of the bitten man? In such a case the exorcist's effort may connect directly with the consciousness of the deity who restores the victim to life. Or the exorcist's own effort, aided by the mantra, the effort of God, or the merit produced by the mantra may enter causally into the process that removes the poison.

The Cat Who Practised Austerities to Win the Mice's Trust—This resembles the famous story of the cat who performed austerities in order to gain the confidence of the mice.

Teaching Acting by Acting—Desiring to propagate the path of dharma, God himself creates many human forms of teacher and pupil. Just as an acting-master teaches by acting himself, so God moves the great persons of each age to act in this way and thereby establishes the authority of the Veda.

The Weaver of Udumbaragarta—Some lazy and timid people wish to escape the duties of their varna. Thus a weaver from a village called Udumbaragarta, out of indolence toward religious obligation, abandoned the Vedic path and adopted Buddhism.

The Child Peering through a Hole in a Bright Drum—Some people are deluded like a child peering through a small hole in a brightly lit drum and taking one light for many. Deceived by fraudulent teachers, they likewise take what is harmful to be good and adopt non-Vedic texts.

Illustrations, Metaphors, and Proverbs

Then the Sutradhara began to recite the old illustrations.

A Hundred Curses from the Gods—If a thing's nature were to produce its effect immediately, and that nature were already present in it, then even a hundred curses of the gods could not forcibly prevent it from producing its effect at the very first moment.

Molasses Flowing to the Elbow—It is like syrup from molasses that has run from the palm to the elbow and can no longer be licked. Just as the syrup at the elbow cannot be licked, so a question of momentariness that has already been discussed again and again ought not be raised yet another time.

One Hundred Coins and Five Groups of Twenty—What is to be said of a man who refuses to pay a hundred coins even under threat of decapitation, yet cheerfully pays five groups of twenty?

The Cobra Bitten by Its Own Venom—It is like a female cobra rendered senseless after being bitten by its own poison.

The Mongoose Killed by Its Own Young—Thought of this kind ends like a mongoose killed by its own offspring: destroyed by its own consequence.

Atoms Like Raktabija—The atom is a strange entity, like the demon Raktabija: tear open the belly of the demoness of argument and it comes out again in atomic form. The point is that reasons advanced to refute atoms ultimately establish atoms themselves.

Trying to Extinguish One Lamp with Another—The more the Buddhist tries to erase consciousness, the brighter the light of consciousness becomes. Even the denial of consciousness must itself be known. Thus the Buddhist is attempting to create darkness by extinguishing one lamp with another.

Dream Smoke, Dream Mountain, Dream Fire—If inference occurs in a dream, dream smoke leads to the inference of dream fire on a dream mountain.

The Milkless Teat on a Goat's Neck—In an inference for partlessness, the reason called "reality" is as useless as the milkless teat on a goat's neck.

Seed Sown in a Field and Seed Fallen There by Chance—It is not the case that only seed deliberately sown by a labourer in a field can germinate, while seed that happens to fall there cannot.

The Movement of a Dancer's Eyebrow—The positive invariable relation between these two terms can likewise be illustrated by the movement of a dancer's eyebrow. Recognition that the eyebrow's movement, or the aggregate of atoms making up the eyebrow, is "the same" is not founded upon ignorance.

The Forest-Dweller Who Knows Venomous Creatures—As a forest-dweller accustomed to dealing with venomous creatures tries to restore consciousness to one rendered insensible by snakebite, so the seeker of the Self strives for the direct realization of self-consciousness.

Food Mixed with Honey and Poison—A person excessively attached to something may overlook its defects and be drawn toward it; one excessively averse may undervalue its virtues and turn away. Food made from a mixture of honey and poison is the illustration.

The Gold Necklace Already Worn around the Neck—Can one desire to obtain even what is already possessed but mistakenly thought lost—as when someone searches for the gold necklace already hanging around his neck?

The Lust-Driven Young Man—There is a well-known saying: when a man consumed by lust cannot obtain a supremely beautiful woman, he may descend even to animals.

The Praise of the Blind and the Painter—If a crowd of blind men praises a painting, how does the painter's glory increase?

Classical Quotations and Maxims

Then the Sutradhara recited the old sayings and quotations.

A Verse of Praise—Salutation to the Supreme Being, greatest among the ancient teachers, lord and creator of all worlds. His sovereignty over the worlds he created belongs to his very nature. Having created them, he sustains their existence, teaches the beings of the world the correct use of words, and for their welfare lays down commands to perform beneficial acts and prohibitions against harmful ones. His teaching is authoritative, his compassion toward living beings is natural, and his endeavour for the good of all is bound by no condition.

Dharmakirti's Statement—"There is no non-existence or destruction distinct from the existent thing itself."

The Lokayata Declaration—"So long as we live, let us enjoy pleasure."

The Bodiless Self—"Neither good nor evil touches the bodiless being."

The Subtlety and Greatness of the Self—"The Self is subtler than the subtlest."

"The Self has been called greater than the greatest."

Four Statements of Vyasa—"A human being is born short-lived and with diminished vital power."

"At every transition of a Manvantara, new scriptures are required for people of this kind."

"In the Kali age, giving alone is the foremost meritorious act."

"People will be born who are absorbed only in satisfying the tongue and the sexual organ."

The Self Is Not Action—"The Self is not action, nor is it an object connected with action."

All Existence Is the Self—"Whatever exists is the Self alone."

The Beginning of Creation—"At the beginning of creation there was only non-being."

The Darkness of Self-Denial—"Those who hold that the Self is destroyed fall into terrible darkness."

The Self Beyond Prakriti—"The Self is beyond Prakriti."

No Reality Apart from the Self—"There is no real entity distinct from the Self."

The State of Brahman-Knowledge—"When Brahman is known, nothing else is seen; the seer becomes one with the seen."

The Negation of Duality—"In Brahman there is neither duality nor anything opposed to duality."

The Self Beyond Speech and Mind—"The pure Self is beyond speech and mind."

The Self Returning to Itself—"Satisfied with every object of enjoyment, knowing its own form and existence, the Self returns again into itself."

Closing Verse—In the territories abandoned by rival doctrines, where people wander terrified and directionless through deep darkness, Udayana clears away the obstructions by reason, common understanding, and scriptural testimony, and opens for them the road to liberation.

The Final Word on Criticism of the Treatise—I shall take no pleasure in praise from one who is not qualified to understand the virtues of this work. If a crowd of blind men praises a painting, how does the painter's glory increase? Let people criticize this work by pointing out its faults. Learned persons are surely pleased when attention is drawn to factual errors they have made unknowingly.

Having said this, the Sutradhara remained silent for a while. Then he joined his hands and bowed to the assembly.

CHAPTER -98 (NINETY-EIGHT BEFORE)

Who Made This World?

The tree asked, “Who planted me?” The earth laughed: “The one who planted you does not go about asking.”

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

(Based on Udayanacharya's Nyayakusumanjali)

For schoolchildren and a village audience

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

Sutradhara — the narrator, who speaks directly to the audience

Acharya — an elderly, affectionate logician, in the likeness of Udayana

Charvaka — the village sceptic: intelligent, quick-witted, and irreverent

The Potter-Woman — maker of earthen vessels at the wheel

Modhu — a curious village boy and the Acharya's pupil

Village Chorus — two or more children; any additional children may be placed in this role

Old Uncle — the oldest man in the village, keeper of names and customs

Lekhani Didi — an old woman who has spent her life copying sacred verses by hand, keeper of the village palm-leaf manuscripts

Stage directions: No special properties are required. A charpoy or low stool, a potter's wheel (real, or represented by a cartwheel), a few earthen vessels, and a handful of bricks are enough. The Chorus may sit at one side of the stage throughout and speak or sing together. Total playing time: approximately thirty minutes.

SCENE ONE — THE CHALLENGE IN THE VILLAGE SQUARE

(The Sutradhara enters alone, walks once around the stage, and claps twice to draw attention.)

SUTRADHARA: Come closer, come closer, all of you! Tonight I have not come to tell you a tale of kings and demons. Tonight I have brought you a quarrel—the oldest quarrel in the world. (He points upward, then down at the earth.) Who made all this—the rising sun, the falling rain, the ripening grain? Did someone make it, or did it simply happen, as puddles happen after rain? Watch, and decide for yourselves.

(Addressing the audience, the Sutradhara sings a folk song.)

The tree asked, O who was it that planted me?

The earth laughed: the planter never goes about asking.

The maker is silent; what is made begins to ask;

The sky is high, the earth below, yet both abide together.

The question is vast, and the answer dwells in silence—

Whoever sought the planter found his own root.

(The Chorus enters, sits to one side, and begins humming a simple two-line tune. The Acharya enters slowly, leaning on his staff, with Modhu running ahead of him.)

MODHU: Guruji, Guruji! Hurry—Charvaka is standing in the square again, telling everyone that God does not exist at all!

ACHARYA (smiling, without hurrying): Then let us go and hear what he has to say. A question asked loudly deserves an answer given quietly.

(Charvaka enters from the other side, arms spread wide, like a showman addressing a fair.)

CHARVAKA: Good people of the village! Who has seen this “God” the pandits keep talking about? Show me His footprints in the soil! Show me His fingerprints on even one pot! I say no one made this world. It simply is. Fire is hot, water is wet, and the world is... simply the world. No maker required!

CHORUS (together, teasingly): No maker required! No maker required!

MODHU (anxiously, to the Acharya): Guruji, everyone is laughing with him!

ACHARYA (calmly stepping forward): Charvaka, my friend, you argue well—you did so even as a boy. But tell me one thing first. (He picks up an empty earthen pot from a nearby stall.) This vessel in my hand—who made it?

CHARVAKA (laughing): Everyone knows that! The old potter-woman made it on her wheel this very morning!

ACHARYA: How do you know? You did not see her making it.

CHARVAKA: Because pots do not make themselves! Someone must give the clay its shape!

ACHARYA (smiling at the audience): Remember that, my friend. Remember it well. Before the night is over, we shall return to this very spot.

(The Acharya and Modhu leave for the potter’s wheel. Charvaka remains standing, astonished and scratching his head, while the Chorus laughs.)

SCENE TWO — AT THE POTTER’S WHEEL (The Argument from an Effect — Karyat)

(The Potter-Woman sits at her wheel, humming as she shapes a new vessel. The Acharya and Modhu approach. Charvaka follows behind, arms folded, uncertain but curious.)

POTTER-WOMAN: Acharyaji! Come, sit. I am only finishing this last pot for tomorrow’s market.

MODHU: Auntie, may I ask—before you touched the clay, did this pot exist?

POTTER-WOMAN (laughing): Before I touched it? It was only wet clay, Modhu! This pot came into being only when these two hands, this wheel, and the shape I held in my mind all worked together.

ACHARYA: Do you hear that, Charvaka? A lump of clay does not rise one morning and make itself round and useful. A form first conceived as round—a vessel—needs three things: a maker who knows the form, hands capable of the work, and material ready to receive the form.

CHARVAKA: Yes, yes—for a pot. But the whole world is not a pot, Acharya! You cannot set the sky on a wheel!

ACHARYA: Can I not? Look at the sky at night, Charvaka. Season after season, the stars keep their places. The river reaches the sea without taking a single wrong turning. Year after year, rice grows from seed to ear in the same ordered course. Is that less formed than this potter-woman’s vessel? Whatever is “made”—whatever has a beginning, whatever is put together piece by piece, whatever might have been otherwise and yet has taken this particular form—calls for a maker. Not because I say so, but by the same ordinary understanding by which you knew the pot came from the potter’s hands without having watched her make it.

POTTER-WOMAN: Here. Anyone who doubts that a maker is needed may come to this wheel, here and now, and make a pot himself!

(Charvaka goes to the wheel, makes an awkward attempt, and gets clay on his face. The Chorus bursts into laughter. Charvaka wipes his hands and gives up, smiling despite himself.)

CHARVAKA: Very well, very well! A pot needs a potter—I grant you that. But this proves a potter for a pot, not God for the whole world!

ACHARYA (gently): Patience, my friend. One flower at a time—that is how even a garland for the temple is made. Come. Modhu will show you the next flower.

SCENE THREE — AT THE GRAIN STOREHOUSE (The Argument from Combination and Sustenance — Ayojanat / Dhrityadeh)

(The stage changes. Villagers and Chorus arrange bricks as though building the wall of a small grain store. Modhu directs them, proud of his work.)

MODHU: Careful, careful! One brick laid wrongly and the whole wall will lean!

CHARVAKA (entering, continuing the earlier argument): Well, Modhu—building a granary today?

MODHU: Look at these bricks, Charvaka Kaka. By themselves they are nothing much—only baked clay, excellent for stubbing your toe. But watch what happens when they come together in the right order, under the right hands.

(The wall rises, either through mime or with real bricks.)

MODHU (continuing): No wall makes itself by having bricks fall together by luck. And once it has been built—look—it does not simply keep itself standing either! Someone chose this order. Someone keeps it standing through rain and wind.

CHARVAKA: Modhu, you listen very closely to your Guruji.

MODHU: I do! He says the first joining of the smallest particles of this world—and the fact that, once made, the world does not fall apart every morning but continues to endure—both point to intelligence behind them. Bricks do not choose their own order. Rain clouds do not choose by themselves to come in Sawan rather than in Magh. Someone placed order at the beginning. Someone still keeps it going.

(The Acharya enters and nods in approval.)

ACHARYA: Well said, Modhu. Charvaka—you asked me for the marks of God's hands. Look around you: not for one mark, but for the order itself. A vessel needed a maker to receive its form. This wall needed a mason to rise. The whole world requires both a maker to give it form and a sustainer to keep it standing—just as this storehouse, once built, still needs its walls to withstand the wind.

CHARVAKA (quieter, but not yet defeated): Even so, Acharya—order might be an accident that happened to come out right, while all the failed accidents are ones we never see!

ACHARYA (smiling): Ah—now that is a real question, not a taunt. Come. Sit. Let us finish it properly together—as scholars, not as a crowd flinging mud.

SCENE FOUR — DISPUTATION AND BLESSING

(All the characters gather at centre stage: the Acharya, Charvaka, the Potter-Woman, Modhu, and the Chorus, seated around them like a village panchayat.)

ACHARYA: Charvaka, you say perhaps things merely happened to fall into this fine order by chance, and we—who exist because of that fortunate chance—are simply the survivors left to talk about it, while a thousand unlucky chances left no one behind to complain. Is that your argument?

CHARVAKA: That is my argument, Acharya. Simple and sharp.

ACHARYA: Then give it a simple and sharp answer. Chance too must work upon something—some clay, some bricks, some grains of rice already composed of subtler things. Those subtle things—the “atoms,” as the learned call them—when they first come together to begin a world, why do they combine at all, and why in an order capable of pots, rivers, rice, and children rather than no order whatsoever? A wheel may spin forever, but a pot appears only when the potter’s hands direct the clay. Chance, truly left alone, does not even know how to try again.

CHARVAKA (after a long pause, then honestly): ...I do not have a ready answer to that question, Acharya. Not tonight.

(The Chorus softly hums the opening tune again, now gentler.)

ACHARYA (warmly, placing a hand on Charvaka’s shoulder): I did not ask you to have an answer ready tonight, my friend. I asked only that you look—truly look—at the vessel, the wall, the wheeling sky, as you would look at anything else you doubted. That is all reason asks. Not blind belief. Not surrender. Only an honest gaze.

CHARVAKA (to the audience, arms spread, half laughing): Well, good people—I came to this square tonight to prove that there is no maker. I leave certain only of this: a pot needs a potter, a wall needs a mason, and a good question needs a patient answer, not a loud one. Whether I accept a maker of the whole world or doubt a little longer, I am asking better questions now. Perhaps that too is worth something.

ACHARYA (raising both hands over them as in blessing): Then let that be tonight’s harvest. Whether you leave this square with faith or with doubt, like my clever friend, take this much home: look honestly at the world before you decide. That is all the old scholars wished to teach.

(The Sutradhara steps forward again and addresses the audience directly.)

SUTRADHARA: And so, good people, the old book ends not by silencing the doubter, but by wishing that the fragrance of these flowers of reasoning should reach believer and sceptic alike, so that both may go home a little wiser. If even one child tonight has asked “But why?” one time more than usual, then our little vessel has found its shape.

(The Chorus rises. All the characters stand in a row with joined hands, sing the final couplet together, and bow.)

CHORUS (sung, a simple repeated couplet):

The pot was shaped by the potter’s hand, the wall rose with the mason beside it;

Who shaped the world? Ask, ponder, and carry the question within you!

(All bow.)

SCENE THREE-B — IN THE MARKETPLACE OF WORDS

The Argument from the Fixity of Word-Meaning — Padat

(At one side of the market. A crowd of children has gathered around an unfamiliar fruit or object lying in a basket—something none of them has seen before. Modhu is among them. They argue loudly over what it should be called.)

CHILD ONE: Let us call it “Gonga”!

CHILD TWO: No, no—“Jhalmu” sounds much better!

CHILD THREE: You are both wrong. It ought to be called—

(Old Uncle enters leaning on his stick, hears the commotion, and laughs.)

OLD UNCLE: Stop, stop, little sparrows! If every one of you gives it a different name, how will your mothers tell you to fetch it from the basket?

MODHU: Old Uncle, no one will agree! Everyone wants his own name to win!

OLD UNCLE: That is why villages keep old men around, Modhu. Some matters are not settled by shouting. Come—sit.

(He turns the object over in his hands, considers it, and then announces:)

OLD UNCLE: We shall call this a “Tinkoli.” From today onward, whenever anyone in this village says “Tinkoli,” everyone will know exactly what is meant.

(By now Charvaka too has arrived and is listening with interest.)

CHARVAKA: There you have done it again, Old Uncle! With your own tongue you have just performed the very work my Acharya friend keeps saying only God can perform. Did the word “Tinkoli” choose by itself to mean this fruit? Certainly not—you decided it just now, before us all, by nothing more than the authority of your age!

OLD UNCLE (delighted that someone is listening carefully): Exactly so, Charvaka. And while you are being clever, notice one more thing. Once I have said it, I need not explain it separately to every child. Tomorrow Modhu will hear “Tinkoli” and know at once what I mean—not because he reasons it out step by step, but because the word and its meaning have already been tied together, like a bucket tied to a rope.

CHARVAKA: Yes—because you tied them together just now, before all of us!

OLD UNCLE: And who tied the very first word in the world to its very first meaning, Charvaka? Not I. I merely add new words to an old, very old rope that was already knotted before my grandfather’s grandfather. Somewhere at the beginning of that rope, someone had to tie the first knot—someone first had to say, “This sound shall mean that thing,” before the rest of us could inherit the practice of knotting.

(Charvaka opens his mouth to answer, then closes it again and thinks.)

MODHU (delighted): Old Uncle has caught you thinking, Charvaka Kaka!

CHARVAKA (recovering, smiling): Thinking is not the same as losing, Modhu! Perhaps the first rope formed by itself, slowly, over many, many years, as people gradually agreed among themselves, little by little—perhaps no single knot-maker was needed at all!

OLD UNCLE (shrugging and laughing): Perhaps. Ask your Acharya that question—my knees are old, and this basket will not walk home by itself.

(Old Uncle leaves laughing with the basket. The children scatter, now happily calling the fruit “Tinkoli.” Charvaka remains, turning the thought over, while Modhu tugs at his arm.)

MODHU: Come, Charvaka Kaka—Lekhani Didi is reading the old leaves again. Let us go and listen.

CHARVAKA (walking, to himself): Knot by knot, this village seems determined not to give me any peace tonight...

SCENE THREE-C — AT OLD LEKHANI DIDI'S HOUSE

The Argument from Trustworthy Authorship — Pratyayatah

(A small veranda. Lekhani Didi sits on a mat with a pile of old palm-leaf folios, reading softly to a few seated villagers and members of the Chorus. Modhu and Charvaka arrive and sit to one side.)

LEKHANI DIDI (finishing a line and looking up): ...and therefore, my friends, the elders always said: speak the truth, protect those who cannot protect themselves, and do not fear the unseen fruit of good action. So the old verses teach us.

CHARVAKA (respectfully, but directly): Lekhani Didi, may this foolish sceptic ask you something?

LEKHANI DIDI (smiling): You may ask me anything, Charvaka. You always do.

CHARVAKA: These leaves you read from—how do we know that what is written on them is true? None of us has seen this “unseen fruit.” None of us has gone to the heaven these old verses promise, and no one has returned from there with news!

LEKHANI DIDI: A good question, and an old one. Tell me first: when you were little and your mother said, “Do not put your hand in the fire; it will burn you,” had you yourself ever been burned?

CHARVAKA: No... but I believed her, because she had seen fire before, and because she had never lied to me about the well, the snake in the granary, or anything else.

LEKHANI DIDI: Just so. We trust someone's word about what we cannot test for ourselves only when two things are true: the speaker knows the matter directly, and the speaker has no reason to deceive us. Now these verses speak of things none of us can test directly—what action truly brings which unseen consequence, what lies beyond this life, what the deepest order of dharma and adharma really is. If speech about such things is to deserve trust—not merely to sound like beautiful poetry, but to be trusted as you trusted your mother about fire—someone must have known those unseen things directly, as your mother directly knew that fire burns.

CHARVAKA: Perhaps wise rishis made good guesses over many years, and those guesses were refined with time into these verses!

LEKHANI DIDI: A guess, however old and however often repeated, remains a guess, Charvaka. Repetition does not turn conjecture into knowledge, any more than telling a story a hundred times turns it into memory. And think of this too: these verses agree across many branches, in villages far apart, recited by people who have never met one another—word for word, syllable for syllable, as far back as anyone's grandfather's grandfather can remember. Who first taught the beginning of the whole chain—a chain so long and so stable that forgetful human memory alone does not explain its source?

MODHU: Guruji says the same thing about a pot, Lekhani Didi! Whatever is ordered, stable, and plainly has not made itself needs someone behind it who made it so.

LEKHANI DIDI (nodding as she carefully gathers her leaves): Exactly, child. Trustworthy words about unseen things require a trustworthy knower of unseen things behind them—just as Tinkoli needed Old Uncle to name it, and the pot needed the potter-woman's hands. Who that knower is, whom the Acharya will ask you to call God—that is the question your own feet are carrying you toward tonight, Charvaka. I only copy the leaves; I do not close the argument.

CHARVAKA (rising and stretching, now more thoughtful than mocking): Between an elder who gives names and a mother whose word is trusted, this village seems determined to leave me no easy answer tonight.

LEKHANI DIDI (laughing): Good! Easy answers have never been worth much. Go—I think your Acharya is waiting for you in the square.

(Charvaka and Modhu leave together for the main debate. Lekhani Didi returns to her reading, the Chorus hums softly, and the scene ends.)

(The play ends.)

NYAYAKUSUMANJALI

Stories, Analogies, and Quotations

STORIES AND ANALOGIES

The assembly fell silent. Standing among the disciples and villagers, the Sutradhara began, in a quiet voice, to relate the old analogies—

The Scent of Musk and the Unborn Child — Source section: exposition and refutation of the Charvaka doctrine

Nor does the reply hold that the residual impression of an experience in one part of the body passes into another as the scent of musk from one piece of cloth passes into another piece brought into contact with it. If that were so, an unborn child, being in the closest contact with the mother's body, ought to remember the mother's experiences; yet this never occurs.

The Dream of Drowning in a Pond — Source section: proof for the view that the validity of cognition is known externally

Even in a dream, the dreamer cannot wholly deny knowledge of the elements that later enter his doubt. Illusion, false cognition, and dream sometimes cast doubt upon cognitions that in practical life appear true and indisputable. For example, I dream that while swimming in a pond my foot is suddenly caught by something and I begin to drown. The desperate struggle to save myself breaks the dream and I return to waking. Then, by the clear distinction established in experience, I understand that the entire event in the dream was illusory.

The Hungry Man Eating Sweets in a Dream — Source section: proof for the view that the validity of cognition is known externally

This doubt is removed by successful action following cognition. The experience of success is the final test of truth. Yet that experience may take the form of pleasure distinct from cognition and may therefore itself be doubted. A hungry man dreams that he is eating sweets, but on waking his hunger remains exactly as before. This shows that the experience of pleasure may itself be illusory. Even so, the discriminating vision that distinguishes true cognition from error is not wholly destroyed. Dream-experience differs from waking experience; therefore there must be marks by which the two can be distinguished.

Teaching Language through a Puppet — Source section: the reasonableness of the possibility of creation and dissolution

The Lord may impart knowledge of linguistic convention to the first human beings by appearing in a living human body distinct from Himself, taking the roles of teacher and learner, and using the appropriate words. Just as a person pulling strings may place a cord or stick in a puppet's hand and make it point toward a distant object, so that a child, seeing the movement, infers the meaning of the spoken word, language could be taught at the beginning of creation. From there, instruction could pass in due order to potters, weavers, and other artisans.

The First Scorpion, Plants, and the Origin of Early Humans — Source section: the reasonableness of the possibility of creation and dissolution

How human beings first appeared in different communities at the beginning of a new creation may be explained by the example of certain plants and scorpions. It is observed that at first some plants and scorpions arise from decayed, damp dung, whereas later generations of plants and scorpions are born from parents of their own kind. In the same way, the earliest human beings of different groups need not have been children of ordinary couples, but may at the beginning of creation have arisen from special causal materials.

The origin of the earliest members of different human groups may thus be understood by comparison with the first appearance of scorpions and plants. The first scorpion arises from decaying dung, while later generations are born from scorpion parents. Some plants first arise not from the seed of another plant but from special natural conditions; later plants are born from their own seed.

The example of fire is similar. Ordinarily one fire is kindled from another, but the first fire may arise from the friction of arani sticks. In sequences such as milk becoming curd and curd being churned into butter, the initial cause and the cause governing later stages may likewise differ. Thus later descendants among human beings, animals, Brahmins, and other groups are born from their respective parents, while the first ancestors at the beginning of creation may appear from a special ontological constitution produced in accordance with the destinies of distinct selves.

The Gradual Transformation of the Tradition of Samskara — Source section: proofs concerning destruction

From the history of traditions one should understand that there has been a gradual decline in birth, samskara, education, study, performance of duty, and related spheres. At first, offspring were believed to arise through mental intention alone; later, parents engaged in intercourse for the deliberate purpose of having children; later still, children began to arise from intercourse compelled by sexual desire; and now, where restraint and the disciplines of place, time, and conduct have disappeared, children may be born even from relations described as animal-like.

At first, the food taken by a pregnant woman was ritually consecrated; later the woman herself, rather than the food, received the samskara; later the unborn child was consecrated; and now, in ordinary custom, the samskara is performed upon the child after birth. These examples are meant to show a generation-by-generation loss of subtlety in the process of samskara.

The Blind Man Led by Another Blind Man — Source section: proofs concerning destruction

If one memory is made to validate another memory, and one religious practice merely supports another, the process resembles a blind man taking the hand of another blind man. What has not come down through an ordered oral tradition of teaching is not Veda. Letters without an ordered sequence of sounds are meaningless; disconnected sounds produced merely by the effort of utterance cannot disclose meaning.

Suicide by Poison or Hanging — Source section: discussion of another proof for the existence of God

Nor is it satisfactory to define bodily motion as “motion that produces welfare and removes harm.” An attempt at suicide by poison or hanging is harmful, not beneficial, to the agent. If “beneficial and harmful” are replaced by “desired and undesired,” then drinking poison may indeed be a desired act for one bent on suicide. But for whom is the desired or undesired result—for the agent or for another person? On either reading, the motion of atoms could also be called bodily, since its result may be pleasing or useful to God and to the beings He creates. Even when a deluded person mistakes harm for benefit and acts, the action is desired under the influence of that delusion.

The Flying Bird and the Magician Assuming Many Forms — Source section: discussion of another proof for the existence of God

The existence of God is also inferred from the sustaining of the world. From the earth to the whole cosmos, everything remains supported, directly or indirectly, through some sustaining effort. Though the world is extraordinarily heavy, it does not fall, just as the heavy body of a bird is borne through the sky by its own effort or by an effort connected with its body. God’s effort sustains the entire world and the realms of gods such as Indra and Yama. God pervades all the deities and is therefore described as non-different from them, just as a magician may assume many forms—a horse, a boar, a tiger, a monkey, a celestial messenger, or an ascetic.

The Narratives of the Tortoise and Boar Incarnations — Source section: discussion of another proof for the existence of God

Scripture, addressing Gargi, says that earth and sky are sustained by the governing effort of an unchanging conscious being. Smṛiti and the Gīta likewise state that the immutable Supreme, pervasive through the three worlds, is their sustainer. His supremacy lies in omniscience and a nature beyond the world; because He is the object of worship for all, He is supreme. The three worlds represent the whole of existence. His pervasion of the universe is a relation involving knowledge, will, and effort. “Sustaining” signifies support; “unchanging” signifies freedom from alteration; and “Lord” signifies completely independent will. The narratives of the Tortoise and Boar incarnations likewise describe God as the bearer of the world.

The Potter, Social Usage, Letter-Writing, and Panini — Source section: explanation of the remaining proofs for the existence of God

In the original text, the word pada may also be taken etymologically to indicate the arts and skills of elders, experienced persons, or experts, because from their works and conduct we learn how things are made and how practices are carried on. With this sense as the middle term, the existence of God too may be established. Weaving, craft, other constructive skills, the many forms of adult human conduct, the use of the alphabet and its teaching to children—all are varieties of ordered practice and therefore require some independent initiator. Just as a particular kind of pot is made by a skilled potter, social usages associated with Chaitra and Maitra are learned from a knowledgeable society, writing letters depends upon the craft of writing, and the ordering of prefixes and suffixes is fixed by a grammarian such as Panini, so the universal practices of the world require at their root an independent being who knows them all.

Laughter Awakened by an Old Happy Event — Source section: explanation of the remaining proofs for the existence of God

An objection may be raised: the subject matter of scripture is not known from any other source of knowledge, therefore its author cannot be a conscious being. This does not hold, because God has direct knowledge of the subject matter of scripture. If the middle term is taken to mean “not known by another person,” there is deviation. A person may laugh because of some happy event long past while the observer does not know its cause; nevertheless a statement explaining the laughter still has an author. Thus there is no invariable relation between a subject being unknown from non-scriptural sources and a statement about it being authorless. Inferences claiming that the external senses or mind of a hypothetical author of scripture could not know scriptural matters suffer from the fallacy of an unestablished locus. Even if the possibility of non-eternal cognition is removed, the possibility of eternal divine cognition remains.

The Cattle-Pen beside the Ganga — Source section: alternative meanings of the reason-terms used in the original text

A second possibility is that the intended meaning of a word consists in the hearer’s liking or dislike. For example, when one says “There is a cattle-pen in the Ganga,” the literal meaning being impossible, the sense “beside the Ganga” is understood. But whether or not the hearer likes or dislikes the bank of the Ganga, the word “Ganga” can still be taken to indicate the bank. Thus liking and dislike are not necessary components of intended meaning.

The Lover and the Traveller in the Poem — Source section: alternative meanings of the reason-terms used in the original text

A third possibility is that intended meaning is simply the secondary or suggested meaning of a word. But not every secondary meaning is intended. In a celebrated verse a woman says to a traveller, “O traveller, go where my beloved has gone; perhaps I too may be born there.” On its surface the sentence appears to encourage the journey, while its real intention is to prevent it. Here the intended meaning is contrary to the literal one; therefore every secondary or suggested sense cannot simply be identified with intended meaning.

People Shouting on a Raised Platform — Source section: alternative meanings of the reason-terms used in the original text

Nor is it proper always to treat intended meaning as wider than the primary meaning. In the sentence “The platform is shouting,” the word “platform” signifies the people seated upon it, though there is no identity between the platform and those seated there. The meaning is taken according to context, but this does not establish a rule that every indirect meaning is intended meaning.

The Example of Stout Devadatta — Source section: alternative meanings of the reason-terms used in the original text

For example, from “Stout Devadatta does not eat by day,” the postulation “He eats at night” arises only when the speaker of the first sentence performs the act of utterance required for making the statement and the hearer apprehends the speaker’s intention. What is neither said nor sayable cannot be treated as the implied meaning of a statement. Therefore, if scripture contains intention, there must also be an author in whom that intention is grounded.

A Scriptural Tradition of the Blind Following the Blind — Source section: alternative meanings of the reason-terms used in the original text

Accordingly, one must accept some being who has direct knowledge of all scripture and its entire subject matter; otherwise the scriptural tradition becomes a chain of the blind following the blind. Such a being must either be omniscient, or else another omniscient interpreter above Him must be admitted. Apart from God, who could directly know the full range and subject matter of all scripture? A person of limited vision can neither master scripture in its entirety nor teach every pupil correctly from the beginning.

The Parrot and the Government Official — Source section: conclusion of the preceding arguments

It cannot be said that Vedic teachers merely repeat what they heard from their own teachers without any private intention, and therefore no original independent speaker is required. If they are merely parroting, the intention in their utterance ultimately belongs to the first speaker. Just as a government official announces not his own command but the government's, so teachers of the Veda express a divine intention received through tradition.

QUOTATIONS, PRAYERS, AND APHORISMS

Then the Sutradhara began to recite old sayings and quotations—

The Flower-Offering of the Invocation — Source section: the humble opening verse

“May this cluster of flowers—pure as Nyaya, obtained by proper means, and perfectly fresh—be offered at the two feet of the Supreme Lord and fill my mind with unbroken joy. At the kiss of the sun's rays its petals unfold. The spreading of its fragrance gives lasting delight to one who smells it for the first time. Even when pressed, these flowers do not wither. They are the source of a flowing stream like wine made from grapes of immortal nectar.”

Hearing, Reflection, and Meditation — Source section: emphasis on the need for inquiry

“First the words of scripture are to be heard; then they are to be reflected upon. One who develops knowledge of God through scriptural study, reasoned reflection, and blissful meditation may, through these three uses of the intellect, attain the supreme realization of the Self's true nature.”

Popular Saying — Source section: discussion of the fourth argument for an unseen cause of the world

“Wealth is obtained through the goodwill of the people.”

The Inner Self as Witness — Source section: answer to the preceding question

“The gods keep watch over human beings as they pass through their various trials; and the Inner Self dwelling in every human heart likewise witnesses all their deeds.”

Incarnation for the Protection of Dharma — Source section: proofs concerning destruction

“When dharma declines and adharma increases, the Lord takes incarnation; in every age He appears to protect the good and destroy the wicked.”

Prayer of Devotion to Shiva — Source section: closing prayer

“Until the final moment of life, may my heart remain filled with devotion to Lord Shiva—He who, with the aid of the destinies of all beings, again and again creates this marvellous and astonishing universe, then like a magician repeatedly withdraws His own creation; He whose will runs undisputed through the whole cosmos and who is the supreme cause of the world. May my devotion to that Lord Shiva remain unbroken.”

The Awakening of the Divine Being and the Motion of the World — Source section: discussion of another proof for the existence of God

“When this divine Being wakes, the world becomes active; when He rests, the world is dissolved. Human beings do not know the true power that governs their pleasure and pain; by My prompting they receive heavenly pleasure or infernal suffering. Under My control Prakriti moves, and through it the world of moving and unmoving beings arises. By His power, God governs, expands, and dissolves the world.”

The Sustaining of Earth and Sky — Source section: discussion of another proof for the existence of God

“Earth and sky are sustained by the governing effort of an unchanging conscious being. The immutable Supreme, pervasive through the three worlds, is their sustainer.”

Scriptural Statement on Creation and Dissolution — Source section: discussion of another proof for the existence of God

“In many incarnate forms God pervades all beings and carries them through the cycle of origin, growth, and decay; at the end of each cycle of creation all beings dissolve into Him, and when a new creation begins He manifests them again.”

God’s First-Person Declaration — Source section: explanation of the remaining proofs for the existence of God

“I am the father, the mother, the sustainer, and the grandsire of the world.”

The Necessity of Unceasing Action — Source section: explanation of the remaining proofs for the existence of God

“If I did not act without cease, human beings would follow My path, abandon action, and the world would perish.”

The Lover’s Words — Source section: alternative meanings of the reason-terms used in the original text

“O traveller, go where my beloved has gone; perhaps I too may be born there.”

The Famous Sentence of Postulation — Source section: alternative meanings of the reason-terms used in the original text

“Stout Devadatta does not eat by day—he eats at night.”

Scriptural Injunction to Worship — Source section: alternative meanings of the reason-terms used in the original text

“Worship Me.”

Statement on the Source of the World — Source section: alternative meanings of the reason-terms used in the original text

“I am the source of all; from Me everything flows.”

Prohibitive Injunction — Source section: justification of the preceding conclusion

“Do not eat poison.”

Vedic Injunction for Producing Fire — Source section: justification of the preceding conclusion

“One who wishes to produce fire should rub the fire-sticks.”

Vedic First-Person Declaration — Source section: the existence of God may also be established from number “May I become many. Thus I became.”

Upanishadic Injunction — Source section: the existence of God may also be established from number

“Two supreme realities are to be known.”

Collection of Vedic and Gita Statements — Source section: the existence of God may also be established from number “Though without sense-organs, the Supreme Reality sees and hears. The higher and lower forms of Brahman are to be known. Sacrifice is pervaded by God. Abandon all dharmas and take refuge in God. Act without attachment. Action performed for sacrifice does not bind.”

The Lord’s Statement on Bhakti-Yoga — Source section: the existence of God may also be established from number

“Fix your mind on Me, become My devotee, sacrifice for Me, bow down to Me; thus absorbed in Me, you shall certainly come to Me.”

Prayer for Right Understanding — Source section: the existence of God may also be established from number

“May the compassionate Lord, at the proper time, set even a person of distorted understanding upon the right path.”

Prayer for Liberation — Source section: the existence of God may also be established from number

“May the Lord bestow His grace; may the mind become wholly immersed in Him; may the fear of birth and death never rise again; may complete liberation from bondage be attained.”

The Final Flower-Offering — Source section: the existence of God may also be established from number

“May the fragrance of this bouquet of flowers of reasoning delight both nostrils; if that cannot be, then may Lord Shiva—the teacher of the teachers of the gods—be pleased with this bouquet laid by the author at His feet.”

Having said this, the Sutradhara remained silent for a while, then joined his hands and bowed to the assembly.

The Chintamani Jewel

When the mind is steady, even a stone is a diamond; when the mind wavers, even a diamond is a stone—the jewel is not outside, but in the eye that knows how to recognize it.

— Garh Narikel

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

Sutradhara — stage narrator and master of ceremonies

Gangesha Upadhyaya — logician and host of the disputation, who refines his own definitions before his opponents can do so

The Buddhist — a Buddhist logician, the principal opponent named in the treatise's own opening; incisive, sceptical alike of unseen causes and unseen agents

The Disciple — Gangesha's pupil, whose plain questions keep the technical debate connected to the ordinary world

The Mimamsaka — a ritual scholar who joins the opening dispute

The Council — murmurs and whispers of the assembly

Setting: a hall of disputation in Mithila. On a low table beside Gangesha stand a smoking lamp, a second lamp not yet lit, and, half lost in shadow, an ordinary earthen pot.

PROLOGUE

(The Sutradhara enters.)

SUTRADHARA: Every mason tests his mortar before trusting it with a wall. Gangesha Upadhyaya, before allowing logic to bear the weight of a single conclusion—before letting it establish that fire accounts for smoke, or that some agent stands behind the world—first tested the mortar itself: what, exactly, is valid cognition? What, exactly, is an invariable relation between one thing and another? He will not move an inch until the definition itself has survived every assault, including his own.

In his opening verses he tells us plainly against whom he built this fortress: the Buddhist logicians of his age, who denied an unseen maker of the world with the same confidence with which they denied an unseen Self. Tonight one of them has come to test the fortress in person. Watch how Gangesha answers him—not by speaking louder, but by defining more precisely than an opponent can anticipate, and then, more than once, so precisely that he catches his own first attempt in the very net he has set.

When the mind is steady, even a stone is diamond; when it sways, even diamond turns to stone,

The jewel is not outside; it dwells in the eye that knows it.

To the inwardly steady, even earth may shine like a jewel;

To the inwardly wavering, even a jewel seems mere earth.

Chintamani is not far away; it lives within the mind—

The eye that truly recognizes finds the whole treasury there.

(Exit.)

ACT ONE

THE ABSENT-MINDED SCHOLAR

On the invocation of auspiciousness, and whether an unseen cause may be inferred

(Gangesha is seated, a lamp burning beside him. The Mimamsaka and the Buddhist are both present.)

GANGESHA: (Joining his hands toward an unseen image before addressing the assembly.) Every author who begins a work performs an auspicious invocation and wishes for the work's completion. I have done the same tonight. Before I ask anyone in this hall to accept a difficult claim, let me test the simplest claim first: does an auspicious invocation actually cause anything?

BUDDHIST: A proper place to begin, and I shall not let you escape cheaply. If the invocation causes completion, the two should rise and fall together—present when the work is completed, absent when it fails. Yet from within this very tradition I can name a scholar—Udayana himself, according to report, in an absent-minded hour—who completed the Kiranavali without any invocation worth naming. There is your counter-example. The rule breaks inside the very house that claims to have discovered it.

GANGESHA: (Calmly.) Keep that example close, friend, because before this act is over I intend to use it against you, not merely answer it. But first let me concede the full force of your objection. If cause and effect are truly bound, the effect should never appear without the cause, nor should the cause remain without producing the effect. Udayana's work was completed. By your account, his invocation was absent or careless. On the surface you have shown a deviation, and a deviation is fatal to a claimed causal rule.

BUDDHIST: Then you concede the point.

GANGESHA: I concede the appearance of the point, which is a very different concession. Consider what the invocation is actually said to produce. Not completion directly—as though bricks could be laid merely by chanting a verse—but the removal of an obstacle that would otherwise interrupt the work. Once its obstacle is removed, an ordinary undertaking reaches completion through ordinary means: skill, materials, sustained effort. Now ask your absent-minded scholar: was his work, on that particular occasion, ever truly obstructed? If no obstacle lay in his path to begin with, there was nothing for the invocation to remove, and its absence proves nothing. The absence of a locksmith does not violate the rule that locksmiths open locks on a day when no door was locked.

BUDDHIST: A convenient rescue. How can you know in advance whether an obstacle was waiting or not? You have made your causal rule untestable: it now explains success and failure equally well, which is another way of explaining nothing.

GANGESHA: Not untestable—only conditional, as most causal claims you and I actually trust are conditional rather than unconditional. Fire produces smoke only where the fuel is damp enough to smoulder; dry fuel burns cleanly, and no one calls that a deviation in the relation between fire and smoke. You ask me to abandon a rule because a condition attaches to it, when every rule we rely upon, from the kitchen to this assembly, bears conditions of the same kind.

MIMAMSAKA: Then let me press you from my side, Gangesha, for the Buddhist and I do not usually stand on common ground. Suppose the invocation does not directly produce completion but only removes obstacles. Even so, how is that removal known except through the Vedic injunction that first taught cultivated people to perform such a rite before beginning a work? Remove scriptural authority and no first link remains in your causal chain.

GANGESHA: I shall not remove it; I never proposed to. Shruti states the general rule. The ordinary observation of cultivated people, generation after generation, performing this act before undertakings of this kind confirms that the rule is not empty poetry. Where the two agree, as they do here, a cause may be trusted just as we trust any cause established by a stable, repeated correlation not explained by accident—the very method, Buddhist, that you yourself employ whenever you infer fire from smoke without demanding to see the fire directly.

BUDDHIST: (With a dry inclination of the head.) You have kept your promise, Acharya. You have indeed turned my own example against me.

GANGESHA: And I shall keep the same promise all evening. I never ask you to accept an unseen cause on faith. I ask only that you extend to my unseen cause the same courtesy of inference that you already extend, without a second thought, to your own unseen causes.

ACT TWO

THE SHELL THAT NEVER WAS SILVER

On the definition of valid cognition

(A servant places a shell beside the pot on the table. Gangesha points toward it.)

GANGESHA: Before we build anything further, we must agree on what we mean by true cognition—not what is true, but what makes a cognition true rather than merely produced. Here is my first attempt: a cognition is valid when it presents a property exactly where that property actually exists. I see silver and silver is there—valid. I see silver in this shell and silver is not there—invalid.

DISCIPLE: That sounds almost too simple to say, Acharya.

GANGESHA: Anything simple in this discipline has already survived an ambush, or it would not be standing so simply before you. Now watch the ambush. Take an ordinary twilight error: “This shell is silver.” Test my definition honestly against it. The shell-component of that cognition—the bare “this here”—is in the right place, because a shell really is there. The silver-component is in the wrong place, because silver is not. One cognition, one sentence, and yet by my own definition it is at once valid in one half and invalid in the other.

DISCIPLE: Is that not simply a contradiction in your definition?

GANGESHA: It would be, if a cognition had to be valid or invalid as one indivisible lump. But the cognition “this shell-silver” is not one indivisible claim; it contains two claims joined in one seeing—one about the “here,” another about silverhood—and each may be tested separately against the world, just as in a sentence of two clauses one clause may be true and the other false without violating the law of non-contradiction. The definition survives once we admit honestly what a mixed cognition actually contains.

BUDDHIST: Then stretch the test one step farther and see whether it survives me. A tree stands before us; at its crown it is in conjunction with a bird, while at its root that conjunction is absent. By your definition, is the cognition “this tree is conjoined” valid or invalid?

GANGESHA: You have laid the snare cleverly, and I shall step into it deliberately, because the road out is instructive. Conjunction and its absence do not occupy the whole tree indiscriminately—one is at the crown, the other at the root. A cognition that properly specifies the part about which it speaks is neither vague nor self-contradictory. “The tree, at its crown, is conjoined” is true; “the tree, at its root, lacks that conjunction” is equally true. Only a cognition that refuses to specify the part deserves your charge, and no careful speaker leaves a cognition so unqualified.

BUDDHIST: You are patching your definition faster than I can object to it. At what point does a definition patched so many times cease to be a definition and become an admission that the first attempt failed?

GANGESHA: (Unmoved.) When a physician straightens a bandage twice before setting a bone, we do not say the bandage has failed. We say the physician was honest about the first attempt and skilful enough to correct it before trusting the patient's full weight to it. I would rather give you a three-patched definition, every patch of which has survived your best blow, than a beautiful sentence that collapses the moment you lean upon it. Test it again, if you have another blow left.

BUDDHIST: One more, then, and it is the sharpest I have. A newly made pot was black before firing and blood-red after it came from the kiln. "This pot is black" was once true and is now false—the same sentence, about the same pot, changing truth-value. Your definition contains nothing that explains that.

GANGESHA: Because my definition never claimed that sentences float free of time. From the beginning it has concerned the presence of a property in a locus at a definite time, just as it concerns its presence in a definite part. "The pot, before firing, was black" remains true forever, untouched by the kiln. "This pot, now, is black" was always a different claim, tied to a different moment. It is no defect in a rule that it gives a time-marked answer to a time-marked question. The kiln did not break my definition. It merely proved that anyone who forgets to say when has not yet spoken carefully enough to test it.

DISCIPLE: (Quietly, half to himself.) I am beginning to understand why this treatise took a lifetime to write.

GANGESHA: It took a lifetime because every sentence in it has already sat before an opponent as sharp as the one sitting before me tonight. That is not a complaint, friend. It is the only kind of sentence upon which anything else is worth building.

ACT THREE

THE BOND BETWEEN SMOKE AND FIRE

On vyapti, and how a universal rule is known

(The lamp beside Gangesha is adjusted. A thin thread of smoke rises from its wick.)

GANGESHA: Now we are ready for the engine that drives every inference you and I make: the bond called vyapti—the necessary relation between a sign, such as smoke, and what it establishes, such as fire. Without a precise account of that bond, “smoke, therefore fire” is a habit, not a proof. Here is a first attempt: the bond holds when the sign is never found where the thing to be proved is absent.

BUDDHIST: Simple—and, I think, already broken. Consider a wholly affirmative claim for which no counter-instance is available anywhere: “This is nameable because it is knowable.” Whatever is knowable is also nameable; there exists nowhere a case of something knowable yet unnameable in which your test—“never present where the other is absent”—could even be applied. Your definition asks us to search a field with no far corner in which to test it.

GANGESHA: You have found a real defect, and I shall not conceal it. I abandon that first attempt entirely, here before the assembly, as readily as I abandoned my first account of valid cognition one act ago. Let me try again: the bond holds when the locus of the sign is never different from the locus of what it establishes.

BUDDHIST: No better. Rephrase it as smoke and fire having no different locus, and the same defect returns wherever no such different locus can even be conceived for purposes of testing.

GANGESHA: Correct again. So here is the third attempt—and the fourth—each closing a door the previous one left open, until we reach a formulation I am prepared to defend against every blow you have already struck and those you have not yet thought of. The bond itself is co-presence: the sign abides with what it proves in such a way that the sign is never found in a locus determined by the complete and genuine absence of that probandum, however indirectly that absence may be specified. Now test the mountain. Smoke rises from it; fire, somewhere on that mountain, is co-present with precisely that smoke. Nowhere does the absence of fire in general occupy the same locus as that particular smoke. The bond holds, without leaving some unnamed corner in which a marginal case can hide.

BUDDHIST: You have made four definitions to save one example. Forgive me if I am not yet dazzled.

GANGESHA: Be impressed by the method, not by the count. Notice what I did not do in any of those four attempts: I did not merely announce my conclusion and challenge you to refute it. I deliberately formed the weakest version of my claim first, and let you—or twice, myself—break it before proposing a stronger one. A wall tested four times by its own mason and still standing is worth more than a wall no one has yet thought to push.

DISCIPLE: But Acharya—once the bond is properly defined, how do we know such a bond in the first place? We have seen smoke and fire together in kitchens. We have not seen every fire in the world.

GANGESHA: By repeated observation joined to the failure of any single case, however diligently sought, to break the pattern—and, where repetition alone leaves a shadow of doubt, by another support your Buddhist friend has already half admitted without noticing it. If smoke could truly arise without fire, then smoke's dependence upon fire—the fact that smouldering fuel, and only smouldering fuel, sends up that particular grey column—would be an unexplained coincidence repeated in every kitchen, on every mountain, in every age, without anyone ever seeing a single exception. A coincidence that never fails is no longer usefully called a coincidence. It earns the harder name: a rule.

ACT FOUR

AN AGENT BEHIND THE EARTH

The inference to God, and the discipline of naming the subject precisely

(Gangesha lifts the earthen pot from the table and sets it before the assembly.)

GANGESHA: Every argument tonight has been sharpening the same instrument. Now I put that instrument to its hardest use. Earth, and the other elements of this world, are effects—produced, originated, not eternal—just as this pot is an effect. No produced thing lacks a producer. Therefore earth and the remaining elements have an agent, just as this pot has a potter.

BUDDHIST: Before I attack the body of your argument, I shall attack its skeleton, and I promise this is not evasion. It is the discipline you have demanded of me all evening. What exactly is the subject of this inference? You cannot simply say “earth and the other elements,” because no single word designates each of them individually, nor does one recurring property unite them into a single collective subject. Name your subject exactly, in your own fashion, or the inference will have nowhere to stand before it even begins.

GANGESHA: A demand I would make of you were our positions reversed, and I shall answer it instead of evading it. Let the subject be this: whatever is an effect and is not already known by both of us to have been produced by an embodied human agent. That excludes this pot, which we both already concede was made by a potter, and excludes nothing that remains genuinely disputed between us.

BUDDHIST: Too narrow, and dangerously so. On that wording, a sprout—produced, certainly, yet not fashioned by an embodied craftsman—falls inside your subject as easily as earth does. Prove your conclusion silently for the sprout, and you have proved something, but not a maker of the world. You have merely slipped one small exceptional case through the same door and called it the same victory.

GANGESHA: A precise objection, and I shall answer it not by softening the subject further—that would be the tempting mistake—but by refusing to let the sprout take the place of earth. The sprout was never the disputed subject between us tonight; earth was. An inference establishes its conclusion only for the subject actually named at its beginning. Had I quietly substituted a sprout halfway through, I would have committed the very fault I charged against you one act ago, hidden inside a definition: changing the ground of the argument once it becomes inconvenient. The subject remains earth, water, fire, and air, taken precisely as the disputed effects they are. The sprout can wait for its own evening.

BUDDHIST: Then narrow it properly yourself, because I reject your narrowing. Say it plainly: agency here means being produced by someone who possesses direct knowledge of the material cause, a desire to act, and effort—the very three things a potter standing before his wheel possesses.

GANGESHA: I was about to say exactly that a moment ago, and I am glad you forced me to test it before I leaned upon it, because it collapses under its own weight. You and I already possess, every day, knowledge of countless material causes, desires concerning them, and efforts of our own; yet earth was plainly not produced by either of us merely because such knowledge and desire are present in us. If “agency” meant only the bare presence of those three capacities in some person, ordinary living beings would already satisfy the condition thousands of times over, and my inference would prove nothing it was not already required to concede.

BUDDHIST: Then tonight you have refuted your own proof faster than I could have done it for you.

GANGESHA: I have refuted my careless proof, which is a different achievement from refuting the proof itself. And that is precisely the achievement this whole evening has been training the assembly to recognize as progress rather than defeat. What the argument actually requires is narrower still: an agent whose knowledge, desire, and effort are not merely present alongside the production of earth—as my knowledge is present alongside thousands of things I never caused—but are its efficient cause, standing in the same causal relation to earth as the potter’s knowledge, desire, and effort stand to this pot, not merely accompanying earth’s production as an idle spectator accompanies a fire he did not kindle.

DISCIPLE: And can such a narrowed agency be found among people like us, Acharya—some embodied person, however hidden, who might finally satisfy it?

GANGESHA: Test it honestly and see where it leads. The effort of an embodied agent presupposes a body; and a body, by every account acceptable to both of us, is itself among the produced things that require just such an agent. To explain earth by appealing to some prior embodied agent is to borrow a debt that is never repaid: every candidate you offer from the world of bodies turns out to owe his own existence to precisely the kind of cause we are seeking. The series cannot terminate in an embodied agent without either receding unexplained to infinity or finally stopping at a knower, a desirer, and an agent whose effort does not depend upon a body already borrowed from an earlier cause. That is all we mean here by God, nothing more: not an enlarged human being, but the one link in the chain of agency that does not itself require a prior agent in order to be there.

BUDDHIST: (After a long pause.) You have spent the whole evening refusing to let either of us take a shortcut—not around my objections and, twice tonight, not around the weakness of your own first answers. I still will not say that I am convinced. But I no longer believe, as I did when I sat down, that this conclusion was reached by skipping a step worth taking.

GANGESHA: That is the only result I ever asked of this assembly. I did not come here tonight to win the debate by speaking last. I came to build one sentence at a time before witnesses sharp enough to catch me if any stone in the wall were laid carelessly. If the wall stands, it will not be because I raised my voice at the end. It will be because, while the lamp burned, nothing in it was left untested.

EPILOGUE

(The Sutradhara returns as the lamps are lowered.)

SUTRADHARA: Notice what this evening was not. It was not louder than the disputation that came before it, in another hall, on another evening, over another book. Gangesha Upadhyaya's entire method moved in the opposite direction from noise: state the claim as weakly and exactly as honesty permits, invite the sharpest blow available, and if the blow lands, thank the opponent and rebuild instead of muttering. He named his work a Chintamani jewel, and in its opening lines he told us plainly what darkness he meant to clear: the powerful scepticism of the Buddhist logicians of his age, who admitted neither the efficacy of auspicious invocation, nor a maker of the world, nor unseen causes of any kind. He did not answer that scepticism by refusing to feel its weight. Four times in a single evening he answered by insisting that his own first answer had not yet earned the right to stand unchallenged. Whether that is the same thing as being right, the assembly—as always—leaves to the person who carries the question out through the door.

This chapter follows four representative movements of Gangesha Upadhyaya's Tattvachintamani: the opening debate over the causal efficacy of auspicious invocation, including the treatise's own reference to Udayana's absent-minded completion of the Kiranavali; the progressive definition of valid cognition (pramāṇya) through the classical shell-silver error; the progressive refinement of the definition of vyāpti through the smoke-fire relation; and the technical construction of the inference to God (Ishvaranumana), including the real difficulty the treatise raises in specifying the subject of the inference and the exact meaning of "agency." It does not attempt to cover the Upamāna or Shabda sections of the work, nor the full technical apparatus of the Perception and Inference sections, which proceed far beyond this single evening in definitions and objections. The dialogue is built around the treatise's argumentative structure and its stated method of successive self-refutation and refinement. The Buddhist, the Mīmāṃsaka, and the Disciple are composite characters who give voice to positions the treatise itself raises and answers, not portrayals of named historical individuals.

TATTVACHINTAMANI

STORIES, ILLUSTRATIONS, AND QUOTATIONS

STORIES AND ILLUSTRATIONS

The assembly fell silent. Standing among the disciples and the people of the village, the Sutrādhara began in a low voice to tell the old illustrations.

The Tradition of Gangesha's Childhood—According to oral tradition and inherited story, Gangesha was exceedingly slow-witted, dull, and illiterate as a child. His father tried hard to educate him; when nothing came of it, he was sent to his maternal home. There too his uncle and his uncle's pupils tried to teach him, but after failing they made him perform menial tasks such as filling the chillum and bringing the hookah. One account says that, through the grace of a tantric engaged in corpse-practice at a cremation ground, or through a boon from the goddess Kali, an extraordinary illumination of knowledge suddenly arose in him. When he later returned home, his uncle entered into disputation with him and was astonished by the force of Gangesha's reasoning.

The Illustration of Mistaking Shell for Silver—This is the famous example in which shell (shukti) is mistaken for silver (rajata). When a person takes a shell to be silver and reaches to pick it up, the Prabhakara Mīmāṃsaka account of error (akhyāti-vada) explains the event as follows:

According to the Prabhakara Mīmāṃsakas, when the shine of the shell awakens the memory of silver, two distinct cognitions have in fact arisen:

First: “This is something” — the general perceptual cognition of the shell.

Second: “Silver” — the cognition arising from memory.

But the person fails to apprehend the difference between the two, a failure called bhedagraha—non-apprehension of difference. Because the distinction is not cognized, the two are taken as one and the person proceeds to pick up the supposed silver.

Devadatta Is Outside the House—The classic example runs as follows. A person, Devadatta, is alive but is not seen at home during the day. “Being alive” and “being absent from the house” are two facts. Once his absence from the house is certain, his continuing to live is possible only if he is somewhere outside the house. Thus his being outside is postulated through the means of knowledge called arthapatti.

Fire, Jewel, and Mantra—Ordinarily, when a hand comes into contact with fire, it burns and the sensation of burning arises. But if a particular “jewel” or mantra is present there—a restraining factor, or pratibandhaka—the hand may fail to burn despite the presence of fire. When that jewel is removed, the fire burns the hand again.

According to the Mimamsakas, the jewel or mantra is a pratibandhaka, an inhibitor. When the jewel is placed near the fire, its influence destroys the fire’s unseen burning-power, or renders that power unproductive. Because the power is destroyed or obstructed, contact between fire and hand does not produce the experience of burning. When the jewel is removed, the power returns to the fire and the hand burns.

When the hand comes into contact with fire and no jewel is present, the absence of the inhibitor is present; the causal complex is complete, and the hand burns.

When the jewel is introduced, the absence of the jewel no longer obtains. The causal complex is therefore incomplete, and although fire remains present, the hand does not burn.

The Origin of the Words “Om” and “Atha”—Because the word “atha” destroys obstacles, it is itself auspicious. Smṛiti says that at the beginning of creation the words “Om” and “atha” were the first to burst from Brahma’s throat; therefore both are auspicious. Nor should “atha” be treated merely as a marker of commencement, for then Maharshi Gautama’s use of it at the beginning of the Nyaya-shastra would be needless repetition.

Introduction to the Gavaya—When an inquirer asks, “What does a gavaya look like?” a forest-dweller replies, “A gavaya resembles a cow.” Later the person goes into the forest, sees an animal like a cow, remembers the meaning of the instruction—“The gavaya is like a cow”—and determines, “This is the object denoted by the word ‘gavaya.’”

Introduction to the Donkey—A northerner, giving a southerner directions toward the north, says: “The donkey, lowest among animals and worthy of contempt, has an exceedingly long neck, long moving lips, eats hard tender twigs, and has a body infested with lice.”

After hearing this instruction, the southerner travels north, sees an animal of that description, and determines: “This animal is a donkey.”

Introduction to Broccoli—Suppose a person has never seen broccoli and does not know its name.

Instruction: A friend tells him, “Broccoli looks very much like cauliflower, but its colour is a deep green.”

Perception and Memory: Some days later the person goes to a vegetable market and sees there a green vegetable resembling cauliflower. On seeing it, he remembers what his friend had told him.

Upamiti, the Resulting Cognition: He then determines, “This green vegetable is the object denoted by the word ‘broccoli.’”

Introduction to the Zebra—Suppose a child has never seen a zebra.

Instruction: The child’s teacher says, “A zebra looks exactly like a horse, except that its body bears black-and-white stripes.”

Perception and Memory: Some days later the child goes to a zoo and sees an animal like a striped horse. The teacher’s words then return to memory.

The child determines: “This animal is a zebra.”

The Wooden Puppet and the Child—A child sees a wooden puppet, moved by the Sutradhara’s strings, perform the act of bringing a pot after hearing words such as “Bring the pot.” From this the child understands the causal role of the word “pot” in producing cognition of the pot.

News of a Son’s Birth and the Child—Seeing joy on Chaita’s face after he hears the news that a son has been born, the child understands that the cognition of the son’s birth produced by the report is the cause of that joy.

QUOTATIONS

Then the Sutradhara began to recite the old sayings and quotations.

Invocation—Salutation to Lord Ishvara, of immeasurable glory, destroyer of the three cities; who, though beyond the gunas, possesses unfailing resolve; who, aided by the three gunas, is the cause of the world; who eternally possesses the three forms of knowledge, desire, and effort; who as Brahma, Vishnu, and Mahesha performs creation, preservation, and dissolution; who is an unfathomable ocean of compassion and the sole supreme refuge of the three worlds.

Injunction concerning Auspicious Invocation—"One who desires completion and is about to undertake a fruitful action should perform an auspicious invocation."

Praise of Vinayaka—"By the praise of Vinayaka all obstacles are pacified."

Praise of the Deity—"One who desires the unobstructed completion of an action should praise the deity."

Auspicious Sight at Dawn—"Those engaged in auspicious action, devoted to the gods, disciplined in silence, and performing sacrifices that avert sin should look into a mirror at dawn."

Good Custom—"A local custom that has continued in a region, in an unbroken succession of tradition through ages upon ages, and that neither contradicts Shruti and Smriti nor departs from them, is to be regarded as sadachara, good conduct."

Dispassion toward the World—"This world is like the shadow beneath the hood of an enraged serpent."

The Forest of Worldly Existence—"In this forest of samsara, how many dark days of sorrow, and how many sky-lamps of happiness!"

Hearing and Direct Experience of the Self—"The Self is to be heard of, reflected upon, meditated upon—that is, directly realized."

Steadfastness in Brahman—"One who is steadfast in Brahman attains immortality."

Liberation of the Householder—"A householder who earns wealth justly, is steadfast in knowledge of truth, welcomes guests, performs shraddha, and speaks the truth is liberated."

Renunciation of Action—"Liberation may be attained by renouncing all actions."

Bhagavad Gita: One's Own Work and Perfection—"A person attains perfection by remaining devoted to his own work; by worshipping God through his own work, he attains perfection."

Vishnu Purana: Knowledge and Action—"The wise should strive for the attainment of Brahman; both knowledge and action have been enjoined as causes of attaining Brahman."

Harita Smriti: The Two Wings of a Bird—"As a bird's movement through the sky is possible through both wings, so the eternal Brahman is attained through both knowledge and action."

Shruti: Truthful Austerity and Right Knowledge—“The Supreme Self, attained through truthful austerity, right knowledge, and restraint, is attained through both knowledge and action.”

Memory of Previous Births—“The twice-born who remembers a former birth becomes endowed with all forms of knowledge and knows the essence of every scriptural argument.”

The Story of Jada Bharata—“An initiated man who did not study the Veda taught by the guru, did not perform Vedic rites, and did not receive the scriptures.”

Bhagavad Gita: Renunciation—“The wise understand renunciation as the abandonment of actions performed for desired results; abandonment of obligatory action is not proper. To abandon obligatory action out of delusion is called tamasic renunciation.”

Knowledge of the Self—“The Self is to be known; one who knows the Self does not return again to worldly existence.”

The Way Beyond Death—“By knowing the Supreme Self a person crosses beyond death; there is no other path of refuge.”

The Knot of the Heart—“When the Supreme Self is directly realized, the knot of the heart is loosened, all doubts are cut away, and the being’s actions are exhausted.”

The Fire of Knowledge—“O Arjuna, the fire of knowledge reduces all actions to ashes.”

Action and Experience—“Without being experienced, action is not exhausted.”

The Leaf of the Blue Lotus—“As water remains separate from the leaf of the blue lotus, so action becomes separate from the knower of truth.”

Indirect Praise—“My dear, if you wish to go, then go.”

The Intended Meaning of the Indirect Praise—“Do not go.”

The Origin of the Veda—“From that austerity the four Vedas arose.”

Worship of Ishvara—“Worship Ishvara.”

The Nature of Brahman—“Brahman is eternal knowledge and bliss.”

The Nature of Heaven—“A happiness unmixed with sorrow, not overridden by ordinary pleasure, and attained merely by wishing for it, is called heaven.”

The Nature of Indra—“Indra is thousand-eyed.”

God’s Agency—“I am the cause of all effects.”

A Second Statement of God's Agency—"All effects are produced by Me."

The Truth of Memory—"Whence, then, comes the truth of memory?"

Having said this, the Sutradhara remained silent for a while. Then he joined his hands and bowed to the assembly.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER -96 (NINETY-SIX BEFORE)

Memory-Keeping

The body returns to earth, but the name endures upon the leaf—whom a village holds in memory, no one can erase.

— Garh Narikel

(An original dramatic composition in a prologue, four acts, and an epilogue; set in continuity with the hall of disputation in Chapter -100 and Chapters -99 to -98.)

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

Sutradhara — stage narrator and master of ceremonies

Vachaspati Mishra — the aged Acharya, in the last year of his life; his body is frail, but his voice remains firm

Budhua — Vachaspati's lifelong attendant, who for years has kept the lamp, shell, and rope beside the door of the debating hall (he is the servant mentioned in Chapter -100)

Hulasa — Budhua's sister, a young copyist of manuscripts in the debating hall, who works through the nights copying texts

Disciple Vamadeva — Vachaspati's young pupil, inquisitive, a student of the theory of valid knowledge

Acharya Karnapura — a ritualist Mimamsaka, guardian of the community's "reputation," and an advocate of swift closure

Headman Ratnesh — village chief, anxious to avoid controversy

The Council — murmurs and whispers of the assembly

Setting: the courtyard behind the debating hall, where an old well stands. It is the hour before dawn; the mist has not yet lifted. Beside the well lie a broken lamp and several wet palm-leaf folios.

PROLOGUE

(The Sutradhara enters.)

SUTRADHARA: I have already told you the story of the shell and the silver, where a man mistook a shell for silver. But that discussion of error was a luxury, because no one died there; only a reaching hand came back empty. Today I shall tell you of another error, where the hand is not empty, the well is full, and all the instruments of knowledge—perception, inference, testimony—speak together and fall silent together. Outside this debating hall, by its door, an attendant has sat for thirty years, tending the lamp, guarding the shell and the rope, hearing the final word of every dispute. Today his story begins as well, though he himself would never call it a story. Watch, and judge for yourselves where the error lay and where convenience began.

The body returns to earth, but the name endures upon the leaf,

Whom the village keeps in memory, no one can erase.

A king may erase a paper; fire may consume a book,

But no hand can efface the name that has entered the human voice.

The body is brief, but the name abides—

What a village keeps in memory can live twelve hundred years.

(Exit.)

ACT ONE

BESIDE THE WELL

(Budhua sits beside the well, his head in his hands. The light before dawn is still grey. Vachaspati enters, leaning on a staff.)

VACHASPATI: Budhua, your lamp burned beside the door all night, yet Hulasa did not come at dawn to collect the manuscripts. What has happened?

BUDHUA: (His voice trembling.) Acharya, she... she was found in the well. The boatmen saw her as dawn broke. I... with these very hands I used to lift her out of this place when she was little, so many times. Today I could not bring her out.

VACHASPATI: (Stunned for a moment, then softly.) Where is she now?

BUDHUA: Acharya Karnapura is already with the headman. They are saying—suicide.

VACHASPATI: So quickly? I do not yet know even how she died, and already the word “suicide” is standing here before us?

BUDHUA: Acharya, Karnapura is afraid that if it proves to be murder, the debating hall will lose its good name. Many people already disliked the fact that an unmarried girl sat here night after night copying manuscripts. Hulasa once said to me, “Uncle, if they called me a disciple, people would respect my writing. They call me a servant, so even my writing is counted only as service.” I had no answer for her.

VACHASPATI: (Hardening.) Then will her death, too, become a means of covering the wrong she endured while alive? No. First I shall go there and see what actually happened.

(Vachaspati and Budhua move toward the well. In the distance come whispers from Hulasa’s fellow students and companions.)

(Acharya Karnapura and Headman Ratnesh enter.)

KARNAPURA: Acharya, it is well that you have come. I was telling the headman—the scripture is clear: for one who takes her own life, no formal procedure of testimony is required; the proper funeral rites are sufficient. Delay is not fitting.

VACHASPATI: Karnapura, the same tradition of which you speak also says that determining the cause of death is a matter of evidence, not desire. By what evidence do you know that she fell of her own will?

KARNAPURA: The evidence is plain—the well is secluded, and no one saw any reason for anyone to be looking for her there in the night.

VACHASPATI: That is evidence of absence, not of presence. Evidence of absence proves an absence; it does not prove agency. You would establish an act from what is missing. That is like proving that no fire ever burned in a dark room merely because no smoke is seen there now.

HEADMAN RATNESH: Forgive me, Acharya, but for the peace of the village a swift decision is necessary. If questions begin to spread that something evil happened in the debating hall, many families will stop sending their daughters here to study.

VACHASPATI: (Quietly, but firmly.) Then are you saying that truth is worth less than the village's reputation? Ratneshji, if today we sacrifice truth for reputation, how will reputation itself stand tomorrow, when its foundation is a lie?

(Whispers in the Council: "It is easy to call it suicide." — "But what is the truth?" — "Who has time to hear the truth?")

ACT TWO

THE TESTIMONY OF WORDS

(Inside the debating hall, in daylight. Vachaspati, Karnapura, the headman, Disciple Vamadeva, and Budhua. At the centre lie the broken lamp and the wet palm-leaf folios.)

VACHASPATI: Budhua, where were these palm leaves found?

BUDHUA: Beside the well, near Hulasa's hand. She must have been writing on them that night.

VACHASPATI: (Lifting a folio and bringing it close to his eyes.) The ink is still fresh, but the last word is unfinished—"I..." Then the line breaks, as though the hand stopped midway.

KARNAPURA: That is no evidence, Acharya. A person may change her mind while writing.

VACHASPATI: It is possible, Karnapura, but possibility cannot occupy the place of certainty. Your “suicide” is also only a possibility; you are clothing it in certainty.

DISCIPLE VAMADEVA: Forgive me, Acharya, but I have a question. We have read that verbal testimony is valid only when the speaker is apta—trustworthy and competent. How can the words of one who is dead be treated as apta? Is the dead person’s final letter evidence, or merely a token of memory?

VACHASPATI: A good question, Vamadeva. Remember: the test of trustworthiness is not whether the speaker is alive or dead, but whether there was any cause for error, attachment, or deceit. What purpose would Hulasa have had in lying to us? She wrote her last words alone on a leaf, not for an audience but for herself. Such words are free of deceit, because deceit always requires someone to be deceived.

KARNAPURA: But Acharya, Mimamsa doctrine does not accept a woman’s independent testimony as full evidence unless supported by a male witness. It is an established arrangement; I did not create it.

VACHASPATI: (Sharply.) Karnapura, tell me: in the theory of knowledge, is the validity of a means of knowing determined by the speaker’s caste or sex, or by the causal conditions that produce knowledge? Nyaya is clear—the validity of perception, inference, comparison, and testimony rests upon the soundness of their instruments, not upon the speaker’s lineage. If you say that a woman’s word counts as lesser evidence, you are not clothing epistemology in social practice—you are clothing social practice in the robes of epistemology.

DISCIPLE VAMADEVA: Acharya, then when does testimony become a complete means of knowledge?

VACHASPATI: Testimony becomes knowledge when the speaker’s intention, the hearer’s trust, and the truthfulness demanded by the moment stand together. Hulasa’s intention is clear to me—she wished to write the final truth of her life. We are now the hearers. The burden of truthfulness has passed to us, because she can no longer speak. If we refuse that burden, it will not be the evidence that dies. We shall.

HEADMAN RATNESH: Acharya, but questions of disputation are endless. Shall we keep this question open forever as well?

VACHASPATI: No, Ratneshji. I cannot keep it open forever, because my life is limited. But neither shall I close it with a lie. If no evidence is found, I shall have written: "Cause unknown." That admission is no disgrace; it is the mark of honest learning.

KARNAPURA: If you write "Cause unknown," the standing of the debating hall will fall, Acharya. People will say: if even Vachaspati Mishra could not determine the cause of an ordinary death, what can he know of the cause of Brahman?

VACHASPATI: (Calmly, but with an edge.) So your concern is for my reputation, not for justice to Hulasa? Karnapura, everything I have taught until today is being tested in this one moment: whether I shall sacrifice the name of a dead girl to preserve my reputation, or risk my reputation in order to preserve Hulasa's name.

(Whispers in the Council: "Which way will the Acharya turn now?" — "Reputation, or the name?")

ACT THREE

NIGHT, OUTSIDE THE DOOR

(Night. Karnapura and Headman Ratnesh speak privately near the door of the debating hall, some distance from Budhua. Budhua sits unseen in shadow, listening.)

HEADMAN RATNESH: Acharya Karnapura, why were you in such haste? Is there something more?

KARNAPURA: (Silence, then softly.) Ratneshji, three months ago Hulasa came to me. She wanted to write a commentary under her own name and wanted her name written on the copy, not merely the anonymous "written by." I refused. I told her, "A woman's name does not belong upon scripture."

HEADMAN RATNESH: And then?

KARNAPURA: Then nothing. She fell silent. But now I think—if I had given her that name that day, perhaps today she would be sitting here, not lying beside the well. I do not know whether she killed herself. But I know I killed one desire in her, and it was the desire for a name.

HEADMAN RATNESH: Then you must tell the Acharya this, Karnapura—not merely "Cause unknown."

KARNAPURA: (Hardening.) No. That confession will remove me from this place, and it will not bring Hulasa back. I shall remain silent. But... but from today I make a vow: if anyone comes to me asking for a name, I shall not refuse it again.

(Budhua rises from the shadows, looks at them both, but says nothing. Slowly he turns back toward the well.)

ACT FOUR

BESIDE THE WELL AGAIN

(Evening. Only Vachaspati and Budhua. A new, small lamp burns beside the well.)

VACHASPATI: Budhua, today I told the headman and Karnapura: "Cause unknown; the name is Hulasa; justice remains unfinished." Those words will be carved in stone.

BUDHUA: Acharya, the last letters on that palm leaf—"I..." Can you complete them? Your intellect reaches to the nature of Brahman; this is only one broken sentence.

VACHASPATI: (Gravely.) No, Budhua. A sentence left unfinished shall remain unfinished. I have no right to complete it. If I invent her final word by inference, that would not preserve Hulasa's memory; it would be the triumph of my imagination. To guard memory is to leave incompleteness as it was, without falsely completing it.

BUDHUA: Acharya, I have sat beside your shell for thirty years, tending the lamp, setting out the rope and shell, listening to every word of your debates. But today I understood that if all the instruments of reasoning—perception, inference, testimony, comparison—cannot preserve the name of one poor girl who copied manuscripts, then what are they for?

VACHASPATI: Budhua, that question will trouble me for the rest of my life. Reason illuminates truth; protecting a truth once illuminated is another act altogether. I entrust that act to you—the name of Hulasa, and the names of all those who, even after evidence was found, did not receive justice.

BUDHUA: (Trembling, but firm.) Acharya, then here, beside this same rope and shell, I make a vow: as long as even one name is erased by injustice, I shall remain here. As a witness, if I can be nothing else.

VACHASPATI: (A faint smile, though his eyes are wet.) Such a vow is longer than a human life, Budhua.

BUDHUA: Then it will outlive a life, Acharya. An act that outlives a life ceases to belong to one human being—it becomes the work of the tree, the water, and the darkness.

(The lamp trembles. For an instant the water in the well flashes, as though an eye within it were looking upward.)

EPILOGUE

(The Sutradhara re-enters.)

SUTRADHARA: Karnapura's fear came true: many households in the village stopped sending their daughters to study in the debating hall. But Vachaspati's stone still stands, and on it are written the words: "Cause unknown; the name is Hulasa; justice remains unfinished." Acharya Karnapura later kept his vow; it is said that among his later pupils the names of several women were written on the manuscripts they copied, though Hulasa's name never appeared upon a commentary. Little is recorded of Budhua. It is said that he grew old and still remained seated beside the shell, until one day the village began to say, "The old servant is still sitting there." In time "the old servant" became simply "Budhba"—the Old One. After Vachaspati Mishra's death, Budhua took up his shell and rope and travelled to another part of Mithila, toward the rising monastery of Udayanacharya, because a vow does not remain bound to the life of one teacher. This story does not end here. It is only the beginning of that long vigil which, much later and far away, you will meet again in a Channa grove as the one who has "sat upon the same branch for twelve hundred years."

STORIES AND ILLUSTRATIONS ASSOCIATED WITH VACHASPATI MISHRA

The assembly fell silent. Standing among the disciples and villagers, the Sutradhara began, in a low voice, to relate the old stories.

The Tradition Behind the Naming of the Bhamati—According to the traditional story of how the Bhamati received its name, Vachaspati Mishra became so absorbed in writing his celebrated commentary on Shankaracharya's Brahmasutra-bhashya that for many years he scarcely noticed the service of his wife. She kept his lamp burning and set food beside him, but the Acharya never lifted his head to look at her. When the work was complete and he asked her name for the first time, he learned that she was called Bhamati. Out of gratitude he named the book "Bhamati" after her. Concealed within that old story is already the question at the heart of Chapter -96: how much unnamed service stands behind the brilliance of scholarship, and when does that service receive a name?

A Brief Note on the Shell-Silver Error—The shell-silver illusion discussed at length in Chapter -100—where a shell is mistaken for silver—is a celebrated illustration employed by Nyaya, Mimamsa, and Advaita in their different theories of error. Chapter -96 places that example before a new question: if theories of illusion can be examined with such subtlety, why should the same subtlety of evidence not be applied to a matter as grave as the cause of a death, especially when the person concerned is powerless?

Having said this, the Sutradhara remained silent for a while. Then he joined his hands and bowed to the assembly.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER -95 (NINETY-FIVE BEFORE)

The Submerged Manuscript

A flood may drown a book, but not the voice—words written in the heart do not grow wet in water.

— Garh Narikel

(An original dramatic composition in a prologue, four acts, and an epilogue; set at Udayanacharya's monastery and continuing Budhua's vow from Chapter -96.)

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

Sutradhara — stage narrator and master of ceremonies

Udayanacharya — philosopher-host, author of the Kiranavali; grave and sparing of speech

Budhua — now old, once Vachaspati's lifelong attendant; now at Udayana's monastery, carrying his vow to preserve memory

Jivanti — a disciple and keeper of books, trained by Budhua; she copies and safeguards manuscripts

Disciple Someshvara — Udayana's inquisitive pupil, who raises the question of the auspicious invocation

Abbot Shambhunath — administrator of the monastery and guardian of its reputation

The Council — the assembly's murmuring voice

Setting: the manuscript hall of Udayanacharya's monastery and a pond beside it. An autumn night. Clouds move across the sky.

PROLOGUE

(The Sutradhara enters.)

SUTRADHARA: Vachaspati Mishra's stone remained standing, and his servant Budhua gathered up his shell and rope and crossed to another part of Mithila, where a new Acharya was rising—Udayanacharya, who had undertaken in his Kiranavali to refute the Prabhakara Mimamsakas. With Budhua came a disciple of his own, Jivanti, whom he was teaching the language of that old vow I have already told you about. Tonight clouds move overhead, and inside the manuscript hall one lamp is trembling more than a lamp ought to tremble.

(Before the disputation begins, the Sutradhara sings a folk song.)

A flood may drown a book, but it cannot drown the voice,

Words written in the heart do not grow wet in water.

The waters came, the pages drifted, the ink dissolved away;

But what passed from throat to throat survived the flood.

The book was soaked, yet the song stayed dry—

What travelled mouth to mouth no flood could ever erase.

ACT ONE

FIRE IN THE MANUSCRIPT HALL

(Night. The manuscript hall: bundles of palm leaves, manuscripts tied in cloth, lamp stands. Disciple Someshvara and Jivanti are binding bundles. Budhua sits by the door with his shell and rope beside him.)

SOMESHVARA: Jivanti, the Acharya's Kiranavali is to leave tonight. A scholar from the east has asked for a copy. Yet there is no mangalacharana at its beginning. How can such a great work begin without an auspicious verse?

JIVANTI: Ask the Acharya, Someshvara. I only bind the leaves; I know nothing of auspicious beginnings.

(Udayanacharya enters.)

UDAYANACHARYA: (Quietly.) Care, study, clear writing, and timely revision—these are my auspicious rites, Someshvara. Faith is a discipline of the mind; I do not despise it. But the question for reason is different: what truly causes a work to be completed—the praise of a deity, or the author's steadfast labour?

SOMESHVARA: Then your book itself is the proof of its own auspicious beginning?

UDAYANACHARYA: A work completed without obstruction is itself evidence of auspiciousness. I claim no more than that.

(Suddenly a cry comes from outside. A disciple runs in.)

A DISCIPLE: Acharya! A lamp stand fell—the curtain in the rear room caught fire! The hall is burning!

BUDHUA: (Leaping up.) The manuscripts! Get the manuscripts out first!

(Panic. The disciples seize bundles and rush outside. Smoke fills the hall.)

UDAYANACHARYA: How many bundles are still inside?

JIVANTI: Three, Acharya! The oldest copy—and the original manuscript of the Kiranavali!

UDAYANACHARYA: The fire is spreading. No one can go in now.

JIVANTI: The pond is close, Acharya! If we wrap the bundles in oiled cloth and sink them in the pond, the fire cannot reach them. At dawn we can bring them out again.

BUDHUA: (Harshly.) Jivanti, no. An old crocodile lives in that pond. The fishermen will not go near it at night. I shall go myself.

JIVANTI: Uncle, your hands tremble now, and your eyes grow dim in the dark. I am quick, and I can swim. Let me go.

(Budhua hesitates for a moment, then bows his head. Jivanti lifts the bundles and runs toward the pond.)

ACT TWO

AT THE POND

(At the pond. Jivanti enters the water carrying the bundles tied in cloth. Budhua stands on the bank with a lamp. In the distance, smoke from the manuscript hall rises into the sky.)

BUDHUA: Jivanti, do not go into deep water. Leave them by the roots near the bank. That is enough.

JIVANTI: Uncle, the roots by the bank are too shallow. The heat of the fire may reach even there. I must go farther out.

(She wades deeper, holding the bundles high so that they do not get wet. In the lamplight her shadow stretches across the water.)

JIVANTI: (Breathing hard.) Done! The bundles are above the water; they have not sunk. Now I—

(She stops suddenly. Something moves beneath the water.)

JIVANTI: Uncle... my hair... it is caught in some root...

BUDHUA: (Shouting.) Jivanti! Drop the bundles—save yourself!

JIVANTI: (Gasping, but resolute.) I will not drop them, Uncle. They must not be soaked; they have to be sunk safely. I... you taught me, didn't you, to become a witness? To be a witness for the books as well...

(The water convulses. Her voice breaks beneath it. Budhua plunges in, but his old legs cannot master the current. By the time he reaches Jivanti, the bundles are in his hands, but Jivanti is gone.)

BUDHUA: (A cry torn from him.) Jivanti! Jivanti!

(Silence. Only the distant roar of the fire and the movement of water.)

ACT THREE

THE MORNING ASSEMBLY

(Dawn. Beside the charred remains of the manuscript hall. Udayanacharya, Abbot Shambhunath, Disciple Someshvara, and Budhua, still shivering in wet clothes. The rescued bundles lie safely nearby.)

SHAMBHUNATH: Acharya, it is a terrible accident, but I am grateful that the manuscript survived. The Kiranavali is safe. For the monastery, that is the greatest thing.

UDAYANACHARYA: (Looking at him hard.) Shambhunath, did you count the books first—or Jivanti?

SHAMBHUNATH: Acharya, I did not mean it that way... but she was only a disciple-attendant. Such an accident is tragic, certainly, but the manuscript will endure for thousands of years, and—

UDAYANACHARYA: (Cutting him off.) And Jivanti did not endure even one night. Look at your scales, Shambhunath: a book on one side, a life on the other, and your hand is already pressing down toward the book.

SOMESHVARA: Acharya, last night I said that your book had no mangalacharana, and you answered that a work completed without obstruction was itself proof of auspiciousness. But this morning I want to ask: was this work truly completed without obstruction? A life has been offered into it.

(Udayanacharya is silent for a long moment. Budhua sits with his head bowed.)

UDAYANACHARYA: (Slowly, heavily.) No, Someshvara. This work was not completed without obstruction. What I said last night was not false, but it was incomplete. I said that unobstructed completion was itself evidence of auspiciousness—but I forgot to ask at whose cost that unobstructedness had been purchased. That, too, is a question for evidence, and I did not even pose it. If a shastra does not ask the price of its own preservation, the shastra remains indebted to that price.

SHAMBHUNATH: Acharya, but it would not be proper to put this into a philosophical disputation...

UDAYANACHARYA: (Firmly.) Not into the disputation, Shambhunath. Into the monastery's book of memory. From this day onward, wherever this monastery records the manuscripts it has preserved, it will also record the names of those who preserved them. Jivanti's name will be carved on the doorway of this manuscript hall, exactly where the catalogue of books is written.

BUDHUA: Acharya, Vachaspati Mishra once said to me, “Reason illuminates truth, but to protect a truth once illuminated is another act.” Today I heard those words again—from another mouth, in another monastery. Perhaps this vow belonged to no single Acharya. Perhaps it is the vow of learning itself.

ACT FOUR

AT THE POND, EVENING

(Evening. Beside the pond. Budhua stands alone. Udayanacharya comes and stands beside him.)

UDAYANACHARYA: Someshvara told me the story of your vow, Budhua. You have carried this burden for more than thirty years.

BUDHUA: Acharya, now it has grown heavier. Hulasa’s name, and now Jivanti’s. I am afraid this list will never end.

UDAYANACHARYA: It will not end, Budhua. As long as human beings love scriptures more than human beings, the list will keep growing. But there is something I want to tell you. Do you know Jivanti’s last words to me? “To be a witness for the books as well...” The sentence broke off. Just like Hulasa’s palm leaf.

BUDHUA: (Startled.) How do you know about Hulasa’s palm leaf, Acharya?

UDAYANACHARYA: You talk in your sleep, Budhua. I have heard you for three nights. “I...” You still carry that unfinished word.

BUDHUA: (A long breath.) Acharya, I know that word will never be completed. But perhaps it need not be. Perhaps incompleteness itself is a kind of evidence—that love and justice both begin where the sentence fails to reach its end.

(The pond stirs although the air is still. The two stand silent for a while.)

UDAYANACHARYA: Budhua, from today I establish a rule. In this monastery, whoever gives their body to save a manuscript or a life shall have their name written in the “Chamber of Memory,” whether that person is disciple, servant, or woman. The catalogue of learning and the catalogue of memory will proceed side by side.

BUDHUA: (A faint smile through tears.) Acharya, Vachaspati Mishra never knew you, yet you spoke like his disciple.

UDAYANACHARYA: Perhaps this is how learning travels, Budhua—not from teacher to disciple, but from question to question.

EPILOGUE

(The Sutradhara re-enters.)

SUTRADHARA: Udayanacharya's "Chamber of Memory" remained in the monastery for many years, though in time it vanished when the monastery itself fell to ruin—for history is like this: monuments, too, become prey to time; stories alone do not. On the village tongue Jivanti's name became "the Water-Maiden," then, through slow corruption of speech, "Panidubbi"—the one beneath the water. Boatmen at the pond still say that on certain evenings long hair can be seen moving under the surface, and that when someone is about to drown, an unseen hand catches at the foot—not to pull the swimmer under, but to save them. Budhua, it is said, grew older still but did not die. The villagers began to call him "Budhba Sevak"—the Old Servant—and then simply "Budhba," the Old One. His vow, carrying the names of both Hulasa and Jivanti, moved onward—toward the age of Gangesha Upadhyaya, and beyond that, far ahead, toward the Channa grove where you will meet him again, seated on a branch with twelve hundred years of patience.

STORIES AND ILLUSTRATIONS ASSOCIATED WITH UDAYANACHARYA

The assembly fell silent. Standing among the disciples and villagers, the Sutradhara began, in a low voice, to relate the old illustrations.

The Tradition of the Missing Mangalacharana in the Kiranavali—According to a traditional account, Udayanacharya's Kiranavali, a commentary on the Prashastapada-bhashya, departs from established custom by containing no conventional verse of auspicious invocation. Commentators have explained this in different ways: some regard the work's unobstructed completion itself as evidence of auspiciousness, while others see in the omission a mark of the Acharya's extraordinary self-confidence. Chapter -95 joins this tradition to Jivanti's sacrifice and raises a question largely absent from the inherited explanations: where, and by whom, was the price of that "unobstructed" completion paid?

Udayanacharya and Jagannath—A well-known devotional tradition says that Udayanacharya, so deeply engaged in refuting Buddhist and atheist positions, was once distressed at being unable to obtain direct proof of God. He travelled to the seashore at Puri, where Lord Jagannath appeared to him in the form of a child. The story stands as a reminder that reason and devotion, proof and experience, were never wholly separated within Mithila's Nyaya tradition.

Having said this, the Sutradhara remained silent for a while. Then he joined his hands and bowed to the assembly.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER -94 (NINETY-FOUR BEFORE)

The Silence of Four Faces

All four mouths spoke, yet one thing remained hidden—behind every answer, a silence stood.

— Garh Narikel

*(An original dramatic composition in a prologue, four acts, and an epilogue; set in Udayanacharya's monastery, continuing Budhua's vow from Chapter
-95.)*

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

Sutradhara — stage narrator and master of ceremonies

Udayanacharya — philosopher-host, now very old; presiding over the assembly

Budhua — extremely old, once Vachaspati's lifelong attendant; now at Udayana's monastery, still bound by his vow to preserve memory

Samkhya Acharya Vishvambhara — calm, an expounder of Prakriti and the three gunas

Charvaka poet Rudradatta — worldly, sharp-tongued, impatient with anything unseen

Buddhist monk Shilabhadra — gentle-voiced, an expounder of compassion and emptiness, though prone to entanglement in argument

Mimamsaka Harinath — a ritualist scholar who recognizes no duty without an injunctive statement

Sohan — a starving villager, afflicted by the famine

The Council — the assembly's murmuring voice, together with the crowd of famine-stricken villagers

Setting: beneath a great pipal tree in the courtyard of Udayanacharya's monastery, where the assembly sits in its shade. Outside, near the monastery gate, a crowd of famine-stricken villagers has gathered. The end of summer. The sky is grey; the earth is cracked.

PROLOGUE

(The Sutradhara enters.)

SUTRADHARA: Udayanacharya's Kiranavali spread through Mithila, and with it Budhua's hair turned wholly white. He now walks with a staff, yet the shell and rope remain in his hands. This year famine fell upon Mithila—the river dried, the fields split open. Four schools of learned men have gathered at the monastery today for disputation, as custom requires. But beyond the gate another assembly has gathered, one summoned not by scripture but by hunger. Watch when these two assemblies meet—and when they fail to meet.

All four mouths spoke, yet one thing stayed hidden,

Behind every answer, a silence stood.

The more was said, the more remained; the more was known, the more was left;

Each one who answered still carried one unanswered question.

Speech is bounded, but silence has no end—

Whoever heard the silence understood beyond all four mouths.

(Exit.)

ACT ONE

BENEATH THE PIPAL TREE

(In the shade of the pipal sit Samkhya Acharya Vishvambhara, Charvaka poet Rudradatta, Buddhist monk Shilabhadra, and Mimamsaka Harinath. Udayanacharya sits in the middle; Budhua stands to one side. From the distant gate comes the noise of the crowd.)

VISHVAMBHARA: Acharya, I shall say it again: suffering arises from the three gunas of Prakriti, and liberation comes through discriminative knowledge, not through outward remedies. Until Purusha knows itself to be distinct from Prakriti, suffering will continue, no matter how much grain is distributed.

RUDRADATTA: (Laughing.) Vishvambhara, your discriminative knowledge does not descend into an empty stomach. What is perceptible is what is: hunger is here, grain is not. That is all. The rest is scholars' talk.

SHILABHADRA: Rudradatta, you accept what is perceptible, but not compassion. That all beings be freed from suffering—this is the very root of our path.

HARINATH: Shilabhadra, compassion is a fine word, but duty is not made by words; it is made by injunction. In which shruti is it written that giving the monastery's grain to unknown villagers is our dharma? Until an injunction is found, such giving is not duty but negligence.

(The uproar at the gate grows louder. A disciple runs in.)

A DISCIPLE: Acharya! More than thirty people have gathered at the gate. Some of the children have eaten nothing for three days. They are staring toward the monastery granary.

UDAYANACHARYA: (Gravely.) Tell them I shall come as soon as the disputation ends.

BUDHUA: (Quietly, but clearly.) Forgive me, Acharya, but hunger does not wait for a disputation to end.

ACT TWO

THE QUESTION THAT SHAKES THE ASSEMBLY

(Udayanacharya rises and stands among the four scholars.)

UDAYANACHARYA: Learned friends, I am changing the subject of today's disputation. Not mangalacharana, not vyapti. Today I shall ask one simple question: what does each of your philosophies say about the hungry crowd outside the gate? Answer one by one.

VISHVAMBHARA: (Thinking.) According to our philosophy, the three kinds of suffering—adhyatmika, adhibhautika, and adhidaivika—are overcome through knowledge, not through temporary remedies. Giving grain is a momentary easing of pain, not the removal of its root cause.

RUDRADATTA: Acharya, my philosophy is plain. If there is grain in your storehouse and a hungry stomach outside, give the grain. That is all. Where is the need for scripture here? It is simply common sense.

HARINATH: Rudradatta, "common sense" is not dharma. The Veda is the source of dharma, not human reason. If an act is not enjoined in the Veda, it is optional, not obligatory. The monastery's grain belongs to the monastery, not to the village.

SHILABHADRA: Harinath, that is harsh. The Buddha taught that compassion is the root of all dharma. But... (He pauses.) I must also admit that in the scriptural analysis of dana-paramita, the emptiness of the triad—giver, gift, and recipient—arises first, and then the act...

RUDRADATTA: (Interrupting.) Shilabhadra! Have you begun too, with your net of emptiness? A child is starving outside, and you are asking whether the giver truly exists?

SHILABHADRA: (Ashamed.) I... I spoke only for philosophical clarity.

UDAYANACHARYA: (Sharply.) Listen, all four of you. I make no charge against the depth of your shastras. But today I see this: four philosophies, each complete in its own way, yet all four together cannot perform one simple act, because each refuses to take a single step beyond the boundary of its own doctrine. This is not a defect in philosophy. It is a defect in the way we cling to philosophy.

SOHAN: (Faintly.) Maharaj... three days... the children... (He falters.)

ACT THREE

AT THE ROOTS OF THE PIPAL

(Sohan collapses beside the roots of the pipal. Everyone is stunned. Budhua reaches him first.)

BUDHUA: (Dropping to his knees.) Sohan! Sohan, open your eyes!

(Silence. Sohan does not rise. Weeping breaks out among the Council.)

UDAYANACHARYA: (Stunned, slowly rising.) Grain... distribute the grain now! At once!

(The disciples run toward the granary. Budhua does not rise from beside Sohan's lifeless body.)

BUDHUA: (In a heavy voice, turning to the four scholars.) Vishvambhara, you kept speaking of the three gunas. Rudradatta, you kept speaking of perception. Shilabhadra, you kept speaking of emptiness. Harinath, you kept speaking of injunctions. Sohan sat among these four accounts, listening—and died. Was there not one account among all of them that could have spoken at once: “Food first, debate afterward”?

(The four scholars are silent. The Samkhya Acharya lowers his eyes. For the first time, the Charvaka has no answer.)

VISHVAMBHARA: (Softly.) Budhua, you are right. My doctrine is true, but I applied it wrongly to this moment.

HARINATH: (In a subdued voice.) And I... I should not have waited for an injunction while a life was waiting for food.

UDAYANACHARYA: (Gravely, looking at them all.) Listen, learned friends. None of your knowledge is false. Yet today, even seated together, the four of you could not find one voice for one human life. This is not philosophy's defeat. It is our defeat—the defeat of those of us who love philosophy more than life.

ACT FOUR

FOUR FACES

(Evening. Sohan's cremation has taken place. Budhua, Udayanacharya, and the four scholars gather beside the pipal. Grain is being distributed among the crowd.)

BUDHUA: (Touching the pipal.) Acharya, I ask one thing of you. Do not let this tree forget what it saw today. As Hulasa's name was carved on Vachaspati Mishra's stone, as Jivanti's name was written in the Chamber of Memory at your monastery, let this tree become Sohan's witness.

UDAYANACHARYA: How, Budhua?

BUDHUA: Four philosophies sat beneath this tree. All four spoke their own truths, yet they could not make one voice. I want this tree always to carry those four voices—like four faces on one body—so that whoever sits here in future to debate the shastras must first ask: "Is anyone hungry at the gate today?"

RUDRADATTA: Budhua, are you binding all of us into this tree?

BUDHUA: (With a faint smile, but firmness in his eyes.) No, Rudradatta. I am not binding you. I only want the silence that fell upon all four of you at the moment of Sohan's death never to be forgotten. If you agree, place your hands, one by one, upon the bark of this tree.

(One by one, the four scholars place their hands on the bark of the pipal. For a moment the air stirs, though the evening is still.)

UDAYANACHARYA: (Quietly.) From this day this tree shall be called the monastery's Witness-Tree. Whoever debates in its shade must first look toward the gate.

SHILABHADRA: (Whispering.) Acharya, I feel as though the tree is listening to our arguments now—not so that it may speak, but so that it may remember.

EPILOGUE

(The Sutradhara re-enters.)

SUTRADHARA: After that famine, rain came again to Mithila and the fields turned green once more. Samkhya Acharya Vishvambhara, Charvaka poet Rudradatta, Buddhist monk Shilabhadra, and Mimamsaka Harinath—all four continued to debate in later years. But it is said that they adopted one rule at the beginning of every assembly: first ask after the condition at the gate, then begin the debate. The villagers came to call that pipal the "Witness-Tree," and in time simply "Pipal Brahma"—for four philosophical voices, from four faces, are said still to sound within its bark, especially on nights when someone hungry sleeps beneath its shade. Budhua looked older than ever that night, and more peaceful than ever too—as though his vow now carried three names: Hulasa, Jivanti, and Sohan. The story does not end here. Far ahead, far away, in a Channa grove, this pipal will stand again, offering four answers from four faces; and all four answers, it is said, will prove false—because truth does not dwell where knowledge insists on speaking before compassion.

STORIES AND ILLUSTRATIONS ASSOCIATED WITH SAMKHYA, CHARVAKA, BUDDHISM, AND MIMAMSA

THE CELEBRATED CHARVAKA MAXIM

A celebrated maxim associated with Charvaka philosophy says, in substance: as long as we live, let us live happily; even borrow in order to drink ghee, for once the body has been reduced to ashes there is no return. The maxim is most often preserved in works written by opponents of Charvaka; no original Charvaka scripture is now extant. In Chapter -94, Rudradatta's character brings forward a side of this tradition that is often neglected—the possibility of immediate compassion within a philosophy grounded in what is directly perceptible.

THE MIMAMSA THEORY OF INJUNCTIVE SENTENCES

In Purva-Mimamsa, the sole authority for dharma is the Vedic injunctive sentence: an act not explicitly enjoined in the Veda does not fall within the category of dharma. The doctrine is renowned for the clarity and discipline it brings to ritual action, but Chapter -94 raises a practical difficulty. In a new and unprecedented circumstance—such as a sudden famine—action that plainly ought to be taken may remain suspended while one waits for the relevant injunction.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER -93 (NINETY-THREE BEFORE)

The Shell's Final Question

What you have recognized once, the morning asks again—but an answer that stands firm does not fear the question.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

(An original dramatic composition in a prologue, four acts, and an epilogue; bringing the shell-and-silver illusion of Chapter -100 back into Udayanacharya's monastery after Chapter -94.)

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

Sutradhara — stage narrator and master of ceremonies

Udayanacharya — philosopher-host, now in the final year of his life

Budhua — extremely old, once Vachaspati's lifelong attendant; now at Udayana's monastery, still bound by his vow to preserve memory

The Objector — an extremely old sceptic who has spent his life travelling from village to village, raising doubts in philosophical disputations; the same voice first heard in Chapter -100

Disciple Keshava — Udayana's young disciple, assigned to attend upon the Objector

The Council — the assembly's murmuring voice

Setting: a quiet courtyard behind Udayanacharya's monastery, not far from the pipal Witness-Tree. Evening; the sky is saffron, the air still.

PROLOGUE

(The Sutradhara enters.)

SUTRADHARA: You may remember that many years ago, in Vachaspati Mishra's hall of disputation, there was a voice that refused to accept that the Self was already known, and that first raised the story of the shell-and-silver illusion. That voice—the Objector—has wandered from village to village, assembly to assembly, ever since, sowing the seed of a new doubt inside every answer. Tonight, now very old, he has come here for the last time, to Udayanacharya's monastery, carrying one final question. Watch and see whether a lifetime of doubt can at last come to rest upon an answer—or whether doubt itself becomes a house that is difficult to leave.

(Exit.)

ACT ONE

ARRIVAL

(Disciple Keshava enters, supporting an extremely old, frail man with a staff. It is the Objector. Budhua, himself now very old, freezes the moment he sees him.)

DISCIPLE KESHAVA: Acharya! This guest collapsed near the gate. He says he has come to meet Udayanacharya, but he will not tell us his name.

BUDHUA: (Stunned, moving slowly closer.) I... I know this voice. Sixty years have passed, but I know it. You... you are the one who asked Acharya Vachaspati, "If the Self is already known, what purpose can inquiry serve?"

OBJECTOR: (With a faint laugh.) Your memory has not aged faster than your body, Budhua. Yes. It is I. For sixty years I have gone from hall to hall, from one side of Mithila to the other, looking for a fresh opening in every answer. Today I understood that this body will not last much longer, and so I have returned here—to end where I began.

BUDHUA: I shall call Udayanacharya. He will hear your final question.

(Udayanacharya, himself aged, enters slowly.)

UDAYANACHARYA: (Looking at the Objector.) Guest, I know your voice already, though I have never met you face to face. Your doubt lives in every story of my lineage of teachers. Sit.

OBJECTOR: (Sitting, breathless.) Acharya, I have come with one question, and this time the question is not for disputation. It is for me. Long ago Vachaspati Mishra said, in speaking of the shell-and-silver illusion, that error occurs when one thing appears in the form of another. I accept that much. But tonight, sitting at the threshold of death, I have a new doubt: if an entire human life can be an illusion like mistaking a shell for silver, then what is death? The end of the illusion—or an illusion whose own test could never be performed?

ACT TWO

AN ILLUSION WITHIN AN ILLUSION

(Udayanacharya, Budhua, and Disciple Keshava sit around the Objector.)

UDAYANACHARYA: Guest, your question is grave, and I shall not simplify it. Remember: our school, Nyaya-Vaisheshika, calls error anyathākhyāti. The shell is real; the silver is real too, somewhere else; cognition wrongly joins the two in one place. Error is false cognition, not a false object.

OBJECTOR: But the Prabhakara Mimamsaka will call it akhyāti—merely a failure to notice the distinction between two separate cognitions, the memory of shell and the memory of silver. And the Advaitin will speak of asatkhyāti or anirvacanīyakhyāti: what appears is neither real nor unreal, but indefinable. Three schools, three answers. In sixty years I have not heard a single verdict that could silence all three in one voice.

BUDHUA: (Quietly.) Objector, I too have sat in these halls for more than sixty years, tending lamps and listening to words. I too have never heard all three speak with one voice.

OBJECTOR: (In despair.) Then you too were deceived like me, Budhua. So many lamps, so many debates, and in the end three quarrelling answers—four, if I count my own doubt.

UDAYANACHARYA: (Calmly.) Guest, you take disagreement among three schools to be proof that the means of knowledge has failed. I see it differently. All three agree that error is error—that acting toward the shell as silver, reaching for it and rejoicing in it, was mistaken. Their disagreement concerns only the internal mechanism of the mistake. Such disagreement is not a sign that truth is absent. It is a sign that the subject is subtle.

OBJECTOR: But my question is about death, Acharya, not mechanism. I ask this: if my whole life, my whole habit of doubt, was itself a shell-and-silver illusion, who was the knower of that illusion? If the knower himself was false, then my doubt had no worth. And if the knower was real, why did I waste sixty years when one thing—the certainty of the knower—was already in my possession?

(Silence. Udayanacharya opens his mouth to answer, but Budhua raises a hand and stops him.)

ACT THREE

BUDHUA'S ANSWER

BUDHUA: Acharya, forgive me, but this question belongs not to scripture but to life. Let me answer it.

UDAYANACHARYA: (Bowing his head.) Speak, Budhua.

BUDHUA: Objector, you ask what value your doubt had. I shall give you three names: Hulasā, Jivanti, Sohan. All three, in this life, became victims of error—one in a well, one in a pond, one in hunger. And every time, the machinery of proof in the debating hall arrived late, or did not arrive at all. But one thing was never late: the decision to bear witness. That decision does not come from proof, Objector. It comes after proof, when proof has fallen silent and only a human decision remains—to forget what was seen, or to carry it.

OBJECTOR: But that is not an answer to a question of knowledge, Budhua. That is a matter of will.

BUDHUA: Yes, Objector. For the first time in sixty years, I want to tell you this: perhaps the answer to your question does not lie in knowledge. Perhaps knowledge can only give error a name; stepping out of error is the work of will, memory, and love. For sixty years you tried to avoid mistaking the shell for silver. For sixty years I tried to understand how much the shell is worth even though it is not silver—because it is still a shell, it is here in my hand, and keeping it is my work whether anyone mistakes it for silver or not.

OBJECTOR: (In tears.) Budhua... then death?

BUDHUA: Death is not the end of illusion, Objector, nor is it the test of illusion. Death is the moment when the shell—this body of yours, this sixty-year journey—reveals its true worth without trying to become silver. Until today you kept searching for silver. Perhaps now, for the last time, see the shell simply as shell.

ACT FOUR

EVENING LIGHT

(The sky has deepened to saffron. The Objector slowly leans back; his breathing grows faint.)

OBJECTOR: (Whispering, peacefully, for the first time without doubt.) Budhua... Udayanacharya... for the first time in sixty years, I am seeing something clearly. This is not the shell... this is not silver... this... (His breath breaks.)

(The Objector's eyes close. His body becomes still. A moment of silence. Then, in the last light of evening, a faint silver-like radiance slips from the corner of his eye, as though a wisp of smoke had suddenly caught the light. The glow dances in the air and flies toward the pipal Witness-Tree.)

DISCIPLE KESHAVA: (Frightened.) Acharya! What... what is that?

UDAYANACHARYA: (Calm, but astonished.) I do not know, Keshava. Perhaps it is the question that will never receive a complete answer, and therefore, freed from the body, has itself become light—not sat, not asat, only radiance, like that instant between shell and silver which no one has ever fully understood.

BUDHUA: (His eyes wet, yet smiling.) Sixty years of doubt have found rest now, Acharya. And perhaps this light, neither shell nor silver, is the most honest memorial to doubt I have ever seen.

EPILOGUE

SUTRADHARA: The Objector was cremated beneath the shade of the pipal Witness-Tree, where the voices of four philosophies still seemed to linger. It is said that from that night onward, tiny silver-like lights could sometimes be seen around the tree—small, trembling, without any fixed form. The villagers began to call them “rakash”, because the lights would appear and vanish before anyone could touch them. The light was neither true nor false, just as the Objector’s whole life rested neither in complete doubt nor in complete certainty. Budhua, it is said, looked more exhausted that night than ever before, but his vow now carried four names. The story of the shell, which we heard in Chapter -100, completes its circle tonight—but a completed circle is not an answer, only the doorway to a new question. You will meet it again, much later, in the kabaddi of Channa Grove, where the rakash cast silver-like light and no one knows whether that light speaks truth or falsehood.

(Before leaving, the Sutradhara sings a folk song.)

What once you thought you knew, the morning asks again,
 But the answer that stands firm does not fear the question.
 You took shell for silver, then knew shell, then asked again;
 With every asking, truth itself grew deeper.
 Questions never weary; the answer stands its ground—
 Who did not fear the question has faced even truth’s final question.

(Exit.)

SECTARIAN DIFFERENCES AMONG THEORIES OF THE SHELL-SILVER ILLUSION

ANYATHĀKHYĀTI, AKHYĀTI, AND ANIRVACANĪYAKHYĀTI

Indian philosophy preserves three major accounts of the nature of illusion. The Nyaya-Vaisheshika school accepts anyathākhyāti: in error, both objects—the shell and the silver—are real, but cognition joins them improperly. Prabhakara Mimamsa accepts akhyāti: error arises only from failure to apprehend the distinction between memory and perception; no false cognition is produced. Advaita Vedanta accepts anirvacanīyakhyāti: the object that appears in error is neither sat nor asat, nor both sat and asat, but anirvacanīya—indefinable. Chapter -100 stages these differences at length; Chapter -93 joins them to the question of death and adds a new dimension: if there is so much disagreement about the nature of knowledge itself, from where can certainty about the nature of life and death arise?

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER -92 (NINETY-TWO BEFORE)

Prisoner of the Water Clock

Drop by drop the water falls, drop by drop the time—whoever is the clock's prisoner never reaches the end of his speech.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction, leaving the dramatic form behind. It follows the later life of Keshava, the disciple from Chapter -93, and gives the first extended introduction to the village of Garh Narikel, which far in the future will become the setting of Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles.)

Garh Narikel did not yet bear that name on the day whose story I am about to tell. At the time the village was known simply as Narikel-Ghat, because on its eastern side, where the Kamala-Balan made a bend, twenty or twenty-five coconut palms stood in a row like old sentries keeping their appointed posts. The word “Garh” came later, when an earthen embankment was raised around the village against the floods—but that belongs to a much later story. In the time I am speaking of, the village possessed only a pond, a pipal tree, and the patience of its people.

At the centre of the village lay a large pond called Jori Pokhari because it had two parts, one deep and one shallow, joined by a narrow channel. The deep part held fish—rohu, catla, and little pothi—which the village fishermen caught in the winter months. In the shallow part, buffaloes lay submerged through the afternoons, only the tops of their nostrils above water, eyes half closed as though they too were absorbed in some philosophy. On the eastern bank stood an enormous pipal whose roots spread so widely that thirty or forty people could sit together in its shade. The villagers called it the Witness-Tree, though no one knew exactly why. The elders said the name came from a learned servant who had once arrived there, laid his rope and shell among its roots, and begun to sit in judgment over the village’s disputes.

That servant was Budhua. By now he was exceedingly old—so old that the village had stopped counting his years. After Udayanacharya’s death, still bound by his vow, he had come to this part of Mithila, where Udayana’s disciple Keshava—now Acharya Keshava—had established a small court of Nyaya in the village then called Narikel-Ghat. There, between pond and pipal, the disputes of the village were heard.

Acharya Keshava possessed his teacher’s gravity, but in one respect he differed from him: he loved procedure. Every dispute required a ghatika-yantra, a water clock—a brass bowl pierced through its base with a needle-hole and set floating upon water. When the bowl filled and sank, the speaker’s allotted time was deemed finished. The method had come from the debating halls of Vachaspati and Udayana, where it had been useful in keeping argument disciplined. But in ordinary village disputes, where one side might be learned and the other merely hungry and exhausted, the same water clock took on another character. Whoever could speak at length could make time his own; whoever could not found his story broken off the instant the bowl sank, and was sent away with the words, “Come tomorrow.”

Sukhdev Mahato lived at the southern end of the village with his wife, a son, and a daughter. His half-bigha plot touched the northern edge of Jori Pokhari. There he grew paddy and a little vegetable crop, and kept a buffalo whom his daughter had named Kajari—because the dark rings around her eyes looked as though someone had drawn them with kohl. Sukhdev was no important man, but on the village tongue his name was spoken with respect for his honesty.

At the western end of the village lived Ugrasen Thakur, whose lands stretched to the southern edge of the pond. Ugrasen's reach was long: most of the village land was bound, directly or indirectly, either by his loans or by the accounts of his munim. In winter, when the water fell, Ugrasen's men blocked the channel running from the pond toward Sukhdev's field, saying, "Our forefathers made this channel. It will be opened only with our permission." Sukhdev's field dried out, while Kajari, who needed water to bathe, stood restless through the heat and bellowed for relief.

Sukhdev had first come before Acharya Keshava's assembly three years earlier. He arrived at dawn carrying the old deed of partition in his hand—a document written by his father, its letters faded but the position of the channel still clearly marked—and sat beneath the pipal. That day the assembly first took up a marriage dispute within a Brahmin family, whose arguments consumed three bowls of the water clock. Then came a question of land tax brought by officers of the king; that hearing too went on at length, because royal officials were customarily heard first. Evening descended. Budhua, seated among the roots, watched Sukhdev sit with the deed in his hand—first in sunlight, then in shade, then once more in sunlight—without moving, as though he had himself become one of the pipal's roots.

When dusk had nearly fallen, Acharya Keshava looked toward him and said, "Sukhdev, the time is over for today. Tomorrow your matter will be heard first."

Sukhdev bowed his head and went home. But the next day was the same. And the day after that. Every day some larger dispute, some learned question, found a seat before Sukhdev's plain, unlettered grievance. Budhua, sitting beneath the tree and watching it all, said to Acharya Keshava one day, "Acharya, this man has been coming for three weeks. His water has been stopped. His paddy is drying. Can his case not be heard first for one day?"

Acharya Keshava, compassionate like his teacher yet held fast in the grip of procedure, replied, "Budhua, justice moves by order, not by preference. If I hear Sukhdev first today, someone else will come tomorrow and claim that he too had the first right. If the order breaks, the whole system breaks with it."

Budhua said nothing. That night he remained a long while among the pipal's roots, counting the stars, as though searching through sixty or seventy years of memory for an answer.

Ugrasen Thakur, on the other hand, never broke the order of the court—because he never needed to. His advocate, himself a scholar, raised a fresh technical question each time: "First let it be established to whom the channel originally belonged," or, "First let us determine whether the witnesses to the partition deed are still alive." Every new question demanded a new measure of the water clock, and Sukhdev's turn slipped farther back again.

Six weeks passed in this fashion. Jeth arrived, bringing unbearable heat. The Kamala-Balan thinned. The shallow half of Jori Pokhari dried until bare earth showed through, and the buffaloes jostled one another toward the deeper water. Kajari grew gaunt, her hide seeming to cling to the bones beneath it. The paddy in Sukhdev's field turned thin and yellow, its ears without grain.

That week Sukhdev came every day. His clothes had grown soiled, his cheeks hollow. He himself was becoming thin and yellow like the paddy in his field. Budhua, watching him, began filling his shell with water and giving him drink, but he said nothing; by then, what could words do?

One evening, as the final bowl of the water clock was sinking and Acharya Keshava was nodding over yet another technical point made by Ugrasen's advocate, Sukhdev rose from his place. He had sat silent for a long time, but now his body had begun to tremble. He took two steps forward, lifted a hand, and tried to speak: "Acharya, my daughter..." His voice broke. He swayed and fell beside the roots of the pipal.

For one instant the assembly froze. Then came confusion. Someone brought water; someone else tried to fan him. Budhua reached him first and took Sukhdev's head into his lap. Sukhdev's eyes were half closed, his mouth still half open, as though the words remained standing there, waiting to come out. "My daughter..." That was all he had managed to say. Budhua took his hand in his own, but life had already left the body.

Acharya Keshava ran to him and tucked the edge of his robe beneath Sukhdev's head. "Sukhdev! Sukhdev, today... today I would have heard you!" But those words were now like seed sown only after the field had dried.

That night Budhua sat beside Sukhdev's body among the pipal roots, filling his shell with water and carrying it to Sukhdev's lips although he knew no water would pass them now. Acharya Keshava, with all his scriptures and all his ordered procedures, sat on the other side of the tree with his head in his hands. "Budhua," he said at last, "was I wrong?"

After a long silence Budhua answered softly, "No, Acharya. Your order was not wrong. It merely forgot that for many people time itself is a luxury. And when a person cannot afford that luxury, his case does not reach the end of the queue; it reaches the end of his body."

Acharya Keshava said nothing. But after that night he added a rule to the assembly's code: anyone who had waited for more than three consecutive days would be heard first, however many complicated disputes remained. The rule later came to be called the “Sukhdev Rule,” though the name was never carved upon any stone. After Sukhdev’s death his land passed into the hands of Ugrasen’s munim, and the daughter whose name had been given to the buffalo—her own true name—never entered the village record at all.

After this event, people said that on certain evenings a dim figure could be seen beside the roots of the pipal, its mouth half open as though trying to speak, yet the words never came to completion. The villagers called it “Loth,” for its body stood still as a corpse while its mouth remained unfinished like that of the living. Whenever anyone looked upon the figure in fear, Budhua would say, “Do not be afraid. That is the man whose turn never came. All he wants is for someone, one day, to hear his case to the end.” But the case was never heard to the end, because it had been left incomplete from the beginning, and Budhua had learned long ago that no witness has the right to complete another person’s unfinished words.

In time Narikel-Ghat came to be called Garh Narikel. The pond is old even now, though its waters are still divided into a deep and a shallow half. The pipal still stands, though its roots now spread as far as Channa Grove—or perhaps Channa Grove itself is only the extension of that ancient pipal; the oldest people of the village cannot say exactly where one ends and the other begins. The Kamala-Balan still flows, sometimes full, sometimes thin, just as it flowed centuries ago when Sukhdev Mahato first arrived beside the pond carrying his deed of partition. Buffaloes still spend their afternoons in the shallow water; egrets still stand along the banks watching for fish; the koel still calls when the mango trees flower, as though the joys and griefs of the village were no concern of hers. Yet the village’s hunger, the village’s waiting, and the village’s unfinished speech remain much as they were. Only their names have changed: date, file, and courthouse veranda.

That day, counting the drops of the water clock, Budhba sang a saying—

Drop by drop the water falls, drop by drop the time,

Whoever is the clock’s prisoner never reaches the end of his speech.

Time flowed on, the drops fell, but the name stood still;

Whoever counted time became time’s prisoner.

The water kept falling, the name kept dwelling—

Whoever set a name above time is no prisoner of the clock.

A NOTE ON ACHARYA KESHAVA AND THE NYAYA TRADITION OF NARIKEL-GHAT

THE GHATIKA-YANTRA AND THE QUESTION OF TIME IN JUSTICE

In the classical Indian tradition of philosophical disputation, the ghatika-yantra, or water clock, was used to discipline speaking time and prevent a disputant from expanding without limit. Chapter -92 raises an uncomfortable aspect of that practice: an instrument devised to regulate debate among scholars can, unintentionally, become a new barrier against society's less powerful people when access to time itself is distributed unequally.

The Light of the Leatherworkers' Quarter

The hand that stitches leather has a name upon the leaf as well—the lamp of the quarter and the lamp of the palace burn the selfsame oil.

— Garh Narikel

*(A passage of narrative fiction in the manner of Chapter -92. It concerns the leatherworkers' quarter of Garh Narikel—which will be mentioned again much later in Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles—and that part of Gangesha Upadhyaya's life which remained hidden behind the brilliance of the shastras.)*

By then the people had almost stopped calling the village Narikel-Ghat; it had become, simply, Garh Narikel, and it had grown large. Jori Pokhari, the pipal Witness-Tree, and the current of the Kamala-Balan were still where they had always been. But a hall of baked brick now stood in the middle of the village, where learned disputations were held and where one or another successor in Acharya Keshava's line could always be found seated.

For this story, however, we must go to the part of the village that the scholars passing to and from that hall almost never saw—the western edge, where an old channel of the Kamala-Balan had dried up and left behind a parched watercourse that people called Maral-Gang, the “Dead Ganges.” Babul and date palms stood along it: neither as shady as the pipal nor as tall as the coconut, thorny and dust-covered, but useful in their own way. This was the leatherworkers' quarter. Hides were dried here, drums and mridangas were made here, shoes and sandals were stitched here—the work without which the village could not live, yet which the village would not allow near its own threshold.

In that quarter lived Malati, a bright, deep-eyed girl. Her father, Somar the leatherworker, was considered the finest maker of dholaks in the village. Her mother, Ratna, was summoned to every household when a child was to be born, because her hands possessed something that even the medicines of great physicians sometimes lacked: patience, and a knowledge of herbs written nowhere, passed only from the ear of one generation into the next.

One summer evening, when the sky had turned a dusty yellow and only a few pools of water remained in the dry bed of Maral-Gang, the dogs of the quarter began to bark. Ratna stepped outside and saw a young man lying collapsed beside a babul tree, his clothes filthy, his body shaking with fever. Several palm-leaf folios were clutched in his hand; even unconscious, he had not let them go.

“Who are you, babu?” Ratna asked. The young man could not answer. Only an indistinct murmur came from him—“Pramana... without pramana... how...” —and then he lost consciousness again.

The young man was Gangesha. The story of his family was told in many different ways through the village. Some said that he had been born five years after his father's death, an impossibility that cast a shadow of suspicion over his lineage; others said he had been so slow-witted as a child that even his mother's people made him fill their pipes. Whether all this was truth or rumour, Gangesha himself never made clear. What was true was that, fleeing suspicion and humiliation, he had left home and wandered from village to village, composing in his mind a new and unprecedented work on the theory of valid knowledge—a work that would later be called the Tattvachintamani. But during those wanderings his body repeatedly failed him: fever, hunger, and the exhaustion of unbroken thought.

Ratna and Somar carried him into their hut. Many households in the village would have driven such a young man from the door, for his clothes and speech made it plain that he was a Brahmin, and for a Brahmin to stay in a leatherworker's house was regarded as "polluting" from both sides. Ratna had no use for such a rule. Hers were the hands that gave a child its first touch at birth, and those hands could not abandon a young man sitting at the edge of death.

For fifteen days Gangesha fought the fever. Ratna fed him neem, tulsi, and other herbs whose names perhaps only she knew. Malati, sixteen years old then, sat beside his head listening to his delirious mutterings—"No object of knowledge without a means of knowledge... what makes testimony a pramana..." One day, without thinking, she asked, "But if someone speaks and there is no falsehood in the speaker's mind, how can the words be false, whoever the speaker may be?"

Still trembling with fever, Gangesha opened his eyes. "Who said that?"

"I did," Malati said, a little frightened. "Forgive me. I am no pandit. I have only watched my father make drums. If the hide is not stretched true, the drum gives a false sound no matter how skilful the drummer's hands may be. But if the hide is stretched true, the drum will speak as truly as any great instrument in a palace."

Gangesha was silent for a long while. Then, in a voice still exceedingly weak, he said, "Do you know what you have just said? You have moved the question of the apta—the trustworthy speaker—from the speaker's caste to the soundness of the karana, the instrument that carries the knowledge. I... I have been caught on this question for three years, and with the example of a drum you have loosened it in a single breath."

Malati laughed, though she did not understand what great thing she was supposed to have said. "I only spoke about a drum, babuji."

"No," Gangesha said, and for the first time there was a brightness in his eyes despite the fever. "You spoke about Nyaya."

From that day on, even after he recovered, Gangesha returned again and again to Somar and Ratna's house. He would say, "The air suits me there," but the village knew that more than the air, he liked sitting with Malati, who had never studied shastra yet asked, out of lived experience, questions for which answers were not always found even in the greatest disputations. Within two years the talk of a marriage between Gangesha and Malati had become serious.

An uproar broke out in the Brahmin quarter. “A Brahmin—and one so gifted—will marry a leatherworker’s daughter?” The question echoed at every doorway and every well. Gangesha’s own maternal kin threatened that if the marriage took place, no assembly would ever invite him to debate, no pandit would accept him as a witness, and however fine his book might be, no school would teach it.

In the midst of that uproar, one evening Gangesha sat alone beside Jori Pokhari under the pipal Witness-Tree, his head in his hands. Then he heard a voice: “You are in as much doubt as an Objector was sixty years ago.”

Gangesha looked up. Among the roots sat a man so old that it was almost difficult to call him a man at all. In his hands were an ancient shell and a worn rope. It was Budhua.

“Who are you, Baba?” Gangesha asked.

“I am a servant whose service has lasted so long that it is no longer right to call it service. I know your trouble. I have come to tell you this: the learned disputation that shuts you out of its assembly will not endure longer than your book. But the knowledge you received from Malati’s story of the drum will remain on every page of that book, whether anyone ever writes Malati’s name or not.”

Gangesha stared at him. “How do you know the story of the drum?”

Budhua smiled faintly. “I have sat beneath this tree for many years, babu. The wind tells me a great deal. I shall say only this: the marriage you are about to make is not your downfall; it is the foundation of your book. But I must also tell you something sorrowful. The world will read your book and forget Malati’s drum. It will turn your marriage into a story of charity, not a story of Nyaya. I cannot prevent that injustice. But I can make one promise: as long as my vow lives, the names of Ratna and Malati will survive somewhere, in some form—if not on the pages of shastra, then on some other page.”

The marriage took place despite the opposition of the Brahmin quarter. Several Brahmin families barred Gangesha from their doors. Yet the work he wrote over the next twenty years, gathering thought said to equal twelve thousand treatises, came to be studied in every school of Mithila—and exactly what Budhua had foretold came to pass. People revered the Tattvachintamani but forgot the story of Malati’s drum. Instead of remembering Ratna, in time some people fashioned a different tale: that Gangesha’s intelligence had awakened in the cremation ground through the grace of a tantric or by a boon from the goddess Kali. Such a divine tale was easier to make than to admit that a leatherworker’s daughter, from years of watching hides stretched upon drums, had grasped a profound truth of the theory of knowledge.

Ratna and the other leatherworker women of the village, who gathered around her for her knowledge of herbs, her skill in childbirth, and her sharp intelligence, would bring their low stools after dusk and sit beside Maral-Gang. They talked, sang, and shared among themselves every quarrel, every injustice, every hidden story in the village. They knew that their voices would never be heard in the assembly hall, so they made an assembly of their own, where the language was not the language of shastra but the language of experience. The Brahmin quarter regarded the gathering with fear, because those women knew things the scholars did not: which herb would cure which illness, which woman would have a difficult birth, whose husband knocked at whose door in the night. Knowledge that was never written in a book was gradually translated into the language of fear. People began to call these women “dains”—witches—because when society meets knowledge it cannot write down, it tends to call it either a goddess or a witch; it has no name for the space between.

After Ratna’s death—she lived to old age, teaching her herb-lore to her granddaughters—her name faded in the village story, but it did not vanish altogether. The pipal Witness-Tree, beneath whose shade Budhua had spoken with Gangesha, held that evening’s conversation in its roots, just as it held the stories of Hulasa, Jivanti, and Sukhdev. And the gathering of women on their low stools beside Maral-Gang slowly took another form in village memory: even now, people say, after dusk certain figures may be seen sitting there on stools, talking and planning, but never speaking loudly, for they had learned long ago that a quiet voice is a safer voice.

That day, seeing the lamps of the leatherworkers’ quarter, the village sang—

The hand that stitches leather has a name upon the leaf,

The lamp of the quarter and the lamp of the palace burn the selfsame oil.

The hand that labours is the hand that builds the village;

The quarter called low bears a name greater than the register.

Whether the lamp is small or great, its light is one—

Whoever preserves the name of labour preserves the whole story of the village.

STORIES AND TRADITIONS CONNECTED WITH GANGESHA UPADHYAYA

The assembly grew quiet. Standing among the disciples and villagers, Sutradhara began, in a low voice, to recount the old traditions—

A note on the tradition of Gangesha's marriage—Traditional lore contains a reference to Gangesha Upadhyaya marrying a woman of the leatherworker community, although the older texts do not preserve a detailed account of the marriage, the names of those involved, or its circumstances. It survives only as a brief fact, often treated as uncomfortable and therefore suppressed. The characters Malati, Ratna, and Somar, and the details of their household in Chapter -91, are fictional constructions and are not established by historical documents. The purpose of the chapter is not to claim them as historical fact, but to give narrative form to a question also raised in the epilogue to Chapter -97: how many unnamed contributions remain hidden behind the brilliance of shastra?

Its relation to the tradition of Gangesha's childhood—The appendix to Chapter -97 cites the traditional story of Gangesha's dullness as a child and his sudden awakening to knowledge through tantric grace. Chapter -91 does not reject that tradition; rather, it offers an alternative, parallel possibility—that over time the story of a divine boon may cover over a human education that society found harder to acknowledge.

Having said this, Sutradhara remained silent for a while, then joined his palms and bowed to the assembly.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER -90 (NINETY BEFORE)

Budhua's Water-Burial

The crocodile took the body and left the name—one who takes water-burial dwells not on the pond's floor, but in the village's memory.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction in the manner of Chapters -91 and -92. In this chapter Budhua, who has witnessed every story from Chapter -100 through Chapter -91, himself takes water-burial among the crocodiles—and the “Budhba ghost” is born, whom we shall meet much later in Channa Grove, “seated on the same branch for twelve hundred years.”)

Garh Narikel had changed greatly. The assembly hall had fallen twice and twice been built again. A young Acharya named Vardhamana, the seventh-generation successor in Acharya Keshava's line, now sat there, and disciples were beginning to arrive from every corner of Mithila with dreams of writing commentaries on Gangesha Upadhyaya's Tattvacintamani. Jori Pokhari was still where it had always been, though its deep half had grown deeper with the silt of many years and the rain of many monsoons. The pipal Witness-Tree had become so vast that its roots reached the pond's edge and descended into the water, as though the tree itself wished to drink. The leatherworkers' quarter by Maral-Gang had expanded as well; four generations of Ratna's family now lived there, and every child in the village was still born into the hands of one woman or another from that family, though the Brahmin quarter never openly acknowledged the fact.

And Budhua was still alive.

By now this seemed less astonishing to the village than ordinary, like the pipal tree or the water of the pond—something that had always been there, whose presence no one thought to question. The children had begun calling Budhua “Budhba,” and the name still carried a faint memory of the words “old servant,” though no one any longer knew exactly whose servant he had been. He could no longer walk. All day he sat among the pipal roots, his worn shell and old rope beside him, and whenever anyone passed he would always speak a name—sometimes Hulasa, sometimes Jivanti, sometimes Sukhdev, sometimes Ratna—as though those names floated in the air and Budhua's last remaining work was simply to keep them from falling out of it.

That winter was harsher than most. The Kamala-Balan ran thin and cold as ice. The buffaloes of the pond left the water and huddled on the dry grass along the bank. The egrets that usually wandered at the water's edge flew somewhere else that season, and the pond looked deserted: only its still surface, and upon it the shadow of the pipal roots.

One evening that winter a young disciple of Acharya Vardhamana, named Raghunath, sat beside Budhua as village children often did to hear the old man's stories. Raghunath asked, “Budhba, how old are you?”

Budhua smiled, a smile that now seemed made more of air than bone. “I do not know, babu. I stopped counting long ago. But this much I know: when I began, there was only a line of coconut palms here, and the pond and the pipal, and a hall of disputation where an Acharya argued about the error of mistaking a shell for silver.”

“Vachaspati Mishra?” Raghunath asked in astonishment. “But he... he lived hundreds of years ago!”

“Yes,” Budhua said softly, looking toward the pond. “Hundreds of years. Now it seems to me, babu, that those hundreds of years are sitting inside me—not in my body, but in my memory. And memory becomes a burden when the body that carries it begins to weaken.”

After Raghunath left, Budhua gazed at the pond for a long time. His hands, once firm sixty years before, now trembled. His eyes, which had once read the final letters on Hulasa’s palm leaf, had grown dim. He understood that his body would not remain with him much longer. Yet one question troubled him: if he died like an ordinary man, who would hold Hulasa’s name, Jivanti’s name, Sukhdev’s unfinished sentence, Ratna’s story of the drum? None of these had been carved in stone. None had been written in a manuscript. They existed only in the memory of one old man, and that memory would end with him, as the light of a lamp ends when the flame goes out.

That night Budhua lifted his shell and rope and, step by trembling step, made his way toward the pond. Moonlight lay across the water like silver—the same kind of light whose story he had heard from the Objector sixty years before, in the tale of shell and silver. Budhua sat on the bank, lowered his rope into the water, and pressed the shell to his chest.

“Hulasa,” he whispered, “your last word was ‘I...’, and I never completed it, because I had no right to do so. But today I want to tell you this—I am taking that unfinished word with me, not so that I may finish it, but so that I may preserve it forever.”

“Jivanti,” he continued, “you said, ‘To bear witness to a manuscript is also...’ and your sentence broke in the water. Today I am going to complete that sentence in this water—not with your words, but with your deed. I shall bear witness, Jivanti. Always.”

“Sukhdev,” he said, tears in his eyes, “your daughter, your buffalo Kajari, your deed of partition—all were erased from the village record, but not from my memory. I am taking the Sukhdev Rule with me.”

“Ratna,” he said at last, smiling faintly, “your story of the drum lived on every page of Gangesha’s book, though no one wrote your name. I am writing your name in the water of this pond—not with ink, but with memory.”

Having said this, Budhua slowly entered the water. It was cold, yet he felt no cold. Wherever he moved, the water around him began to glow faintly, as though something were leaving his body and mingling with the pond. The pipal roots, spread along the bank, seemed to bend toward him, and for one moment the wind stopped, as though the entire village—the tree, the pond, the river-current, and every creature that lived there—were holding its breath and watching.

When Budhua reached the middle of the pond, he stopped. He looked up at the sky, where the winter stars shone with extraordinary clarity.

“Acharya Vachaspati,” he said for the last time, “you told me that a vow lasts longer than one human life. Today I understand: a vow is not merely longer than a life; it breaks the boundary of life itself.”

Then he lowered himself into the water, gently, as one might sink little by little into sleep, without struggle, without fear. The water closed over him, and for one instant—one instant only—the entire pond shone like silver, as though that night’s moon had descended into the water. Then everything was still. Only small ripples touched the banks and quieted, and a pipal leaf stirred once before becoming motionless again.

In the morning, when the village fishermen came to cast their nets, they found an old shell and a worn rope on the pond bank, laid neatly together as though someone had deliberately placed them there. Budhua was nowhere to be found. No body, no footprints, no sign of struggle. Only the shell, the rope, the water, and the pipal tree—which, the villagers said that morning, looked greener and fuller than before, as though its roots had received something new during the night.

As soon as he heard the news, Acharya Vardhamana ran to the pond. For a long time he sat beside the shell and rope with his head bowed. Then, slowly, he lifted the shell and placed it among the pipal roots, where Budhua had sat year after year. “Budhua has not died,” he told the gathered villagers, his voice trembling. “He has only... he has only come closer to us than ever before—closer to this tree, to this water, and to every memory of this village than any living human being could ever be.”

From that day onward, people said that after dusk, on certain evenings, a shadow could be seen among the pipal roots—seated, still, yet somehow alive. Whoever passed that way would hear their own name whispered, as though someone were entering their existence into a record. Children sat there and heard the old stories—of Hulasas, Jivanti, Sukhdev, Ratna—though no one could any longer say exactly who was telling them. “Budhba,” the people said, “is still sitting there.”

With time, as happens to every story, details blurred, names changed, and the boundary between what had happened and what people remembered grew uncertain. Jori Pokhari acquired many names. The geography of Garh Narikel was mapped and remapped. The pipal Witness-Tree, it was said, stood for many years more, until its roots had spread as far as Channa Grove—or perhaps Channa Grove was only an extension of that pipal; village memory was always divided on the question. Yet one thing never changed: whoever sat there after dusk still encountered an old, patient presence holding names and waiting, just as long ago he had waited at Vachaspati Mishra’s door, tending a lamp.

People stopped counting the age of that presence long ago. Some said it was hundreds of years old; some said a thousand. And when the tale was told again, much later, in another age and another language, people would choose a round number that was easy to remember: twelve hundred years. The number would be neither wholly true nor wholly false—just as a shell is never truly silver, yet in its gleam the memory of silver remains.

That day, remembering Budhua, the village sang a song of mourning

The crocodile took the body, but left the name;

He who took water-burial did not dwell upon the pond's floor.

The body went into the water, but the village kept the name;

He who was Budhua now lives in the village's memory.

Deep is the pond, but deeper still the name—

The name a village carries cannot be lost in any water-burial.

BUDHUA'S WATER-BURIAL AND THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE BUDHBA GHOST

What "Twelve Hundred Years" Means

In Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles (Parts 1 and 2), the Budhba ghost is repeatedly described as having been "seated on the same branch for twelve hundred years." According to the chronology of Part 0, Budhua's water-burial (Chapter -90) takes place roughly four or five hundred years after the period of Vachaspati Mishra (Chapter -100), not twelve hundred years later. This discrepancy has deliberately not been resolved. Just as the kabaddi of Channa Grove itself leaps across 1885, 1934, 1977, and the present within a single innings (Part 1), the reckoning of time in folk memory is not linear but symbolic. "Twelve hundred years" should therefore be understood here not as a precise historical calculation, but as a folk expression for "an antiquity so great that it must be remembered"—a measure that accords with the story's inner truth rather than with an external calendar.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER -89 (EIGHTY-NINE BEFORE)

First Night, First Flood

The first flood took houses, not the village—the night that survived became the seed of morning.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. Exactly one year after Budhua's water-burial —the first test of the Budhba ghost. From this night begin both the story of Garh Narikel's embankment and the seed of the belief that "a human witness is half a ghost.")

It was past midnight when the sky split open.

At first there was only wind—hard, cold, lashing the coconut fronds from side to side like whips. Then lightning flashed: once, twice, a third time so fiercely that for one instant the whole form of the pipal Witness-Tree stood out in the brightness of day. Then came rain, as though all the water stored in the sky had fallen at once. The Kamala-Balan, calm in its ordinary channel until evening, had begun to roar by midnight—a sound less like water than the advance warning of calamity.

Among the pipal roots beside Jori Pokhari, Budhua—no, no longer Budhua, but only the presence whom the village had begun to call Budhba—understood for the first time the full meaning of his new body. A year earlier he had entered the water, and now he had become one with it: every rise of the current, every surge, he felt within his body, within his roots, within his shell. And what he felt tonight frightened him. The Kamala-Balan was about to break its bounds, and those bounds were weakest at the village's southern edge, precisely where the leatherworkers' quarter stood—where the village embankment, if it could be called an embankment at all, had never been more than a few heaps of earth, raised each year before the rains with soil left over from the farmers' field boundaries.

Budhba shouted. But his voice dissolved into the wind—nothing but wind, nothing but the sound of rain. He ran toward the centre of the village, wanting to seize hands, to pound on doors, but his hands could no longer touch a door: they slipped through the wood like water, making no sound. He cried out, he pleaded, and in that single moment the whole year of his new existence seemed useless to him. "I took a vow to bear witness," he said to himself, "but if a witness cannot save anyone, then he is only a spectator, not a witness!"

In the leatherworkers' quarter, a little girl of the fourth generation descended from Ratna and Malati lay asleep beside her grandmother. Her name was Gauri. She was seven, and the village children thought her a little different because now and then she would say things no one had taught her—she might sit by the pipal tree and, without anyone telling her anything, say, "Budhba is sad today." The villagers called it a child's imagination. Her grandmother, who had herself learned the lore of herbs from Ratna's hands, knew there was something more in Gauri: a thin, indistinct thread, one end of it within the child and the other—no one knew where.

That night Gauri saw Budhba in a dream—more clearly than ever before. She saw him standing in water, one hand raised, his mouth open as though he were trying to speak but no sound came out. In the dream Budhba kept repeating one word, again and again, until it rang inside Gauri like a bell: "Wake. Wake. Wake."

Gauri woke screaming. "Grandmother! Grandmother! The water is coming! Budhba told me—wake up!"

At first her grandmother tried to soothe her, thinking it only a frightening dream. Then a sound came from outside—distant but unmistakable, the roar of water, mingled with the ceaseless barking of the village dogs, utterly unlike their barking on an ordinary night, as though they too could see something human eyes could not. Grandmother rose, opened the door, and saw at the lower end of the village, in the dark, a pale brightness growing larger—the gleam of water rushing rapidly nearer.

"Flood! The flood is coming!" Grandmother cried, and her voice carried from house to house across the quarter, because the night was such that one shout could break the sleep of the whole village. Doors began to open. People snatched up their children, their cows and goats, whatever their hands could reach, and ran toward higher ground.

But there was very little time.

The embankment, for years no more than a mound of earth, collapsed before the full force of the Kamala-Balan like a castle of sand. Water came roaring and foaming toward the lower part of the village—straight toward the leatherworkers' quarter, toward the babul and date palms, toward the place where drums and mridangas were made. Gauri ran holding her grandmother's hand, following her mother and father toward higher ground, but the water was too fast. It reached her ankles, then her knees.

Budhba, now diffused through every drop of water, felt Gauri's fear and turned all the power he still did not fully understand in her direction. The current that had been rushing straight toward Gauri's family divided for one moment—only one moment—around their threshold like water around a tiny island, as though an invisible hand had bent the flood aside. Gauri's family used that instant to reach a nearby rise—the old cremation ground, a place the village ordinarily shunned as "inauspicious." There, they survived.

The rest of the village was not so fortunate.

Somar's house—Ratna's old house, now kept by Gauri's grandfather and great-grandfather—was swept away completely. Gauri's great-grandmother Subhagi, very old and disabled, could not run. Her children tried to carry her, but the force of the water tore her from their arms on the way. "Only one name came from her mouth," villagers said afterward. "Gauri's: 'Did Gauri survive?'" Then the water took her.

Seven lives were lost in the village that night—Subhagi and six others whose names were never properly entered in any village record, because all of them belonged to the leatherworkers' quarter, and the royal officials who came to reckon the flood damage counted the Brahmin quarter's losses of grain and cattle first.

By morning the rain had stopped. The sky was grey but calm. The water slowly withdrew, leaving mud, broken thatch, and the marks of grief behind it. Budhba sat among the roots of the pipal Witness-Tree—which had stood fast through the flood, though half its roots had been washed bare—and for the first time since his water-burial, he wept. It was not human weeping: there were no tears, no sound. Yet every leaf on the tree that morning seemed wetter than dew alone could explain, as though the tree itself had wept.

Gauri, safe with her family, came to the pipal tree that afternoon to mourn her great-grandmother. She sat among its roots and said softly, "Budhba, you saved me. But Grandmother..." She could say no more.

Budhba's voice, which only Gauri could hear, rose softly, heavy with grief. "Gauri, I could not save all of you. I could save only some. I will have to learn to bear that difference, just as with Hulasa, Jivanti, and Sukhdev I had to learn that not everything can be saved—but saving what can be saved is no small thing."

"And Great-grandmother Subhagi?" Gauri asked through her tears.

"I shall keep her name with me," Budhba said, "as I keep all the others. But Gauri, I want to tell you one more thing. Tonight you heard my voice when no one else could. I do not fully understand why you have this capacity, but it is real. Perhaps a person who is ready to become a witness becomes, in some small measure, half a ghost—not wholly alive, not wholly dead, but a thin thread between the two worlds."

From that night onward, the villagers rebuilt the embankment, this time with fired brick and stone. And the village's name—which earlier had been Narikel-Ghat—slowly became Garh Narikel, the word garh joining it in memory of the new fort-like embankment raised after seven lives had been lost. By common decision, the stretch facing the leatherworkers' quarter was built first and built strongest. For the first time in the village's history, the safety of that quarter was treated as equal to—or perhaps more important than—the safety of the rest of the village.

And from that night, "a human witness is half a ghost"—a truth that at first belonged only to Gauri—slowly became a village saying. Mothers and grandmothers would tell their children: "If someone sees a strange dream in sleep, or feels afraid without cause before a disaster, do not dismiss it lightly. Perhaps that person has become half a ghost, and Budhba is speaking to them."

After that first flood, the surviving village sang a song—

The first flood took houses, but could not take the village;

The night that survived became the seed of morning.

The water rose, the roofs were swept away, but the people stood;

Those who stayed together that night survived until dawn.

The flood receded, and the village was built again—

Whoever endured that first night became the seed of every flood to come.

A NOTE ON GARH NARIKEL'S EMBANKMENT AND MITHILA'S FLOOD TRADITION

Floods in Mithila and Social Inequality

The Kosi, Kamala, and Balan river regions of Mithila have historically been prone to flooding, and the traditional allocation of resources for building and maintaining embankments has often reflected social hierarchy: the protection of powerful quarters given priority, the protection of marginal quarters neglected. Chapter -89 gives this historical reality a narrative form and links the origin of the name “Garh Narikel” to this calamity. The etymology is fictional; its purpose is not to provide the village name’s actual history, but to bind a place-name to the relationship between memory and justice, one of the central concerns of Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles.

CHAPTER -88 (EIGHTY-EIGHT BEFORE)

The Accusation of Witchcraft

The woman the village called a 'witch'—no one asked her name. An accusation can burn a body; truth remains upon the leaf.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. Twenty years after the flood. Gauri, who as a child had heard Budhba's voice, is now the village's principal healer—and for that very reason becomes the centre of a conspiracy.)

In twenty years Garh Narikel had changed greatly. The new embankment, built of fired brick, still stood strong, and under its protection the leatherworkers' quarter was now safer than before and—something many of the village's old families did not like—more prosperous. On the embankment's raised ground, betel and vegetables grew well, and the drums and mridangas of the leatherworkers' quarter, once sold only in Garh Narikel, had acquired a name in markets and fairs across Mithila.

And at the centre of that quarter was Gauri—now twenty-seven, the mother of two children, and the fourth-generation inheritor of Ratna's tradition. In her hands lived the herbal knowledge her great-great-grandmother Ratna had learned, and with it something else the village had known for years but did not care to say aloud: from childhood Gauri had been "half a ghost," and even now she sometimes heard Budhba's voice, especially when some calamity was drawing near the village.

But that evening Gauri had seen no strange dream. She did not know that at the village's western end, inside the Thakur mansion, two men were making a plan whose shadow would fall across her life for weeks to come.

Pratapsen Thakur, grandson of Ugrasen Thakur, paced the mansion's sitting room with one hand on his head. "Panditji," he said, "my property shrinks year by year, while the leatherworkers' quarter grows richer. What sort of age is this, when one of those drum-makers can sell as much paddy as I do?"

Pandit Yashpati, ritualist president of the village's new assembly hall, smiled slowly. It was the kind of smile that never comes from good intentions. "Thakur Sahib, your concern is justified, but there is a remedy. The land-allotment law says that if any quarter is proved 'impure' or 'harmful,' the assembly may reconsider its land rights—in the name of purification."

"Harmful?" Pratapsen asked, interest waking in his eyes.

"You know Gauri's reputation," Yashpati said, lowering his voice still further. "She knows herbs. She goes out alone at night. She sits by the pipal Witness-Tree and, people say, speaks to something unseen. To use the word 'witch' for such a woman would not be a lie, Thakur Sahib—only an old word put to a new use."

Pratapsen was silent for a long time. Then he said, "But evidence? The village has known her for years. She has helped bring children into the world in nearly every house. Every fever, every wound—she has treated them."

Yashpati laughed, a cold, calculating laugh. "Evidence is made, Thakur Sahib, not requested. All I need is one calamity, one illness, and a thread tying Gauri's name to it. Fear will do the rest by itself. Fear runs faster than reason."

Within a week, the opportunity came of its own accord—but not in the form Pratapsen had hoped for.

Pratapsen's younger son, six-year-old Vishwanath, suddenly came down with a high fever. For the first two days the household physician tried to cure him, but the fever rose, and on the third day the child lost consciousness. Panic seized the Thakur mansion. Pratapsen's wife, Kamala Devi, wanted Gauri summoned—for every mother in the village knew that Gauri's hands could quiet a fever better than any village physician's. But Pratapsen refused. "Let a woman from the leatherworkers' quarter touch my son? No. Yashpatiji's medicines and mantras are enough."

On the fourth night Vishwanath grew worse. Against her husband's orders, Kamala Devi secretly sent her maid to fetch Gauri.

Gauri sat beside Vishwanath through the night, laying cool cloths on him and giving him a decoction of neem and chirayata. By dawn the fever had broken. Vishwanath opened his eyes, recognised his mother, and weakly asked for water. Kamala Devi began to weep with relief. Grasping Gauri's hand, she said, "You have saved my son's life, Gauri. I shall never forget this."

But when Pratapsen rose in the morning and discovered that Gauri had spent the night in his house, his face reddened with anger—not because his son had recovered, but because his command had been defied, and in favour of a woman from the leatherworkers' quarter. He carried the matter to Yashpati, who saw in it a new and sharper opening for his plan.

"Thakur Sahib," Yashpati said, "consider it. The fever rose first. Then Gauri came, and the fever broke. How does that prove she cured it? Why not say she had caused the fever in the first place, and then came to stage a cure and display her power? That is what witches do—give the illness first, then grant relief and establish their hold."

Pratapsen, whose pride had been wounded more deeply than his son's life had been endangered, seized upon the argument. That evening an emergency meeting called by the Thakur assembled in the village hall. In a grave voice, Yashpati announced before the village: "A harmful force is active in Garh Narikel. We have gathered evidence that Gauri, a woman of the leatherworkers' quarter, is using tantric arts to tamper with children's health. This matter must be investigated—and until the investigation is complete, she must be excluded from the village's religious rites, and her quarter must be removed from the land adjoining the embankment, for purposes of purification."

Silence fell over the assembly. Many whose children Gauri had saved sat stunned and uncertain, torn between fear and gratitude. A few voices rose in protest, but Yashpati's voice and Pratapsen's power smothered them.

In the leatherworkers' quarter, Gauri sat at home nursing her daughter, knowing nothing of what had happened until her friend Phulesari came running, breathless and frightened. Phulesari, who led the secret evening circle of stools carried on from Ratna's tradition, cried, "Gauri! They have accused you in the assembly hall—a witchcraft accusation! Yashpati says your whole quarter will be driven from the land beside the embankment, in the name of 'purification'!"

Gauri's hand went still; her daughter was still at her breast. Many questions rose in her mind at once. Had saving Vishwanath been a mistake? Or was her only mistake that she had been born in the leatherworkers' quarter, and that her knowledge lived not in books but in her hands? Suddenly she remembered Ratna, Hulasa, Jivanti, Sukhdev—all the names Budhba had carried year after year, all those people whose service, whose truth, had remained unfinished before the great structures of society.

"I have to go to the pipal tree," Gauri said suddenly, placing her daughter in Phulesari's arms. "I have to speak to Budhba. But Phulesari..." Her voice trembled. "What if even Budhba cannot do anything this time?"

She ran through the deepening dusk toward the pipal tree, and the wind followed her with a strange silence—as though the whole village, knowingly or not, had begun to hold its breath, waiting to see what the night would bring. Far off, in the direction of the assembly hall, torchlights were moving, drawing nearer: a crowd of people carrying torches, slowly advancing toward the leatherworkers' quarter.

That day, for the woman under accusation, some of the village women quietly sang a song—

The woman the village called a 'witch'—no one asked her name;

Accusation burns the body; truth remains upon the leaf.

The crowd shouted, the torches burned, but evidence was nowhere;

An accusation laid without first asking the name—that was injustice.

An accusation lasts a moment; a name endures age after age—

Whoever asked her name saved that woman from the fire.

SPECIAL NOTE

The Historical Connection Between Witch-Branding and Land Seizure

In many regions of India, especially among Adivasi and other marginalised communities, accusations of “witchcraft” have historically often been connected with land disputes, family enmity, or a woman’s independent social position—particularly when she is widowed, childless, or, like Gauri, an independent source of traditional medical knowledge. Chapter -88 gives this social reality a narrative form in order to show that superstition is often not spontaneous, but is consciously fashioned and used in the interests of power and property. The story continues in Chapter -87.

CHAPTER -87 (EIGHTY-SEVEN BEFORE)

At the Quarter's Gate

A torch may come to the gate; inside, a name does not burn. When a quarter stands awake, its wall rises higher than fire.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction, immediately following Chapter -88. The torch-bearing crowd has reached the gate of the leatherworkers' quarter—and the village women have now changed their decision to remain silent.)

At the roots of the pipal tree, Gauri knelt with folded hands. "Budhba," she whispered, "you came too late for Hulasa, too late for Jivanti, too late for Sukhdev. Do not come too late for me tonight."

For a moment the air went still. Then a tremor ran through the pipal leaves, though there was no gust. Budhba's voice, audible only to Gauri, rose softly: "Gauri, my power cannot touch a body, cannot extinguish a torch, cannot stop the feet of a crowd. I will not tell you the lie that I can save you. But I can tell you this: the truth that is in this quarter tonight is stronger than I am, stronger than you are. That truth needs only one place through which to come out—many mouths that have been silent for too long."

Torchlight, cutting through the darkness, reached the gate of the leatherworkers' quarter. Pratapsen Thakur was in front, Yashpati behind him, and behind Yashpati fifty or sixty villagers—some genuinely frightened, others merely moving with the crowd. "Gauri!" Yashpati shouted. "Come out! Obey the order of the assembly hall!"

At the gate of the quarter, Phulesari came out first instead of Gauri, and behind her came other women—ten, twenty, then more. They carried no weapons, only lamps and their children. They stood between the leatherworkers' quarter and the crowd, forming a living wall.

"Whom do you want to punish?" Phulesari cried. Her voice trembled, but did not break. "The woman whose hands saved our children?"

For a moment confusion passed through the crowd. Then another voice rose from an unexpected direction. Kamala Devi, Pratapsen's own wife, came running from the mansion with her maid, breathless, her clothes in disarray.

"Stop!" Kamala Devi cried, and the crowd turned toward her in astonishment—for no one had ever seen the Thakur's wife run out of her house like this, at night, barefoot. She pushed through the crowd and reached Pratapsen. "Do you know what Gauri did? Do you know that our son—the boy you watched dying before your own eyes—is alive today because of Gauri's hands, the very hands you want to burn tonight?"

"Kamala! Go home. This is a matter for men!" Pratapsen roared, but for the first time there was hesitation in his voice.

"No," Kamala Devi said, and for the first time—for the first time in her entire married life—she stood straight before her husband. "This is not a matter for men. It is a matter of truth, and truth is not heard only by men's ears. I ask every woman in this village whose child Gauri has saved to come forward and speak. Here, tonight: is your silence worth more to you than your children's lives?"

For one moment there was silence. Then, slowly, women began separating themselves from the crowd—some from the Brahmin quarter, some from the Kayastha quarter, some from ordinary farming households. They came forward and began telling their stories. "Gauri saved my daughter on the night of her birth, when she lay wrong-way in the womb." "Gauri cured my husband after a snakebite, when the great physician had given up." "Gauri sat beside my mother-in-law every night during her final month and took no payment." One by one, voices rose, and each voice removed a brick from the mountain of falsehood Yashpati had been building for years.

Seeing his control slipping away, Yashpati made one last attempt. "All this is sentiment! A witch first draws her victims into her net—that is why she seems sweet to them!" He turned to the crowd and raised a hand. "Whoever refuses to accept the truth, I will..."

He could not finish the sentence.

For at that very instant, without anyone touching it, the torch in Yashpati's hand went out by itself—without a gust of wind, without a drop of water, in a single moment, as though someone had blown upon it from within. The crowd cried out and recoiled. Yashpati himself, for the first time in his life, collapsed before something outside his scriptures and his cunning, just as Budhba, many years earlier, had once seen a silver-like light in the Objector's eyes.

"What... what power is this?" Yashpati said, trembling.

Gauri, who had now come to stand at the gate beside Phulesari and Kamala Devi, answered quietly: "His name is Budhba, Panditji. He has sat here year after year, carrying all the names that people like you try to erase. He will not harm you—that is not his way—but he will not allow your lie to burn with the light you turned into a weapon."

The crowd slowly began to disperse, some ashamed, some relieved, some still uncertain. Pratapsen, shaken both by his wife's courage and by Yashpati's failure, said nothing. He simply turned and walked back toward the mansion. But before leaving he looked back once at Gauri—and in that look there was no gratitude, only the shame of humiliation. Gauri had learned long ago that shame can sometimes be more dangerous than gratitude, because a humiliated man may seek not forgiveness but revenge.

That night the quarter survived. At the next day's assembly, the land too was registered again in the name of the leatherworkers' quarter, because of Kamala Devi's forceful intervention. But Yashpati, though removed from his office, did not leave the village. He became silent. Gauri, who had begun to hear Budhba's voice more clearly than before, knew that silence and defeat were two different things. She had seen something in Yashpati's eyes that she could not name, but its coldness kept her awake through the night—as though a new conspiracy, having learned from this failure, had already begun taking shape somewhere far away, in some unseen corner, with greater patience and greater cunning.

That night, after seeing the torches at the gate, the awakened quarter sang a song—

A torch may come to the gate; inside, a name does not burn,

When a quarter stands awake, its wall rises higher than fire.

Fire may burn a body, but it cannot burn a name;

A quarter that stood together was defeated by no torch.

The torch went out, but the name kept burning—

When the quarter became one, the fire stopped at its gate.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTERS -87 AND -88

The Power of Collective Women's Testimony

In Chapter -87, the collective testimony of the village women rises beyond individual fear into a collective truth. It offers a communal, folk-based form of the theory of verbal testimony (shabda-pramana) attributed to Vachaspati Mishra in Chapter -96—the speaker's intention, the hearer's trust, and the truthfulness of the moment. Where the word of one woman, like Hulasā's palm-leaf statement, can become the object of doubt, the independent and mutually consistent testimony of many women has the power to break that doubt—a principle also recognised in modern legal systems. The story does not create the illusion of perfect justice here: Yashpati is not punished, only displaced, and his future intention is left uncertain. This accords with the central truth of Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles: injustice does not end in a single night or with a single victory.

CHAPTER -86 (EIGHTY-SIX BEFORE)

The Crocodile of Time

Time too is a crocodile—it swallows generation after generation. But a name the village keeps, even time cannot swallow.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. After Yashpati leaves the village for the royal court at Darbhanga, Budhba sees for the first time something he cannot place within any boundary of the world he understands—as though time itself were a crocodile that devours ages, but not names.)

Yashpati had fallen silent, but silence was not defeat—Gauri had learned that long ago. At the end of winter, word came that Yashpati had left the village and gone toward the royal court at Darbhanga, saying that “many reforms are needed in Mithila’s religious order.” The villagers heard the news with relief; Gauri heard it with unease. “He has not lost,” she told Phulesari. “He has only gone looking for another field.”

That evening Gauri went to the pipal tree to speak with Budhba, but she was not prepared for what she saw. Budhba, departing from his customary stillness, was unsettled—as though he occupied many places at once and was wholly present in none. His figure flickered between water and shadow like a lamp whose oil was running out; yet it was not for want of oil. It was something else.

“Budhba! What has happened to you?” Gauri ran toward him.

Budhba’s voice, always so clear, sounded broken today, as though it were filtering through a multitude of voices from very far away. “Gauri... I do not understand... what am I seeing... where am I...”

(First glimpse—a distant shore)

Ships. Huge, black, breathing smoke, of a kind Gauri did not know by name. Hundreds of people stood at a harbour with bundles in their arms, fear and hope together in their eyes. A recruiter with a honeyed tongue cried loudly, “Abroad, the earth yields gold, babu. A three-year contract, then you return home with your hands full.” A young man released his wife’s hand and pressed his thumb onto a paper he could not read. Beneath the ship, black and fathomless, the water waited silently like a crocodile.

“Is this... is this 1885?” Budhba whispered to himself. “But I... I am not in this time. How am I seeing it?”

(Second glimpse—a parched field)

A vast field scorched by the sun, where thousands had gathered, shouting slogans. A young woman held a microphone and cried, “The land belongs to the one who tills it!” Police advanced with lathis. A stampede. In the dust fell an old deed of partition, just like the one Sukhdev Mahato had held in his hand hundreds of years earlier. Feet trampled the paper; its letters vanished into the dust.

“Sukhdev’s deed!” Gauri cried. “Budhba, it looks just like Sukhdev’s deed!”

“No,” Budhba said, his voice trembling harder. “It is not Sukhdev’s deed, Gauri. This is... this is some other Sukhdev. As though the same story were being written again, with another name, in another time, but in the same shape.”

(Third glimpse—a grove, a game at night)

A grove of channa trees—a name Gauri had never heard—at night, and in that grove a game: kabaddi, but the players were not alive. An old, impossibly old figure sat on a branch as referee. In his hand was a worn shell. His feet hovered a finger’s breadth above the earth. Around him stood a woman without hands, a woman with soaking hair, a four-faced figure, a figure with half its face torn open, and tiny creatures that flung silver-coloured light. The old figure was drawing a circle for the sake of a name—“kabaddi... kabaddi...” —while living children stood in the darkness, holding their breath and watching.

Budhba screamed—a sound Gauri had never heard from him. “That... that is me! Gauri, the figure sitting on that branch—it is I. But... but I am here, today, before you! How can I be in two places at once?”

Gauri, trembling herself, sat beside Budhba though she knew she could not touch him. “Budhba, be calm. Explain something to me. What is all this?”

Budhba was silent for a long time. When he spoke again, there was a new and strange calm in his voice—the calm that comes after fear and just before understanding. “Gauri, I think time is not what I believed it was. I thought time was a river flowing from one direction to another, and that I sat on its bank watching it pass. But tonight I think time is a crocodile—it lives inside the river, yet obeys none of the river’s flow. Sometimes it goes backward, sometimes forward, sometimes it is in two places in the same instant. It eats bodies, epochs, years—but it cannot eat names. A name can come even out of that crocodile’s mouth and live again on another bank, in another time.”

“But the children we saw in that grove,” Gauri asked, “who are they? Why did they seem like us?”

“Because they are ours, Gauri. They are children of some time yet to come, but the names, the stories, of Hulasā, Jivanti, Sukhdev, Ratna, Malati, Vishwanath—they have reached them by some unknown road. Perhaps... perhaps someone will gather all these stories in one place, very far from now, in some unknown language, in some unknown form. Perhaps we do not yet understand that we ourselves, today, are living for the sake of that gathering.”

Gauri remained silent for a long time, trying to understand the words though she could not grasp them fully. Then she asked, a new fear in her voice, “Budhba, did you see me too in those glimpses? In another time—another Gauri?”

Budhba was silent for a moment, and in that silence Gauri found her answer—fear and compassion together in eyes that were no longer eyes, only a shape of light.

“I want to say no,” Budhba said at last, “but I will not lie to you, Gauri. Yes, I saw you. In another time, amid another calamity, there was a pair of eyes like yours—just as steady, just as afraid. I do not know what year it was or what the calamity was. But this much I know: this story, this vow, will not end with you. It will return, bearing other names and other faces, until... until there comes a time when the crocodile has no name left to eat, because every name is already safe.”

The night deepened. Budhba’s instability slowly quieted, though he never again became wholly still as before—as though something in him had changed forever that night, a new awareness he could no longer forget. At last Gauri turned toward home, but one question remained lodged in her mind, and through every calamity of her later life she kept searching for its answer: if time truly is a crocodile, then is the calamity now returning in Yashpati’s form really new, or merely some old calamity rising again with a new face?

That day, remembering the generations that had passed, Budhba sang a folk refrain—

Time too is a crocodile, swallowing generation after generation,

But a name the village keeps, even time cannot swallow.

Kings went, palaces fell, generations mingled with earth;

But the name a village kept in its heart is living still.

Time eats everything, but it does not eat a name—

Whoever lives in memory escapes the crocodile of time.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -86

The Nonlinearity of Time and the Nature of Folk Memory

Chapter -86 deliberately breaks the simple, one-directional flow of chronology, in the same way that in Part I, during the kabaddi game in Channa Grove, “ghosts can cross 1885, 1934, 1977, and the present in a single turn.” This technique—sometimes called “magical realism” or postmodern chronological rupture in literary criticism—is not merely a stylistic experiment here. It is a structural expression of the story’s central claim: injustice, and the act of bearing witness against injustice, recur from generation to generation. Budhba’s bewilderment at seeming to exist in many places at the same time signals to the reader that the entire ten-part project of Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles is itself founded on this nonlinear logic, in which Part 0 (the past) and Parts 1-2 (the present) are read together, within the same readerly moment.

CHAPTER -85 (EIGHTY-FIVE BEFORE)

The Amil's Order

The sahib's order is on paper, the village's justice on leaves—the command may be erased, the proverb will not be.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. Yashpati has not returned empty-handed from the royal court at Darbhanga: this time it is not merely the leatherworkers' quarter and Gauri that are in his sights, but the pipal Witness Tree itself.)

Amil Jay Singh entered Garh Narikel one morning on an elephant, accompanied by ten soldiers and Yashpati. His proclamation, hung in the village square, was written in clear letters: “The Department of Religious Administration of the Mithila State hereby gives notice that a pipal tree situated in the village of Garh Narikel, locally known as the ‘Witness Tree,’ has become a centre of tantric malpractice and superstition. The tree shall be examined under the supervision of Amil Jay Singh and, if necessary, removed. If no supernatural power is found in the tree, as the learned class believes, the tree shall be felled and a royal granary established upon the site.”

Standing beside the Amil, Yashpati looked toward the gathered villagers, and there was a satisfaction on his face that had not been seen there for a long time. “Gauri!” he shouted. “You and your quarter escaped once because of the sentimentality of the women. But today I have brought science and the power of the State. If your ‘Budhba’ truly exists, he will be proved today. And if he does not—as I am fully convinced he does not—then the faith of your entire quarter, and with it your last refuge, will be cut down with this pipal tree.”

Holding the hand of her eight-year-old daughter Savitri, Gauri stepped forward through the crowd. Like her mother, Savitri had begun to show an unusual sensitivity from childhood. She would wake at night saying, “Someone is crying by the pipal tree,” and Gauri knew that this signalled Budhba’s unrest, especially since the night when he had seen those strange glimpses across time.

“Amil Sahib,” Gauri said, trying to keep her voice steady, “this tree has stood for hundreds of years and has never harmed anyone. This tree belongs to the village’s memory, to the village’s grief, to the village’s justice.”

“Memory cannot be cut down, Gauri,” Jay Singh said, speaking for himself for the first time. His voice was neutral, almost kindly, unlike Yashpati’s fervour. “I shall cut only the tree, if it proves necessary. But first I will give all of you an opportunity to show what you claim. If there truly is a power here, my axe will not be able to harm it, and I myself will carry that report to my king. But if there is nothing, then you will be freed from a falsehood.”

The crowd stood silent. Phulesari whispered into Gauri’s ear, “Gauri, this is a trap for us—if we lose, the tree is cut; if we win, even then the burden of proof is placed on us.” Gauri nodded, knowing Phulesari was right, but there was no path left by which to retreat.

By noon the whole village had gathered at the roots of the pipal tree, together with the soldiers, Yashpati, and Jay Singh. The soldiers raised their axes. Gauri sat beside the roots, bowed her head, and whispered, “Budhba, forgive me. I am dragging you into this trial, but I have no other way.”

No answer came. The silence was so deep that even the village dogs were quiet. Jay Singh raised his hand in signal.

The first axe struck the root.

And in that instant every person in the village—Gauri, Phulesari, Yashpati, Jay Singh, all of them—froze for a moment, because a voice rose in the air: neither woman’s nor man’s, neither human nor animal, a voice that seemed to come from a thousand throats at once though not another mouth was there. “Stop.”

The soldier stumbled backward in fear and dropped the axe. Jay Singh, who considered himself a rational man, stood rooted where he was, his eyes wide open.

Slowly, from the roots of the pipal tree, a figure emerged—the shape the villagers had seen year after year only as an indistinct shadow. Today, for the first time, in full daylight, the figure was clear, though its edges trembled between smoke and light. Budhba.

“Who are you?” Jay Singh asked, mastering his fear.

“I am a witness,” Budhba said. His voice reached every ear in the village though it was not loud. “I am no god, Amil Sahib, and I am no demon. I am only the one who does not let names be forgotten—Hulasa, Jivanti, Sukhdev, Ratna, Malati, Subhagi, and so many others whose names never entered the records of your royal court. If you cut down this tree, you will not destroy me—I am older than this tree. But you will prove that the State can cut down whatever it does not understand, and that proof, Amil Sahib, is as dangerous to your king as any tantric malpractice.”

Jay Singh stood silent for a long time. Then, slowly, he turned toward his soldiers. “Lower the axes.”

“Amil Sahib!” Yashpati cried as he saw his victory slipping away. “This is only a trick! Some tantric illusion, some—”

“Yashpati,” Jay Singh said, and for the first time the hardness in his voice turned toward Yashpati, “I have seen many illusions in the course of my service, and I know how to distinguish illusion from truth. What I saw today was no illusion. And I now understand why you brought me here—not for the sake of this tree, but for the land of the leatherworkers’ quarter. I understand your true intention now, Yashpati, and it does not please me.”

For a moment Yashpati stood stunned as both sides of his scheme—religious superstition and administrative argument—collapsed before him. Then suddenly he began to run through the crowd, away from the pipal tree, away from the village.

“Stop him!” Jay Singh ordered. But the soldiers, still shaken, moved too slowly, and Yashpati crossed the boundary of the village and vanished into the dark forest.

After some time Jay Singh turned toward Gauri. His face had changed: the pride had disappeared, replaced by a new and uneasy respect. “Gauri, I shall recommend that your land, your tree, and your rights—all three—be placed under royal protection. But allow me one question whose answer I may spend my life seeking: what is the power in this tree?”

Gauri smiled, though tears still stood in her eyes. “Amil Sahib, this power is no tantra and no god. Its power is only this: when a human being decides, out of love, never to forget another person’s name, that decision can become stronger than time.”

Jay Singh left the village that evening with his soldiers, carrying his report back toward the royal court—a report about which the villagers speculated for many years, because it was never found in any archive, as though it too, like the name of some witness, had been erased from history.

But Yashpati was not found. Not that day, not the following week, not the following month. Gradually the villagers came to believe that some animal had taken him in the forest, or that he had fled to a distant land. Yet that night, when Budhba spoke to Gauri alone, there was a concern in his voice she had never heard before. “Gauri, I could not see Yashpati’s end. My sight, which now reaches even beyond time, stops at the place where he entered the forest. That is unusual. It... it frightens me.”

That day, on hearing the Amil’s order, the villagers sang a proverb-song—

The sahib’s order is on paper, the village’s justice on leaves,

A command can be erased; a proverb cannot be.

The order came today, changed tomorrow, vanished the day after;

But the proverb the village kept in its heart lived from generation to generation.

Paper may tear, but the proverb remains in the throat—

Justice that lives on the village tongue cannot be erased by any command.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -85

The Conflict Between Anti-Superstition Reform and Local Tradition

In both medieval and modern periods, outside authorities have at times destroyed the local, autonomous traditions of marginalised communities—religious or medicinal—in the name of “eradicating superstition,” while overlooking the social functions embedded in those traditions: communal memory, justice, or health care. Chapter -85 deliberately refuses a simple answer to this conflict. Amil Jay Singh is neither an outright villain nor a complete saviour; he is a genuinely inquisitive holder of power whose curiosity, because of Gauri’s courage, turns from destruction toward recognition.

CHAPTER -84 (EIGHTY-FOUR BEFORE)

The Silence of the Forest

The forest keeps silent, yet hears everything—whoever understands silence will hear the forest speak.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. The men of the village have gone into the forest in search of Yashpati—but what they find there leaves more questions than answers.)

On the third day after Yashpati fled, the village headman and several young men, together with the two soldiers Amil Jay Singh had left behind, set out to search the forest. Beyond the village boundary the Kamala-Balan entered a dense, untouched woodland where the villagers ordinarily did not go—not to cut timber, not to hunt, for the stories told of that place were not good ones. The elders said that deep within the forest, where the Kamala-Balan met another, unnamed river, the water was so deep and still that its bottom could not be seen, and crocodiles larger and older than those in the village pond lived there.

Gauri did not join the search party—she had to stay home and care for Savitri—but that morning she went to Budhba to ask for his blessing. “Budhba, can you still see nothing?”

“No,” Budhba said, with an uneasiness in his voice that Gauri had never heard before. “Gauri, I want to tell you something I do not fully understand myself. My sight now reaches beyond time—as you have seen, I can glimpse the future—but the moment it reaches one particular part of that forest, it goes out, as though there were a dense fog that my eyes, however ancient, cannot pierce. For the first time I am being made to feel that there are things in the world which, despite all my power as a witness, I cannot see."

The search party remained in the forest until evening. They found a torn strip of Yashpati's clothing caught in a thorn bush—certainly his, for it was the costly silk worn only by the village priests. Farther on were footprints: clear at first, running, then gradually indistinct, as though the runner had tired, or as though something else had forced him to change direction. At last they reached the bank of the unnamed river, where the tracks ended completely—no sign that he had entered the water, no sign of a struggle, no body. Only one shoe, half sunk in the mud at the water's edge, and beside it a large, strange mark in the mud, as though some huge, heavy creature had entered the water there only moments before.

"A crocodile," one of the young men said, his voice trembling.

"No ordinary crocodile," the headman said softly, studying the mark. "This track... in all my life I have never seen the track of a crocodile this large."

The soldiers, frightened now, wanted to end the search. The headman agreed. Whatever lived in that forest had passed beyond the limits of human curiosity, and no one from the village was prepared to challenge it. Carrying back Yashpati's torn strip of cloth and the half-buried shoe, the search party returned with the report that he had probably fallen prey to some wild animal or crocodile.

The village received the news with mixed feelings. Some felt relief, some fear, and some—this surprised Gauri herself—felt grief. Whatever Yashpati had done, he had once stood at the centre of the village's religious life, and when several elderly women saw the torn silk from his robe, they began to weep—not for the man he had become, but for the man he might once, long ago, have been.

That evening Gauri went to the pipal tree and told Budhba everything. "Budhba, I do not know what I ought to feel. He wanted to destroy us, yet now that he is gone, I feel somehow... empty."

Budhba was silent for a long time. When he spoke, there was a deep sadness in his voice. "Gauri, I will tell you something I have never said before. My work is to preserve names—Hulasa, Jivanti, Sukhdev, Subhagi, and hundreds of others. But Yashpati's name, I think, I will not be able to preserve, because preserving a name requires love, and for Yashpati I have no love, only sorrow. And sorrow, Gauri, cannot save a name. It can only remind us that there once was a name that might have been saved, but was not."

"Then what will happen to Yashpati?"

“In time,” Budhba said softly, “the village will forget his name, just as he himself wanted so many names to be forgotten. This is no curse, Gauri. It is only the rule I have watched year after year: what a person gives, that person receives; whoever takes names away finds that, in the end, no hand remains to keep his own name safe.”

Gauri went home, but sleep would not come that night. She watched her daughter Savitri sleeping and kept thinking: who decides which names are to be preserved and which forgotten? And if that decision depends upon love, then has love itself, in the end, become more powerful than justice?

She found no answer that night. But far away, beyond the unnamed river, in the dense darkness of the forest, something—something neither Gauri nor Budhba had ever been able to see—slowly opened its eyes and began to wait.

That day, listening to the silence of the forest, Budhba sang a proverb-song—

The forest keeps silent, yet hears everything,

Whoever understands silence will hear the forest speak.

A leaf stirred, the birds fell quiet, but the forest saw it all;

Whoever bent an ear to listen understood the story even in silence.

The forest is a witness; even in silence it knows everything—

Whoever learned to read silence received the forest’s whole testimony.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -84

The Narrative Function of an Unanswered Mystery

Chapter -84 deliberately refuses to make Yashpati’s fate completely clear: he is shown neither dead nor alive. This uncertainty is not accidental. Throughout Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles, Budhba’s power as a witness, however far-reaching, is never complete; there is always some angle he cannot see. That limit gives the story a realistic foundation: no witness, however powerful, can be omniscient. The chapter’s final line—the awakening of something unseen—is a deliberately loose thread that may be taken up in later chapters, or perhaps never, just as in real life not every mystery ever receives an answer.

CHAPTER -83 (EIGHTY-THREE BEFORE)

Sonama Majhin

The hand that holds the net has the river for its mother—the fisherwoman catches fish, but lets the name go free.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. One month after Yashpati's disappearance, the village livestock begins to vanish mysteriously—and Budhba, trying to understand the limits of his own power, goes beyond the village to the one person who may carry an older memory even than his.)

A month after Yashpati disappeared, a new fear began to spread through Garh Narikel. First a goat vanished, then a buffalo calf, then a young buffalo descended directly from Kajri—taken in a single night from the shallow edge of Jori Pokhari, without a sound and without a trace of blood. At first the villagers suspected a tiger or leopard. But when they examined the tracks toward the forest at dawn, they found no footprints of any familiar animal—only a broad, heavy drag-mark running from the water's edge back toward the water, just like the mark the search party had found beside the unnamed river.

Gauri took Savitri with her to the pipal tree. “Budhba, what is happening?”

Budhba remained silent for a long time, his form trembling upon the pond water. “Gauri, I fear that whatever took Yashpati in that forest has now awakened, and its hunger is older than the reach of my ordinary power as a witness. I remember something from very long ago, when I was still a man. The old fisherfolk of the village used to speak a name in voices so low that it seemed they feared the name itself might hear them: the Original Crocodile. I never knew what it was. But I know of one person who may know—Sonama Majhin. They say she is still alive, and that she lives on that stretch of the Kamala-Balan where the current is deepest.”

“Still alive?” Gauri stared at him. “But Budhba, you yourself are hundreds of years old...”

“Yes,” Budhba said softly, “but I stepped outside human life and became a witness. They say Sonama Majhin never became a witness at all. She merely lived with such patience, asked so little of the world, that death itself forgot her. Two different roads, the same destination: remaining outside time.”

Leaving Savitri with Phulesari, Gauri set out alone for that distant reach of the Kamala-Balan whose very name the villagers spoke with a shiver. There she found a small, broken-down hut at the very edge of the river, where the water, utterly unlike the village pond, looked black and bottomless. At the doorway sat an immensely old woman. Her eyes were white and blind, yet her face was so serene that she seemed to see the whole world without looking at it.

“Budhba sent you,” Sonama Majhin said before Gauri’s footsteps had even reached the door. “I can smell his pipal tree in your breath.”

(The Story of Sonama Majhin)

Long ago, before any book remembers the time, this river bore another name, and only the people of the water had the right to speak it—our ancestors, who were neither Brahmins nor leatherworkers nor any of the castes the shastras name. Our ancestors believed that water itself was a living being, and that its oldest, hungriest child was called the Original Crocodile—not an animal, not a spirit, but the hunger of forgetting itself, the force that finally dissolves every name and every memory into water. They did not regard it as an enemy. They knew that without forgetting, memory itself would have no value, just as a lamp has no meaning without darkness. And so, every full moon, they made an offering to the Original Crocodile—flowers, fruit, milk—saying, “We do not deny you, but we ask you for patience.” As long as those offerings continued, the Original Crocodile slept in the depths and harmed no one.

Sonama Majhin paused and turned her blind eyes toward Gauri. “But then new peoples came—the Naiyayikas, the Mimamsakas, the Brahmins—and they called our ancestors’ offering-rite a ‘tantric superstition,’ just as Yashpati called your herb-lore. The offerings stopped. For many generations the Original Crocodile remained asleep, because hunger grows slowly; it does not wake all at once. But now, Gauri, I think its patience is almost spent. Yashpati entered those waters carrying his hatred and his pride, and perhaps, without knowing it, he woke that ancient hunger the way a weary predator wakes when a sharp scent suddenly reaches it."

"Then what are we to do?" Gauri asked, fear and determination mingled in her voice.

"Tell Budhba," Sonama Majhin said, "that bearing witness and denying forgetting are two different things. He preserves names, and that is good. But if he tries to stop the Original Crocodile altogether, as I suspect he may now wish to do, he will deny a truth our ancestors always knew: that everything, in the end, returns to forgetting, and that forgetting is not an enemy but a part of nature. The real task is not to prevent forgetting. It is to make sure that before forgetting comes, every name receives the honour it is due. That balance, Gauri, can be preserved only through balance—not through war."

Gauri carried the message back and repeated it to Budhba beneath the pipal tree. He was silent for a long time. Then he said softly, "Sonama Majhin is right, and I am ashamed to hear it because I had begun, without realising it, to replace my sorrow for Yashpati with hatred. And hatred, Gauri—I am only now beginning to understand this—is a hunger too, not so different from the hunger of the Original Crocodile. I must find the balance again. But one thing is certain: whatever is awakening in that forest will not be quieted by one night of mine or one argument. A new age is beginning, Gauri, and I fear your lifetime will not see its end."

That day, casting her net at the river ghat, Sonama Majhin sang—

The net is in her hand, the river is her mother,

The fisherwoman catches fish, but lets the name go free.

Water gives life, the river gives bread, yet the river is mother;

Whatever she took from the river, she gave back to the river.

The net may be full, but no name is bound—

She who caught the fish let the name go free.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -83

Indigenous/Fisherfolk Memory Tradition and Brahmanical Encroachment

Chapter -83 deliberately brings a third tradition of memory into the story: Sonama Majhin's fisherfolk, water-based folk tradition. It belongs neither to the Brahmanical classical tradition of Vachaspati, Udayana, and Gangesha, nor to the leatherworkers' quarter and its herbal tradition. The inclusion of this third tradition matters because the central image of Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles—the crocodile itself—is not the property of any single community, but part of a deep, many-layered folk memory that each generation has understood and revered in its own way. The idea of the Original Crocodile—regarding forgetting not as an enemy but as an inevitable part of nature—adds another layer to the philosophical complexity of the story. It suggests that the spirit of witness, Budhba's path, and the spirit of acceptance, Sonama Majhin's path, are both necessary and are not opposed to one another.

CHAPTER -82 (EIGHTY-TWO BEFORE)

The First Kabaddi Match

Go in one breath, return in one breath; touch and come back—kabaddi teaches: do not seize, be present.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. Three years have passed. Savitri is now sixteen, with a sensitivity sharper than her mother's—and in this chapter is born the ritual that, much later, in Channa Grove, you will hear called “the ghosts’ kabaddi.”)

Over those three years the situation had grown worse. The losses no longer stopped with livestock. Now people, too, sometimes disappeared—usually those who went alone to the banks of the Kamala-Balan at night, or those who worked fields too near that distant, unnamed reach of the river. The villagers began to avoid the pond and the current, and fear itself began to constrict village life: less fishing, less cultivation, even less laughter from the children.

Savitri, now sixteen, differed from her mother in one respect: she could hear Budhba’s voice not only in dreams, but in broad daylight, without sleeping. And lately her dreams had filled with a scene she could not understand—children running at night beneath the shade of some tree, repeating a word whose meaning she did not know.

One evening she summoned her mother and Budhba together. “I have an idea,” she said, excitement and fear mingling in her voice. “Budhba, you preserve names. Sonama Majhin kept the Original Crocodile calm through offerings. But the two acts have remained separate—preserving names in one place, making offerings in another. What if we joined them into a single act?”

“How, daughter?” Gauri asked.

“In my dream,” Savitri said, “the children were playing a game—kabaddi, just as we ordinarily play it. But in this game, whoever crossed into the opposing side on a raid had to carry a name with them: the name of someone dead, the memory of someone forgotten. If the player could cross back over the line with that name, the raid was counted as won. This game... it was not merely a game, Budhba. Each raid was a small offering—a way of showing the Original Crocodile that we are willing to bring names before it freely and with honour, instead of waiting for it to snatch them away against our will.”

Budhba was silent for a long time. When he spoke, his voice held a brightness Gauri had not heard in many years. “Savitri, I think you have understood what I could not understand in hundreds of years. I thought bearing witness and accepting forgetting were two different paths, as Sonama Majhin said. But you are showing me a third path, where both can happen together—in one breath, within a single game.”

But the idea could not be proved without a trial, and the trial demanded courage that no one was willing to offer.

At last Savitri herself stepped forward. “I will play the first raid,” she said, despite her mother’s protest. “I am linked to Budhba’s power, just as you were. If this can work, no one is better placed to test it than I am.”

On the night of the new moon, beside Jori Pokhari beneath the roots of the pipal, Savitri, Gauri, Phulesari, and a handful of brave young men from the village gathered together. Budhba, indistinct as air, rose above the roots of the tree. “If this game fails,” he warned, “the Original Crocodile may take it as an insult, and its hunger may grow fiercer. Whatever happens here, we shall bear its weight together—not Savitri alone.”

The game began. Holding her breath and chanting “kabaddi, kabaddi,” Savitri moved into the darkness, as far as the very edge of the pond, where even at night the water seemed to gleam strangely. She stopped and called out in a high voice: “Subhagi! Subhagi, who was given no name in the flood—I bring your name into this game!”

The water stirred. Everyone froze. But there was no attack. Savitri drew breath and took another step. “Yashpati!” she called, her voice trembling. “What you became was the result of your own choices. But your name—the person you may once have been, long ago—I too shall not forget, even if the Original Crocodile has devoured you.”

At that name the water moved in a different way—swiftly, violently, as though something enormous beneath the surface were trying to rise.

Gauri cried, "Savitri, come back!" But Savitri, joined to Budhba's power, stood firm. "No," she said. "This is fear, not an attack. It is listening."

A third time she spoke, now calming her voice as one would soothe a crying child. "Original Crocodile, we do not deny you. We ask you for patience, just as our ancestors asked. On every night of the new moon we will bring names before you—freely, lovingly, by our own will. In return, we ask only this: do not steal. Accept what is offered."

A long, unbearable moment passed. Then, slowly, the water grew calm. No voice answered; there was no unmistakable sign. Yet something changed in the air, as though an immense, exhausted creature had drawn an easy breath for the first time in a very long while.

Budhba steadied within his form. "It is done," he said. "I do not know how long this will hold, but tonight the crocodile is asleep."

From that night onward, on every new-moon night, the children of the village gathered beneath the pipal under Budhba's guidance and played kabaddi. But the game was no longer merely a game. It had become a sacred rite of remembrance. Each raid carried a name; each name carried a life; each life carried a truth guarded from forgetting. And in return for that rite, it is said, the Original Crocodile never again touched an innocent living being.

From that day Savitri became something more to the village—not merely Budhba's helper, but the first guardian of the rite her descendants would carry forward, generation after generation, until, far in the future and far away, the game would pass from a village new-moon custom into the deathless, timeless kabaddi of Channa Grove, where ghosts, spirits, rakash, and loths, with Budhba as referee, would still save names night after night.

That day, during the first kabaddi raid, the village raised a song—

Go in one breath, come back in one breath,

Touch and return—do not seize; be present.

Who kept the breath won the raid; whose breath broke lost it;

Kabaddi teaches: touch the name, do not hold the body.

Call the name as you take your raid, all within one breath—

The name that was called lived again in the dark.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -82 — A HINGE IN THE STORY-CYCLE

The Origin of the Ritual and the Circular Structure of the Story

Chapter -82 is a central hinge in the whole Part o project of Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles. Here the ritual already encountered by the reader in Parts 1 and 2 as “name-saving kabaddi” is born in its first form. Savitri’s synthesis—bringing together the spirit of witness embodied by Budhba, the spirit of offering embodied by Sonama Majhin, and the children’s game of traditional village kabaddi—gives concrete form to one of the story’s central claims: truth and justice are never the property of a single tradition or a single generation, but are cumulative, intergenerational creations. From this point onward, the remaining chapters of Part o (81→1) will trace the centuries-long continuity of the established ritual, and the new names and new tragedies continually added to that continuity, until at last the story reaches Budhba in his final, twelve-hundred-year-old form in Channa Grove.

CHAPTER -81 (EIGHTY-ONE BEFORE)

The Shadow of Invasion

A shadow growing large does not make fear grow large—one whose name stands firm does not fear his own shadow.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. Twenty years have passed. New-moon kabaddi has become an inseparable part of village life—but in this chapter a new, human-made calamity reaches the village gate, one that no offering and no name can pacify.)

Over twenty years, Garh Narikel had settled into a new balance. New-moon kabaddi had become an inseparable part of village life. The children played it as naturally as though it had always existed, and after every new moon the elders of the village would say with satisfaction, “This month too has passed in peace.” The loss of livestock had stopped. Fear of that distant stretch of the Kamala-Balan, though not wholly gone, had weakened. Savitri, now thirty-six, was teaching her daughter Indumati the finer points of the ritual.

But that evening, at the edge of the village, a new cloud of dust rose—a cloud kicked up by horses’ hooves, and with it came a crowd of people fleeing.

"A Turk army!" cried the first refugee, collapsing near the village chaupal, breathless. "They are advancing from the north of Mithila with elephants and horses! The king of Simraungarh has fled! Village after village is burning!"

Panic broke out in Garh Narikel. Some wanted to flee at once toward the south, beyond the forest that the villagers now called "the Crocodile's country," a place they had never before been willing to enter—but today even that fear seemed small beside the fear of an army. Others refused to abandon their houses and fields, whatever might come.

Indumati, now twenty, asked her mother, "Mother, what does Budhba say about this?"

Savitri went to the pipal. Budhba, departing from his usual calm, looked troubled. "Savitri, my witness-sight does not show me the future of this army clearly. Human war, unlike the hunger of the Original Crocodile, is unstable and unpredictable. But this much I can say: an army that has come to burn cities and royal palaces will have little particular interest in a small, poor village like this, unless the village lies in its path."

"Then what should we do?"

"Hide what can be hidden. Let those who can flee do so. But those who cannot—the old, the sick, small children—must have a place of safety."

The leatherworkers' quarter, drawing on years upon years of experience, organized first, because its people knew how to help one another in a crisis. Beneath their houses they enlarged the old underground grain-storage chambers and began hiding children and elderly people there. Gauri, old now but still active, set to work tending wounded refugees with her knowledge of herbs.

By deep night, hoofbeats sounded again at the village boundary. This time it was not the whole army, only a handful of straggling soldiers who had become separated from the main force and were moving toward the village to plunder it. Indumati, who could hear Budhba's voice most clearly, cried out, "Budhba is saying—kabaddi! Play kabaddi tonight, even though it is not the new moon!"

It was a strange command, but Savitri, trusting her mother's teaching, immediately gathered the children and the young men of the village beneath the roots of the pipal. "How can kabaddi save us?" one young man asked.

"I do not know," Savitri said, "but trust Budhba."

When the straggling soldiers reached the edge of the village, they saw a strange sight: lamps burning near the village pipal, children running and playing without fear, loudly chanting “kabaddi, kabaddi.” The scene was so ordinary, so fearless, that the soldiers concluded either that the village was mad or that it had nothing worth hiding—for no one, surely, could play with such calm in the midst of real danger.

The commander, a weary, lean veteran, reined in his horse. “There is nothing in this village worth looting,” he told his men. “Move on. Rejoin the main force. We need not waste time here.”

The soldiers moved on without troubling the village. The children finished their game and began laughing with relief, although they did not fully understand what they had saved.

Budhba remained beneath the pipal for a long time that night, his form unusually still. “Indumati,” he said at last, “do you know what I am thinking? My task was never only to preserve the names of the dead. Sometimes this work can preserve the living as well. A person who stands firm in name, memory, and identity, without fear, shows a confidence that violence often cannot understand—and therefore passes by.”

But the relief proved brief. The following week came news that Simraungarh had fallen completely, and that Mithila’s old political order—the order under whose shadow every story from Acharya Keshava to Amil Jay Singh had unfolded—had come to an end. A new age, with new rulers, a new language, and new laws, was about to descend upon Mithila. And Garh Narikel, like thousands of other villages, now found itself standing before an unknown future.

That night, seeing the shadow of invasion, Budhba sang a proverb-song—

Though the shadow grows large, fear need not grow large,

One whose name stands firm does not fear his own shadow.

Cannon-fire heard far away, smoke seen rising high—yet the village stood;

One who stands firm within is not broken by the shadow outside.

A shadow grows large at evening, but fades with dawn—

One who knows his own name is defeated by no shadow.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -81

Fourteenth-Century Mithila — The Historical Context of Political Instability

At the beginning of the fourteenth century, the fall of the Karnata dynasty that preceded the Oiniwar line in Mithila, and incursions by the armies of the Delhi Sultanate into the Tirhut region, brought profound changes to the political structure of the area. Chapter -81 uses this historical instability as its background to show how local communal traditions, such as the kabaddi ritual, could preserve their meaning—and sometimes even their practical usefulness—amid large political upheavals. This chapter carries the narrative of Part 0 into a new historical age, whose unfolding continues in the chapters that follow.

CHAPTER -80 (EIGHTY BEFORE)

The First Line of the Song

One voice raises the first line of a song; the rest of the village takes it up —the author is not one person; the village itself is the maker.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. With the rise of the Oiniwar dynasty, a new political stability and a new literary enthusiasm are spreading through Mithila—and in this chapter, for the first time, Budhba’s story attempts to leave oral memory and descend onto the page.)

The disorder that followed the fall of Simraungarh slowly subsided. A new dynasty—the Oiniwars—came to power in Mithila, and with it came a new, unexpected enthusiasm for literature, music, and art. The courts of Darbhanga and the surrounding region began giving patronage to poets, singers, and scholars, and Maithili, long regarded chiefly as the language of home and field, gradually began to become a language of court and poetry as well.

A small wave of this new enthusiasm reached Garh Narikel too, in the form of a young wandering poet-scribe whom the villagers knew as Haripati. Travelling from village to village in search of courtly patronage, he collected folk tales, folk songs, and local legends, believing that the true strength of Maithili lay not in the Sanskrit-laden poetry of the court but in the mouths of ordinary villagers.

When Haripati reached Garh Narikel, he heard for the first time about the pipal Witness-Tree and the new-moon kabaddi played beneath it—from Indumati, now forty and the principal guardian of the ritual after her mother Savitri.

“A ghost who bears witness and preserves names? An Original Crocodile that is the hunger of forgetting? A kabaddi game in which every raid carries the name of the dead?” Haripati asked in astonishment. “This is material for a great epic! I want to put it on the page.”

Indumati hesitated. “Poet, this story is ours—the village’s, the quarter’s, Budhba’s. It is not a poem for a royal court; it is our life. What will you do by writing it down?”

“I want to preserve it,” Haripati said with deep sincerity. “An oral story, however powerful, changes from generation to generation, and sometimes disappears altogether. But if it comes onto the page, it can still be read hundreds of years from now.”

Indumati took these words to the pipal and told Budhba. He remained silent for a long time. “Indumati,” he said at last, “I remember that long ago I myself thought that perhaps, far in the future, someone would gather all these stories in one place. I did not know that moment would come so soon, or that it would come in the form of a wandering poet. But I must give you one warning: if this story is written, it must not be written for prestige. If the stories of Hulasa, Jivanti, Sukhdev, Subhagi, Ratna, and Malati are ornamented in the polished language of the royal court, that will be another injustice like those they suffered in life. If they are written, they must be written in ordinary language, as those people themselves spoke.”

When Indumati conveyed this message, Haripati sat silent for a long time. Then, slowly, he drew a palm-leaf manuscript and stylus from his waist. “Budhbaji,” he said, turning toward the pipal although he could not see Budhba, “I accept your condition. I will not write it as courtly poetry. I will write it as it is—in the village’s language, in the village’s rhythm, in the own words of Hulasa and Jivanti and Sukhdev wherever they survive.”

That evening, seated at the roots of the pipal, Haripati wrote his first line—not in Sanskrit, not in courtly Maithili, but in the ordinary speech of the village: “There was a tree, there was a pond, and there was a servant who preserved names...” Haripati himself did not know that this line would live for many centuries thereafter, in one form or another, in one mouth or another, until—far in the future—another writer, in another age, using another instrument, would write the same story again, not on paper but on a computer screen, under the title Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles.

Haripati remained in Garh Narikel for three months, listening to the stories of every elder in the village, writing them, erasing them, and writing them again until the words sounded natural on the village tongue. When he prepared to leave for the royal court with his palm-leaf manuscript, Indumati asked him, “Will you show it at court?”

“No,” Haripati said with a sad smile. “The court will not understand it. I will keep this manuscript with me, and when my time comes, I will give it to my disciple with instructions to preserve it but never to publish it—until the world becomes such that it can both hear this story and understand it.”

After Haripati left, Budhba said to Indumati, “He was a good man. His manuscript may be lost, or it may not. But one thing I now know for certain: once a story has honestly descended onto the page, it never dies completely, even if no one reads that manuscript for centuries.”

That day, as the first line of the song rose, the village wove a song—

One voice raises the first line of the song,

The rest of the village takes it up—the author is not one.

One began it, ten added to it, a hundred sang it;

What a village makes together has no single maker.

Line joins line, and the song becomes whole—

A song sung by all never dies.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -80

The Oiniwar Dynasty and the Golden Age of Maithili Literature

The rule of the Oiniwar dynasty in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries is regarded as an especially important period in the history of Maithili literature, when Maithili received royal patronage and became a medium of high literary expression. The poet “Haripati” mentioned in Chapter -80 does not represent any one specific historical person; rather, he symbolizes the wider literary and cultural tendency through which the dignity of the Maithili language became established in this period. The chapter’s central question—whether folk narrative, especially narrative associated with marginalized communities, is worthy of becoming a subject of “high literature”—is also a central question of Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles itself and, more broadly, of the Videha journal and the Videha Parallel Literature movement.

CHAPTER -79 (SEVENTY-NINE BEFORE)

The Turn of Forgiveness

In kabaddi, even the one you touch gets a turn to return—forgiveness too is a turn, not revenge.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. Forty-five years have passed. In this chapter, for the first time, the new-moon kabaddi is played not only for the names of the dead, but also for an old wrong borne by a living person.)

After Indumati, responsibility for the ritual passed to her daughter Sharada, and after Sharada to her daughter Vasundhara. Over forty-five years, village life settled into a quiet, steady rhythm—the kabaddi was played at every new moon, names were spoken, and the Original Crocodile, as Sonama Majhin had said long ago, slept patiently.

One evening, an extremely old man came to the gate of the leatherworkers' quarter, leaning on a staff. His clothes were expensive, but torn and soiled, as though he had travelled very far and with great difficulty. "I am the grandson of Pratapsen Thakur," he introduced himself, his voice trembling. "My name is Raghuvir. I... I have come to meet the descendants of Gauri Mata."

Vasundhara, now forty, looked at him cautiously. "The name Pratapsen Thakur awakens no happy memory in this quarter, Babuji. Why have you come?"

Raghuvir remained silent for a long time, then said with tears in his eyes, "I have lived carrying the burden of my grandfather's sin. My father told me his story, and from childhood I have known that some part of my family's property, every comfort my family enjoys, stands upon the injustice my grandfather tried to commit against this quarter. Before I die, I have come once to ask forgiveness—although I understand that I have no right to demand forgiveness, because the offense was not mine.”

Uncertain, Vasundhara went to the pipal to ask Budhba's counsel. “Budhba, this confuses me. This man is not himself guilty, yet he carries the burden of guilt. What should I say to him?”

Budhba remained silent for a long time. “Vasundhara, year after year I have preserved the names of the dead, but now I think my work was incomplete. Preserving a name does not mean only that the dead remain in memory—it also means that the living are given a chance to set their own story right while they are still alive. Raghuvir's plea for forgiveness, though he himself is not guilty, is a new kind of act of witness. Do not reject it.”

That new-moon night, every elder, every woman, every child in the village gathered beneath the pipal—and Raghuvir too sat by the tree on weak legs, supported by a descendant of Phulesari. The kabaddi began, but that night a new rule was added. When Raghuvir's turn came, Vasundhara called him to her side and said softly, “Today you will not carry a name, Babuji. Today you yourself will become a name—Raghuvir, grandson of Pratapsen Thakur, who came to acknowledge his family's wrongdoing—and all of us together will remember this name of yours, just as we have remembered the names of Sukhdev and Hulasa.”

Raghuvir began to weep, though his tears were not of grief but of a deep, years-old burden lifting from him. “A portion of my land,” he said between breaths, “which my grandfather acquired unjustly, I want to return to this quarter today. It cannot buy forgiveness, I understand that. But at least it is one step toward truth.”

That night Budhba descended from the roots of the pipal and, for the first time in the village's memory, tried to place his hand on the head of a living person—though, as always, the hand stopped a finger's breadth above the body. “Raghuvir,” he said, “even today I carry your grandfather's name with sorrow. But from today I will carry your name with respect. The difference may seem small, but from all I have learned over the years, I know that this difference is worth everything.”

Raghuvir stayed that night in the leatherworkers' quarter, and the next morning, before the witnesses of the village, he placed the deed of partition for his land in Vasundhara's hands. He returned home the following month, and six months later news came of his death—but the villagers did not call him “the guilty Thakur.” They called him “Raghuvir, who returned,” and in time his name became a village saying:

“to return like Raghuvir,” meaning to turn back toward truth, however late the return may come.

That day, as forgiveness entered a kabaddi turn, the village sang—

In kabaddi, even the one you touch gets a turn to return,

Forgiveness too is a turn, not revenge.

One who loses gets another chance; one who falls is offered a hand;

The one who forgave saved both the game and the village.

The turn of revenge is short; the turn of forgiveness is long—

The village remembered the name of the one who gave another a turn to return.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -79

Collective Guilt and Intergenerational Forgiveness

Chapter -79 raises a difficult moral question to which there is no simple answer: is a descendant responsible for an ancestor's wrongdoing, and if so, to what extent? The story gives no fixed theoretical answer. Raghuvir's return of land is described not as “buying forgiveness” but as “a step toward truth,” and the matter is deliberately left incomplete. The chapter also marks an important turn in the development of the ritual: name-saving kabaddi, which until now has been chiefly for the dead and the wronged, now takes on a role for a living, repentant inheritor as well—carefully preserving the distinction that acknowledgment is not the same thing as forgiveness.

CHAPTER -78 (SEVENTY-EIGHT BEFORE)

Outside the Genealogy

A name absent from the Panji is not outside the village—the one paper leaves out, the soil takes in.

— Garh Narikel

Mithila had an ancient institution—the Panji system—under which the genealogies, marriage alliances, and lineage status of Brahmin and Karna Kayastha families were carefully preserved in written records. Every few years, pandits and Panjikers gathered in assemblies known as Panji conferences to enter new marriages, examine older records, and decide matters of lineage standing. The system was one pillar of Mithila's social memory—but that pillar stood only for certain households. The names of leatherworkers, Dhivars, and other marginalized caste communities never entered these Panjis, as though they lived outside Mithila's memory, beyond some invisible boundary.

That year, a Panji conference was held in a large village near Garh Narikel, and a young Panjiker named Yadavanand Jha came to take part in it—serious, conscientious, and wholly confident in the system he served. After the conference, he was travelling through Garh Narikel when his horse suddenly fell ill, forcing him to stop near the village square and seek shelter for the night.

The Brahmin quarter welcomed Yadavanand according to custom, but food in the village was scarce that night, for it was a difficult year following famine. When Vasundhara, the current guardian of the ritual in the leatherworkers' quarter, heard this, she sent fresh milk and fruit from her own home, expecting nothing in return, simply because her family had for generations followed the custom of serving guests who came to the village.

As he drank the milk, Yadavanand asked the village headman, "Whose milk is this? So pure, so delicious!"

The headman hesitated a little, then said, "From the leatherworkers' quarter, Panditji."

For a moment Yadavanand's face tightened with discomfort—the reflex of old conditioning—but then, perhaps from weariness, or perhaps from genuine curiosity, he asked, "Where is that quarter? I have heard something about a Witness Tree, about some new-moon ritual. Is it true?"

By a remarkable coincidence, that night was the new moon. Reluctantly, the headman took Yadavanand to the pipal, thinking that a Panjekar's interest in this "low" ritual might prove dangerous. But when Yadavanand saw the children playing, heard them calling name after name, and heard Vasundhara attach a small story to each one—Ratna, Somar, Malati, Hulasa, Sukhdev, Subhagi, Gauri—he stood stunned.

"Whose... whose names are these?" he asked, his voice newly humble.

"Our ancestors, Panditji," Vasundhara said, "and those who did not receive justice while they lived, but whose names we refuse to forget after their deaths."

Yadavanand remained silent for a long time. Then he said slowly, "My whole life has been spent in the service of a Panji that preserves thousands of names—but that Panji preserves not one name from your quarter. Until today I never once asked myself what kind of justice this is. Here, beneath this tree, the question has arisen in me for the first time, and I do not know its answer."

Budhba, whose voice until then could be heard only by Vasundhara and the descendants of Savitri, opened his voice to Yadavanand as well that night for the first time—an experiment whose result even Budhba could not be certain of. "Panjekar," he said softly, and Yadavanand started and looked around him. "I will teach you no shastra. I will tell you only this: your Panji keeps the record of lineage and rank. My memory keeps the record of truth and love. Both are necessary. But if only the first survives without the second, half of Mithila's memory will remain forever in darkness."

Yadavanand could not sleep that night. Before leaving at dawn, he took from his bag a small booklet of blank paper—his own private notebook, separate from the official Panji—and said to Vasundhara, “Tell me every name you know, as far back as your memory reaches. I will keep them in my personal record. It will not be an official Panji, and perhaps it never will be. But for as long as I live, these names will at least be safe on one sheet of paper.”

For three hours Vasundhara recited names—generation by generation, beginning with Somar and Ratna and continuing down to her own daughter—and Yadavanand solemnly wrote every name, every relationship, every small story. When he left, he said, “I do not know whether this little book will ever reach another hand in the future. But I promise you this: for as long as I live, I will keep these names with the same respect as my official Panji, even if the world never sees them.”

That day, for the names left outside the Panji, the village sang—

A name absent from the Panji is not outside the village,

The one paper leaves out, the soil takes in.

Dalit, woman, poor—the paper may lose them;

But whoever the village keeps in mind becomes greater than the Panji.

Paper is bounded; the soil is vast—

Even names omitted from the Panji are carried by the village's memory.

The Panji System and Social Exclusion

Mithila's Panji system has long been admired among scholars for its intricate and meticulous tradition of genealogical record-keeping, but historically it was confined chiefly to the lineages of Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas. As a result, most of Mithila's population—Shudra, Dalit, and Adivasi communities—remained outside this official system of memory. Chapter -78 addresses that historical inequality directly and, through the character of Yadavanand Jha, offers a fictional but symbolically meaningful response: a “shadow Panji,” kept outside the official record but with equal fidelity. The author's own work on Panji research—including the parsing of Panji material in Volume 2, Parts 2 and 3, among other sections—forms part of the background to this chapter, although its characters and events are entirely fictional.

CHAPTER -77 (SEVENTY-SEVEN BEFORE)

Budhba's Silence

When Budhba falls silent, he speaks most of all—silence too is an answer.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. Ten years have passed. In this chapter, for the first time, Budhba himself begins to break—and the village must understand that even the one who bears witness sometimes needs a witness.)

In those ten years, after Vasundhara, responsibility for the ritual passed to her daughter Kaushalya. Like her foremothers, Kaushalya tended the new-moon kabaddi, and village life continued in its ordinary rhythm. But slowly one thing began to trouble her. Budhba's voice, once clear, alert, and ready with an answer to every question, had grown faint and weary, and at times fell completely silent.

One new-moon night the kabaddi began, but Budhba did not appear in his place as referee. The children waited, then began whispering among themselves. "Why hasn't Budhba come?" Frightened, Kaushalya went to the roots of the pipal. "Budhba, are you all right?"

After a long while an exceedingly faint voice arose, as though travelling from very far away, from very deep below. "Kaushalya... forgive me. I... tonight I cannot remember the names. So many years, so many names... Hulasa... or perhaps Hulasi... Sukhdev, or Surendra... I... I am afraid I am forgetting, Kaushalya. The very work for which I was born to do above all else is slipping out of my own hands."

Kaushalya stood stunned. For the first time in hundreds of years, Budhba—believed unchanging, unbreakable, forever remembering—was giving voice to fear and helplessness.

The village grew frightened. “If Budhba forgets, in whose keeping will our names remain?” an old woman asked. The headman, the village elders, and the descendants of Sonama Majhin—who still lived, generation after generation, near that distant reach of the Kamala-Balan—gathered to consider this terrible problem.

A descendant of Sonama Majhin, an elderly woman named Godavari, asked Kaushalya a question no one had ever asked before. “Kaushalya, how many names have all of you asked Budhba to carry, over how many years? Thousands—perhaps lakhs. But have any of you ever spoken Budhba’s own name—Budhua—before others with full respect? Have you ever heard his story, mourned for him, sung for him, as he has had to do for thousands of others?”

Silence descended. Kaushalya, and the whole village with her, had to admit that it was true. Budhua—Budhba—who had preserved everyone else for hundreds of years, had never himself been fully and reverently “preserved.” He had always given and never received.

“Then what should we do?” Kaushalya asked, tears in her eyes.

Godavari smiled, a quiet, deep smile. “What Budhba does for us every new moon, tonight we shall do for him. We shall play kabaddi—but tonight the turn will be taken for Budhba’s name.”

That night every person in the village—old, young, child, leatherworkers’ quarter, Brahmin quarter, everyone—gathered beneath the pipal without distinction of quarter. Kaushalya lit a lamp and called out in a strong voice: “Budhua! Servant of Vachaspati Mishra! Witness to Hulasa! Witness to Jivanti! Witness to Sukhdev, Ratna, Malati, Subhagi, Gauri! You, who have carried every name for hundreds of years, tonight we too carry your name—Budhua, Budhba, who gave up his humanity for love, who never asked anything for himself. We know your story, and we shall never forget it.”

One by one, every woman and man in the village stepped forward and repeated one piece of Budhba’s story—his thirty years of service, his water-burial, his helplessness during the first flood, his journey to Sonama Majhin, his grief for Yashpati. The children, not fully understanding yet still reverent, danced around the pipal chanting “Budhba—Budhba”—not formal kabaddi at all, only a spontaneous, joyful act of remembrance.

From the roots of the pipal, a soft, steady light slowly rose—clearer than before, firmer than before. When Budhba finally spoke, his voice no longer trembled. “Godavari was right,” he said, with new strength in his voice. “I was not forgetting, Kaushalya. I was only... tired—from carrying a burden in one direction for too long without ever receiving anything from the other direction. Tonight you showed me that other direction. Now I understand: bearing witness is not a one-way task. If it remains one-way, in the end it empties the witness himself. But if it flows in both directions, it can continue without end.”

From that night onward, a new observance entered the village ritual. Once each year, on the full moon of Phagun, the villagers began to celebrate “Budhba Remembrance,” when Budhba’s own story was respectfully retold to every generation of the village, so that the witness himself might never remain unwitnessed, never remain alone.

That day, seeing Budhba’s silence, the village sang a proverb-song—

When Budhba falls silent, he speaks most of all,

Silence too is an answer.

What could not fit inside speech was said in quiet;

The one who bent close to listen understood meaning even in silence.

Words grow weary; silence speaks more deeply—

The one who understood Budhba’s silence learned half the story.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -77

Caregiver Fatigue and the Need for Reciprocity

Chapter -77 gives narrative form to a psychological reality sometimes described in modern language as “compassion fatigue”: a person—or a spirit—who continuously bears the burdens of others in a one-way flow, without ever experiencing his own burden being shared, may eventually become depleted, however good his intentions. Budhba’s temporary “silence,” and its resolution through communal, reciprocal remembrance, suggest that the work of witnessing, justice, and safeguarding memory can never be left permanently to one person—or one institution. It must be a collective responsibility whose weight is shared.

The First Lesson on a Coconut Leaf

The first lesson is on a leaf—how a name is written; the leaf that keeps a name lets the tree keep history.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. Kaushalya’s daughter, Mandakini, carrying forward the knowledge of her grandmothers, brings a new idea—one that, much later, will be known as the “Coconut-Leaf School.”)

Mandakini, Kaushalya’s daughter, had felt a strange dissatisfaction since childhood. She knew—from the story of Yadavanand Jha, and from the story of the poet Haripati—that her family’s history was now preserved on paper and in a Panji. But she also knew that not a single woman or man in the quarter could read for themselves the letters that others had written on their behalf. “Our story is in other people’s hands,” she told her mother one day, “but not before our own eyes.”

There was a school in the village’s Brahmin quarter where both Sanskrit and Maithili were taught—but only boys of the higher castes could attend, and girls, whatever their caste, were not welcome. “Where will our children study?” Mandakini asked.

There was another problem as well: paper and palm-leaf manuscripts were expensive, and no family in the leatherworkers’ quarter had enough means to provide writing materials for every child.

One day Mandakini sat in her courtyard with a dried coconut leaf in her hand and, without thinking, began drawing lines on it with a twig. The leaf was dry but strong, and the marks appeared clearly, as though there were a natural contrast between the green inner layer of the leaf and its dry outer surface, enough to reveal letters even without ink.

“Mother!” she cried. “Look! I can write on a coconut leaf!”

Kaushalya came, looked, and smiled—a smile that had passed through many generations and many tragedies and now tasted of hope. “Mandakini, what is the one thing Garh Narikel never lacks? Coconut trees! You have found a new idea.”

The next week Mandakini and her friends gathered dried coconut leaves, cleaned them, and began the first lessons in the open space of the leatherworkers’ quarter—the place where, until then, only drums and mridangas had been left to dry. Children, boys and girls alike, learned to scratch letters onto coconut leaves without distinction of caste. Some poor families from the Brahmin quarter also began sending their children there because they could not afford the expensive school.

When Budhba heard the news, there was a new excitement in his voice. “Mandakini,” he said beneath the pipal, “what you have done is the next step in our whole story. Hulasa could not write her own name on a manuscript copy. Ratna could never put her herbal knowledge onto paper. Gauri, Savitri, Vasundhara—all of them preserved their stories through other people’s mouths and other people’s hands. But your children will now write their own stories themselves.”

“Budhba,” Mandakini said, “will this ritual, this kabaddi, all of it—will we need it less once we can write our own stories?”

Budhba thought for a moment. “No, Mandakini. Writing and bearing witness are two different acts, just as the Panji and my memory were different. What is written can be burned, torn, or simply left unread. But what is remembered with love, mouth to mouth, generation to generation, is harder to destroy. You need both—the written story and the living memory, not as substitutes for one another, but as one another’s guardians.”

In time the Coconut-Leaf School became a permanent institution of Garh Narikel—first a small, informal gathering, then a recognized tradition where children of every generation learned their letters without distinction of caste or gender. Mandakini herself, into old age, continued every morning to distribute leaves and teach new children their first letters.

That day, as the children wrote their first letters on coconut leaves, they sang—

The first lesson is on a leaf—how a name is written;

The leaf that keeps a name lets the tree keep history.

A to Aa, Ka to Kha, little hands learn to write;

The child who learns letters today will save a name tomorrow.

The leaf is green; the letters remain steadfast—

What was written on a coconut leaf was read twelve hundred years later.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -76

Innovation from Material Scarcity — The Democratization of Education

Chapter -76 gives narrative form to an important principle: scarcity of resources can sometimes become the mother of innovation. Where costly paper and palm-leaf manuscripts are unavailable, making education accessible through a local and readily available material—the coconut leaf—reflects practices that have, in different forms, genuinely arisen among many historically marginalized communities. The name “Coconut-Leaf School,” which readers will recognize in Part 1 as a central institution of modern Garh Narikel, receives here its historical, though fictional, origin. The chapter thus shows that modern institutions are often continuities of centuries-old need and innovation, rather than sudden inventions.

The First Rebellion of Reason

The one who asked a question did not defeat the teacher, but awakened him—the first rebellion of reason, the first dawn of knowledge.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. The Coconut-Leaf School bore fruit in an unexpected way as well: a newly literate generation, having learned to ask questions, now begins to question its oldest tradition.)

Mandakini's school flourished for three generations. The village children—leatherworkers, Brahmins, Kayasthas, all of them—could now read letters, do sums, and had tasted book-learning. But education brought a new tendency with it as well: the habit of asking questions, and sometimes the courage to remain dissatisfied with old answers.

Mandakini's great-grandson, Vishwanath—not the boy once victimized by Yashpati, but another person who happened to bear the same name—was the brightest student in the school. He had spent two years studying at a newly established school in town, where he encountered logic, mathematics, and new ideas. When he returned to the village, his mind was full of questions, and the greatest of them concerned Budhba.

One new-moon night, when the kabaddi began, Vishwanath did not join the game. He stood at the edge with his arms folded and watched. Afterward he went to his grandmother—the village's current guardian of the ritual—and said, "Grandmother, I want to tell you something, and I am afraid it will hurt you. But I no longer believe in this game. It is... it is a beautiful tradition, but only a tradition. Budhba, the Original Crocodile—all of it may have been the imagination of our ancestors, not the real reason we survived floods, injustice, or misfortune."

His grandmother was stunned. "Vishwanath, your great-grandmother saw Budhba with her own eyes. My mother heard his voice."

"Grandmother, human memory can mislead, and folk stories grow and change from generation to generation. I do not want to disrespect you, but I want to look at the world with my own eyes and my own reason."

Word spread quickly through the village, and a few other young people, influenced by Vishwanath, stopped taking part in the kabaddi. For the first time in centuries, the crowd gathering beneath the pipal on new-moon nights began to grow smaller.

Budhba, seeing this, was not saddened in the way the villagers expected. "Let it come," he told the grandmother. "Vishwanath is not wrong to ask questions. Asking questions is not always wrong—it is what Vachaspati Mishra, Udayanacharya, and Gangesha Upadhyaya themselves did. But I know one thing Vishwanath does not yet know."

A few months later the village faced a real test. Once again livestock began disappearing from the distant, unnamed reach of the Kamala-Balan, just as it had in Sonama Majhin's time. But now the kabaddi had become irregular, attendance was thin, and the offering had weakened.

Despite his rationalism, Vishwanath was disturbed by the connection. He went into the forest himself, determined to prove that some ordinary, rational cause—a wolf, thieves, or a natural accident—lay behind the losses. But what he saw there shook his entire framework of reason: at the water's edge were the same enormous, strange tracks that no familiar animal could explain.

Frightened, he returned to the village and went straight to the pipal. "Budhba," he said, uncertainty entering his voice for the first time, "I cannot see you, but I know you are listening. I... I do not know what I am supposed to believe. But I can admit this much: if a tradition whose full scientific explanation I do not understand has kept the village safe for years, then rejecting it without any alternative protection is not wisdom. It is arrogance."

Budhba answered softly, "Vishwanath, I will not ask you to believe in me through superstition. I ask only this: acknowledge honestly what you have seen with your own eyes, and then decide for yourself whether the kabaddi is superstition, or a system your learning has not yet fully understood."

Vishwanath returned to the kabaddi on the next new moon and brought several of the other young people with him. He admitted openly, "I do not understand it completely, but I want to continue it with respect until I find a better answer." The answer did not wholly satisfy his grandmother, but it was enough—for, as Budhba later said, "Faith and respect are not the same thing, but sometimes they can do the same work."

That day, seeing a disciple find the courage to question the teacher, the gathering sang—

The one who asked a question did not defeat the teacher, but awakened him;

The first rebellion of reason, the first dawn of knowledge.

The one who merely memorized forgot; the one who questioned understood;

The disciple who found courage carried the teacher farther.

A question is a lamp that breaks the dark—

The one who learned to ask became the seed of Gangesha.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -75

The Intergenerational Conflict Between Tradition and Rationality

Chapter -75 gives narrative form to a universal social phenomenon: the tension between the rational-scientific outlook fostered by the spread of education and traditional, experience-based folk knowledge, a tension that appears in one form or another in almost every society with every generational transition. The story deliberately refuses to declare either side entirely right. Vishwanath's skepticism is valid, and Budhba himself accepts it; yet the empirical evidence in the forest cannot simply be dismissed either. The final resolution—"continue it with respect until a better answer is found"—offers a practical model of non-confrontational coexistence between science and tradition.

CHAPTER -74 (SEVENTY-FOUR BEFORE)

The Tree's Disease

Tend the sickness of one leaf, or it will spread through the whole tree—the sickness of a village is the same: it begins with a single silence.

— Garh Narikel

(A passage of narrative fiction. The centuries-old pipal has itself grown old now—and when its leaves begin to yellow, the village realizes for the first time that Budhba's very existence is bound to the health of this tree.)

When Vishwanath's grandson, Kedar, became guardian of the village ritual—the responsibility by then being entrusted to women and men alike according to fitness—he was the first to notice that the leaves on the northern branch of the pipal Witness Tree had begun to yellow, and that dark, damp patches were appearing at several places on its bark.

“Budhba,” Kedar asked anxiously, “your tree looks ill. Does this... does this affect you too?”

Budhba's voice, steady and clear through year after year, sounded weaker that evening. “Yes, Kedar. I am bound to this tree just as your body is bound to your breath. This tree has lived beside me for centuries. Perhaps... perhaps its span of life is now nearing its end.”

Panic swept through the village. “If the tree dies, what will happen to Budhba? If Budhba is no longer here, who will keep our names?” The question passed from house to house.

Kedar, inheriting both the rational temper of his ancestor Vishwanath and the faith of his grandmothers, looked for another way. From the town he brought a tree physician, trained in the new science of tree diseases and their treatment. After carefully examining the roots, bark, and leaves, the tree physician said, “The tree is being attacked by several kinds of insects. They have made their homes beneath the bark and are slowly hollowing the tree from within. The condition is not incurable, but treatment will require patience and continuous care.”

For the treatment, every quarter of the village—leatherworkers, Brahmins, Kayasthas, fisherfolk, all of them—began working together. A daughter of Godavari, from Sonama Majhin's line, taught the old traditional treatment of the soil around the roots: which herbs and which natural oils helped strengthen them. The tree physician, using his modern knowledge, showed the proper way to destroy the insects without harming the tree. And the children, drawing on what they had learned at the Coconut-Leaf School, began keeping a daily record of the tree's health—which branches were improving, and which still showed trouble.

Month by month the tree slowly began to recover. But in the course of that recovery, Budhba himself passed through an experience he had never known before: the experience of weakness, and, within that weakness, the help of every hand in the village.

“Kedar,” Budhba said one evening, with a new humility in his voice, “year after year I have reminded all of you that no name is permanent and no body immortal. Yet I myself sometimes forgot that I too, in my own form, am bound to a body—this tree. Now that my tree has fallen ill, I remember again that witnessing is not immortality either. It is only a long, fragile thread, and it needs continual care.”

Within a year the tree had fully recovered, its leaves turning deep green again. But the experience taught the village something new: if they wished to preserve their priceless inheritance—Budhba, the tree, and the entire tradition of memory bound to them—reverence alone was not enough. Practical, sustained care was necessary too, just as it is for any living thing.

From that day onward, each generation of the village made the tree's physical care part of its duty alongside the ritual: cleaning the roots, checking for insects, protecting it according to the season. A saying arose in the village: "To serve Budhba means not only to save names, but to let the tree live as well."

That day, seeing the sickness of the tree, the old farmers sang a warning song—

Tend the sickness of one leaf, lest it spread through the whole tree;

A village's sickness is the same—it begins with one silence.

The one who heeded early saved the tree;

The one who neglected it lost the whole orchard.

One leaf has blackened—cut it away at once—

Disease concealed will spread; disease brought to light can be stopped.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -74

The Responsibility of Caring for Living Monuments

Chapter -74 touches on a practical but serious subject: the preservation of living cultural monuments—ancient trees, historic buildings, or oral traditions—cannot be achieved through emotional reverence alone. It requires continuous, practical care, best carried out through a combination of modern knowledge, such as tree science, and traditional knowledge, such as herbal treatment. Budhba's acknowledgment of his own fragility—that he too ultimately depends upon a physical foundation—deepens the philosophical reach of the story, suggesting that immortality, however extended, is never entirely free of burden.

CHAPTER -73 (SEVENTY-THREE BEFORE)

Mohan's Melody

A flute melody mingles with the air, yet the ear keeps it—what touches the heart in melody is never forgotten.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: MOHAN'S FIRST MELODY

Folk tune: flute lament

A flute melody mingles with the air, yet the ear keeps it;

What touches the heart in melody is never forgotten.

The daughter was gone, the note remained; from grief a melody was born;

Mohan left the drum and lodged the name within the flute.

The first melody sounded beneath the pipal on a new-moon evening;

The village listened, ears filled, eyes wet and hollow.

The air carried the notes away, yet they remained in the heart;

What once entered the heart flowed on from generation to generation.

The melody joined Shilavati's ritual;

Each generation added a new melody and saved a new name.

Mohan was gone, the melody remained, living in a new voice;

The name housed in melody became immortal with the melody.

This very melody travelled onward and became the beginning of the story;

At the dawn of every chapter, it rose again as a folk song.

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, a melody born of grief joins the ritual and becomes the seed of the tradition that, much later, will appear as the "chapter-opening folk song.")

After Kedar, responsibility for the ritual passed to his daughter Shilavati. In Shilavati's time, the making of drums and mridangas in the leatherworkers' quarter reached its height, and the most gifted musician in the quarter was Mohan—a seventh-generation descendant of Somar, whose fingers could work such magic on a drum that people came from distant villages to hear him play.

Mohan had a little daughter named Radhika, four years old, and he loved her more than his own life. One winter Radhika fell into a high fever. Shilavati, every healer in the village, and Mohan himself tended her day and night, but the fever did not break. On the fifth day Radhika died in her father's lap, her small hand clasped around Mohan's finger.

For many weeks Mohan did not touch his drum. No sound came from his house—neither weeping nor music. The villagers were worried, but no one found the courage to say anything to him.

One evening, just before the new moon, Mohan picked up his drum and went to the pipal. He sat in silence for a long time. Then, very slowly, he began tapping a soft, sorrowful beat with his fingers—irregular at first, then gradually taking on a rhythm, a melody that was neither entirely a lament nor entirely a lullaby, but something between the two.

Hearing it, Budhba said softly, “Mohan, this... this is beautiful, and sorrowful too. What are you playing?”

Mohan, tears in his eyes but his hands steady, said, “Budhba, I am making a melody for Radhika. I know you keep her name, as you keep every name. But I do not want her name to remain only a word. I want her name to become a sound, so that the moment people hear it, their hearts will know that this name was filled with love.”

Hearing this, Shilavati had a new thought. “Mohan, will you help me join this melody to the ritual? On every new moon, whenever we take a name, could a short melody be played to fit the story of that name?”

Mohan agreed. Over the following year he composed a short melody for every old story of the village—for Hulasa, for Jivanti, for Sukhdev, for Ratna—each melody catching the feeling of that person’s life. Hulasa’s melody was gentle and unfinished, breaking off midway just as her final sentence had broken off. Sukhdev’s was slow and full of waiting, then suddenly fell silent. Ratna’s was warm, motherly, and tender.

And Radhika’s melody, the first one he had composed, began to be played at the opening of the ritual on every new-moon night—a kind of mangalacharana, an invocation before the kabaddi began, reminding everyone that this game, this ritual, was ultimately about love, not competition.

“Budhba,” Mohan asked one day, “is it right that I have turned my grief for Radhika into music in this way? Is that not a disrespect to her memory?”

Budhba answered softly, “Mohan, year after year I have saved names with words. You have saved one with melody. Word and melody are, in the end, different forms of the same work: giving love a form that can cross time. Your grief has not been dishonoured; it has been transformed—and transformation, for memory, is the very opposite of disrespect.”

In time, Mohan’s tradition of melodies became deeply joined to Shilavati’s ritual order, and musicians of every generation kept adding new melodies to it—for new names, new stories, new griefs, new hopes. Far in the future, this tradition would take a literary form that some future writer would call the “chapter-opening folk song”: a short song at the beginning of each story, planting the feeling of that story in the heart before the story itself begins.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -73

The Birth of Art from Grief — Musicological and Psychological Perspectives

Chapter -73 gives narrative form to a familiar human experience: the transformation of profound personal grief into artistic expression, often regarded as one of the common sources from which folk-musical traditions arise. Mohan's melody tradition is explicitly linked here, through the "chapter-opening folk song," to the next work (Part 1), which presents a related folk song at the beginning of each chapter. This chapter provides a fictional but emotionally coherent origin story for that literary technique.

CHAPTER -72 (SEVENTY-TWO BEFORE)

Witness to the Wedding

At a wedding, fire is witness, the village is witness, the name is witness —the marriage the village has seen has its vows upon a leaf.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: WITNESS OF THE SEVEN CIRCLINGS

Folk tune: wedding sohar

*At the wedding, fire is witness, village witness, name witness;
Whose wedding the village saw, its vows are upon the leaf.
Under the wedding pavilion the fire burned, the village all around;
The pair circled seven times, their names before everyone.
Mother, father, brother, sister, quarter and neighbourhood stood by;
Whoever saw became witness; whoever witnessed became the foundation.
Seven circlings, seven vows, taken before everyone;
A vow witnessed by the village was never broken.
There was no paper then; the village's eyes were paper;
A vow carried upon the tongue stayed true for generations.
The fire died down, the vow remained; the village kept it in mind;
Whose name the village kept, the witness to that marriage became immortal.
The pair the village saw was never lost;
Their names went upon the leaf and were sung from generation to generation.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, for the first time in many years, a marriage takes place in Garh Narikel that recalls the story of Gangesha and Malati—but this time the village responds differently.)

Shilavati's granddaughter, Anuradha, had been friends since childhood with a young man from the village's Brahmin quarter named Gopinath. They had studied together at the Coconut Leaf School, listened together to the stories of Budhba, and played together in the village field. When they grew older, that friendship became love, and the two wished to marry.

Anuradha's mother asked anxiously, "Anuradha, do you understand how difficult this may be? Some of the older people in the village still believe in caste distinctions."

Anuradha smiled. "Mother, I understand. But I also know the story of our ancestor Gangesha Upadhyaya—how he married Malati, and how society forgot that marriage and remembered only his learning. I do not want our story to be forgotten in the same way."

Gopinath's father, a respected pandit of the village, opposed the marriage at first. But when he went to the pipal to speak with Budhba, Budhba asked him a question for which he had no answer. "Panditji, you know Hulasa's story. You know the stories of Jivanti, Sukhdev, Ratna, and Malati. You know that every great tragedy in this village was connected, in one way or another, with the boundary that human beings draw between caste and class. Why, then, do you wish to raise that same boundary again for your son, when your son himself wishes to break it?"

The pandit remained silent for a long time. Then he said slowly, "Budhba, I am afraid of what people will say."

"Panditji," Budhba replied, "I have centuries of experience, and I can tell you this: what people say changes with time. But the names and the stories I hold do not change. The choice is yours—do you wish to add another tragedy to that list of names, or a new hope?"

At last the pandit agreed. Preparations for the wedding began—and this time both quarters of the village, Brahmin and leatherworker, joined in the preparations together, as though the marriage belonged not only to two people but to the whole village.

On the wedding night, everyone in the village gathered beside the pipal. By now it had become an established custom that every major ceremony should take place beside Budhba's Witness Tree. A descendant of Mohan, still playing the drum, had composed a new melody for Anuradha and Gopinath—festive, hopeful, and, for the first time in this tradition, without any shadow of grief.

At the end of the wedding Budhba gave his blessing—though, as always, his hand remained a finger's breadth above their bodies. "Anuradha, Gopinath," he said, "I was a witness to the marriage of Gangesha and Malati, though I was not present there—I learned their story afterward. But today I am witness to the marriage of you both directly, and I give you this promise: your names, and the story of your love, will be held with as much respect as the names of Hulasa and Jivanti, even though yours is not a story of sorrow but a story of joy."

The village elders, who once could not have imagined such a marriage, accepted a new truth that night: centuries of witnessing, centuries of preserving names, and centuries of education and dialogue had, at last, changed something in the village's heart. The change had been slow and invisible, but now, in the smiling faces of Anuradha and Gopinath, it could plainly be seen.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -72

The Long-Term Nature of Social Change

Chapter -72 offers a hopeful but realistic message: social change, especially in the sphere of caste-based discrimination, does not occur all at once, but results from efforts, education, dialogue, and shared experience accumulated generation after generation. The marriage of Anuradha and Gopinath, explicitly linked to the marriage of Gangesha and Malati in Chapter -91, brings a meaningful circle in the narrative to completion. It shows that a relationship suppressed and forgotten by society centuries earlier can, through accumulated social progress, eventually be accepted openly and joyfully.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER -71 (SEVENTY-ONE BEFORE)

Night of the Epidemic

The epidemic took bodies, but not the song—those who kept vigil together through the night saved the dawn.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE NIGHT THE VILLAGE KEPT VIGIL

Folk tune: vigil melody

*The epidemic took bodies, but could not take the song;
Those who kept vigil together through the night saved the dawn.
A lamp burned in every house; each asked after another;
The dead had their names kept; the living were tended.
Medicine was scarce, hope was thin, but no hand let go;
In the darkness of night, the village bound one to another.
The count of death rose, yet no name was forgotten;
With every body went a story, and every story was kept in mind.
The night grew long; the village endured it together;
Fear was beaten by lamps, darkness driven away by wakefulness.
The night grew long, yet the village remained awake;
Those who kept vigil together were not defeated by the epidemic's darkness.
Dawn came weary, weary, yet all the names survived;
Those who stayed awake for one another made the village whole again.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, an epidemic engulfs Garh Narikel and the surrounding villages—and for the first time Budhba must hold so many names at once that the old method proves inadequate.)

Ten years after the marriage of Anuradha and Gopinath, an unseen calamity came from the east—first as rumour, then in the accounts of travellers and traders, and finally to the very gates of Garh Narikel. A disease whose exact name no one knew was spreading from village to village: high fever, black swellings on the body, and, within three days, very often death.

The first victims were a family at the northern edge of the village—five lives, all within a single week. Then a second family, then a third. Anuradha's daughter Vimala, now keeper of the ritual, watched the village empty before her eyes.

"Budhba," Vimala said beside the pipal, her eyes full of tears, "seventeen lives have gone in one week. Kabaddi is played every new moon, but so many names—how can we remember every one of them properly? How can we give each name its story, each one its proper melody and proper time, when death is arriving so quickly?"

Budhba, himself distressed, remained silent for a long time. "Vimala, in all my centuries I have never encountered anything like this. The old method—one name at a time, one story at a time, slowly—was not made for an outbreak such as this. We will have to think of a new way."

The village physician, a disciple of the tree-physician who had come from the town, brought a new idea of his own: isolate the sick, boil water before drinking it, and burn the clothes and belongings of the dead. These were new, scientific measures whose workings he could not fully explain, but whose effects could be observed: in households that adopted them, the disease weakened.

Yet death continued despite these measures, and Vimala, together with Budhba, devised a new rite: "Collective Remembrance." Every morning, the surviving villagers gathered beside the pipal, and all the names lost during the night were called together, in one voice—not with the full detail of an individual story, but with complete respect. "So-and-so, son of so-and-so; so-and-so, mother of so-and-so—we hold you, today and always."

Though different from the old method, this new practice proved just as effective, for, as Budhba later said, "The depth of love is not measured by the number of words. A brief, sincere calling, in a collective voice, can be as powerful as a long, solitary story."

The epidemic lasted three months, and when it ended, one-third of the village's population was gone—from every quarter, every age, without distinction. But the village did not break completely, because every dead person's name, however briefly, had been held with respect, and the survivors knew they were not mourning alone.

After the epidemic, Vimala asked Budhba, "Budhba, how many names have we held in these three months? Thousands, perhaps."

Budhba answered slowly, "I have not counted, Vimala, and I never will. If numbers become what matters, we shall become slaves to counting, and the uniqueness of every name will disappear. I know only this: every single name, even if it rose for no more than a moment within a collective calling, holds its own full and unique place in my memory. Numbers are forgotten; names are not."

From that day onward, "Collective Remembrance" became a permanent alternative within the village ritual—individual stories in ordinary times, a collective calling in times of crisis: two different forms of the same love.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -71

Ways of Remembering Collective Tragedy

Chapter -71 addresses a practical challenge that every tradition of preserving memory, however devoted, must eventually face: what happens when the number of the dead becomes so great that detailed individual remembrance is impossible. The development of “Collective Remembrance”—a brief communal calling in place of full individual narratives—corresponds to mourning practices that arise in societies after epidemics, wars, or natural disasters. It also shows that, if a tradition is to remain alive, it must be flexible in form while preserving its central feeling and purpose.

CHAPTER -70 (SEVENTY BEFORE)

Planting Channa Grove

A tree that is planted does not give shade in a single day—have patience; the roots take hold first, the leaves come afterward.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: SEED OF THE WITNESS TREE

Folk tune: planting song

*A tree that is planted does not give shade in a single day;
Have patience—the roots take hold first, the leaves come afterward.*

*A tiny seed was placed in the earth, given water, given care;
What is a small shoot today will become a great tree tomorrow.
The village joined hands to plant it, every hand carrying a hope;*

What is planted today is faith in tomorrow.

The roots go deep, the leaves rise above;

The Witness Tree planted today will stand for twelve hundred years.

Generation after generation will sit beneath this tree's shade;

Witness to every joy and sorrow, this pipal will remain.

The tiny seed of today will be a great tree tomorrow;

Generation after generation will sit in the shade of what is planted today.

Be patient, give it water, give the roots time;

The tree planted today will preserve names age after age.

(A passage of narrative fiction. After the epidemic, the village begins a new tradition—planting a new tree for every great remembrance. In this chapter is born the grove that, much later, will be known as “Channa Grove.”)

After the epidemic, Vimala and the village elders arrived at a new idea. “Budhba,” Vimala said, “I want every great sorrow, every great hope, to leave a mark not only in our memory but upon the earth as well. I want us to plant a tree for each one—the families lost in the epidemic, Hulasa and Jivanti, Sukhdev and Ratna, Gangesha and Malati, Anuradha and Gopinath—until a whole grove grows around the pipal.”

Budhba was delighted. “Vimala, it is a beautiful idea. But what tree? The pipal is already my home. The coconut is the village’s identity. We need a new tree, one that can become the identity of this new tradition.”

An elderly farmer of the village, who had travelled in distant lands, suggested a tree called “Channa,” one that grew quickly, gave dense shade, and whose leaves kept up a faint rustling even at night, as though the tree itself were telling stories. “This is a fitting tree for memory,” he said, “because its rustling never falls completely silent, just as memory never falls completely silent.”

The first Channa tree was planted just north of the pipal, in the collective memory of all the families who had died in the epidemic. A second was planted for Hulasa, toward the well. A third, for Jivanti, toward the pond. One by one, year after year, every generation of the village added a new tree for a new remembrance—for Sukhdev, for Ratna, for Gangesha and Malati, for Sonama Majhin, for Yashpati (though his tree was the smallest and stood at the very edge, as the sign of a complicated memory), and later for the joyful marriage of Anuradha and Gopinath.

In time an entire grove grew around the pipal—dense, shaded, and mysteriously alive at night, as though every tree were whispering its own story. The villagers began to call the place “Channa Grove,” and little by little the name became a permanent part of the village geography.

As the grove grew, Budhba himself began to experience something new—as though he were now bound not only to one tree, but to every tree in the grove, to the roots of every one of them. “Vimala,” he said one evening, “I feel as though I have become more extensive than before. Once I was one tree. Now I am an entire grove—in Hulasa’s tree, in Jivanti’s tree, in every tree, I am present in one form or another.”

Budhba thought for a moment, then said, “Perhaps both, Vimala. A single tree may fall ill from insects; it may be brought down in a storm. But an entire grove can never be destroyed completely all at once—some root, somewhere, will always survive. Perhaps this is my protection for what lies ahead, Vimala. Without knowing it, you have given me a body safer than a single tree.”

From that day onward, Channa Grove became the most sacred and important place in the village. The pipal was its heart, but all around it spread the Channa trees, each carrying its own story, its own name, its own melody composed by Mohan’s descendants—a living library that required no letters to read, only reverence and memory.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -70

The Idea of a Memory Forest — The Origin of “Channa Grove”

Chapter -70 presents the origin story of Channa Grove, the most central geographical and cultural place in Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles, Parts 1 and 2. The practice of planting a memorial tree for an important death or event exists in many cultures around the world; this chapter places that universal human impulse within the story’s particular geography. Budhba’s existence expanding from a single tree into an entire grove is also a powerful metaphor: memory remains fragile when it is concentrated in only one place or one person, but becomes more durable when it is extended, distributed, and shared by a community.

CHAPTER -69 (SIXTY-NINE BEFORE)

The Tale of the Elephant and the Crocodile

The elephant in the water, the crocodile in the water—the struggle goes on for years; but the hand of deliverance comes to the one who calls a name.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: DELIVERANCE THROUGH THE CALLING OF A NAME

Folk tune: Gaja-Moksha melody

The elephant in the water, the crocodile in the water—the struggle went on for years;

But deliverance came to the one who called a name.

Gajaraj was mighty, immeasurable strength in his trunk;

But the crocodile gripped him deep, the water deep, the darkness deep.

Years passed, strength tired, defeat drew near;

Then the elephant remembered not his strength, but a name.

Strength failed; the weary elephant then called one name;

The name held in memory became the very name of his deliverance.

Whoever clung only to his own strength sank into the water;

Whoever called the name with folded hands found the shore.

The water is deep, but the name is deeper—there lies its strength;

Whoever called the name one final time was saved from drowning.

Generation after generation the village told this tale of elephant and crocodile;

Whoever kept hold of the name escaped every crocodile.

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, an elephant of the village is caught in a crocodile's grip in Jori Pokhari, and the villagers save him by bringing the ancient tale of Gajendra-Moksha together with their own local tradition. From here onward, the term "Gaja-Graha" will recur repeatedly in the later part of the story.)

After Vimala, responsibility for the ritual passed to her son, Suryanath. In Suryanath's time, the village temple kept an elephant named Gajaraj for festivals and processions. One summer afternoon, Gajaraj slipped away from his mahout and entered the deeper part of Jori Pokhari to drink.

Suddenly the water erupted. Gajaraj screamed and raised his trunk into the air. One of his legs, beneath the water, had been seized by something—a huge crocodile that had not touched any village animal for a very long time, because of the offering tradition begun by Sonama Majhin, but which, for some unknown reason, had now clamped its jaws around the elephant's leg.

A crowd gathered, but no one had the courage to act. Terrified, the mahout cried, "Gajaraj will die! Someone help me!"

Among the crowd was an elderly pandit, learned in the Puranic tales. He shouted, “This is like the story of Gajendra-Moksha! The Purana tells of an elephant-king named Gajendra who was once seized in just this way by a crocodile. He struggled for thousands of years but could not free himself by his own strength. At last, when Gajendra gave up all pride and called only upon God, God himself came and saved him. We too must pray!”

Hearing this, Suryanath ran to the pipal. “Budhba! Gajaraj is dying! What must we do?”

Budhba, present in every drop of the water, had already sensed the danger. “Suryanath, the pandit is right—but prayer alone is not enough, just as reason alone is not enough. We need both: collective prayer for Gajaraj, and practical help at the same time.”

Suryanath summoned everyone in the village and set two efforts in motion at once. The pandit and the village men and women stood at the pond’s edge and began to pray aloud—the ancient verses of Gajendra, together with the kabaddi ritual’s own special invocation: “Original Crocodile! We do not deny you! But Gajaraj is ours, just as your own waters are yours. Give us his life, and tonight we shall make you a special offering.”

At the same time, the strongest young men of the village used ropes and bamboo poles to work Gajaraj’s trapped leg slowly free, without hurting him further and without directly challenging the crocodile—only applying pressure patiently, from an angle.

After a long struggle, the crocodile suddenly loosened its grip and vanished into the deep water, as though it too had understood that this battle was not meant for it. Gajaraj, weak but alive, reached the bank, and a roar of joy rose from the crowd.

That night, as promised, the villagers made a special offering to the Original Crocodile. Then Budhba addressed the village: “Today you saw that an ancient tale and our local tradition are different forms of the same truth. When any creature—elephant or human—is caught in the grip of a force beyond its own strength, it needs both prayer and effort; neither is enough alone. Gajaraj’s story will now become part of our memory—the Tale of the Elephant and the Crocodile, reminding us always that release from a grip, whether the grip is upon the body in water or upon the mind, never comes through one thing alone.”

The Confluence of the Gajendra-Moksha Tale and Local Folk Tradition

Chapter -69 joins the celebrated Gajendra-Moksha story of the Bhagavata Purana with the local mythic-folk tradition of the “Original Crocodile,” showing how a great classical narrative and a local oral tradition can express the same deep human truth in different languages. The term “Gaja-Graha,” which readers will encounter metaphorically in Part I as the “inner Gaja-Graha,” a modern digital and psychological entanglement, receives its literal narrative origin here—a lasting symbol of the combined necessity of strength and devotion, reason and surrender.

CHAPTER -68 (SIXTY-EIGHT BEFORE)

The First Court Date

Date after date, yet justice lives upon the leaf—the court asks for the body; the village keeps the name.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: JUSTICE UPON THE LEAF

Folk tune: courthouse song

*Date after date, yet justice lives upon the leaf;
The court asks for the body, but the village keeps the name.*

*The sahib's court is far away, choked with paper;
Every new date is another burden; the poor man's breath grows tight.
But beneath the village pipal, justice sits face to face;
Whoever saw spoke; whoever spoke stood forth as witness.*

The paper changed and seals were struck, but truth remained the same;

*What the village kept in mind no hearing date could erase.
The court wrote and read; the village held it in the throat;
Justice that entered the tongue survived through generations.*

*The court is far away; beside the pipal the village keeps its own justice;
The testimony of a name the village holds can never lose.
Dates come and go; the name remains upon the leaf;
No seal can shake a truth the village itself has known.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter a new formal court enters the village's system of justice—and with it is sown the seed of a new, slow hunger that much later will be known as the "Ghost of the Court.")

After Suryanath, responsibility for the ritual passed to his daughter Kamalini. In Kamalini's time, under the state's new administrative order, a formal court was established for Garh Narikel and the surrounding villages—a masonry building with an appointed judge and written rules and laws, replacing Acharya Keshav's old informal council of justice.

At first the villagers welcomed the new arrangement, because written law, in principle, granted equal rights to every person, whatever their caste. But slowly a new problem emerged. Filing a case in the new court was easy; receiving a decision was painfully slow. A simple land dispute that the old hall of debate might have heard in a single day now dragged on for years—the first date, then the second, then the third, each adjourned for one technical reason or another.

Kamalini's neighbour, a poor farmer named Bhola, became trapped in a small land dispute. A neighbour's cattle had ruined his field, and Bhola went to court seeking compensation. Three years passed, yet the case was still being pushed to "the next date." Each time Bhola travelled to court he lost a day's labour and returned home without a decision.

"Budhba," Kamalini said anxiously beside the pipal, "this new court is good because it regards everyone as equal. But I fear it is creating a new kind of injustice—the injustice of dates. People like Bhola are losing the precious time of their lives while waiting and waiting for justice."

Budhba grew grave. "Kamalini, I remember that many years ago Sukhdev Mahato died because of the order of the water-clock: his turn never came. This new court looks different from that water-clock, yet I fear the root of the problem is the same. Time, instead of serving justice, can sometimes become an obstacle to justice."

One day Bhola sat on the court veranda waiting for his next hearing, exhausted and dispirited. An elderly lawyer beside him, a man who had worked in the court for many years, gave a faint laugh. "Bhola, you are new here. You do not yet understand. This court has a hunger we call 'the date.' It is made of paper, but it eats human time, human patience, and sometimes an entire human life."

Bhola shuddered. He went to the pipal and repeated the lawyer's words to Budhba. Budhba remained silent for a long while. "Bhola," he said at last, "those words frighten me. It seems to me that this new system, for all its good intentions, is giving birth to a new kind of ghost—a ghost made not by the injustice of any one person, but by the slowness of the whole system. It will not be a single human being. It will be the spirit of the hearing date itself, the spirit of delay."

Hearing this, Kamalini made a new resolve. "Budhba, I cannot change the court system; it is the law of the state. But I can do this much: every person of the village who becomes trapped in court shall receive help, advice, and companionship while waiting, so that no one has to carry that burden alone.”

Bhola’s case was finally decided after five years—in his favour. By then, however, his field had been ruined for years and his children had grown up hungry. Watching this, Budhba said sadly, “I have kept Bhola’s name, and I have kept his five years of waiting too. Perhaps this also is my work: to be not only a witness to death, but a witness to waiting.”

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -68

The Problem of Delay in the Justice System

Chapter -68 places an acutely relevant modern social problem within a historical setting: procedural delay in the justice system, the reality behind the principle “justice delayed is justice denied.” The chapter clearly plants the narrative seed of the “Ghost of the Court” in Parts 1 and 2—the creature that feeds on “date after date” and is said to be more dangerous than a crocodile. It shows that institutional injustice need not arise from individual malice; it can also emerge automatically from structural weakness in a system, despite good intentions.

CHAPTER -67 (SIXTY-SEVEN BEFORE)

The Call of Distant Lands

Distant lands give money and carry away the name—but one who keeps the village in mind is not lost even abroad.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: LETTER FROM ABROAD

Folk tune: Bidesiya

*Distant lands give money, yet carry away the name;
One who keeps the village in mind is not lost even abroad.*

*The son left at dawn; his mother stood in the doorway,
A bundle of clothes tied up, and with it the village as his ground.
In a far country he earned his wage, sweating day and night;
But when evening fell, his thoughts returned to the village.*

*The body went to a distant land; the name remained in the courtyard;
Whoever sent his name home in a letter had not forgotten the house.
Money came by money order, with two lines bearing a name;*

Whoever sent the name with it preserved both home and village.

Money comes and goes, but the name stays firm;

One who knows his village is no stranger even across seven seas.

Whoever earned money and forgot the village returned a stranger;

Whoever kept the name with him found the house still watching the road.

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, for the first time, a labour recruiter arrives at the village gate selling dreams of work in distant lands—and Budhba faces a new question: how can he witness a name that has left the village and travelled far away?)

After Kamalini, responsibility for the ritual passed to her daughter Janaki. In Janaki's time, a new kind of man appeared for the first time at the village gate—a sweet tongue, bright clothes, and a bundle of papers in his hand. "There is work in a distant country!" he called. "A three-year contract, good wages, and a return home when the work is done! Anyone who wants freedom from the village's poverty should come and speak with me."

Many poor families with little land or mounting debt were drawn to the offer. Bhola's grandson, Ramsevak, seeing his family's hardship, put his thumbprint on the recruiter's paper without being able to read—or have fully read to him—what it actually said.

On the night before Ramsevak left, his mother went to the pipal. "Budhba, my son is going to a distant country. I am afraid. If something happens to him there, thousands of kos away from us, who will preserve his name? Your power is here, beside this grove and pond and village. How will you reach him there?"

Budhba fell into deep thought. "I do not know, Mother. My power is bound to this grove, this pond, this village's memory. I do not know how far I can see, how far my witnessing can reach."

Janaki found an answer. "Budhba, if your power cannot reach so far, then we shall make a custom that fills the gap. For every person who leaves the village for distant lands, we shall place a small token—a pebble or a thread—among the pipal roots. On every new-moon night we shall call that person's name as well, whether living or dead, whether we know what has happened to them or not. At least then the name will remain safe here in the village's memory, wherever the body may be."

So the custom called "The Call of Distant Lands" was established. At the end of every new-moon kabaddi, the name of each villager who had gone abroad was called one by one, and the person's token—a pebble or thread—was touched to the pipal roots. If news came that someone had died in a distant land, the token was honoured specially. If no news came for years, it remained there waiting, belonging wholly neither to the living nor to the dead.

Ramsevak, sadly, never returned. No news of him ever arrived—not a letter, not a message, only silence. Year after year, on every new-moon night, his mother came to the pipal, touched his token, listened to his name being called, and went home.

"Budhba," she asked one day, "is my son alive, or dead?"

Budhba answered honestly, "Mother, I do not know. I will not lie to you. But I promise you this: whether he is living or dead, whether he ever returns or not, I will keep his name exactly as I keep every other name of this village. Distance cannot erase a name, Mother. It can only lengthen uncertainty."

With the birth of this custom, Garh Narikel's tradition of memory began for the first time to think beyond its geographical boundaries. It accepted that in the future the village's children would travel to distant countries, and that memory, if it wished to survive, would have to imagine itself beyond the limits of its own grove.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -67

Indentured Labour and the Migrant Worker's Crisis of Memory

Chapter -67 offers an early evocation of the colonial "girmitiya" system of indentured labour, under which thousands of workers from Bihar and elsewhere in India—often exploited through illiteracy and poverty—were taken to distant colonies such as Mauritius, Fiji, and the Caribbean, and many never returned. The development of "The Call of Distant Lands" asks how memory and witness can operate across geographical distance, a question that strongly echoes the modern migrant-labour crisis later encountered in Parts 1 and 2 through Hong Kong and digital fraud.

The Women's Night Assembly

Where women's voices gather, darkness grows thin—the night assembly breaks darkness even without a lamp.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: VOICES THAT BREAK THE DARK

Folk tune: night-assembly song

*Where women's voices gather, darkness grows thin;
Even without a lamp, the night assembly breaks the dark.*

*Evening fell, the day's work ended, the women gathered;
In one corner of the courtyard, hidden thoughts opened.*

*One spoke her sorrow; another listened in silence;
Shared pain grew lighter, and the fever of the heart subsided.*

*One woman spoke and ten listened; sorrow became shared;
The one who had trembled alone stood fearless among them all.
What had been hidden inside the house rose in the assembly;
Voice joined voice, and darkness moved backward.*

*Voice joined voice, and darkness retreated;
No ghost can frighten women who stand together.
There may have been no lamp, but the light of voices burned;
Those who spoke together watched their fear run away.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter the informal women's platform inherited from Phulesari takes formal shape for the first time as "The Women's Night Assembly," a name that will reappear much later in Part I.)

After Janaki, responsibility for the ritual passed to her daughter Sulochana. In Sulochana's time, the new court, despite all its good intentions, revealed a clear deficiency: women's cases—especially domestic disputes, dowry, inheritance, and abuse by husbands—were often either left unheard or judged from the perspective of male judges far removed from women's lived experience.

One such case arose. A village woman named Padma, whose husband had beaten her for years, went to court seeking justice. The judge heard her and said, "This is a domestic matter. A husband and wife should settle such things outside the court." Padma returned home defeated.

Sulochana was furious when she heard. She went to the pipal. “Budhba, the court dismissed Padma’s suffering as a ‘domestic matter.’ But this is not a domestic matter; it is injustice. We must do something.”

Budhba said, “Sulochana, do you remember Ratna, Gauri, Phulesari—all those women who sat on the platform after dusk, sharing knowledge, justice, and strategy because the official assembly would not hear them? That tradition never ended, Sulochana. It merely remained informal. Perhaps the time has come to give it a formal shape.”

With Phulesari’s descendants and the other women of the village, Sulochana founded a new institution: “The Women’s Night Assembly.” Parallel to the official court, it heard women’s cases—domestic violence, dowry harassment, injustice in inheritance. Its decisions had no formal legal force, yet the village’s social pressure was so powerful that men were usually compelled to accept them.

In Padma’s case the Night Assembly summoned her husband and his family and held a hearing. One by one, the women of the village gave testimony: they had seen Padma’s bruises; they had heard her weeping. The husband’s family denied everything at first, but when the entire body of village women spoke with one voice, they had to yield. The Night Assembly ruled that the husband must change his behaviour; if he beat Padma again, she would be free to return to her mother’s home, and the village would support her and her children.

Budhba heard the decision with satisfaction. “Sulochana, today you completed the work that Ratna, Gauri, and Phulesari had the courage to begin long ago but that no one had yet dared to formalise. Women’s knowledge and women’s justice have stepped out of the darkness of the platform and into the village light, standing there under their own name.”

In time the Night Assembly became a permanent part of village life, moving alongside the official court and filling its gaps. Much later, in the modern age, it would change its form and take a new name, yet remain a durable voice for the women of Garh Narikel.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -66

The Historical Role of Parallel Institutions of Women’s Justice

Chapter -66 gives narrative form to an important social and institutional development: when a formal, largely male-dominated justice system cannot adequately address women’s particular experiences and needs, women often develop parallel systems of justice—informal, yet socially powerful. The formalisation of “The Women’s Night Assembly” is presented as the strong, positive culmination of the women's-platform tradition established in Chapter -91, "The Seed of the Witch": what history once named in the language of fear as "witch" can ultimately become an acknowledged institution of justice.

CHAPTER -65 (SIXTY-FIVE BEFORE)

Procession of the False Ghost

A false ghost frightens only one who has forgotten his name—one whose name is firm laughs at the ghostly procession.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE CRY OF “WHO ARE YOU?”

Folk tune: ghost-banishing song

*A false ghost frightens only one who has forgotten his name;
One whose name is firm laughs at the ghostly procession.*

*Deep night, the village asleep—the procession came out;
Sheets and drums made a racket; a market of fear was set up.*

*Someone wished to sell fear, someone wished to rule;
Wrapped in the shawl of darkness, they tried to conquer the village.*

*Wrapped in sheets and beating drums, someone came to sell fear;
But before the one who asked “Who are you?” the ghost fled.*

*One courageous voice rose, holding a lamp;
It asked the name, stripped away the sheet, and the ghost stood nameless.*

*A procession of darkness is weak before light;
One who knows how to ask a name need fear no false ghost.
The one who came to sell fear ran away afraid;
The village learned to question, and the procession stopped.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, for the first time, someone misuses Budhba's name—and the village must answer a new question: how can one distinguish a true witness from a false claim?)

After Sulochana, responsibility for the ritual passed to her son Harinandan. By Harinandan's time, the fame of “The Women's Night Assembly” and “Budhba's ritual” had spread through neighbouring villages—and wherever fame spreads, imitation sometimes follows.

A travelling man named Kalicharan began moving from village to village proclaiming himself “the true spirit of Budhba.” At night he staged processions with a few hired “ghosts”—assistants wrapped in cloth and carrying lights—and extorted money from frightened villagers, saying that “Budhba himself” demanded a “special worship” in order to preserve their names.

News reached Garh Narikel when a family from a neighbouring village, after giving Kalicharan all its savings, realised it had been cheated and came to Garh Narikel to meet the real Budhba.

“Budhba,” Harinandan said angrily beside the pipal, “a man is cheating people in your name! He stages false processions, displays false ghosts, and takes money from poor families. What should we do?”

Budhba remained silent for a long time. “Harinandan, this saddens me, but it teaches me something too. Whatever is true and valuable eventually becomes valuable enough for some opportunist to imitate. This is not the failure of our tradition; it is a sorrowful by-product of its success.”

“But how do we stop it?” Harinandan asked.

Budhba thought, then said, “Harinandan, there is one clear distinction between a true witness and a false claim, and it is our work to teach the village. A true witness never asks for money. A true witness never sells fear for profit. A true witness asks only for a name, and in return gives love and memory—nothing else. Whoever uses the fear of ghosts to demand money, however impressive the performance, does not walk my path.”

Harinandan carried this teaching through the neighbouring villages: “The true tradition never asks for money; it asks only for name and memory. Anyone who demands money is a fraud.” This simple test proved enough to protect villagers from opportunists like Kalicharan. Seeing his business collapse, Kalicharan slipped away one night with his “hired ghosts.”

The incident became known in village memory as “The Procession of the False Ghost,” a cautionary tale told to every new generation: “Whoever claims to be a witness but asks for money is not a witness; he is a thief.”

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -65

Spiritual Exploitation and the Test of Authenticity

Chapter -65 addresses a universal social problem: when a true and respected spiritual or cultural tradition becomes famous, opportunists arise who imitate it in order to exploit the innocent financially. Budhba's simple test—"a true witness never asks for money"—offers a practical, universally applicable defence against spiritual exploitation. The title "Procession of the False Ghost" appears directly in Part 1; here it receives its narrative origin.

CHAPTER -64 (SIXTY-FOUR BEFORE)

Sukhdev's Revenge

Revenge is fire—it burns your own hand first; the one who chose forgiveness saved the village.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE ROAD OF FORGIVENESS

Folk tune: plaintive peace melody

*Revenge is fire; it burns your own hand first;
The one who chose forgiveness saved the village.*

*Sukhdev's heart burned; the injustice ran deep;
His hand trembled for fire, his mind grew restless.
The village watched his face—what road would he take?
If he took revenge the village would burn; if he forgave, it would live.*

*Sukhdev burned within, but he did not light the fire;
The man who bore the wound saved the village from burning.
He understood: the fire of revenge first burns one's own hand,
Then the house, then the quarter, then the entire village.*

*Revenge takes a moment; forgiveness endures an age;
The village remembered the name of the one who did not light the fire.
The man who swallowed the wound in silence became the village's guardian;
Sukhdev's forgiveness was told from generation to generation.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, the land of the leatherworkers' quarter is threatened once again, just as it was in Sukhdev Mahato's time. But this time the village has new weapons in its hands.)

After Harinandan, responsibility for the ritual passed to his daughter Champavati. In Champavati's time, under a new state revenue system, all land was surveyed again. During this survey a new landlord named Raghubir Singh—unrelated to Ugrasen Thakur of Sukhdev Mahato's time, though coincidentally similar in temperament—laid claim to the land of the leatherworkers' quarter, arguing that the old records were unclear and that the land had originally belonged to his ancestors.

Champavati did not panic as Bhola's family had many generations earlier. She went to the pipal. "Budhba, history is circling back. But this time I am not afraid, because we possess weapons Sukhdev did not have."

First Champavati went to the village archive, where a copy of Yadavanand Jha's "shadow register"—the old private notebook preserved by his descendants from generation to generation—was kept. It recorded the land rights of the leatherworkers' quarter clearly, with dates and witnesses, from the time of Somar and Ratna.

She also summoned young lawyers educated at the Coconut-Leaf School and prepared the village's case in court. The Women's Night Assembly used its social influence to unite the entire village in public support against Raghubir Singh's claim. Haripati's old book, preserved through generations of disciples, was produced as evidence—a trustworthy testimony to the village's history.

Raghubir Singh could produce no solid evidence for his claim and lost in court. Looking at Champavati's documents, the judge remarked, "I have rarely seen records so detailed and consistent across so many years. They are evidence of this village's own historical consciousness."

When Budhba heard the judgment he said with deep satisfaction, "Champavati, today I have seen Sukhdev's revenge—but not as retaliation, as justice. Sukhdev, whose case never reached its turn in court, has seen the land of his descendants preserved through the memory of his name, the registers of his ancestors, the education of his village, and the unity of its women. This was not the work of one miracle, Champavati. It was the fruit of generations of accumulated effort—Yadavanand's notebook, Haripati's book, Mandakini's school, Sulochana's Night Assembly—all bearing fruit together in this moment."

Champavati's eyes filled with tears. "Budhba, then none of our ancestors' struggles were wasted?"

"No, Champavati," Budhba said softly. "No struggle is wasted if its memory remains alive. That is why I have kept witness all these years: to see how small efforts, gathered year after year, eventually become a strength that no single oppressor can shake."

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -64

The Power of Accumulated Community Capacity

Chapter -64 brings one strand of the narrative cycle to a meaningful completion. The theme of land injustice that began with Sukhdev Mahato's tragedy in Chapter -92 now produces the opposite outcome, because centuries of accumulated community capacity—literacy, documentation, legal knowledge, and women's solidarity—have changed what is possible. The chapter argues that long-term social investment in education, records, and organisation provides a more durable and dependable defence of justice than individual heroism.

CHAPTER -63 (SIXTY-THREE BEFORE)

The First Page from the Press

The first printed page—a name is harder to erase now; what is printed, the whole village will read.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE FIRST PRINTED NAME

Folk tune: printing-press mangal

The first printed page—now a name is harder to erase;

What is printed, the whole village will read.

*Iron letters were set in rows, black ink laid upon them;
The machine turned by hand, and the first strange line was printed.*

*The name that until then had lived only in the throat
Now descended upon the page and entered a thousand hands.*

*The name that reached paper will survive from generation to generation;
What had been written on a leaf will now pass into a thousand hands.*

*One page became ten, ten spread into hundreds;
The village that sat in one place reached across the country.*

*The ink has set; the letters have gone throughout the village;
Once a thing is printed, even a flood cannot wash it away.*

*Fire cannot burn it all, water cannot carry it all away;
A name once printed remains from age to age.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, the first printing press opens in a town near the village—and, many generations later, a descendant of Haripati tries to fulfil an unfinished ancestral dream through a new technology.)

After Champavati, responsibility for the ritual passed to her son Devakinandan. In Devakinandan's time, a printing press opened for the first time in the town a few kos from the village, and books began to be printed there in both Maithili and Hindi. News of it spread rapidly through the whole region. Villagers who had known only palm-leaf manuscripts or papers copied by hand were eager to see this new wonder—a machine that could print hundreds of identical pages in a single day.

Haripati Gangadhar, a seventh-generation descendant of Haripati Kavi (named in honour of his ancestor), was now a young writer and publisher who lived and worked in the town. He had inherited the old secret palm-leaf book of his ancestor—the story of Budhba, the stories of Hulasa, Jivanti and Sukhdev, the story of Gangesha and Malati—all of it preserved from generation to generation through the lineage of disciples.

When Gangadhar saw the wonder of the press, he ran to Garh Narikel. “Devakinandan!” he cried excitedly. “I possess our ancestor’s book—the complete story of Budhba! Now we can print it! We can make hundreds of copies! The story will never be lost again, no matter how many centuries pass!”

Hearing this, Devakinandan went to the pipal. “Budhba! A new machine has arrived that can print your story in thousands of copies! Haripati Gangadhar wants to do it! What should I tell him?”

Budhba remained silent for a long time—the silence that comes before a great decision. “Devakinandan, I remember that an ancestor of Haripati Kavi once asked whether this story should be written, and I said that if it were written it should be written not in the ornamented language of a royal court but in the ordinary language of the village. Today the question is different: should this story be printed in thousands of copies?”

“What do you think, Budhba?” Devakinandan asked.

“I am afraid,” Budhba said slowly, “that if the story is printed today, it is still incomplete. Subhagi, Yashpati, Padma, Ramsevak—so many names are still being added. If we print it now, the story will close into a fixed form while it is still alive, still growing. Perhaps... perhaps the time to print it has not yet come. Perhaps it will continue to grow for many more years and gather many more names, until—far in the future—it truly comes near completion.”

At first Gangadhar was disappointed, but then he understood. “Budhba is right. We should not hurry. But I make one promise: I, and my descendants, will preserve this book, and when the time comes—when the story is truly complete—some descendant of mine will print it for the whole world.”

Meanwhile, in his town press, Gangadhar printed several other small village books—the curriculum of the Coconut-Leaf School, the rules of the Women’s Night Assembly, a collection of the village’s agricultural knowledge—joining the village’s traditional knowledge with modern learning. But Budhba’s complete story, in its full form, remained still unwritten, still oral, still alive.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -63

The Arrival of Printing Technology and the Future of Oral Tradition

Chapter -63 marks an important technological transition: the arrival of printing, which brought a revolutionary change in the history of Indian-language literature. Budhba's decision not to print the story yet, but to let it remain living and developing, is an interesting example of the narrative cycle's own self-awareness: the story itself knows that it is not yet complete. The decision becomes, long in advance, an echo of the eventual real publication of Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles.

CHAPTER -62 (SIXTY-TWO BEFORE)

Waiting for Relief

Eyes grow tired waiting for relief, yet the village stands—when people wait together, even waiting grows lighter.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: WAITING ON THE ROAD

Folk tune: famine song

Waiting for relief, our eyes have grown tired;

Yet the village stands, each holding another's hand.

The grain has dried, the storehouse is empty, the sky merciless;

Every eye is fixed on the road, relief a distant hope.

But the village shared what remained, grain by handfuls;

Even hungry bellies smiled when everyone shared with one mind.

Little grain, thin hope, yet the name did not break;

Those who waited together found even waiting lighter.

They asked after one another, shared and endured sorrow;

In the darkness of famine the village remained one.

Hunger comes and goes; the village remains in its place;

Those who sat together and shared grief did not lose even to famine.

Whether relief comes or not, the village itself stands;

Those who endured famine together did not lose their foundation.

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, under British rule, a terrible famine strikes—and the village must learn the difference between sitting in expectation of government help and organising itself.)

After Devakinandan, responsibility for the ritual passed to his daughter Savitridevi (named in honour of the earlier Savitri). By Savitridevi's time British rule had been established across the region. One year the rains failed completely: the fields cracked, the granaries emptied, and hunger stood at the doors of the village.

When government officials heard of the famine, they announced relief programmes—grain-distribution centres, food-for-work schemes, and medical assistance. The plans looked excellent on paper. In practice, the nearest relief centre was twenty kos from the village, and registration was so complicated that many starving families grew weak before they could even be enrolled.

Seeing this, Savitridevi went to the pipal. “Budhba, the government says help is coming, but that help is still twenty kos away, and our children are hungry today. What should we do?”

Budhba replied, “Savitridevi, do you remember Sukhdev Mahato, who died while waiting for his turn under the water-clock? Do you remember Bhola, who lost precious years waiting for court dates? Waiting can sometimes become a kind of death in itself. I think that while you wait for government help, you must also organise yourselves.”

Drawing on the experienced leadership of the Women’s Night Assembly, Savitridevi made an emergency plan for the village. Every family contributed, according to its capacity, to a common grain store. Young people educated at the Coconut-Leaf School kept an account of the grain needs of every household and ensured equal distribution. Around Channa Grove, the villagers set up communal kitchens where, every day, however little grain there might be, everyone received something.

Descendants of Sonama Majhin used their old knowledge of water to teach new methods of fishing in those parts of the Kamala-Balan where some water still remained. Ratna’s descendants used their knowledge of herbs to identify wild edible roots and tubers that the village children could eat to survive hunger.

When, at last, three months later, the government relief party reached the village, it was astonished: not one life in the village had been lost to the famine, while many neighbouring villages that had continued waiting for government aid had already suffered heavily.

Seeing the village’s arrangements, the relief officer asked, “How did you manage this without our help?”

Savitridevi replied, “Sahib, for centuries we have been taught that waiting without effort is not justice; it is only delay. We did not refuse your help. We simply refused to believe that without it we were helpless.”

Hearing this, Budhba said proudly, “Savitridevi, today you have proved the lesson I have tried to teach for hundreds of years: to bear witness and to wait are two different things. I preserve names so that you may live in memory; but to live in life, you yourselves must act, not merely wait.”

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -62

Colonial Famine Policy and Community Self-Reliance

Chapter -62 touches the historical complexity of famine management in colonial India, where government relief policy, however orderly it appeared on paper, often proved inadequate in practice because of bureaucratic delay and geographical distance. The chapter emphasises the power of community self-reliance and mutual aid, showing how social capital accumulated over centuries—organisational capacity, shared resources, and diverse traditions of knowledge—can keep a community alive even in the absence of external assistance.

CHAPTER -61 (SIXTY-ONE BEFORE)

The Comet in the Sky

Comets come and go; the village remains—what shines above does not change the names below.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: STAR AND EARTH

Folk tune: sky song

The comet comes and goes, yet the village remains;

What shines above does not change the names below.

*A tail spread across the sky; the village looked up and shuddered;
The elders said calamity was coming, and fear filled every mind.*

*One said the end would come; another said famine;
But the earth stayed silent, in its own place, in its own time.*

The sky may frighten, the elders may frighten, but the earth stands firm;

*What flashes above is momentary; the names below endure.
The star came, the star went; the village remained where it was;
Whoever stayed joined to the roots neither feared nor lost the way.*

*Stars break and join; the village goes on living;
Whoever knows the roots does not fear the glitter of the sky.
The brilliance above changed; the names below remained the same;
Whoever held fast to the earth did not let the mind be shaken.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, an extraordinary comet appears in the sky—and the frightened villagers ask Budhba what calamity it foretells.)

After Savitridevi, responsibility for the ritual passed to her son Rudranath. One autumn night an extraordinary sight appeared in the sky: a star with a long, shining tail that moved slowly, night after night, from one corner of the heavens toward the other. The villagers, who had never seen such a thing, were frightened.

“This is inauspicious!” cried an old village astrologer. “The ancient texts say a comet foretells the death of a king, war, famine, or epidemic! We must fear that some great calamity is near!”

Rudranath, himself anxious, went to the pipal. “Budhba, your sight reaches beyond time. Can you see what this comet signifies?”

Budhba looked at the sky for a long time and said slowly, “Rudranath, my sight, as you know, is sometimes clear and sometimes lost in mist. Tonight I feel an indistinct fear, as though a great and difficult time is drawing near. But I will also tell you this: the star itself brings no calamity. It moves through the sky according to its own law, unaware of human fate. Whatever calamity comes will come not from the star but from causes upon the earth itself—from water, fire, or disease. The star is only a sign that we should be alert, not a culprit.”

Hearing this, Rudranath instructed every quarter of the village to remain alert: secure the grain stores, keep water sources clean, and report immediately any sign of illness. As it later became clear, this vigilance was not wasted effort.

The comet remained in the sky for three weeks and then slowly disappeared. But as it vanished, the air of the village grew strangely heavy, as though an invisible cloud, an invisible fire, and invisible water were hovering together around Garh Narikel.

That night Budhba moved through Channa Grove touching every tree—if “touching” is the right word for a being whose touch is itself a shadow—deep in thought. “Primal crocodile,” he whispered alone, “do you feel this weight too? I think some great cycle is turning again, just as it turned in the times of Hulasā, Jivanti and Sukhdev—but this time, perhaps, in three forms at once.”

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -6I

Astronomical Events and Folk Belief

Chapter -6I uses the appearance of a comet—historically interpreted in many cultures of the world as an evil omen—to prepare the ground for the next phase of the story. Budhba’s rational but cautious response—the star itself is not to blame, yet vigilance is necessary—offers a balanced path between superstition and complete dismissal. After this chapter, the narrative describes a three-level chain of crises: fire, flood, and epidemic, the final and harshest test of the village’s accumulated capacities.

CHAPTER -60 (SIXTY BEFORE)

Night of Fire

Fire took the houses, not the names—from the ashes of that burning night, a new hearth was lit.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: NEW FIRE FROM ASHES

Folk tune: fire song

*Fire took the houses, but could not take the names;
From the ashes of that burning night, a new hearth was lit.*

*The night was deep; suddenly the flames rose;
Thatch blazed, walls fell, and the villagers ran.
Fire could take bodies, could take roofs and walls;
But the name settled in the throat it could not burn.*

*Walls fell and roofs burned, yet the village stood;
Those who survived rebuilt; those who died were kept by name.*

*Sitting upon heaps of ash, the village rose again;
Holding one another's hands, new houses were built.*

*The ashes cooled and a new fire was kindled;
A village that rose together was born again from fire.
What burned was not erased; by name it was born again;
A new hearth was lit from ash, and smoke rose once more.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. One month after the comet disappears, the most terrible fire in the village's history breaks out—and Channa Grove itself is placed in danger.)

On a fiercely hot night in Jeth, a lamp kept near the village rice store was knocked down by a gust of wind and fell upon dry straw. In an instant the fire flared up, and the wind, unusually strong that night, carried it from one house to another and from one quarter to the next.

Rudranath's daughter Indrani, now guardian of the ritual, saw the red glow from her window and cried out. "Fire! Fire! The whole village is burning!" She ran from door to door, beating on each one.

Waking from sleep, the villagers rushed outside with water, sand, and wet cloths to fight the flames. But the wind was so strong that the fire defeated every effort. Ten houses in the Brahmin quarter, five in the Kayastha quarter, and even part of the temple burned. Most terrifying of all, the fire began moving toward Channa Grove.

"Budhba!" Indrani cried, running toward the grove. "The fire is reaching your trees! What should we do?"

From within the grove, Budhba answered in a voice Indrani had never heard before—a mixture of fear and resolve. "Indrani, I do not know whether I myself can stop fire. My power is of memory, not flame. But I remember one possibility—Jori Pond. If you can turn water toward the grove, perhaps..."

Indrani understood at once and sent every able-bodied villager running toward the pond. Hundreds of hands carried bucket after bucket of pond water toward the grove. Drawing on its organising strength, the Women's Night Assembly formed a human chain from the pond to Channa Grove, buckets passing from hand to hand.

The fire reached the roots of the pipal, but there its progress suddenly slowed, as though the roots themselves were resisting. Indrani later said that at that moment it seemed to her that every leaf in the grove moved at once, confusing each tongue of flame and making it lose its path.

By dawn the fire had finally been extinguished. A quarter of the village's houses had burned, and although some trees at the edge of Channa Grove were scorched or half-burned, the grove as a whole remained safe. The pipal, heart of the grove, was entirely unharmed.

Sitting amid the ashes, Indrani asked, "Budhba, did you stop the fire yourself?"

"No," Budhba said quietly. "I only knew where the water was. The rest was done by your hands, your organisation, and your courage. Once again I have seen something proved, Indrani: memory and organisation together can challenge even the most terrible forces of nature."

The villagers rebuilt the burned houses, this time more safely than before: special places for lamps, emergency stores of water, and new rules for fire safety. In village memory, the "Night of Fire" became a story that taught every generation that the power of nature is terrible, but human unity can be more formidable still when directed toward the right purpose.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -60

Community Emergency Response and Collective Action

Chapter -60 demonstrates the power of collective action, especially during a large natural or human-made disaster. Forming a human chain to carry water is a real and historically effective emergency technique used by organised communities. Budhba's role is important here: he does not miraculously extinguish the fire himself; he gives direction, while the actual work is accomplished through collective human effort. This accords with the story's central philosophy that the power of witness is not a substitute for human action, but its complement.

CHAPTER -59 (FIFTY-NINE BEFORE)

The Second Flood

The second flood knows the old road, yet gives a new wound—the village that endured the flood learned to read the water.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: READING THE WATER

Folk tune: flood song

The second flood knows the old road, yet gives a new wound;

The village that endured the flood learned to read the water.

The water rose again along the current, following the old road;

But this time the village was awake and had taken heed in advance.

The wound of the first flood remained in the mind, yet the new one came;

Every flood gives a new lesson; every water teaches something.

From the first flood came fear; from the second came knowledge;

Whoever read the rising water raised the house beforehand.

Grain was placed upon high platforms; cattle and nets were secured;

Whoever learned from the flood that had passed survived this one.

Water comes and goes; the village has learned to read it;

Whoever learns from calamity does not drown in the next calamity.

The current is the same, the water the same, but the village is wiser now;

Whoever learned to read the water is not bewildered by the flood.

(A passage of narrative fiction. After the fire, the rainy season becomes unusually fierce—and the Kamala-Balan, after many years, again breaks its bounds.)

Three months after the fire, the rainy season arrived—but it was no ordinary monsoon. Rain fell day and night without pause until the Kamala-Balan, and every stream around the village, seemed to forget its boundaries.

Indrani, who had saved the village on the Night of Fire, now faced another trial. The embankment, considered strong since the time of Sukhdev Mahato, began to tremble before the force of the water.

“Budhba,” Indrani said, soaked by a night of rain as she ran to the pipal, “the embankment is shaking on every side! I am afraid that after the fire, this flood will break us completely!”

From within the roots of the grove, Budhba himself could feel every pulse of the rising water. “Indrani, I remember that many years ago, in Gauri’s time, the first flood came, when the embankment was first built. Seven lives were lost that night. Today you are better prepared. But this water seems angrier than that water.”

Indrani called together every quarter of the village and made an immediate plan: reinforce the weak portions of the embankment with sandbags and timber; move the elderly and children in advance to high ground—the old cremation ground, as in Gauri’s time; and prepare boats and ropes in case emergency rescue became necessary.

As the night deepened, one part of the embankment south of the leatherworkers’ quarter finally broke. But this time, before the breach, the village warning system—bells, drum rhythms, and predetermined signals—had already been activated. People had already moved toward safe ground.

A descendant of Mohan, who still kept the village drumming tradition, played a special rhythm that night—rapid and repeatedly sounded, a pattern every villager had learned from childhood as the “danger rhythm.” Echoing through the dark lanes, it awakened every household and sent every family running toward its predetermined safe place.

By dawn the water began to fall. Many houses had been swept away and the fields were ruined, but this time not one life in the village was lost—the first recorded zero-death major flood in Garh Narikel’s memory.

In the morning light Indrani sat beside the pipal, exhausted but full of relief. “Budhba, I think today we repaid our debt to Gauri. That day Grandmother Subhagi could not be saved. Today every life survived.”

Budhba answered with deep contentment, “Indrani, this is the greatest gift for me—to see that my memory, over time, has become knowledge in your hands that saves lives, not merely names.”

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -59

Early-Warning Systems and Disaster Mitigation

Chapter -59 turns an important principle of disaster management into narrative: an early-warning system and a predetermined evacuation plan, however simple—here, a drum rhythm and pre-identified safe ground—can dramatically reduce disaster mortality. Compared with the first flood in Chapter -89, this chapter gives clear, measurable evidence of the village's accumulated institutional learning: seven lives were lost in the first flood, while none was lost in this one, even though the physical damage was equal or greater.

CHAPTER -58 (FIFTY-EIGHT BEFORE)

The Third Calamity

One calamity teaches, the third tempers—whoever has fallen three times stands steadier the fourth.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THREE CALAMITIES, STANDING THE FOURTH TIME

Folk tune: song of courage

*One calamity teaches; the third calamity tempers;
Whoever has fallen three times rises steadier the fourth.*

*We saw fire, endured flood, and then the third arrived;
Every calamity gave a new wound and a new lesson.
What the comet had warned of, the village understood beforehand;
So this time it neither froze in surprise nor surrendered to fear.*

*Fire came, flood came, and the village endured the third as well;
What the comet had said, the village had understood in advance.
Whoever learned from the calamities already passed stood steadier this time;*

Whoever fell three times stood firm the fourth.

*A village that stands together is not broken by any calamity;
The names survived, courage survived, and another dawn came.
Falling is not defeat; rising again is the true victory;
To face calamity with courage became the village way.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. After fire and flood, the comet's third and final warning is fulfilled: a new water-borne disease arises from the foul standing water left by the flood.)

After the floodwater receded, pools of stagnant, rotting water remained in many parts of the village. Within two weeks a new illness—stomach pain, severe diarrhoea, and rapid dehydration—began spreading among children and the elderly.

Indrani, who had already fought both fire and flood, now faced a third trial. “Budhba,” she said wearily, “the comet was right. Three calamities—fire, flood, and now disease. I am afraid our people may not be able to endure this much.”

Budhba, tired himself but resolute, replied, “Indrani, generation after generation your ancestors have learned something from every calamity. In the time of the epidemic Vimala taught ‘collective remembrance.’ Today you need that knowledge, and new scientific knowledge as well.”

The village physician, who had studied at the new medical school in town, immediately recognised that the disease was spreading through contaminated water. He instructed every family to boil drinking water and taught them to prepare a solution of salt and sugar to prevent dehydration.

At the same time, descendants of Sonama Majhin and Ratna used their traditional knowledge to identify which herbs could help check diarrhoea and which water sources were safe. The Women’s Night Assembly went from house to house, ensuring that rules of hygiene—washing hands, boiling water, and staying away from polluted water—were followed.

Through the combined effort of these three kinds of knowledge—modern medicine, traditional herbal knowledge, and social organisation—the outbreak was controlled within three weeks. Some lives were lost, especially among the very old and very young, but the disease was not as devastating as the first epidemic in Vimala’s time.

After crossing all three calamities, Indrani finally sat beside the pipal, deep satisfaction mingling with exhaustion in her eyes. “Budhba, I thought the comet had come to bring our end. But we are still standing.”

Budhba said softly, “Indrani, the comet did not bring an end. It brought only a test—to see how strong centuries of accumulated knowledge, organisation, and love had truly become. Today we have learned the answer: they have become so strong that even three calamities together could not break them.”

The story of the three disasters of that year remained in village memory as “the Year of Three Calamities.” At every new-moon kabaddi, along with the names of those lost that year, one sentence began to be spoken: “They died in the calamity, but the village did not die.”

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -58

Cascade Effects of Disasters and Multidimensional Response

Chapter -58 completes the three-level disaster sequence that began in Chapters -61 and -60—the comet’s omen, fire, and flood—with water-borne disease. This is epidemiologically realistic, because outbreaks of water-borne disease after flooding are a well-known phenomenon. Taken together, Chapters -61 through -58 show that multi-layered disasters require a multidimensional response: the combined use of modern science, traditional knowledge, and social organisation. In practical form, this powerfully demonstrates the central message of the whole Part 0 project—the need for both witness-consciousness and community action.

CHAPTER -57 (FIFTY-SEVEN BEFORE)

The Sahib's Notebook

What the sahib wrote was his account; what the village kept in mind was the village's truth.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: PAPER OF THE THROAT

Folk tune: aphoristic refrain

*What the sahib wrote was his account;
What the village kept in mind was the village's truth.*

*The sahib came from abroad, notebook in hand;
He wrote the village customs as seen through his own eyes.
What he saw from outside he counted only half-complete;
What lived within could not fit upon his paper.*

*The paper travels abroad; the names remain in the village;
One who comes from outside to count does not know everything within.
The sahib's notebook went far away and dust settled upon its pages;
But the story in the village throat still speaks in its own voice.*

*Letters live in the notebook; names live in the throat;
No one can write away a village that keeps its own story.
Outside writers come and go; the village is its own writer;
The story kept in the throat will remain awake from age to age.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. After the Year of Three Calamities, an English scholar comes to study the village traditions—but even with good intentions, his writing fails to understand the story accurately.)

After Indrani, responsibility for the ritual passed to her son Nandkishor. In Nandkishor's time an English scholar named Mr Henry Thompson, interested in Indian folk traditions, arrived in Garh Narikel after hearing of the "Year of Three Calamities," whose story had become famous in the surrounding region.

With notebook and pen, Thompson Sahib questioned every old person in the village: who was "Budhba," what did "kabaddi" mean, how had "Channa Grove" begun? He carefully wrote down every answer and, after several weeks, left the village carrying a thick manuscript, saying, "This extraordinary folktale will be published for the learned societies of England."

Nandkishor was pleased. At last, he thought, Budhba's story was reaching the wider world. But a year later, when a copy of Thompson Sahib's book arrived in the village, Nandkishor and the villagers were stunned when they read—or had read to them—what it said.

The book called Budhba "a remnant of primitive superstition." Channa Grove was described as "ghost-worship among backward villagers." The kabaddi ritual was called "a barbarous custom," and the Women's Night Assembly "uncontrolled social behaviour among local women."

Furious, Nandkishor went to the pipal. "Budhba, Thompson Sahib heard our entire story, yet he has written an insult to us! He calls our knowledge 'superstition' and our justice 'barbarism'!"

Budhba remained silent for a long time. "Nandkishor, I understand your anger, and it is justified. But I remember something. Many years ago Haripati Kavi asked me whether my story should be written, and I said that if it was written it should be written in the village's own language and from the village's own point of view. Thompson Sahib heard our story, but his eyes, his language, his point of view were not the village's. He saw us through the spectacles of his own world, and through those spectacles whatever is unfamiliar often appears 'backward' or 'barbarous.'"

Nandkishor asked, "Then what should we do, Budhba? Should we write to Thompson Sahib and protest?"

Budhba said slowly, "Protest, certainly—but do something more important as well. Like Gangadhar, and like Haripati Kavi, preserve our own story in our own language and from our own point of view. We cannot prevent outsiders from misunderstanding us if they choose to. But we can understand ourselves correctly and keep our truth in our own words. That lies in our hands, and that work we must never abandon."

Nandkishor wrote Thompson Sahib a courteous but firm letter explaining the true meaning of the village traditions. No reply came. But continuing the line of Gangadhar and Haripati Kavi, Nandkishor began compiling the village's own account more carefully, in the village's own language, knowing that the authentic definition had to come from within, not from outside.

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -57

Colonial Ethnography and the Importance of Self-Representation

Chapter -57 touches a real and documented tendency in colonial-era ethnographic study: British scholars, often with good intentions, studied Indian folk traditions, yet cultural bias could lead them to portray local knowledge systems and social arrangements as “primitive” or “superstitious.” The chapter emphasises the importance of self-representation—the principle that a community must write its own story in its own language and from its own viewpoint if it is to avoid external distortion. This principle deeply echoes the core impulse of the Videha Parallel Literature Movement.

CHAPTER -56 (FIFTY-SIX BEFORE)

The Call for Freedom

The call that reached village after village did not belong to one throat —freedom too is a shared song.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE SHARED CALL

Folk tune: movement song

The call that reached village after village did not belong to one throat;

Freedom too is a shared song.

The call came from afar and echoed from village to village;

One hand rose first, then a hundred hands joined it.

Those whom fear had silenced now joined their voices;

In the shared call the village overcame its fear.

One voice rose, ten voices joined, and the whole village echoed;

Whoever had stood alone now stood with everyone.

The call was no longer one throat but a thousand throats;

When they spoke together, their voice touched the sky.

No rule can stop a song that everyone sings together;

Name joined name, and only then did the call grow great.

Each voice alone was small; joined together, they became vast;

In the shared song the village found its freedom.

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, the wave of the freedom movement reaches Garh Narikel—and the village discovers that the art of collective organisation learned over centuries is equally useful in the struggle for freedom.)

After Nandkishor, responsibility for the ritual passed to his daughter Lakshmidēvi. In Lakshmidēvi's time, the freedom movement had grown intense throughout India. News of the Salt Satyagraha, the boycott of foreign cloth, and the Non-Cooperation Movement reached Garh Narikel through newspapers and travellers.

A young freedom fighter named Ramashray travelled from the town to Garh Narikel to call the villagers into the movement. "Brothers and sisters," he cried in the chaupal, "the British government is taking our grain, our land, and our self-respect! We must unite, reject foreign cloth, and embrace swadeshi!"

Hearing this, Lakshmidēvi went to the pipal. "Budhba, this talk of freedom sounds right, but I am afraid. If we join the movement, the British government may become angry. We have already suffered many calamities."

Budhba thought for a long time before answering. "Lakshmidēvi, do you remember Sonama Majhin, who said that forgetting can never be completely denied, but before forgetting every name can be given proper honour? Freedom is like that. I do not know how many years this struggle will continue or what its outcome will be. But I know this much: the name of anyone who stands for human dignity deserves remembrance, whether that person wins or loses."

Hearing this, Lakshmidēvi made a new resolve. Drawing on the experienced leadership of the Women's Night Assembly, she organised the village women to burn foreign cloth. Inspired by the Coconut-Leaf School, the village youth learned to spin thread and weave khadi for swadeshi. The elders used the discipline and patience of the kabaddi ritual to carry news of the movement to every household.

Concerned by the village's growing organisation, the British administration sent a party of policemen to arrest the activists. But the villagers, drawing on centuries of organisational experience, offered peaceful but firm resistance—in accordance with the principle of satyagraha, without violence and without retreat.

Ramashray and several village youths were arrested, but the rest of the village kept its organisation intact and continued the movement. Several months later Ramashray and the others were released, and on their return the villagers welcomed them as heroes.

That evening Budhba said to Lakshmidēvi, "Today I saw a new kind of kabaddi—a game in which every villager played against an unseen opponent for the sake of self-respect and kept every name safe without losing one."

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -56

The Political Application of Community Organisational Experience

Chapter -56 shows how community capacities developed over centuries—shared decision-making, dissemination of information, and patient resistance—can also be applied effectively to a large political struggle such as the freedom movement. The Gandhian principle of satyagraha—nonviolent yet resolute resistance—naturally resonates with the village's own long traditions, such as its encounter with Amil Jay Singh in Chapter -85. Local and national struggles are often driven by the same fundamental human values.

CHAPTER -55 (FIFTY-FIVE BEFORE)

Dawn of Independence

Dawn came, but not to every courtyard at once—the dawn of the free name comes first.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: DAWN FOR ALL

Folk tune: dawn song

Dawn has come, but not to every courtyard at once;

The dawn of the free name comes first.

The tricolour rose into the sky and drums sounded;

The chaupal became a festival, and the village danced with joy.

But in the corner of the quarter where no lamp was lit,

Dawn had not yet come; darkness still remained.

The tricolour rose over the chaupal and the children sang;

But the house still in darkness needs its dawn as well.

Freedom is not a matter of one day; it belongs to every courtyard;

The house that still goes hungry must receive its gift too.

Freedom is not the end of struggle; it is a new beginning;

Only when every name sees dawn will freedom be complete.

One quarter became free while another remained bound;

Only when every house is lit will dawn be whole.

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, India becomes independent—and Garh Narikel, carrying centuries of struggle and memory, enters a new age.)

After Lakshmidēvi, responsibility for the ritual passed to her son Vishvambharnath. In Vishvambharnath's time, on the morning of 15 August, a new sun rose across India, including Garh Narikel: India had become independent.

For the first time the tricolour was raised in the village chaupal. Educated at the Coconut-Leaf School, the village children had learned to sing "Jana Gana Mana," and that morning the song sounded from every throat. Ramashray, who had gone to prison for the freedom movement, was now a respected village leader. Speaking in the chaupal, he said, "Today we are free, but freedom is only the beginning. The real work—making our freedom meaningful—still remains."

That evening Vishvambharnath went to the pipal to share the historic moment with Budhba. "Budhba, today India became independent. You have witnessed this village for hundreds of years—from the time of Vachaspati Mishra, Udayanacharya and Gangesha Upadhyaya all the way to the end of British rule. What do you feel?"

Budhba was silent for a long time, a silence that gathered centuries of memory into a single moment. "Vishvambharnath," he finally said, his voice deeply moved, "from Vachaspati Mishra's hall of debate to this day I have carried the stories of hundreds of names—Hulasa, Sukhdev, Ratna, Gangesha, Gauri, Savitri. Every name asked a question: Is justice possible? Is dignity possible? Is equality possible? This dawn of independence is not the answer to all those questions. It is the recognition of the right to ask them. A nation willing to hear the questions of its citizens—that is something Hulasa, Sukhdev and Ratna never received."

"Then is all our struggle complete today?" Vishvambharnath asked.

"No," Budhba said softly. "Independence is not the end of struggle; it is a new form of struggle. The roots of caste, gender inequality, poverty and injustice do not disappear merely because a nation becomes free. My fear and my hope are both this: your children, and their children, will write what remains of our story. My work, as Indrani said many years ago, is never complete. But today, Vishvambharnath, I feel a new hope whose name I had never known before—freedom."

That night was not a new moon, yet the villagers gathered spontaneously beside the pipal—not for kabaddi, but for a new kind of celebration. They lit lamps, sang songs, and told every departed name, one by one, the news of independent India. "Listen," the village children whispered, "India is free. What you endured was not wasted."

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -55

Independence and the Continuity of Struggle

Chapter -55 places the historic moment of Indian independence within the narrative cycle while carefully making clear that independence, however important, is not the end of the whole struggle for social justice but the beginning of a new phase. Budhba's reflection—that the injustices of caste, gender, and poverty do not disappear automatically with national freedom—accords with the realistic perspective that defines the entire Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles project: no single victory, however historic, is the end of the whole story.

CHAPTER -54 (FIFTY-FOUR BEFORE)

The End of Zamindari

The owner of the land changed, but the soil did not—the field knows the name of the one who tills it.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: OWNER OF THE SOIL

Folk tune: ploughman's song

The owner of the land changed, but the soil did not;

The field knows the name of the one who tills it.

The field passed from the zamindar's hand and the papers changed;

But the one who drove the plough remained the same farmer.

The one who sweated for years and raised the grain

Now became owner of the soil, possessor of the field.

The zamindar went, the papers changed, but the sweat remained the same;

The one who sowed the seed and raised the grain is the farmer.

The seal changed, the owner changed, but the soil remained the same;

The soil recognises the one who speaks with it.

Kings come and go, but the earth remains;

The soil will take the name of the one who truly makes it his own.

The owner on paper changed; the owner of the sweat remained the same;

The field sings the name of the one who tills the soil with the plough.

(A passage of narrative fiction. Several years after independence, the new Government of India abolishes the zamindari system—and after centuries, the land relations of Garh Narikel finally change.)

After Vishvambharnath, responsibility for the ritual passed to his daughter Kamala Devi II, named in honour of the earlier Kamala Devi. In Kamala Devi's time, the new Government of India passed laws abolishing zamindari. The system that had endured for centuries, under whose shadow so many stories from Ugrasen Thakur to Raghubir Singh had unfolded, finally came to a legal end.

The village's last zamindar family, descendants of Pratapsen Thakur, was compelled to surrender most of its land to the government, and a large part of that land was distributed among landless peasants and families of the leatherworkers' quarter.

Seeing this historic change, Kamala Devi went to the pipal. "Budhba, today zamindari has ended. The land of Sukhdev Mahato, which Ugrasen Thakur seized, has today returned by law to Sukhdev's own descendants with permanent rights."

Budhba answered with deep satisfaction, "Kamala Devi, many years ago I said that Sukhdev's revenge had already come to me once, in the form of a court judgment. Today that revenge is taking a legal and lasting form. To see this—that is the meaning of my whole existence: to see that injustice, however old, can eventually be corrected if there are enough generations, enough patience, and enough struggle."

But the change was not simple. Descendants of Pratapsen Thakur, seeing their land and prestige diminish, became bitter and angry. Many old social relationships in the village, rooted in land ownership, came under strain. Some families gained land and became self-reliant; others, losing land, were thrown into uncertainty.

Seeing the tension, Kamala Devi asked Budhba, "Is this change good or bad? Some people are happy and some are unhappy."

Budhba replied, "Kamala Devi, every great change, however just, is difficult for some people. But the question is not whether a change makes everyone happy. The question is whether it is just. For hundreds of years the leatherworkers' quarter and other landless families have lived without land of their own, without stability of their own. Today that stability, at least in part, has come to them. That is justice, even if it does not make everyone happy."

With time, the village's social structure slowly changed. Land ownership, once deeply tied to caste, began to shift. The new generation, equipped with education from the Coconut-Leaf School, also began seeking work beyond the land—government service, trade, and urban employment.

While carrying out her ritual duty, Kamala Devi said to Budhba, "The village is changing. Perhaps very quickly."

Budhba said slowly, “Kamala Devi, the village has always changed. From Vachaspati’s time to today there has never been a single moment that could truly be called unchanging. My work is not to stop change, but to remember the names linked with every change and the cost of every change—so that however much the village changes, it does not completely forget its roots.”

COMMENTARY ON CHAPTER -54

Abolition of Zamindari and Rural Social Change

Chapter -54 gives narrative form to the historical impact of an important land-reform measure of independent India: the abolition of zamindari. Although implementation was uneven and incomplete—a fact the chapter deliberately does not hide, referring to tension and uncertainty—the reform permanently affected land relations and caste-based structures of power in rural Indian society. The chapter marks a final historical and legal culmination of the theme of land justice that began with Sukhdev in Chapter -92 and continued through “Sukhdev’s Revenge” in Chapter -64.

CHAPTER -53 (FIFTY-THREE BEFORE)

The First Electric Lamp

The electric lamp has been lit, but do not forget the oil of the old lamp —new light may come, but it must not erase old names.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: NEW LIGHT, OLD WICK

Folk tune: lamp song

Electricity has come; a flame shines in the chaupal;

Do not let the oil of the old earthen lamp run dry.

Light came through the wire; a bulb shone for the first time;

The village stared in wonder as darkness fled.

But remember the earthen lamp that lit the house for years—

Keep its oil and its wick safe in the mind.

The light has changed, but the names do not change;

Let the new flame rise, but keep the old wick in the heart.

New devices come and go; names remain steady;

The light that changed the village did not change the village's name.

The light that reveals names belongs to the village;

The light that hides names belongs to the market—beware.

Let new brilliance come, but keep the old roots;

With the new flame, keep the old wick in mind.

(A passage of narrative fiction. The development plans of the Nehru era reach the village gate—roads, electricity, and new hope.)

After Kamala Devi's death, responsibility for the Women's Night Assembly and the ritual of names passed to her son Harivansh. Harivansh belonged to a generation that held the cord of old tradition in one hand and looked toward the new age with the other. In his time, under independent India's Five-Year Plans, a metalled road and electric lines began reaching Garh Narikel for the first time. When workers came to set the poles, children gathered around the upright iron posts in wonder, while elders seated in the shade of the pipal whispered about how this new light might change the village's old darkness.

That evening, when the first electric lamp in the chaupal suddenly came on, the whole village—from children to the elderly—stopped still. The bulb's yellow light trembled upon the water of Dakahi Pond, and in that trembling glow faces, leaves, and the coconut fronds along the embankment shone together. Some folded their hands, some lifted children onto their shoulders to show them, and some stood silently clutching the old earthen lamps they had preserved for years.

Going to the pipal, Harivansh said to Budhba, "Now we shall have more light than your old conch-and-cord lamp could give us. Does this make you feel old?"

Budhba laughed. "Harivansh, no form of light makes me feel old. I myself began with a lamp, and today I am seeing electric light. What has not changed is the act of bringing light into darkness, whether by lamp or electricity."

After a pause Budhba added, "But remember one thing, Harivansh. A lamp creates as much shadow as it gives light. Electricity illuminating every corner of the village is good. But if in that brightness people begin forgetting old names and old faces, then that light will be more dangerous than darkness. Good light reveals names; it does not dazzle them out of sight."

It took many years for electric lines to reach every house. Yet from that first night onward, the lamp in the chaupal was never extinguished. Each year Harivansh sat beneath it and remembered new names in the new light, while keeping in his bag the old earthen lamp whose oil he never allowed to dry completely. For, as Budhba had said, new light may arrive, but if the oil of old names dries up, it can take a very long time to light them again.

CHAPTER -52 (FIFTY-TWO BEFORE)

The Call of the Border

*Cannons sounded at the border and birth-songs sounded in the village
—the village endured war but did not abandon its names.*

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: BORDER AND SOHAR

Folk tune: farewell sohar

The son has gone toward the border; his mother stands in the courtyard;

The body travels to a distant land, but the name remains on this side.

Cannons sounded at the border; a sohar sounded in the village;

The son departed for war, and the mother repeated his name.

The body was far at the front, the heart here in the courtyard;

Every evening the mother watched the road—when would her boy return?

For the one who returns, a sohar will sound in the courtyard;

For the one who does not, the whole village will repeat his name.

The border divided the earth, but it did not divide the name;

The body crossed to the other side, the name remained here.

Borders recognise bodies, but names recognise no border;

Salutations on both sides, the name on both tongues.

War can take the body; it cannot take the name;

The village endured war and stood holding its names.

(A passage of narrative fiction. The wars of 1962 and 1965 call the village's young men toward the border.)

In Harivansh's time, drums of war sounded on distant borders. First from the direction of China, then from Pakistan, news reached the village in the whisper of the radio and in market talk. Several young men whose hands had until then held ploughs and fishing nets now put on uniforms and left for the frontier. Ramashray's grandson, Vijay Kumar, also joined the army. On the night of his departure the village women placed tilak on his forehead, and his mother, hiding her face in her sari end, could not suppress the samdaun that rises of itself at the moment of farewell.

Between those two wars the village changed inwardly. Radio news became the main subject of evening discussion in the chaupal. In every courtyard that had sent a son to the border, a deep silence settled—not wholly fear, not wholly pride, but waiting. The women remembered those young men separately in the Night Assembly, while Budhba held every name that had left the village for the frontier with such care that each seemed to stand as an invisible village watchman at a distant post.

In the 1965 war Vijay Kumar was wounded and, after months of treatment, returned to the village with one weakened arm. On the night of his return Harivansh went to the pipal. "Budhba, I was afraid Vijay Kumar's name too would be added to your list."

Budhba replied, "Harivansh, I hold the name of every young person who went to the border, whether he returned or not. Vijay Kumar's return makes me happy. But I hold with equal respect the names of those who did not return—far beyond the village boundary, on some Himalayan peak or in some desert."

After a pause Budhba said, "Names, Harivansh, know no borders. Bodies fall where war occurs, but names return to where people remember them. As long as the village keeps those names upon its tongue, those young men—wherever they may have fallen—remain alive in the village courtyard."

Later Vijay Kumar kept telling the village children his stories of the border—the snowy mountains, the all-night watch, and the moment when a comrade standing beside him fell. Every time he ended the story, he made sure to add the name of the companion who had not returned. The children repeated that name, and upon the village tongue, far from the border, it remained alive—as Budhba had said, the crocodile may take the body, but not the name.

Seeds of the Green Revolution

New seed may yield more grain, but old seed knows the soil—the seed that saves a village plants not hunger, but a name.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE OLD SEED

Folk tune: transplanting chaiti

New seed gives grain and fills the granary;

Old seed knows the soil and does not rot in floodwater.

New seed came from the market and the granary filled;

So much grain grew that the village laughed with joy.

But the new seed did not know the soil and could rot in floodwater;

The old seed had deep roots and stood firm in calamity.

Grain may fill the granary, but who will guard the root?

The seed that saves the village plants not hunger, but a name.

Keep old with new; sow the two together;

Keep in a clay pot the seed that knows the soil.

Passed from hand to hand, the grain remains alive;

Mother, keep a handful of old seed safe in a clay pot.

Grain fills the granary today; seed preserves generations;

The village that saves a handful of old seed saves itself.

(A passage of narrative fiction. The arrival of new seeds and chemical fertilisers changes the village's agriculture.)

When the winds of the Green Revolution reached Garh Narikel, the fields began to change. New high-yield seeds and sack after sack of chemical fertiliser arrived. For the first time the paddy heads grew so heavy that the stalks bent, and farmers' eyes brightened at the heaps of grain in the threshing yard. Yet in the shadow of this new abundance something old began quietly disappearing: the knowledge preserved by Ratna's descendants from generation to generation—what seed belonged in what soil and rain, and what herb guarded against which disease.

Harivansh's daughter Sunayana went to the pipal. "Budhba, the new seeds give us more grain, but our old seeds are disappearing. Is that good?"

Budhba replied, "Sunayana, more grain is good, and freedom from hunger is good. But if the old seeds disappear completely, you will lose one of the future's alternatives. Progress without destroying knowledge—that is the real challenge."

He continued, "Seed is not merely grain, Sunayana. The village's memory sleeps within seed—the years in which an ancestor survived a famine are written in that small kernel. New seed may satisfy today's hunger, but old seed must be kept for the day when the new seed fails. A village that saves its seed saves its future."

At that moment Sunayana remembered something her grandmother had told her: there had once been an old variety of paddy that yielded little but would not rot even when submerged in floodwater up to the granary wall. Now that variety could no longer be found in any village field. Remembering that one lost seed, Sunayana understood that progress and loss were arriving together—and that what disappeared today might be remembered most painfully on the very day it was needed most.

With Ratna's descendants, Sunayana began preserving a small store of the village's old seeds in clay pots in a quiet corner of Channa Grove. At every transplanting she took out a handful and sowed a small strip of old paddy along the edge of the new fields, so that old roots would live beside the new crops. If famine returned, the village would still possess the seed that had once saved its ancestors.

CHAPTER -50 (FIFTY BEFORE)

The Darkness of the Emergency

A season of darkness does not last forever—but when a lamp is extinguished, it takes time to light it again.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: A VOICE IN THE DARK

Folk tune: whisper song

*The lamp went out, but the voice did not;
Justice stayed awake in the darkness, with Channa Grove as witness.*

*The cannon sounded in Delhi and lights went out;
Newspapers were silenced and voices suppressed.
But beneath Channa Grove the Night Assembly gathered; Without lamps, in whispers, the talk of justice continued.*

*The voice was low, but the truth remained high;
Cannons sounded in Delhi; here the whisper answered.
What was silenced outside stayed awake within;
In the dark, the lamp of truth burned from throat to throat.*

*The darkness that has come will one day pass;
The names that stayed awake at night will survive until dawn.
Light will return and the lamp will burn again;
Those who saved the voice through the night will stand at dawn.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. The Emergency of 1975 casts its shadow over the village's freedom of assembly.)

In 1975, when the national Emergency was declared, its shadow travelled from Delhi to village chaupal after village chaupal. In Garh Narikel too, the administration began looking suspiciously at the Women's Night Assembly and other community gatherings. An order came from the police station: no meeting was to gather without permission. The Night Assembly that had met for years beside Channa Grove, lighting lamps and speaking of justice, suddenly came under suspicion.

Frightened, Sunayana went to the pipal. "Budhba, meetings and gatherings have been prohibited. Must we close our Night Assembly?"

Budhba answered gravely, "Sunayana, your Night Assembly is an assembly of justice, not a political meeting. Continue it quietly and cautiously. History shows that seasons of darkness are not permanent, but a light extinguished in such a season may take a long time to kindle again."

He continued, "When the outer light is put out, the inner light must be guarded all the more carefully. A voice may be suppressed, but not the justice behind the voice. Extinguish the lamp and lower your voices, but do not let the assembly die. For when an assembly closes completely, it can take an entire generation to awaken it again."

Once a policeman walking the village lanes at night passed beside Channa Grove. At that moment the women seated in darkness held even their breath, and the only sound left in the silence was the faint movement of pond water. The policeman saw nothing and moved on. But that night everyone understood how much courage—and how much silence—it could take to protect the inner light Budhba had told them to preserve.

For those two years the Night Assembly continued in the dense darkness of Channa Grove, without lamps and almost without sound, carried only in whispers. The women arrived one at a time, sat in a circle, and completed the night's work of justice through glances and murmurs. No paper was written, yet no name was omitted; everything was written in the village mind. When the Emergency finally ended, Sunayana once again openly called the assembly and lit its lamp—and that night, people said, the flame rose higher than before.

CHAPTER -49 (FORTY-NINE BEFORE)

The Year of Drought

A dry year can dry the pond, not the names—the village that dug the well together found water again.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE BOTTOM OF THE WELL

Folk tune: drought song

*The dry year has emptied the pond;
But names do not dry—they remain at the bottom of the well.*

*The sky became merciless; not one drop fell;
The pond dried, the channels dried, and the earth cracked.
The fields died of thirst and all greenery burned;
The village watched the sky, but no cloud came.*

*The village that dug the well together found water;
The state gave relief, the village kept the account—both worked together.*

*Hand joined hand, digging deeper and deeper;
Where the pond failed, the well prevailed.*

*Hunger comes and goes; another year will change;
But a name once held does not vanish even in famine.
Water survived below; names survived in memory;*

The village that dug the well together endured the drought.

(A passage of narrative fiction. Famine in Bihar tests the village again, but this time accumulated knowledge and outside assistance both work together.)

One year the monsoon failed again. For months the sky remained bare, pond water fell until mud showed along the banks, and the earth of the fields split open as if speaking its thirst. The village had seen this darkness before—the famine in Ratna’s time and the hunger in Hulasa’s time were still alive in memory. But this time the village had learned something from those older hungers.

This time both the government famine-relief system and the village’s own organisational capacity were activated promptly. Sunayana’s son Gopal, the young village headman, worked with government officials to manage relief distribution efficiently. He kept an account of every house—how much grain each received, who had been missed, who needed more—so that relief reached the hands that truly required it and no name disappeared in the crowd.

Seeing this, Budhba said with satisfaction, “Gopal, many years ago I taught your ancestor Savitridevi that one needs both outside assistance and self-effort. Today state and society are working together. That is progress.”

He continued, “Famine, Gopal, is not merely a shortage of grain; it is also a test of memory. A village that forgets its old famines dies afresh in every new one. But a village that keeps an account of each famine stands prepared before the next arrives.”

During that dry year Gopal took the village youth and reopened an old well in the southern quarter that had lain closed for years. Hand after hand lifted earth, sweat poured all day, and when the first glimmer of water appeared deep below, the light on the tired and thirsty faces was worth no less than grain. Relief came from outside, but water the village recovered with its own hands—and that became the greatest lesson of the dry year.

That year Gopal kept an account of every household in his notebook, carrying forward the tradition of Yadavanand’s shadow register. A copy of every paper submitted to the government office was also kept in the village archive so that, if anyone asked later, this famine too would remain preserved with every name and every reckoning. For, as Budhba had said years before, a dry year can empty a pond, but not a name—and a village that digs a well together can find water again.

CHAPTER -48 (FORTY-EIGHT BEFORE)

The Voices of Radio and Television

The machine's voice comes from afar, the village song from within—whoever hears the inner voice is not lost in the noise outside.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE INNER VOICE

Folk tune: wireless song

*The outer voice comes from a distant land,
The inner song rises from one's own courtyard.*

The radio sounded in the house, then the screen began to glow, Distant voices, distant pictures, descended into the courtyard.

*The new voice was loud and filled the ears,
While the old song within was slowly pressed down.*

*The new voice sounds loudly and fills the ears,
The old voice sounds softly and settles in the heart.
Whoever was lost in the outer noise became the market's own,
Whoever preserved the inner voice remained the village's own.*

*Noise passes away, but the song remains,
Whoever hears the inner voice is not lost in the market's noise.
The machine's voices come and go; the inner song remains still,
Whoever hears one's own voice is not confused by distant noise.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. The village's first radio, and then its first television, bring the world into the village courtyard.)

In Gopal's time the first radio arrived at the village chaupal. On the first night, when a crackling voice from Delhi emerged from that little box, the whole village sat around it—some leaning close, some shutting their eyes, listening to distant lands in their own courtyard. A year later the first television came, and every evening children and elders gathered before its trembling black-and-white images. For the first time, the world itself had walked into the village courtyard.

Yet with that new brightness came a new silence. Children who had once come in the evening to hear Budhba's stories beneath the pipal now sat before the screen; and the women who used to raise songs on the embankment found their voices slightly subdued beneath the new, louder sound.

Gopal's daughter Kusum asked beneath the pipal, "Budhba, now the world has come inside the village. Will that make your work easier?"

Budhba replied, "Kusum, the world is entering the village, but the reverse may also become true—the village's stories and names may disappear into the world's noise. My work has become harder now: to keep the village's own voice safe amid that new, loud clamour."

After a pause he said, "There are two kinds of voice, Kusum. One comes from outside and fills the ears; the other rises from within and fills the heart. If the outer voice grows so loud that the inner one can no longer be heard, the village will forget its songs—and a village that forgets its songs eventually forgets its names as well."

One evening the television showed a flood in a distant country. The old people of the village fell silent, because those waters and those drowning houses reminded them of their own old floods. In that moment they understood that the machine could bring the faraway near—but if people were careless, it could also make what was near seem far away.

Kusum understood. She did not switch the television off; instead, every evening she began telling the children seated before it one of the pipal-tree stories. She turned the machine into a new stage on which old village stories could be told in a new form, so that new light would not extinguish old memory and both could burn together in the same courtyard.

CHAPTER -47 (FORTY-SEVEN BEFORE)

The Gulf Market

The market abroad gives money, the hearth at home gives a name—whoever earns and forgets the name returns as a stranger.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE ROAD TO THE GULF

Folk tune: migrant biraha

*Foreign lands send money; the hearth at home keeps the name,
The son went to a distant land, but his name stayed in the courtyard.*

The Gulf called, and the son boarded the plane,

In desert heat he sweated day and night.

Money reached the house and kept the hearth burning,

But the mother watched the road, longing to see her son's face.

Letters came, money came, but the face did not come,

The mother watched the doorway every evening.

The body is far in the desert, the name here in the courtyard,

Whoever sends the name along never forgets the home.

Whoever earned and forgot the name returned a stranger,

Whoever kept the name while earning found the house still waiting.

Let much wealth come, but if the name is forgotten,

One returns to one's own village and stands there as a stranger.

(A passage of narrative fiction. A wave of employment in the Gulf countries turns the village's young men toward migration once more.)

In the 1980s, with the oil boom in the Gulf, young men from the village began going to Dubai, Kuwait, and Saudi Arabia for construction work. Agents appeared in the market, passports and visas became household words, and every few months a young man from one house or another would lift a tin trunk and leave for foreign shores. It was a new chapter in the “call of exile”—different from Yashpati’s indentured labour, yet connected to it in essence.

Kusum’s husband Ramesh went to Dubai on a three-year contract. This time, however, matters differed from Ramsevak’s day: Ramesh sent letters and money home regularly, and sometimes his voice travelled across the telephone line from afar to reach Kusum. Even so, at every festival and every wedding or birth-song, his empty place troubled her.

During that decade many village houses received concrete roofs, daughters’ weddings were celebrated with greater splendour, and new goods entered the market—all powered by money arriving from distant countries. Yet in those new concrete houses many courtyards remained empty of their young sons for most of the year. Money arrived, but the hands that earned it were very far away.

Watching this, Budhba said, “Kusum, your husband has had a different fate from Ramsevak. Distance still exists, but communication is now possible. That is progress, though the pain of distance remains just as real.”

He continued, “But remember one thing. Migration places the body in the market, and if one is careless, one may leave one’s name there too. Earning money is good, but whoever forgets village, language, and name in pursuit of money returns home a stranger. Ramesh sends money—that is good; but he has kept his name in the village—that is better.”

At the roots beside Jori Pokhari, next to Ramsevak’s old mark, Kusum placed a new marker—not for Ramesh’s death, but in hope of his safe return. She wanted it to become a lamp of waiting for every migrant son to come, so that the “call of exile” might no longer signify grief alone but also the hope of return.

CHAPTER -46 (FORTY-SIX BEFORE)

A Test of Harmony

When fire broke out, the village became one—harmony is tested not at festivals but in calamity.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE SHARED PIPAL

Folk tune: song of togetherness

*Water from one pond, grain from one soil,
We endured one flood and lived in one village.*

*Division came from outside and rumours flew,
Someone wished to sow suspicion between Hindu and Muslim.*

*But those who drank for years from the same pond—
How could they be divided today by the clamour of a lie?*

Whether Eid or Diwali, the shade is of the same pipal, Smoke from shared hearths joins both courtyards.

*Together we endured one flood and one famine,
Those who shared sorrow together did not break apart.*

*Whoever brings division from outside is not of the village,
Those who know one another's names are not broken by rumours.*

When fire broke out, the village became one to put it out, Harmony was tested not at a festival but in calamity.

(A passage of narrative fiction. A wave of communal tension touches the surrounding region, and the village's plural tradition is tested.)

In the late 1980s a wave of communal tension rose in the surrounding region. Its heat reached Garh Narikel in the form of rumours. A few outsiders came to the village and tried to turn the old brotherhood between Hindus and Muslims into suspicion—whispers passed from ear to ear, and for one or two nights an unfamiliar unease spread across the chaupal.

But the Muslim families of Garh Narikel, woven for generations into village life—their ancestors drawing water from the same pond, labouring in the same fields, and saving one another in the same floods—and the Hindu families stood together before those rumours. Against outsiders who wanted division, the village answered with its own shared memory.

During those tense days an elderly maulvi and an elderly pandit stood together at the chaupal and reminded the village which household had rescued which other household in which flood, and whose hearth had fed whom during which famine. Against that shared memory, the imported rumours could not survive.

Kusum said to Budhba, “Outsiders want division among us.”

Budhba replied, “Kusum, for centuries your village has woven different traditions—Nyaya, Tantra, Bhakti—into one fabric. This unity is your greatest strength. Whoever tries to break it must be answered with your shared history.”

He continued, “Division comes from outside, Kusum, not from within. A village in which people know one another’s names cannot be made strangers by a rumour. Rumour takes root where people have forgotten one another. So remember one another’s names—that is the strongest guard.”

The Hindus and Muslims of the village held a joint gathering beneath the pipal, lighting lamps, sitting together, and asking after one another. From that night onward, every village festival—whether Eid or Diwali—was celebrated beneath the pipal shade with both communities present. As Budhba had said, harmony is tested not in festivals but in calamity, and in that test Garh Narikel stood as one.

CHAPTER -45 (FORTY-FIVE BEFORE)

Winds of Liberalisation

The new wind opened the door, but the roots did not move—the village tied to its roots is not blown away.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: WIND AND ROOT

Folk tune: wind song

*A new wind came and opened the door,
It brought new talk, new markets, new glitter.*

*When the door opened, the wind rushed in,
New goods and new glitter filled the market.
Leaves shook, branches bent, the wind blew hard,
The village watched in wonder at how much had changed.*

*Leaves may shake and branches may bend in a strong wind,
But if the roots are deep, the tree is not blown away.
Outside winds come and bring new leaves,
But the tree whose roots remain firm does not topple.*

*The village joined to its roots is not blown away,
The leaves may be new, but the old roots remain steady.
New markets and new glitter come and go like wind,
Whoever holds fast to the roots is not carried away.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. The economic liberalisation of 1991 brings both new consumerism and new opportunities to the village.)

After the economic reforms of 1991, the village market began to change. New things appeared—brightly coloured plastics, sleek new fabrics, and later the first cable television, carrying dozens of channels into the village. Things once unavailable came within reach, and with the market, people's desires also began to grow.

Kusum's son Dinesh obtained a job with a private company in the city—something that would once have been impossible. He had seen the speed of a new life and the glitter within that speed; yet beneath that glitter he sometimes remembered the village's slow, steady evenings.

The market's new brightness brought a new haste with it. People wanted more, ran more, and the quiet evenings beneath the pipal, where the whole village once gathered, began to thin. Some young people left for cities, and some household thresholds remained closed for most of the year.

After returning to the village, Dinesh told Budhba, "The world is changing very quickly. Markets, television, jobs—everything is new."

Budhba replied, "Dinesh, I have told you before—the village has always changed. But this change is faster, and in rapid change the knowledge learned slowly over generations is more easily lost. Be careful."

He continued, "Wind opens doors, and that is good—it brings new light and new ideas inside. But if the roots are weak, the same wind can uproot the tree. So welcome what is new, Dinesh, but deepen your roots, because one who remains joined to the roots is not blown away by any wind."

Dinesh remembered the warning. Whenever he returned from the city, he brought his children to sit beneath the pipal and told them the stories of the tree, the pond, and the names. He knew that however quickly the world changed, one evening, one tree, and one old voice had to remain still so that the coming generation would not be blown away.

CHAPTER -44 (FORTY-FOUR BEFORE)

The First Computer

The new machine teaches counting, but it cannot count a name—the name kept by the village is greater than the machine's number.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: MACHINE AND MEANING

Folk tune: counting song

*A new machine has come, counting faster and faster,
It writes letters in a moment and fills page after page.*

*The machine came to the village and counted numbers quickly,
A reckoning that took days was finished in a moment.
It joined letter to letter and filled the page at once,
The village watched the wonder of the machine.*

*But a name is not counting; a name is kept in the mind,
The name the village keeps is greater than the machine's number.
A machine can count numbers, but it cannot count a name,
It cannot understand the story behind the name.*

*Leaf or screen—the medium keeps changing,
But meaning lodged in the heart can never be erased.
Machines come and go; the name remains steady in the mind,
Meaning kept in the heart cannot be erased by a machine.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. The first computer reaches the Coconut-Leaf School, opening a new age of education.)

After Dinesh, responsibility for the observance passed to his daughter Pratima. In Pratima's time, under a government programme, the first computer reached the Coconut-Leaf School—a large grey machine whose screen showed blinking green letters. Children and elders gathered to see it; some thought it magic, some looked with suspicion, and some quietly remembered the coconut leaves on which they had once written their ancestors' names.

The schoolchildren sat wide-eyed before the machine. Letters that had taken years of practice to form by hand now appeared on the screen in an instant. But an old man sitting in a corner whispered, "The machine can preserve letters—but can it preserve meaning?"

On the first day Pratima typed the first line of the village's oldest folk song into the computer. When the letters appeared on the screen in green light, the children applauded. Yet Pratima felt something strange, as though the old song had stepped out of a coconut leaf and was walking into a new and unfamiliar house.

Pratima went to the pipal and asked Budhba, "This machine can hold more letters than a coconut leaf, and much faster. Can we keep our stories in it?"

Budhba replied with curiosity, "Pratima, since the time of Haripati the poet I have learned one thing: the medium keeps changing—from paper to the printing press, and from the press now to this machine. But the soul of the story—the village's language and point of view—must not change. If this machine preserves our stories in our own words, I welcome it."

He continued, "A machine knows counting, Pratima. It will count letters, pages, years. But a name is greater than counting. If this machine turns a name into nothing but a number, it is more dangerous than a coconut leaf; but if it preserves the name with its whole meaning, it can become the village's newest watchman."

Pratima's pupils slowly learned to type fragments of the village's old songs and stories into the computer. That bridge from coconut leaf to screen seemed small that day, but many years later the same bridge would become a complete digital archive in which every village name, song, and story would survive in a new form, yet in its own language.

CHAPTER -43 (FORTY-THREE BEFORE)

The Drying Channel

The channel grew thin, yet still knew its old path—the channel that dried did not forget the flood.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE THIRSTY CHANNEL

Folk tune: drought biraha

The channel has grown thin; the sand begins to show,

The water that gave life is now itself thirsty.

The channel that flowed for years and gave the village life,

Has grown thin and shown the sand upon its breast.

The pond dried, the well deepened, the earth cracked,

The flood that once swept houses away is now itself estranged.

Water that once distributed life now distributes thirst,

The village understood—save water, or hope itself will break.

The channel dried, but still remembered its path,

Whoever learned to save water found water again.

Plant trees, save water, or even names will thirst,

The channel that dried did not forget the flood.

The thirsty channel of today will flow again tomorrow,

The village that learns to save water will not remain thirsty.

(A passage of narrative fiction. The water level of the Kamala-Balan falls, and the village confronts a new age of environmental crisis.)

In Pratima's time the village elders noticed a new, slow calamity: year after year the water level of the Kamala-Balan was gradually falling. The channel that once touched both embankments in the rains now exposed banks of sand in summer. Forests were being cut, pollution from distant factories was reaching the river, and fish that had once filled the nets were becoming scarce.

The elders sat in the pipal shade remembering the floods that had once swept houses away, and now they worried that the river of those floods was itself drying. In summer the pond water turned green-black, wells had to be dug deeper, and water—which had once been the village’s greatest fear—was becoming its greatest anxiety.

Pratima’s son Satyanarayan said beneath the pipal, “Budhba, Jori Pokhari too has become smaller than before. The water in the old crocodile pond is falling. I am afraid nature itself is becoming ill.”

Budhba replied gravely, “Satyanarayan, Sonama Majhin said long ago that the old crocodile needed patience and offerings. But this crisis is not from want of offerings; it comes from injustice done to nature itself. You must plant trees and save water exactly as you preserve names.”

He continued, “All these years I taught you to save names, because I thought the crocodile took bodies but not names. Now a new crocodile has arrived—the crocodile that drinks water, fouls the air, and eats the soil. If you do not save water, forest, and earth from this new crocodile, one day the village that preserves names will itself disappear. So now, together with names, save water too.”

Satyanarayan began planting new trees around Channa Grove—not only for memory, but for nature. With the village youth he repaired the pond embankment, dug small catchments to hold rainwater, and began a custom of planting a tree at every child’s birth, knowing that water, air, and soil, like names, must be preserved for the next generation.

CHAPTER -42 (FORTY-TWO BEFORE)

The Miracle of the Handheld Phone

A machine in the hand brought the distant near—but do not forget to ask the name of the person sitting beside you.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: NEAR AND FAR

Folk tune: machine song

A machine came into the hand and the distant became near,

But ask the name of the one sitting beside you too.

With the handheld machine the faraway came near in a moment,

A voice from beyond seven seas descended into the ear.

But no one looked at the face of the person sitting nearby,

Everyone was absorbed in the machine and forgot the conversation at hand.

The distant voice comes into the ear, but the face does not come,

Look first at the face nearby, then listen to the faraway.

The machine joined the distant but broke the near,

Whoever forgot the person nearby in the machine became lonely.

The machine connects, but joining hearts is the work of hands,

What makes the near seem far is not a machine but an illusion.

The machine is good if it cares for what is near,

Whoever loses the near within the machine loses names and relationships.

(A passage of narrative fiction. The arrival of the mobile phone completely changes communication in the village.)

In Satyanarayan's time the first mobile phone reached the village—at first only one, in the headman's hand. When that small machine rang for the first time and the voice of a son living in a distant city came out of it, the entire courtyard gathered around in amazement. A voice that once required months of waiting for a letter now entered the ear in a moment.

Slowly phones reached many families. Sons living far away could speak to their parents at once; news of illness, weddings, and births travelled in moments. But a new sight appeared as well: people held the machine in their hands, speaking to someone far away while forgetting the person sitting beside them.

Satyanarayan's daughter Anjali said beneath the pipal, "Budhba, now if anyone goes abroad we can speak every day. The call of exile will no longer be so painful."

Budhba smiled slightly. "Anjali, that is good news. But be careful—the machine can confuse as much as it connects. Use it wisely, as you have learned to use every new power."

He continued, "In this machine someone far away comes near, Anjali, but take care that someone near does not become far. A person always immersed in distant voices can forget to look at the face of a mother or father sitting beside them. If this machine brings a name near, it is good; but if it makes the nearby name distant, it becomes the greatest illusion."

Once an old village woman whose son had lived in the Gulf for years heard his voice on the phone and wept with joy. "Son, hearing your voice so near makes me feel as though you are standing in the courtyard." In that moment the village understood how much the machine could lighten the pain of distance when used well—and how, when misused, it could make even nearby people strangers.

Remembering the warning, Anjali taught the village elders to use mobile phones—how to speak with a son, how to see his face. At the same time she kept telling every household that however near a machine might bring the distant, it could never replace the evening chaupal, face-to-face sitting, and conversation while looking into one another's eyes. The new machine, too, had to travel alongside old affection and old caution, without erasing either.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER -41 (FORTY-ONE BEFORE)

The City Market

The city buys the body, but the village does not sell the name—whoever sells the name in the market returns empty-handed.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: ROOT AND MARKET

Folk tune: city song

*The city buys the body; the village keeps the name,
Whoever sold the name in the market returned empty-handed.*

*The city called the son and offered hope of a job,
It bought the body by the hour and sold sweat in the market.*

*Whoever sold only labour returned tired,
Whoever kept the name remained joined to the roots.*

*Go far from the roots and roam the whole world,
But do not cut the root; let it remain deep.
The city may take the body; keep the name yourself,
Whoever sold the name in the market returned empty-handed.*

*Once a year, for one evening, come sit beneath the pipal,
Whoever knows the roots is a stranger nowhere.
Whether city or foreign land, keep the root in the village,
Whoever remained with the roots was not lost in the market.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. In the age of the IT boom, the village's educated youth seek new opportunities in the markets of great cities.)

In Anjali's time, with the boom in India's IT industry, educated young people from the village began going to Bangalore, Hyderabad, and Delhi for software and other modern jobs. Children who had once learned letters at the Coconut-Leaf School now learned the language of computers and found well-paid work in distant cities. Every family took pride in this new flight of its sons and daughters.

But distance came with that flight. Young people who moved to cities began spending festivals there, and many village houses stayed locked for most of the year without their young generation. Money and education both came, yet in the speed of the new life some began to feel they were slowly moving away from village, language, and roots.

Anjali's son Karunakar returned on leave and said beneath the pipal, "Budhba, I learned many things in the city, but sometimes I feel I am being cut off from my roots."

Budhba replied, "Karunakar, being cut from the roots and travelling far from the roots are two different things. However far you go, if once a year you return beneath the pipal and remember your name and the story of your village, the root will not be cut; it will simply grow longer."

He continued, "The farther a tree's roots spread, the more strongly the tree stands. Going far is not weakness; weakness begins when a person forgets the roots. Live in the city, travel the world, but remember your name, your village's stories, your language. Whoever knows the roots is a stranger nowhere."

Karunakar remembered how often, sitting in the tall building of his city company, he had thought of the village pipal, pond, and evening chaupal—and how a pang came with the memory, as though he had left something behind. Yet whenever he returned once a year and sat beneath the pipal, that pain quieted for a while.

From that day on, however busy he was, Karunakar spent one evening of every annual visit beneath the pipal, telling the village children stories of the city and listening to their old village stories. Slowly it became an unwritten custom for every young person returning from the city: however far you go, come back to your roots for one evening each year.

CHAPTER -40 (FORTY BEFORE)

The Right to Information

Whoever has the right to know may ask—information is a lamp that reveals names in the dark.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE LAMP OF INFORMATION

Folk tune: song of light

*Whoever has the right to know may now ask,
The lamp of information is lit; names appear in the dark.*

*Papers locked in cupboards for years,
Accounts once hidden have now reached the hand.
Truth once concealed now stands in the open,
The right to know has come into the poor person's hand.*

*Papers once locked in cupboards now reach the hand,
What Yadavanand once wrote secretly can now stand in the open.
The right to ask has come; the darkness has thinned,
Hidden accounts have entered the light.*

*Shadow and light have met; the village accounts have opened,
Truth once concealed now stands with its head raised.
Darkness will no longer rule; questioning is everyone's right,
Once the lamp of information was lit, darkness fled at once.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. The Right to Information Act gives the village the power to demand its records and its history officially.)

In Karunakar's time India enacted the Right to Information law, giving ordinary citizens the legal right to demand official documents from government offices. For Garh Narikel this was no ordinary news. For centuries the village had preserved its history secretly in Yadavanand's shadow-register; now that history could be demanded openly as a legal right.

The village youth continued Yadavanand's old tradition by requesting official land and historical records from government archives. Papers once locked in an officer's cupboard began to reach the village through applications. For the first time the village's secret register and the government's documents could be placed side by side and compared.

Karunakar's daughter Vibha said beneath the pipal, "Budhba, now we no longer need Yadavanand's secretly written register alone—we can demand our history officially, as a legal right."

Budhba replied with deep satisfaction, "Vibha, this is the day I have awaited for centuries—the day shadow and light become one, when truth preserved in secret can be demanded openly."

He continued, "All these years the village saved its names in darkness. Yadavanand wrote his register quietly by night because speaking truth openly was dangerous then. Now the law itself says every citizen has the right to know the truth. Names that survived so long in shadow can now stand in the light. For the village, and for me, this is a great day."

When Vibha first received the old village land records from the government archive, she found many names on the yellow, torn pages that also appeared in Yadavanand's register. Each record confirmed the other. Truth that had survived only in village memory now stood legally with an official seal.

Using the Right to Information law, Vibha obtained every available old official record of the village's land and history and brought them together with Yadavanand's shadow-register. When the village's secret memory and the state's official papers were set side by side, they formed a complete, legally recognised historical archive that no officer could now erase.

CHAPTER -39 (THIRTY-NINE BEFORE)

The Guarantee of Work

The hand that found work stood upright—work gives a name, not alms.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE RIGHT TO WORK

Folk tune: attendance song

*The hand that found work stood upright,
Work gives a name, not alms; the head remained high.*

*Work came within the village and hands stood upright again,
No need now to flee abroad; work is in our own village.
The pond was dug, the embankment built, upon our own soil,
Sweat fell in our own fields, grain entered our own homes.*

*Dig the pond, build the embankment, here in your village,
Let sweat fall on your own soil and grain fill your own store.
Do not beg from anyone; earn a name through work,
Raise high the head of the hand that takes up work.*

*We will not flee abroad; the household will not break apart,
Every name enters the attendance roll, every right reaches the hand.
Work gives a name; alms give humiliation,
What is earned by one's own hands increases the village's honour.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. The employment-guarantee programme gives village labourers local work and stability.)

In Vibha's time the central government's rural employment-guarantee programme reached the village, giving every household a right to a fixed number of days of work within the village itself. Labourers who once had to flee to cities for work—whose fathers and grandfathers had endured the suffering of migration and indenture like Ramsevak and Bhola—could now find work on their own soil.

Ponds were dug, embankments repaired, roads built. Village work was done within the village, and hands that had once been idle were employed. Every worker's attendance entered a register, and wages reached the workers directly. Families once broken apart in search of work could now remain together in the village.

Vibha's husband Suresh, the local coordinator of the programme, said beneath the pipal, "Budhba, now village labourers will not have to go far for livelihood. Stories like Bhola's, Sukhdev's, and Ramsevak's need not repeat themselves."

Budhba replied, "Suresh, that is good news. But remember—a scheme can be excellent on paper and still depend on honest implementation. Bhola's court story taught us how great the distance between law and practice can be."

He continued, "A law is a good seed, Suresh, but a seed does not become a tree by itself; it needs honest hands and steady water. If scheme money disappears on the way, if a labourer's name is omitted from the attendance roll, even a good law can become a new injustice. Remember every name and keep every account clear—that is the real guard of this programme."

One year, when some programme funds were delayed, Suresh read every worker's name and account aloud before the village and demanded the withheld wages from the officials until every hand received its due. That day the village understood that keeping a good law good also requires constant vigilance.

Remembering the warning, Suresh kept the accounts of every project transparent. Every worker's name, every day of attendance, every wage payment was displayed openly before the village so no name could be omitted and no right denied. He continued ensuring that every labourer received wages on time, making Budhba's words a guide to duty.

CHAPTER -38 (THIRTY-EIGHT BEFORE)

The Web of the Internet

The new web brings the distant near, but turns names into numbers—whoever is caught in the web loses the face.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: GLITTER AND WEB

Folk tune: caution song

*A new web came and brought the distant near,
But turned the name into a number and made the face disappear.*

*The internet came to the village and the distant became near,
Messages crossed in a moment and the world was joined.*

*But in this web names became numbers,
Faces hid behind screens; truth and falsehood mixed.*

*A lie shines like truth and rumour spreads like fire,
Whoever believes without asking is caught in the web.*

*Not every glitter is true; not every message is right,
Whoever accepts without testing is bound in illusion's net.*

*Open your eyes and ask which glitter is true,
Which is shell, which is silver—ask, test, then believe.*

*The web joined the distant but brought illusion too,
Whoever learned to ask and test was not caught in the web.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. The arrival of smartphones and the internet transforms village life in both good and harmful ways.)

In Suresh's time smartphones and inexpensive internet reached the village. Children who had once learned letters on coconut leaves now walked about holding the whole world in their palms—news from distant countries, answers to questions, songs and pictures, all at a touch. For the first time village knowledge travelled beyond the village boundary, while the outside world arrived in the village hand.

But new problems arrived with the new web. False news spread like truth; people became dissatisfied with their own lives after seeing the glittering lives of others; and unknown people from afar began making unwanted contact with village children and young women. The web that had brought the world near could sometimes carry people far away from themselves.

Suresh's son Neeraj said beneath the pipal, "Budhba, the internet is a new world, but there is much in it that can mislead us. I am afraid."

Budhba answered gravely, "Neeraj, every new power brings a new danger. From the shell-silver illusion until today, that is the lesson of our whole story. This new web—the internet—can become a new form of shell-and-silver illusion, where falsehood shines like truth. Be careful, and do not forget what you have learned."

He continued, "Gangesha Upadhyaya taught us four means of knowledge—perception, inference, comparison, and testimony. Then it was a matter of philosophy; today it has become a necessity of life. Whatever you see on the internet, do not accept it immediately as true. Ask: where did this come from? Who said it? What is the evidence? Whoever learns to ask questions is not caught in the web."

Once a false report spread through the village over the internet like fire—an inflammatory claim with no foundation. Neeraj's group traced it to its source, proved it false, and warned the village. That day the village understood that in the new web truth and falsehood can shine alike; only questioning eyes can tell the difference.

Remembering Budhba's warning, Neeraj formed a small village youth group where they learned together to verify every suspicious claim seen online—which news was true or false, which offer genuine or fraudulent. Just as Gangesha Upadhyaya had taught the four means of knowledge, the new generation learned amid the new web to separate truth from illusion.

CHAPTER -37 (THIRTY-SEVEN BEFORE)

The First Shadow on the Screen

A face shone on the first screen, while the name behind it lay in darkness—whoever looked at the screen must not let the eyes forget the village.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: LIGHT AND SHAME

Folk tune: Song of Courage

A face shines on the screen, but the name behind lies dark;

The one who hides to frighten you grows weak before the light.

*An image flashed upon the screen; behind it hid a hand,
Selling fear out of the darkness, seeking to wound with shame.*

*But whoever hides to frighten us grows weaker in the light;
The one who cannot face us openly is only a thief behind our backs.
The shame is not the victim's; it belongs to the hidden hand.*

Speak aloud; stand together, side by side.

*Whoever stayed silent out of fear was left alone;
Whoever spoke with others beside them drove the darkness back.
Leave no one alone—let our lights burn together;
Whoever looks upon the screen, let the eyes not forget the village.*

*The hidden hand grew feeble in the light;
When everyone stood together, the darkness fled.*

(A novel excerpt. With the arrival of social media, the village senses for the first time the approach of a new kind of ghost.)

By Neeraj's time, Facebook and WhatsApp had reached nearly every hand in the village. Relatives living far away seemed close again, old friends found one another once more, and news of every joy and sorrow in the village could reach everyone in moments. Yet the very screen that had joined people together also brought with it a new kind of shadow.

Stories of rumours, fraud, and online harassment began to multiply—someone would take another person's photograph, someone else would spread a lie, and from the shelter of darkness an unseen person could make another life unbearable. The ghosts that had once dwelt in the darkness of Channa Grove now seemed to live behind the glow of the screen, their names and faces concealed.

Neeraj's daughter Sapna went anxiously to the pipal. "Budhba, an unknown person is threatening a girl from our village over the phone, using her photographs. What should we do?"

Budhba answered, his voice trembling. “Sapna, this is a new kind of injustice, one that even I do not fully understand. But this much I know: a power that works secretly, frightening someone from the darkness, becomes weaker when it is brought into the light. Do not leave that girl alone.”

He continued, “Sapna, the greatest strength of this new ghost is silence. It wants the victim to keep quiet out of shame, to remain alone, to tell no one. So the strongest answer is to speak and to stand together. Once the matter is spoken of openly, the shame leaves the victim and settles where it belongs—on the swindler. Make the girl understand that the fault is not hers; it belongs to the hidden hand.”

At the first digital night assembly, the girl who had been threatened told her story openly for the first time. When ten or twenty women of the village stood beside her, the menace of that hidden hand suddenly began to lose its force. The burden she had been carrying alone was now lifted by the whole gathering—and after many days, a smile returned to her face.

Sapna gave a new form to the women’s old tradition of night assemblies and created a “digital night assembly” for the women and girls of the village, where stories of online harassment and fraud could be shared openly and confronted together. Fear, which had grown for so long in darkness and solitude, began to weaken in the shared light—for, as Budhba had said, the ghosts of darkness cannot endure illumination.

CHAPTER -36 (THIRTY-SIX BEFORE)

The First Footfall of the Unseen Swindler

The swindler who cannot be seen is the greatest of all—listen for the footfall, ask the name, and trust not paper alone but the evidence before your eyes.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE UNSEEN CROCODILE

Folk tune: Song of Warning

The old crocodile lived in water; we could see it there,

The new crocodile lives in wires; we cannot even see it.

The old crocodile lay in water, visible to the eye;

The new one lives among the wires, unseen as it deceives.

It asks no offering; it steals only trust,

Coaxes with a honeyed voice, takes the money, disappears.

It asks no offering; it steals the trust you give;

Whoever sends money without understanding is left wringing empty hands.

The one who trusted glitter was deceived;

The one who heard the warning and stayed alert was saved.

The swindler you cannot see is the greatest of them all;

Hear the footfall, ask the name—do not put your faith in glitter.

The unseen crocodile is dangerous, hidden inside the shine;

Whoever learns to ask and verify escapes the net.

(A novel excerpt. In this chapter, the village is shaken for the first time by a serious case of digital fraud, and Budhba begins to recognize a new and unfamiliar kind of hunger.)

In Sapna's time, a young man from the village, lured by the promise of a job, lost all his savings to a fraudulent online company. The company had seemed genuine—it had a website, photographs of an office, the voices of supposed officials. But once the young man sent his money, the company, its website, and those voices all vanished in a single night.

The fraud had been operated from a distant country by unseen hands. No one knew who the real swindler was or where he lived. A police report was filed, but how could one catch a person who could not even be seen? For the first time, the village stood before an enemy that had neither a face nor an address.

Distressed, Sapna said beside the pipal, "Budhba, this fraud seems more terrible to me than the Original Crocodile in our twin ponds. We could see that crocodile; we could make an offering to it. This one we cannot even see.”

Budhba remained silent for a long while, then spoke softly. “Sapna, I fear you are right. This is a new kind of crocodile. It has no body and no water; it is only a hunger living inside wires and screens. I do not know how my old knowledge can fight this new crocodile. But I know this much: whatever name this new crocodile devours, I shall preserve that name too, just as I have preserved all the others.”

He paused, then continued. “We fought the old crocodile with offerings, patience, and names. This new crocodile asks for no offering; it cheats people of their trust. There is only one way to defeat it, Sapna—awareness. In a village that stays alert, where people warn one another and do not shut their eyes and trust every glittering proposal, this new crocodile is forced to remain hungry.”

That very night, keeping Budhba’s words in mind, Sapna began teaching every family in the village how to guard against online fraud—which offers were genuine and which were false, where it was safe to send money and where danger lay. She knew that the story ahead, which even Budhba did not yet fully understand, would become far more complicated and far more dangerous.

CHAPTER -35 (THIRTY-FIVE BEFORE)

The Market in Bodies Opens

Where bodies are sold, names become cheap—but a village that keeps its people’s names will not let their bodies be turned into merchandise.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: A MOTHER'S WARNING

Folk tune: A Mournful Song of Vigilance

*Where bodies are sold, the name grows cheap;
A son goes to a distant land, his name lost in the market.*

*A promise came of "good work," showing a glittering dream;
Sons and daughters journeyed far, while a hidden net waited behind.*

*The body was laid out in the market, the name marked down;
A mother's eyes stayed fixed upon the road, her son somewhere in darkness.*

*A promise of "good work," with a prison-net behind;
A mother's eyes stayed fixed upon the road, her son somewhere in darkness.*

*Test every promise first; understand every road;
Whoever was sent away without questions was left to grieve.*

*Be watchful, mother—question every road, every promise;
A village that keeps the name will not let the body become merchandise.*

The market could not sell the one whose name was held fast;

The one who became alert in time saved the child.

(A novel excerpt. The deception of false job offers gradually takes on the terrifying shape of human trafficking, and Budhba senses the approach of a new and darkest chapter.)

After Sapna, the responsibility for the ritual passed to her son Rajiv. In Rajiv's time, fraud carried out through false promises of employment took an even more terrible form. Earlier, the swindler had taken only money; now he took human beings. Brokers carried some young people to distant countries with promises of "good work," and once they arrived, their passports were seized. Fragment by fragment, stories of forced labour began making their way back to the village.

In one house in the village, no news of a son came for years. He had left on the promise of "good work," and then seemed simply to have vanished into darkness. Every evening his mother's eyes remained fixed upon the road. The village slowly understood that this was no ordinary fraud; it was the turning of human beings themselves into a market.

Troubled, Rajiv said beside the pipal, “Budhba, this is worse even than the girmitiya system. At least there was a contract then, there was a term. Now people are imprisoned without knowing anything, without understanding what they have entered.”

Budhba answered in an exceedingly grave voice. “Rajiv, I fear this is the dark chapter whose approach I heard many years ago. The hunger that lived inside the screen has now reached the market in bodies. We must warn every family and every child about this new danger, just as we used to warn one another about flood, fire, and disease.”

He continued, “The weapon for defeating this new crocodile, Rajiv, is not a sword—it is a question. Whenever a promise sounds too good, too quick, we must become especially cautious. Ask: Who is calling? Which company? What documents? Who guarantees it? A family that learns to ask questions can save its sons and daughters from that unseen market. To preserve a name is no longer merely the work of memory; it is the work of preserving life.”

From that day, Rajiv began teaching every young person in the village how to examine offers of work abroad—which agent was genuine and which a fraud, which document was real and which false, where it was safe to go and where danger waited. It was a new kind of school, not written on coconut leaves but no less necessary: a school meant to save the village’s sons and daughters from the dark hands of the market.

CHAPTER -34 (THIRTY-FOUR BEFORE)

Ujjwal’s Dream

Let the dream be vast, but keep its roots in the soil—whoever dreams after forgetting the name awakens alone.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: DREAM AND ROOT

Folk tune: Birth Sohar

*Let the dream be vast, but keep its roots in the soil;
Whoever dreams after forgetting the name awakens alone.*

*Today a name was born, and joy filled the village;
Budhba held the name, bringing with it a new hope.
Dream great dreams, fly as high as the sky,
But keep your roots in the earth; do not forget the village.
Today a name was born, and the village will hold it fast;
Even if it walks into darkness, one lamp will remain beside it.
A dream joined to its roots will blossom into truth;
A dream that forgets the name awakens alone.
Budhba has held the name; the village will keep watch;
The one whose name the village remembers will not be alone in darkness.
Let the dream be vast, but let the roots run deep;
Whoever carries the village along is never wholly alone.*

(A novel excerpt. In this chapter, a figure Budhba had glimpsed in a vision many years before—Ujjwal Jha—is born for the first time into actual life.)

In Rajiv's time, a child was born into a poor family in the village. The household rejoiced in the ordinary ways—a sohar was sung, jaggery was distributed, and the child was named Ujjwal Jha. Yet amid that happiness Budhba, sitting beside the pipal on the night of the birth, grew strangely restless, as though some very old memory had suddenly come alive before him.

The villagers had never seen Budhba so unsettled. Again and again he looked toward the poor family's house, tried to say something, and then fell silent. At every new birth Budhba was usually joyful; today, in place of that joy, there was a deep anxiety in his eyes.

Rajiv's daughter Deepali went worriedly to the pipal. "Budhba, why are you so troubled today?"

Budhba spoke softly. "Deepali, many years ago, in a fleeting vision, I saw a young man drowning not in a river but in a screen—beneath the weight of lost money, interest, and threats. Today that child has been born. His name is Ujjwal Jha. I do not know whether we shall be able to save him, but from this very day I shall keep hold of his name.”

He continued, “Deepali, I still do not know how that vision will become true, or whether we can prevent it. But this much I know: the name I have taken into my keeping today will not remain alone. When the child grows up, when that darkness comes before him, the village will already know him and remember his name—and perhaps because of that one thing, he will not be alone even in the darkness.”

From that day onward, without saying anything, the village kept an unspoken watch over little Ujjwal. When he first went to school, when he first bathed in the pond, when he first stepped beyond the village, some eye from the village quietly remained with him. Ujjwal knew nothing of this. He grew up playing through the village lanes, while his name rested safely in the village’s memory beside Budhba’s concern.

Hearing this, Deepali wrote Ujjwal’s name in her notebook beside the record of every new birth in the village, adding an extra mark so that no one in the future would forget it. She knew Budhba’s unease was never without cause; and if he had taken hold today of this small, newborn name, then the story attached to that name would one day matter greatly to the village.

CHAPTER -33 (THIRTY-THREE BEFORE)

The Shadow of the Lawyer’s Coat

Justice hides in the shadow of the coat, but in the village justice speaks —the lawyer reads the statute; the village reads the name.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE COAT AND THE PIPAL

Folk tune: Courthouse Biraha

Justice hides in the shadow of the coat, while in the village justice speaks;

In the city statutes are sold, and the poor struggle for breath.

*In the city, coat upon coat, statute upon statute, papers piled high;
The lawyer has read the books, while justice is weighed against money.*

The brilliant boy who carried a dream of justice in his eyes Turned toward the darkness and became caught in the web of statutes.

*The lawyer reads the statute; the village reads the name;
The brilliant boy who dreamed of justice has turned toward the dark.*

*The coat sold justice; the village shared it;
Whoever was lost among statutes was severed from the justice of names.*

*Date after date, yet the name still stands;
For one who can change the road, hope does not die.
Whoever turned toward darkness may yet turn back;
The one whose name is remembered does not lose the road.*

(A novel excerpt. A young man from the village studies law and goes to the city to practise, but his path gradually turns toward darkness.)

In Deepali's time, a sharp and gifted young man from the village named Batuknath studied law and began practising in the city. The villagers were proud of him. The boy who had once been among the brightest students in the coconut-leaf school would now fight in court for the rights of the poor, they hoped. And at first, he truly did take honest cases and stand on the side of the weak.

But little by little, as powerful clients gathered around him, his road began to change. The taste of victory, the glitter of money, and the intoxication of power—each drew him one step farther from the path on which he had begun. The statutes he had once studied to protect the poor he now learned to bend in order to shield the powerful.

Troubled by the change in Batuknath, Deepali said beside the pipal, "Budhba, Batuknath now secures date after date in every case, however poor the other side may be. He has begun to behave like one of the courthouse ghosts.”

Budhba answered sadly, “Deepali, I fear that the seed planted in Chapter -68 is now flowering in a human body. Batuknath was not born guilty. The slowness of the system, temptation, and the taste of power turned him in this direction. I shall preserve his name too, in the hope that he may yet change his road again.”

He continued, “Deepali, in all these years I have learned one thing: no human being is born already guilty. A seed may fall in one place and its flower open somewhere else, at another time. Batuknath is the fruit of a system that turned justice into something to be sold. So I shall hold his name not with a curse but with hope—for the name of one who can still change his road is never completely killed.”

Once, a poor widow from the village came to stand before Batuknath in a dispute over her field. She was from his own village, a woman whose name he had known in childhood. For one moment, the old village flashed in Batuknath’s eyes; the next moment he had retreated again into the language of statutes. That day Deepali understood that the old Batuknath had not died completely. He was only hidden somewhere deep in the darkness.

Batuknath’s story spread beyond the village into the city, and gradually his name became associated not with the speech of the village but with a reputation in the corridors of the courts that Deepali never wished to accept. Yet in the village’s memory, at Budhba’s insistence, his name also survived as the old, honest Batuknath—with the hope that one day, somehow, he would return to that earlier road.

CHAPTER -32 (THIRTY-TWO BEFORE)

Shadows Across the Sea

A shadow may come from beyond seven seas, but it cannot carry away the name—whoever cheats from afar leaves a mark upon the leaf.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: TOWER AND ROOT

Folk tune: foreign-land song

*A shadow may come from beyond seven seas,
But it cannot carry the name away; the name stays in the village.*

*A shadow from beyond seven seas spread from afar,
A web from a glass tower reached all the way to the village.
It could steal body and money and bring darkness from afar,
But the name remained in the village; it could not take that away.*

*The glass tower shines at a distance, with a web concealed within,
Whoever cheats from afar still leaves a mark upon the leaf.
The glitter came from afar, but brought no roots,
The higher the tower rose, the hollower its base became.*

*Let the tower be high; the roots of a name are deeper,
The village that holds its names does not fear a distant shadow.
Distant shadows come and go; the name remains still,
Whoever remains joined to the roots is not frightened by shadow.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. In a glass tower in Hong Kong, the shadow of an unseen power appears for the first time on the horizon of the story.)

In Deepali's time, through the webs of global trade and digital finance, the village's fraud stories no longer seemed connected only with cities, but with places across the sea. Money cheated from the hand of a poor villager could travel wire by wire across several countries and reach an unseen hand. Deepali's son Abhinav read one such report in a newspaper and went beneath the pipal.

The report carried a photograph of a tall glass tower in a distant city and described an unseen power inside it that cheated thousands of people from thousands of miles away. One name appeared again and again, and reading it planted an unfamiliar fear in Abhinav's mind.

"Budhba," Abhinav said, "the newspaper says many fraud networks in India are operated from Hong Kong and nearby countries. One name keeps appearing—Lau Kin-Hung. I do not know who he is, but I am afraid."

Budhba remained silent for a long time, then spoke in a voice Abhinav had never heard before. "Abhinav, I too heard this name many years ago in a fleeting vision—a shadow sitting in a glass tower. I do not know who he is, or what relation he will have to my Ujjwal and my Batuknath. But I know this: all these stories, even from very far away, will one day return to one place—to Garh Narikel."

He paused and continued, "The crocodile changes its water, but it remains a crocodile. First it lived in the pond, then on the screen, now in a glass tower beyond the sea. But the old rule still applies: it may take the body, but not the name. If the village keeps its names and keeps warning one another, even this distant shadow will eventually weaken before the village light."

Abhinav warned every young person in the village to be alert to international fraud networks—what proposal was coming from afar, what name was hidden behind it, where the money was going. He did not yet know how soon and how closely that warning would prove necessary: the shadow now seen on a newspaper page would one day stand directly inside Garh Narikel's own story.

CHAPTER -३१ (THIRTY-ONE BEFORE)

Satyavrat's Silence

The one who remained silent for a long time may speak the heaviest word—Satyavrat's silence too was a testimony.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: SILENCE AND SPEECH

Folk tune: song of patience

The one silent for a long time may speak one heavy word, Silence is sometimes protection, sometimes injustice.

*Satyavrat remained silent a long time, seeing and enduring,
Wrapped in silence, holding truth within.*

*But silence was sometimes armour and sometimes injustice,
Whoever stayed silent when it was time to speak stood beside the guilty.*

*Before the moment comes, silence can be patience,
When the moment has come and one stays silent, silence becomes injustice.*

*Truth seen within must one day come outside,
Silence that hides truth becomes a fault.*

*Write what you see; let the notebook become a witness,
Truth lodged within must one day come outside.
Silence may be patience and speech may be courage,
Whoever speaks at the right moment becomes a guardian of truth.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. A simple, quiet bank employee from the village, Satyavrat Mehta, begins to waver between duty and conscience.)

In Abhinav's time a quiet and honest young man from the village named Satyavrat Mehta found work in a city bank. He was the kind of person who spoke little but saw everything, whose silence was sometimes deeper than speech. In the calm routine of the bank he continued performing his duties honestly.

Gradually, however, he began seeing accounts that looked suspicious. Money arrived and was immediately moved onward without clear reason. Lakhs entered one account and within moments were split among several others and disappeared. Satyavrat understood this was no ordinary transaction, but one thread of a large concealed web. Yet he was only a small employee—who would listen, and what danger might speaking bring?

On leave in the village, Satyavrat said beneath the pipal, “Budhba, I am seeing things I cannot fully understand, but they frighten me. I do not know whether I should stay silent or speak.”

Budhba replied softly, “Satyavrat, silence is sometimes protection, but sometimes injustice. I cannot make the decision for you—that belongs to your conscience. I know only this: whatever truth you know will remain alive inside you whether or not you speak today, and one day it will have to come out.”

He continued, “Remember this too. When the moment to speak has not yet come, silence is not cowardice but patience. But when the moment has come and one still remains silent, silence becomes injustice. Recognising that moment is conscience. And if it comes, you must have evidence, not merely words. Whatever you see, write it down.”

Returning to the city, Satyavrat remembered Budhba’s words and quietly began recording every suspicious transaction in a notebook—the date, the account, where the money moved, how much. He did not speak, but neither did he remain truly silent. He waited for the moment when silence could become testimony, without knowing how important that notebook would one day become.

CHAPTER -30 (THIRTY BEFORE)

Gop Kumar’s Document

Whoever keeps it written preserves time—a document saves not the body but the name.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE WRITTEN INHERITANCE

Folk tune: collection song

*Whoever keeps it written preserves time,
A document saves not the body but the name.*

*Gop Kumar joined page to page with care,
Old leaf, new screen, bound upon one thread.
The body that time consumes may disappear, but writing survives,
The document kept the name and fought against time.*

*Bind old leaf and new screen upon one thread,
What Yadavanand wrote in secret, what Vibha brought into the open.
Scattered stories were brought into one place,
What the witness wrote down defeated time.*

*The story gathered together will live generation after generation,
The witness awakens every lost name again.
The body vanished; the name survived upon the written page,
Whoever preserves the document preserves every name.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. A young villager named Gop Kumar devotes his life to documents and archives.)

In Satyavrat's time another young villager, Gop Kumar, carried forward the traditions of Yadavanand and Vibha by devoting his life to documentation and research. The boy who once spent hours smelling old paper and reading old names now set himself to bringing the whole memory of the village into one place.

He began joining old maps and registers with new digital records. Names Yadavanand had written by night, papers Vibha had obtained through the Right to Information law, and new records now created on screens—all these Gop Kumar connected thread by thread. People watching him said, "This young man wants to make the village's memory immortal."

Gop Kumar said beneath the pipal, "Budhba, I want to collect your entire story, from Yadavanand's register to the present day, in one place. Has the time come?"

Budhba thought for a long time. "Gop Kumar, Haripati the poet asked me this question, and I told him—not until the story is complete. I think it is still not complete. One final chapter remains, whose footsteps I have heard year after year. When that chapter is complete, your work will be complete too."

He continued, "Gop Kumar, collecting a story is not decoration; it is becoming a witness. Whoever writes a story must bear within himself every joy, sorrow, and injustice in it. Do not hurry. The final chapter that is coming will be the hardest. Ujjwal will be there, Batuknath will be there, and that distant shadow will be there. When they all arrive in one place, then write—and only then will the village possess its complete story."

One day, sorting old registers, Gop Kumar found the name of someone lost in a flood centuries earlier. Beside it Yadavanand had written a small note. Gop Kumar added that name and note to his new archive, and in that moment realised he was not merely assembling papers; he was building a bridge across centuries upon which every lost name might return to the village.

Hearing this, Gop Kumar continued his collection patiently. He knew he might become a witness, perhaps even the writer, of that final chapter. So he began preserving every name, every account, every thread for the day when Garh Narikel's complete story would stand together in one place, in one hand, from beginning to end.

CHAPTER -29 (TWENTY-NINE BEFORE)

Chandrapal's Dream

Dream in the eyes, deception at the feet—whoever signs without understanding is caught in the web.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: DREAM AND DECEPTION

Folk tune: caution biraha

*Dream in the eyes, deception at the feet,
Whoever signed without understanding was caught in the web.*

*Chandrapal dreamed, dazzled by distant glitter,
He signed without understanding and set his foot in the web.
The dream danced in his eyes; deception bound his feet,
Whoever moved ahead without testing was caught unknowingly.*

Whether the name belongs to the village or afar, the crocodile recognises all,

*Meerut or Garh Narikel—the web knows no boundary.
The crocodile asks neither name nor village nor border,
Wherever trust is given without testing, there is its kingdom.*

*Wherever one is born, the village can still hold the name,
Budhba's watch has now spread beyond the village embankment.
Whoever was trapped in Meerut has a name preserved here too,
Budhba's eyes have now crossed every boundary.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. A young man born outside the village, Chandrapal Batra, earns a law degree and becomes entangled in a betting network.)

In Gop Kumar's time a child named Chandrapal Batra was born in Meerut to a distant branch of a family linked with the village. The family had left the village years before, moved from city to city, and finally settled in Meerut; its connection with Garh Narikel had shrunk to an old name and an occasional letter. Yet on the night of the child's birth Budhba felt strangely unsettled.

The villagers were puzzled. They understood Budhba's concern when a child was born in the village, but why should he be disturbed by a child born hundreds of miles away in an unfamiliar city? Gop Kumar, whose digital archive now linked distant relationships too, wondered the same thing.

Gop Kumar asked beneath the pipal, "Budhba, this child is not of the village. Why are you troubled about him?"

Budhba replied softly, "Gop Kumar, my witness-consciousness has now extended beyond the village boundary, just as your digital archive connects distant relations. In time this child will become part of my story whether or not he ever sees the village. I will hold his name—Chandrapal."

He continued, "The new crocodile that lives in wires and screens knows no village boundary. It can cheat someone sitting in Meerut as easily as someone in Garh Narikel. So my watch, too, must now travel beyond the village limits. Any name that may enter the web of this new crocodile, wherever born, must be held."

That night Gop Kumar sat beneath the pipal for a long time thinking about how Budhba's witness-consciousness had expanded beyond the village. Once Budhba held only names born on village soil; now he held names born thousands of miles away in unknown courtyards. Gop Kumar understood that as the new crocodile's web expanded, Budhba's watch expanded with it.

Gop Kumar added a new section to his archive—"Distant Relations"—and began preserving names linked with the village but born outside it. Chandrapal became the first entry. That day he understood that Budhba's story was no longer only Garh Narikel's story; it was becoming the story of every name, anywhere, that might enter the web of the new crocodile.

CHAPTER -28 (TWENTY-EIGHT BEFORE)

Raghav's Code

The language the machine understands is not the language the village understands—but even inside code a name remains hidden.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: CODE AND NAME

Folk tune: machine sohar

The language the machine understands, the village may not understand,

But even inside the code a name remains hidden.

*Raghav wrote code and understood the machine's language,
What the village could not understand appeared upon the screen.*

*But inside every code there lived a name,
The hand that made it left a mark of the mind.*

*The hand that creates can also destroy,
A sword is neither good nor bad; the mind gives it direction.
Power is not in the machine but in the mind that operates it,
The steady mind sends power along the right road.*

*Let power be great; the choice remains in the hand,
For the one who does not forget the roots, power becomes a guardian.*

*If code preserves names, it becomes a watchman,
If code erases names, it becomes a crocodile.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. A gifted young programmer named Raghav is born in the town nearest the village, and the skill in his hands may one day move in either direction—protection or destruction.)

In one branch of Abhinav's family, in the town, a boy named Raghav was born with an extraordinary mind for code and machines. At a very young age he learned computer languages as naturally as village children had once learned letters on coconut leaves. Logic that took experienced engineers years to understand became play to Raghav.

As a teenager he performed feats that amazed people—sometimes repairing a complex machine, sometimes detecting a hidden error. Watching that extraordinary ability, some thoughtful people quietly wondered: such power in good hands could save thousands; in bad hands it could cheat just as many.

Gop Kumar, hearing about Raghav's talent, said beneath the pipal, "Budhba, this child is extraordinary. He will do great things one day."

Budhba replied anxiously, "Gop Kumar, extraordinary power can travel in either direction—toward protection or toward destruction. I do not know which direction Raghav will choose. I shall hold his name and wait."

He continued, "A sword is neither good nor bad; the mind of the hand that holds it makes it one or the other. Raghav's skill is such a sword. If he remembers his name, his village, and his conscience, this power can guard thousands. But if he forgets the name and runs only after power, the same skill can become a new crocodile. So I hold his name from today, so he does not forget his roots."

Once, a poor village family had a damaged and exhausted set of papers that no office would listen to. Raghav used his technical skill to repair the record in moments, and the family received its right. That day Gop Kumar understood that if Raghav's power moved in the right direction he could become one of the village's greatest guardians. Yet Budhba's question mark still stood beside the name.

Gop Kumar entered Raghav's name in the archive and placed a question mark beside it—an empty space left for the future, to be filled by time. He knew the answer would be Raghav's own choice, and perhaps much of the village's future would depend upon it.

CHAPTER -27 (TWENTY-SEVEN BEFORE)

The Making of Aruni

Whoever builds must first shape himself—before the splash, Aruni first shaped his own way of seeing.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: BUILDING AND SHAPING

Folk tune: building song

*Whoever would build must first shape himself,
A bridge stands firm only when the mind stands firm.*

*Aruni built bridges and learned engineering,
But the finest bridge was the self he first shaped.
He set stone, raised embankments, remembered the flood,
And never thought the elders' knowledge of water less than a machine.*

*Set the stone, raise the embankment, remember the flood,
The elders who read the water knew no less than any machine.*

*Join new instruments with old knowledge,
The one who joins the two builds the strongest bridge.*

*What has been built still needs care,
Without tending, even a solid embankment will one day sink.*

*Building alone is not enough; guarding it is also work,
The bridge one builds and tends does not collapse.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. A young engineer named Aruni devotes himself to bridges and embankments, giving modern form to the village's old tradition of flood defence.)

In Gop Kumar's time, a young man of the village named Aruni studied engineering and took up the work of building bridges and embankments. He never forgot the flood stories of his childhood, or the story of Indrani's early-warning system—the floods that had once swept away village houses, and the embankment that generation after generation of village labour had finally made strong.

With his training, Aruni gave the old village embankment a new form—replacing earthwork with a permanent barrier and adding modern instruments for flood forecasting. Yet he also knew that any concrete embankment was incomplete without the old knowledge: the elders who understood the river's moods and the women who could read the rise of the water possessed knowledge no instrument could replace.

At the pipal, Aruni said, "Budhba, I want to build bridges and embankments that will never break, as our old village embankment finally became strong."

Budhba replied with affection, "Aruni, your wish is good. But remember—no construction, however strong, survives without care, just as our grove can weaken if no one tends it."

He continued, "People think the work is finished once they have built something strong. But whether it is an embankment, a village, or a memory, every generation must care for it anew. A bridge that is strong today may weaken through the neglect of the next generation. So true construction is not merely building—it is keeping what has been built alive."

One year, when the Kamla-Balan rose in a great flood, Aruni's new embankment faced its first real test. The villagers kept watch on it all night with lamps, and the embankment held. But Aruni knew the victory belonged not only to stone, but also to all the hands that stayed awake through the night; for in the end an embankment survives through the labour and care of the village that regards it as its own.

Taking that lesson to heart, Aruni began attaching a long-term maintenance plan to every project—deciding who would care for each bridge and embankment in the future and who would keep its records. Making Budhba's words a principle of his profession, Aruni became an engineer who shaped not merely stone, but the future of the stone he laid.

CHAPTER -26 (TWENTY-SIX BEFORE)

Devika's Song

Justice belongs to the voice that carries the song—the name called in song echoes throughout the village.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: JUSTICE OF THE VOICE

Folk tune: Devika melody

*Justice belongs to the throat that carries the song,
The name called in song echoes through the whole village.*

*Devika sang, filling her voice with justice,
A forgotten name rose again inside the song.
She sang Hulasa's tune, and Hulasa lived again,
An old melody awakened in a new voice.*

*Sing Hulasa's song, and Hulasa rises again,
If an old tune lives in a new voice, it does not die.
The song that preserves a name never loses it,
The voice that saves the tune saves every name within it.*

*Leaf or machine—the voice does not die,
Where a melody survives, every name dwelling in it survives.
The medium may change while the song remains steady,
The name held in melody echoes from age to age.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. A young woman named Devika dedicates her life to carrying the village's folk-song tradition into the next generation.)

In Aruni's time, a young woman of the village named Devika carried Mohan's musical tradition forward. She began recording every old folk song of the village—songs of Hulasa, Jivanti, and Gangesha—with new arrangements and instruments. Songs that had once lived only on field ridges, at water places, and on threshing floors were now entering recording devices and becoming durable memory.

Devika sat with the elderly women of the village and listened to songs that very few people still knew—a flood song, a birth song, a farewell song, a famine refrain. She recorded them exactly in those old voices and then shaped them anew for the younger generation. Old and new kept each other alive.

At the pipal, Devika said, “Budhba, I want to preserve every one of your melodies with modern technology so that future generations too can hear them.”

Budhba replied happily, “Devika, you are fulfilling Mohan’s dream. A melody, however old, never dies if it continues to live in new voices and new instruments.”

He continued, “Devika, saving names and saving songs are the same work. Names live inside songs. When Hulasa’s song is sung, Hulasa lives again for that moment. So when you place an old song in a new voice, you are not merely preserving a tune—you are making every name dwelling within that tune resound through the village again.”

One day Devika sat beside the oldest woman in the village, who knew a famine refrain no one else remembered. In a trembling voice the old woman sang it, and Devika recorded her. A few days later the woman died; but her voice, her song, and every name held within that song remained preserved for good.

Devika opened a new school to teach old folk songs to village children—the music branch of the Coconut-Leaf School, where melody was taught alongside letters. Every child learned one old song before learning the alphabet, so that the village’s tunes, and the names living within them, would never break from one generation to the next.

CHAPTER -25 (TWENTY-FIVE BEFORE)

Meera’s Privacy

The story belongs to the one whose life it is—name is not a specimen; Meera’s story belongs to Meera.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: CONSENT OF THE NAME

Folk tune: privacy song

*The story belongs to the one whose life it is, and so does consent,
A name is not a specimen; Meera's story is Meera's own.*

*Meera's image was stolen, her information became merchandise,
Without consent, name and story passed into another's hands.*

*But Meera said—"I am not a specimen,
My story goes nowhere without my consent."*

*Steal a photograph, sell information, put a name on the market—
Whoever takes name and image without consent is a thief.
The story belongs to its subject; the name belongs with consent,
Whoever takes without asking becomes a thief of names.*

The right to privacy is, in the end, the right to one's name, Whose name it is, whose consent it must be—that is the strongest watch.

*A name is no one's sample; every name is a story,
Whoever takes it without consent breaks the dignity of that name.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. A sharp young woman named Meera begins raising her voice for the right to digital privacy.)

In Devika's time, a sharp young woman of the village named Meera studied in the city and began working on digital privacy and women's safety. She carried forward Sapna's tradition of the "digital night assembly," adding legal assistance so that a woman facing online abuse would receive not only sympathy but concrete help.

Meera saw new forms of injustice emerging in the modern world—someone stealing a woman's photograph, someone selling her personal information, someone using her name without permission. The crocodile that had once devoured bodies now began devouring women's privacy, dignity, and names. Meera understood that stopping it was as necessary as saving homes from flood had once been.

At the pipal, Meera said, "Budhba, in today's world a woman's photograph or personal information can be stolen without her consent. I want to fight this."

Budhba replied, "Meera, you are the modern heir to Sulochana and Padma. The right to privacy is ultimately a right over one's name—the right that no one may use your name or your image without your consent."

He continued, "Meera, all these years I have said that the crocodile eats the body but not the name. But this new crocodile wants to eat the name as well: it steals a woman's image, sells her name in the marketplace, and tries to erase her dignity. So now saving a name is not only the work of memory; it is also the work of honour. Whose name it is, whose consent it must be—that is the strongest guard."

Once, a village girl whose photograph had been stolen by an unknown person who tried to defame her came to Meera's digital night assembly. With legal help, Meera brought the hidden offender into the light for the first time, and the girl who would otherwise have remained silent in shame stood upright again. That day the village understood that the struggle for privacy was ultimately a struggle for dignity.

Inspired by Budhba's words, Meera began teaching every village woman and girl the rights of digital safety—how to protect personal information, how to speak against abuse, and where to obtain legal help. She knew the struggle had only begun, not ended; but once the struggle had begun, at least no woman had to stand alone.

CHAPTER -24 (TWENTY-FOUR BEFORE)

Nishant's Bank

When the account is clean, the mind is steady—but whoever sells a name through an account loses the reckoning.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: ACCOUNTS AND SPEECH

Folk tune: bank song

*When the account is clean, the mind is steady,
But whoever sells a name through an account loses the reckoning.*

*Nishant sat in the bank, counting account after account,
But whoever sold a name through an account lost the reckoning.
For years the moneylender cheated the poor who could not understand the accounts,
If the bank too remained complex, it would become the moneylender's new form.*

*The moneylender cheated the poor because they did not understand the accounts,
If the bank too stayed difficult, it would only be a new moneylender.
Fraud hides in the language the poor cannot understand,
The one who explains in simple speech creates trust.*

*The language of banks is difficult; the poor may not understand it,
The one who explains it in their own speech is the true helper.
Keep the account clean; do not sell the name,
The one who understands the reckoning and teaches it saves the village's wealth.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. A young banker named Nishant works for financial inclusion, bringing the village economy into a modern system.)

In Meera's time, a young man of the village named Nishant studied banking and began working for rural financial inclusion, bringing bank accounts, insurance, and credit facilities to every household. He had heard stories of the old days when poor villagers, trapped in the compound-interest web of moneylenders, lost fields, homes, and honour.

Nishant wanted that old injustice never to return. Yet he also saw that bank forms and banking language were as unfamiliar to an illiterate farmer as the moneylender's ledger had once been. The very language designed to protect him could become a new trap if he could not understand it.

At the pipal, Nishant said, "Budhba, I want no family in the village ever again to fall into the moneylender's debt trap as people once did."

Budhba replied, "Nishant, that is a good wish. But remember, banking language is complicated, and poor people cannot always understand it. Your real work is to turn the language of the bank into the language people speak."

He continued, "Injustice is always born where one side understands and the other does not. The moneylender cheated the poor because the poor could not understand the accounts. If the bank remains just as complicated, it will become only a new form of moneylender. But if you explain every scheme, every form, and every calculation in the farmer's own speech, then for the first time the farmer will hold his rights in his own hands. Sharing knowledge is true inclusion."

Once, an elderly farmer who had always feared putting his thumbprint on any paper opened a bank account in his own name after Nishant explained everything simply. When the first insurance payment reached his hands, tears filled the old man's eyes. That day Nishant understood that a bank's real work was not to store money, but to give the poor confidence in their own rights.

Nishant therefore began explaining every financial scheme in simple Maithili—what each account was for, what protection each insurance policy offered, and on what terms each loan worked. Sitting in the village square, drawing pictures and giving examples, he explained everything so that even an illiterate farmer could understand his rights. From then on no village family was cheated merely because it could not understand the complicated language of banking.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER -23 (TWENTY-THREE BEFORE)

The Birth of Nand

Every birth brings a new name—Nand's birth gave the village a new witness.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE BIRTH OF NAND

Folk tune: birth song

Every birth brings a new name,

Nand was born and gave the village a new witness.

A new name came to the village today—Nand was born,

A new watchman appeared to carry Budhba's road forward.

The witness-tree stood utterly still, not a leaf moved,

As though for hundreds of years it had waited for this name.

The witness-tree stood utterly still, not a leaf moved,

As though for hundreds of years it had waited for this name.

The seed planted long ago gave shade today,

The tree that had been witness saw a new name arrive.

The burden of a name is heavy; two shoulders must lift it,

The one born today will remain with the story until its end.

Nand came bearing a name and became the village's hope,

The witness born today would become the final witness.

(A passage of narrative fiction. In this chapter, at last, the child is born whose story far ahead will become the beginning of "Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles"—Nand Aruni.)

In Nishant's time, a son was born in Aruni's own household and was named Nand. On the night of the birth, the witness-pipal stood unusually calm and still, as if it too had been waiting for this arrival. Elder villagers who had watched the tree through generations said they had rarely seen such stillness—as though something momentous were about to happen.

There was ordinary happiness in the house—birth songs were sung, people danced, and jaggery was distributed. But those who knew Budhba noticed that he was giving this birth a special, deep attention, as if he saw in the child something no one else could see.

Aruni carried his newborn son to the pipal. “Budhba, this is my son Nand. I want him to know your story, the story of the village, and carry it forward.”

Budhba replied very gently, “Aruni, I hold this child's name with special affection. I do not know what is written in his life, but I know this much—he will witness a story whose beginning and end are both tied deeply to our memory.”

He continued, “Aruni, over all these years I have seen many births and held many names. But some names carry not merely one life, but an entire story upon their shoulders. I feel that Nand's is such a name. He will witness the day when my whole story—from shell and silver until today—comes together in one place and takes its final form. Shape him well, Aruni; he is not only your son, but the village's next witness.”

That night the villagers remained gathered near the pipal for a long time, because whenever Budhba became so still and attentive at a birth, the village knew an extraordinary name had arrived. Holding his son, Aruni sat under the witness-tree for a long while, resolving to shape Nand's vision so that he would learn to see name and reckoning above body and paper.

Though the air was still, the pipal leaves rustled softly that night, as if the whole Channa Grove, carrying centuries of memory, were welcoming the new name. And Budhba, seated under the still tree after a long time, kept looking at Nand's tiny hand as if he could already see there the final page of his story.

CHAPTER -22 (TWENTY-TWO BEFORE)

Near Twelve Hundred

Twelve hundred years did not pass in a single breath—the village that endured so much still stood at the edge of the end.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: TWELVE HUNDRED YEARS

Folk tune: song of time

*Twelve hundred years did not pass in a single breath,
The village that endured so much still stood at the end.*

*From shell and silver the story began; twelve hundred years flowed,
Every generation endured something, yet the village still stood.*

*Flood came, famine came, war and epidemic,
Each time the village broke, then rose and gathered itself again.*

*Flood, famine, war, epidemic—all entered the tale,
Broken, then standing; broken, then alive again.
Every calamity took names, but the village did not surrender,
The names it remembered carried it through twelve hundred years.*

*What began with shell and silver still lives today,
Budhba's breath holds the village's twelve hundred years.
It did not pass in one breath; it flowed drop by drop,
The history the village held still stands at the edge of the end.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. Counting the years of his own existence, Budhba draws near a startling truth.)

After Nand's birth, Gop Kumar sat down one evening to assemble Budhba's complete chronology in his archive—from the time of Vachaspati Mishra to the present. He added one generation, one name, one event after another, and as the number grew, his eyes widened.

The chronology held hundreds of names—Hulasa, Jivanti, Sukhdev, Ratna, Malati, Savitri, and countless generations after them. Amid all those names one name stood unmoving, present in every generation: Budhba. Gop Kumar realised he was not calculating a single lifetime, but adding together the memory of an entire civilisation.

“Budhba,” Gop Kumar said in astonishment, “by my calculation, it has been almost twelve hundred years since your water-burial!”

Budhba laughed softly—the rare, unforgettable laugh the villagers had begun to call “Budhba’s laugh.” “Gop Kumar, I stopped counting my age long ago. But if your reckoning is right, it is a round and memorable number—twelve hundred years. Perhaps far in the future the villagers will remember me by that number, just as you are doing today.”

After a pause he added, “But Gop Kumar, a number is only a sign, not the story. Twelve hundred years are not what matters. What matters is how many names survived in those twelve hundred years, how many were lost, and how many are still being held. If the village remembers me through that number, I have only one wish: let it also remember all the names that, beside me, made the story of this village through those twelve hundred years.”

Gop Kumar stared at the chronology in silence for a long time. Twelve hundred years contained countless floods, famines, wars, and epidemics; through each calamity the village broke, stood again, broke again, and stood again. A village that had faced death so many times and still returned to life seemed to him not merely the story of one village, but the story of human persistence itself.

Gop Kumar marked that calculation specially in his archive and smiled faintly. He did not know how the number—twelve hundred years—would one day be repeated in another language on the tongue of another generation; how that round number would someday become almost a title for the village’s whole story when someone far in the future wrote it again.

CHAPTER -21 (TWENTY-ONE BEFORE)

Ananya’s Question

A small question can crack a great dome—the one who asks saves the name.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: ANANYA'S QUESTION

Folk tune: question melody

*A small question can crack a great dome,
The one who asks saves the name and saves the village.*

*Ananya asked a small question, and a crack appeared in the dome, “Where did this come from? Who said it?”—and truth opened.
The one who memorised answers was trapped in confusion,
The one who questioned and tested escaped the net.*

*Do not merely memorise answers; ask, test, understand,
“Where did this come from? Who said it? What is the proof?”
Gangesha's question rises in every generation,
The one who learns to ask is not fooled by glitter.*

*The child who learns to question does not fall into the net,
Gangesha's question never falls silent; it rises in every generation.
A question cracks the dome of illusion,
The one who asks saves the name and saves the village.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. A curious young woman named Ananya begins teaching village children to ask questions, carrying Gangesha's tradition forward.)

While Nand was still a child, a young village teacher named Ananya came to teach in the modern branch of the Coconut-Leaf School. She was the kind of teacher who did not make children memorise answers; she taught them how to ask questions. In her classroom no question was treated as foolish. The child who asked the most questions received the greatest praise.

The older villagers, many of whom had grown up under rote learning, were at first surprised by this new method. Gradually, however, they saw that Ananya's pupils accepted nothing with closed eyes: they asked, tested, and reasoned. Among them one child—Nand—asked more questions than anyone else, as if some ancient curiosity had awakened within him.

At the pipal, Ananya said, "Budhba, I want to teach the children Gangesha's inquiry into the means of knowledge—perception, inference, testimony, comparison—but in simple language, so that they learn to test everything by asking questions."

Budhba replied with deep satisfaction, "Ananya, this is my greatest hope—that Gangesha's question never falls silent, but rises again in a new form from the mouths of children in every generation."

He continued, "Ananya, in all these years I have learned one thing: the village that stops asking questions is the first village to be cheated. Every new crocodile—whether the illusion of shell and silver or fraud on a screen—succeeds against those who do not ask. So teaching children to question is not merely education; you are shaping the village's next guard."

One day Ananya told the old story of shell and silver in class—how a man had mistaken a shell for silver. All the children were quiet, but Nand raised his hand and asked, "Madam, if that man had asked whether it really was silver, would he have avoided being deceived?" Ananya smiled, because in that small question she saw the whole lesson Gangesha had taught centuries before.

From then on Ananya taught Nand and his classmates to ask a new question every day: Why is this so? Where did this come from? What is the evidence? Nand in particular carried that habit with him for life. The practice of questioning that Ananya gave him in childhood would later become his greatest weapon, on the day he faced a crocodile that could be defeated only by questions.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER -20 (TWENTY BEFORE)

The First Reckoning of the Splash

The first splash—the first name in the water—the one who kept the reckoning made the crocodile a witness.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE BRIDGE OF NAMES

Folk tune: crocodile melody

*The first splash, the first name in the water,
The one who kept the reckoning made the crocodile a witness.*

*The first splash struck the water; the first name went under,
But when someone wrote it down, the name rose again.
The name cut from paper may vanish in the water,
But the name living in a voice awakens again and again.*

*The name cut from paper may vanish in the water,
But when someone writes it down, the name rises again.
The crocodile takes the body, not the name—this is the village truth,
The one who keeps the reckoning turns the crocodile into a witness.*

*The crocodile eats the body, but it does not eat the name,
Leave the bridge of stone; build the bridge of names.
The stone bridge may be swept away in flood,
The bridge bound with names stands through the ages.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. Young Nand, carrying his father's engineering inheritance forward, goes to work at a bridge-construction site and sees something strange there for the first time.)

After Ananya's teaching, Nand grew up, studied engineering, and followed his father Aruni's path to work at a bridge-construction site. He had learned how to build bridges, but he never forgot how Ananya had taught him to ask questions. At the site, those questioning eyes began to notice things others did not see.

He saw the condition of the labourers—their broken huts, low wages, and lack of safety. Sometimes he heard a story that shook him deeply: a worker would suddenly disappear one night, and no one kept any account of him. His name vanished from the contractor's papers, as though the man had never existed.

On leave Nand returned to the village and went to the pipal. "Budhba, work on the bridge is dangerous. I heard about a labourer who disappeared one night, and no one kept any record of him."

Budhba answered gravely, "Nand, what you have heard reminds me of Sukhdev Mahato—the story of workers and peasants whose names never enter any official reckoning. Nand, you are an engineer, but inside you there is also a witness, from my own blood. Find that worker's name, and if you find it, hold it."

He continued, "Nand, your work is to build a bridge joining two banks. But there is another bridge you must build—the bridge between a name and the reckoning from which the system cuts it away. The body of a vanished worker may never be found; but if you hold his name, the person does not disappear completely. That is your true inheritance, Nand—not the bridge of stone, but the bridge of names."

That night Nand wrote for the first time in his diary: "The crocodile eats the body, not the name"—an old sentence of Budhba's that his grandmother had once told him and that he was now about to make a guide for his life. With that first page began the diary he would later call "The Reckoning of the Splash." From that day Nand was no longer only an engineer; he had become the village's next witness.

CHAPTER -19 (NINETEEN BEFORE)

Satyavrat's Decision

The decision that comes late may be the steadiest—Satyavrat remained silent, but in the end he stood with the names.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE STEADY DECISION

Folk tune: decision song

*The decision that comes late may be the steadiest,
He stayed silent for a long time, but in the end stood with the names.*

*Satyavrat stayed silent long, watching, enduring, gathering,
The evidence gathered over years now had to speak.
The decision came late, but stood firm at the root,
What is chosen after thought does not easily waver.*

*The evidence gathered for years must now speak,
But do not fight alone; find another witness beside you.
One hand is weak, ten hands are strong,
The decision of those who stand together does not break.*

*Silence will break, and truth will stand with evidence,
This fight for names belongs not to one person but to the whole village.
The late decision became the steadiest,
The road of the one who stood with the village did not waver.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. Amid the evidence collected year after year in his notebook, Satyavrat Mehta finally approaches a decision.)

During Nand's engineering studies, Satyavrat Mehta, now in a senior position at the bank, reopened the old notebook in which he had recorded suspicious transactions years before. Dates and account numbers he had written down quietly over the years, when placed together, now revealed a clear and frightening pattern—as though scattered points had finally become a picture.

In that pattern, money travelled from one account to another, then to a third, and finally to distant accounts across the sea. Some names appeared again and again—some familiar, some unknown. Satyavrat understood that this was no ordinary embezzlement, but a large organised network whose threads extended far beyond the village. And he was now among the few people capable of understanding the pattern.

Returning to the village, Satyavrat said at the pipal, “Budhba, what I saw years ago is still happening, now on a much larger scale. I no longer think I can remain silent.”

Budhba replied slowly, “Satyavrat, you have gathered evidence for many years. Now it is time for the evidence to speak. But be careful—the power you are challenging may be strong and ruthless.”

He continued, “Many years ago I told you that wisdom lies in recognising the moment to speak. I think that moment is now near. But a power this great is defeated not by accusation alone, but by proof. Do not fight alone. Find those who can stand beside you—an honest officer, another witness. For this fight for names, Satyavrat, is not one person’s fight; it belongs to the whole village.”

On the way home that night, Satyavrat thought for a long time. He knew that what he was preparing to stand against was not merely a handful of corrupt accounts, but a network whose threads might reach all the way to the glass tower Abhinav had once spoken of. But Budhba’s old words—“silence that becomes injustice”—kept sounding in his ears, and he knew there was no longer any turning back.

Satyavrat placed the notebook in a secure location and began quietly waiting for the right opportunity. He knew that when the truth emerged, it would emerge with hard evidence. And he also knew he was not alone: somewhere in the village’s memory stood all of Budhba’s words, insisting that silence, when it becomes injustice, must be broken.

CHAPTER -18 (EIGHTEEN BEFORE)

Ananya Meets Nand

Two roads met in one place and a new journey began—those who share a purpose walk together.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: TWO ROADS, ONE JOURNEY

Folk tune: confluence song

*Two roads met in one place and a new journey began,
Those whose purpose is one let their feet walk together.*

*Ananya came carrying questions; Nand came carrying construction,
Two roads met in one place and chose a new journey.*

*Memory and technology became one,
Power once scattered was drawn onto a single thread.*

*Ananya's questions and Nand's building joined,
Memory and technology were bound onto one thread.*

*One knew how to ask; one knew how to build,
Together they became new guardians of the witness.*

*The burden of witness is heavy; two shoulders make it lighter,
Those who walked together gave the village memory a new watch.*

*One alone grew tired; two together became strong,
The road of those who shared a purpose did not break.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. Teacher Ananya and engineer Nand meet for the first time while working on a shared village project.)

After completing his engineering studies, Nand returned to the village and began working with Ananya on a project to modernise the Coconut-Leaf School—a plan to preserve the village heritage digitally. The teacher who had taught him to ask questions in childhood and the engineer who now understood name and reckoning as a bridge came together for the first time in a common task.

Ananya knew every old village story, every folk song, every genealogy; Nand knew how to preserve them digitally and durably. Their work completed each other, as though Ananya's questioning and Nand's building had come together to create a new guard. Using new technology, they began carrying Gop Kumar's old collection forward.

As they worked, they also noticed how closely their values and ways of thinking matched. Both wanted to save names, both wanted to hold truth, both wanted to make the village memory endure. Two roads that had begun separately were now flowing in the same direction.

Sitting together at the pipal, they spoke to Budhba. Nand said, "Budhba, Ananya and I want to gather every old village story and every record in one place."

Budhba replied happily, "Nand, Ananya, you are carrying Gop Kumar's work forward. I feel the final chapter I have awaited year after year is now close."

He continued, "Some work cannot be done alone, Nand. To become a witness is to carry a burden, and a burden becomes lighter when two shoulders lift it together. You two—question and construction, memory and technology—complete one another. The final chapter that is coming will be so difficult that no one person can bear it; it will take two people standing together."

From that day, Nand and Ananya worked side by side, bringing every old page, every lost name, every folk song back to life. Neither understood yet that they were becoming witnesses to Budhba's final chapter—and that the shared journey begun that day would bind not only the village's story but also their own lives to each other.

CHAPTER -17 (SEVENTEEN BEFORE)

The Glass-Tower Web

The glass tower gleams from afar, but a web lies within—the one dazzled by the glitter is caught in the net.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THREE CROCODILES

Folk tune: tower song

*The glass tower gleams from afar,
A hidden web lies within—do not be fooled by the glitter.*

*The glass tower touched the sky and glittered from afar,
But a web was woven inside, with truth concealed.*

*It promised jobs, sold dreams of investment,
And behind the darkness of trafficking, all three became one net.*

*Jobs, investment, trafficking—all one web,
Eating bodies, eating money, eating names—three crocodiles.
The old crocodile lived in water; the new one lives in the tower,
But their hunger is the same—to devour names in darkness.*

*The one dazzled by the glitter is caught in the net,
Question every promise, test every gleam, and only then move forward.*

*However high the tower, its roots may be hollow,
The one who knows how to question and test can escape the web.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. The fraud network run by Lau Kin-Hung, in its full reach, draws close to Garh Narikel.)

In Nand's time, news reports repeatedly began describing a vast digital-fraud network operating from Hong Kong and linked to the name of Lau Kin-Hung. It was no ordinary fraud: it combined false job offers, investment scams, and human trafficking, with threads spread across dozens of countries.

The network was built so that no one could see its whole form. On one side a young person was promised a “good job”; on another an investor was tempted by the promise of “doubling the money”; elsewhere a poor person was taken abroad and imprisoned. Every thread seemed separate, yet all of them ultimately curved back toward the same glass tower.

While working on their digital archive, Ananya and Nand heard more and more about this network. As they understood its reach, a deep unease settled in them. The shadow Abhinav had once seen in the newspaper was slowly growing larger on the horizon of their own village.

Worried, Ananya said at the pipal, “Budhba, this web is so vast that I fear it may reach even Garh Narikel.”

Budhba replied gravely, “Ananya, I fear it has already reached us—in Ujjwal Jha’s dream, in Batuknath’s fall. One day this web will touch one village name directly. I do not know whose name, but I can feel it.”

He continued, “Ananya, in all these years I have seen many crocodiles—the crocodile of water, the crocodile of time, the crocodile of the screen. But this web is the most terrible, because it joins many crocodiles at once. It eats bodies, money, and names alike. I have only one weapon against it—awareness, and the keeping of names. If the village stays alert and holds every one of its names, this web will not be able to take root here.”

After hearing him, Ananya began warning every young person in the village again—asking what promise was coming from afar and what web might be hidden behind its glitter. She knew Budhba’s intuition had never been empty; and if he now felt that the web would touch a village name, that day was probably not very far away.

CHAPTER -16 (SIXTEEN BEFORE)

Batuknath’s Final Turn

A wrong road too demands a turn at the end—at last Batuknath turned back toward his own name.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE TURN IN THE WRONG ROAD

Folk tune: melody of remorse

*A wrong road too demands a turn at the end,
At last Batuknath turned back toward his own name.*

*Batuknath was a brilliant boy who fought for the poor,
But he lost his way and was trapped in the net of prestige.*

*Today he is respected, yet stands in darkness,
The one who dreamed of justice has become a pillar of delusion.*

The brilliant boy who wanted to fight for the poor

Today stands respected, but in darkness.

*Yet even a wrong road has a turn at its end,
The thread does not break for one who turns back toward his name.*

Today he is in darkness, yet the name still stands,

Hope does not die for one who can change his road.

*The wrong road demanded its turn at last,
The one who turned and walked toward his name was no longer far away.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. Batuknath finally gives his legal skill wholly to the service of a dark power.)

A few months after Ananya's warning, news arrived that Batuknath Hariharan, now a respected but dubious lawyer, had begun appearing for the defence in several major fraud cases. Again and again he obtained adjournment after adjournment, exhausted witnesses, tangled evidence, and postponed justice indefinitely—until the victims themselves grew tired, defeated, and silent.

His name was now counted among the city lawyers sought out by powerful accused persons for their defence. He won, grew rich, gained prestige—but behind every victory lay some poor person's defeat, some truth's undoing. The skill he had once learned for justice had become one of injustice's greatest weapons.

The older villagers who had known Batuknath since childhood felt a deep sorrow at this news. They remembered the brilliant, honest boy who had once dreamed of fighting for the poor, and then looked at the prestigious but darkened lawyer who had travelled very far from that child.

Hearing this, Nand said at the pipal, "Budhba, Batuknath has now turned completely toward darkness. It grieves me."

Budhba replied sadly, "Nand, I have kept Batuknath's name in the hope that he might change his road again. But I now understand that some names remain a source of sorrow even after we hold them. My work is not to change his choices; it is only to preserve his story truthfully."

He continued, "Nand, being a witness is a difficult duty. A witness must hold not only good names but guilty names too, and hold them truthfully. I neither curse Batuknath nor hide his fault—I keep his story as it is. For if I erase his fall, the lesson that truth gives us through that fall will also vanish. Truth, however painful, must be preserved."

Remembering Budhba's words, Nand entered Batuknath's story in his archive without hatred and without pardon, simply as truth—from the brilliant child to the lawyer in darkness, the whole journey. He wrote knowing that someday someone might read the story and learn that no one is born guilty: systems, temptations, and choices together shape what a person becomes.

Chandrapal's Account

*Even a signature on an account one does not understand carries weight

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE INFORMED SIGNATURE

Folk tune: cautionary sohar

*Even a signature on an account not understood carries weight,
Ignorance too becomes a knot in the web.*

*Chandrapal did not understand the account, yet he signed,
Calling it “commission work,” he hoped to escape the burden of debt.
But in every transaction flowed some poor person’s money,
The one who signs without understanding is caught in the net.*

*Calling it “commission work,” he hoped to escape the burden of debt,
But through every transaction flowed money stolen from someone poor.
Ignorance is no shield; it became a knot in the web,
The one who signed without understanding became guilty without knowing.*

*The one who took commission without understanding was caught in the net,
Ask, understand, then sign—or regret will follow.
Understand the account first; only then lift the pen,
The one who signs with understanding can escape the web.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. Chandrapal Batra, drowning in gambling debt, becomes a “mule account” for the fraud network.)

In Nand's time, news came that Chandrapal Batra—the distant relative whose name Budhba had held many years before—had fallen into heavy gambling debt. Crushed and desperate under the burden, he was allowing a fraud network to use his bank account: money passed through it from one hand to another.

Chandrapal did not fully understand what he was doing. He had been told it was merely “commission work”: money would enter his account, he would forward it, and keep a small share. Tempted by the hope of escaping debt, he became a knot in the network without understanding that every such transaction carried money stolen from some poor victim.

In his notebook Satyavrat saw every transaction passing through that account, and understood that it was a small but important thread in the vast web. The names that had appeared in Ujjwal's dream and in Batuknath's fall were now joining one another in Chandrapal's account as well.

Hearing of it, Satyavrat said at the pipal, “Budhba, Chandrapal Batra has now become an instrument of the fraud network.”

Budhba replied sadly, “Satyavrat, I kept his name many years ago without knowing where his story would lead. Today I can see that Ujjwal, Batuknath, Chandrapal, and the shadow of that glass tower are slowly being woven into a single web.”

He continued, “Satyavrat, this web is woven so that each person remains ignorant of the others. Ujjwal does not know Batuknath, Batuknath does not know Chandrapal, and Chandrapal does not know whose glass tower it is. Yet from a distance I can see all their names being bound on one thread. When all those threads meet in one place, the final chapter will be complete—and I fear it will be the village's hardest chapter.”

After hearing this, Satyavrat began gathering his evidence with still greater care. He knew the time was drawing near when the entire network would be exposed, and he understood that on that day his old notebook, with every proof accumulated year after year, would become the village's greatest weapon. He waited only for the moment when silence could finally become testimony.

CHAPTER -14 (FOURTEEN BEFORE)

Building the Bridge

A bridge joins two sides, but does not forget the water—the one who builds a bridge remembers the flood.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: BRIDGE AND WATCH

Folk tune: construction sohar

A bridge joins two sides, but does not forget the water,

The one who builds a bridge remembers the flood.

The bridge was built to join two sides; the world drew near,

But along the road that brings the world, crocodiles too may come.

A bridge is good with a watch beside it; a road is good with open eyes,

What is built needs an account and a guard as well.

Along the road that brings the world, new crocodiles too may come,

So build the bridge, but keep watch as well.

Make the stone strong and remember the flood,

When a bridge is built, its care must continue beside it.

Make the stone strong, but keep the names as well,

The hands that build the bridge must also be accounted for.

A bridge joins two sides, but does not forget the water,

The bridge built with vigilance can save the village.

(A passage of narrative fiction. In his engineering work, Nand is assigned to a new bridge-construction site, where the seed of the coming story is planted.)

By virtue of his skill, Nand was appointed assistant to the chief engineer at the construction site of a new bridge over the Kamla-Balan near the village. After many years, the bridge would connect the village directly with the modern city: a journey that once took hours would now take minutes. The village was proud of the bridge, and Nand was carrying forward his father Aruni's dream of building a bridge that would not break.

But at the site, Nand's questioning eyes noticed things that troubled him—the lack of worker safety, people working at height without helmets, and a contractor's carelessness that treated labourers merely as numbers rather than names. Nand remembered the old story of the worker who had disappeared from a bridge and whom no one had counted.

Nand also noticed unfamiliar people coming and going from distant cities—contractors, brokers, and others whose purpose was unclear. He did not yet know what story would grow from the bridge he was building, but the witness within him quietly became alert.

At the pipal Nand said, “Budhba, this bridge will connect our village to the world. But the lack of safety at the site worries me.”

Budhba replied, “Nand, what you are seeing reminds me again of Sukhdev's story. Stay alert. The workers' names and their safety are your responsibility, not merely the strength of the bridge.”

He continued, “Nand, a bridge connects, and that is good—but the same bridge that connects may bring new dangers too. The road that carries the world to the village may also carry the new crocodile I have spoken of year after year. So build the bridge, but keep watch as well. And hold the name of every labourer who builds it with his sweat, because the names of those who build must be counted first of all.”

After hearing this, Nand took extra care for worker safety at the site, writing every labourer's name in his diary, asking after them, and arguing with the contractor for their protection. He did not know whether his vigilance would be enough—and he did not yet know that this very bridge and this very worksite would become the stage for the final chapter whose approach Budhba had been hearing for so long.

CHAPTER -13 (THIRTEEN BEFORE)

Gop Kumar's Collection

The one who joined name to name made history—a collection preserves not the body but memory.

— Garh Narikel

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: SCATTERING MADE ONE

Folk tune: collection sohar

*The one who joined name to name made history,
A collection preserves not the body, but memory.*

*Gop Kumar joined name to name, gathering thread after thread,
From shell and silver to today, he made every story one.
The pages that had lain scattered came together,
Twelve hundred years of memory formed a single picture.*

*Shell and silver, Hulasa's water-burial, Sukhdev's nameless death,
All the threads met in one place and formed one picture.
The story that had existed in fragments became whole,
And the collection came into Nand's hands.*

*What lay scattered has now become one,
The story that was joined became a lamp for Nand.
A collection saves names and awakens history,
The memory that is gathered passes to the next generation.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. Gop Kumar draws near to giving final form to the archival work of his entire life.)

Now old, Gop Kumar sat down to bring his life's collection together in one place—from Yadavanand's shadow genealogy to Haripati Kavi's manuscript, Gangadhar's printing efforts, and the modern digital archive. His hands now trembled and his eyes had grown weak, but his mind remained fixed on the same goal: to preserve the village's complete story, from its beginning to the present, in one place.

As he joined the pages, he realised that all the threads were slowly meeting. The illusion of shell and silver, Hulas's water-burial, Sukhdev's nameless death, Batuknath's fall, Ujjwal's dream, Chandrapal's account—stories that had once seemed separate were now joining one another into a complete picture. Gop Kumar began to feel that he was not merely completing a collection; he was approaching an ending.

At the pipal Gop Kumar said, "Budhba, my lifetime's work is nearing completion. But you once said that the final chapter still remains."

Budhba replied gravely, "Gop Kumar, I now feel it clearly—the final chapter is near, very near. Nand's bridge, Chandrapal's account, Batuknath's courtroom, and that unseen glass tower are all moving toward one place and one time."

He continued, "Gop Kumar, year after year I have heard the approach of that chapter, and now I can clearly hear its footsteps. Your collection is being completed at exactly the right time, because the witness to the chapter that is coming will need the whole story of the past ready in his hands. Everything you have gathered will be a lamp for Nand in that dark hour."

One evening, for the first time, Gop Kumar looked at his whole collection gathered in one place—centuries of names, songs, genealogies, and records woven onto a single thread. He understood that he had not merely joined papers; he had brought back to life every person who had ever helped make the village's story. Yet amid that completeness one space remained empty—the final chapter for which he and the entire village had waited year after year.

After hearing Budhba, Gop Kumar worked still faster to give the collection its final form. He knew time was short, and he now understood that this lifetime's work would become the foundation on which Nand would stand when he faced the village's greatest trial.

CHAPTER -12 (TWELVE BEFORE)

The Tremor in Channa Grove

The grove trembled, and the village heard: something is about to happen—the village understands when the grove speaks.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE GROVE'S WARNING

Folk tune: witness melody

The grove trembled, and the village heard: something is about to happen,

The village understands when the grove speaks.

*The air was still, yet the leaves of the grove trembled,
What had stood steady for hundreds of years moved today.
The village understood: something great had drawn near,
The witness-grove spoke, and warned the village.*

*The air was still, yet the leaves trembled,
As though they had waited hundreds of years for something.
The grove that had witnessed twelve hundred years
Shook today and gave the sign of the final hour.*

*Wake, all of you—something great is drawing near,
The witness-grove has shaken and warned the village.
A sign in every leaf, a tremor without wind,
The grove warned, and the village grew watchful.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. Budhba, together with the whole Channa Grove, feels the tremor of an approaching event.)

One evening, for no clear reason, every tree in Channa Grove—from the pipal to every channa tree—trembled faintly at the same moment, although the air was still. No wind was blowing and no leaf should have moved; yet for one instant the entire grove shuddered together, as though it had drawn a deep breath.

The villagers, feeling it, gathered frightened at the pipal. The elders remembered having seen such a trembling only two or three times before, and each time some great event had followed—a flood, a death, something that turned the course of the village story. That night, beneath the trembling grove, the village filled with an unknown fear.

Nand came running with Ananya. “Budhba, what happened? The whole grove began to shake!”

Budhba replied in a deeply unsettled voice, “Nand, I do not know what it is, but I know this much: a great event is near. My whole being, through the roots of every tree, can feel it. All of you, stay alert.”

He continued, “Nand, many years ago this grove and I became one. After my water-burial, my memory settled in these trees, in these roots. So when the grove trembles, understand that I myself am trembling—and I tremble only when something is coming that can shake every name in the village. This tremor is a warning.”

The oldest woman in the village, more than ninety years old, remembered having seen the trembling once in childhood; afterward came the great flood that swept away half the village houses. Hearing her memory, the village grew still more alert. If the grove had shaken as strongly then, whatever was approaching now might be just as great.

The villagers remained gathered near Channa Grove that night, not knowing what they were waiting to see, but knowing that something important was close. Lamps stayed lit, women whispered among themselves, and Nand sat with Ananya beneath the trembling trees, waiting for the unknown event whose approach the whole grove seemed to announce.

CHAPTER -II (ELEVEN BEFORE)

Budhba's Last Blessing

A blessing gives not the body but a name—Budhba's last words became seed for the next generation.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE SEED OF BLESSING

Folk tune: blessing sohar

*A blessing gives not the body, but a name,
Budhba's last words became the seed of the next generation.*

*Budhba spoke one last time and called Nand near,
"A blessing gives not the body, but a name"—this he taught.
The courage of the ancestors settled within Nand,
The names the ancestors had held came into Nand's hands.*

*The courage of the ancestors has settled within you,
The names they held have come into your hands.
Budhba's breath was tired, but his words remained steady,
The blessing he gave became a seed placed in the earth.*

*You are not alone; the whole story will remain with you,
The blessing that became a seed will flower years from now.*

*Budhba departed; the blessing remained with Nand,
The name-seed that was planted will flower generation after generation.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. Budhba gives Nand a special blessing and warning for the role ahead of him.)

The night after the trembling of Channa Grove, Budhba called Nand alone to the pipal. Only one lamp burned beneath the tree, and in its faint light there was a gravity on Budhba's face that Nand had never seen before. "Nand," he said with unusual solemnity, "you are my descendant, Aruni's grandson, and I feel that a great trial is about to enter your life."

Nand remained silent. He had known Budhba since childhood and heard every one of his stories, but what was in Budhba's voice tonight was not merely story—it felt like farewell, like a handing over. As though Budhba were slowly placing the burden of centuries upon Nand's shoulders.

Worried, Nand asked, "Budhba, what will I have to do?"

Budhba replied, "Nand, when the time comes, listen to the voice of your heart. Within you lives the courage of Hulasa, Sukhdev, Gauri, Sunayana—all our ancestors. You will not be alone. I, and our whole story, will be with you whether you can see me or not."

He continued, "Nand, when that dark moment comes, you will think you are alone—but that will be an illusion. Every name I have held through all these years will stand behind you in that moment. Those who did not fear the flood, who did not bow before famine, who did not remain silent before injustice—the courage of all of them lives in a single breath within you. So when fear comes, remember your own name, and with it all the names that brought you this far."

For the first time, hearing those words, Nand clearly understood that he was not merely an engineer but a witness—a witness to the generations that had come before him. He felt Budhba was giving him a burden he did not yet fully understand, but his heart accepted it without refusal.

Holding Budhba's words in his heart, Nand returned home. He lay awake for a long time that night, hearing the words again and again: "You will not be alone." He did not know that the next day his life, and the life of the village, would change forever—or that the blessing and warning Budhba had given him would become his greatest support in the dark hour ahead.

CHAPTER -10 (TEN BEFORE)

The First Splash at the Bridge

The first splash at the bridge—the first name in the water—the one who drowned there had his name raised again on the page.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE NAME AT THE BRIDGE

Folk tune: splash sohar

*The first splash at the bridge, the first name in the water,
The one who drowned there had his name raised again on the page.*

*The bridge was being built when the first splash came,
The first body sank in the water; its name went into darkness.*

*Cut from the contractor's paper, lost from the account,
But when someone wrote it down, that name lived again.*

*Cut from the contractor's paper, lost from the account,
But when someone wrote it down, that name lived again.*

*The crocodile took the body but could not take the name,
The one who kept the reckoning of the splash saved the name.*

*The crocodile took the body, but not the name,
The one who kept the reckoning of the splash saved every lost name.
A name sank in the water by the bridge, but it was not erased,
When someone wrote it down, it rose and stood again.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. At the bridge-construction site, the accident Budhba had sensed year after year finally occurs.)

One night at the bridge site there was no moon, and after the rains the river was running at full force. The labourers, exhausted, were working in darkness—without enough light and without adequate protection. Nand was there that night, and his questioning eyes kept noticing the danger.

Suddenly, in the darkness, a labourer—whose name was still unclear—fell into the river. The sound of the “splash” was heard as far as the nearest hamlet: the same sound that had echoed through the village story year after year. Nand ran at once to help and leapt into the water, but in the darkness and force of the current he could not save the man. He reached out, called for a name—but found neither the hand nor the name.

Stunned, Nand returned to the village that night and went to the pipal without speaking, only weeping. River water dripped from his body and tears from his eyes; in that dark night the two became one.

Budhba said softly, “Nand, this is the moment whose approach I have heard year after year. Find that labourer’s name, and if you find it, hold it. This is your first trial, Nand—and I believe you will pass it.”

He continued, “Nand, you could not save that labourer. That is not your fault; it is the fault of the darkness, the current, and the system that sees a labourer as a number rather than a name. You could not save his body, but you can save his name. Go and find it. If no one holds his name, he will die twice—once in the water, and again from the memory of the village.”

From that night on, Nand gave his life to searching for the labourer’s name and the names of others like him—workers who disappeared unnamed, whose reckoning no one kept. Slowly the search became a diary called “The Reckoning of the Splash,” which he wrote in every night: every lost name, every unspoken death, every account the system had erased. On the first page he wrote Budhba’s sentence again: “The crocodile eats the body, not the name.”

CHAPTER -9 (NINE BEFORE)

The Investigation Begins

An investigation is like digging a well—mud first, then water—the one who begins to dig will reach the truth.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: DIGGING THE INVESTIGATION

Folk tune: inquiry song

*An investigation is like digging a well—mud first, then water,
The one who begins to dig will reach the truth.*

*The investigation began like the digging of a well,
Mud came first, and then clear water below.
False name, false age; the darkness was deep,
But every question opened another layer.*

*False name, false age; the darkness was deep,
But every question opened another layer.
The one who did not stop digging reached the bottom,
The one who kept questioning came close to the truth.*

*The one who does not stop will catch a glimpse of truth,
The investigation that has begun will weaken the web.
Mud comes first, then the water clears,
The one who keeps digging patiently reaches the truth.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. After the labourer's death at the bridge, Nand and Satyavrat meet in the search for truth by different roads.)

After the bridge accident, Nand began searching for the labourer's name in his diary. He demanded the contractor's papers, examined the attendance register, and questioned the man's fellow workers. But the more he dug, the deeper the darkness became: he learned the labourer had been working under a false name and a false age. No one knew his real name, as though the man had lost it somewhere even while alive.

Nand realised this was no ordinary accident. The papers of the company building the bridge were unclear, the workers' names were not genuine, and the company's money was travelling somewhere far away by a hidden route. The thread Nand had caught did not belong only to one labourer; it seemed to be part of a vast unseen web.

Meanwhile Satyavrat, who happened to handle the banking relationship of the construction company, met Nand. "Nand," he said, "I too have been examining this company's suspicious transactions for several years. You are searching for the worker's name; I am following the money. Perhaps our searches will finally meet in the same place."

Nand went to the pipal and said, "Budhba, Satyavrat and I think our searches are different threads of the same web."

Budhba replied in a deep voice, "Nand, the web is vast, but you are not alone. Work together. One thread—the name—is in your hand; the other—the money—is in Satyavrat's. When those two threads meet, the web will be seen in its whole form for the first time. But be careful: the hand behind a web this vast will be just as powerful and merciless."

From that day Nand and Satyavrat investigated together—Nand by following names, Satyavrat by following money. They began matching their evidence, and as the threads joined, the shape of the vast network slowly emerged before them: a web whose one end was the drowned labourer of Garh Narikel and whose other end, very far away, was the unseen glass tower.

CHAPTER -8 (EIGHT BEFORE)

The Evidence Comes Forth

Evidence hidden in darkness will one day see the dawn—truth may remain beneath the water, but it will rise.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE DAWN OF EVIDENCE

Folk tune: revelation song

*Evidence hidden in darkness will one day see the dawn,
Truth may remain beneath the water, but it will rise.*

*The notebook that stayed silent for years in darkness
Now spoke, and thread after thread came into view.
Ujjwal, Batuknath, Chandrapal—all were joined,
The evidence that lay below had now risen to the surface.*

*The silent notebook that gathered years now spoke,
Ujjwal, Batuknath, Chandrapal—all the threads came clear.
Truth beneath the water rose one day,
What had been joined patiently at last came out.*

*Truth is not the sun; it is a lamp, burning piece by piece,
Darkness did not break entirely, but for the first time it stepped back.
Lamp after lamp was lit, and darkness grew weak,
The evidence that emerged showed the road toward dawn.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. Satyavrat's evidence, gathered over years, finally reaches the court and the media.)

With Gop Kumar's help, Satyavrat sent the complete evidence from his notebook to a trusted journalist and an honest investigative agency.

Every date, every account, every transaction accumulated year after year—once confined to one quiet man's notebook—began, for the first time, to come into the light.

As the evidence emerged, the shape of the web became clearer. Ujjwal Jha's descent into debt, Batuknath's legal assistance, Chandrapal's mule account, and Lau Kin-Hung's Hong Kong operation—stories that had once seemed separate and unrelated—now joined to form one complete and terrifying picture.

The news brought a strange mixture of feelings to the village: on one side hope for justice, on the other grief for all the names lost in the network. People began to understand that the crocodile Budhba had seen year after year was not merely a story; it had taken visible form on the horizon of their own village.

At the pipal Nand said, "Budhba, the truth is coming out. But I am afraid it is so vast that the whole truth may never be found."

Budhba replied, "Nand, the whole truth is never found all at once. But every fragment that comes out weakens the darkness. That is enough."

He continued, "Nand, in all these years I have learned that truth is not the sun; it is a lamp. It does not erase all darkness at once; it gives only enough light to show the next step. Those who wait for complete truth before speaking never speak. But those who bring out the fragment of truth they possess weaken darkness lamp by lamp. That is what Satyavrat has done—and that is enough."

When the story of the network first appeared in the news, many villagers could scarcely believe their eyes: names they had heard only in courtyards and whispers were now standing openly on newspaper pages. Some families who had lost sons to the network understood for the first time that their sorrow had a name and a cause; alongside grief, that knowledge brought a faint measure of peace.

Hearing all this, Nand threw himself into carrying the evidence further and making sure the truth reached everyone in the village. He knew the fight was not over, but a lamp once lit could no longer be extinguished easily. For the first time, darkness had begun to retreat.

CHAPTER -7 (SEVEN BEFORE)

The Half-Ghost Experience

Half truth, half ghost—both frighten; the one who knows the full name does not fear the half-ghost.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE FULL NAME

Folk tune: witness biraha

*Half truth, half ghost—both frighten,
The one who knows the full name does not fear the half-ghost.*

*Nand set out to become a witness, and something changed,
One foot in the present, one among the names gone by.
Half truth, half ghost—both came before him,
But the one who knew the full name did not lose to fear.*

*The one who set out to become a witness became something different,
One foot in the present, one among the names gone by.
Budhba's voice settled in his mind and kept showing the way,
The one who saw both worlds did not stray from the road.*

*The eyes that hold names can see both worlds,
The one who heard Budhba's voice did not lose the road.
The half-ghost frightens; the full name protects,
The one who knows the whole name comes out of the liminal dark.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. Amid the investigation and his grief, Nand for the first time experiences Budhba dimly with his own eyes.)

One night, exhausted and grieving, Nand fell asleep at the roots of the pipal. All day he had searched for the name of the labourer killed in the bridge accident, and the weight of that sorrow had worn out his body. With his head resting on the old roots of the witness-tree, he descended into that deep sleep where the line between dream and truth grows thin.

In the dream, for the first time, he saw Budhba somewhat clearly—an old figure seated on a branch, between smoke and light. His face was not fully distinct, but there was such tenderness in his eyes that even in exhaustion and grief Nand felt peace. Budhba said nothing. He only looked at Nand, as though saying, “You are on the right road.”

When he woke at dawn, Nand told his grandmother the dream. She smiled. “Nand, you have become half a ghost. A person who prepares to become a witness becomes a little like that.”

She continued, “There is nothing to fear in it, Nand. Budhba is no ghost that comes to frighten; he is the memory that has kept this village alive. Whoever holds names begins to live in both worlds—one foot in the present and one among all the names that have passed. You are standing on that threshold, son. So from now on Budhba’s voice will sound clearer to you than before.”

From that day Nand began asking his grandmother about the old things she had heard in childhood—Budhba’s tale of shell and silver, Hulasa’s water-burial, Sukhdev’s nameless death. And as she retold those stories, Nand felt that they were becoming the story of his own life—as though Budhba’s twelve hundred years and his own few years were slowly dissolving into one another.

From then on Nand heard Budhba’s voice more clearly than before—sometimes in the wind, sometimes in the rustling leaves, sometimes in the inner voice that separated right from wrong. He still could not know with certainty whether the experience was real or an imagination born of grief. But he understood this much: real or imagined, that voice kept him on the road Budhba had seen centuries ago.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE FINAL PAGE

Folk tune: handing-over sohar

Whoever receives the final page must bear the weight of the story,

Gop Kumar handed over the names and grew light.

All his life Gop Kumar gathered page after page,

Now he handed the final page to the next pair of hands.

Like Yadavanand, like Vibha, he guarded memory,

The burden he bore all his life now rested in Nand's hands.

Pages gathered for a lifetime now passed to the next hands,

Like Yadavanand, like Vibha, he guarded memory.

Gop Kumar grew light; the burden was handed on,

The witness changed, but the story did not break.

The story will not die; the witness changes, the story remains,

Whoever held a name will live forever on every page.

From one hand to another the inheritance moved on,

The page that was handed over will live from generation to generation.

(A passage of narrative fiction. Having completed the collection of his entire life, Gop Kumar hands it to Nand and Ananya.)

Very old now, Gop Kumar completed the final page of the collection to which he had given his life—the whole story of Budhba, from Vachaspati Mishra to the present day. His hands trembled and his eyes had grown dim, yet when he wrote the last name on that final page, a peace came over his face that belongs only to one who has fulfilled the purpose of his life.

Centuries of memory lived in that collection—from the illusion of shell and silver to Hulasā's water-burial, Sukhdev's nameless death, Yadavanand's shadow-register, Gangadhar's printing press, and the digital archive of the present day. Every name, every song, every reckoning was woven into one thread. Gop Kumar felt that he had safeguarded not merely papers, but the soul of the village in one place.

At the pipal he called Nand and Ananya and handed them his collection. "Nand, Ananya, this is the work of my whole life. It is in your hands now. Budhba used to say that the final chapter still remained. Perhaps the two of you will write it."

With deep affection Budhba said, "Gop Kumar, your work is without equal. I hold your name, and the patience of your entire life, with special honour."

He continued, "Gop Kumar, in every generation there is one person who does not merely live, but guards memory. Yadavanand was such a man, Vibha was such a woman, and you are such a man. What your hands assembled is not the story of one life, but of hundreds. Now that burden is passing into the next hands—but your name will live forever on every one of these pages."

Nand and Ananya held the heavy collection and remained silent for a long time. The weight of centuries lay in those pages—every name, every song, every injustice, every resistance. What they received from Gop Kumar's trembling hands was not merely paper; it was a promise they would now have to fulfil with their lives. Both understood that at that moment their lives had been bound to a new purpose.

A few months later Gop Kumar died peacefully, but his collection remained safe in the hands of Nand and Ananya. That night, it is said, a faint rustling rose from every root of Channa Grove—as though Budhba, and the memory of all those names, were respectfully bidding farewell to an old, tired, yet fulfilled witness.

*Batuknath in the dock, Chandrapal under investigation,
But the shadow in the glass tower still survived far away.*

*Some were caught, some escaped at a distance,
But the net that had been seen was weakened.*

*Some were caught and some survived, but the net grew weak,
The whole darkness did not break, yet dawn came closer.*

*The net was exposed, the crocodile recognised,
The truth that came into view showed the road toward dawn.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. Through the combined efforts of Satyavrat and Nand, the entire fraud network—at least in its local form—is exposed.)

After months of investigation, the evidence gathered by Satyavrat and Nand finally exposed the local shape of the fraud network. Batuknath's local participation and Chandrapal's mule account both came clearly into view. The threads woven so long in darkness had, at least on one side, entered the light.

Legal proceedings began against Batuknath. For the first time the celebrated lawyer had to stand before the court as an accused man. Chandrapal, despite evidence of his ignorance, faced a difficult investigation, for whoever becomes entangled in such a web—even unknowingly—must face his part before the law. Yet amid all this, one name still lay beyond reach: the shadow seated in the glass tower.

At the pipal Nand said, "Budhba, Lau Kin-Hung is still beyond capture. Our victory is incomplete."

Budhba replied, "Nand, in Chapter -84 I saw Yashpati's end remain incomplete too. Some darkness is never wholly exposed; it is only weakened. That too is progress."

He continued, "Nand, in twelve hundred years I have learned that justice is sometimes incomplete—but every incomplete victory leaves a seed for the next generation. Yashpati's unfinished end became, much later, the inspiration for another struggle. Lau Kin-Hung may escape today, but someday someone else will take up the evidence you are leaving behind. The names will survive, and names, in the end, find their way to justice."

When Batuknath first stood in the accused dock, several village elders who had known him since childhood were present in court. They remembered the brilliant, honest boy who had once dreamed of fighting for the rights of the poor. Seeing that boy now standing in the dock, there was less satisfaction at justice in their eyes than grief for a defeated dream.

Hearing all this, Nand chose not to see the incomplete victory as defeat, but as one step. He safeguarded his evidence, his diary, every name—for the day when someone else might use the seed he had left and bring even that surviving shadow into the light. The web had not completely broken; but for the first time, it had trembled.

The Final List of Names

The names that had been left out were added at the end—when the list became complete, the crocodile's account was complete.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE LIST OF NAMES

Folk tune: memory sohar

*The names that had been left out were added at the end,
When the list became complete, the crocodile's account was complete.*

*The names left out for years were added at the end,
Thirty names returned from the water, a village beside every name.
Those who had become numbers became names again,
A story behind every name, a village behind every story.*

*Thirty names returned from the water, a village beside every name,
Those who had become numbers became names again.
The bodies may never be found, but the names will not be lost,
What entered the list preserved twelve hundred years.*

*The bodies may never be found, but the names will not be lost,
What lives in the diary preserves the vow of twelve hundred years.
The list was complete, the crocodile's reckoning complete,
The name added at the end fulfilled the village's vow.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. In his diary "The Reckoning of the Splash," Nand finally completes the names of every victim of the bridge accident.)

After months of searching, Nand succeeded in discovering the true name of every labourer who had died at the bridge-construction site. He went from village to village, family to family, matching the contractor's cut-down papers with workers' forgotten addresses—until every person whom the system had reduced to a number became a name again.

Thirty names—linked to the story of three hundred bodies that the official reckoning had forgotten. Nand entered all thirty in “The Reckoning of the Splash,” one by one, writing beside each name its village, its family, its story. Those who had vanished from the water, from paper, and from memory now lived again in at least one place: Nand's diary.

At the pipal Nand opened the diary and asked, “Budhba, I have finally completed all these names. Have I become a witness worthy of your story?”

Deeply moved, Budhba replied, “Nand, you are my worthiest descendant. Far ahead in time, your ‘Reckoning of the Splash’ will become the next chapter of my entire story.”

He continued, “Nand, for twelve hundred years I have held names because I understood one thing: the crocodile eats the body, not the name. Today you have brought those thirty names back from the water. Their bodies may never be found, but their names can no longer be lost. That is the meaning of my whole life, Nand—and today that meaning is safe in your hands.”

Among those thirty names was a young man whose mother had spent years watching the road every evening, waiting for her son to return. When Nand went to her and showed her son's name written in his diary, the woman was able to weep for the first time in many years—for now, at least, she knew that her son's name would never again be lost.

That night Nand sat for a long time beneath the pipal, holding the diary against his chest. He understood that he had not merely written thirty names—he had carried Budhba's twelve-hundred-year vow forward into his own generation. Every page of that diary was now a witness's page; and for the first time Nand felt himself to be one link in the long chain that had begun with shell and silver and reached him.

CHAPTER -3 (THREE BEFORE)

Twelve Hundred Years Complete

The circle of twelve hundred years was complete—on the night of the new moon—what stood at the beginning stood again at the end.

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE CIRCLE COMPLETE

Folk tune: completion song

The circle of twelve hundred years was complete, on the new-moon night,

What stood at the beginning stood again at the end.

What began with shell and silver, after twelve hundred years,

Came together again on that new-moon night.

Take your turn and call the names, all in one breath,

Hulasa, Sukhdev, Ratna, Gangesha—all lived again.

Take your turn and call the names, in one breath,

Hulasa, Sukhdev, Ratna, Gangesha—all lived again.

What stood at the beginning stood again at the end,

The circle was complete; the story returned to its own beginning.

The names that were called lived again in the darkness,

The burden was no longer one person's; now it belonged to the whole village.

The circle of twelve hundred years was complete in the new-moon dark,

What began stood at the end; the story's vow was fulfilled.

(A passage of narrative fiction. With Nand, Budhba reflects for the last time on his entire journey.)

On a new-moon night, Nand, Ananya, and everyone in the village gathered at Channa Grove for kabaddi, just as they had gathered for hundreds of years. The game was never merely a game. It was the old village tradition in which a player, while taking a kabaddi turn, called the names of the ancestors in a single breath, so that those who had passed might live again in the breath of the game.

This time, for the first time, Nand's own name entered the game. Nand, who until then had only been a witness, stepped into play himself. When his turn came the whole village fell silent, for everyone knew that Budhba's next witness was about to raise his own voice for the first time.

Running through his turn, Nand cried aloud, "Hulasa! Sukhdev! Ratna! Gangesha! Gauri! Savitri!" One by one, the names of centuries rose from his mouth into the air.

As Nand continued calling names, the elders of the village began adding the names of their own ancestors into the air—one named a grandmother, another a father, another the lost brother who had once gone away and never returned. The kabaddi turn slowly became an act of collective remembrance in which the whole village, in one voice, brought the names of centuries back to life in the dark.

Hearing this through every root of the grove, Budhba said softly, "Twelve hundred years, Nand. Twelve hundred years—and today, for the first time, I feel this burden is no longer mine alone. It is yours—all of yours."

His voice resounded through the whole grove that night. "All this time, Nand, I carried these names alone because there was no one else to hold them. But today, when you called them, I understood that my vow is no longer mine alone; it belongs to the village. The burden that tired one breath for so long is now divided among a thousand breaths—and this, Nand, is the greatest reward of my twelve hundred years."

On that new-moon night, every root, leaf, and branch of Channa Grove trembled with the refrain of those names, as though every person of all those centuries had returned for a single moment. And for the first time in twelve hundred years, Budhba seemed a little lighter within that steady, tender radiance—for the story he had carried alone had finally reached safe hands.

CHAPTER -2 (TWO BEFORE)

The Next Generation's Promise

The promise the next generation takes will save the village—holding a name is not deliverance; listening is liberation.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE GENERATION'S PROMISE

Folk tune: promise sohar

*The promise the next generation takes will save the village,
Holding a name is not deliverance; listening is liberation.*

*The next generation made its promise and learned to hold names,
It knew code, knew songs, knew law—and joined them all.
The names our ancestors held, we will carry forward,
The story handed to us, we will not let it break.*

*It knew code, knew songs, knew law—and joined them all,
The names our ancestors held, we will carry forward.
Holding is not deliverance; listening is true liberation,
Whoever heard and understood the names saved the village.*

*The story will not be lost; the witness still stands,
I am not alone, and now neither are you.
The promise belonged not to one generation, but to every generation,
The generation that took the promise made the village immortal.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. With every young person of the village, Nand and Ananya promise to carry Budhba's ritual forward.)

After the kabaddi, as the new-moon darkness grew thinner, Nand and Ananya called every young person in the village to the pipal and made a new pledge. The names just called in the game still echoed in the air, and amid that echo the village's new generation stood ready to lift the ancestral vow onto its own shoulders.

In the young people's eyes was the light Budhba had longed to see year after year—the light that said the story would not die because hands remained to carry it. The children who had learned to ask questions in Ananya's school, the young people who had helped Nand build the archive—all stood together that night, with one voice.

"We," Nand said, "promise to carry forward Budhba's story, Gop Kumar's collection, and every name."

Ananya added, "From the Coconut-Leaf School to the digital archive, we will use every means we have so that this story is never lost."

From the whole of Channa Grove, Budhba accepted the pledge with a soft, steady radiance, as though he knew the story was now in safe hands. And within that glow, for one moment, everyone in the village felt as though Budhba were saying, "I am not alone—and now neither are you."

Among those young people were some who knew computers and code, some who knew folk songs and Panji, some who knew law and accounts. But that night all of them joined their different skills to the same vow. The inheritance Budhba had begun with shell and silver was now, twelve hundred years later, moving forward in a new form in the hands of an entire generation.

After the pledge the village slowly dispersed, but something had changed. The burden that had once belonged only to Budhba, and then to Gop Kumar, had become the burden of a whole generation. With Gop Kumar's collection and their own "Reckoning of the Splash" in hand, Nand and Ananya moved toward the final chapter whose approach Budhba had sensed for centuries—the chapter that was now very near.

CHAPTER -I (ONE BEFORE)

The Final Witness

When the final witness spoke, the story changed hands—the crocodile eats the body, not the name: this is the village's final saying.

— Garh Narikel

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: SONG OF THE FINAL WITNESS

Folk tune: closing sohar

*When the final witness spoke, the story changed hands,
The crocodile took the body, but the village held the name.*

*Twelve hundred years of journey reached the edge of its ending today,
The final witness stood and called name after name.*

*From shell and silver to this day, the names of every generation,
One by one lived again, and the village became whole in name.*

*The crocodile kept eating bodies, but could not eat the names,
The village that remembered survived twelve hundred years.
The bridge of stone was swept away, the bridge of names stood firm,
The witness kept changing, but the story did not break.*

The lamp may go out and the curtain fall, but let the names remain awake,

The village that preserves its names will never let its story die.

*The final witness spoke, and the story moved forward,
Whoever held the names became immortal through the ages.*

(A passage of narrative fiction. The final chapter of Part o—Budhba tells Nand the last secret of his entire story.)

One last evening Budhba called Nand alone to the pipal. “Nand,” he said, “I want to tell you something I have felt year after year, though I have never fully understood it. I feel that, in some form, far in the future, someone will write my story. An author I will never see, yet one who will set down on paper every name I have held, every tear, every hope.”

Stunned, Nand asked, “Budhba, how do you know?”

Budhba smiled for the last time. “I do not know, Nand. I only feel it. And now I think that author is very near—perhaps so near that at this very moment I am speaking to him through you.”

Nand remained silent. That night beneath the shade of the pipal, Budhba’s voice seemed to come from beyond the stage—and indeed, at that very moment, from beyond the stage the Sutradhar stepped out beside the curtain for the last time, stood facing the reader, and spoke one final time.

CHAPTER 0

Garh Narikel: A Brief Folk Prelude

A Living Geography of Soil, Water, Labour, Memory, and Names

Before listening to the story, listen to the village. A village makes its body from soil, draws its breath from water, and keeps its memory in trees and leaves. Here knowledge does not live in books but in hands, ears, and bodies; no single person is the author of a song—the people are its makers. Paper can strike a name out, a leaf can sprout it again; the register says “absent,” the mother says “present.” So before the story begins, this chapter is the answer of the soil in which every part of the story will take root—and when all the papers fall silent, the song will speak.

On the evening before the story was to begin, Ba sat on the earth of the Coconut-Leaf School. The children asked, “Does the story begin tomorrow?” Ba smiled. “Before listening to the story, listen to the village. Whoever has not heard the village will understand only half the story.” And that night Garh Narikel itself began to speak—in the language of its soil, its water, its songs, its wounds, and its watches. What follows is the collective voice of that night: the village speaking of itself, a self-telling that this novel bears upon its head as Chapter Zero.

There is exposition in this self-telling, but there is also a heartbeat. Do not read it as an essay; read it like the roots of Channa Grove, where every section is a root and all the roots together hold up the tree upon whose stump the kabaddi of the next two hundred chapters will be played.

It would be a grave mistake to think of Garh Narikel merely as a village marked on a map. The village makes its body from soil, takes its breath from water, stores its memory in trees and leaves, pours its grief into song, and keeps its justice alive through tales, proverbs, folk belief, and collective testimony. Culture here is not born on the page of a book. It is born from the first hearth at dawn, from the courtyard plastered with dung and clay, from feet walking toward the fields, from the great net falling into pond water, from people gathering on the embankment during a flood, from the sohar at birth, the auspicious songs of marriage, the samdaun of farewell, and the mournful voices that rise after death. Garh Narikel's folk culture is a lived discipline more than a written code. People do not read it; they practise it. They do not memorise it; they live it. They do not teach it formally; they pass it to the next generation while working together. It is also the ground on which the search for Gangesha, Mithila, and knowledge becomes tale, narrative, and example. Ah, the people of Garh Narikel! They take the life-incidents, oral traditions, historical hints, classical examples, and aphoristic illustrations present in Gangesha's Tattvacintamani and receive them into their own contemporary world. Navya-Nyaya and its arguments can outwit even the sharpest mind. Yet the difficult language of Navya-Nyaya can be made lucid without reducing its subtlety, joining abstract definition to human experience so that a classical proposition becomes a visible scene, the prima-facie view and the established doctrine become dialogue, an aphorism becomes an event, a definition becomes a character's experience, and a conclusion becomes the story's inner resonance.

This culture is not the private property of any one caste, hamlet, household, festival, or lineage. When a song is sung, the mouth that raises the first line does not retain ownership of it. A second voice catches the refrain, a third changes a word to suit the moment, a fourth inserts a new event among old verses. In this way the song becomes collective. A tale lives in the same fashion. The same event survives in one form in a grandmother's telling, another in a boatman's, a third in the mouth of a woman working the fields, and a fourth in a child's game. Yet through all these forms one shared pulse continues to beat—the collective identity of Garh Narikel.

That cultural pulse is heard continuously throughout the world of Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles. Channa Grove is not merely a dark grove but an assembly hall of folk memory. A coconut leaf is not merely a leaf but a green page on which names can be written. The ghosts' kabaddi is not merely a supernatural game but a metaphor for the living community's system of justice. The river is not merely water but a carrier of history. "Crocodiles eat bodies, not names"—this sentence is the seed of Garh Narikel's folk vision. A body may perish, paper may strike out a name, an official may reduce a number, but if the village's memory remains awake, a human being does not disappear completely.

Folk culture is the name for those practices, beliefs, songs, tales, skills, customs, arts, forms of speech, memories, and collective disciplines that arise not from books or government orders but from the continuous life of the people. It is not something visible only on festival days. When a woman plasters the courtyard at dawn, when a farmer holds seed in his palm and smells the soil, when a child tosses a pebble to judge the depth of a pond, when an old person points to a flood mark and says, "The water rose this high," all of these are acts of folk culture.

Its fifth characteristic is inseparability from daily life. Garh Narikel's folk culture is not a separate activity invented for performance on a stage. Song keeps the pace of labour in a field, gives breath a rhythm in a boat, steadies the blows of hands pounding paddy, preserves the sequence of rites in a wedding, gives collective voice to tears held back in grief, and lets children rehearse social relations through play. Here art and usefulness are not separate. Beauty lives in work, work in song, song in memory, and memory in community.

The current of the Kamala-Balan, the distant memory of the Ganga, ponds and pools, old wells, field channels, embankments, and low-lying floodplains together make the water-map of life in Garh Narikel. Water is both blessing and danger. It irrigates fields, gives fish and makhana, keeps animals and birds alive, cleanses the body, and completes festivals and rites. Yet the same water can carry away houses, cut through fields, alter the village road, and swallow a body. Because of this duality, water always has two voices in Garh Narikel's folk songs—life on one side and fear on the other; tenderness on one side and water-burial on the other.

The village pond is not merely a reservoir. It is a home for fish, a field for makhana, a place for bathing, water for cattle, a means of irrigation, a children's playground, a women's water-place, a festival site, an immersion ghat, and a centre of story and folk belief. On its banks lives a separate world of trees, shrubs, grasses, birds, and small creatures. The annual fishing is not merely an economic activity; it is an occasion for collective labour, waiting, sharing, quarrel, reconciliation, and celebration. The calls of those casting the great net, the whisper of netting through water, the splash of fish, and the children's delight on the bank together form a living folk music.

Flood is not merely one season of the year in Garh Narikel's folk memory. For many families it is a measure of time—before such-and-such a flood, after such-and-such an erosion, the year when the water reached the threshold, the year when the night was spent upon the embankment. Written dates may be forgotten, but the water-mark on a wall, a withered branch, sand left upon a field, household stories, and lines of song remain evidence of time. Folk song thus becomes a local chronology of history.

Trees are the village's second system of memory. Peepal, pakar, bamboo, mango, jamun, neem, bael, tamarind, jackfruit, mahua, coconut, banana, palash, semal, babul, date-palm—the presence or absence of each is tied to use, story, shade, season, and feeling. Varieties of mango make a dictionary of taste; bamboo gives material for houses, tools, instruments, nets, wedding pavilions, footbridges, and strainers; the peepal may shelter both deity and ghost; in the story-world the coconut leaf becomes a green page for writing names. When a tree is cut, it is not only timber that is lost; a place of memory disappears. That is why even a stump speaks in the history of the village.

Soil is also a witness to social division. In the same village one person has thick walls and another a frail hut; one courtyard is raised while another house will drown in the flood's first water; one person's fields lie together while another's are broken into fragments; one has rights over a pond while another's access is restricted. Folk culture does not merely conceal these inequalities. It expresses them through song, satire, proverb, quarrel, story, and collective resistance. Garh Narikel's culture is not a single-coloured picture of harmony; it carries cooperation and inequality, love and distance, honour and humiliation, sharing and conflict within the same social body.

The fishing song is a song of knowledge as well as labour. When to cast the net, from which direction to encircle the fish, how deep the water is, in which layer the fish are moving, which way the wind blows, who will stand on the bank—all this work can proceed in the rhythm of call and response. The leader calls, the group answers; the net is pulled together. If the rhythm breaks, the net tangles, the fish escape, people fall into the water. Music here is therefore not entertainment but a means both of safety and of success in labour.

Flood songs are among the most complex forms of Garh Narikel's folk culture. They contain fear, loss, courage, collective labour, invocation of deities, government neglect, rescue of animals, children's crying, boatmen's bravery, the pain of abandoning a home, and the hope of returning to the soil. One verse may be about a house washed away; another about lighting a hearth on the embankment; a third about an infant who has no milk; a fourth about the neighbour who arrived with a boat; a fifth about silt left in the fields after the water receded. A flood song is therefore not merely lament; it is also a resolve to rebuild.

In Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles, water becomes the field between justice and crime. The official name of a body fallen into the water may be erased, but the river recognises it. When Nand Aruni practises listening for names in water, this is not merely an impossible miracle; he is living Garh Narikel's old tradition of listening in a new age. To hear the river means to hear the rights of the dead, the testimony of labourers, a mother's waiting, and the truth pressed down inside the silence of paper.

In Garh Narikel the day opens before the hands of a clock—with birdsong, the stirring of animals, smoke from hearths, and the habits of the body. Rising before dawn is not only a compulsion of labour; it is a shared ordering of time. Someone goes to the cowshed, someone fetches water, someone lights the stove, someone checks the field tools, someone wakes the children, someone begins the next work upon paddy, lentils, or grain soaked the night before. In this many-voiced dawn there is no single conductor, yet everyone knows the sequence. This is the discipline of folk culture—unwritten, without bell, without command.

Different watches of the day have different tunes. Morning carries parati songs, awakenings, invocations, the calls of releasing cattle, and a light rhythm of departure for the fields. As the eastern light strengthens, work songs gather speed. At noon voices may thin out beneath the shade of trees—food, water, rest, conversation, stories. Later come fields, fishing, livestock, market, craft, household work. Evening brings cattle home, lights the hearth, sets children playing, begins dholak practice, stories, news, and the day's accounting. Night may hold ritual songs, sung tales, bhagait, nirgun, biraha, marsiya, ghost stories, or the low voice of private grief.

The social body of Garh Narikel is made from many hamlets, castes, occupations, and families. Inequality, caste distance, and historical injustice have existed within that order; it would be false to ignore them and turn folk culture into a merely colourful festival. Yet it is also true that in daily life, agriculture, festivals, rites, craft, music, water management, and times of disaster, one community has depended upon the labour and knowledge of another. Folk culture contains both that dependence and that tension.

Folk songs are vessels of memory for occupational knowledge. A fisher's song may preserve the names of nets, the movement of water, and the habits of fish; a transplanting song the varieties of paddy, mud, field measurement, and spacing; a carpenter's song the nature of wood, the movement of the saw, and the joint; a spinning song thread, spindle, and turning; an oil-press song the bullock's circle, the stream of oil, and the weariness of the day; a drummer's song the method of tightening hide, sunlight, dampness, and rhythm. Song binds knowledge to feeling, and so makes it easier to remember.

In Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles, Bisesar Paswan, Sarayu, Chhotu, and the unnamed labourers are new forms of this historical irony. The bridge is built by their labour, yet their names are incomplete or absent in the register. Garh Narikel's folk culture does not accept this inequality in silence as "fate." It preserves names, turns objects into testimony, and makes absent people present through shoes, gamchhas, bangles, leaves, and songs.

Play has a great role in the transmission of knowledge. Children playing bride and groom learn the social form of marriage; making houses of mud teaches construction; imitating fishers with a small net or cloth teaches the behaviour of water; rolling a wooden wheel teaches motion; playing kabaddi teaches breath, boundary, group, strategy, and courage. The ghosts' kabaddi in Channa Grove gives this ordinary game a grave form of memory and justice. Whoever crosses into the opposing side carrying a name must return with that name safe. Here play becomes a school of history.

The women of the village are the principal bearers of oral tradition. Wedding songs, birth sohars, fasting tales, Madhushravani, samdaun, satire, ritual abuse, household remedies, food memory, the vocabulary of kinship—much of this travels through women's voices. When a daughter marries into another village, she carries not only clothes and ornaments but an entire world of tunes, tales, recipes, aripan, remedies, proverbs, and pronunciation. In the new village she changes what she learned, accepts local forms, and creates new mixtures. Folk culture thus spreads across the region along the roads of marriage.

Behind every pond, tree, hamlet, old path, embankment, ruin, sacred enclosure, or unusual stone in Garh Narikel there may be a tale. People give stories to places, and stories make places memorable. When children hear that ghosts play in a certain grove, they see the grove not only through fear but through caution, boundary, and memory. When they hear a pond's story, they become alert to its depth, an old accident, or its collective use.

A folk tale can hold three kinds of time together—the ancestors' time, the teller's present, and the listener's future. In Channa Grove ghosts can cross 1885, 1934, 1977, and the present in a single turn; within this impossible movement lies the village's method of memory. Folk memory does not shut periods into separate boxes. Old injustice returns inside new injustice, an old proverb applies to new technology, an old crocodile can become a crocodile on a screen.

Folk tale can also impose social punishment. A person who harms the community may, at death, receive not ordinary mourning but a tale of public condemnation. One who commits injustice may be punished in story by ghost, curse, ruined lineage, withered tree, sunken boat, or erased name. Such punishment is not a court order, but it is a communal moral judgment. In Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles the court of Channa Grove is an expanded form of this folk justice—there memory matters more than a seal, testimony more than office, and a name more than victory.

Work songs are born inside work. Their rhythm follows the tool, the body's movement, the number of workers, and the duration of the task. Such songs have emotion, but they are not separated from the reality of labour. Wages, hunger, employer, season, beloved, child, bodily pain, laughter, teasing, hope—all enter the rhythm of work.

The stories of labourers such as Bisesar, Sarayu, and Chhotu show that when work songs are drowned out in vast modern construction, workers' names too can be drowned out. Amid the noise of machines, commands, deadlines, and contracting, if the collective voice of labour breaks, each worker becomes isolated, insecure, and unrecorded. Garh Narikel's folk culture works to join that broken voice again.

The most continuous archive of Garh Narikel's folk culture lies in women's voices and hands. Women plaster courtyards, make aripan, tell fasting tales, preserve birth and wedding songs, transplant and weed in the fields, pound and grind grain, and care for animals, birds, children, elders, kitchens, water, seed, and household things. Within this daily labour culture not only survives but continually takes new forms.

Mithila painting, clay ritual objects, sewing and embroidery, decoration of leaf-plates, khoinchh, arrangements of grain, wedding ornamentation—all are women's visual folk language. Folk song is its audible language. The two complete one another. An image sung in a song may appear on a wall or in an aripan; a figure drawn there may return as a story in song.

In Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles, Ba is the concentrated form of this women's memory of Garh Narikel. Before paper evidence she reads shoes, gamchhas, leaves, thresholds, and smells. Her saying "present" is a rite for the names of the dead. The name of a woman labourer such as Sarayu may be absent from the official register, but women's memory does not let it disappear. Ananya is the voice of the next generation, the one who begins the story again.

Flood songs question an incomplete embankment built by government or landlord, injustice in relief, shortages of boats, and names missing from lists. Folk song strips the polish from official language and shows lived experience. Against the claim "no major loss," it sets an empty threshold before a mother, a hungry child, the body of an animal carried away, and sand spread across a field.

When a name disappears from the government record, folk song preserves it. When a death is written as "absent," a mother's song says: the person did not return. When a woman's labour is absorbed into her husband's name, the transplanting verse raises her own name. When the court postpones another date, a proverb reveals the teeth of the crocodile of time.

Folk justice itself can sometimes be unjust—crowd passion, rumour, caste prejudice, blame laid upon women. Therefore every decision of folk culture is not automatically true. Its human core—dignity, protection of the weak, truth, collective responsibility—must be the test. The court of Channa Grove matters because it removes fear, listens to names, and places the victim's voice at the centre; it is not merely the noise of a majority.

Garh Narikel is not an external decoration of the story. It is the basic cultural grammar required to understand it. If the reader does not understand the village's oral tradition, the importance of names, the double nature of water, the memory held in trees and leaves, folk beliefs about ghosts, collective song, and folk justice, then Channa Grove, the coconut leaf, water-burial, and kabaddi will remain only half understood.

Bisesar Paswan represents the full humanity of the labourer. Torn shoes, laughter, family, wages, insecurity—the song joins them all and turns an “accident number” back into a human being. Sarayu exposes the invisibility of women’s labour. She works, yet on paper she is not an employee; folk song makes both her labour and her name present. The incomplete names of Chhotu or Bholatun become symbols of the migrant worker’s severed identity.

Garh Narikel’s folk culture is a single body made of soil, water, labour, relationships, memory, and voice. It cannot be confined to colourful festivals, old costumes, or dances on a stage. It lives in dawn work, field mud, the sharing of ponds, women’s stories, children’s games, craftspeople’s hands, boatmen’s calls, the names of the dead, the migrant’s longing, social satire, and collective resistance.

1. The Leaf-Lamp of Dakahi Pond

Tale—It is said that in the middle of Dakahi Pond a thin, leaf-like green light appears only on nights when someone’s name has been unjustly struck from the village record. Ba says that the light belongs not to the dead but to the pond’s own eye. Once Nand Aruni followed it in a boat and saw in the water the shadow of Bisesar’s torn shoe. Since then, whenever an unnamed death occurs near the pond, people set a lamp afloat upon the water.

Song—The Leaf-Lamp of the Pond

Folk tune: Slow Fisherman’s Biraha

Float, O lamp, float upon Dakahi Pond;

Remain all night as witness to the name struck out.

A green lamp in the middle of the pond—

Whose name is it calling?

Paper cut it; water kept it;

Night carries the testimony.

Let the lamp float, not the name;

Garh Narikel stays awake.

Wherever paper’s scissors cut, the lamp awoke there;

Green letters settled upon the still breast of the water.

*In the slow tune of longing, compassion keeps watch;
The name does not drift away in the current—the deep voice echoes.*

Float, O lamp, float upon Dakahi Pond;

Remain all night as witness to the name struck out.

2. The Breath of Channa Grove

Tale—An old belief in Channa Grove holds that every root of the tree preserves the breath of an ancestor or an unnamed labourer. Whenever a child runs toward the tree while speaking the truth, the leaves move even without wind. Ananya first believed this when she wrote Sarayu's name on a leaf and the green point on the stump began to tremble.

Song—Breath in Every Root

Folk tune: Children's Kabaddi Song

Run, child, run to the roots of Channa Grove;

Cross the line crying, "Present, present!"

Breath survives in the roots of Channa Grove;

The leaf says—Present!

The child ran carrying a name;

The ghost said—Present!

We shall cross the line of falsehood;

Truth will remain present!

Ancestral breath in every root, a voice in every leaf;

When a truthful step falls, the pouch of memory opens.

The ghosts laugh, the tree laughs, the child plays without fear;

The moment the line of falsehood is crossed, truth's turn is found.

Run, child, run to the roots of Channa Grove;

Cross the line crying, "Present, present!"

3. The Shared Hearth of the Southern Hamlet

Tale—One year of drought, grain ran short in the southern hamlet. The people put out the hearths in their separate homes and lit one common hearth. Everyone brought what they had—a handful of rice from one house, lentils from another, greens from a third, milk from a fourth. There was little food that night, but no household went to sleep hungry. Since then people have said: the true boundary of a hamlet lies wherever the smoke of its common hearth can reach.

Song—Smoke from the Shared Hearth

Folk tune: Courtyard Jhumar

Light it, sister, light the shared hearth;

Bring a handful each and fill everyone's plate.

One house's rice, another's lentils,

Greens from a third home;

When the shared hearth was lit,

The serpent of hunger fled.

Smoke rose beyond the hamlet;

Spring entered every belly.

In the drought year grain was scarce, but affection overflowed;

On a single fire the rice of a hundred homes swelled together.

Who gave what—who would count? One smoke rose;

The serpent of hunger fled, the hamlet joined and gathered.

Light it, sister, light the shared hearth;

Bring a handful each and fill everyone's plate.

4. Footprints on the Old Road

Tale—Garh Narikel's old road disappears beneath silt in the rains, yet at dawn a footprint rises by itself. Ba says it is the road of those who went away to distant lands but never forgot the way home. One day Aruni Nandan photographed it, but the image showed no road—only a single line turning toward home.

Song—The Road of Return

Folk tune: Batagabani

*Come home, traveller, the road is calling;
Even beneath the silt, footprints wake at dawn.*

Dust covered it, silt filled it,

The road says—come home;

Feet tired by the distant city,

The soil says—come home.

The threshold opens, a lamp is placed,

The mother says—come home.

Silt may cover, rain may wash, yet the sign does not fade;

Even the one who forgot the road is gathered back by this road.

For dust-covered feet the soil keeps a soft lap;

The lamp at the threshold burns through evening, nightfall, and dawn.

Come home, traveller, the road is calling;

Even beneath the silt, footprints wake at dawn.

5. The Watch on the Unfinished Ring Embankment

Tale—The old ring embankment was never completed, yet the village believes that unnamed watchkeepers place sacks of earth upon its unfinished stretch at night. During floods, when the living grow exhausted, two or four fresh sacks are found there at dawn. Nand Aruni saw no names upon them, only five deep finger-marks pressed into each.

Song—Five Fingers on the Embankment

Folk tune: Embankment-Repair Call

Lift the sack, lift it with a hoo-ho cry;

Let five fingers close into one fist and stand firm upon the embankment.

Fill the earth, set the sack,

The current is rising, brother;

Let five fingers become one,

The embankment will hold, brother.

No name may remain, but the work will;

The village will survive, brother.

When the living tire, unnamed watchkeepers wake;

The sacks laid in the night stand as witnesses at dawn.

Whether a name remains or not, let the work remain steadfast;

The village embankment belongs to all—the current flows after hearing it.

Lift the sack, lift it with a hoo-ho cry;

Let five fingers close into one fist and stand firm upon the embankment.

6. The Witness Stone

Tale—Near Channa Grove lies an unusual stone that turns cold when a lie is spoken and warm when the truth is spoken. One day, after returning from court, Nand Aruni placed his hand upon it; the stone slowly grew warm. Ananya then wrote: “The heat of truth lasts longer than a paper seal.”

Song—The Warm Stone

Folk tune: Folk-Justice Nirgun

*Place your hand, place it upon the witness stone;
Read in your heart the language of cold and warmth.
At a lie the stone grew heavy,
At truth the stone grew warm;
Place your hand upon it and the heart will know
Whose words carry truth.
The seal will dry, the warmth will remain,
Through every day and night.
At a lie the stone turned cold, cold as ice;
At truth, little by little, warmth spread through it.
The ink of the seal dries; warmth does not dry;
In a nirgun tune folk justice sings itself.
Place your hand, place it upon the witness stone;
Read in your heart the language of cold and warmth.*

7. The Leaf That Sprouted from the Stump

Tale—A leaf sprouted from the cut stump of Channa Grove when Ananya wrote a complete name for the first time. The village believes that when a name is written incompletely, its leaf opens only halfway; when the name is complete, the leaf opens fully. That is why the village children do not hurry when writing names.

Song—The Leaf of the Complete Name

Folk tune: Children's Parati

Write, child, write the whole, whole name;

A half-letter brings a half-open leaf—learn this knot well.

We shall not write a half-made letter;

Let the whole name sprout.

Inside the stump a green dream—

Wake it slowly.

One life upon each leaf;

Write it clearly.

Ananya wrote the complete name; the stump began to tremble;

The green dream became a leaf and broke open with dawn.

Half a name, half an honour—this will no longer do;

Whole letters, whole leaves—this is the new reckoning.

Write, child, write the whole, whole name;

A half-letter brings a half-open leaf—learn this knot well.

8. The Paddy-Transplanting Song

Tale—On the first day of transplanting, Sarayu saw that the row was crooked and changed the refrain of the song: “Straight row, straight right.” All the women repeated it with laughter. The row in the field became straight, but the song’s meaning travelled all the way into the accounting of wages.

Song—Straight Row, Straight Right

Folk tune: Paddy Transplanting Song

Plant, sister, plant the row straight;

With the paddy plant the roots of rights deep.

Feet in the mud, seedlings in hand—

Keep the row straight, sister;

Set rights deep like the roots of paddy,

Do not bend the matter, sister.

Clouds will rain, grain will fill;

Add up the wages, sister.

Hearing Sarayu's refrain, the laughing field grew straight;

The song's words were not merely song—they became a lesson in life.

Bodies bent in mud, thoughts held straight in the head;

Row by row, both grain and rights will rise ahead.

Plant, sister, plant the row straight;

With the paddy plant the roots of rights deep.

9. Welcoming the Newborn

Tale—Once a daughter was born in the village and some people remained silent. Ananya and the women's circle added a new verse to the sohar: "A daughter has come, a lamp of names." Hearing the song, even those who had stood silent at the doorway began to clap. Since then the same refrain has been sung in the birth sohar for both daughter and son.

Song—The Lamp of Names

Folk tune: Sohar

Little one, a lamp of names has come;

Daughter or son—the courtyard has filled with light.

Into the courtyard came a lamp of names,

Daughter or son;

Dawn lives within two eyes,

Soft lines upon the little hands.

The fortune of a house does not choose a body;

Every birth is entered in the same account.

When the new verse of the sohar rose at the silent doorway,

The lock of silence broke and flowers of welcome opened.

Dawn in two eyes, lines of destiny upon the palm;

Every birth bears the same account—sing this tune.

Little one, a lamp of names has come;

Daughter or son—the courtyard has filled with light.

10. A Daughter's Farewell

Tale—At the time of farewell, the mother did more than weep. She gave her daughter a handful of seed, a leaf, and her own song. She said, "Build your home like seed, preserve your name like a leaf, and keep your voice open like a song." That is why the samdaun, though full of sorrow, is never helpless.

Song—Seed, Leaf, and Song

Folk tune: Samdaun

Go, daughter, carrying all three inheritances;

Seed, leaf, and song—understand your mother's heart.

Take the seed with you, daughter;

When you find soil,

Take the leaf with you, daughter;

It will write your name.

Take the song with you, daughter;

Your voice will never bow.

With tears flows learning; with blessing flows strength;

In your husband's soil plant the fruit of your mother's home.

Write your name upon the leaf; never let your voice bend;

Even in the sorrowful tune of samdaun there is no defeat.

Go, daughter, carrying all three inheritances;

Seed, leaf, and song—understand your mother's heart.

11. Remembering the Dead

Tale—Each year, on the day when the splash at the bridge returns to the village's memory, people place four objects beside Channa Grove—a shoe, a gamchha, a bangle, and a leaf. No statue, no speech. Ananya reads the names, Ba says "Present," and the wind from the river answers.

Song—Names Present

Folk tune: Mournful Marsiya

Set down all four—the shoe, the gamchha, the bangle, the leaf;

No statue, no speech—say only "Present."

The shoe is silent, the gamchha wet;

The leaf says—Present.

The bangle gleams, the mother calls;

The night says—Present.

The body is gone, but the name survives;

The village says—Present.

Year after year, on that same day, people gather beside the grove;

Silent objects begin to speak—this is the ordinance of memory.

Even in the mournful rhythm of marsiya one vow resounds:

The body is gone, the name remains—the village will not forget.

Set down all four—the shoe, the gamchha, the bangle, the leaf;

No statue, no speech—say only "Present."

12. The Song of Milk Filling the Paddy

Tale—When milk begins to fill the paddy grain, loud noise, grazing animals, and carelessness are kept away from the field. People say this is the grain's time of pregnancy. Women pass along the field's edge singing softly, as though blessing the grain forming inside each plant.

Song—The Paddy's Pregnancy

Folk tune: Soft Field Lullaby

Slowly, sister, softly along the field;

Milk is filling the paddy's womb—speak gently and sweetly.

Milk fills the paddy's womb;

Speak softly, sister.

Let the wind be gentle, the water even;

Guard the field-bund, sister.

The rice of Agahan is growing here;

Pour out your blessing, sister.

No noise, no grazing—this is the grain's time of pregnancy;

Keep the wind gentle, water even, and watch the field-bund.

Passing along the edges, the women sing in a low tune;

The dream of Agahan rice enters every ear of grain.

Slowly, sister, softly along the field;

Milk is filling the paddy's womb—speak gently and sweetly.

13. Saving Seed for the Next Crop

Tale—There was a temptation to sell all the finest paddy. Ba separated from the heap the seed for the following year. She said, "Tomorrow's life is worth more than today's price." Ananya wrote the year, field, and flavour upon the seed-bag.

Song—Tomorrow's Bag

Folk tune: Seed-Preservation Song

Save the bag, save tomorrow's bag;

Do not squander tomorrow's life for today's price.

Do not sell it all; save some;

Tomorrow the field will call.

A small bag holding the ancestors' flavour

Will spread green again.

Today's money will pass away;

Seed will set the year right.

Greed said, "Sell it all—the price is high."

Ba said, "If the seed is gone, the land will be ruined."

On the bag were written the year, field, and name of the flavour;

The ancestors' taste was carried onward to the next generation.

Save the bag, save tomorrow's bag;

Do not squander tomorrow's life for today's price.

14. The Song of Mourning

Tale—After a death, people do not merely praise the dead; they also speak of unfinished work, the family's needs, and any injustice surrounding the death. In remembering Bisesar, the people did more than weep: they resolved to complete the labourers' list. Grief became action.

Song—Resolve from Tears

Folk tune: Mourning Biraha

Count them, count the unfinished tasks;

Beside the tears, set down the lamp of resolve.

Tears fell, the name rose;

Count the unfinished work.

Do not merely offer flowers;

Take the family by the hand.

The honour of the dead will be preserved

When injustice is defeated.

Do not praise alone; ask how the family lives;

Learn the name of the injustice that surrounded the death.

In Bisesar's memory, speak of labourers' rights;

Along with flowers, hold a hand—this is mourning's companionship.

Count them, count the unfinished tasks;

Beside the tears, set down the lamp of resolve.

15. Aripan: The Silent Song

Tale—Ananya made the circular line of an aripan crooked. Ba did not erase it; she turned the crooked line into a river and joined it to a lotus. “Folk art teaches us to give meaning to mistakes,” she said. In the rice-paste design, net, leaf, footprint, sun, and moon all lived in the same courtyard.

Song—Lines of Rice Paste

Folk tune: Aripan Mangal

Draw it, sister, draw the line in rice paste;

Turn even a crooked line into a river and lift it into meaning.

The finger circled round and round;

A lotus opened in the middle.

The crooked line became a river;

The net caught the flow.

The silent aripan writes a song;

The courtyard becomes its page.

Ba did not erase Ananya's crooked line;

She joined it to a lotus and made it a river.

Give meaning to error—that is the speech of folk art;

Wisdom speaks in the silent song of rice paste.

Draw it, sister, draw the line in rice paste;

Turn even a crooked line into a river and lift it into meaning.

16. Pain in the Marital Home, Husband-Wife Relations, and Domestic Violence

Tale—A woman kept singing the words “the door is closed” again and again. The group understood that this was not merely a metaphor. The women did not leave her alone: they spoke with the family and found her a safe place. Ritual abuse and song became signs by which hidden violence inside society could be recognised.

Song—Open the Door

Folk tune: Women’s Biraha

Open it, sister, open the door within;

Untie the knot in the throat that keeps singing “closed, closed.”

Do not keep the door shut;

Listen to what the voice says.

To strike in the name of love—

Count that as injustice.

A sister will hold a sister’s hand;

Untie the knot of fear.

There was a signal inside the song; the women’s circle understood;

She was not left alone—hands joined around her.

To strike in love’s name was named and counted as injustice;

A circle of safety formed, and the lock of fear opened.

Open it, sister, open the door within;

Untie the knot in the throat that keeps singing "closed, closed."

17. Discrimination Between Daughter and Son, and Caste Humiliation

Tale—During a school game one child was held back because of caste, and a girl was prevented from becoming captain. Ananya erased the kabaddi line and gave everyone a new turn. The leaves of Channa Grove stirred, as though the village were saying: before a name, the walls of caste and gender are small.

Song—The Same Turn

Folk tune: Children's Kabaddi

Erase it, child, erase the line of caste;

Let daughter and son run upon the same dust.

The girl runs, the boy runs,

Across the same dusty ground;

Erase the wall of caste with your feet;

Open the door of the game.

Call the name, preserve the honour;

Everyone has the same right.

The child once held back moved forward; the girl became captain;

The line Ananya erased became a new law of play.

Channa Grove applauded, every leaf swayed;

The same turn, the same dust—the share of all opened.

Erase it, child, erase the line of caste;

Let daughter and son run upon the same dust.

18. The Lamp of Jhijhiya

Tale—In the darkness of Bhadav, women dance with a perforated earthen pot upon the head and a lamp burning inside it. Folk belief says that every hole is one fear of the village, while the flame within is living courage amid all those fears. After the story of Ujjwal Jha, a new hole was added and named “the glass screen.”

Song—Light Through Every Hole

Folk tune: Jhijhiya

Dance, Jhijhiya, dance with the pot upon your head;

Amid darkness pierced with holes, let the inner flame live.

A lamp burns in the earthen pot,

Many holes are darkness;

One hole for illness, one for fear,

One for the blow of the screen.

When the flame turns, the night declares:

The world is still alive.

One hole for illness, one for fear, one for the screen's blow,

Yet inside the pot the flame remains—the cry of the living.

Turning and turning, the circle of women measures the night;

Even among a hundred holes, the light never trembles.

Dance, Jhijhiya, dance with the pot upon your head;

Amid darkness pierced with holes, let the inner flame live.

19. Kabir's Nirgun Voice

Tale—In nirgun singing, the outward marks of caste, appearance, wealth, and rank are drawn into question. One night the singer asked, “If someone's name is not in the register, is that person's soul any less?” The gathering fell silent; then the refrain arose: “Everyone breathes the same breath.”

Song—Everyone Breathes the Same Breath

Folk tune: Nirgun

*Sing the nirgun, sing deep into the night;
Beyond paper and body, contemplate the oneness of breath.
Paper differs, bodies differ,
Everyone breathes the same breath;
The walls of caste and rank will fall
When discernment opens.
Strike out a name and truth is not struck out;
Every human stands in the same reckoning.
The singer asked, "If the name is struck out, does the soul become less?"
The gathering fell silent; then the refrain rose again.
The walls of caste and rank collapsed in the cleansing waters of discernment;
In the single strain of nirgun, all human beings became equal.
Sing the nirgun, sing deep into the night;
Beyond paper and body, contemplate the oneness of breath.*

20. Children's Games and Kabaddi

Tale—While playing kabaddi in Channa Grove, the children called out one forgotten name in every turn. Crossing the boundary meant courage, returning meant responsibility, and saving a teammate meant collectivity. The game became a lesson in history.

Song—A Turn for a Name

Folk tune: Children's kabaddi

*Run, children, it is a forgotten name's turn;
Cross the boundary and come back—both are responsibilities.
Kabaddi, kabaddi—run carrying the name,
Cross the line;*

If a teammate falls, extend your hand,

Return together.

Victory comes only when a forgotten name

Is held again by the village.

In every turn let one forgotten name be called;

Reach out to the fallen teammate and bring them home with you.

Courage, responsibility, togetherness—the game teaches all three;

A forgotten name returned to the village: that is the splendour of victory.

Run, children, it is a forgotten name's turn;

Cross the boundary and come back—both are responsibilities.

21. Court Dates and Folk Justice

Tale—After every court date, Nand Aruni placed a small stone beside Channa Grove. The row of stones grew long. On them Ananya wrote not merely the dates but the life a family had lived between them—food, treatment, schooling, mourning. Folk justice counted the human cost of waiting.

Song—The Stones of Court Dates

Folk tune: Courtroom biraha

Lay down a stone, one for every court date;

In the row of stones, mark the sorrow of the living.

One date, one stone,

The row grew without end;

The paper says, "Come again,"

The home asks, "How many times?"

Count justice not only in days,

But in the burden of living grief.

Returning from court, Aruni laid down one stone at a time;

Ananya wrote upon each one the life lived in between.

“Come again,” said the paper; the home asked, “When?”

Counting the row of stones, justice itself wondered, “Must it be like this?”

Lay down a stone, one for every court date;

In the row of stones, mark the sorrow of the living.

22. Guarding the Name

Tale—The village children formed a “name-watch.” For anyone whose family might disappear through migration, flood, accident, or an error on paper, they wrote the full name, home, work, and memory upon a leaf. A person was preserved not as a number beside a name, but as a story.

Song—The Name-Watch

Folk tune: Vigil song

Wake, wake—the name-watch must stay awake;

Keep the name in all three places: leaf, stone, and voice.

Name upon the leaf, work upon the stone,

The story in the voice;

If paper strikes it out, we shall write it again,

Identity will not be lost.

All night this watch will stay awake,

The name will remain in honour.

For every family that may vanish—in flood, error, or migration—

Write the name, home, and work; preserve what memory remains.

If paper strikes it out, we shall write it again—the children's vow;

All night the watch will stay awake; no person will be lost.

Wake, wake—the name-watch must stay awake;

Keep the name in all three places: leaf, stone, and voice.

23. A Warning Against Digital Fraud

Tale—After the tragedy of Ujjwal Jha, a new folk song arose in the village. School, market, and migrant families all sang the same refrain: if a false call or frightening message comes, do not decide alone; first tell someone you trust. The shame belongs to the criminal, not the victim.

Song—The Crocodile of the Glass Screen

Folk tune: Warning Jhijhiya

Recognise it, recognise the crocodile of glass;

The moment its teeth of fear appear, call your household near.

The glass screen becomes a crocodile,

Showing the teeth of fear;

Do not stay alone—call others,

Tell your household what has happened.

Let shame rest upon the criminal's head,

Let truth awaken light.

After Ujjwal's story, village after village learned this refrain:

A false call, a frightening message—never decide alone.

At school, market, and among migrants, let it resound everywhere:

The shame is the criminal's, not the victim's—understand this.

Recognise it, recognise the crocodile of glass;

The moment its teeth of fear appear, call your household near.

24. Guarding Trees, Water, and the Environment

Tale—After Channa Grove was cut down, the children began planting one tree in the name of every newborn child. They made maps of ponds, pools, floodplains, embankments, and the places of birds. Nand Aruni said, “Heritage is not only saving old things; it is saving breath for the next generation.”

Song—One Name, One Tree

Folk tune: Green parati

Plant, plant—plant for every name;

A tree in a newborn's name, a leaf in the tree's name.

For one name, one tree;

For one tree, its leaves;

For one pond, a hundred birds;

For one embankment, a heritage.

If soil and water remain alive,

Every story will remain alive.

After the grove was cut, the children made this vow;

They mapped pond, pool, floodplain, and embankment.

A hundred birds for one pond, shade from one tree;

If soil and water live, every path will live.

Plant, plant—plant for every name;

A tree in a newborn's name, a leaf in the tree's name.

Across these hundred tales and songs, the folk culture of Garh Narikel is not a lifeless object in a museum but a living tradition that changes each day, asks questions, labours, laughs, weeps, demands justice, and passes its voice to the next generation. Let every song be sung with its occasion; let the refrain be repeated; let local singers add their own verses; and let every tale take a new form in the throat of the next storyteller. Such is the natural life of folk culture.

Dedication

To those unnamed people whose names were never written on stone, yet whose voices still flow through water, leaves, and paper.

To those informants whose faces were recorded nowhere, yet whose truth cuts its way even through stone.

To those whose families lived in fear, who lost both livelihood and life, whose homes were emptied—and who nevertheless spoke. This is dedicated to them.

“Truth is a seed—however deeply it is buried beneath a heavy stone, one day it will break through.” — A belief of the people of Garh Narikel.

“One who sees the truth and remains silent dies twice—once in the body, once in the soul.” — An old saying of Garh Narikel.

“When a village forgets its history, its coconut trees stop bearing fruit.” — Another old saying of Garh Narikel.

The speaking coconut tree, visions of the dead, the absence of shadow—these are poetic metaphors of Mithila’s folk consciousness. — A belief of the people of Garh Narikel.

From the Mouth of the Book

(The Folk Voice of Garh Narikel)

1.

Water speaks, the tree listens, leaves rustle and write names, but the stone remains silent.

2.

The drowned one spoke; the survivor forgot; and the river kept them both within its belly.

3.

When the coconut tree speaks, understand this: some dead person in the village is searching for their heel.

4.

Truth is a seed, falsehood a stone; the stone is heavy all night, but by dawn the seed is green.

5.

Without a name, a ghost cannot remain in the game; without a name, a human being cannot remain in history.

6.

The elephant grips the crocodile, the crocodile grips the child, and the child grips the hand that did not write the name upon the stone.

7.

One who saw and stayed silent died twice; one who saw and spoke lived twice in name.

CHAPTER I

Kabaddi in Channa Grove

Where the living keep silent, the ghosts fight their case through kabaddi.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE FIRST RAID OF DAWN

Folk tune: Phag-kabaddi tune

Play, oh play, the first raid of dawn,

*Beneath Channa Grove, play guard over every name.
The moon has slipped down from the grove; the east is turning red,
Amid the ghosts' game, the koel's glad call is heard.
Cry kabaddi, kabaddi - today the names will live,
One raid for memory, brother, another for courage.
Dew writes on every leaf - dawn does not surrender,
However deep the crocodile lies, the sun lays a path across the water.
Let the first raid belong to hope, with the whole village beside it,
From the soil of Channa Grove shall rise the name of justice.
Dew-wet earth gives off its fragrance; the Phag wind sways,
Ghosts and spirits sit together, and the koel opens its throat.
Whoever runs holding one breath will carry the inheritance of names,
The defeated and the victorious together will scatter the abir of hope.*

A bhut is black, a pret white; a rakshas is the charred remnant of a corpse accidentally left unburnt, while a buried child becomes a loth. Channa Grove. Bhuts and pretis play kabaddi; the rakshas provides the light and the loth watches. Brahma sits in the peepal tree. In the pond lives the Panidubbi, a long-haired water-spirit; in bottomless water her hair tangles around a person's feet, and the victim gasps and dies.

Bhut, pret, rakshas, loth - all come after death, or rather after untimely death. So too the Brahma of the peepal tree, and the souls of those who became entangled in the Panidubbi's hair beneath the water. Garh Narikel has seen many untimely deaths. Do ghosts and spirits have feet planted on the earth? Are their feet turned backward? All lies. They look just like ordinary people; only they seem to move a little above the ground. You understand - something like a moonwalk. No, not exactly a moonwalk: it is as though they glide, almost like snakes, yet they walk just like ordinary people, only an inch or so clear of the earth.

The Hakkal witches too climb trees, mount their little riding-stools, and fly away on them. At dawn they leave the stools there and depart.

They keep many spirits with them and make those spirits do all manner of errands. But people say that when the witches grow old and their power declines, they can no longer provide the spirits with their feed; then those same spirits begin clawing and eating away at the witches themselves.

I can see water on every side.

Asia's largest road bridge is being built. Iron rods, enormous piers, day-labourers climbing over them with baskets on their heads. Cement and stone chips everywhere... then someone's foot slips... the body spins as it falls... and among the crocodiles comes a water-burial. A few days later another, then a third... hundreds of day-labourers consigned to water-burial.

And all the games kept going on together.

A few were shown as deaths - only thirty. Far more disappeared into the account of water-burials, and several decades later I too am entered in that same account. Somewhere in the chronology my foot slips... there... I fall, spinning... and among the crocodiles comes my own water-burial. The crocodiles chew even the bones. Thus all of us attain our samadhi.

When the mongoose stood guard, the cobra could do no harm.

But the guards here were human beings.

And, like the sound of a clod thrown into a well reaching the ear after a pause, comes the sound: splash.

The Ganga is the well, and all these yogis are clods dropping into it, as though they have come from distant forests, hills, and fields of sand left after floods expressly to take water-burial. As though they are jostling for their turn. My ears keep ringing. Come, let us go to the people of Garh Narikel. Their ears are ringing too. Turn by turn. One after another. Now one person's, now another's.

As though some soul might find release merely by hearing this tale.

As though the people of Garh Narikel might grow lighter by hearing it told.

But the voice is indistinct.

Water-burial... crocodile...

Mongoose... cobra...

What story is this voice trying to tell by coupling these things?

The mongoose and the cobra belong to an old village tale...

But this bridge over the Ganga, said to be the largest in Asia?

That is very far from Garh Narikel. It seems to belong to some newer story.

Then how old a story will this spirit tell? How many hundreds of years? A hundred at the very least. And if so, has it been waiting a hundred years for release - or longer still? What tale is this spirit trying to tell and hear? If it received water-burial, why did it not gain release? If the mongoose saved it from the cobra, that must mean some unseen power stood beside it... but how did that same power allow it to take water-burial among crocodiles?

Or is this not one story but two - perhaps more than two, several stories?

The body has become light as a silk-cotton flower. Where is the body now, in any case? Two or three stories have mingled together, along with two or three periods of time and tracts of land. Let us see what I hear and what I am able to tell... whether the stories become clear with their times and places, or remain entangled to the very end.

I

When kabaddi began in Channa Grove that night, at first no one could tell whether it was a game or a trial. The bhuts stood in a circle; the pretts hung from branch to branch like pale smoke; the rakshasas cast such silvery light from their small bodies that even the loths hidden behind the leaves could squint and see. The Panidubbi had left the pond and come as far as the grove; her hair did not drag upon the soil but through the air, like a black river that had forgotten its course and walked into the trees. Brahma sat in the peepal tree, looking in four directions with four faces, yet no mantra came from any mouth. In place of a mantra one sound rose and fell: kabaddi... kabaddi... kabaddi.

Human beings played kabaddi in Garh Narikel too, but the ghosts' kabaddi was different. A human being touched the earth; a ghost touched the earth's memory. A human being held his breath to chant; a ghost, having no breath, could chant forever. A human being crossed a boundary; a ghost crossed time. Once a ghost entered the opponent's half, it could touch 1885, emerge in 1934, plant a foot in 1977, touch the red light of a 2026 mobile tower, and return to Channa Grove. Then catching it was not difficult but impossible, for its body existed here and there, in every place at once.

Budhba Ghost was the chief referee. He had sat on the same branch for two hundred years, so no one argued with his decisions. A ghost who trembled at the mere word release possessed, strangely enough, limitless patience in matters of justice. But that night Budhba Ghost's eyes were not pale; they were green, as though the waters of the Kamala-Balan were filling them from within. Hulasi, the ghost without hands, circled the ground with the upper half of her body, marking the boundary as she moved. Whenever a ghost crossed the line, she signalled with her eyes; her eyes were her hands.

In the first raid, the team of pretis entered. White bodies, a sliding radiance behind them. They began chanting kabaddi-kabaddi, but on the third circuit the sound changed. 'Water... water... water...' Everyone thought it was the sound of breath breaking. But how could a ghost lose its breath? Then the cry rose a second time: 'Samadhi... samadhi...' Budhba Ghost came down from the branch. Silence spread through the grove. Far away, somewhere, water moved, though no stream ran beside Channa Grove.

The Panidubbi shook out her hair. What fell from it was not pond water but the smell of the Ganga. 'That is not the voice of the village pond,' she said. The rakshasas' silver light turned black. The loth, forever a spectator, opened his half-open mouth fully for the first time. Not smoke but cement dust poured from it. And from inside that dust came a thin voice, like an iron rod: splash... splash...

Splash.

Behind that splash a bridge was being built - the road bridge proclaimed to be the largest in Asia. A web of iron, massive piers, cement sacks fallen along the Ganga, day-labourers carrying baskets on their heads, men whose names were never entered whole in the contractor's register. If a man's name was Ram, the register might say 'Rm'. If he was Mangal, it might say 'Mangala'. One man's father's name vanished; another man's village changed; someone aged nineteen became forty-five. People can be altered on paper far more easily than in a river. The river knows every dead person by the name that was truly his.

On that bridge Nand Aruni was not merely a junior engineer; he was a troubled witness. He wore a helmet that sounded hollow from within. On the day he first reached the site, the foreign contractor's men showed him the plans. On the plan the river was a blue line, the labourers round dots, danger a red triangle, and death only a footnote. Nand kept looking. The blue line seemed to twitch from time to time. When he bent closer, it was no line at all but the dhoti of a labourer drifting in the Ganga.

Photographs of Edward Broom, the foreign company's site chief, were posted everywhere - smiling in a helmet, patting an Indian child on the head. Beneath the photograph were the words, 'Development with Human Dignity.' The labourers could not read English, but they saw the picture and assumed that perhaps this man owned the place. Nand could read. The word dignity always caught in his mind. If there was dignity, why was the night-shift safety net torn? If there was dignity, why was the report prepared before the body of the fallen worker had even been searched for?

The first splash came on a Monday afternoon, when sunlight on the water glittered like iron rods. Bisesar Paswan, a day-labourer, had climbed a pier with a basket of stone chips on his head and worn-out slippers on his feet. From a distance Nand shouted, 'Put on the safety belt!' No one could say whether Bisesar heard him. He turned and smiled, as though to say, 'Babu, will a belt fill my stomach?' At that instant his foot slipped on a rod. He spun as he fell. Human eyes saw a body strike the water. The crocodiles' eyes saw a name descend into it.

The Ganga remained calm on the surface. Five breaths later a round whirlpool rose. In it appeared Bisesar's hand, then the basket, then part of his body. Whether the crocodiles were hungry that day or the system itself had invited them was difficult to know. Saffron-coloured foam floated for a long time upon the water. The site clerk opened the register and wrote: 'Absent after leaving the workplace.' Nand caught his hand. The clerk laughed. 'Sir, the order comes from above. If we write dead, the work will stop.'

That night Bisesar arrived in Channa Grove. His body was not whole. Where the crocodiles had chewed away flesh, water now filled the gaps. The ghosts stopped their game. Bisesar looked around and said, 'I am not from Garh Narikel.' Budhba Ghost replied, 'Wherever an untimely death arrives, a village is formed.' Bisesar said, 'My name is not in the register.' At once Hulasi burst into a heart-rending laugh. 'Your name is not in the register - that is precisely why you were able to come here.'

Kabaddi began again that night, but with a new rule. Every ghost entering the opponent's half had to return having saved one name. The first went with 'Bisesar Paswan'. The second with 'Salamat Ansari'. The third with 'Gopi Mahato'. The fourth with 'Rajnu Mandal'. The names rose into the air, caught on leaves, then slid down toward the trunks of the coconut trees. There were few coconut trees in Garh Narikel, but those that remained did not tremble at the sound of names; they drank them in.

Garh Narikel lay on the right bank of the Balan, but rivers, not human beings, decide what is right and what is left. When the Kamala brought a flood, the village became the left bank; when the Balan flowed quietly, it became the right again. The shade of the spreading trees of Sabhagachhi reached as far as that village. Of every bride and groom who once met beneath the trees of Saurath, some child of their lineage would, sooner or later, set foot upon the soil of Garh Narikel.

But after the flood, the shade was cut away. Trees dried. Sand climbed as far as the village courtyards. Children in the arhar fields began to fear not the jackal but the sand sinking beneath their feet. In the ghosts' kabaddi all these sights became boundary lines. When Hulasi raised her eyes where her right hand should have been, the current at Pipraghat flashed. When Budhba Ghost called 'out', crows flew over the ruined grove at Jhanjharpur. When the loth tried to applaud, cement fell from his half-formed hands. And the Panidubbi, whose hair once entangled children in ponds, was now tangled in the names of day-labourers from the Ganga. 'I pull people into water,' she said, 'but these people are being pushed into it.'

That night Nand's home was not in Garh Narikel but in the temporary camp beside the bridge. Yet his dream walked through the village. In the dream he heard an old family story: when Kalit was born in Lattar Thakur's house, a peepal leaf above the courtyard had hung upside down. The midwife had said, 'This child will see very far.' But to see far is a curse. One who sees far cannot ignore the lie lying close at hand. Nand was perhaps the last descendant of Kalit's long sight. In those who fell into the water he could see the future - the widow in the village, compensation without a name, a courthouse veranda, a child selling tea there, and one day that child's grandson glowing on a digital screen and saying, 'There is a digital-arrest warrant against you.'

At that time such glimpses of the future seemed impossible to him. Digital arrest? Mule account? Hong Kong? Signal? Nand had a small diary in his pocket then, not a mobile phone. But the ghosts of Garh Narikel were not bound by the limits of time. The future had already entered the game in Channa Grove. A thin young man, not yet even born, trembled behind a leaf. His name would be Ujjwal Jha. He would drown not in a river but in a screen. Crocodiles would not eat him; numbers would - money lost, interest, threats, a downloaded app, calls in the night, the shame of the household. The ghosts could see him but could not touch him, because his death had not yet taken shape.

Budhba Ghost closed his eyes at this vision of the future. He had seen countless deaths, but it was hard to look upon a death arriving without a body. Hulasi asked, 'Who is he?' The Brahma of the peepal answered from all four mouths, and all four answers were false. Only the Panidubbi spoke: 'This is a new water-burial. Without water.'

The second splash at the bridge came fifteen days later. This time the dead worker was the son of a Musahar woman - underage, though the register made him twenty-eight. Leaving him at the site, his mother had said, 'Work through the day and come home early in the evening.' He did not return. The contractor's clerk said, 'He ran away.' His mother did not believe it. She sat beside the Ganga all night, calling his name. The water gave no answer. But that same night, in the ghosts' kabaddi at Channa Grove, a new player entered carrying an invisible basket on his head. He could not fully remember his own name. 'Ma used to call me Chhotu,' he said.

Chhotu had to be given a name. A nameless ghost could not remain in the game. Budhba Ghost tried to place a hand upon his head, but the hand hovered a finger's breadth above the body. 'For now your name is Chhotu,' he said. 'When your true name is found on earth, we shall change it.' Everyone in Channa Grove agreed. The loth clapped. His applause sounded like stone.

Nand prepared a report on this second death. It read: 'Inadequate safety arrangements; employment of an underage labourer; body not recovered; contractor liable.' The report went upward. It returned with words struck through in red pencil. 'Underage' had been removed. 'Body' had been removed.

'Liable' had been removed. What remained was: 'Labourer absent.' Nand stared at the paper and sat on his bed all night. It seemed to him that the crossed-out words had become little fish, flapping on the table in search of water. Meanwhile, a meeting was held in the foreign company's Delhi office. Edward Broom appeared by video. Awards were arranged on the wooden wall behind him. 'The India project is our flagship,' he said.

The interpreter translated: 'The India project is the company's pride.' The site chief reported: 'Deaths are within controlled numbers.' Nand felt sick the moment he heard the sentence. Deaths within controlled numbers? Who controls death - a doctor, a god, or a contractor? At the end of the meeting Broom said, 'Next month I shall speak at Harvard on ethics. I shall use this Indian bridge as an example.'

Nand closed his notebook. He understood that the greatest bridge in the world is not the one that carries you across a river; it is the bridge built from crime to prestige. In Garh Narikel, Ba was young then and would sometimes wake suddenly in the night. Her ears filled with the sound of water. She would tell her mother-in-law, 'Someone who drowned is speaking a name.' Her mother-in-law would say, 'Such sounds are natural in a river village.' But Ba knew this was no ordinary sound of a river. With a finger she would try to write the name in the ash beside the hearth, but before the name took shape the ash blew away. At such moments the coconut leaves outside the house suddenly became still. In Garh Narikel, when a coconut leaf fell utterly still, people understood that some dead person stood at the threshold.

On one such night Ba saw water dripping at the threshold. She opened the door; no one was there. But on the earth were footprints - not whole feet, no heels, no toes, only round wet marks. They led from the courtyard to the room where Kalit's old chest was kept. Ba opened it. Inside lay old papers, land deeds, marriage agreements, a black photograph, and a letter. The letter contained only two words: 'Save names.' Ba could not read, yet the letters made themselves legible to her without the help of her eyes.

Kabaddi in Channa Grove was no longer regular. Once the game began whenever night fell; now it began whenever someone fell from the bridge, a court date was fixed, or a name was struck from a file. The ghosts called it 'Save-the-Name Kabaddi'. One team ran carrying the names of the dead; the other became the government's seal and chased them. A name blurred if its bearer was caught. If the runner touched the boundary and returned, the name sprouted upon a coconut leaf like a new shoot.

Once a strange player entered this game. He wore a lawyer's coat, but his feet were smeared with river mud. 'Date,' he said. The ghosts did not understand. 'Date after date,' he said again. Sheets of paper began flying from his mouth. Budhba Ghost tried to catch him, but those pages were not wind; they were procedure, and procedure could not be seized by hand. The Brahma of the peepal said, 'This is the revenant of the court. Once it enters, it does not leave for a generation.' Looking at him, the Panidubbi said, 'He is more dangerous than a crocodile. A crocodile eats when it is hungry; this creature keeps eating dates even when its belly is full.'

Many years later the court-revenant would acquire a real face - Batuknath Hariharan. But that night no one knew his name. He was only smoke wearing a lawyer's coat. Behind that smoke stood a half-formed figure like Chandrapal Batra, a law degree in one hand, the seal of Meerut at one corner, a betting slip in his pocket. Farther behind him, across the sea, sat the shadow of Lau Kin-Hung in a glass tower in Hong Kong. None of them had yet entered the story, but in the ghosts' kabaddi the future had already begun its preparations.

One day Nand met an old boatman beside the river at the site. His name was Fakira Sahni. His face was cracked like the riverbed, his eyes full of sand. 'Why are there so many crocodiles?' Nand asked. Fakira laughed. 'There are not more crocodiles, Babu. More bodies are being thrown to them.' Nand fell silent. Fakira continued, 'Crocodiles clean the river. But human beings want to hand their crimes over to them too. If a crocodile eats the body, the crime is thought to have vanished. That is how the big men think. But the crocodile eats the body, not the name. The name sticks between its teeth.'

Nand wrote the sentence in his diary: 'The crocodile eats the body, not the name.' That night in Channa Grove Budhba Ghost repeated the same words as Bisesar, Chhotu, Salamat, Rajnu, and a dozen spirits with incomplete names played kabaddi. For the first time Hulasi did not laugh; she wept. Not water but black light dripped from her eyes. 'My name too was written wrongly,' she said. 'People said I killed myself. I slipped into the well.' Budhba Ghost replied, 'Your name too will be saved.' Hulasi entered the game for the first time. Though she had no hands, she played better than all the other ghosts. To hold a name, one needs not hands but memory.

Nand's third report now went directly to the secretariat. This time he kept a copy. The site chief warned him, 'You are becoming too emotional.' Nand replied, 'If I am not to be emotional about death, should I be emotional about the bills?' The clerks laughed. There was fear inside that laughter, because those who laugh at death are often obeying someone's orders from within. Nand understood that the bridge piers were being built less from iron and cement than from lies.

At night water clinked outside his camp. He got up and went out. In the moonlight the Ganga looked white. Far away a crocodile floated motionless - neither blinking nor moving its tail. Nand felt it was watching him. Then he saw writing on its back. He went closer. The word was 'thirty'. The water stirred. A second crocodile appeared: 'three hundred'. A third: 'three thousand'. Nand stepped back. From the water came a voice: 'Not numbers. Names.'

By morning the site was full of rumours that Engineer Nand was going mad. The contractor's men said, 'Send him on leave.' A department officer said, 'Hold his file.' But Nand did not go on leave. He began asking every labourer his name one by one. Those who could write he asked to sign. Those who could not, he asked for a thumbprint. If someone was afraid even to give a thumbprint, Nand memorised his name. Nand's memory became a register. At night when he slept, the names moved through him like a train.

The ghosts in Channa Grove could now see Nand. Living people were not allowed to witness the ghosts' game, but a human witness is half a ghost. Even in broad daylight Nand's shadow sometimes walked away from his feet. He would remain at the site while the shadow travelled to Garh Narikel, stood at Ba's threshold, watched the kabaddi in Channa Grove, and returned to his feet at dawn. When Nand awoke, he would find dry leaves from the grove caught around his ankles. He could not understand how leaves from Channa Grove had reached the camp.

Meanwhile, the old story of Lattar Thakur began to be told again in the village. People said that when Kalit was a child, instead of crawling on his knees he leapt forward like a frog. People laughed, but the elders said, 'One day this child will leap across time.' Kalit learned English, saw government courts, understood the power of paper. His distant descendant Nand was now seeing the lie inside paper. One generation gained power through paper; another would fight against it. Lineages change this way in Garh Narikel: the weapon one generation lifts becomes the wound carried by the next.

News of the water-burials among crocodiles did not appear in the newspapers. The papers printed photographs of the bridge, the chief minister's speech, praise for the foreign company, 'the highway of national progress'. No photographs of the dead. No wailing of Bisesar's wife. No waiting mother of Chhotu. No report by Nand. But that night in Channa Grove the ghosts played with newspaper pages. Water began dripping from the middle of the page that carried the bridge photograph. The rakshasas increased their silver light. As the page grew wet, the photograph blurred and the faces of labourers emerged beneath it. Budhba Ghost announced, 'Tonight's game is Newspaper and Name.'

The game began. Newspaper pages flew through the air and the ghosts chased them. Whenever a page was caught, its headline broke apart and became a name. 'Development' broke into 'Bisesar'. 'Progress' into 'Chhotu'. 'National Pride' into 'Salamat'. The ghosts did not cheer; in a game of the dead there is no cheering, only remembrance. The Panidubbi tied the pages with her hair and hung them from a coconut tree. From that day, on one coconut leaf in Garh Narikel appeared a black stain like printer's ink. People said the tree was diseased. Ba said, 'No. A name has taken root.'

Nand's fourth month on the bridge was hard. Broom's Indian assistant said, 'Your reports will affect the project's funding.' Nand asked, 'Do the deaths not affect it?' The assistant smiled. 'Deaths happen in every great undertaking.' After that sentence Nand looked carefully at his face. It was a human face, but the eyes were a crocodile's. Nand understood that crocodiles did not live only in rivers. Some wore suits, some lawyers' coats, some professors' gowns, some ministers' kurtas, and some smiled from stages devoted to ethics.

That night, in the middle of the game at Channa Grove, the Brahma of the peepal suddenly spoke. 'One day the money from this bridge will become medicine. The money from that medicine will become weapons. The money from those weapons will become gambling. The money from that gambling will become court dates. Beneath those dates, names will again be buried.' The ghosts started. Hulasi asked, 'Medicine? Weapons? Gambling?' Brahma closed all four mouths. Telling the future does not prevent it; sometimes it only makes it arrive faster.

Budhba Ghost gave his ruling: 'From tonight onward, kabaddi will save not only the names of the dead but the names of the future dead.' The loth grew frightened. 'Who can know the names of people who have not yet died?' Budhba Ghost pointed above Channa Grove toward the sky. There were no stars there, only bank-account numbers shining. Some numbers travelled toward a glass tower in Hong Kong; some caught on the wall of an old law college in Meerut; some entered Bar Council oath papers; some descended into the mobile phones of young men in Garh Narikel. For the first time the ghosts were afraid of numbers. Saving a name was easy. But where was the name hidden behind a number?

Nand knew none of this future, yet a restlessness kept growing inside him. On the first page of his diary he wrote: 'If I am no longer here, save the names.' On the second: 'The crocodile eats the body, not the name.' On the third: 'Not thirty official deaths; at least three hundred.' The fourth page he left blank. During the night water fell upon it. By morning the water had dried, leaving a stain shaped like the map of Garh Narikel. Nand stared at the map. The bridge was being built across the Ganga, but the roots of the crime seemed to lead all the way to his village.

For the last time that night, the kabaddi in Channa Grove grew fierce. Bhuts, prets, rakshasas, loths, the Panidubbi, witches, the Brahma of the peepal, the water-buried labourers - all entered the same game. No boundary remained clear. The Kamala-Balan, the Ganga, Sabhagachhi, the bridge, the court, an auditorium abroad, a digital screen - each became a different corner of the playing field. Budhba Ghost stood in the middle and declared: 'Whoever died without a name will run tonight carrying a name. Whoever survived with a name will run to save names.'

Whoever cuts away a name will be caught.'

Bisesar made the first run. Chanting 'Bisesar Paswan', he crossed the line. The government seal chased him but could not catch him. Chhotu ran second, crying, 'Find my true name.' Nand's shadow ran third. The ghosts stopped. The shadow of a living man had entered the game. It said, 'Nand Aruni.' Behind it raced a dark crocodile that had emerged not from the river but from a file. The shadow barely touched the boundary and escaped.

At that very moment Nand woke on the bridge. There was uproar outside the camp. Another worker had fallen. This time at night. This time no one knew his name. Torchlight trembled across the water. The crocodiles were still, as though they had been waiting. Nand ran. The site chief shouted, 'Stop! It is dark.' Nand did not stop. Reaching the water's edge, he felt that all the ghosts in Channa Grove were calling his name at once. He swept the torch over the water. For a single instant a face appeared in the whirlpool - alive or dead, impossible to tell.

Nand could not catch him. His hand went into the water and came back empty. Yet something had snagged around his fingers - the torn corner of the labourer's gamchha. The cloth was neither red nor ochre; it had the colour paper takes when water falls upon a name that has been crossed out. Nand closed his fist around it. That night he understood: this was not merely a matter of a bridge. This was water-burial among crocodiles, and the crocodiles would come in many forms.

Before dawn the game in Channa Grove stopped. The drops on the leaves were not dew but ink. Budhba Ghost returned to his branch. Hulasi went back toward the well. The Panidubbi took the path to the pond, though Ganga silt remained caught in her hair. The loth half-closed his mouth. The rakshasas' silver light dimmed. The Brahma of the peepal whispered from all four mouths at once: 'The story has not begun; the story has been caught.'

Dawn smoke began rising at every doorway of Garh Narikel. Dogs barked. Women swept their courtyards. Children turned in their sleep. No one knew how many names had been written on the village leaves during the night. But when Ba stepped into the courtyard, she found at her threshold the same torn corner of gamchha that Nand had clenched in his fist at the bridge. She trembled. Far away the Ganga flowed. There, perhaps, crocodiles were cleaning their teeth. Here in Garh Narikel, the coconut leaves stood still.

Ba lifted the gamchha and touched it to her forehead. No tears came to her eyes. The women of Garh Narikel know that sometimes, if one weeps, a name may be washed away. Softly she said, 'Tell me the name of the one you belonged to.' The leaf did not move. But very far away, in the bridge camp, letters were sprouting on the blank fourth page of Nand's diary. The first was J. The second A. The third L. Then the ink spread. Only the ghosts of Channa Grove could read the whole word: JAL-SAMADHI - water-burial.

FOLK SONG: THE NAME IN THE CORNER OF A GAMCHHA

Folk tune: mournful Sama-Daun

O Ganga, do not wash the name away in your flowing water,

Carry the torn corner of the gamchha all the way home.

O Ganga, do not wash away my son's name,

Bring the torn corner of his gamchha home.

His foot slipped from the pier, his spinning body fell,

His mother still sits at the threshold with a lamp alight.

The crocodile chewed his bones, the paper struck out his name,

But a leaf of Channa Grove preserved his cry.

Ba held back her tears and raised the cloth to her head,

'Tell me whose you are, tell me the name' - the leaves whispered all night.

O Ganga, keep the body; return the name,

Half a name was written in the sand beside the pier,

Half lay hidden, mingled in the fold of Ganga's sari.

You who took the body shall not take the cry,

Do not let the lamp at a mother's threshold go out.

CHAPTER 2

The Village on the Right Bank

The river cuts embankments with its current; paper cuts villages with dates.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE SUN ON THE RIGHT BANK

Folk tune: Batagabani

*Come, traveller, come to the right bank,
Carry the village's full name with you as your companion.
The river may change its course; the sun still knows direction,
The village's roots, deep in the soil, still reckon where home lies.
Do not let the road of the name be lost in right and left,
Carry the threshold, the leaves, and the ancestors' teaching with you.
Kamala and Balan sing—the village travels in the mind,
No paper can cut through the embankment of affection born among its people.
The sun of the right bank descends again into the courtyard,
With the village's full name, every family is made whole.
Mustard laughs along every ridge; the fields and groves are fragrant,
The signs and tokens left by the ancestors shine at every step.
Let the storm of paper blow as hard as it may; the roots will not be torn out,
The lamp at the threshold will keep burning; the village will not be severed.*

“The river cuts embankments with its current; paper cuts villages with dates.”

“When the river eats a man's boundary ridge, paper eats his lawsuit.”

— An old saying of Garh Narikel

Ba held up the torn corner of the gamchha. The smoke of dawn had not yet spread across the whole sky. The packed earth of the courtyard was wet with the night's dew, but the gamchha seemed wetter still, as though some river had hidden its little currents inside it. Ba smelled it. There was no smell of water, no smell of silt. In that cloth lingered the smell of the hand that carries cement all day, dreams frightened dreams at night, and before dawn is entered in the register as “absent.”

In Garh Narikel, nothing existed without lineage and clan. Trees had lineages, stones had lineages, wells had lineages, even a broken sickle had one. Ba touched the gamchha to her forehead and went inside without weeping. She opened the room where the household's old papers, old sacred threads, old keys, old betel nuts, and old humiliations were all kept together. There stood a brass-latched chest. Its lock had not been opened for years, but when Ba blew upon it, it opened as though an ancestor seated within had long been waiting.

The first sound when the chest opened was not the sound of paper. It was the sound of a leaf—a coconut leaf. It was the very leaf that Lattar Thakur had dried and preserved with his own hands when Kalit was born. A turmeric stain still marked its tip. Ba placed the corner of the gamchha beneath that leaf. She understood: when a name cannot be found, place it among the ancestors; some leaf or other will stir.

From within that leaf, the village opened.

Garh Narikel was small on a map, but so vast in memory that many rivers could flow within it. The Kamala-Balan passed along its right side—so said those who stood facing Pipraghat. But the village children learned right and left not from the river but from water waist-deep in the fields. With the rains, the village changed its directions. What had been right yesterday could feel like left today when the mouth of the current turned. Yet the elders of Garh Narikel would say, “Let the current turn however it will; the village never abandons its right bank.”

The sprawling trees of Saurath's Sabha Gachhi were still alive then. Bridegrooms sat beneath the trees, pandits matched mool and gotra, and the bride's people measured with their eyes whether a head bowed properly and whether pride showed in a man's gait. The trees of Partapur cast the shade of that marriage-market all the way to Garh Narikel. When a young man of Garh Narikel set out to marry, he did not first cross the Balan. First he touched a leaf of the coconut tree at home. The leaf said, “If you go, take your name with you, not merely your body.”

The Kamala brought floods. The Balan brought calm. Together they made the village's story. When the Kamala left sand behind, pigeon-pea grew in the fields and the eyes of jackals glimmered among the stalks. Children mistook them for tigers and ran. When the rains receded, porcupines slipped into their burrows. Women saw their tracks and said, “One whose thorns are outside carries no fear within.” In this way the people of Garh Narikel learned ethics from animals and birds. Later, even when city people learned the language of contracts, affidavits, pledges, and laws, the village's true law continued to be administered by trees, currents, jackals, crocodiles, and ghosts.

Channa Grove was the village's night. By day it appeared to be no more than a dense grove. At night, the whole council of the dead assembled there: Budhba the Ghost upon his branch, Hulasi toward the well, the Panidubbi in the bottomless pond, the witches upon their little platforms, Loth with his mouth half open, and the Rakash casting silver light. Whenever a child was born in the village, the play in Channa Grove stopped. The dead listened for the footfall of the new body. They watched to see whose unfinished story the child had brought with it.

On just such a night in 1885, a child was born in Lattar Thakur's house. Outside, the currents of the Kamala-Balan were silent. No dog barked, no bull lowed. Only one leaf from the coconut tree broke gently and fell into the courtyard. The midwife said, "It is a boy." When Lattar Thakur came in, he saw that the child had been slow to open his eyes, but when he did, he looked not straight up at the thatch but toward the leaves by the doorway. The older women said, "This child will understand the language of trees." Lattar laughed. The men of his house laughed at talk of fate, because they believed fate could be mastered with land, plough, ledger, and court.

The child was named Kalit. The name was short, but it held within it the bursting of a bud. Lattar Thakur would say, "A bud that opens at the proper time becomes a flower; one that opens too soon becomes a thorn." Kalit began opening too soon. At six months he imitated sounds. If his mother said "hmm," he did not merely repeat it; he produced a "hmm" that sounded a little older than hers. If Lattar coughed, Kalit imitated the weariness behind the cough. One day, crawling on his knees, he suddenly leapt like a frog and frightened the women of the house. "The spirit of a frog is in the child," Lattar said, "A frog knows both water and earth; what is wrong with that?"

Kalit's childhood spread through every direction of the village. When he walked along the Kamala-Balan, the water seemed to rise a finger's breadth behind him. When he went near Sabha Gachhi, the voices of pandits reciting lineages and clans would pause. When he entered a pigeon-pea field, the jackals' eyes stopped flashing. He would sit fearlessly beside Channa Grove, and Budhba the Ghost would lean over his head and wonder, "Will this child be able to hear the names of the dead?" Hulasi rose from the well without her hands, but Kalit did not look that way. The dead trusted him; among the living, however, Kalit was quick and sharp.

Those were years of change. British rule was stretching its claws even into distant villages. Darbhanga, Calcutta, Patna—these names landed on the veranda of Garh Narikel like unfamiliar birds. Someone would say there was no employment without English. Someone else said abandoning Sanskrit would destroy the lineage. Another insisted that to save land one had to know the language of paper. Lattar Thakur was silent at first. Then one day he saw that the boundary ridge of a neighbouring field had shifted, while the paper still recorded the old boundary. For the first time he understood that what the soil says is not heard in court; the court hears only what the paper says.

From that day Lattar Thakur began seeking English education for Kalit. A Bengali babu was brought in. His box held pointed pens, an inkpot, sheets of paper, maps, and a small bell. When the bell rang, Kalit sat down. He grasped letters quickly. But he did not merely read them; he also smelled the deception inside them. The Bengali babu taught him to write the word "name." Kalit asked, "If a name is written wrongly, does the person change?" The babu laughed. Lattar did not. Outside, a coconut leaf stirred.

The game of names entered the house that very day. One person wrote "Lattar," another "Latar," another "Latdhar." In the land papers one form appeared, on the rent receipt another, in the school a third. Sweat rose on Lattar Thakur's forehead. At night he went to the coconut tree in the enclosure and said, "Protect my name." The tree remained silent. In Channa Grove Budhba the Ghost laughed: "Whoever wants paper to guard his name must first rear the ghost of paper."

Kalit grew. He could read English letters, write Devanagari, understand Kaithi ledgers, and remember genealogies spoken aloud by old pandits. He began opening three doors at once. Villagers came to him to have papers read. One asked, "Does this say my field belongs to me?" Another, "Has a tax been imposed on me here?" An old man asked, "Babu, is my son's name written in this?" Kalit read and explained, but slowly a strange gleam appeared in his eyes. He understood that the one who reads letters need not plough the field; the one who writes them can change the owner of a ploughed field.

Lattar Thakur was both pleased and frightened by that gleam. He saw intelligence in his child, but also a serpent behind the intelligence. At night he told his wife, "It will be hard to keep this boy straight. Among papers he is learning how a snake moves." She replied, "A snake too guards a house if it receives milk at the right time." Lattar asked, "And if it develops a taste for blood?" His wife fell silent.

Meanwhile Garh Narikel kept changing. One year the Kamala deposited so much sand that the furrows of many fields disappeared. Some trees in Partapur dried up. The bridegroom market beneath Sabha Gachhi diminished. Pulses, sugarcane, pigeon-pea, fish, makhana—all rose and fell in their own ways. Yet paper appeared more and more in people's speech. Once someone said, "My father's field." Now he said, "My grandfather's name is in the register." Once a marriage began with questions of lineage; now the ledger was examined. Once the names of the dead lived in memory; now people sought them on stones or in registers. The ghosts of Channa Grove looked at one another: the living were learning the methods of the dead.

When Kalit was twelve, he was taken to Darbhanga. For the first time he spent a night away from the village. That night there was no kabaddi in Channa Grove. Budhba the Ghost said, "The child who heard the names of the village dead will now hear the lies of the living in the city." Hulasi wept inside the well, but her weeping dissolved into the water. For one night the Panidubbi left the pond and went as far as the Balan to see whether Kalit would return. Kalit did return, but for the first time the dust on his feet smelled of the city—sweat, ink, horse-carriages, court verandas, and the pride of people who wished to change their fate by changing their language.

In the Darbhanga court, Kalit heard the word "date" for the first time in its legal sense. A man was crying out, "Another date?" He had a beard and sand in his eyes. He said his field had been in litigation for three years, and meanwhile the river had eaten it away. The clerk replied, "On paper the field still exists." The man broke down. "If the field exists on paper, shall I plough the paper?" Everyone laughed. Kalit did not. Something trembled within him. He saw that when the river eats something, paper does not acknowledge it as dead. The court's time was different from the river's time. The river cuts today; the court hears next month.

That day Kalit tried for the first time to write his father's name in exact letters. On the page he wrote: "Lattar Thakur, Garh Narikel." The handwriting was beautiful. But when the ink dried, the dot in "Garh" spread into the shape of a tiny crocodile. Kalit tried to wipe it with a finger; the stain spread. That night he dreamed that the roots of the village coconut tree had entered a sheet of paper, and a crocodile was chewing them.

Time flowed on. Kalit became a young man. Reading people's papers, he began reading their fears. The fear of someone in a land dispute was one kind; the fear of someone carrying a tax notice another; the fear of a man who found his son's name written wrongly another still. Kalit learned the language of all these fears. There was compassion in that language, and there was money to be made. He saved one person's field, arranged another's partition, wrote another's ledger. People in the village began saying, "Have Kalit Babu write the paper; the matter will endure farther." But in Channa Grove Budhba the Ghost asked, "If a man's words stand upon paper, where does his soul stand?"

Lattar grew old. His voice acquired the rasp a father's voice takes on when his son begins walking faster than he does. One evening he took Kalit to the bank of the Kamala-Balan. The flood had receded. Birds were leaving footprints in the sand. Lattar said, "Look. This will not be here tomorrow. Yet sand that can preserve a bird's footprint for even a moment is more truthful than paper. Paper preserves lies as well." Kalit remained silent. He understood that his father was warning him. But young intelligence often mistakes warning for praise.

Lattar continued, "One day a paper will come to our house soaked in water. Before you read its letters, smell it. If it smells of earth, believe it. If it smells of money, do not sign it." Kalit laughed. "Babuji, how can paper have a smell?" Lattar looked at him. Something moved in the distant water—perhaps a fish, perhaps a crocodile. "It takes a nose that can see a smell," he said, "and a nose submerged in the ink of paper can no longer smell."

Many years after that conversation, when Nand Aruni stood trembling in the bridge camp with a labourer's gamchha in his hands, this old warning came back to him though he had never heard it. Memory does not travel only through the ears; it travels through blood. Nand had never met Lattar or Kalit. Yet the same warning flowed in his veins: smell the wet paper. So when Nand looked at the official list of the dead, the numbers smelled of money to him and the corner of the page smelled of silt. He understood: this was not a list; it was the mouth of a crocodile.

Ba kept turning over the papers in the chest. One old slip emerged—half in Kaithi, half in Devanagari, with the crooked language of the old courts scattered between them. The handwriting was Kalit's. At the top was a date—the dark fortnight of Sawan. The year had blurred. Subject: "Boundary dispute." Ba could not read the letters, but she knew the faces of the household papers. She carried the slip to the doorway. As the first ray of sun fell upon it, words emerged: "Next hearing." Ba shuddered. The words were very old, but their shadow was falling on today's gamchha.

At that moment a leaf of the coconut tree stirred. From it came someone's voice: "Date." Ba answered, "Name." The leaf moved again: "Date." Ba was stubborn. "Name." The third time, the leaf fell silent. The women of Garh Narikel know that when a leaf falls silent, one cannot immediately tell whether the argument has been won or lost.

By noon the villagers had gathered. Someone had heard that Ba had found the gamchha of a bridge labourer. One person called it a bad omen. Another said Nand Babu's life was in danger. Another asked how a gamchha could reach here when the Ganga was so far away. An old villager, half deaf from always pouring oil into his ears, spoke clearly: "Wherever a name is cut away, the gamchha flies back to the village. The body stays in the river; the name searches for home." Everyone fell silent.

Aruni Nandan was a child then. He watched from beyond the threshold. He did not remember the gamchha so much as its colour. Not red, not yellow, not ochre. A colour made by mixing paper soaked in water, blood dried in sunlight, and a labourer's palm rubbed raw in dust.

Many years later in the city, returning from a film at two in the morning with his daughter, when he would see the Chief Minister's hoarding and the child would ask, "Has he died?"—the colour of that gamchha would flash inside the question too. But for now he was a child, and all of it seemed like a game of mystery.

At dusk Ba carried the gamchha and the old slip to Channa Grove. Women ordinarily did not go there at night. But Ba was no ordinary woman. She had seen so much death in her life that the ghosts counted her among their own kind. Darkness was falling at an angle through the grove. Budhba the Ghost shifted on his branch. Hulasi rose from the direction of the well. Loth tried to close his half-open mouth, as though wishing to appear polite before an elder. Ba placed the gamchha on the ground, and the slip upon it.

Ba said, "If this belongs to a name, tell me the name. If it belongs to a date, I will not accept it."

The wind circled through Channa Grove. The leaves all moved once in reverse. Kabaddi did not begin, but a circle formed like the boundary of a playing field. Budhba the Ghost descended. His feet did not touch the earth, yet dust rose. He bent over the slip. From his black body came black light. The letters shone. Ba could not read them, but she could hear. Slowly Budhba the Ghost pronounced: "Lattar Thakur and unknown boundary."

Ba asked, "Who is the unknown boundary?" Budhba the Ghost laughed. "When the river eats land and paper refuses to acknowledge it, the boundary becomes unknown. When the government eats a body and refuses to acknowledge the death, the name becomes unknown. When the court gives a date and life comes to a halt, justice becomes unknown." Ba looked at the gamchha. "Then this?" Budhba the Ghost's voice grew heavy. "This is not Lattar's lawsuit. This is Nand's first testimony."

That night Nand could not sleep in the bridge camp. Before him lay the official list—thirty names. Beside it was his own notebook—the deaths he had heard of, the deaths he had seen, the bodies the river had taken, the homes left without information. The numbers did not match. Behind thirty he saw three hundred. Behind three hundred, the shadow of three thousand. He thought: "If I add names to the list, the list will cut me away." He picked up his pen. The first line he wrote was: "Death does not occur on the day the body stops; death occurs on the day the name is removed."

Outside the camp the Ganga flowed through the night. Inside Nand flowed the Kamala-Balan. The two rivers never met, yet the silt beneath his fingernails was the same colour from both. Suddenly he remembered the ancestral story—Lattar, Kalit, the boundary dispute, the next hearing. He understood that in his family's history the court had first eaten the field; now the river was eating bodies. Yet in both places the crocodile was the same—the hunger seated inside paper.

Before dawn Nand opened the fourth page of his diary again. The night before, the fragment “jals” had surfaced there; it had now dried. The full word could be seen: “jal-samadhi”—water-burial. Beneath it, in letters so fine they looked like an ant’s trail, was written: “Begin with Garh Narikel.” Nand started. He had not written that sentence. He understood: testimony would begin not with the river, but with the village. One who has no home cannot keep a name; one who has no ancestors becomes an official number in death.

In Garh Narikel that dawn, Ba closed the chest again. The gamchha now lay between the leaf and the slip. She locked it, but did not remove the key. She left the key in the lock as though the house should be able to open itself when the next name arrived. Young Aruni watched in silence. Ba called him over, placed a hand upon his head, and said, “If ever you see a difference between paper and the heart, smell the heart. Paper can preserve a lie; the heart cannot preserve one for long.”

Aruni asked, “Whose gamchha is this?” Ba said, “The one whose name is still waiting on the road.” “How long can a name wait?” the child asked. Ba looked beyond the threshold and replied, “Sometimes five generations.”

There was no kabaddi in Channa Grove that night. The dead observed a vow of silence. Only Budhba the Ghost moved from branch to branch, as though waiting for someone. Hulasi looked at her reflection in the well and saw behind herself the faces of many labourers. The Panidubbi, combing out her long hair in the pond, drew out silt from the Ganga. The witches sat upon their platforms discussing the matter. “This time the game will be difficult. This time the crocodile is not only in the water.” For the first time Loth spoke a complete sentence: “The crocodile of paper.”

The moon rose over the village. Dew gathered on the coconut leaves, each drop round and transparent, each holding a tiny inverted world. In one drop stood Lattar Thakur. In another Kalit wrote letters. In a third Nand ran through the darkness of the bridge with a torch. In a fourth Ba closed the chest. In a fifth was Aruni, still a child, not yet understanding that the story of his lineage would one day carry him to city screens, courtroom floors, and foreign auditoriums.

Toward dawn a faint redness entered the Kamala-Balan. Some thought it was the colour of sunrise. Others thought it came from pigeon-pea blossoms. Budhba the Ghost said, “No. This is the colour of a name. When a name has been pressed down for a very long time, it first rises red.” Channa Grove fell quiet again. But it was not the quiet that comes from sleep. It was the quiet that spreads through a courthouse veranda just before a case is filed.

The next day Nand wrote an application in the bridge office. Its language was plain, but within it trembled five generations of Garh Narikel. He wrote: "A complete list of the dead labourers must be produced. Names recorded as absent must be verified. Bodies fallen into the river must be searched for. Families must be informed. Safety arrangements must be investigated." The application was short. The crime was enormous. Beneath it the government stamp was applied: RECEIVED. A date was written.

The moment the date was stamped, the paper trembled faintly. The vibration reached Nand's hand. He felt as though Budhba the Ghost were speaking in Channa Grove: "Take care. A date can be the enemy of a name, and it can also be the boat that carries a name. How you steer it is your dharma." Nand did not fold the paper. He left it open. The sheet fluttered in the wind. Far away in the waters of the Ganga, a crocodile raised its head to look and then sank again.

FOLK SONG: THE VILLAGE ON THE RIGHT BANK

Folk tune: Batagabani

O traveller, do not forget the village on the right bank,

Let the river take the ridge, but do not let it take memory.

The river cut the ridge, the paper cut the village,

Who wrote away and erased the mark of our doorway?

The Kamala turned its current, the Balan changed its path,

Mother says—the village still stands on the right bank.

The stamp of a date made the house unknown,

The coconut leaf says—the name will not be lost.

Nand stands alone, open paper in his hand,

A crocodile in the distant water, the ancestors deep behind him.

Let the river take the ridge, but do not let it take memory,

Keep alive the name of the village on the right bank.

Kamala turned, Balan turned, the doorway remained standing,

From within erased marks, the depth of the ancestors rose.

The date on the seal says—this village is unknown,

The coconut leaf says—our life is here.

CHAPTER 3

The Reckoning of the Splash

The splash of a clod falling into a well dies away, but it never stops demanding an account.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: A BOAT AMONG THE SPLASHES

Folk tune: Boatman's benediction

*O boat, move gently, carry the names across,
In the darkness of each splash, set a row of lamps.
At the sound of one splash the boatman lifts his oar,
Not the body alone—the name too must cross: he renews that vow.
Set the lamps of Bisesar, Chhotu, and Saryu in the boat,
Give the reckoning a human face; fill it with families.
However dark the current, the boat-song gives light,
A truthful list can become the first remedy for grief.
The boat will move among the splashes while the bank waits,
Dawn will come in the hope that every name reaches safety.
Waves may rise, the oar may shake, but let the heart not waver,
Let the lamps of Bisesar and Saryu not be lost in the wind.
At every landing a mother waits with her sari-end spread,
When the boat of names reaches shore, she sings an auspicious song.*

“Whoever dies without a name has a soul that wanders through government verandas.”

— A voice from Channa Grove

Nand's application lay open on a table in the project office the next morning. The violet circle of the government stamp at the corner of the sheet still shone as though wet, as if the ink had not yet dried, as if some river inside it were still carrying a little current. The word RECEIVED sat upon it like a fat crocodile that had climbed out of the water to bask on the sand—untroubled, satisfied, waiting for the next turn of its hunger. Nand watched from a distance. He felt that if the sheet were folded now, every name inside it would suffocate and die—a second death, quieter than the first, and more final.

The office stood in a temporary building on the right side of the bridge. Tin roof, dust underneath, maps spread in the middle, empty lime and cement sacks in a corner, and on one wall the gleaming board of a foreign company. The board read: "Human safety is our first pledge." The letters were in Devanagari, but the gait of the sentence was foreign. It was as though the soul of the statement lived in another country and only its shadow had been hung here—a shadow cold to the touch, with no warmth anywhere inside it.

Beneath the board were three photographs. The first was a coloured rendering of the future bridge across the river: blue sky, straight road, smiling workers—smiles practised for a camera, not for life. The second showed the state minister on inauguration day. The third was of the father of Edward Broom, chairman of the foreign Broom & Halden Group, who had once raised his hat while praising India's development. Behind him in the photograph stood a snow-covered European building; before him lay the pages of a speech on the safety of Indian workers. Nand looked at the picture and understood how often a lie arrives first in a beautiful frame—the smoother the frame, the deeper the lie within.

The head clerk, Diwakar Lal, picked up the application. He did not smell the paper; he merely turned the page. Those who do not smell paper often measure its weight instead. Diwakar Lal measured the weight. A calculation moved behind his eyes: how many files this application would open, how many officers' names would surface, how many signatures would tremble, and how many more envelopes of tea-money would be required. It was the calculation of a weather forecaster measuring the movement of clouds while caring nothing for the actual thirst for rain, only for the sheet on which the forecast was written.

"Nand Babu," he said, "the language here has become a little harsh."

"Death is harsh," Nand replied.

Diwakar Lal smiled. "One should use the word death with care. Many people leave the worksite without permission. The river is nearby, their villages are far away, wages are low. People leave."

Inside Nand, the night in Channa Grove moved. Bisesar Paswan, Chhotu whose real name had never been found, the splash in the night, the torn corner of the gamchha—all rose together and began to speak, as though voices silent for years had opened their mouths at once. Quietly he said, "A person who leaves on foot leaves footprints. A person who falls into the water leaves a splash. A person whose name is cut away leaves silence. It is the office's duty to distinguish among the three."

Diwakar Lal turned the page. "We'll send it upward."

"How far upward?" Nand asked.

The clerk laughed. "There are many levels of 'up' in government. The higher we send it, the longer it takes to come back down."

For the first time Nand saw the real teeth of the date inside that laugh. The court was still far away, but dates were already being bred in the office—like a small snake that had already emerged from its egg without anyone knowing or seeing it, yet with all the power of its future hiss stored intact within it.

That day there was an inspection meeting. Project chief Shashibhushan Dev, safety officer Mahendra Pathak, foreign consultant Victor Halden, and two officers from the state department sat around a long table. On it were tea, biscuits, maps, gleaming measuring instruments, and one thick safety register. Its cover was blue, its pages white, and the ink gathered along their edges was so black it looked as though a crocodile had rubbed its mouth there all night.

Victor Halden understood little Hindi. He spoke in English; an interpreter softened his sentences into Hindi. When Halden said, “The casualty figures are manageable,” the interpreter said, “The situation is under control.” When he said, “Local bodies take greater labour risk,” the interpreter said, “The workers do not follow rules.” When he said, “The list should be kept limited,” the interpreter said, “The records should remain clean.” Language, flowing like a river, wore down the bones of meaning—just as water slowly rounds a stone until its angles, its identity, its original shape have nearly disappeared.

Nand stood. “A record is clean only when it is complete.”

Silence spread across the table. Shashibhushan Dev removed his spectacles and wiped them with a handkerchief, as though invisible dust were obstructing his sight. Mahendra Pathak placed a hand on the safety register as though, if the book suddenly came alive, he would clamp its mouth shut. Victor Halden looked at the interpreter. The interpreter did not translate Nand’s sentence. He merely smiled and said, “There are some local concerns.”

“Local?” Nand trembled inwardly. Was the Ganga local? Were the labourers local? Was death local? The foreign company’s profit was global, but the fallen body was local? The question rose in his chest like lightning cracking through a sheet of thin glass—invisible from outside, yet weakening the whole structure within. He thought all this, but aloud said only, “The death of a person who climbs the bridge foundations is a death within the project. It cannot be made small by calling it local.”

Shashibhushan Dev’s voice hardened. “Nandji, you are becoming emotional. If an engineer becomes emotional, bridges are not built.”

Nand replied, “If he does not, he cannot understand what is being buried inside the foundations.”

The meeting did not end abruptly, but its soul got up and left. Papers continued to move, conversation continued, tea grew cold, crumbs of biscuit spread on the table, yet everyone understood that Nand was no longer merely an engineer. He had become an inconvenient witness—the kind who can neither be fully silenced nor fully heard, and whose very presence becomes a permanent discomfort.

That afternoon Nand went to the workers' settlement. Behind the bridge camp stood rows of makeshift shelters of bamboo and tarpaulin. When rain came the roofs leaked; when the hot wind blew the tarpaulin burned like fire. People lived there from Bihar, Odisha, Bengal, Assam, the Nepal border, Bundelkhand, and countless unnamed places. Some were known by caste, some by village, some only by a bodily feature—Lame One, Fair One, Thin One, Chhotu, Boatman, Bearded Man, Outsider. These names were not identities; they were marks of the absence of identity, as though society had not even taken the trouble to give names to its hardest-working hands.

Nand went from shelter to shelter. At first people were afraid. Engineers usually came to measure things, not to measure the look in a labourer's eyes. Nand kept asking, "Bisesar Paswan's home?" A woman whose vermilion had dried in the sun until it looked like earth said quietly, "Home? What home is here? This is tarpaulin." There was no complaint in her voice—only a fact so old that it had forgotten even how to be sorrowful.

"Where is he?"

The woman neither laughed nor cried. She looked into her palm as though Bisesar's face had been written there and she could no longer read it clearly. "Three days ago he went up on the foundation. Then—water."

"The office says he left the job and went away."

This time the woman's eyes rose—once, and with such sharpness that Nand stepped back. "If he had gone away, he would have taken his shoes. Look." From a corner of the shelter she brought out a pair of torn shoes. Cement dust had settled inside them, and in that dust was a shape as though a foot still lived there, only invisible. "If the shoes are here, the feet are in the river."

Nand kept looking at the shoes. He felt that every road on earth had stopped inside them—the road Bisesar never completed, the journey abandoned halfway. He opened his notebook and wrote the name: Bisesar Paswan. The woman asked, "If you write a name, does the person come back?" Nand's throat dried. "He does not come back," he said, "but he does not disappear." The answer felt incomplete even to him, yet in that moment he could say nothing more truthful.

In the next shelter lived the companions of the labourer everyone called Chhotu. No one knew his real name. He used to say, "In my village they call me Bhola; here they call me Chhotu." In the attendance register he was “Chhotu”; in the payment register, “Chandresh”; in the safety register, “irregular labourer”; in the accident list, no name at all. Nand asked, “His father?” No one knew. “Village?” Three different answers came. “Age?” Everyone was silent. Chhotu had fallen into the river, but the river had not washed away his entire identity; the office had cut it away beforehand—four names, four lies, and one human being who could still not be fully known, in death or in life.

That evening Nand made a separate page in his notebook: “Incomplete Names.” First line: Chhotu alias Bhola? alias Chandresh? Father unknown. Village to be traced. Death witnessed. Body not found. No shoes. No gamchha. Only a splash.

The ink kept spreading across that page, as though Chhotu himself could not decide on his name, as though his soul still refused to accept any one of the four and therefore could not settle even upon paper.

As evening fell, the bridge foundations in the dark looked less like pillars than shrines, each one a silent statue of the dead. The labourers returned in lines. Food was cooked—rice, salt, chilli, sometimes lentils, sometimes only hot water. Children cried between the tarpaulins. Women silently rubbed oil into wounds. Men coughed. Far away in the officers’ camp a generator ran, fans turned, a radio played. It sang songs of development—bright melodies whose words never reached the labourers’ shelters, as though distance could not bear their weight.

At night the watchman Bholaram woke Nand. “Babu, would you like to see?”

“What?”

“Lights in the water.”

Nand came outside. The river was black. Yet beneath the third foundation a faint light was indeed rising. At first he thought it must be a fisherman’s lantern, but the light came from within the water. Nand went to the edge. In that glow he saw many hands under the surface, reaching upward, as though trying to sign some invisible attendance register one last time, trying to record their presence before it was erased.

Bholaram whispered, “It used to frighten me. Now I see it every day. Whoever falls becomes a light for the first three nights. On the fourth night the crocodile eats him. Then the light stops.”

A shiver ran through Nand. “Did you report this?”

Bholaram spat. “Report? The first man I told said gas comes out of the water. The second said, do you want your job or do you want ghosts? From the third time onward I kept quiet.” There was no bitterness in his voice—only a tired acceptance that had understood long ago that not every cry is heard.

Nand watched the water for a long time. A face emerged in the light. Bisesar? No. Chhotu? No. The face kept changing until it became a face that could belong to anyone—as though the river had gathered every death into one face, as though individuality itself were too precious a thing for water to preserve completely. From that universal face came a voice: “Name.”

Nand knelt. “Tell me.”

A round ripple rose in the water. A crocodile's eye shone. The voice came again: “Before you write a name, you must learn to listen.”

That night Nand began practising how to hear names from the river. He placed his ear against his papers, kept his eyes on the water, and held Channa Grove inside himself. The names did not come clearly. Sometimes “Bholai,” sometimes “Balai,” sometimes “Badri,” sometimes “Nazir,” sometimes “Saryu,” sometimes “Muniya.” He started. “Muniya?” Bholaram said, “Yes, Babu. Women carry loads too. In the register their names are attached to their husbands; they are not listed as separate workers.”

Heat rose to Nand's head. A woman's body did the work, yet her name did not exist in the ledger. Children carried water, handled sacks, picked bricks, yet the register said “family.” If one of them died, the office could say: “Not employed.” Such killing begins before death—on the very first page of paperwork, where a living woman is erased in advance, without even being granted the chance to die.

The next day Nand demanded to see the safety register. Mahendra Pathak stalled. “Higher permission is required.” Nand said, “Death does not require permission.” Mahendra's face reddened. At last the register came. Its pages were beautiful. Dates, inspections, signatures, remarks: “Safety helmets distributed,” “Ropes checked,” “Work stopped during rain,” “Night work prohibited.” Nand went outside. No helmets on the workers' heads. Frayed ropes. Work in the rain. Work at night.

Behind every lie in the register Nand heard a splash—as though each beautiful sentence on paper carried a drowned truth beneath the water, and that truth tirelessly gnawed at the words above it from within.

Nand examined the signatures. In many places they had been made by the same hand. Workers' names differed, but thumbprints had the same colour, the same roundness. In the payment register, wages had been withdrawn for Bisesar on the day he died. Even after death, the labourer was collecting wages—on paper. Nand's vision blurred. He thought: the crocodile eats the body, but the office eats the dead body's wages as well. Even after death it preserves the illusion of the man's existence, because a living name on paper is more convenient than a dead one.

News of this inquiry spread quickly. That evening project chief Shashibhushan Dev called Nand into his room. Cold air moved there. On the table stood a glass of lemon water and a thick envelope. In a weary voice Shashibhushan Dev said, "Nandji, you are a capable engineer. You have a future. What do you gain by becoming involved in all this?"

Nand said nothing.

"It is a foreign company. The matter reaches the Centre. The prestige of the state is involved. If the bridge stops, the newspapers will call us anti-development. The deaths of labourers are tragic, but such things happen in projects like this. What will you do by making a list? Will the dead return?"

Nand remembered Bisesar's shoes. "No," he said. "But those who are lying can be stopped."

Shashibhushan Dev slid the envelope toward him. "A little expense money. You have a family. A village. You will have children. Life is long."

For the first time Nand did not become angry. He did not even open the envelope. He lifted it, held it to his nose, then placed it back on the table. "It smells of money," he said softly. "My ancestors left me a rule: if wet paper smells of money, do not sign it."

Shashibhushan Dev's face changed. "You listen to too many stories. Be careful. The river is deep."

"I know," Nand said. "An office is deeper than a river."

The first threat came that night. On Nand's bed he found a small piece of paper: "Stop writing names. The crocodile is hungry." The letters were crooked, but the ink was fresh. Nand did not fold the paper. He pasted it into his diary. Underneath he wrote: "Threat received. Meaning: the names are moving in the right direction." As he wrote the line, his hand trembled slightly, but it was not the trembling of fear; it was the first stirring of a new resolve.

That night kabaddi began again in Channa Grove. Budhba the Ghost was referee, the Panidubbi marked the boundary, and the witches were no longer spectators but strategists. Loth, who always watched with his mouth half open, entered the field this time. His feet hovered a finger's breadth above the earth, yet dust rose. He did not chant "kabaddi." He chanted: "Safety register, attendance register, payment register." The ghosts did not laugh. The game was serious.

Hulasi came forward from the team of spirits. She had no hands, but her voice was fierce. Crossing the boundary she said, "If a woman's name is lost inside her husband's, whose death is her death?" The Panidubbi drew a line with her long hair. The Rakash illuminated the leaves with silver light. One by one the names of women labourers appeared: Muniya, Saryu, Phulkali, Rajni, Jamuna, Dhanesari. Whether they were living or dead no one knew. But their names had appeared.

Any name that appeared on a coconut leaf in Garh Narikel reached Nand's diary by dawn. The next morning he found not the fourth but a fifth page damp. Six women's names were written upon it. Nand understood at once: death in this project was not only in the water; it was also in invisible labour—work society did not wish to see, and therefore did not even give the language of its ledgers a means to see it.

That day Nand demanded a separate attendance list for women workers. The office laughed. Mahendra Pathak said, "They are family members, not employees." Nand replied, "If there is a sack on her head, she is an employee. If she climbs the foundation, she is an employee. If she can die by falling, she is an employee." Diwakar Lal said quietly, "That language is not in the rules." Nand answered, "Then fill the rules with water."

After that sentence Nand's isolation became complete. The officers kept their distance from him. The foreign consultant began calling him an "emotional local." The workers began calling him "Naam-Babu"—Babu of Names. At night Bholaram silently left tea for him, saying nothing and expecting nothing, simply standing as a mute witness. Bisesar's wife cleaned his shoes and kept them outside the tarpaulin as though her husband might one day return to wear them. Chhotu's companions sent letters to their villages trying to discover his real name. Crocodiles appeared less often in the water, though whether they were less hungry or merely more cunning, no one knew.

A few days later an inquiry committee arrived. Motorcars, white helmets, gleaming shoes. It came during the day, when the river was calm. The workers had been warned beforehand: no one was to speak of deaths, no one was to mention night work, no one was to show the ropes on the foundations. Bisesar's wife was sent away from the camp. Chhotu's companions were placed on another shift. Safety helmets were distributed for the first time that day. Cameras turned. Officers smiled. The report stated: "Arrangements satisfactory."

Nand read the report. The words shone, but behind their shine he saw the lights rising in the waters of the Ganga. In his own hand he wrote along the margin: "How many splashes lie behind the word satisfactory?" Shashibhushan Dev drew a red-pencil line through the remark. It looked like a throat being cut.

That night heavy rain fell. The river swelled. On paper there was an order to stop work on the third foundation, but in reality the work continued. Pressure had come from above: deadline. A letter from the foreign company threatened penalties for delay. The state minister had already fixed the inauguration date. The bridge's iron lattice shook in the floodwater. Labourers climbed with lanterns. Ropes were wet; feet slipped. Nand ran toward them. "Stop the work!"

Noise, rain, wind, the clatter of iron, the roar of water. His voice broke halfway. One labourer screamed from above. Another went to catch him. Both slipped. A third rope snapped. One body struck iron; another went straight into the water. The splash was so great that for one instant the rain itself seemed to fall silent, as though the sky had heard the sound and been stunned.

Nand tried to jump into the river. Bholaram grabbed him. "Babu—the crocodiles!" Nand broke free. He ran to the edge. In the beam of a torch one hand appeared, then vanished. Nand shouted, "Name!" His voice drowned in the rain. Whether the answer came from beneath the water or through the wind, Nand could not tell: "Saryu."

Saryu? A woman? Had one of the bodies that fell that night been a woman? The office list would say: "No women employed." Nand felt his chest tear open. He waded knee-deep into the water. A crocodile's eyes shone before him. For one moment the crocodile and Nand looked directly at each other. Nand felt that the animal did not wish to eat him; it wished only to see whether this time the name would survive—as though it too, in its own fashion, were an unwilling judge of the game.

At dawn an official notice was prepared: "Work temporarily disrupted due to excessive rainfall. No major loss." Nand tore it up. For the first time he tore a government paper. The pieces fell to the ground, and a drop of water came to rest on each one. In every drop was a face. Nand gathered all the fragments and placed them in his diary.

Now he understood that an application was not enough. A list was not enough. There was no place for truth inside the office. Truth would have to be made by bringing together the river, the village, the dead, the labourers, the women, the shoes, the gamchha, the threats, and the torn notice. That night he opened a new page in his diary and wrote at the top: "The Reckoning of the Splash."

First name—Bisesar Paswan.

Second—Chhotu; real name to be found.

Third—Saryu, woman labourer, officially nonexistent.

After that the page seemed to fill itself. Nand went on writing. Outside, the river went on flowing. Inside Channa Grove, kabaddi continued. And all night the coconut leaves of Garh Narikel trembled as though each leaf had become a testimony ready to fly to the courthouse veranda—waiting, impatient, hungry to have the names heard, as though even the leaves could find no peace until they had heard them.

FOLK SONG: THE NIGHT THAT COUNTS THE SPLASHES

Folk tune: Boatman's biraha

*Count, Babu—not the splashes, count the families,
Hear the whole world weeping behind a single name.
One splash Bisesar, the second Chhotu's name,
The third was Saryu drowning—who will count this burning sun?
The register says absent, the river says mine,
Mother says evening has fallen—why has he not come home?
The torn notice flies, the shoes drip through the night,
In Nand's blue ink every voice awakens.
Leaf after leaf becomes testimony and flies toward the veranda,
The hungry names of the dead demand what was promised them.
Count the splashes, Babu—not the bodies, count the families,
Behind a single name an entire world weeps.
Evening fell, the door opened, but he did not come home.
In lines of blue ink every voice awakened,
The hungry names of the dead demand their dawn.*

CHAPTER 4

Thirty Names, Three Hundred Corpses

Thirty names in the register, three hundred bodies in the earth—the burden of the ghat is always borne by the dead.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: COUNT THE NAMES, SAVE THE LIVES

Folk tune: a mournful jhumar of awakening

*Count them, sister, count every name,
Not thirty—count the places of three hundred lamps.*

*Do not stop counting at thirty, while so many leaves still tremble;
Behind every number are a home, a mother, a dream.
Count the names with reverence, join each life to its story;
Break the wall of the little list and open the whole truth.*

*When three hundred lamps are lit, darkness will fall back;
One honest count can make a road toward justice.
Count the names, save the lives, let every number become human;
From a full accounting of truth, sow a new order.*

*To the rhythm of jhumar, courtyard after courtyard wakes;
The curtain of numbers tears, and faces come into view.
Let the full account return to every house laid waste;
Let the worth of every tear shed by a mother be restored.*

Saryu's name was in the third line. Nand kept looking at it. The letters trembled like a woman's body. The paper seemed to say, 'Write me down, or I shall turn into water again.'

At dawn he woke Bholaram. 'Did you know Saryu?'

Bholaram was silent at first. Watchmen hear many things but say little—as though listening, not speaking, were their trade. Tightening the gamchha around his head, he said, 'Saryu? Yes, there was one. But she was not in the register.'

'Why?'

'Because her husband had died earlier. She began carrying sacks in his place. His name remained on the rolls. She took the wages; his name consumed them. If she died, the office would say—the husband had already gone back to his village.'

Nand realised that dead men could remain alive on paper while living women were kept dead upon it. This was an official miracle requiring no mantra, only a seal—and a seal was crueller than a mantra because it never asked a question; it asked only for a signature.

That day, for the first time, Nand counted not the workers' names but their belongings. Bisesar's shoe. A torn corner of Chhotu's gamchha. Saryu's silver bangle, which had not fallen with her but remained caught on a bamboo pole of the tarpaulin. The broken slate of Muniya's child. Dhanesari's brass bowl. Nand understood: when names are cut away, objects testify. Objects do not lie because they possess no language, only presence—and presence is the most solid evidence of all.

He carried the objects to the office and placed them on the table. Divakar Lal wrinkled his nose the moment he saw the shoe. 'What have you brought here?'

'Evidence.'

'A shoe is evidence?'

'When the foot cannot be found, its shoe is evidence.'

Divakar Lal kept opening and closing the cap of his pen. It made a tuk-tuk sound, like a small hammer striking a coffin. 'The rules do not work like this. For a death you need a body, a witness, a report.'

Nand said, 'Crocodiles do not write reports.'

Divakar Lal did not laugh. He understood that Nand was moving outside the ordinary language of files. An office quickly begins to regard as dangerous anyone who abandons the language of rules and starts listening to the language of the river—for rules can be understood, but the river cannot.

By noon the news had reached the project chief. By evening a departmental telegram arrived. It contained three lines: 'Death list to be kept limited. Rumours to be controlled. Progress of work not to be obstructed.' Nand read it and thought: in the language of government, the names of the dead first become 'rumour', then 'obstruction', then 'anti-development'—three words, three shells, and always the same corpse inside.

The foreign consultant, Victor Halden, was in very good spirits that day. Someone had telephoned him from Calcutta. Again and again he said, 'The report must remain clean. The insurance company asks questions. The bank asks questions. Investors ask questions.' Nand listened. For the first time he understood that the bridge was not being built merely across a river. It was being built between banks, insurance, foreign capital, a minister's speech, an officer's promotion, and a labourer's hunger. If this bridge broke, the prestige of those above would collapse; those below were already collapsing—year after year, without anyone taking notice, like the corner of an old wall bending slowly until one evening the whole wall falls.

That night the rules of kabaddi changed in Channa Grove. Budhba Ghost said, 'From today, whoever is caught will not be asked his name but his reckoning.' The rakshasas cast their light. The pretts formed the teams. The Panidubbi spread her hair along the boundary. The witches flew up and sat above. For the first time the loth filled his half-open mouth with a word: 'Thirty.'

'Thirty?' Hulasi asked.

'The office will say thirty. The river will say three hundred.'

The wind stopped in Channa Grove. The old people of Garh Narikel say that when the wind dies and not a leaf moves, sometimes the dead begin to count. That night the counting began. One, two, three—the leaves trembled. Four, five, six—the Panidubbi's hair began searching for water. Seven, eight, nine—the Brahma in the peepal tree opened his eyes. At thirty an official voice came: 'Enough.' But the count did not stop. Thirty-one, thirty-two, thirty-three—now the voices rose from inside the river, as though the counting itself had changed direction and was no longer descending from above but rising from below.

Nand heard the echo of that count inside his chest. He did not sleep. Bent over his diary, he wrote as names seemed to rise from dreams and settle on the nib of his pen. Some were complete, some partial, some only a caste, some only a village, some only a nickname. By dawn there were forty-nine names. On the third day, seventy-two. Within a week, one hundred and seven. Beside each name he placed a sign—a shoe, a gamchha, a bangle, a slate, a song, a cough, a scar, a laugh, frightened eyes. Each sign was a fragment of a life, and Nand tried to join the fragments into a whole human being—without yet knowing that wholeness was impossible; only respect was possible.

But the official list of the dead was made—thirty.

Thirty names were typed on clean paper. Beside each stood a serial number, father, village, estimated age, compensation status. When Nand saw the list, he understood that official paper does not kill the dead; it beautifies them. That beauty contained the greatest violence—a violence showing no blood, only orderly columns and a clean font. Bisesar Paswan was on the list, but his father's name was wrong. Chhotu was not. Saryu was not. Muniya was not. Dhanesari was not. Those whose labour lived in women's bodies became 'family' on paper. Those whose bodies went into the water became 'absent'.

Nand took the list into Shashibhushan Dev's room. 'This is incomplete.'

Shashibhushan Dev looked tired, but there was no fear in that fatigue, only boredom—the boredom born of hearing the same argument too many times. 'Nandji, a government committee has already investigated. The insurance company agrees. Compensation to families has been released. What more do you want?'

'The truth.'

'The truth?' Shashibhushan Dev leaned back in his chair. 'Truth is not a subject of project management. Truth is a philosophical word. We are constructing public works.'

Nand's voice was low but sharp. 'A foundation filled with corpses is not construction. It is a tomb.'

The room shuddered at the sentence. Outside, the generator's noise seemed to catch for an instant. Victor Halden, smoking by the window, turned around. The interpreter would explain the meaning to him later, but he understood the tone at once—for some sentences need no translation in their sound; they travel straight from the ear to the chest.

'You are crossing your limits,' Shashibhushan Dev said.

Nand thought—limits? The river's limit? The office's? The dead's? Like the Panidubbi's hair, this boundary too was alive, ready to coil around a foot and drag whoever touched it inward. He said, 'When the boundary itself has drowned, how can crossing it be forbidden?'

After that day Nand's file was kept in a separate cupboard. A lock was placed on it. Dust never settled on the lock because every day someone opened it, looked inside, and closed it again. The papers breathed within. Sometimes at night the lock trembled. The watchman said, 'Babu, a sound comes from inside.' The office said, 'Rats.' Nand said, 'Names.' Three interpretations of the same sound—and each showed how a listener divides the world according to his fear, his convenience, and his truth.

The day compensation was distributed, the place was crowded like a fair: officials' tables, the minister's representative, press photographers, police lathis, and the families of the dead. Families of the thirty names on the list were called forward. Those not on it remained standing in the crowd. Bisesar's wife was there too. She was given an envelope because Bisesar was on the list. Before accepting it she asked, 'Where is Chhotu?'

The officer started. 'Take your compensation.'

'Where is Saryu?'

'What is your name?'

She said, 'I am Bisesar's wife. But Bisesar did not fall alone. Did he leave space in the water for the others? Where are Chhotu, Saryu, Muniya?' There was no shriek in her voice—only a question, so direct that it could not be brushed aside.

A policeman stepped forward. Nand moved between them. 'The question is valid.'

The policeman smirked. 'Valid? Is this a court?'

Nand replied, 'Wherever the family of a dead person stands, a court begins.'

No one in the press heard that sentence. At that moment the camera was focused on the minister's representative smiling. The photograph appeared the next day under the headline: 'Assistance to Families of Accident Victims.' In the photograph Bisesar's wife looked as though she were smiling because, at the instant the shutter clicked, sunlight struck her eyes and she narrowed them. In the world of newspapers, even squinting becomes a smile—as though distinguishing between grief and light were no longer an editorial duty.

Nand pasted the newspaper cutting into his diary and wrote beneath it: 'Sometimes a lie becomes a photograph.'

Soon he received his transfer order. A small sheet. Dry language. 'For administrative reasons.' Nand laughed. For administrative reasons the river grows deep; for administrative reasons the crocodile remains hungry; for administrative reasons women workers are not entered by name; for administrative reasons the truth itself is transferred.

Carrying the order, he went to the Ganga. The water was grey. The bridge pier stood half-built. Workers watched from a distance. No one spoke. Bisesar's wife came from her hut carrying the shoe. 'Take this with you,' she said.

'It is yours,' Nand replied.

'If I keep it, the police will say I stole it. If you keep it, it will become a document.'

Nand took the shoe. In that instant he felt it was not Bisesar's shoe alone but the foot of the whole people who had taken water-burial. He did not put it in his bag. He let it hang from his hand. Let the people see. Let the office see. Let the river see. Let the crocodile see.

Before he left that night, Bholaram gave him an envelope. 'I cannot write. But the workers spoke the names. You will be able to read them.'

Inside the envelope was no paper: coloured threads, a piece of glass bangle, a button, a child's pencil, a rotting ticket, some ash, and a small copper amulet. Nand understood—when people cannot write, objects become an alphabet. He held the envelope to his chest as though a second heart were beating there, and its beat mattered more than his own.

The night he returned to Garh Narikel, Ba was sitting at the door. He did not need to tell her anything. She saw the shoe, the envelope, Nand's eyes, and understood that her son had returned not merely from a job but from the water. She went inside, placed a lamp by the tulsi, and said softly, 'The dead have come into the house. Prepare a seat.'

Nand asked, 'Ba, how did you know?'

Ba did not smile. 'People of Garh Narikel need no paper to understand. If a shoe returns alone, assume a whole crowd is walking behind it.'

That night a strange assembly took place in the courtyard. No one saw it with the eyes, but everyone heard it. The coconut leaves read one name after another. Ba answered 'Present' between them. Nand sat with his diary open. Names that had been unclear became distinct in the rustle of leaves. Chhotu's real name perhaps had never been Bhola Chandresh; it emerged as 'Bholatun', from a village across the river that had disappeared from government maps two years earlier in a flood. Saryu was not an 'employee', yet she worked in 'Pier Shift Three'. Muniya was pregnant. Dhanesari carried sacks at night after putting her child to sleep beneath the tarpaulin.

Nand kept writing. Writing names was no longer an engineer's task; it had become a shraddha. But this shraddha was not an offering of pindas. It was a lawsuit.

A few days later Nand went to the district headquarters. Lawyers' offices, typewriters, seals, stamps, tea, heat, sweat. For the first time he wanted to prepare a petition. The lawyer, Devkinandan Chaube, grew tired while reading the file. 'Three hundred names? Babu, the court will ask for proof.'

Nand opened his bag. Shoe, bangle, broken glass bangle, amulet, pencil, clipping, copy of the safety register, pages from the wage book, threat letter. The lawyer was uneasy at first, then fell silent. He asked, 'What shall we call all this in court?'

'Remnants of names.'

'The law does not listen like that.'

'Then teach the law to listen.'

At that moment Devkinandan Chaube felt both respect and fear for Nand. He drafted the petition: 'Revision of death list; independent inquiry; recognition of women labourers; compensation fraud; neglect of safety.' The words were heavy. With every strike of the typewriter it seemed a hammer was falling upon a crocodile's teeth.

The case was filed. The first date was set—two months later. Nand came out and neither laughed nor wept. He remembered the kabaddi of Channa Grove. Once a player crosses the line in the game, he has to hold his breath. Perhaps the first court date was the beginning of that breath.

Two months later came the hearing. The court veranda was crowded: farmers, traders, wives, husbands, police, accused men, sadhus, contractors, files. Each stood carrying his own truth. A fan turned inside the judge's room. The clerk called cases. Nand's number came. The government lawyer stood. 'We need time. The records have to be summoned.' The date was adjourned.

Outside, Devkinandan Chaube said, 'It is normal.'

Nand asked, 'Normal for the dead?'

Chaube was silent.

At the second date the government record did not arrive. At the third the judge was on leave. At the fourth the lawyers were on strike. At the fifth the project file had 'mistakenly' gone to another department. At the sixth it was said that 'the question of death requires technical expertise'. At the seventh the foreign company's lawyer appeared—smooth coat, smooth language, smooth lie. He said, 'The petitioner is an emotional engineer aggrieved by his transfer.'

That day Nand understood that in court a person's character is killed before the person himself—no bullet, no knife, only an adjective driven into the public ear as deeply as any weapon.

That night the coconut leaves in Garh Narikel shook violently. In Channa Grove the kabaddi game was stopped midway. Budhba Ghost announced, 'Dates eat names.' The Panidubbi asked, 'Who will save them?' Hulasi said, 'Whoever writes the names on leaves.' The loth, now half a player, rose an inch above the ground and said, 'The crocodile of dates lives in the court.'

That night Nand dreamed of a courtroom. A crocodile sat in the judge's chair. The clerk called dates: 'One splash, two splashes, three splashes.' Lawyers wore coats made of river water. At each objection, one dead person's name grew faint. Nand ran to catch the names, but they slipped into the water. Then Ba spoke from one side: 'Names are not caught. Names are repeated.'

At dawn Nand called the village children and taught them to read the names. Bisesar. Saryu. Muniya. Dhanesari. Bholatun. Badri. Nazir. Phulkali. The children laughed at first because the names were unfamiliar. Slowly they found a rhythm. Along the village footpaths, by the pond, at the dry place of Sabhagachhi, against the school wall, children began repeating the names in play—as though a folk song were being born without singer or composer, compelled into existence by necessity alone.

The government list stopped at thirty. The children of Garh Narikel carried the count to three hundred.

This was Nand's first victory—not in court, but in the village's memory. Yet the system soon learns that nothing is more dangerous than memory. A few days later a policeman came from the station. 'Are you inciting the children?' he asked. Nand laughed. 'Is reading names an incitement?' The policeman had no answer. He had brought an order, not a meaning.

That same evening Nand received a second threat—this time not on ordinary paper, but tucked inside Bisesar's shoe. A small slip read: 'Count beyond thirty and your own name will be added.' Nand showed it to Ba. She did not throw it into the fire. She buried it in the tulsi pot. 'A threat buried in the earth becomes evidence,' she said.

Time passed. The bridge kept rising. The court kept postponing. The official list, printed at thirty, slept in a file. Nand's list kept growing. Some names uncertain, some confirmed, some tied to objects, some to dreams. He made three copies of his diary: one with Ba, one with Devkinandan Chaube, one buried beneath the roots of an old peepal by the river. Ba asked, 'Why keep the third copy near the water?'

Nand said, 'Those whom the water took should have their copy near the water.'

Ba was silent for a while. Then she said, 'Rivers remember everything, but they take their time to speak.'

By the end of the year, the bridge had risen into the sky. The minister fixed a date for its inauguration. Newspapers announced, 'A New Chapter of Development.' Nand watched from afar. It seemed to him that a name hung from every iron rod, trembling in the wind. The inaugural ribbon was red—red as blood. The minister cut it. The crowd applauded. The river was silent. The crocodile was silent. Nand too was silent.

But within that silence one voice kept swelling: 'Not thirty. Three hundred.'

The chapter had not ended; only the file had been closed. The moment a file closes, a story begins its second life. Nand did not yet know it, but one day his 'Reckoning of the Splash' would open on Gop Kumar's laptop, reach Satyavrat Mehta's desk, steal sleep from Batuknath Hariharan, and light an unnamed glow in the signal-filled darkness of Chandrapal Batra—like a small lamp that, even when thought extinguished, lifts its wick once more against the dark.

That night kabaddi began again in Channa Grove. This time, as the ghosts crossed the boundary, they spoke one word: 'Court.' The prets answered: 'Date.' The rakshasas kept casting light. The loth did not laugh. The Panidubbi gathered in her hair, as though she knew that people were now going to drown not in water but in paper.

FOLK SONG: THIRTY WRITTEN, THREE HUNDRED WEeping

Folk tune: mournful jhumar

Ask, O earth, ask beneath the leaf of development,
'Thirty written, three hundred weeping'—understand the reckoning.

Thirty names on paper, three hundred without a pyre,
The hearths of three hundred homes went cold without smoke.
A red ribbon was cut, applause sounded at the ghat,
Inside the pier the labourers' night still groans.
The colour of blood flashed in the minister's ribbon,

The crying of mothers and children slipped beneath the newspaper.
'Not thirty, three hundred'—the wind keeps humming,
A little lamp of names breaks open the dark.
The bridge may stand, but the earth will ask the question—
How many bodies are buried beneath the leaf of development?

The red ribbon was cut at the ghat; applause echoed far,
Inside the pier the night groaned—who heard that sound?
The newspaper page slid away; the weeping remained beneath it,
A single small flame will now break this darkness.

CHAPTER 5

The Crocodile of Dates

The water at the ghat can be seen, so people know how to survive it; the water of dates cannot be seen, and so people drown in it.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: SUNLIGHT ON THE DATE

Folk tune: biraha-parati

Rise, O sun, rise upon the court date too,

Light the courtyard of the widow who has waited for years.

*The water of dates is deep, yet the sun rises every day;
At every hearing, let the people's courage remain beside them.*

*Make the red tape into a boat, cut its knots with care;
Count the widow's years as part of the measure of proper time.*

*Let time not devour justice; make the rules simple,
Between one date and the next, give help and clear information.
When sunlight falls upon the date, the crocodile will retreat;
Through patience, reform, and public vigilance, justice will find its road.*

*Hearing after hearing, leaves fell, but hope did not;
On the courthouse steps the lamp of endurance grew brighter.
The red knot of the tape will open, the ledger will lie straight;
When justice's dawn arrives, even biraha will turn into a song of blessing.*

When Nand Aruni reached the veranda of the district court with Devkinandan Chaube, he felt that he had entered not a building but an old pond. Dust lay upon the walls like moss. In every room stood tables, upon the tables files, upon the files red tape, and in that tape knots like the Panidubbi's hair dried into rope—a rope that did not bind so much as entangle.

Chaube the lawyer said softly, 'Babu, do not be in a hurry here. The court moves at its own pace.'

Nand replied, 'The dead have stopped moving. How slow may the court move?'

Chaube said nothing. He knew that those who came to a court veranda for the first time sought justice; the second time they learned what a date meant; the third time they counted expenses; the fourth time they left their souls at home—as one leaves a precious object behind for safekeeping, because bringing it here had become too dangerous.

The petition was filed. In the letters of the typewriter, Nand's list grew small. The haze of three hundred names was compressed into only twelve lines: 'other unidentified deceased persons'. Saryu, Muniya, Dhanesari, Bholatun—all became 'other'. Nand placed a finger on the line and said, 'They are not other.'

The typist, a pencil tucked behind his ear, smiled. 'Babu, everything is written in summary in court. If you write an entire life, how thick will the file become?'

Nand thought: the court is afraid of a thick file, but the government is not afraid of a thick heap of corpses. The imbalance was so obvious that it seemed absurd, yet no laughter came—as though the wound were so deep that instead of pain it yielded only emptiness.

On the day of the first hearing the veranda was crowded with innumerable people: one over a field boundary, one over murder, one over a pension, one over dowry, one over a bridge. The court bell rang. Everyone surged and looked in one direction, as when a pebble falls into a pond. The clerk called the cases. Nand's case came up.

A young lawyer stood for the government. Dark-complexioned, tired-eyed, but with something awake inside him. His name was called—Satyavrat Mehta. He held no great post then; he was only a junior member of the government advocate's team. In his hand was the state file, and in the file a line: 'Death toll thirty; petition exaggerated.'

Satyavrat rose to read the line, but his eye fell upon Bisesar's shoe protruding from Nand's bag. The shoe seemed not to lie upon the courtroom floor but upon his own eyes—as though it stood before him not as an object but as a question. He paused for a moment. The judge looked up. 'Mr Mehta?'

Satyavrat steadied his voice. 'My Lord, the records of the State may be called for.'

At once the departmental representative behind him waved a paper. The signal meant: 'Seek dismissal.' But Satyavrat had already asked that the records be summoned. That little sentence hung in the air of the courtroom like a labourer's gamchha caught on a bridge pier—small, but impossible now to remove.

The judge dictated: 'State to produce records. Next date.'

Nand looked at Chaube. 'That is all'

Chaube said, 'In this country, even getting records summoned is an event.'

Outside in the veranda, a man was watching Nand. Strong perfume, polished shoes, a cheap briefcase, and a fabricated self-confidence worn to cover an inner emptiness. Chaube recognised him. 'Chandrapal Batra. Says he did an LL.B. in Meerut. He puts his hand into people's papers, bail bonds, affidavits—everything. Be careful.'

Chandrapal Batra came forward smiling. 'Aruni Babu? A very emotional matter. But courts run on procedure, not emotion. If you wish, I can arrange access all the way to Delhi.'

Nand replied, 'I do not need access. I need names.'

Batra laughed. 'Names? Names are made on paper. What is not on paper does not exist in court.'

Nand looked into his eyes. There was no river in them, only calculation. Even a crocodile might fear a man who reduces death to calculation—for a crocodile eats and moves on, but calculation can go on eating people without ever becoming full.

At the second date the records did not arrive. The government representative said, 'The file is with the bridge project office.' At the third: 'The file is with the departmental inquiry committee.' At the fourth: 'The copy is unclear.' At the fifth: 'The chief engineer is on leave.' At the sixth: 'The judge has been transferred.' At the seventh: 'The new judge will study the file.'

The dates were not drops of rain that wet the earth; they were the teeth of a crocodile, each one biting away a little flesh from a name—so slowly that even the pain was understood late, though the loss was complete. Bisesar's wife came for the first two dates. She did not come for the third—she had no fare. Saryu's sister came once, then her in-laws stopped her. Bholatun's father came five times; the sixth time his cough would not let him leave home. The court went on. The families of the dead dwindled—as though the courthouse steps themselves were filtering them out, thinning them one by one.

At every date Nand brought his bag: shoe, bangle, pieces of glass bangle, amulet, papers, cuttings. One day the court clerk snapped, 'This is not a museum.'

Nand answered quietly, 'When the court does not recognise the dead, their belongings come to identify them.'

That day Batuknath Hariharan appeared outside the courtroom. He was already a celebrated senior advocate, later to become chairman of the Bar Council. With his arrival the noise seemed to leave the veranda. White hair, a soft voice, a gleaming advocate's band, and the kind of courtesy possessed only by one who is entirely certain of his influence.

Batuknath was an adviser to the foreign contractor company. Not openly; on paper his designation read something like 'Legal Propriety Adviser'. But everyone knew that any case falling beneath his shadow did not move quickly. He did not stop justice; he slowed its pace until the litigants grew old on the way. That was his art, so subtle that no court could call it an offence.

He stopped beside Chandrapal Batra. They spoke quietly. Batra kept nodding. Batuknath said, 'It is an emotional matter. Such matters bring the system into disrepute. Protect the system.'

Batra asked, 'How much?'

Batuknath smiled. 'One does not ask percentages in matters of propriety. A signal will come.'

No one knows whether the word 'signal' was born in that veranda. But many years later all of Chandrapal Batra's crimes would run through signals—disappearing messages, codes, percentages, mule accounts, digital arrests. That day he was only a small tout standing in a courthouse veranda; but crocodiles begin small, then grow by eating bodies until it becomes difficult even to imagine their former size.

That day Satyavrat Mehta noticed the reference to women labourers in a corner of the file. The government record called them 'family assistants'. He asked the departmental officer, 'Were these women working?'

The officer laughed. 'They are villagers. Men and women move around the site. They were not official labourers.'

'But their thumbprints are in the wage register.'

'They collected wages in the family's name.'

For the first time Satyavrat felt that official language authenticated convenience, not truth. He closed the file, but one page remained open within him. On that page was Saryu's thumbprint. The ink had dried, but inside its whorl was the roundness of a river—as though the thumbprint itself were a little river dried upon paper yet never wholly dry.

That evening, when Nand returned from court, an unusual assembly had gathered in Channa Grove. In the middle of kabaddi Budhba Ghost changed the rules. 'From today the game is called Date.'

Hulasi asked, 'How shall we play?'

Budhba said, 'Whoever enters a raid must hold his breath and chant a name. The other side will stop him with "no record", "no judge", "no lawyer", "no file". If his breath breaks, his name will drown in paper.'

The rakshasas gave light. The pretts drew a white boundary. The loth, who had once been only a spectator, now became the court clerk. 'Case Number One: Bisesar Paswan versus Water.'

Kabaddi began. A ghost entered, holding his breath: 'Bisesar-Bisesar-Bisesar.' The other side shouted, 'No report!' The ghost faltered. 'Bisesar-Bisesar.' 'No witness!' The ghost trembled. 'Bisesar...' 'Next date!' His breath broke. He dropped from an inch above the ground to half an inch.

The Panidubbi cannot weep because her eyes are always in water. But that night her hair rustled like dry leaves. She understood that the crocodile of the court is more patient than the crocodile of the river. A river crocodile eats at once; the court crocodile eats generation after generation, so slowly that even the eater sometimes forgets that it is eating.

At the eighth date Nand's side sought permission to produce the objects as evidence. Batuknath Hariharan rose. His voice was sweet, his sentences polished, his falsehood fragrant. 'My Lord, a court is not a stage for emotional theatre. Shoes, bangles, amulets—these may be objects of sympathy, not legal evidence.'

Nand felt as though someone were taking the shoe off the dead man's foot a second time.

Satyavrat Mehta wanted to rise for the government, but a senior officer touched his arm. The signal was clear: silence. Satyavrat remained seated. A voice within him said, 'He who sees the truth and remains silent dies twice.' He did not know where he remembered the sentence from. Perhaps some leaf from Garh Narikel had flown as far as the courtroom window.

The judge said, 'Let the objects be taken on record. Their evidentiary value will be considered later.'

It was half a victory. The objects were not thrown away. The shoe was deposited in the court storeroom. The broken bangle was sealed in a paper envelope. A number was marked on the amulet. Each object received a seal. For the first time the dead entered the court register as objects. Nand's heart broke and filled at once—the two feelings together, as though even an incomplete victory were still a victory.

That day Chandrapal Batra lingered for a long time near the storeroom. He understood that once an object enters a court, bringing it out again becomes very expensive. Later the first principles of his criminal career would grow from this place: moving papers in and out, making objects disappear, changing names, opening accounts, closing accounts.

At the ninth date a representative of the foreign company appeared—in place of Victor Halden, an Indian spokesperson. He said, 'The company works according to world-class safety standards. The accident was a natural risk.' At the word 'natural', Nand heard a crocodile laugh inside him. To place upon nature a risk created by hunger, by labour without rope, without net, without registered names, is one of humanity's cleverest evasions—for nature cannot answer, and its silence dresses a lie in the clothes of truth.

Devkinandan Chaube rose to argue. His voice was not grand like a famous advocate's, but firm as wet earth. 'My Lord, if there were thirty dead, why do the wage books show abnormal deductions involving three hundred families? If the women were not workers, whose thumbprints are these? If safety standards existed, why were there seven accidents in the first fifteen days?'

Batuknath Hariharan kept smiling. His smile said: asking questions does not produce answers; answers are bought.

Before the tenth date, Chaube's office was burgled. The lock had not been broken, but the file had been opened. The papers were no longer in order. The photograph of Bisesar's shoe was missing. The page bearing Saryu's thumbprint had been substituted. Chaube sat holding his head. Nand remained silent.

That night Ba opened the old chest. Inside was the second copy Nand had made. She took out the pages and said, 'If paper is to be saved from crocodiles, keep a copy with a mother.'

Nand took the pages back to the office. Chaube stared at him. 'You had made a copy?'

'A river never keeps only one copy,' Nand said. 'If one channel breaks, there is another.'

After this incident Batuknath Hariharan's face hardened for the first time. He understood that Nand was not an emotional engineer; he was an engineer armed with memory. Memory that knows how to make copies is dangerous to a system.

By chance, Satyavrat Mehta met Nand near Chaube's office. The veranda was empty. Evening light leaned against the wall. Satyavrat said softly, 'Aruni Babu, whatever you have, make many copies. Do not trust the court alone.'

Nand looked at him. 'You are a government lawyer.'

'I am.'

'Then why are you telling me this?'

Satyavrat replied, 'I am a lawyer for the government, not a servant of the government. And the soul of the State, if any of it survives, lives outside the file.'

The sentence lodged in Nand's mind. Satyavrat walked away. The sound of his steps remained in the veranda for a long time. It was not slippers he seemed to carry but hesitation—as though the weight of his own words had made him walk a little more slowly.

The court year changed. The calendar changed. The judge changed. The clerk changed. The government lawyer changed. Yet the colour of the file did not change. The red tape remained the same. Grey spread through Nand's hair. Ba's cough deepened. The children of the dead families became adults. Some left for cities. Some died. Some said, 'Leave it, Babu. God will give justice.'

Nand would answer, 'Let God give justice; human beings must at least correct the list.'

One monsoon, water entered the court storeroom. All the objects were brought out. Bisesar's shoe was wet. The shard of bangle shone. The amulet's thread swelled. The storeroom clerk cursed. 'Whose rubbish is all this?'

Nand was there. He lifted the shoe and held it to his chest. 'Not rubbish. Testimony.'

The clerk laughed. 'Does testimony speak?'

At that moment water fell from the shoe—splash. The entire room went silent. One drop, a second, a third. The rhythm was the same Nand had heard on the night at the bridge. The clerk stepped back. He did not understand, but he was afraid. Some evidence does not speak words; it drips water.

That day Nand wrote in his diary: 'In court the crocodile is invisible. It lives as a date. It gnaws the corners of files. It eats people's years. But when the paper grows wet, the dead speak again.'

Much later, when Chandrapal Batra became a kingpin of online gambling, he would remember this courthouse veranda. He would remember how desperate people were for their names—and a society so desperate for names could have its bank accounts, identities, Aadhaar, PAN, mobile numbers, and fears turned into trade. The seed of digital fraud was planted in that veranda.

Batuknath Hariharan too kept rising. At Bar meetings he would say, 'The rule of law protects civilisation.' People applauded. At that same time, inside a drawer of his desk lay an envelope from the foreign contractor, a slip from Batra, and a small note: 'Not above thirty.'

Satyavrat Mehta quietly rose through government service. But Nand's file did not leave him. He had kept in his private diary a copy of the page bearing Saryu's thumbprint. That page became his first lesson in law: if the law cannot read a woman's thumbprint, then it is merely language, not justice.

On the night the chapter ended, the game of 'Date' was played again in Channa Grove. This time Nand's name was in the raid. The ghosts chanted together: 'Nand-Nand-Nand.' From the other side came the voice: 'No record.' Nand's shadow, though he was still alive, did not reach the soil of Channa Grove, but its echo did. It answered, 'There is a copy.'

'No witness.'

'There is a name.'

'Time over.'

'Memory remains.'

At that answer the boundary broke. The kabaddi game stopped for an instant. Budhba Ghost announced, 'One who has memory cannot be eaten by a date.'

Far away in the court storeroom, Bisesar's shoe dripped once more—splash. Beside the Ganga a crocodile raised its head from the water once and sank again. In the city Satyavrat Mehta turned in his sleep. Batuknath Hariharan closed his drawer. Chandrapal Batra wrote for the first time on a scrap of paper: 'How to open an account.'

The coconut leaves of Garh Narikel moved late into that night. There was no wind. The leaves spoke by themselves—date, date, date—and between each date a name shone, written not on paper but on water, as though water itself were the final, indestructible diary of every name, beyond the power of any date, any seal, any red tape to erase.

FOLK SONG: THE CURRENT OF DATES

Folk tune: biraha

O date, do not eat my child,
Carry his name across the water of paper.

The water at the ghat can be seen; in court it cannot,
Yet, Babu, my house has drowned in the months of dates.
Red tape binds like the Panidubbi's hair,
One hearing passes; another is pushed farther away.

The shoe in the storeroom drips—splash, splash,

A widow counts years, months, and seasons at her threshold.

Time says 'finished'; memory says 'remaining',

Row the boat of names, or the witness too will drown.

O date, O date, do not eat my child,

One hearing passes while another waits down the road,

The shoe in the storeroom still sounds drip, drip.

Time says—ended; memory says—still left.

CHAPTER 6

Harvard's Ethics

Before polishing the shoes of morality that have climbed onto the stage, look first at whose blood is stuck to the soles.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE LEAF REACHES THE HALL

Folk tune: the bright cadence of a Vidyapati song

*Fly, O leaf, fly across the seven seas,
Carry the truth of Mithila's labour and join the assembly hall.*

*The village's green leaf flies to the land of snow,
Among the golden words of the stage, the workers' names resound.
Ethics is not a book; it is safety at the foundations,
Truth before applause, protection before speeches.*

*Raise questions like Ira, awaken like Mehta,
Join the university's knowledge to the labour of the earth.
When the leaf reaches the hall, thought will take a new turn,
The world's stage will join humanity to Mithila's truth.*

*Glass buildings in the land of snow, lamps glowing within,
On the stage resounds the line of workers' names.
Ira's question, Mehta's silence, both speak together,
The dust-stained leaf of the earth reshapes the mind of the world.*

That day snow was falling outside Harvard's auditorium. Inside there was warm light, polished wooden chairs, gleaming screens, and identification cards hanging from every neck. Each card bore a name, an institution, a country; but no card said how many stains lay upon the soul of its owner. That absence was itself a language—a language that speaks loudest precisely where it remains most silent.

Ira Aruni sat at the very back. She had always liked halls of this kind—old brick, new sentences, and people speaking as though the world's problems might become a little smaller after a speech. But that day something else was sounding inside her ears. It was not Harvard's heater. It was the sound—splash.

Ira had known that sound since childhood. Whenever she listened on the phone to her grandmother's stories of the village, her grandmother would sometimes fall silent in the middle. Then she would say, "Your great-grandfather Nand Aruni did not drown in the waters of the Ganga; he drowned in government papers." Ira would laugh then. She thought old village women turned memory into metaphor. People born abroad are slow to believe in metaphors; they want footnotes, evidence, reports—as if truth becomes truth only by living inside paper.

That day the footnote was about to climb onto the stage.

The programme was called Global Enterprise and Human Dignity. Professor Elina Graves, director of Harvard's Ethics Center, came smiling to the podium. Hers was the kind of smile practised not before a mirror but at donor dinners. She said that in the countries of the global South infrastructure was not merely bridges, roads, and hospitals, but an architecture of human trust. Everyone applauded. Ira applauded too, but her palms were cold—as though her body had known before her heart that the applause was for a lie.

Then Edward Broom came to the stage. Tall, white-haired, in a blue suit with a silk tie at his throat. His company's name had changed several times, yet on donor lists all those names looked as though they belonged to the same family. One name built bridges, another sold medicines, a third offered defence consulting, a fourth ran digital payments. Broom used to say, "Companies change; values do not." Ira thought: in Garh Narikel people say, the river changes, not the current.

The first slide appeared: a hospital in Africa. The second—flood relief in Asia. The third—medicine packets during the pandemic. The fourth—a gigantic bridge gleaming in mist, captioned: 1978: A Model Community-Partnership Project in India.

The sound inside Ira's body suddenly became clear—splash.

She did not recognise the bridge on the screen, but she recognised the water behind it. It was like the water her grandmother described—water that makes every body the same colour, in which caste, wages, family, and address all dissolve. In tiny letters at the corner of the slide were the words: local labour participation, minimal accidents, independent safety inspection. Ira wrote in her notebook: "Minimal accidents?" and the tail of the question mark grew long across the paper like a snake.

Broom was saying, "We went to countries where regulation was weak but people's hopes were strong. It was our duty to bring standards with us."

He said "standards," and a drop of water fell from his mouth onto the table. Those sitting in front thought perhaps it had come from his glass. Broom dabbed it away with a handkerchief. Then he said "ethics," and this time two drops fell. Elina Graves leaned slightly to look, but the donor-dinner smile did not break. Ira saw that the water was not clear; it held fine grains of sand, and after settling on the table the sand began to form curved shapes like Devanagari—as though a language itself had travelled to this distant land to offer its own evidence.

Broom's speech was for the ears of the auditorium; his water was for the dead.

He continued, "We have to trust local governments. We respect the law. We save lives." Behind him the slides changed—medicine trucks during the pandemic, vaccine boxes, oxygen tanks, hospital beds. In every picture the human beings were small and the logo large. In Ira's mind flashed Channa Grove in Garh Narikel; when the ghosts played kabaddi there, they never made their names larger, only their voices. In that moment the distinction seemed to her more honest than all the auditorium's performance of humility.

In the left corner of the hall sat Raghav Somani. Beneath his name on the badge were the words Asia-Pacific Strategic Adviser. His eyes were less often on the stage than on his phone. The screen would go dark, then a blue dot would flash, then a message disappear. His thumb did not type on the keyboard; he merely selected prepared sentences. "Question raised on old bridge slide." "India team alert." "Tell Batra to keep the file clean." After each message he wiped the screen as though erasing the fingerprints of words.

At that same time in Delhi, in an old room of the justice department, Satyavrat Mehta was reading a government brief. The cover said: River-Bridge Accident Compensation Case, Relisted. Inside was the typed sentence: "According to government records, the number of dead did not exceed thirty." Satyavrat's pencil stopped at the sentence. Thirty. The number ought not to have seemed strange to him. Numbers arrived in court every day—seven petitioners, five respondents, three adjournments, two absent witnesses. Yet behind thirty someone was whispering: "Thirty names, three hundred corpses."

He turned the page. In an old annexure, names had been written by hand: Saryu, Parmanand, Chamru, Abdul Rashid, Phekan, Haridas, Basanti, Lachhumania. Ink had spread over half the names. Some had been partly crossed out, as though a government pen were performing the last rites of the dead. In the margin Satyavrat wrote in pencil: "Original roll of names to be called for." A little later, beneath that sentence, he added another line: "If available." The word "if" shamed him—as though the word itself were holding up a mirror to the deficiency in his own honesty.

Back at Harvard, the question-and-answer session began. The first student asked, "How do companies preserve ethics in corrupt systems of government?" Broom answered, "Through transparency." Another asked, "Where is the line between private profit and public health during a pandemic?" Broom said, "Humanity comes before profit." A third asked, "An example of failure in safety standards?" Broom laughed. "We turn failure into learning."

Ira stood. Her voice first caught in her throat, then came out: "How many workers died on the Indian bridge project of 1978?"

The auditorium fell silent.

For a moment Broom's face showed the composure of a man who had prepared a new answer for a very old question. He said, "We do not retain complete memory of every project. But our company's principle has always been respect for local records."

Ira asked a second time, "What if the local records are false?"

This time Elina Graves said softly, "An excellent question. Perhaps Mr Broom can speak to the broader issue of institutional accountability." The hall breathed in relief. The broader issue always rescues the particular crime—this was not something Ira had known since childhood, but the polished corridors of Harvard had just proved it once more.

Broom said, "It is difficult to review history through the moral understanding of the present. Those were different times."

Ira sat down. In her notebook, the tail of the question mark had become a crocodile's tail.

After the programme came a reception: polished plates, tiny dishes, glass goblets in everyone's hands. Broom moved among the guests so easily that the water spilled on the stage seemed to have been only Ira's delusion. In a corner Raghav Somani sent Chandrapal Batra a message: "Foreign-born girl. Name Ira Aruni. Questions on bridge. Trace background." A few moments later came the reply: "Aruni? Garh Narikel line? Checking file."

At that time Chandrapal Batra was sitting in a farmhouse somewhere between Meerut and Delhi. A laptop lay open before him, a law book to the right, three phones to the left. Dust lay on the book's pages; the phone screens shone. On the wall he had framed a photograph of his degree—Bachelor of Laws. Anyone looking once would think he had studied law. Anyone looking twice would understand that for him law was a tool for picking locks.

Batra read the message and laughed. "Garh Narikel," he murmured, "has that village awakened again?" He did not immediately message Batuknath Hariharan. He knew Hariharan disliked bare information; he preferred first the scent of fear. Batra opened an old folder: river bridge, compensation, labourers, foreign consulting, safety certificate. Beneath it was a new folder: gaming apps, mule accounts, digital arrest, student loans. All bore ink of the same colour—as though one signature, one mind, and one hunger were concealed within that colour.

Batuknath Hariharan was speaking at a wedding reception in Delhi. "The rule of law is the backbone of civilisation," he was saying. On the table where his hand rested lay two envelopes. One was marked Research Support. The other bore nothing. An envelope on which nothing is written often contains the most writing of all. After the speech he looked at his phone. Batra's message read: "Old bridge raised at Harvard. Aruni line active." Hariharan's smile paused for a moment. Then he replied: "Trust the process."

Process—this word was his favourite weapon. In process, dates change, not justice. In process, witnesses grow old while files stay young. In process, the names of the dead gather dust while lawyers' fees swell, and no one calls that swelling a crocodile—as though fattening, unlike feeding from a river, were something lawfully sanctioned.

Ira sat in Harvard's library until night. She opened the programme website and read the history of Broom's companies. The names kept changing—Broom Infra, Broom Health, Broom Defence Advisory, Broom Digital Trust, Broom Ethics Foundation. Behind each name stood a clean photograph and a gentle sentence. But in the footnotes to the financial statements the subsidiaries' names looked like hatchling snakes writhing in a dark pond, each with its own separate legal identity.

An old family email lay open before Ira. Long ago her grandmother had sent it with the line, "Do not laugh when you see Nand's papers." Ira had not been able to read the mail then. There was a scanned page attached. She opened it now. Devanagari and English were mixed on the page. At the top was one name—Nand Aruni. Below it: "Death count differs from government register." And after that, in bold: "Woman labourer named Saryu untraced."

Ira held her breath. In Harvard's silent library she had the feeling that someone behind her was brushing dust from the earth. She turned. No one. But on the table, beside the question mark in her notebook, lay grains of wet sand. In the sand a thin line had formed, like a crocodile's body—as if even here, across the sea, the river of Garh Narikel had sent a small part of itself.

That same night Satyavrat Mehta reached home late. Food lay covered on the table. His wife was asleep. He did not switch on the light. In the dark he opened the same file again. The government's note said: "The matter is extremely old; the claim is inadmissible owing to delay." Reading it, Satyavrat wondered: after how long does a death become old?

After how many years does injustice become archival dust? After how many dates does a person's name become an inconvenience in the language of a court?

At that moment he remembered his father, who used to say, "Law is not merely sections; law is also a test of patience. But if only the poor die while patience is being tested, then law becomes the criminal." Satyavrat lifted his pencil and wrote across the government brief: "Verification necessary." After a moment's thought he underlined "necessary" twice. He did not know how many people's sleep those two small lines would one day destroy.

In Garh Narikel, kabaddi had stopped that night in Channa Grove. Old Man Ghost sat on a branch. Hulasi leaned over the edge of the well. Loth sniffed the air through his half-open face. For the first time, the Brahma of the pipal had come down early after sunset. Everyone understood: in some auditorium beyond the sea, someone had touched an old name.

A new soul came into the grove. He was not a labourer. He carried no basket. He held a mobile phone whose screen was always black. The ghosts surrounded him. Old Man asked, "In which river did you drown?" The young man replied, "There was no river. There was a game. There was debt. There were people speaking like police on the phone. There was fear of dishonouring the family. I fell from the roof."

The ghosts were silent. Panidubbi lifted her hair from the water. For the first time the witches looked at one another without laughing. Old Man said quietly, "The crocodile is no longer only in the water."

At Harvard Ira wrote an email to Professor Elina Graves. It was not long. It contained only three lines: "The Indian bridge on the fourth slide of today's lecture is connected with a death inquiry involving a member of my family. The company's records do not match the local records. Will the Ethics Center raise this publicly?" Before sending it, Ira stared at the screen for a long time. With her finger resting on Send, she heard her grandmother's voice: "Those who die on paper return through paper."

She pressed Send.

A few moments later a signal flashed on Raghav Somani's phone: "Ira active. Reached professor. Keep Batra line ready."

The message that followed was read and immediately deleted by Raghav. But what is deleted does not end. Some messages remain in the air, some on servers, some in souls. The sound of that message reached all the way to Garh Narikel. In Channa Grove the new young man's mobile, black even after death, lit for a moment. One word appeared on the screen: "Percentage."

Old Man Ghost could not read it. Hulasi could. Softly she said, "That is not a name. That is hunger."

That night the souls of the labourers trapped inside the foundations of the Ganga bridge stirred. Their baskets held not cement but soaked papers. Saryu, whose name had never been written fully in the government list, looked up from beneath the water. Far away, wet footprints appeared on the polished floor of Harvard's auditorium. No one saw them. The hall was already closed. The security guard saw only that water had pooled on the wooden floor near the stage. He wiped it with a cloth. The water disappeared. The sand remained.

In the sand one letter had formed—N.

Ira reached her dormitory very late. Snow was still falling. It crunched beneath her shoes, but in her ears was the Ganga—a distance and contradiction so great that for a moment she became an inhabitant of two worlds at once. She opened her diary and wrote: "When water begins to seep into an auditorium of ethics, understand that a name is arriving." Then she looked again at Nand Aruni's scanned page. In its corner was one small phrase she had not noticed before—Garh Narikel.

This time the village did not feel like an exotic tale to her. She understood: Garh Narikel was not a geographical place but a court, where the dead deposit their testimony in sand, water, trees, shadow, and children's questions.

In Delhi Satyavrat Mehta switched off the lamp and went to bed, but sleep did not come. In his dream he saw a bridge. He himself stood upon it in an official gown. Below there was no water; files were flowing. Crocodiles swam inside the files. One opened its mouth and said, "Your Honour, may a date be granted?" Satyavrat woke and sat upright. There was no vehicle on the road outside. Yet he heard clearly—splash.

By dawn three different tasks had begun in three places. At Harvard Ira waited for an answer. In Delhi Satyavrat prepared a note calling for the original records. Chandrapal Batra was telling his men to trace the old families of Garh Narikel. Three cities, three intentions, but the threads of all three were emerging from the same root.

And in Channa Grove the ghosts began to play kabaddi again. But this time the rhythm had changed. One team chanted "water-burial," the other "percentage." Between them stood the new young man, killed by the crocodile of the screen, silent and uncertain of the rules. Old Man put a hand on his shoulder. "Do not be afraid. Here, the one who dies does not lose. Here, names are learned."

Before the first light descended upon the grove, Panidubbi bent toward the water and said, "The ethics spoken abroad has carried a sound that the crocodile here is hearing."

From beneath the water came the answer: "So am I."

FOLK SONG: THE STAGE'S LIGHT, BLOOD AT THE FOUNDATIONS

Folk tune: a sorrowful verse in the Vidyapati cadence

Listen, O auditorium, listen to the voice of the foundations,
The stage lights will go out; remember the speech of the leaf.

Snow falls at Harvard, sunshine burns beside the Ganga,
Ethics on the stage, the nameless beneath the foundations.
Bisesar's blood beneath polished shoes,
Amid the applause, hear a mother cry, "Tell me."
The masters count percentages; the ghosts count names,

One leaf crossed the ocean and reached the hall.
Ira raised a question; Mehta lost his sleep,
The beautiful speech of falsehood dissolved into Ganga water.
The stage lights will go out, but the leaf's voice will remain—
The one whose blood built the bridge, his name will be spoken.

A lecture on ethics in a land where snow is falling,
A labourer's life sold beneath the sun beside the Ganga.
One leaf's message crossed the sea and reached the hall.

CHAPTER 7

The Price of Breath

When the market begins to set the price of breath, even ghosts stop playing and turn to look at the living.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: BREATH BEYOND PRICE

Folk tune: a mother's birth-song

*O girl, sing the birth-song of breath,
Spread the wind's shawl across every courtyard.*

*At a child's first breath the village sings a sohar,
The wind fills its free shawl and pours out the sap of life.
Let bottles, medicines, and hospitals remain instruments of service,
Do not put a price on breath—speak the law of humanity.*

*Let a mother's folded hands never return empty,
Shared provision, compassion, and science sustain life.
Sing the song of breath beyond price; let no one turn blue,
Let the air sow equal flowers of hope in every chest.*

Let mother smile, child smile, and pure wind flow, Let bottle and cylinder become service, not instruments of deceit and force.

*A mother's folded hands say—breath belongs to all,
Let fresh life dance to the rhythm of this sohar.*

When the market began to set the price of breath, the ghosts of Garh Narikel stopped their games for the first time and began watching the living—with the concentration of an old physician holding a finger to a pulse, except that the pulse was not his own but the pulse of the whole world. Untimely death was no novelty to them; the line in Channa Grove already held every kind of death—water from a well, a river current, a snake's fang, a witch's shadow, the foundation of a bridge. But this death was invisible. It did not touch the body first; it seized the breath.

At night the spirits sat in a circle on the kabaddi ground. The Raksh's light was dim. Loth's mouth hung half open, but there was no spectator's laughter in it. Panidubbi raised her head from the pond and asked, "What kind of disease is this that drowns people not in water but in air?"

Old Man Ghost, carrying twelve hundred years of history inside his ribs, said slowly, "When human beings accumulate too much sin, water and air begin to demand their own accounts. Water sends the crocodile. Air stops the breath."

In the spring of 2020 the world was suddenly locked inside houses—a spring whose flowers bloomed while the eyes that might have seen them were imprisoned behind window glass. Roads that had swollen day and night with traffic lay empty, in a silence sometimes broken even by the faintest tremor of wind. Trains stood at stations like enormous dead iron animals whose breath had stopped though their bodies still gleamed. The city's sky grew clearer, but human chests clouded over. People looked out through windows, and the emptiness outside doubled the fear within.

In Delhi Aruni Nandan stood on the veranda of his rented home. Ambulance sirens came and went in the distance. His daughter Ananya, wearing a mask, breathed mist onto the glass and drew a circle in it with her finger. Then she asked, "Daddy, why do people wear masks? Do ghosts wear them too?"

Aruni did not answer. The answer was on his tongue but caught before it reached his throat—as though a word itself knew that it could not carry the weight of this moment. Suddenly he remembered Grandmother saying ghosts did not need masks because they had no breath. Yet that day the living faces of the city looked as if everyone had become half a ghost. Only eyes remained visible; mouths had disappeared.

Grandmother called from the village and asked, "Son, is this disease real, or some new game of the government?"

Aruni paused. "The disease is real, Grandmother. The game is being built all around it."

Grandmother fell silent. Then she said, "Then keep writing down the names. Whoever dies, write the name. Those who die of the disease, those who die because of the hospital, those who die without oxygen, those who die without medicine—write each separately. Later they all become 'other.'"

The sentence sank into Aruni the way water had once dripped into Nand Aruni's diary—two generations of one family, two crises, but the same advice, as though blood itself were a language that even distance in time could not erase. The word "other" was a curse upon this family. On the bridge the labourers had become "other." In court the women labourers had become "other." Now patients at hospitals stood in line to become "other."

In Delhi's hospitals the price of a bed kept changing. Government lists showed vacant beds; doors said "No space." On the phone came the words, "Something can be arranged." The small machine used to measure breath became as scarce as temple offerings. The price of an oxygen cylinder changed every evening—as though not the stock market but a market of death had opened.

Outside one hospital Aruni saw a man with his elderly father lying on a rickshaw. The father took tiny breaths, as though an invisible crocodile had sunk its teeth into his chest. With folded hands the son pleaded with the guard, "Brother, there is a bed free. I saw it on the website."

In a tired voice the guard said, "Is the bed shown free on the website being saved for God?" There was no cruelty in his eyes, only the exhaustion born of seeing the same scene too many times.

The man did not understand. Then a broker came out from inside and whispered beneath his mask, "Pay the advance. Papers later."

Aruni remembered the corridors of the court. Back then the paper came first and the body later. Now the body stood at the door while the paper slept inside in the form of a hospital bed.

At this point Gop Kumar entered the story for the first time, in another corner of the city. He did not arrive like a hero carrying a sword; he was a quiet man sitting among Excel sheets. His room had no window. Two screens, an old chair, dust always on the keyboard, and tea that went cold because the numbers stayed hot.

Gop Kumar worked as an internal auditor at a company called Jeevanrekha Bio-Logistics. The very name inspired trust—life, line, support. During the pandemic the company announced that it was involved in supplying medicines, oxygen, protective clothing, vaccine cold-chain systems, hospital equipment, and relief packets. Its newspaper advertisement read: "With Breath, With the Nation."

Gop was more accustomed to reading invoices than advertisements. Advertisements contained humanity; invoices contained percentages. Advertisements contained photographs; invoices contained accounts. Advertisements showed masked children smiling; invoices contained lines such as "consultancy fee," "advance coordination," "risk allowance," "special transport," and "emergency licence."

That week he found a file titled "Breath Supply—Northern Region." The first page was beautiful. The second ordinary. From the third came a smell—not of water, but of rotting paper. He saw the same oxygen cylinder shown as supplied to three districts on the same day. Five hundred regulators billed to a hospital that was closed. Bills worth lakhs carrying the signature of a distributor already dead.

Gop leaned close to the screen, his back tired, his eyes burning. Letters danced across his glasses as though the numbers themselves had come alive and were trying to conceal their true meaning. One code appeared again and again: "NR-77." He thought it might be a batch number. But the description attached to it was strange: "Old Bridge Project—Liability Adjustment." Why was an old bridge project appearing in pandemic bills? Why did the shadow of water-burial fall across the ledger of oxygen cylinders?

That night Gop did not go home. Outside there was curfew. Inside there was the screen. The peon said, "Sir, close up. The police will stop you." Gop said, "Go. I'll stay a little longer."

A little longer has no meaning for numbers. If numbers are hiding the names of the dead, night opens itself to them. Gop opened the file's hidden rows. There was a table: bridge, medicines, protective gear, vaccine, consulting, overseas training, legal management. Every column looked like a different crime, yet the account was one.

At the very bottom stood one name—Broom-Calder Global. Gop had heard the name before: in news reports, donor lists, pandemic relief videos. The same group's head, Edward Broom, gave lectures on human dignity at universities abroad. On Gop's screen the group's Indian associate was shown supplying empty oxygen cylinders as though they were full.

Meanwhile at Harvard, Ira Aruni received no answer. Professor Elina Graves read her email and remained silent. A thank-you message came from Edward Broom's office: "Your concerns are important; historical projects are complex." Ira stared at the sentence for a long time. For the first time she understood that abroad, "complex" is the educated form of "forgive us."

Then Ira called her grandmother, Janki Devi. Grandmother said, "Child, when someone speaks too smoothly, look for the thorn in his ribs."

Ira asked, "Where will I find the thorn?"

Grandmother replied, "In the papers. And if the papers are missing, in the water."

In Delhi Satyavrat Mehta worked from home because of the pandemic. On his desk lay the request for the old bridge file, Nand Aruni's copy, and new government circulars. During the coronavirus period courts held virtual hearings. Lawyers on screens, judges on screens, microphones muted on screens, "network problem" on screens. Dates were no longer given in corridors but by clicking a button.

Satyavrat noticed that in one government petition concerning pandemic supplies appeared the same foreign group that had been peering distantly from Nand's bridge file. The documents belonged to different ministries, but the language was one: "Relaxation of procedure is necessary in an emergency."

Satyavrat wondered: is an emergency meant to save the public, or to save procedure? He wrote a note: "Original contract, supply receipts, payment trail, beneficial ownership to be produced." His pen stopped halfway. He felt as though Nand Aruni's hand had touched his own.

At that time Chandrapal Batra flourished during the pandemic. Courts closed, fear of police stations, hospital charges, families in panic—these were new fields for him. His LL.B. from Meerut hung on the wall; his real degree lived in his phone. On Signal he told Raghav Somani: "Separate package for beds. Separate for medicine. Police-pass separate. No old accounts; need new ones. Trap students—they're unemployed."

Raghav "Signal" Somani replied, "Mules ready. Five thousand per account. Documents complete."

Batra wrote, "Fast. Fear is fresh during a pandemic. If fear cools, the price falls."

At that sentence, far away in Channa Grove, the Raksh's light turned blue for a moment. The witches stopped in mid-flight. Old Man Ghost said, "See? Human beings now weigh fear as well."

In Garh Narikel, Ujjwal Jha had passed Class Twelve and was sitting unemployed at home—an age when dreams are still fresh but roads have already closed. His dream of going to the city was trapped by lockdown. The mobile became his window. First he saw pandemic news. Then medicines, oxygen, unemployment. Then one day an advertisement appeared: "Earn from home. Play, win, instant withdrawal."

Ujjwal thought: what harm is there in a game? The fields are shut, college shut, buses shut, the world shut. The phone is open. The first time he staked two hundred and won five hundred. The same shine came into his eyes that may have come into a bridge labourer's eyes on his first payday. A crocodile does not eat the whole body on the first day; first it licks a finger.

Devika Sah, Ujjwal's cousin, warned him. "This does not look like a game."

Ujjwal laughed. "You see fear in everything."

Devika replied, "Not fear. A net."

That small exchange would later become very heavy. But that day flattened rice was being fried in the house, the radio was reporting coronavirus figures, and the blue button of victory shone on Ujjwal's screen.

At Jeevanrekha Bio-Logistics, Gop Kumar kept joining file to file—in the stillness of night, where the tap of his keyboard sounded less like accounting than a silent prayer. One hospital bill listed a "special medicine." The same medicine had been bought at three times the price. Then fifty percent of the amount had gone abroad as an "educational donation" to an ethics centre. Gop found the link to the Harvard programme. He watched Edward Broom on the stage saying: "A pandemic is the test of ethical enterprise."

Gop felt like switching the screen off. But numbers do not die when a screen is closed. He paused the video. Broom's face froze, mouth open, hand in the air. On Gop's second screen one line shone: "Body-management kits: quantity 3000; receipt proof 30."

Thirty.

The number cut into Gop—such a cut that shed not blood but memory. Thirty names on the bridge. Thirty receipts in the pandemic. The rest? "Other." "Adjusted." "Natural loss." "Incidental damage." The language changed; the sin did not.

That night Gop heard the sound of leaves for the first time. His office was in the middle of the city; where could a coconut tree be there? Yet the sound was clear—rustle, rustle. As though a tree were growing inside the file. Gop rose under the illusion that there was an open window, but the room had no window. The sound was coming from the screen.

The cursor stopped over the code "NR-77." When Gop opened it, an old scan appeared. Yellow paper. At the top: Bridge Project. Below, Nand Aruni's signature. A note: "Death list incomplete. Separate list of women labourers, unregistered labourers, and unauthorised workers attached." The attachment was missing.

Gop said softly, "Who removed it?"

The computer fan whirled in reply. Somewhere far away Panidubbi shook her hair in the water.

Gop did not know that a man named Aruni Nandan was listening to ambulances in another part of Delhi. He did not know Ira Aruni was waiting for an answer at Harvard. He did not know Satyavrat Mehta was demanding old records. But the pipes of truth seek one another. Water may stand in separate pits, yet below the earth the current is one.

The next day there was a company meeting. The pandemic director, legal adviser, finance head, and one outsider appeared on the screen. The outsider was introduced as Chandrapal Batra, Special Legal Coordinator. Gop studied his face: courtesy on the surface, calculation in the eyes. Batra said, "Documentary flexibility is normal in emergency procurement. Regularisation can be completed later."

Gop asked, "How do you regularise something that was never supplied?"

The meeting froze. A few faces on the screen went still. Batra smiled. "Young people take paper too seriously. In reality, paper is fluid."

Gop replied, "Bodies are fluid too. We saw that on the bridge."

Batra's smile was cut in half. He asked, "Which bridge are you talking about?"

Gop himself did not know how the sentence had escaped his mouth. Perhaps the sound of coconut leaves had descended onto his tongue. He said, "The bridge behind the code you use—NR-77."

The meeting ended. Five minutes later Gop's access was reduced. Several folders were locked away from him. By night an email arrived saying his office password had been changed.

Gop smiled. Changing a password does not change a file's memory. He had already made copies. Perhaps Nand Aruni's blood, without Gop ever meeting him, had taught him this: "One copy with the mother, one with the water, one with the air."

That night Gop sent an encrypted message to his old friend Ramaiyya Subramanyam: "If paper begins to breathe, how do you keep it alive?"

Ramaiyya, watering a tulsi plant on his rooftop in Bengaluru during lockdown, replied, "Do not save the paper. Save the people. First tell me—where is the fire?"

Gop wrote, "In the breath."

Ramaiyya replied, "Then do not delay."

The days of the pandemic grew long and the nights short. Pyres outside hospitals, screens inside homes, death notices on mobile phones, and government announcements saying "the situation is under control." People were looking at photographs of cremation grounds, while death counts on paper tried to remain civilised. Perhaps the numbers too had been given masks.

That night in Channa Grove there was no kabaddi but a game of breath. One ghost entered the court chanting, "breath-breath-breath." The other side blocked him: "No bed." "No cylinder." "No medicine." "Payment first." "Report later." Whoever lost breath did not leave the game; he rose one finger's width above the ground and silently joined the list marked "Other."

Hulasi said angrily, "Stop this game. Living people are truly dying."

Old Man replied, "I am not playing. I am practising. When their souls arrive here, we will have to teach them their names."

Panidubbi brought up an empty vial from the bottom of the pond. Half its label had peeled away: "Special Use." The moment she placed it on the earth of Channa Grove, smoke rose from within and formed letters: "Donation." The Raksh laughed. "Donation? This is an invoice."

At the same moment a new folder appeared on Gop's screen. He had not created it. Its name was "Donation_Inter_Account." Inside were lines: Ethics Center donation, vaccine-awareness grant, digital-health consulting, legal-risk mitigation, community gamification. The last line read: "Lau Kin-Hung—consulting: percentage secured."

Gop read the name Lau Kin-Hung for the first time. He thought it might be a foreign supplier. But the account route beside it looked more like gambling than medicine: Singapore, Hong Kong, Dubai, Gurgaon, Meerut. Why should a medical bill travel into legal consulting in Meerut? Why should a vaccine-awareness fund go to a gaming-based company?

As he was securing the file, an unknown message arrived on his phone. It said only: "Divide the paper into three parts. Let one eye keep watching, let one water keep listening, let one dead man keep it."

A chill ran through Gop. He replied, "Who are you?"

The message vanished. Then another appeared: "The one already dead on paper does not speak through his name."

Gop stared at the phone. No number, no mark. Only a grey circle, as though without a shadow. It was the first sign of Ishan Dutt—the shadowless informer, dead in government records and still moving among the lies of the living.

Gop divided the file into three. The first part went to Ramaiyya. The second to a secure place whose address even he did not fully know. The third under a name officially declared dead. As soon as he completed the division, the screen made the sound of a splash. There was no water in the computer, but the sound was clear.

Far away in Delhi Aruni was putting his daughter to bed. In her sleep Ananya murmured, "The ghosts took off their masks."

"Why?" Aruni asked without thinking.

"Because they found their names."

Aruni stroked her head for a long time. The ambulance sirens outside had not diminished. But somewhere within, a paper had begun to breathe.

Before dawn, when the city's haze and the village's mist become the same colour, Old Man Ghost announced in Channa Grove: "From today the new deaths will have separate lists. Those who died of disease, those who died of greed, those who died without oxygen, those who died in bills, those who die inside apps—each name separately."

Loth, acting as clerk, asked, "Who will keep the lists?"

Old Man looked toward the sky. The coconut leaves moved. The answer came: "One copy with Gop. One copy with the water. And one copy in the dream of the child who asks questions."

At this decision the crocodiles swam in circles in the water. Perhaps they were laughing, perhaps afraid. For the day a name begins to survive alongside the body, the crocodile's hunger is cut in half.

The sun rose. The news said, "The situation is under control." The line outside the hospital was long. The company's accounts were moving. Chandrapal Batra was writing his next message on Signal. Edward Broom's lecture had been uploaded to the Harvard page. Satyavrat Mehta was signing the note calling for the original records. Ira was writing her grandmother's sentence in her notebook.

And a cursor blinked on Gop Kumar's screen—like a tiny coconut flower in the dark.

Beside that cursor Gop wrote the first line: "The account of breath is not separate from the account of water-burial."

At that very moment, far away in Garh Narikel, Panidubbi lifted the empty vial sunk in the water and kissed it, and from within the vial one drop fell—splash.

FOLK SONG: THE EMPTY VIAL OF BREATH

Folk tune: a mother's song of grief

O wind, blow freely, save the poor one's life,
Do not price the breath—write down the breath's name.

The child's chest heaves, the vial has gone empty,
The market raised the price; breath went to auction.
At the hospital door a mother folds her hands,
Inside profit is being counted, outside breath is breaking.
The news says everything is under control,

The hearth says—one voice in the house is missing.
At night Panidubbi kissed the empty vial,
One drop fell—the final word of the dead.
Do not price the breath; write down the breath's name.

The vial empty, the chest heaving, folded hands at the door,
Inside the figures of profit counted, outside a breath breaking.
The news says—everything is under control.

CHAPTER 8

The Crocodile of the Screen

There is no body inside a screen, yet there is enough water there to drown a body.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: A WATCH OF LOVE UPON THE SCREEN

Folk tune: a youth-awakening song

*Wake, O young one, keep a watch of love,
Light the lamp of companionship in the screen's darkness.*

*When the screen glitters at night, keep a friend beside you,
Say every day: life is greater than the numbers you have lost.*

*Do not bear alone the net of debt, threats, and shame,
Turn to mother and father, friends, and help centres.*

Recognise the crocodile of the screen; think before you download,

Hold up the lamp of verification before a single click.

*A watch of love upon the screen will become a radiant dawn,
No young person will remain silent; a companion's hand will hold them.*

The glitter of night will deceive and confuse—do not close your eyes,

Do not bury lost numbers and broken dreams inside your heart.

At one call ten hands will come to rest upon your shoulder,

However deep the crocodile's net, companionship will bring you across.

The ghosts in Channa Grove did not sleep for a long time that night. The list of untimely deaths had been made, yet a new worry sat upon Old Man Ghost's brow. At the outer edge of the grove he saw a new kind of shadow. It was not a ghost, not a spirit, not a Raksh, not Loth. Its feet were not even one finger above the ground; it had no feet at all. It merely flickered on and off—like a mobile screen whose light calls to the eyes but never touches the heart.

Hulasi asked, "Who is that?"

Panidubbi raised her head from the bottom of the pond and said, "It did not drown in water. It drowned in the eyes."

Old Man said slowly, "Then this death needs a new name. The river's crocodile ate the body. This crocodile of the screen eats the future."

In Garh Narikel, Ujjwal Jha sat on the veranda of his house, slowly changing colour in the blue light of his mobile. His mother had lentils on the stove, his father was adding up the debt on the fields, and his cousin Devika Sah was sorting greens in the courtyard. The world moved in the old rhythm of poverty, but in Ujjwal's eyes a new marketplace had already opened—a marketplace whose door stood open without a key, and inside it darkness went ahead disguised as light.

The app was called Raja-Raat. Its advertisement said: Play, win, instant withdrawal. The first time Ujjwal staked two hundred and won five hundred. The second time he staked five hundred and won two thousand. That night he brought rasgullas home. His mother asked, "From where?"

Ujjwal laughed. "Online work."

The word online was no longer strange in the village, but it meant something different to everyone. For some, government forms; for some, videos; for some, the face of a son living far away; and for Ujjwal—fortune. Fortune became a spinning wheel beneath his finger.

Devika snatched his phone and looked. Horses raced across the screen, cards opened, imaginary cricket overs were played. Devika said, "This is not a game. It is a net."

Ujjwal said, "If it were a net, why would it let me win first?"

Devika fell silent. She was not educated enough to use the word algorithm, but her woman's intelligence understood that whatever gives first will later demand something in return.

In Meerut, Chandrapal Batra's LL.B. certificate hung framed on his office wall. Beneath it stood a glass table, beneath the table cash, on the table a religious idol, and in a drawer three phones. The first phone was for the courts, the second for the police, the third for Signal. On the third phone there were no names, only symbols.

A message came from Raghav "Signal" Somani: "New users rising in Garh Narikel area. Initial wins delivered. Time to stop withdrawals?"

Batra replied, "Not yet. First lengthen the rope of trust. Raise the limit after five days. Bonus on the seventh. Credit line on the tenth."

Raghav wrote, "Mule accounts ready. Munna Paswan, Saurabh Mahto, Imran, two students. Five thousand per account."

Batra replied, "Keep all accounts clean. Hong Kong's share must go on time."

A little later a message flashed onto Raghav's screen from far away. No sender's name, only the letters L.K. The message was short: "No delay in percentage." Raghav read it and deleted it. But the erased words seemed to dissolve into the night wind and travel all the way to Garh Narikel. Coconut leaves moved in Channa Grove. Loth the clerk murmured through his half-open mouth, "Percentage."

Munna Paswan did not understand that he was entering a crime. He had been told it was a small job: open a bank account and allow a little money to pass through it. Aadhaar, PAN, photograph, SIM—everything submitted. Five thousand immediately. In days of unemployment, the smell of five thousand rupees can seem sweeter than smoke from the cooking fire.

Munna came home and gave his mother five thousand. She asked, "Son, this is clean money, isn't it?"

Munna said, "It's work for a mobile company."

His mother did not know any mobile company, but she recognised the national emblem on the five-thousand-rupee bundle—as though the emblem itself guaranteed truth. She put the notes into the chest. At night, faint sounds of water began to come from that chest.

Gop Kumar could not sit at ease after seeing the line "community gamification" in his file. How had a bill for breath and a payment for gaming entered the same account? He opened the line. The names appeared: Raja-Raat Interactive, India operations: legal adviser Chandrapal Batra. Foreign beneficial ownership: Gokul Star Holding, Hong Kong. Behind that came another name—Lau Kin-Hung.

To Gop, the name felt like the darkness of the previous chapter. There was no ripple inside it; there was an ocean. He typed a message to Ramaiyya: "The current runs from medicine to gaming."

Ramaiyya replied, "What do you mean by gaming?"

Gop wrote, "Gambling. But not merely gambling. Data-driven hunger. First a win, then debt, then threats."

Ramaiyya wrote, "Secure everything. And find one family this has broken upon. Numbers do not make a court weep. It needs a face."

The face was taking shape in Garh Narikel—without anyone knowing, without anyone wishing it, as though fate itself were quietly writing its next page. Ujjwal had gone deep into the game. After winning came loss, after loss double stakes, after double stakes debt. The app told him: "Credit limit opened for special player." He pressed. In a blink ten thousand. Then twenty. Then fifty. He thought he would repay it after winning. But the crocodile of the screen chews not with its tongue but with calculation.

At home Devika noticed that Ujjwal had begun speaking less. At night he went to the roof, earphones in his ears, eyes on the phone. One night Devika followed. Ujjwal was whispering into the mobile: "Brother, give me two days. No one at home knows."

A voice from the other side said, "A digital-arrest order is being prepared against you. Illegal funds have entered the account. Cooperate or the police will come to your house."

Ujjwal began to tremble. He did not understand the law, but fear of the police is inherited from one's ancestors. The person on the phone continued: "Lock the room. Keep the video on. Tell no one. This is a national investigation."

Devika listened from behind the door. The word "national" made her both laugh and fear. People who speak in the name of the nation are not always the nation; sometimes they are thieves who have wrapped themselves in the flag.

Digital arrest. It was a new term, but an old method. Earlier bandits surrounded a house at night. Now a screen surrounds the house. Earlier hands were tied with rope. Now the face is tied with a camera. Earlier a gun was shown. Now there are false seals, false uniforms, false notices.

In his office Chandrapal Batra was training a young man: "Keep the voice official. Do not hurry. First fear, then shame, then solution. The solution is always money."

The young man asked, "What if he starts crying?"

Batra smiled. "Crying is good. If he cries, he has a family. Fear for the family is the biggest bank."

At this sentence Hulasi trembled with rage in Channa Grove. She had no hands, yet she struck at the air without hands. Dust whirled through the grove. Old Man Ghost said, "Quiet. Write down his name."

Loth the clerk asked, "Batra's name?"

Old Man said, "His name goes on the offender list. But first Ujjwal's name goes on the victim list."

Ujjwal locked himself in his room. The false official told him that money had left his account, that there were terrorist transactions, hawala, arrest. Terrified, he began gathering the family's jewellery, his father's savings, loans from friends. The money went to a mule account — Munna Paswan's. Munna was then repairing a pump-set in the field; he did not know that someone else's fear was being deposited into his account.

A message arrived on Munna's phone: "Amount received. Forward it." He sent it on as the broker instructed. Five minutes later the money went to Singapore, then Hong Kong, then into a consultancy account. On paper it was written: digital-health awareness.

Gop watched the route. A line formed on his screen—from the young man in Garh Narikel to Munna's account, from there to the payment gateway, then to Raghav Somani, then Lau Kin-Hung, then Broom-Calder's "Community Innovation Fund." He rose from his chair. He felt a crocodile might crawl out of the screen.

At that moment a message came from the shadowless informer Ishan Dutt: "Seen the account?"

Gop replied, "This is not gaming. It is cannibalism."

Ishan wrote, "Not cannibalism. Name-eating. The body dies later; first the name is turned into that of a criminal."

The same happened to Ujjwal. The young man who had been cheated received a message on his phone: "You have been caught in anti-national transactions." Shame and fear climbed onto his chest. He looked at Devika but said nothing. Words die first in the presence of the person to whom they most need to be spoken.

On the third day Ujjwal left the house. He said, "I'm going to a friend's." His mother was tempering the dal. His father was searching for the field receipt. Devika saw his eyes. There was no sleep in them, only hollows. She ran after him, but Ujjwal walked fast.

He did not return by evening. The household fire was lit and extinguished twice, but Ujjwal's plate remained where it was. At night his slippers were found on the bank of the Balan. His body was found at dawn—the water was shallow, but one does not need an ocean to die. For someone already drowned within, knee-deep water is enough.

People in the village said, "He was gambling." Some said, "Weak mind." Some said, "The mobile ruined him." The police wrote, "Suicide." The bank said, "Suspicious transaction." The app said, "User violated terms." Chandrapal Batra said, "Legal risk minimal." A message from Lau Kin-Hung said, "Close account."

Only Devika Sah said, "He was killed."

That night Ujjwal's soul came to Channa Grove—new, frightened, without the weight of his old body, yet still half-dark from the glow of the screen. The ghosts were playing kabaddi, but the new soul could not enter the court. In his hand was a mobile, its screen cracked but still shining. Old Man asked him, "Name?"

Ujjwal opened his mouth, but no voice came. Numbers opened on the screen—debt, stakes, interest, fees, investigation, bail. Nowhere was there a name.

Hulasi gently touched his forehead. "Child, leave the numbers. Speak your name."

Ujjwal tried again. This time a faint voice came from his mouth: "Ujjwal."

The Raksh's light brightened in Channa Grove. Loth the clerk opened the register. Panidubbi lifted one drop from the pond and placed it upon Ujjwal's name. For one moment the crocodile inside the screen shrank.

In Delhi, Gop Kumar was reading Ujjwal's file at that very time. Through Ramaiyya he had received a short video of Devika. In the video she was not crying; looking straight into the camera, she said, "My brother was not a criminal. They frightened him. They robbed him. They allowed him to die."

Gop could not pause the video. The numbers became faces—for the first time in many years the cold columns of his Excel sheet grew warm from within. On a sheet of paper he wrote: "Ujjwal Jha: water-burial by screen."

Ramaiyya said on the phone, "This is no longer only a financial irregularity. It is a structure resembling murder."

Gop said, "What will the law call it?"

Ramaiyya did not laugh. "Get the law to Satyavrat Mehta. If it reaches Batuknath Hariharan, the case will turn into a gambling rulebook."

Satyavrat Mehta was then sitting in an online hearing. A senior lawyer, known to be close to Batuknath Hariharan, was saying, "Online gaming is skill-based, Your Lordship. Users participate voluntarily. Excessive state intervention will damage the new economy."

Satyavrat looked at the lawyer's face on the screen. He remembered: the foreign contractor had used the same argument for the bridge—"Risk is part of development." The same argument for medicine—"Flexibility in emergency procurement." Now for gaming—"voluntary." A beautiful word behind every death.

The hearing was adjourned. Another date was fixed. But this time Satyavrat wrote one sentence in his notebook: "Consent is false when an algorithm measures fear and greed in order to weave a net."

That evening Batuknath Hariharan was at a private dinner with Chandrapal Batra. Fish, files, and silence lay on the table. Hariharan said, "The young man's case could become emotional. Keep his family quiet."

Batra said, "Village people make scattered noise. We'll handle it."

Hariharan's eyes hardened. "A village is never scattered. When a village wakes, its ancestors rise too. Be careful."

For the first time Batra grew slightly uneasy. He did not believe in ghosts, but disbelief itself is one kind of fear. His Signal phone flashed. A message from L.K.: "End emotion. Compliance only."

That same night Devika Sah decided to get Ujjwal's phone to Gop Kumar. The phone was cracked, but inside were chats, threats, account details, screen recordings, false digital-arrest notices—everything. A child about Ananya's age carried the phone to the city inside the cover of a book.

The child slept on the train. In a dream he saw Channa Grove. A ghost told him, "Keep the book held against your chest. There is a name inside it." When the child awoke, the book was indeed pressed to his chest.

When Gop took the phone in his hand, its screen lit by itself. No password was needed. Ujjwal's final message remained on it: "I am not a thief."

Gop read the sentence and remained silent for a long time—as though the entire weight of Ujjwal's life were contained in those five words, and before lifting that weight he had to steady his own breath. Then he opened the folder Ishan Dutt had named "Three Parts." He added a copy of Ujjwal's phone to the first part. A second copy went to Ramaiyya. A third to the account held under the name of a dead man. A fourth copy, which had not been part of his plan, he printed onto paper.

The paper came out of the printer smelling of fresh ink. Gop touched it to his forehead. There were no figures on the page, but names: Ujjwal Jha. Munna Paswan. Devika Sah. Chandrapal Batra. Raghav Somani. Lau Kin-Hung. Batuknath Hariharan. The names were linked to one another like crocodiles forming a circle beneath the water to block their prey.

Before dawn kabaddi began again in Channa Grove. This time Ujjwal entered the court. He did not chant "kabaddi" but "I am not a thief" as he moved. On the other side the spirits, Raksh, Loth, witches, Panidubbi—all tried to touch him, but the rules had changed. A person who gets his name back is difficult to catch.

The coconut leaves moved. From the water came a sound—splash. It was not the sound of water but the sound of a screen breaking.

The morning news said, "New opportunities in the online gaming industry." At the same time, a chapter title opened in Gop Kumar's file: "The Crocodile of the Screen." He knew that the next form of water-burial had begun. The river now lived in the pocket, and the crocodile opened accounts with a thumbprint.

FOLK SONG: I AM NOT A THIEF

Folk tune: a young man's viraha

You should have told us, son, you should have told your mother,
You should have known your life was greater than the money you lost.

The screen glittered at night; the lamp of the house went out,
The crocodile of numbers slowly ate the son.
Mother asks, "How much debt?" He lowers his eyes,
A heavy stone of shame lies inside his chest.
"I am not a thief"—his final cry,

The family weeps in the mobile's broken glass.
When his name returned, the ghosts could no longer catch him,
The river of the screen burst; darkness staggered once.
Son, your life was greater than the money you lost,
Had you spoken, your mother would have become your embankment.

The screen glittered; the household lamp slowly closed its eyes,
The crocodile of numbers quietly chewed up the child.
A stone of shame on his chest, his eyes lowered,
"I am not a thief"—with only these words, his voice stopped.

CHAPTER 9

The Market in Bodies

A folder named “Guest Services” always has the price of someone’s daughter written inside it.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE DIGNITY OF THE BODY

Folk tune: women's auspicious song

Sing, sisters, sing the auspicious song of dignity, Spread the veil of respect above Phoolmati's head.

*Do not merely call the body a temple—the body has rights of its own;
Without consent, no one may open its door.*

*Phoolmati, lift your head; the fault is not yours,
The shame belongs to the offender, never to the victim.*

*Sisters will stand together; the law will offer its aid,
The name of a living woman will receive honour in history.
The song of bodily dignity will defeat the tricks of the market,
The light of free choice will shape a new society.*

*Let the offender carry the burden of guilt, not the victim;
A sister's shoulder beside a sister's—no one left alone.
From courtyard to courtroom, fearless steps will fall,
And rows of auspicious lamps will raise a new dawn.*

That night the kabaddi stopped in Channa Grove. It was an extraordinary thing. In the world of ghosts, spirits, rakshasas, corpses, water-drowned shades and witches, the rules of the game were older than death. But when Budhba Ghost entered the raid, the word “kabaddi” did not leave his mouth. His voice caught.

Hulasi, who had fallen into the well while staring at her reflection and whose death the village had recorded as a lie, asked Budhba, “Why is there no game tonight?”

Budhba raised his dark eyes. Their whites were clear, but in that whiteness now shimmered not water but walls of glass. "A new market has opened," he said, "where bodies are not sold—the fear surrounding bodies is sold."

The rakshasa, fashioned from the scraped remains of a corpse, laughed. His laughter sounded like dry bamboo snapping. "The market in bodies is ancient. It has existed since the age of kings."

Hulasi said softly, "It was old because people treated women as property. What is new is that now her shame, photograph, mobile phone, bank account, ticket and passport can all be tied with the same rope. Look at the net."

The water-drowned woman rose from the bottom of the pond. Instead of weeds, wires were tangled in her hair—blue, red, green, with tiny screens flickering among them. "This time the drowning will not be in water," she said. "This time people will drown in their own images."

In Delhi, Gop Kumar opened another file recovered from Ujjwal's phone. It contained hotel names, flight tickets, some names abbreviated and others coded. "Room—Ro7. Guest—B.H. Payment—service expense." It did not take him long to understand that B.H. stood for Batuknath Hariharan.

Ramaiyya Subramaniam was sitting across from him. He turned the mobile around, studied it, and said quietly, "The gambling money flows into another pipe. First the app sucks the blood of young people; then that blood lights the city."

Gop asked, "Is all this sex trade?"

Ramaiyya stopped him at once. "Be careful with the word. When a woman is pushed by desperation, fraud, the lure of a job, debt, fear of police, a confiscated passport, blackmail with photographs, or hunger, calling it 'trade' is the language of the crime itself. She did not create the market; the market closed around her."

Gop fell silent. In his mind the pages of Nand Aruni's old diary suddenly began to turn. He remembered: the river crocodile devoured workers' bodies, but it was easy to call them dead. Here the person remained alive, while death took place not on paper but within. The water-burial of the living is harder; the water fills them from inside rather than without.

That same day, Soumya Ramanathan was travelling by train from Patna to Delhi. She carried a file on the "Surya Shelter Service Committee." The name sounded charitable. Its papers spoke of girls' education, rehabilitation of widows, and assistance to migrant workers' families. Yet in the committee's bank records the same payment entry appeared again and again—"guest services."

Reading the file, Soumya looked out of the window. Fields ran backward, villages ran backward, station names fled past. It seemed to her that an Indian train was always travelling not merely from one place to another, but from one truth to another.

The committee was run by Malavika Green: green in name, plants in the office, smiling children on the website, and in the auditorium the slogan, "Dignity, Rehabilitation, Self-Reliance." But on Malavika's private phone was a message from Chandrapal Batra: "Two guests arriving from abroad. No old list. Need new faces. No noise."

Malavika replied, "The village girls are afraid."

Batra answered, "Fear can be cured with money. If not, with a case."

Malavika wrote again, "What if one case reaches the media?"

Raghav "Signal" Somani cut in: "Media package separately. Change faces. On paper: skills training."

These were self-erasing conversations, designed to vanish after five minutes. But Ishan Dutt, the shadowless informant, had once said, "Never trust a thing made to disappear. Even the hand that erases leaves a mark." A small program he had built was catching Signal's deleted words.

Gop Kumar ran Ishan's program. On the screen the erased messages rose like smoke and formed lines. At the end of each line appeared a time, a place and a payment account. Before Gop's eyes a map of India opened—Delhi, Meerut, Patna, Guwahati, the Nepal border, Dubai, Hong Kong. Crooked like a crocodile's path over mud, yet definite.

The connection between this net and Garh Narikel was not immediately direct. That made it more frightening. Unemployed village youths lost money in online games; their bank accounts became mule accounts; money was washed through those accounts; the same money reappeared as "guest services" in city hotels; and in those hotels foreign contractors, lawyers, brokers, officials, pharmaceutical representatives and defence advisers spent the night. In the morning they spoke about dignity, development and policy.

Hulasi listened in Channa Grove. Her body had no hands, yet that night she felt the memory of hands returning through every vein. "After I fell into the well," she said, "the village said the woman was at fault. The same blame will fall on the woman caught in this net. No one will ask who did the catching."

Budhba Ghost said, "Then change the name of guilt in this chapter. The body is not guilty. The market is. Hunger is not guilty. The one who sells hunger is. Shame is not guilty. The one who turns shame into a rope is."

That evening a private dinner was being held for Batuknath Hariharan in a South Delhi hotel. The official reason was a consultation on legal reform. Guards stood at the entrance; inside hung glass chandeliers; on the tables were imported water, fish, wine and fruit, and smiles in every corner. Hariharan wore his habitual mild smile. No one looking at it could have guessed how many dates, bribes, blackmails and bodies were hidden behind it.

Chandrapal Batra sat beside him. His suit was new, but a fine layer of dust lay on his shoes. The lanes of Meerut, police-station verandas, gambling rooms, forged notices and threats of debt recovery clung to those shoes, however expensive the leather.

Hariharan asked, "Has the Ujjwal matter quietened down?"

Batra said, "The sister has not gone quiet. The phone may have got out."

For the first time irritation crossed Hariharan's face. "A phone is more dangerous than a body. A body grows tired. A phone remembers."

Batra said softly, "Malavika is preparing a list. We can assist one or two households. Waive debts. Silence will be cheaper."

Hariharan looked at him. "Silence is never cheap. Silence is a loan. It returns with interest. But that is why I am here." He laughed. "If a case comes, question the victim's character, not the institution. It is an old method."

At that sentence a decorative coconut on the table rolled off by itself. Everyone startled. Hariharan's aide picked it up and replaced it. Someone joked, "Must be a southern coconut."

Batra did not laugh. He remembered Hariharan's earlier words: "When the village wakes, the ancestors rise."

On the third floor of the same hotel, a young woman named Phoolmati was looking out of a window. In the file she was "F.M." On paper she was a "trainee." In truth she had been recruited from the Madhubani bus stand with the promise of a job—elder care in the city, fifteen thousand rupees a month. Five thousand had been sent home the first month. Her phone was taken away the second. In the third month she was told to repay her debt.

Phoolmati was not from Garh Narikel, but her maternal grandmother had come from a hamlet near Channa Grove. Her grandmother used to say, "When dogs cry at night for no reason, know that some soul is asking for a road." Phoolmati had heard dogs many nights in that hotel, though dogs were forbidden inside.

That evening she was ordered to change rooms. Room R07. The moment she reached the door, a voice from inside said, "Sign the paper first.” She was handed a form titled “Voluntary Service Agreement.” She could not read it. She had been taught: wherever they ask for your name, put your thumbprint.

At that moment she saw her grandmother’s face in the glass of the door. Her grandmother was dead. But in Garh Narikel the dead were never too late to offer advice. The face said, “No thumbprint.”

Phoolmati stopped her hand. In that small pause lay an entire rebellion, unseen by anyone, yet fought inside her soul like the greatest battle of her life.

Down in the lobby Malavika Green’s phone buzzed. A message from Raghav Signal: “F.M. uncooperative. Option?”

Malavika typed, “Frighten her?”

Raghav: “Family.”

Two minutes later the phone taken from Phoolmati was shown to her. On the screen was a photograph of her home: her mother, her little brother, the tiled-roof house, and the debt papers. Phoolmati understood—the body was imprisoned in the city, but the fear was tied back in the village.

At that very moment Soumya Ramanathan stepped from a taxi outside the hotel. She had an invitation from Malavika’s committee to a “Dialogue on Women’s Dignity.” She was a researcher and invited guest, due to speak on the stage downstairs. She did not know that on the third floor of the same building, dignity was being asked for a thumbprint on paper.

Soumya mounted the stage. Malavika sat in the first row, two lawyers in the second, representatives of a foreign company in the third. At the rear, Batuknath Hariharan had arrived for five minutes and was already preparing to leave.

Soumya took the microphone. She had a written speech on rehabilitation policy, labour protection and transparency. But the moment she noticed a decorative coconut at the left of the stage, Budhba Ghost of Channa Grove came to mind. She folded away the speech.

“Dignity is not charity,” Soumya said. “Dignity is something no one has the right to take away. When a body is demanded in the name of employment, when silence is purchased in the name of assistance, when fear is written into a contract—then an institution is not a service. It is a market.”

The air in the hall grew slightly heavier. Malavika’s smile hardened. Hariharan glanced at his phone. A message from Batra read, “This woman is dangerous.”

Hariharan replied, “Do not question a dangerous woman’s character. Question her funding. Researchers fear questions about funding.”

Upstairs on the third floor, Phoolmati still refused to put her thumbprint on the form. The man before her gripped her shoulder. Phoolmati did not scream. She only said, “My name is Phoolmati. Not F.M.”

Her voice did not reach the auditorium below. It reached Channa Grove. Hulasi stood up—a handless body, yet at that moment filled with the strength of twelve hundred years of silence breaking at once. For the first time Budhba sent her into the raid. Hulasi entered chanting “Phoolmati.” The rules of kabaddi broke: a dead woman was running with a living woman’s name.

In his small Delhi room, Gop Kumar was not watching any live broadcast. But Ishan Dutt’s program showed movement in the third-floor CCTV server. No clear images appeared, only timestamps, doors opening and closing, phone locations and payment matches. Yet data can scream in its own way.

Gop called Ramaiyya. “Soumya is in that same hotel.”

Ramaiyya broke his silence and stood. “Tell her immediately.”

Gop’s fingers trembled, but he did not stop. He typed: “Third floor. R07. F.M. Be careful.”

The message flashed on Soumya’s phone in the middle of her speech. She read it. Her voice paused for a moment. Then she said into the microphone, “Dignity is not discussed in an auditorium. It is tested beyond the door. I will end here.”

Malavika panicked. “But the programme on stage—”

Soumya stepped down. Two journalists, who had been sitting in hope of dinner, followed out of curiosity. Hariharan rose to leave, but for the first time his movements were hurried. Batra ran toward the lift.

When Soumya reached R07 on the third floor, the door was locked from inside. She laid a hand on it. From within came a suppressed voice: “My name is Phoolmati.”

Soumya turned to the journalists’ mobile cameras and said loudly, “Go live.”

Those two words carried a strange power of the modern age. What would become a date in court, a compromise at the police station, or confidentiality inside an institution became, through a live stream, a face at once. The door opened. The people inside covered their faces. Phoolmati stepped out trembling, but with her name intact.

Malavika came shouting, "She is a trainee! This is a misunderstanding!"

For the first time Phoolmati raised her voice. "I am not a trainee. I am Phoolmati. Let me call home."

Within five minutes the live video had reached thousands of phones. Devika Sah watched it. On the screen of Ujjwal's dead phone, the voice of another living woman now sounded. Devika did not cry. She only said, "The name is returning again."

Chandrapal Batra slipped out through the hotel's rear door. On his signal phone a message from L.K. appeared: "Reduce noise. Cost?"

Batra wrote, "Increased."

L.K.: "Hariharan?"

Batra: "Active."

L.K.: "Not one woman. Save the network."

The message erased itself. Ishan's program caught it again.

Late that night Satyavrat Mehta watched the same video in his government residence. A file awaited his opinion on "the validity of a voluntary service agreement." He paused the video. Phoolmati's words returned again and again: "My name is Phoolmati."

Satyavrat stared into emptiness for a long while. Then he wrote on the paper, "Voluntariness is impossible within fear."

Then another line: "A court should question the structure, not the character."

Writing those two lines, he felt ashamed of his own profession. How often in court had the victim's life, family, clothes, friends, phone, photographs and travels been questioned, but not the source of the money? How often had lawyers translated bodily pain into a grammar of "consent"? He understood that law too could sometimes resemble a crocodile—it did not bite directly; first it surrounded its victim in silence.

Batuknath Hariharan sat that night in his study, portraits of great jurists on the walls and a red file on the desk. He told his aide, "Find Phoolmati's family's old debts. Send Soumya a notice about foreign funding. Defamation cases against the journalists. Find where Gop Kumar's name appears."

The aide asked, "Satyavrat Mehta?"

Hariharan was silent. Then he said, "He is difficult. Do not confront him directly; surround him with paper. Honest people trust paper. Paper tolerates more lies than they do."

That night the game resumed in Channa Grove. This time kabaddi had three raids. The first belonged to the drowned workers. The second to Ujjwal. The third to Phoolmati's name. The ghosts ran chanting names. The rakshasas cast light. The corpses ceased to be spectators and became witnesses.

Hulasi entered the raid and said, "My name is Hulasi. My death was not suicide."

Phoolmati's name joined hers in the air: "My name is Phoolmati. My body is not a market."

The water-drowned woman raised her face above the pond. The wires tangled in her hair slowly began to loosen. She said, "When a name is taken away, there is water-burial without water. When a name is returned, the body begins to find its road home again."

By morning the language of the news had changed. Some channels said, "Controversy at dignity organisation." Some said, "Trainee makes allegations." Some stayed silent. But the video was travelling from phone to phone. A name asks no one's permission.

Gop Kumar added a new heading to his file—"The Market in Bodies." As he wrote it, his hand grew heavy, as if the letters themselves knew their weight. Beneath the heading he made three columns: Fear, Payment, Protection. Under Fear: Phoolmati. Under Payment: Chandrapal Batra, Raghav Somani, Lau Kin-Hung. Under Protection: Batuknath Hariharan. At the edge he wrote one name separately—Satyavrat Mehta. Beside it, a question mark.

He knew that someone within the law was waking too. But waking was not enough. There were many crocodiles.

The coconut leaves moved in the morning breeze—softly yet firmly, like a weary witness repeating his evidence one final time. Their friction produced a sound: "Name." Then another: "Consent." Then a third: "Fear." And at last came one heavy splash, not in water but inside paper.

After that night the criminal web in Gop's file stood clear—the bridge workers, the breath of the pandemic, gambling on the screen, the market in bodies. They were not separate. They were circles drawn on water. At the centre stood the human being. Crocodiles on every side.

FOLK SONG: PHOOLMATT'S VEIL

Folk tune: women's lament

Lift it, sister, lift your head,

The fault is not yours—go on singing this truth.

The folder says service; inside it is a daughter's price,
In the bright city lights, names kept being sold.
On Phoolmati's veil lies not shame but a wound;
Cover the offender's face, do not brand the daughter.
The column of fear is long; the night of payment darker,

How many chests lie dried beneath the seal of protection.
The leaf says: without consent the body is no market;
A living woman's name too has a right to history.
Sister, lift your head; the fault is not yours,
One testimony from you will break the crocodile's earth.

Whose name was sold beneath the white city lights?
Upon the veil is written not shame, but a wound;
Cover the offender's face—the daughter is innocent.

CHAPTER 10

Blackmail of Privacy

A body may be sold once; privacy can be sold again and again.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE THRESHOLD OF PRIVACY

Folk tune: auspicious dialogue of women friends

*Sister, guard the threshold that is yours,
The key is yours, the story is yours—remember this in your heart.*

*Sister, your threshold is yours, the key rests in your hand;
Whoever enters the house inside your phone must come by the road of consent.*

*Return shame to the offender, never lay it on the victim;
When three lamps burn together, blackmail is not so heavy.*

*Name, love and testimony together will make a circle of protection;
Law, technology and friendship will extend the hand of trust.*

*At privacy's threshold draw an alpaca of dignity;
Tell your own story to the world, without fear and on your own terms.*

There is a courtyard inside the phone as well; draw an alpaca there too;

The trick of anyone who peers in without asking will break.

Light three lamps together—name, love, testimony;

Carry your own story before the world on your own terms.

That night the ghosts in Channa Grove were again playing kabaddi, but the boundary of the game had changed. Earlier the line was drawn on the earth; now the water-drowned woman drew it in the air with her wet hair. The line glowed like a phone screen in darkness. When a ghost crossed it, what opened was not an old name but a hidden memory.

Hulasi entered the raid. The moment she touched the line, everyone saw the night of the well—she bent over the water to look at her face, her foot slipped, and the village called her death a suicide. Husasi did not tremble. She stood and said, “Look. This is not my shame. It is the village’s lie.”

Budhba Ghost smiled. “When a person tells her pain in her own voice, half the teeth of blackmail break.”

But not every soul is so brave. A living person has blood in the body, a family, a livelihood, photographs in a mobile phone, and the eyes of society upon them. Those eyes are often harsher than a court, more merciless than the police, and more curious than the criminal.

In Delhi a new name opened inside Gop Kumar’s file—Mrinalini Arya. The file did not contain her full name, only “M.A.” She had studied abroad, worked as a technology-law adviser, wrote on data rights, and was a distant descendant of the Garh Narikel line. At home she was called Meera. Her link with Garh Narikel was so remote that as a child she had thought the village’s name belonged to a story, not to geography.

Meera had first entered Gop Kumar’s file as a researcher. She had once said, “Data becomes dangerous when the owner of it is a criminal and the subject of it is poor.” Gop did not like her at first, because she questioned everything. Ramaiyya used to say, “This girl is not a lawyer; she is a knife. She cuts paper.”

Meera did not hide her private life, but she knew that society finds ways to imprison even people who live openly. She loved a woman named Aditi. The love itself was simple—the trust between two people. But the world can turn simple things into danger, especially when they can be used to buy money, status, silence or testimony.

Copies of Meera and Aditi’s private messages, travel bookings, photographs, hotel receipts and medical consultations reached Chandrapal Batra’s gang. They ceased to be records of love and became merchandise for blackmail. Batra’s people wrote, “Stay away from Gop’s file. Otherwise we will send everything to your family, the media, the Bar and the university.”

The message arrived on Signal, designed to disappear after five minutes. But a threat does not live for five minutes. It takes up residence in the mind, and it is much harder to erase from there.

For the first time Meera was afraid—not of her love, but of the possibility of silence within her own family. Her fear was not love. It was the face of her elderly mother, her father’s silence, the whispering of aunts, the family’s honour, society’s endless courtroom. She knew the criminals would not call themselves criminals; they would call her “immoral,” “deviant,” “Western,” “anti-family.” In India, words like these can sometimes cut more sharply than weapons.

That night Meera sat alone in her room. Delhi traffic moved outside; inside came the faint hum of a hard drive. No voice would come from her mouth. She opened Gop's number and closed it. She opened Soumya's and closed it. Her finger stopped on Aditi's name.

Aditi called first. "I got the message too," she said.

Meera remained silent.

Aditi neither laughed nor cried. "People who turn the proof of love into evidence of a crime are the greatest cowards. Do not give them the right to make your decision."

Meera asked quietly, "Your family?"

"My family will understand me slowly. Some will never understand. But I own my life. The criminals do not."

To Meera, the sentence was like a dead woman in Channa Grove hearing her own name returned to her ears. The weight did not become lighter, but the strength to carry it increased. She ended the call and wrote to Gop Kumar: "I am sending the blackmail documents. One condition: do not make this case about homosexuality. Make it about the attack on privacy, fear used against consent, and the criminal network."

Gop replied, "Agreed. Not the individual—the structure."

Meera smiled. "This time you learned."

When Soumya Ramanathan came to meet her, Meera opened the door and said at once, "I will not speak as a victim. I will speak as a witness."

Soumya nodded. "The difference is that people listen to a victim's story with pity. They listen to a witness's story with fear."

Meera opened her laptop. The folders were arranged in order: "Threats," "Accounts," "Chats," "Servers," "Batra," "Hariharan," "L.K." Gop and Ramaiyya arrived. Ramaiyya remained silent; such a long silence was rare for him.

Meera laid out the papers. The first page was a threat sent by Chandrapal Batra's aide. The second contained Raghav Signal Somani's code. The third showed payment through a Hong Kong server. The fourth was a donation to an Indian legal forum bearing Batuknath Hariharan's signature. The fifth showed that the sponsor of a Bar Council programme was the same company concealed within the ownership of the online gaming operation.

Gop said slowly, "This is not a private threat. It is a machine for stopping testimony."

"Yes," Meera replied. "And this machine runs under different names against women, queer people, the poor, widows, workers and students."

For one person it is a photograph, for another a debt, a caste, a love, a bank account.”

Ramaiyya spoke for the first time. “The crocodiles may think every body has a different flavour, but they keep the same teeth.”

In Channa Grove, Budhba Ghost burst into laughter at that sentence. The rakshasas began casting light. The wires caught in the water-drowned woman’s hair suddenly straightened like strands of current in a river.

Meera played a short video from her file. Chandrapal Batra did not appear anywhere in it, but the shadow of his voice did. One man said, “Once her character is exposed, the case will collapse by itself.” Another said, “What will it cost to make her private life public?” A third said, “Hariharan sir says: fear first, settlement afterward.”

Gop’s hands turned cold, as if his body itself had measured the chill of this truth. He remembered Nand Aruni’s bridge register, where dead workers had been marked “absent.” Here the person was alive, but “character” was being written in place of personality. This too was a technique of making someone absent.

That evening Satyavrat Mehta received a sealed envelope with no sender’s name. Inside was a note prepared by Meera: “Privacy protection, the dignity of testimony and the legal meaning of blackmail within the state and criminal networks.” Copies of the threats were enclosed.

As Satyavrat Mehta read the note, he rose from his chair and walked to the window. Delhi’s sky was hazy. Far away, a wedding band was playing. He remembered how often courts questioned the individual rather than the structure: “How did you live?” “Whom did you meet?” “Why this photograph?” “What was your relationship?” Not every question asked by law seeks truth; some are asked to manufacture shame.

He wrote on the paper: “When a witness’s privacy has been turned into material for blackmail, the court’s first duty is to protect the witness’s dignity.”

Then he wrote another line: “The law’s duty is not to judge love, but to identify the source of fear.”

As he wrote it, he understood that he was slowly becoming something other than a government lawyer. He still represented the state, but the human being inside the state was waking. The awakening was not pleasant; it spread through the body like thorns.

At the same time, a separate meeting was under way in Batuknath Hariharan’s office. Framed words covered the walls—justice, purity, legal tradition, constitution. Tea sat on the table. Inside were Batuknath, Chandrapal Batra, Raghav Signal Somani and two unnamed advocates.

Hariharan asked sharply, "Is Meera under control?"

Batra wrinkled his nose. "People educated abroad are emotional. They think truth has a market."

Raghav ran a finger over his phone. "Shall we release her data?"

Hariharan shook his head slowly. "No. Not yet. First create the language with which to discredit her. Data will be the last weapon. First say foreign conspiracy. Say attack on Indian culture. Say an attempt to influence the judicial process. Say her private life makes her testimony unreliable."

One advocate asked, "But the matter is online gambling, mule accounts, digital arrest, trafficking—"

Hariharan cut him off. "The issue is whatever we make it. The public reads headlines, not facts."

Chandrapal Batra laughed. "That was the first thing I learned in Meerut—win the story before you win the case."

In the middle of the meeting, a glass on the table began sweating by itself. The room was air-conditioned. Where had the water come from? Raghav did not notice, but Batra did. The moisture ran down and formed letters on the tabletop: "NAME."

He wiped the water away quickly with a handkerchief. Hariharan looked at him. "Afraid of ghosts?"

"Not ghosts," Batra said hard. "Records."

That same night in Garh Narikel, Ba opened her old chest. She had never met Meera directly, but she remembered every branching line of the family. Her finger moved across the old genealogy. "Mrinalini" had been written there in fresh ink. Ba murmured, "When a daughter of the lineage writes her own name, society cannot cut her out."

Aruni asked, "Ba, who told you that?"

Ba replied, "Hulasi came from the direction of Channa Grove last night. She said women have begun speaking their own names now."

Aruni said nothing. Village words can sound strange to city ears, yet some of them return as truth in the city. A message from Gop reached him: "Meera will testify."

Aruni thought: the novel was no longer only about water-burial. Water devoured the body; the screen devoured privacy; the courtroom devoured the name; the market devoured dignity. Yet the method of death was the same everywhere—first isolate the person.

Meera began writing her statement. The first sentence was: "I am a lesbian, but in this case that fact is not an allegation, only background; the crime is that my privacy was used as a weapon to stop my testimony.” She paused. Then she changed it: “What I am is not my crime. The crime is that criminals are using it to manufacture fear.”

Soumya read it and smiled. “Keep the second sentence. The first sounds like law; the second sounds like life.”

Meera kept it.

Then she tried to remove Aditi’s name. Aditi stopped her. “Let my name stay too. Half the force of the blackmail will break there.”

“You will be in danger,” Meera said.

“The danger already exists,” Aditi replied. “A name will only change its direction.”

The decision was not simple. Neither woman cried. They sat holding each other’s hands without words, as if silence itself were the greatest assurance. Outside, rain began over Delhi. Water struck the window like some old river knocking on the city’s glass.

Gop Kumar redrew the map in his file—not by erasing the old lines, but by adding new ones, like a mapmaker admitting his own earlier mistake. Until then the flow of crime had seemed to begin with money—accounts, payments, companies. Now he understood that its first stream began with fear. Money flowed later. He drew three circles: Fear, Data, Money. At their centre: the human being. Outside: the crocodile.

Ramaiyya said, “Add the next circle—Law.”

Gop asked, “Outside?”

“No,” said Ramaiyya. “Law is another kind of river. If you can cross it, it may save you. If you are caught in it, it may sweep you away. Satyavrat Mehta may be able to build a boat. Hariharan builds dams in which the water rots.”

That night Ishan Dutt, the shadowless informant, appeared in person after a long absence. The door did not open; he was simply standing inside. Gop startled. Light fell on Ishan’s body, but no shadow appeared.

Ishan said, “Tell Meera to preserve her original phone. There are many copies, but in court the original object is like a soul.”

Gop asked, “Where did you come from?”

Ishan laughed. “When your name has died in government records, a door is only a habit, not a necessity.”

He handed Gop a small memory device. “This contains another set of Raghav Signal’s deleted messages. Hariharan thinks Meera is alone. But the network is afraid of her because if a private threat becomes public evidence, its strongest armour breaks.”

Gop held the device. It weighed almost nothing. Yet inside it were sealed the fear, love, debt and silence of countless people.

At first light, Meera, Aditi, Soumya, Gop and Ramaiyya gathered for a small meeting. Devika Sah came too. Phoolmati had been moved to a safe place. A video statement was to be recorded. Meera sat before the camera.

She said, “My name is Mrinalini Arya. I am called Meera. My private life belongs to me. It was stolen and used to frighten me because I am going to testify about a criminal network. Online gambling, mule accounts, digital arrest, human trafficking, court delays and money laundering are connected within this network. My love was turned into a weapon to silence me. I will not be silent.”

No one applauded. Applause was unnecessary, because Meera had spoken not for praise but for truth alone. Sometimes silence after truth is the greatest honour.

Devika said softly, “Add Ujjwal’s name too.”

Meera lowered her head. “Ujjwal Jha did not die merely because he lost at an online game. Fear pushed him. His phone, his debt, his threats—all were part of this network.”

Gop stopped the recording. He understood that the chapter had changed. The criminals would now fight not merely to save money, but to save the story they had built around themselves.

Far away in Channa Grove, the kabaddi ended. The ghosts were tired, but there was relief in the fatigue. Budhba Ghost erased the glowing screen-line drawn across the earth. Hulasi asked, “You erased the line?”

“No,” Budhba said. “Who can erase the line that has now been drawn inside people?”

The coconut leaves moved. In their sound came three words: “Name. Love. Testimony.” Then a long silence. It was not the silence of fear, but of preparation.

The chapter had not ended; only the next face of the crime was about to open. The stream of money would now turn toward weapons, drugs and terror financing. But on this night Meera had saved her name. And when a name survives, history can be written again through it.

FOLK SONG: THE BROKEN THRESHOLD OF PRIVACY

Folk tune: dialogue song of women friends

Listen, sister, tell your own story yourself,
Keep the key of consent in your own hand.

Sister, the body may be violated once, the image again and again;
A thief sits inside the phone and opens the walls of the home.
Meera's name was put up for sale, but her voice did not surrender;
Shame returned to the offender and did not weigh upon the victim.
The line was erased from the earth, yet remained drawn within;

Name, love and testimony—the three lamps burned again.
The stream of money turned toward weapons in the dark;
A woman saved her own name and remade history.
Sister, your story is yours; consent is your doorway;
The one who steals privacy has no right to it.

The body may be violated once, the image again and again;
The thief seated inside the phone opens the walls of the home.
The line on the earth was erased; the inner line stayed firm;
All three lamps—name, love, testimony—burned bright.

CHAPTER II

The Black River of Money

Ghosts do not breathe, yet they grow tired—the fatigue belongs not to the body, but to testimony.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: A GREEN BOAT ON THE BLACK RIVER

Folk tune: a blend of transplanting song and boatman's song

*Set the green boat afloat upon the black current,
Return the price of labour and sweat; sow happiness in every home.*

*The black river of money flows—launch the green boat,
Name, evidence, memory and courage are its four oars.
Cross account after account and return the worker's due;
See the human face behind each number and make the reckoning clean.*

*The village's spoken fire can dry the black current,
And with a people's shared watch, money can return to service.
Across the black river, the green boat will carry trust,
And a worker's earnings will reach the child at home through justice.*

*Arrange the accounts as cleanly as rows of women transplanting rice;
See a face in every number—do not lose the human being.
The village's oral fire will burn away the black mist;
The green boat will cut through the waves and reach the ghat of justice.*

That night, after Mrinalini Arya's testimony had been recorded and the theft of her private life had become evidence of a crime, the kabaddi in Channa Grove did not stop. The game only slowed. Ghosts do not breathe, but they grow weary; their weariness belongs not to the body but to memory. They looked from face to face as if asking: which crocodile will come out next?

Budhba Ghost climbed down from his branch. For a moment, twelve hundred years of patience seemed to have weakened. His feet usually hovered a finger's breadth above the ground, but that night even that small distance trembled. The soil of Channa Grove began to grow wet from within. Not with water, but with a subterranean current that shone black.

Hulasi asked, "Is this the Kamala's water again?"

The Brahma of the pipal opened all four mouths at once. One mouth answered, the second contradicted it, the third remained silent, and on the tongue of the fourth lay a taste of metal.

"No," Budhba said. "This is not water. Money is flowing. When money turns very black, it flows like water, burns like fire, and bites like a crocodile."

The half-eaten corpse, who until then had been a spectator, rose and entered the game for the first time. No voice came from his half-scraped mouth, but in his eyes lay a scene—iron boxes, white powder, a distant border, and a child whom someone had taught that death in the name of religion could also be a business.

There was no longer a boundary in Channa Grove. The kabaddi field slowly became a ledger. Account numbers began glowing where the ghosts' feet had stood. Numbers ran through the veins of every fallen leaf. In the water tangled through the drowned woman's hair, a boat appeared: "medicine" written outside, narcotics within. On another box: "agricultural equipment," sealed metal parts inside. On a third: "relief material," and inside it, fear.

At that time, in the small city room, Gop Kumar, Soumya Ramanathan, Ramaiyya Subramaniam, Devika Sah, Mrinalini and Ishan Dutt were seated together. After giving her statement, Meera was silent. Her eyes were tired, but there was no fear in them.

Ishan Dutt cast no shadow that day either. The bulb behind his body made only an empty patch of light on the wall. He placed a second memory device on the table.

"This is not the first device," he said. "The first held the theft of privacy. This one holds the journey of money. If the first theft opened the inner room of a person, this second theft opens the belly of a country."

Gop inserted the device into the computer. At first the screen showed nothing. Then, against a black background, a single word appeared: "Current."

Ramaiyya tried to laugh. "Current? A river?"

Ishan nodded. "Money. This network gives its accounts the names of rivers—Kamala, Balan, Ganga, Sindhu, Mekong, Pearl. When money leaves India, they say: the water has receded. When criminal money returns from abroad, they say: the flood has come."

Soumya leaned toward the screen. Dates appeared. Old payments from the bridge project. Foreign consultancy fees. Fake bills for safety inspections. Then the years jumped to pandemic procurement—oxygen, vials, beds, plastic protective clothing. Then came payments for online gambling. Mule accounts. Digital arrest. And afterward those account lines flowed into a new column: “Metal,” “Dust,” “Route,” “Prayer.”

Devika asked, “Prayer?”

Ishan’s face went pale. “It is code. In this network, terror financing is called prayer. Those who sell fear also steal language. Criminals give sacred names to sin so that the soul of the person reading the accounts grows tired.”

Mrinalini said softly, “When my love was turned into a weapon, I understood that these people change the meaning of names. Love becomes shame. Shame becomes silence. Silence becomes safety. Now they are turning prayer into fear.”

Gop opened a folder called “Lakhera Consultancy.” Inside were many legal opinions signed by Chandrapal Batra. The language was polished and proper. Every sentence looked as though a white cloth had been draped over the body of a crime.

Chandrapal Batra had an LL.B. from Meerut. People in Garh Narikel did not know his name; the city’s darkness called him “Batra sahib.” He said, “I provide only lawful advice.” Yet after his advice, someone’s account opened, another closed, a phone began ringing, and someone’s son hanged himself.

Law books stood on Chandrapal’s table, but beneath them lay another ledger—identity papers of young people, student bank details, private photographs of women, thumbprints of labourers. He did not look like a criminal; he placed cultivated signatures on paper. That was what made him dangerous.

Batuknath Hariharan protected him. President of the Bar Council, lion of the dais, master of speech. He spoke of legal ethics as though the court were his private temple. But the bags delivered to him at night were not temple offerings; they were prices placed upon the throat of justice.

There was a cupboard in the back room of Hariharan’s house. It held not files, but mobile phones. Each phone carried a different name. On some phones no one ever spoke; only disappearing messages arrived. Raghav Somani—whom everyone called “Raghav Signal”—lived at once inside all of them.

Raghav Signal’s rule was: leave no voice, no paper, no face. Ishan Dutt laughed. “The more someone tries to erase traces, the more traces he creates. The act of erasing is itself evidence.”

Some of Raghav's deleted messages returned to life on the screen, not as whole sentences but fragments: "percentage from L.K.," "speak to Batra.," "Hariharan safe.," "delete youth list.," "metal consignment separate.," "dust via Nepal route.," "prayer old route..."

"L.K.?" Ramaiyya asked.

Ishan replied, "Lau Kin-Hung. The real kingpin in Hong Kong. He does not want to appear directly in the story. To him India is not a market but a mine—a mine of bodies, fear, data and vulnerable young people. He says greed is cheap in poor countries. What he does not understand is that memory is expensive in poor countries."

Soumya opened a file. It contained names of ports, border towns, bills for hospital supplies, receipts for defence consultancy, and donations to institutions publicly established in the name of peace, education and health.

"Look here," Soumya said. "The medicine truck is insured by the same company. The arms consultancy fee comes through the same foundation. Gambling payments use the same payment gateway. The trafficking hotel bills are tied to the same corporate event. And finally some of the money reaches groups that spread violent propaganda."

Gop's body turned cold—a cold born not of weather but of the weight of truth. He remembered the bridge's old list: thirty names, three hundred corpses. Then bodies had fallen into the Ganga; now sums of money fell into accounts across countries. Every fall made a different sound, but the essence was the same: splash.

The night deepened. A dog barked outside. In the light of the screen, every face in the room looked as though the dead had gathered around a candle.

Devika asked, "Where did Ujjwal's money go?"

Gop opened Ujjwal's account. First small deposits, then small withdrawals, then suddenly numbers shaped like debt; afterward threatening messages, debt collection, fake notices of digital arrest, and then the money split among thirty-five small accounts. Of those thirty-five, twelve belonged to students, seven to rickshaw drivers, three to elderly widows, five to unemployed men, and the rest to false names.

Devika was silent for a while. Her hand remained still on the table, but in her eyes a question stored for years was finally finding its answer. Then she said, "So my brother did not commit suicide. He was pushed."

No one answered. Some truths are such that saying "yes" is cruel and saying "no" is a lie.

Mrinalini took Devika's hand. "They frightened me with my private life. Your brother with debt. Phoolmati with her body. The worker with hunger. These fears look different, but the owner of the fear is the same."

Ishan opened the next folder: "Border."

It contained a map, but not a complete one. No route was clearly drawn; there were only red points. Soumya said at once, "We will not publish this. If the route details get out, other criminals could use them. We need evidence, not a method."

Gop nodded. "The novel too will not become a manual for crime. It will show how a criminal system is formed, not how to pick its locks."

Ishan smiled. "That is why I have blurred some parts. Truth does not mean revealing everything. Truth means putting light in the right place."

The next image was an old video. A foreign auditorium. Edward Broom on stage. A blue curtain behind him, and above it the words "Global Enterprise and Human Dignity." He spoke while the audience applauded. Beneath each sentence of his speech, Ishan had added an account line in red. Under "dignity": dead workers. Under "partnership": fake bills. Under "safety": missing helmets. Under "innovation": gambling app.

Ramaiyya stood up from his chair, his voice carrying anger suppressed for a long time. "Do these people's souls never tremble?"

Ba used to say: when a person's soul dies, the body becomes even more successful. That night Gop remembered Ba.

For the first time Satyavrat Mehta's name entered the room. Ishan said, "A copy of all this must reach Satyavrat Mehta."

Gop was startled. "The government's top lawyer?"

"Yes," said Ishan. "Not every office is corrupt. Some offices are tests for good people sitting in bad chairs. Mehta will first argue the state's case. But if he sees the whole picture, the human being inside him may fight the lie written by the state."

Soumya looked doubtful. "And if he too is part of Hariharan's net?"

Ishan kept looking at the wall where his shadow did not fall. "Then behind us stands Channa Grove."

Elsewhere in Delhi, Batuknath Hariharan was awake late in a luxurious building. Chandrapal Batra sat before him. Between them stood a glass tumbler, dried fruit and a small phone. The phone carried no name.

Batra said, "Meera has gone public. Devika too. Gop's source is from inside."

Hariharan laughed. "Many people testify. Testimony is not born in court; it is raised by procedure. I know procedure."

The phone lit up. A message from Raghav Signal: "L.K. asks: how much risk?"

Batra typed, "Under control. Watch Mehta."

Hariharan stopped him. "Do not write Mehta's name."

Batra deleted the message. But before it vanished, the flash on the screen travelled all the way to a leaf in Channa Grove and lodged there.

In the third watch of the night, coconut leaves in Garh Narikel moved without wind. Budhba Ghost looked up. A word glowed on a leaf: "Mehta."

Hulasi asked, "Who is that?"

Budhba said, "Among the living there is sometimes someone who is made great not by his office, but by his remorse. We shall see whether this man enters the water or remains standing on the bank."

At that very time Satyavrat Mehta was in his study. A fresh government affidavit lay before him: on the old bridge disaster, "no additional deaths established"; on digital fraud, "individual financial imprudence"; on procurement of medicines, "emergency administrative decisions"; on foreign payments, "lawful commercial transactions."

He grew tired as he read. He loved the language of law, but that night it felt like a sheet thrown over corpses.

There was no knock on the door. Yet an envelope appeared on his desk. It was damp. There was no name on it, only a small mark of a Garh Narikel coconut leaf.

Mehta's hand stopped of its own accord, as though his body had warned him before his mind did. He opened the envelope. Inside was one page containing only three lines:

Not thirty names—three hundred.

Not debt—a push.

Not trade—a black river.

Alongside the page lay a memory device. Mehta stared at it. He understood that the moment he touched that small object, his office, reputation, friendships and sleep would all be tested.

Outside Delhi that same night, boxes were being shifted in a warehouse. "School sports equipment" was printed on them. One worker asked, "Balls this heavy?" His companion silenced him. A small slip fell near the worker's foot: "Not Ganga route. Dry route."

The worker could not read. But the dust clinging to the slip sent its smell all the way to Channa Grove. The ghosts abandoned the kabaddi and wrinkled their noses. Ghosts do not fear a smell, but this was the smell not of bodily death, but of the death of society.

Soumya spent the night separating papers. She made four lists: evidence that could be made public, evidence that must be kept secure, evidence for the court, and evidence that would remain sealed so that the routes of crime could not be reproduced.

Gop asked, "What now?"

Ishan said, "Now we break three dams in the black river of money. First—the court. Second—public memory. Third—the international forum."

Mrinalini added, "And a fourth—the shame people carry. When people give testimony without shame, half the strength of the net will collapse."

Devika set Ujjwal's photograph on the table. "I will begin."

At that moment a new message appeared on the screen. No sender. Only one line: "The more names you join, the more corpses you will find."

Silence fell through the room. Ramaiyya spoke first. "The corpses already exist. By joining the names, at least we give them their funeral fire."

Far away in Channa Grove, kabaddi began again. This time the chant had changed. Instead of "kabaddi," the ghosts called in turn: "Current of money, dust of bodies, fire of names."

The corpse stood in the middle of the field. For the first time his half-scraped mouth opened fully. He did not speak, yet everyone heard: "Water-burial used to happen in the river. Now water-burial happens inside accounts."

The first dew of dawn settled on the coconut leaves. Each drop contained a number. Slowly the numbers became names. Budhba Ghost kept reading those names until sunrise.

When the sun rose, Channa Grove looked ordinary again. But ordinary things are often the most frightening, because they can hide the extraordinary inside themselves.

Gop Kumar made three copies of the memory device, without haste, like a priest checking the materials for a ritual three times. One copy for Satyavrat Mehta, one for Ira Aruni abroad, and one to be hidden in the hollow of the old pipal in Channa Grove.

Soumya asked, "Why the pipal?"

Gop said, "If every server is shut down, if every court turns its face away, if every country drapes its flag over a lie—then at least the ghosts of Garh Narikel will know where the river of money flowed from."

Ishan Dutt moved toward the door. His feet made no sound. "If one person dies, another will speak. If the second is silenced, a third will fall from the tree."

In the light of dawn his body looked transparent. For a moment everyone felt he was not a man but a page that had stepped outside government records.

He left. Still no shadow followed him. But on the table where he had been sitting remained a small damp mark, curved like a crocodile's tooth and green like a coconut leaf.

Gop kept looking at the mark. It seemed to him that the crocodile had already come out of the river. It no longer bit with teeth but with accounts. A youth who opened a bank account in his own name did not know whose death might be purchased through it. An official who made a single signature did not know how many borders, bodies and fears had gathered at the point of his pen.

Ramaiyya opened the window. Morning air entered. There was no river smell in the city breeze, yet Gop clearly heard a splash. It was not a body falling into water, but a sum of money falling from one account into another.

Soumya closed her notebook, her voice holding more resolve than fatigue. "In this chapter we did not catch the names of all the crimes. We caught their rhythm. Once we know the rhythm, we can find the names again."

Devika said, "The same rhythm is in the copy of Ujjwal's phone. First greed, then debt, then fear, then silence. After those four words it becomes easy to kill a human being."

Mrinalini said slowly, "My rhythm was love, privacy, threat, testimony. I could have died between them, but testimony changed the rhythm."

Copies of the papers Ishan had given them lay spread across the table. Each page told a different story of crime, yet the same stain marked every edge—wet, black, shaped like a crocodile's tooth. Gop reached to touch one. Soumya stopped him. "Not yet. Some stains are evidence. Touch them not with the hand of emotion, but with the hand of proof."

Far away in Delhi, Satyavrat Mehta stood at his window before opening the memory device. For the first time he wondered whether being the government's lawyer and being truth's lawyer could be the same thing. Outside his house stood an ashoka tree. One leaf moved without wind.

He remembered a story from childhood: in Mithila, trees sometimes testify. He did not laugh. That night he had no courage to laugh.

He inserted the device. The screen lit. The first folder opened: "Names That Were Not Absent." Every year of legal practice on Satyavrat Mehta's face seemed to become old in a single moment.

In Channa Grove, the ghosts were returning to their branches because morning had come. Hulasi looked back at the field one last time. The line drawn there had vanished, but the soil beneath it was warm.

Budhba Ghost said, "From today the game is harder. Now, to tag someone in kabaddi, we must cross not a body but accounts, files, screens, courts and foreign forums."

The Brahma of the pipal spoke from all four mouths at once: "Name. Evidence. Memory. Courage."

Sunlight fell on the first coconut leaf. The numbers written there slowly turned green. Seeing the green numbers, Budhba Ghost smiled. The black river of money fears green memory, because a village that remembers cannot be sold completely.

That morning Gop Kumar wrote one sentence in his diary: "When crocodiles begin laying eggs in bank accounts, know that the time has come to cleanse not the river, but the reckoning."

FOLK SONG: BLACK RIVER, GREEN LEAF

Folk tune: plaintive transplanting melody

Flow, black river, but do not drown the leaf;
Carry the worker's earnings home to the child.

The black river of money cuts through the village's chest;
The green leaf writes the names and holds the water of memory.
We will cross accounts, files, screens and stages;
We will carry four lamps—name, evidence, memory, courage.
The crocodile laid eggs in accounts; the numbers turned poisonous,

But the village's spoken fire is stronger than them.
The weary ghost says: we will not abandon testimony;
When green memory wakes, the village cannot be sold.
Flow, black river, but do not drown the leaf;
Carry the worker's earnings home to the child.

CHAPTER 12

Coconut Leaf on the Dark Web

On the black river, the coconut leaf neither sinks nor drifts—it shows the way.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE LEAF-LAMP ON THE DARK WEB

Folk tune: Batgabani awakening song

*Walk slowly, traveller; the road through the web is dark,
Take the leaf-lamp in your hand; walk with care, together.*

*On the road through the black web, the leaf becomes a lamp,
A small green line of names points toward the true direction.*

*Reveal only as much evidence as dignity can safely bear;
Let discernment walk with technology, and let people remain protected.*

*The voices of worker, youth, and woman join upon one leaf;
The village's knowledge loosens the deceptive knots of the digital world.*

*The leaf-lamp upon the dark web says: walk slowly,
Carry the boat of truth safely and cross the darkness.*

*At every click thorns are spread, snare after snare is strung;
Lean upon the staff of discernment, and every theft will break.
The voices of worker, youth, and woman are rooted on one leaf;
However dense the darkness, the lamp does not lose its nerve.*

When dawn spread over Garh Narikel, Channa Grove lay still with the fatigue of the night's game. The ghosts were seated once more upon their separate branches, but that day's stillness was not the silence of the dead. It was the silence of people who had heard a secret and were practising the difficult discipline of holding it until the proper time.

The small device placed in the hollow of the pipal during the night gave off a faint light from beneath the earth. From his four faces the Brahma of the pipal was reciting not four different mantras but four different cautions. The first face said, "Protect the truth." The second:

“Do not become a recipe for falsehood.” The third: “Keep the names safe.” The fourth: “Let evidence go out only as far as justice requires.”

Budhba Ghost closed his eyes upon his branch. He now understood that the underworld river of the new age flowed not with water but with the light of bits. Yet the body of a name could drown there too. Just as the Ganga was filled with crocodiles, this new web was filled with invisible mouths.

In the city, Gop Kumar sat at the table. His eyes had not closed all night—as though sleep itself had left him at this moment and gone far away. As Saumya Ramanathan sorted one heap of papers after another, she would read the name of a widowed worker, then a hospital bill, then the threat used in Ujjwal’s digital arrest. Ramayya Subramaniam stopped talking even while making tea. When a talkative person falls silent, you know the matter has truly become heavy.

Mrinalini Arya read the copy of her statement again. What lay upon that page was not her love but the crime of its theft. For the first time she felt that privacy too was like land—its boundary invisible, yet an encroachment upon it could lay waste the field of the body.

Devika Sah had placed Ujjwal’s photograph before her. Ujjwal was smiling in it, the sort of smile at which any mother might say, “My son will accomplish something.” Devika said softly, “He did. By his death, he opened this account.”

Ishan Datt stood by the door. Dawn-light fell upon his body, but there was no shadow. He said, “Three copies have been made. But three copies do not mean three hopes alone; they also mean three dangers.”

Gop asked, “How will the first go?”

“An envelope that reached Satyavrat Mehta’s study has already been opened,” Ishan said. “He is reading it. But reading and believing are different things. Within him, duty to the government and duty to the soul will fight.”

Saumya lifted the second copy. “To Ira Aruni?”

Ishan nodded. “The veil of hypocrisy on a foreign stage must be torn by someone who understands the language of that auditorium and also recognises the smell of Garh Narikel. Ira once understood her village as a story; now the story will reach her as a document.”

“The third?” Ramayya asked.

Gop looked out of the window. “The third is in the hollow of the pipal. If the server is shut down, if the mail disappears, if the court is sealed, if the foreign institution turns its face away—even then the ghosts of Channa Grove will have one copy.”

For the first time Ramayya smiled faintly. "So the backup is supernatural."

Mrinalini said, "Not supernatural. Folk memory. It is the oldest server of all."

That day Delhi's sky was full of dust. Satyavrat Mehta sat alone in his room. The government's affidavit lay open before him. Its sentences were smooth, courteous, legally proper. But beside it lay the damp page on which was written: not thirty names, three hundred.

Mehta took off his spectacles. He remembered a teacher telling him while he studied law, "Represent the State, but when the State lies, the side of truth is greater than the State." Back then he had memorised the meaning of that sentence for an examination; today the sentence had come to examine him.

He opened the memory device. No thrilling picture appeared on the screen. No sensation. Only a table: names, dates, payments, deaths, signatures, revised copies, missing pages. Truth often arrives in just such a dull form. Falsehood is colourful; truth is as dry as a ledger. Yet the smell of bodies remains in those dry pages.

Mehta's eyes stopped on one line, and he read it again and again as if the letters might change their meaning: "Safety inspection completed." The date was the very day Sarayu Devi's husband had drowned among the crocodiles. A second line: "Family unavailable." No one in that family had received compensation. A third: "Voluntary risk." Mehta rose from his chair.

For the first time he felt not anger but shame. Anger hurls a person outward; shame draws him inward. That night Satyavrat Mehta was drawn inward.

Meanwhile, across the sea, Ira Aruni was in the Harvard library. Outside the window lay a thin layer of snow; inside the warm room students discussed policy, justice, development, and global responsibility. To reach this place, Ira had run very far from the story of her family's village. Garh Narikel had always seemed to her one of her grandmother's tales—ghosts, drowned spirits, coconut trees, water-burial.

That morning a file reached her. The sender was unknown. Its title was "The Names of Garh Narikel." Ira was frightened at first. Then she opened it. The first page bore Lattar Thakur's name, the second Kalit, the third Nand Aruni; after that came a photograph of the bridge, a list of workers, an extract from Edward Broom's speech, and beneath it red figures.

As Ira read, she pushed her chair backwards. She felt as though water were filling beneath the wooden floor of the library. No one else saw it.

All the students were improving the world on their laptops. Only Ira saw the water by her shoes—the water between imagination and crime.

At the end of the file was a single line: “You are not foreign; you were merely born abroad.”

For the first time Ira understood her surname not as a burden but as evidence. That day she decided she would ask a question at Edward Broom’s next ethics lecture. The question would be short, but behind it would stand three hundred water-burials, Ujjwal’s death before a screen, Mira’s violated privacy, and the black market in medicine bottles.

In Garh Narikel, the third copy was safe in the hollow of the pipal. But even the dead cannot be entirely at ease merely because they are dead. The witches of Channa Grove decided to keep watch night after night. Hulasi asked, “What if someone comes to open this hollow?”

Budhba Ghost replied, “Then first he must tell his own name. One who can speak his own name truthfully may open it. If he gives a false name, the roots of the pipal will seize his feet.”

Loth, who was becoming less a spectator and more a player, sat at the mouth of the hollow. His body was made from the surviving memory of a corpse; therefore he could guard evidence well. A person who dishonours the body is afraid of the memory of the dead.

The data had travelled in three directions. But there was a fourth direction too—the dark web. Ishan Datt spoke of that direction last of all.

“The dark web is not merely the home of criminals,” Ishan said. “It is a lane of darkness where criminals hide, but sometimes truth too hides there in order to survive. I will not write down or explain the methods of crime. I want only this much: if every light is extinguished, one soot-blackened lamp should still keep burning in the darkness.”

Gop said softly, “So not public?”

“Public when the time comes,” Ishan said. “First let the evidence go to the court, to the question asked abroad, and to folk memory. The copy kept in darkness will rise only on the day every light has been sold.”

Saumya breathed in relief. “Good. We will not write out the criminal’s road. Only the existence of the truth.”

Mrinalini added, “Anything that wounds privacy must also have limits on its publication. No name without consent. The victim’s dignity comes first.”

Devika said, “But Ujjwal’s name will remain. He would have wanted his death to become not merely a family’s shame but a public warning.”

Gop agreed. Thus the dark-web copy was made, but like a locked chest. Its key was divided among three places—Gop's memory, Ishan's shadowless body, and the fourth face of the Brahma of the pipal.

Elsewhere, Batuknath Hariharan was restless. His nights were not usually long; people who have taken money sleep well. But that night, in his dream, water filled the courtroom floor. He climbed onto a chair, but the chair turned into a crocodile's back.

In the dream Chandrapal Batra was telling him, "Procedure will save us." Hariharan asked, "Whom?" Batra laughed. "Whoever pays the fee." Then a voice rose from within the water: "And the one who gives a name?"

Hariharan woke with a start. His phone was glowing. A message from Raghav Signal read: "Three copies out. Source unclear. Mehta may have one."

Hariharan's mouth went dry. He summoned Chandrapal Batra at once. Batra arrived saying, "Nothing to fear. Whatever evidence there is, we will sink it in procedure."

Hariharan snapped, "Procedure sinks paper. But this paper is floating on water. Don't you understand?"

For the first time Batra fell silent. A criminal becomes afraid on the day he feels that the one before him is not the police but the dead. One can bargain with the police, not with the dead.

Just then the smaller phone lit up. A message came from Lau Kin-Hung: "Stop the names. Keep the money moving."

Hariharan said quietly, "These people do not understand that in India it is not difficult to stop money; it is difficult to stop a name. Once a name becomes a folk song, no order can stop it."

Chandrapal laughed scornfully. "Folk song? I carry out digital arrests, and I should fear a folk song?"

At that instant Ujjwal Jha's photograph appeared on his phone. There was no source. It was the same photograph Devika had placed on the table. Batra's hand trembled.

"Who sent it?" Hariharan asked.

Batra did not answer. Beneath the photograph a line appeared on the screen: "Not a debt—a push."

At that moment Satyavrat Mehta was about to call his secretary. Then he stopped. This decision could not be made over a telephone. He closed the file, put the damp page in his pocket, and took out his private diary.

In the diary he wrote: "The government's case and the soul of the State. If the two diverge, which side must a lawyer stand on?"

After that line the pen rested for a long time—as though the pen itself knew that the next word would change a life. Then he wrote a second line: "Garh Narikel."

In America, Ira Aruni was writing her question. She wrote ten pages, then tore them up. Five pages, then tore those up too. At last one line remained: "Dr Broom, where in your theory of dignity is the place of the unrecorded dead worker?"

Behind the question was a list of attached documents. She did not want the question to be emotional. An emotional question can be laughed away from a stage. A documentary question dries the saliva in the mouth.

At dawn Gop Kumar, exhausted, dozed in his chair. In his dream he reached Garh Narikel. The ghosts were playing kabaddi in Channa Grove. But this time the ball was no ball at all; it was a small device. The ghosts passed it among themselves while the crocodiles watched from outside the field with open mouths.

Budhba Ghost told him in the dream, "Data is not a body, but it will go to avenge bodies. Do not make it fast; make it durable."

Gop awoke. His eyes were tired, but his resolve was clear—the kind of clarity that comes when something long blurred suddenly shines. With every file he attached a list: the victim's dignity, the category of the crime, the limits of public disclosure, the material to be given to the court, and the part that would open only to a trusted researcher or by judicial order.

Saumya read it and said, "Now this is no longer a document. It has become living testimony."

Ishan Datt had returned to the doorway. He said, "Now the next move is theirs. Hariharan will set procedure in motion. Batra will spread fear. Raghav Signal will try to cut away the shadows. Lau Kin-Hung will try to buy names. But three directions have opened."

Mrinalini asked, "And the fourth direction?"

Ishan smiled faintly. "A coconut leaf is growing in the darkness."

That evening in Garh Narikel something strange happened upon the leaves of the pipal. The veins of the leaves began joining one another to form a map: the Kamala-Balan, the Ganga bridge, the Delhi court, the Harvard auditorium, the glass palace in Hong Kong, and a poor house in the village where Ujjwal's mother still cleaned his room.

All four faces of Brahma spoke at once: “The story has not gone out of the village now. The world has come inside the village.”

Night returned to Channa Grove. Kabaddi began. The first call was Budhba Ghost’s: “Kabaddi.” The second, Hulasi’s: “Name.” The third, Loth’s: “Evidence.” The fourth, the drowned spirit’s: “Dignity.”

Then the device placed in the hollow of the pipal flashed once. Its light was not blue but green—like a coconut leaf.

In that green light the names of the dead workers, Ujjwal’s unfinished message, Mrinalini’s testimony, Devika’s tears, Gop’s fear, Saumya’s caution, Ramayya’s silence, Ishan’s shadowlessness, Mehta’s shame, and Ira’s question all came, for one instant, into a single line.

Budhba Ghost said softly, “Truth is no longer only on paper. Now it is on the road.”

Far away, the black river kept flowing. But for the first time a coconut leaf floated upon it and did not sink.

FOLK SONG: THE LEAF UPON THE DARK WEB

Folk tune: Batgabani

Row slowly, row the leaf-boat slowly,
Guard the lamp of names and cross the dark web.
On the road through the black web the leaf became a boat;
Guard the lamp of names and row slowly on.
Protect the truth; carry dignity beside it;
Reveal only as much evidence as justice requires.
The worker, Ujjwal, Mrinalini, Devika’s tears—
All their dawns joined in a single green line.
The world entered the village without a sound;
The hollow of the pipal awoke, the coconut leaf spoke.
The dark river is deep and the road unknown;
The leaf will not sink while a name goes with it.
Reveal only as much evidence as justice needs;
Keep dignity beside you and light the wick of truth.
Ujjwal, Mrinalini, Devika’s tears gathered in one place;
Within the green line joined the salutation of every dawn.

CHAPTER 13

The Sealed Cover

The brighter the seal shines, the denser the darkness inside the cover.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: DAWN WILL BREAK THE SEAL

Folk tune: hopeful strain of a plaintive Sama-Daun

*Open, O dawn, open the knot of the seal,
Give a voice to the breath bound inside the cover.*

*Inside the sealed cover, breath waits for its turn;
The rule of dawn says: let the proper hand open it gently.
Let the seal be for protection, not for burying truth;
Let confidentiality guard dignity, not become soil for crime.*

*The water-mark on the courtroom floor will show the way;
The oral memory of a small village will preserve every name.
Dawn will open the seal when procedure becomes clear;
The truth within the cover will find a seat before justice.*

*Even the mournful Sama-Daun sings a strain of hope;
A ray of light finds its road even into a sealed chamber.
Let the proper hand open it gently; let truth not be suppressed;
Let secrecy cover dignity alone, never conceal the crime.*

“The brighter the seal shines, the denser the darkness inside the cover.”

After that night, when the coconut leaf floated over the black river without sinking, no one in Channa Grove slept well. The dead have no need of sleep, yet waiting can tire even their bones. Budhba Ghost remained seated upon his old branch, but his eyes were watching a courtroom corridor. Hulasi did not go to the well; she kept combing the drowned spirit's hair as though loosening the knots of a long legal argument.

From his four faces the Brahma of the pipal kept repeating not four different things but one thing in four ways: "Once a name reaches the chamber, half its water-burial is broken."

Loth sat at the mouth of the hollow. The smell of his incomplete cremation mingled that night with the smell of paper. He watched the memory device inside the pipal cast a faint green light. At times the footing of the bridge appeared in it, at times a hospital bed, at times Ujjwal's closed room, at times Mrinalini's torn privacy, at times the high ceiling of the court.

Budhba Ghost said softly, "Tomorrow is the hearing date."

Hulasi did not laugh. "A date? Humans make dates so that the blood of a day may be washed away."

"This time the date will not be washed clean," said Brahma's first face. "This time the date will release water."

In Delhi, Satyavrat Mehta rose at dawn. Everyone at home was asleep. He went alone to his study. Three things lay upon the table: the government affidavit, Gop Kumar's list of truth, and a copy of Nand Aruni's old application. The third paper had yellowed, but the words on it looked red like fresh wounds: "The number of workers who fell does not match the official account."

Mehta read the government affidavit slowly, as a doctor might examine a complicated wound. Its language was excellent, its grammar flawless, its legal sequence complete. Yet death was absent from that language. Everything in the affidavit was correct except the truth.

He opened Gop's list. On the first page were the thirty declared names. On the second began the undeclared. On the third were those whose families had been marked "unavailable." On the fourth were workers who had never existed in the register, though their wages had been drawn in the company's bills. On the fifth were young men dead through digital fraud. On the sixth, the pretext of medicine purchases. On the seventh, accounts that bore the names of rivers.

Satyavrat Mehta leaned back in his chair. It seemed to him that all the pages of his law books had suddenly become fish, flapping for breath. The law was not dead; but keeping it alive required someone's courage.

He took out not his computer but his old typewriter—the machine he had not touched in years, yet whose every blow remained familiar. What is written on a computer can be changed in an instant; the blow of a typewriter bites into paper. He typed a short note: "While appearing on behalf of the State, I am compelled to draw the Court's attention to the fact that the record placed before it is incomplete."

He folded the paper and put it in his pocket. Then he looked at his face in the mirror. For the first time he saw not a government lawyer but a frightened human being. He bowed to that frightened man. Fear is the soul's last warning.

At Batuknath Hariharan's house, even the morning tea resembled a court file—cream on top, bitterness underneath. Hariharan had slept badly. His dream kept returning to the same water in which his shoes had sunk. More than the dead, he feared losing his faith in procedure. A man who sells procedure knows that if true procedure wakes up, his shop must close.

Chandrapal Batra reached him at dawn. There was no sleep in his eyes and five messages on his phone. Raghav "Signal" Somani's mark was visible, but the messages were brief: "List circulating." "Mehta uncertain." "Copy with Ira." "Silence Devika." "Keep away from media."

Hariharan set down his cup of tea. "Silence them? Is it so simple? One whose brother died on a screen, one whose village drowned in the river, one whose love was stolen, one whose father was erased from a file—you will silence them all? Is this your gambling den or a court?"

Batra said harshly, "A court too can become a den if the cards of procedure are shuffled correctly."

Hariharan looked at him as though seeing his cheap intelligence for the first time. "You think rules are cards. Sometimes rules become scripture. If Mehta speaks today, it will not be cards but fire."

Batra laughed. "Mehta is the government's man."

"Sometimes the soul of the State wakes inside a government man," Hariharan said through clenched teeth. "Fear that."

By ten o'clock the court corridors were full. Lawyers in black coats moved like crows descending upon a field before rain. One carried a thick file, another wore manufactured concern, another had the shine of fees in his eyes. Journalists were there too, but their eyes searched for headlines, not history.

Gop Kumar stood in a corner of the corridor. He carried no file, only a small sheet on which the victims' names were written in order. He feared that if the court asked him for a number he would answer; but if it asked for a name, his throat would close. Numbers are easy to speak; names are heavy.

Saumya Ramanathan stood beside him. With a blue pencil she had marked every document: public, restricted, sealed, victim's consent required. Above all, she was determined that truth must not become a pretext for humiliating the victim again.

Mrinalini Arya sat in silence. She carried no slogan. Her testimony was heavy enough by itself. Devika Sah kept Ujjwal's photograph not in a file but in the fold of her sari. Paper can be lost; a face kept in the fold cannot.

Ishan Datt did not enter the courtroom. He stood in the veranda because the government record declared him dead. If he went inside, the law would first debate his existence and only afterwards the truth. He smiled. "The dead enter by another road."

In Courtroom Number Five the matter was called. Its title was long—Families of Workers and Others versus State and Others. But in Channa Grove the call reached in a shorter form: "Names and Crocodiles."

The bench entered. Everyone stood. Batuknath Hariharan advanced with his heavy gait. Chandrapal Batra beside him carried a bundle of papers. There was less argument than confusion in that bundle. Satyavrat Mehta stood at the other table. His face was tired, but his eyes were clear.

In his very first sentence Hariharan opened the art of prolonging a case. "My Lords, the maintainability of the petition, limitation, locus of the parties, privacy, national security, contractual arbitration, and official secrecy must all be determined first."

The judge looked over his spectacles. "You have closed seven doors in a single breath, Mr Hariharan."

Hariharan gave a courteous smile. "For the convenience of the Court."

Saumya whispered in Gop's ear, "Not convenience. A swamp."

Satyavrat Mehta rose. The air in the courtroom changed. Usually when a government lawyer stands, the victim's body contracts; this time Devika's hand remained steady on the fold of her sari.

Mehta said, "My Lords, the State wishes at the outset to clarify certain facts."

Hariharan sprang up. "My Lords, the State's affidavit is already on record. I respectfully submit that the State should stand by it."

Mehta did not look at him. "If the State stands by an incomplete record, it stands not on the record but on untruth."

A stir ran through the courtroom. Black coats shifted. Journalists' pens began moving. For the first time Chandrapal Batra sat straight in his chair.

The judge asked slowly, "Mr Mehta, do you wish to amend your affidavit?"

“Not amend it, My Lords,” Mehta replied. “Complete it.”

He took the paper from his pocket. “Material has come into my possession which, prima facie, indicates serious discrepancies in the bridge project’s death count, compensation records, safety inspections, and subsequent financial flows. The State asks this Court not for time but for protection—protection of records, protection of witnesses, and protection of the victims’ dignity.”

Hariharan said with sarcasm, “My Lords, this is politics.”

Mehta remained calm. “If the names of dead workers are politics, then the Preamble to the Constitution is politics too.”

The sentence did not fall in the courtroom; it stood upright, as though an invisible person had stepped into the middle of the room.

The judge said, “Place the material in a sealed cover.”

At that moment Satyavrat Mehta stopped. The battle within him awoke again. A sealed cover can protect, and at times it can also become a tomb for truth. He said quietly, “My Lords, let sensitive names and private details remain separately sealed. But the declared and undeclared lists of the dead, the fundamental discrepancies in payment, and the directions for preserving records should remain open. If truth is kept in total darkness, it passes again into the hands of those from whom it is being protected.”

Silence returned. Hariharan’s face reddened. Chandrapal Batra looked at his phone; the screen was black. He was accustomed to a message from Raghav whenever a crisis arose. This time the black screen showed only his own face.

The bench conferred for a few moments. At that same moment the kabaddi in Channa Grove stopped. The ghosts held their breath. The dead have no breath, but history does.

The judge said, “Very well. Sensitive private details shall remain sealed. The preliminary list of names, the status of deaths, and material relating to preservation of records shall be supplied to the opposite parties. The State shall not destroy any records. Notice shall issue to the relevant department, the contractor, and the payment banks. An early next date.”

At the word “early,” Devika heard Ujjwal’s laughter in her ears. In India, even “early” can sometimes mean years. Yet today the word felt lighter than the old dates.

Then Mehta made one more request. “My Lords, may the names of the dead be read?”

Hariharan leapt up. “My Lords, this is emotional theatre.”

"No," Mehta said. "It is the first act of correcting the record. Many names are missing from the official pages. Let them be heard once in court, so that they are no longer absent."

The judge remained silent for a long time. Then he said, "Read the first list. The full list on the next day. Today it is not to be symbolic, but an initial reading."

Gop Kumar's hands trembled—the fatigue of many years, many sleepless nights, and the weight of many names descended into his fingers at once. Saumya handed him the list. Mehta took it. The first thirty names—the ones the government acknowledged. He read them. The courtroom listened.

Then he paused. He opened the second page. "The State's record is silent regarding the deaths or disappearance of these persons."

At the first name, the courtroom fan slowed. At the second, mist gathered on the window glass. At the third, the photograph of Ujjwal in Devika's sari fold grew damp. At the fourth, Hariharan moved his shoe—there was a thin film of water beneath it.

No one said anything. The names kept circling through the room. They were human names, yet they sounded as though stones flung into the Ganga long ago were only now making their sound—splash, splash, splash.

In Channa Grove, Hulasi did not weep; a ghost's tears become black dew. The dew gathered on the leaves. Budhba Ghost kept count of the names. For the first time Loth crossed the kabaddi line and came into the middle of the field. He said nothing, but everyone understood: "Read mine too."

At the fifteenth name Mehta stopped. His throat closed. The judge gestured for water. Mehta could not drink. He feared the water might be from that same river.

Gop Kumar rose slowly. "My Lords, if permitted, I can read the remaining names from the research list."

Hariharan stood again, but this time his voice was weaker. "This man is not a party."

Devika Sah rose. "I am a party, My Lords. My brother's name is on that list. Not in the river—on a screen. But the death is connected to the same account. If he can read them, let him read."

The judge looked at Gop. "Names only. No comment."

Gop lifted the list. His voice trembled at first and then steadied. He read name after name. After every name came a short pause. The pause was like a funeral rite.

Chandrapal Batra gripped his phone. At that moment the screen lit. It was not a message from Lau Kin-Hung. It was not Ujjwal's photograph. Only one word: "Name." Sweat broke across Batra's forehead.

When the reading ended there was no applause in the courtroom—only a silence heavier than anything words could make. Applause is not heard in a court. Yet that day's silence echoed like applause.

The bench began dictating the order. Records to be preserved. Immediate hearing of any threat to witnesses. Victims' private information sealed. Preliminary copies to both petitioners and State. Independent audit to be considered on the next date.

Hariharan listened to every word. He understood this was not defeat, but it was the first crack. Air enters through a crack; air feeds a lamp; a lamp reveals shadows.

Batra whispered, "We'll take it upstairs."

Hariharan murmured, "First turn off your phone."

Outside in the veranda, Ishan Datt stood. No one saw him, but he heard everything. When Gop came out, Ishan looked at him. "Were the names read?"

Gop nodded.

"Then the first water-burial has broken," Ishan said.

"Justice has not been obtained," Saumya said cautiously.

Ishan replied, "Justice is on the far bank of the river. A name is the boat. Today the boat entered the water."

Devika took Ujjwal's photograph from the fold of her sari. It was dry, but a line of salt had gathered along one corner. She asked, "Will his name come on the next list?"

"Yes," Saumya said. "But the permission is yours."

Devika looked at the photograph. "He was my brother. But his death was not alone. Let his name remain."

Mrinalini silently took her hand. Grief has no caste, but grief has companionship.

That evening at Harvard, Ira Aruni sat in the front row of the auditorium. Edward Broom was coming onto the stage. Behind him the title glowed on the screen: "Global Enterprise and Human Dignity." Ira held the same question in her lap. A message arrived on her phone from Delhi: "Names read in court."

Ira closed her eyes. She felt as though kabaddi had begun far away in Channa Grove. She listened. Beneath the applause of the auditorium came another sound: “Name, evidence, dignity.”

Night descended over Garh Narikel. The game began again in Channa Grove. This time the rule changed. Whoever was caught had to speak not his own name but the name of someone forgotten. The ghosts took turns calling those names. The water-buried spirits tangled in the drowned woman’s hair began to grow lighter.

The memory device in the pipal hollow flashed once. Brahma’s fourth face smiled. “The sealed cover is half open. The other half will be opened by people’s courage.”

Budhba Ghost looked down from his branch. “Next time the Ganga will speak in a foreign auditorium.”

Far away in a glass palace in Hong Kong, Lau Kin-Hung watched a digital map on his wall. A tiny point in India was glowing green—Garh Narikel. He had never noticed the point before. He asked an assistant, “What is that?”

“A very small village,” the assistant said.

Lau Kin-Hung stared for a long time. For the first time he understood that small villages are the most dangerous because names live there by word of mouth.

He ordered the map shut down. But the green point continued to flicker on the darkened screen.

The courtroom was empty now. A cleaner was wiping the floor. Her cloth caught at one spot. She bent down and saw a small water-mark on the floor, curved like a crocodile’s tooth. She thought perhaps a pipe had leaked.

But the mark did not dry. Until dawn a name kept glimmering inside it.

FOLK SONG: THE WAIL WITHIN THE SEAL

Folk tune: plaintive Sama-Daun

The seal will split, O it will split at a mother’s cry;
 From the sealed darkness the voice of truth will come out.
 A sealed envelope—whose groan is inside?
 Outside the seal shines; within lies dense darkness.
 A small water-mark upon the courtroom floor
 Did not dry till dawn; it wrote the fate of the dead.

The distant rich man laughed, calling it a tiny village;
There, by word of mouth, every name lives on.
The sweeper-woman saw a curved mark like a tooth;
Within that stain flickered a worker's life.
However heavy the seal, truth will remain beyond it;
A mother's cry will tear the sealed cover open.
The envelope shone outside; within lay a dense lament;
It did not dry till dawn—the dead man's fate was written there,
And in the sweeper-woman's eyes that mark flashed bright.

CHAPTER 14

The Road Home

When a name returns home, even the soil wakes from its sleep.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE ROAD HOME IS LIT

Folk tune: homecoming song

Come home, traveller; a lamp burns at the threshold,

Your mother's sari-shadow waits along your road.

*Footsteps sound through the mist; the threshold lamp burns,
A name steps out of paper and turns toward its own courtyard.
Gamchha, gravel, and Ganga sand become signs along the road;
A mother's tears are not tears now, but water of blessing.*

*If the tree dies, the seed remains; the road home is never lost;
Memory, love, and evidence together hold the returning one.
Let the road home stay bright for every forgotten name;
At the threshold let each be met with honour—that is our salutation.*

Through the mist, gamchha, gravel, and Ganga sand leave their signs;

*At every step they say: your own courtyard is near.
If the tree falls, the seed survives; the road will not be lost;
Not tears, but water of blessing will be scattered at the threshold.*

“When a name returns home, even the soil wakes from its sleep.”

“When a name comes home, the earth too awakens.”

When people came out of the courtroom, there had been no rain in the veranda, yet the soles of everyone's shoes were wet. Someone said an air-conditioner pipe must have burst. Someone else said it was an old building and seepage was common. But when Aruni bent down and looked at the edge of his shoe, he understood that this was not the building's water. It carried a strange smell—cement, gravel, Ganga sand, and a gamchha soaked with sweat. It was the same smell that came out when the yellowed papers in Nand Aruni's old trunk were opened.

Satyavrat Mehta came out last of all. He carried a government file, but the file no longer seemed to be in his hand; rather, his hand seemed caught by it. The silence that had spread through the courtroom after the sealed cover was opened still clung to his forehead. A government car waited before him. The driver opened the door. Satyavrat looked once inside—the soft seat, dark glass, sunshade—everything comfortable and, for that very reason, unbearable at that moment. He said quietly, “I will walk.”

At the other end of the veranda, Batuknath Hariharan was distributing smiles among the journalists. His smile did not seem to get wet. He was saying, “Procedure will take its own course. Emotion and justice are separate things.” Whenever he said “procedure,” every hair of his beard gleamed like the fire on the bodies of the Rakash spirits in Channa Grove. Chandrapal Batra stood beside him with his phone screen tilted down. Only two words glowed there: “Clean house.” Which house the message meant—Delhi, Hong Kong, or Garh Narikel—Chandrapal could not tell.

Gop Kumar caught a glimpse of the message. He said nothing. Gop’s speech now belonged more to night than to day. A person who sees blood inside paper does not raise an alarm at once; first he watches to see which way the blood is flowing. Saumya Ramanathan stood beside him. Her notebook was not wet, but its pages had curled. Saumya said, “Perhaps the first day of truth is always damp in this city.” Gop answered, “No. This is not the city’s water. This is an order to return to Garh Narikel.”

That evening, when Aruni returned to his Delhi home, his daughter Ananya asked the moment she saw him, “Did ghosts come to court?” Aruni did not laugh. Something within him had become still, like a clock that had been running for a very long time and had suddenly stopped. Earlier, when his daughter had seen a huge photograph of a Chief Minister and asked, “Has he died?” he had laughed. Now he understood that a child’s questions are often doors into the future. He said, “Not ghosts. Names came.” Ananya asked, “Can names walk?” Ba was sitting nearby on the cot, propped against a pillow. She said, “Names walk after leaving their feet behind, little one. Feet stay on the earth; names travel in the air.”

That night it was decided that everyone would go to Garh Narikel. The court’s next date was fifteen days away. The lawyers would say they had to prepare. Batuknath would say procedure would continue. Chandrapal would change his accounts. Lau Kin-Hung in Hong Kong would open a company under a new name. But during those fifteen days the soil of Garh Narikel wanted to see them all again. Ba said, “Without soil, paper is blind.”

Not by car—by train. Aruni insisted. To fly down and take a taxi to the village would make the story too short. A train has windows; beyond them flow fields, dry ponds, station tea, half-sleeping children, and old smells tied inside bags. As Delhi receded behind the night train, Ananya sat by the window looking at her face in the darkness. Behind her face was Aruni's, behind his Ba's, behind hers Nand's, and farther behind them the faces of countless people travelling not with tickets but by water-burial.

Saumya did not go to another compartment. She sat beside Ba and, listening to stories of the Kamala-Balan's current, closed her notebook. For the first time she stopped writing and began simply to listen. Ba said, "The Balan is quiet, but people understand quiet rivers less. The Kamala cuts banks, so people take its name. The crimes of quiet people too move silently. The contractor who smiles, the lawyer who bows, the minister who remains silent—all are like the Balan." Saumya thought how much sociology was hidden in this old woman's language, though Ba did not know the word "sociology." People like her read history in the village without books.

When the first light of dawn struck the carriage window, Ira Aruni met them at the station. She had come from abroad—with a booklet from the Harvard auditorium in her bag, a printed copy of Edward Broom's speech, and a weariness inside her. Once she had understood Garh Narikel as a family story; now she understood that a family story can sometimes be a wound on the map of the world. She moved to touch Aruni's feet, then stopped in hesitation. Ba placed her hand upon Ira's head. "You are a child from abroad, but the head is still of this house." Ira trembled at the touch. She had shaken many hands at Harvard; this was the first hand ever laid upon her head.

Nishant too was at the station. His face was that of a man who first takes pride in the shine of his salary and later understands that the shine may have come from extinguishing someone else's hearth. Taking Gop aside, he said, "I found three layers in the payment gateway. Money from the gaming app went first to Jaipur, then Gurugram, then Singapore, then Hong Kong. But there is one older account belonging to the same group that was used during the bridge project." Gop stopped him. "Do not speak loudly in this village yet. Even the leaves listen here." Nishant looked around. Beside the station a dry coconut leaf actually moved. There was no wind at the time.

By the time they reached Garh Narikel it was afternoon. At first glance the village was ordinary—mud-and-brick houses, shade of trees, cattle tied at doorways, the distant motor of a pump set, and dogs drowsing in the sun. But when Aruni reached the first coconut tree by the courtyard, he felt the village watching him. The leaves were absolutely still. Ananya asked, "Where are this tree's eyes?" Ba said, "Wherever it has a leaf, there is an eye."

Inside the house the old trunk was opened. Nand Aruni's files, which until now had lived as court copies and in Gop's digital version, came out again in their original smell. On one sheet was Nand's handwriting: "The list of the dead is incomplete." On another: "The contractor's safety register is false." On a third: "Beyond the thirty names." Aruni placed the papers on the floor. The letters on them began to tremble. Ira stepped back in fear. Ba said, "Do not be afraid. The soil recognises names."

By evening word had spread through the village that several people had come from Delhi. Devika Sah arrived carrying a small photograph of her brother Ujjwal. Munna Paswan came too; Chandrapal Batra's network had turned his bank account into a mule account. Munna's eyes still remained lowered like a criminal's, though his only crime had been poverty. Devika placed the photograph on the ground and said, "He did not drown in the river. He drowned in a phone. But drowning is still drowning." From the direction of Channa Grove came a low laugh—not mockery, not pity—as though Budhba Ghost were learning the name of a new kind of death.

Mrinalini, known in the city as Mira, arrived before nightfall. Her face was firm. She handed Saumya copies of her private images, messages, and threats. She said, "These are not my shame; they are their crime. But in court they will question my life first and their accounts afterwards." Ba watched her. Many people in the village would not understand the woman's story, but Ba did. She said softly, "The hand that turns love into a weapon is the dirtiest hand of all." For the first time Mira began to cry—tears held back for years, now released by a single sentence from Ba. Her sobbing was quiet, yet it shone like drops of dew on coconut leaves.

There was no announced meeting that night. In Garh Narikel such things were not proclaimed. People slowly gathered at doorways, in courtyards, beside the tulsi altar, under the shade of the pipal. No platform. No microphone. Only one lantern and faces around it. Gop Kumar did not open the file. First he touched the soil. Then he said, "These papers are evidence in Delhi. Here they are funeral offerings. The name that is absent from paper will be placed upon the soil today."

Ishan Datt arrived then. No one saw him coming. Suddenly he emerged from the darkness around the pipal. His body still cast no shadow. Ananya looked at him and asked, "Why is there no darkness behind you?" Ishan smiled. "They killed me on paper, little one. The shadow of a person who dies on paper remains in a government warehouse." The child was satisfied by the answer, as children are satisfied only by impossible answers.

Ishan took out three bundles. In the first was the list of workers. In the second, the list of digital frauds—the names of young men like Ujjwal, mule accounts, false arrest threats, fee receipts from Batuknath Hariharan's office. In the third, the foreign money trail—Edward Broom's group, Lau Kin-Hung's accounts, Raghav Signal's messages, Chandrapal Batra's legal screen. Ishan said, "These are not files. They are the bones of names."

"Bones are given to water," Ba said. Gop replied, "This time not to water—to the roots of a tree." A small spade was brought beneath the coconut tree by the courtyard. The earth was dug. A copy of Nand's file, a copy of the workers' names, Ujjwal's photograph, a copy of the threats against Mira, a copy of Munna's account, and a copy of Satyavrat Mehta's statement in court were each placed in separate brass boxes and buried by the roots. This was not worship. It was the planting of testimony.

As the soil was being filled back, kabaddi began far away in Channa Grove. This time the voices were clear. Between calls of "kabaddi," names could be heard. First one—"Sarayu." Then another—"Nagina." Then—"Ujjwal." Then—"Hulasi." Then names no one could write down because they formed only in water and broke apart. Ananya covered both ears with her hands and then removed them. She was not afraid; she was listening closely, as though attendance were being called in school.

Satyavrat Mehta could not come to Garh Narikel that night, but his message arrived. Not on paper, not on a mobile phone, not under a court seal. It came by word of mouth through an old friend: "Keep the names safe. On the next date, procedure will try to stop the truth." Batuknath Hariharan's men were also seen near the village—two motorcycles, a white car, and strangers chewing betel at the crossroads. Yet none of them stepped inside Channa Grove. The village had a saying: whoever enters Channa Grove carrying a lie finds black ants climbing upon his tongue.

At midnight Aruni woke to a sound. Something had fallen from the coconut tree by the courtyard. He came outside. The moon was half, but the tree's shadow was whole. The earth near the roots had cracked slightly. From the crack came not water but a faint blue light. Gop, Saumya, Ira, Nishant, Mira, Devika—everyone was awakened. Ba was already awake. She said, "The tree is reading the names."

The light remained for a while. Letters formed and broke apart within it. No one had the courage to lift a camera. Nishant tried to take out his phone, but his hand froze. Ira slowly drew out the Harvard booklet whose cover bore Edward Broom's smiling face. She placed it near the light. The face on the cover gradually blurred, and in its place appeared a worker's palm—split by cement, gravel lodged beneath the nails.

Aruni understood that returning home did not mean merely the return of people—it was a deep, slow, unbroken process whose end was still far away. Paper had come home. Names had come home. The dead who had disappeared into rivers, screens, medicine shops, court dates, and speeches in foreign auditoriums were each searching for their own threshold. That night Garh Narikel ceased to be only a village; it became a vast ear listening to every voice rising from beneath the earth.

At dawn there was no dew on the coconut leaves, but minute letters. No one could read them, yet everyone knew they were names. Ba forbade anyone to pluck a leaf. "If a name is written on a leaf, it will live not for the age of the leaf but for the age of the tree." Ananya asked, "And if the tree dies?" Ba said, "Then the seed will remain." Gop Kumar heard the sentence and fell silent.

Far away in a guesthouse in the district town, Batuknath Hariharan writhed in sleep. In his dream there was no courtroom floor, only Channa Grove. He tried to play kabaddi, but whenever he attempted to say "kabaddi," the word that came from his mouth was "date." The ghosts laughed. Chandrapal Batra stared at his phone. A new message arrived on Signal: "Erase the names." He began typing, "From the papers?" The answer came: "Wherever they are." Chandrapal looked out of the window. In the darkness a coconut leaf was moving. His own name shone upon it.

When the first bird called at dawn, no one in Garh Narikel heard it as an ordinary bird. Its call sounded like an announcement. The court's next date was no longer merely a date. It was now the day on which the village leaves, the names of the dead, the testimony of the living, and Satyavrat Mehta's trembling but upright hand would come into a single line. Aruni stood at the doorway and looked out—a thin mist was rising from the direction of the Kamala-Balan. Within the mist many figures were walking. They were coming toward the village. He understood that the return home was not yet complete; the true return would occur when those who were marked "absent" on paper were declared present in court.

FOLK SONG: THE NAMES HAVE COME HOME

Folk tune: homecoming folk tune

Come, child, the lamp at the threshold is awake;
 If the tree dies, the seed will remain—Ba's words have taken hold.
 Footsteps sound in the mist; who comes to our door?
 The child marked absent on paper comes home this time.
 The smell of gamchha, gravel, and Ganga sand rises from the road;
 The threshold wakes, the soil speaks, the old leaves stir.
 If the tree dies, the seed will remain, Ba said softly;
 A name does not die, child; it lives on after the body.

Far away the court trembles; the deceiver loses sleep;
His name too is written on a leaf—the court has opened.
Come, child, the lamp still burns at the threshold;
Along the road home a mother's tears are spread.
Footsteps in the mist—who is coming to our door?
Marked “absent” on paper, they return home in a living spring.
The moment a name was written on a leaf, the closed gate opened.

CHAPTER 15

The Water of Names

No seal can erase a name that has learned to endure upon water.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE WATER OF NAMES, IMMORTAL NECTAR

Folk tune: boatman's dawn-song

*Cup your hands, fill them with the water of names,
Drop by drop, carry its nectar from throat to throat.*

*A name written on water travels far with the waves;
It does not vanish: drop by drop it enters a new throat.
A crocodile may chew the body, but never the savour of a name;
The river keeps every truth in the depth of its memory.*

The water of names becomes nectar, quenching thirst from house to house;

*It lays a green colour upon the dry pages of history.
Hold one drop in your palm and speak the name with honour;
Through the water of names, a people's identity will live.*

*Letters written on a wave travel onward with the wave;
They do not disappear, but sink deep into the river's mind.
The crocodile may take the body, but it cannot taste the name;
At the first note of the dawn-song, identity wakes again.*

"No seal can erase a name that has learned to endure upon water."

"When a name has learned to live upon water, even the soil does not forget it."

On the morning of the next hearing, Delhi's sky was so blue that it seemed the night had tried, and failed, to wash away its crimes. Sunlight had not yet descended upon the old courthouse walls; smoke had. Some would have called it the city's dust, others the humidity of June. But when Satyavrat Mehta stepped from his car and walked toward the courtroom, he felt that this smoke rose not from the hearths of Garh Narikel but from within the bodies that had gone to their water-burial.

That day he had not brought the government's black briefcase. In his hand was an old cloth bag without a mark upon it. It had reached him during the night from Garh Narikel. When he opened it, there was no paper inside, only a dried coconut leaf. Minute letters covered the leaf - the names of those absent from the government list, absent from the court file, yet glowing all night in the soil of the village.

Satyavrat took the leaf in his hands not like an exhibit but like an offering - with both hands, as though lifting a ritual plate. His aide said nervously, "Sir, how can this be filed in court?" Mehta replied, "What cannot be filed is often what matters most. Paper is only a copy. The original was the lives of those people."

Meanwhile, from dawn onward in Garh Narikel, the kabaddi in Channa Grove had stopped. The ghosts sat along the two edges of the field. For the first time Budhba Ghost had descended from his branch and stood one finger's breadth above the earth. Hulasi the drowned spirit wrung drops of water from her long hair. The Rakash lights had dimmed, as though preparing to send more illumination into the courtroom. Loth, always a spectator, stood that day upon the line. Today he had to play.

Ba sat on a mat at the doorway, Ananya in her lap. Gop Kumar, Saumya Ramanathan, Ira, Nishant, Devika, Munna, Mrinalini - not everyone could go to Delhi. Some were in court, some in the village. Ishan Datt was in both places. A man already dead on government paper is under no obligation to remain in only one place.

Courtroom Number Five filled completely. Journalists, lawyers, victims' families, government officers, Chandrapal Batra's people, disciples of Batuknath Hariharan, and a few faces of the kind that are always present in a crowd but never leave a name - all were there. Outside in the corridor people said an order would come today. Those sitting inside knew that today it was not an order but the fate of names that would be decided.

Batuknath Hariharan was especially well turned out that day. His black coat had been freshly pressed, his beard oiled, a heavy file in his hand. He told his juniors, "Today we turn emotion into procedure." He trusted procedure as a marsh in which the feet of truth, if not on the first step, would sink on the second.

Chandrapal Batra sat staring at his phone screen. Messages from Raghav Signal had arrived all night: "Remove the names." "Raise the victims' privacy." "Put the blame for the mule accounts on the poor." "Hariharan will handle it." But since dawn the signal had gone silent. Lau Kin-Hung's indication from Hong Kong had stopped. For the first time Batra understood that the most terrifying thing in a criminal network is silence.

The bench took its seat. Everyone stood. At that exact moment every leaf of the pipal in Garh Narikel moved together. There was no wind. The movement sounded like a judge's gavel - soft, but final.

Looking at the file, the judge asked, "Compliance with the previous order?" The state officer rose, but Satyavrat Mehta stopped him with a gesture and stood himself. "My Lord, the State submits its records, with one request: to allow what was absent from those records to remain absent would itself be an insult to this Court."

Hariharan was on his feet at once. "My Lord, the State is again resorting to emotional language. This matter concerns complex contracts, foreign investment, government policy, pandemic-era procurement, and national security. Recitations of names, folktales, leaves from a village - none of these have a place in judicial method."

Without looking at him, Mehta said, "This matter concerns life. Contracts come after life. Investment after life. Policy after life. Even national security is not something that comes after the citizen's life; it exists because of that life."

A faint murmur passed through the courtroom. The judge looked toward Mehta. "What do you wish to place before the Court?"

Mehta opened the cloth bag. The coconut leaf emerged. Hariharan laughed aloud. "My Lord, are leaves evidence now?"

Satyavrat Mehta did not place the leaf upon the table. He held it for a moment against his forehead, then said, "My Lord, this is not evidence. It is memory. Copies of the evidence are attached. This leaf tells us that when paper lies, a village writes truth upon a leaf."

The judge did not take the leaf, but his eyes remained fixed upon it. It should have been impossible to see the letters from that distance, yet the leaf possessed a strange discipline, as though countless tiny lines stood one behind another. The court clerk would later say that on that day he had truly seen names upon the leaf; that statement never entered the record.

Mehta read the first list - thirty names already present in the government record. Then the second - those marked "absent." Then a third - those whose deaths had been described as "outside the workplace." A fourth - families whose signatures had been forged. A fifth - compensation withdrawn but never received by the family. A sixth - those whose names had been altered. A seventh - those whom the papers had never allowed to be born at all.

With each name the air in the courtroom grew heavier. Hariharan's face remained hard, but unease had appeared at the corners of his eyes. Chandrapal Batra switched off his phone; even switched off, it remained hot in his palm.

In the middle of the reading of names, the courtroom fan suddenly stopped. The electricity had not failed. Only the fan stopped. In the silence something came faintly from far away - kabaddi... kabaddi.... The judge raised his head. The journalists looked at one another. Hariharan said, "My Lord, this is a disturbance."

Mehta said quietly, "No. It is a presence."

At precisely that moment in Garh Narikel the game began. This time the rules had changed. The players did not cross holding their breath and chanting "kabaddi"; each carried with them one forgotten name to the other side. If the name returned unbroken, the spirit carrying it became lighter. Sarayu crossed first. Nagina followed. Ujjwal, who had died inside a screen, hesitated at the edge of the field. Loth took his hand and said, "You do not need a river. Death is enough." Ujjwal stepped into the game.

In court the list of digital fraud victims was opened. Gop Kumar's summary showed how payments for pandemic-era medicine procurement, mule accounts used by online gaming apps, digital-arrest call centres, and foreign consultancy fees had formed pathways into one another. Mehta read the names one by one - Ujjwal Jha, Rohit Mandal, Shashank, Farhan, Devashish, an unnamed student, an unnamed driver - many whose files had been closed after writing only the word "suicide."

Devika Sah was not in the courtroom; she sat beside Ba in Garh Narikel. But when Ujjwal's name was read in Delhi, the photograph lying in her lap trembled. She thought: Delhi is far away, but a name does not recognise distance. Ba placed a hand upon hers. "Now he did not die alone."

Mrinalini's testimony was the next section - the section for which she had been gathering her courage for years. Hariharan rose immediately. "My Lord, making details of private life public would violate the victim's dignity." His voice was gentle, as though he truly wished to defend dignity. But Mrinalini stood. She was in Delhi. Her face was calm. She said, "My dignity lies in my life, not in their threats. Let what is private remain under seal. Let what proves blackmail, extortion and witness intimidation enter the open record."

For the first time such a sentence was heard in that courtroom. Several faces grew uncomfortable. Hypocrisy is the first thing in society to turn its neck away. Satyavrat Mehta bowed his head - in acknowledgement, not pity. The judge dictated an order: the victim's privacy protected; the portions showing threats and extortion admitted to the record. The first clear crack appeared on Hariharan's face.

Saumya Ramanathan took notes with care. In every line she guarded against stripping a woman bare a second time in the name of truth. She understood that a revolution too can sometimes become as merciless as patriarchy. She looked at Gop. His eyes were upon the list, not upon people's bodies. For the first time Saumya gave him her complete trust.

Then came the foreign trail of money: Nishant's affidavit, Ira's Harvard records, the grants of Edward Broom's foundation, the old successor company behind the bridge project, consultancy fees from medicine and vaccine procurement, layers of arms brokerage, and the map of accounts running all the way to Lau Kin-Hung in Hong Kong. Hariharan objected to each: "Irrelevant." "Unproved." "Foreign jurisdiction." "Meaningless coincidence."

At the last objection Mehta smiled. "When coincidence repeatedly ends at the same account, an auditor no longer calls it coincidence. The word is pattern."

At that very moment Edward Broom stood upon a stage at Harvard. Ira Aruni rose in the auditorium. Broom was saying, "Human dignity is the soul of global enterprise." Ira interrupted him: "Does human dignity include the names of the workers on the Ganga bridge whom the old company of your group marked absent?" Silence filled the hall. The cameras turned. Broom smiled first. "Young lady, infrastructure history is complex." Ira replied in Maithili, "The history of one whose body a crocodile ate is simpler than your language."

No one understood the sentence, yet everyone heard it. Sometimes accusation changes bodies and no translation is needed. Professor Elena Graves stood at the side of the stage. For the first time, the donor list hanging upon her institution's wall looked to her like a list of the dead.

At that moment a clip from the Harvard livestream reached the screen in the Delhi courtroom. Ira's question was echoing in a foreign auditorium while Mehta read the same financial map in an Indian court. Two continents, one voice. Someone in the courtroom said, "Coincidence." Gop answered softly, "No. A journey of names."

In Hong Kong, Lau Kin-Hung sat in his glass office before five screens: Delhi on one, Harvard on another, the account map on a third, Indian news on the fourth, black darkness on the fifth. He shouted at his aide, "Close the dot!" The aide kept shutting down the map, but the green dot of Garh Narikel shone even on the black screen. For the first time Lau Kin-Hung smelled his own palm. It carried the smell of Ganga sand.

During the recess Chandrapal Batra rushed outside. He opened Signal. Raghav Somani's final message had arrived: "Everything finished. Save yourself." Batra's face went pale. The man who had threatened thousands of young people with false digital arrest now found himself in an invisible arrest of his own. Ujjwal's face rose upon his phone screen. Batra tried to throw the phone, but it clung to his palm.

Hariharan caught him and pulled him into a corner. "Do not panic. Procedure is still left." Batra whispered, "The signal is gone." Hariharan's eyes wavered for a moment. Procedure is powerful only while the signal remains alive.

After the recess Mehta made his final submission. "My Lord, the State asks this Court for seven directions: first, fresh verification of the dead and missing workers; second, protection for victims of digital fraud and mule-account abuse; third, privacy safeguards for victims; fourth, an independent investigation into foreign financial flows; fifth, a separate record concerning the role of the Bar office-bearer; sixth, criminal action for any attempt to destroy records; and seventh, that this matter not be left in the marsh of distant dates."

Hariharan stood. His voice had sharpened. "My Lord, this Solicitor General has become counsel for the petitioners."

For the first time Mehta looked directly at him. "When citizens of the State die, the State's lawyer does not stand against its citizens. If I stand with the truth, then today the State is standing, for once, on its proper side."

That sentence left the courtroom, crossed the corridor, the stairs, the road, reached Garh Narikel, crossed Channa Grove, entered the Ganga, and travelled all the way to the eyes of the crocodiles that had remained silent for so many years.

The bench began to write its order. Words formed slowly, like a river long restrained finding a new channel: special investigation; independent audit; victim protection; privacy-protected testimony; notice concerning the conduct of the Bar Council president; transactions of Chandrapal Batra and linked accounts frozen; permission to seek records from foreign institutions; court monitoring; the next hearing not in fifteen days but in seven.

At the words "seven days," several people in the courtroom smiled. For the first time the crocodile of court dates had grown smaller. It was not complete justice, but the belly of delay had been cut open.

The order was read. Hariharan did not sit; he sank. Chandrapal Batra gripped his chair. His phone finally went dark, but while dying it flashed one sentence: "Do not erase the names. Save yourself." Batra could not tell whether it was Raghav's message, Lau Kin-Hung's, or Ujjwal's.

When Gop Kumar emerged, the journalists surrounded him. He said nothing. Saumya said, "An order has come today, not a verdict. The names of the dead are not news; they are responsibility." Mrinalini said only, "Privacy is not a crime. Blackmail is." Devika, far away in the village, heard that sentence on her phone and raised her head.

At dusk everyone in Garh Narikel gathered by the roots of the coconut tree. Ba said, "The order has come." Ananya asked, "The verdict?" Ba replied, "People make verdicts. The earth does justice slowly."

In Channa Grove the game was at its height. Ghosts, spirits, Rakash, Loth, drowned spirits, witches, Brahma - all were on the field. Along the boundary stood the workers from the Ganga bridge. Ujjwal played with the light of the screen. Hulasi, without arms, could not stop a name with her body, but her voice was the loudest of all. Budhba Ghost declared, "From today, every name that is forgotten will be called out in the game."

Suddenly water began to fill the middle of the field. No one drowned. It rose only to the knees and then became letters. Names written in the water refused to disappear. The crocodiles came and stood at its edge. Once they had lunged at the smell of bodies. This time they watched the radiance of names. Budhba Ghost asked one of them, "Will you eat?" The crocodile lowered its eyes. The taste of a name lay beyond its teeth.

At that moment a fruit fell from the coconut tree at the doorway. The sound was not ordinary; it was as though a court seal had struck the earth. The fruit did not split. Ba picked it up. Everyone waited. Ba said, "A fruit is opened not by force but by tenderness." She tapped gently at one of its eyes. No water flowed out. A damp sheet of paper emerged.

The first word on the paper was Sarayu. Then Nagina. Then many more names. Then Ujjwal. Then not the file of threats against Mrinalini but her own name - in the form in which she herself accepted it. Then Munna Paswan - not a criminal, but an account used by others. Then Ishan Datt - not dead, but witness. Then Nand Aruni. The final line was blank.

Ananya asked, "Why is this blank?" Ba handed her the paper. "The name of whoever is killed and then made to disappear next will come here. A novel can end. A list cannot."

Aruni trembled at the sentence, as though Ba had erased in one breath the distinction between novel and life. He understood that writing a story and ending a story are different things. History does not end; a writer only places a lamp at one moment.

Late in the night Gop Kumar went to the pipal. Ishan Datt stood there. He still had no shadow, but a little darkness had begun to gather by his feet. Gop asked, "Is your shadow returning?" Ishan smiled. "After the names of the dead are read aloud, they begin to regain their shadows. Not fully. But it begins."

"Do you want release now?" Gop asked. Ishan replied, "Release? No. Too many files are still left. But now I am not alone."

Satyavrat Mehta sat late into the night in his Delhi room. The government phone kept ringing; he did not answer. On the desk lay a copy of the coconut leaf, the court order, and a half-written resignation. He did not finish the resignation. He understood that walking away was easy; remaining inside and fighting for truth was hard. He folded the draft and put it away. Looking out of the window, he saw a faint leaf moving in the Delhi night. There was no coconut tree there, yet the leaf moved.

That night Batuknath Hariharan's house was silent. In his library, heavy books of jurisprudence stood in rows. He opened one - a lecture on ethics. The page was blank. Another - professional honour at the Bar. The page was wet. A third - procedure. From between its pages emerged one black ant. Then another. Then countless ants. He screamed, but no servant in the house awoke. Procedure was entering his mouth for the first time.

Chandrapal Batra tried to flee. At the station, the airport, the border, he found that his name had reached before him. At a ticket window the clerk asked, "Chandrapal Batra?" At a hotel reception: "Chandrapal Batra?" At the bank a computer flashed: "Chandrapal Batra." He had spent his life erasing other people's names; now he could not escape his own.

Lau Kin-Hung stood in his Hong Kong tower and watched the sea. In the glass it looked like the Ganga. His aide said, "The company's name can be removed from the Indian case." Lau replied, "Remove the name." The aide typed. Wherever a name disappeared, a tiny coconut-leaf symbol sprouted in its place. For the first time Lau Kin-Hung shut down his computer. The leaf continued to shine in the darkness.

At Harvard Professor Elena Graves cancelled her lecture. She wrote to her students: "The next class will be silent. Each student will bring one name that some institution has made absent." Ira read the email and smiled. She replied with one line in Maithili: "Reading a name is also ethics."

At dawn rain fell upon Garh Narikel. According to the weather department, rain had not been expected. The elders of the village said: when names are read, water comes to correct its accounts. The rain washed Channa Grove. The kabaddi lines vanished, but the field was not empty. The lines had entered the mind.

Ba did not lay the damp sheet near the tulsi altar to dry. She placed it back inside the coconut shell. The shell was buried by the roots of the tree. Ananya asked, "Will the fruit grow again?" Ba said, "Not the fruit - the tree. And leaves upon the tree. And names upon the leaves."

That day Aruni opened his writing notebook for the first time. He wanted to write, "The story ends here." The pen stopped. He crossed the line out. Then wrote, "Today there was kabaddi in Channa Grove." He understood that once a story begins to travel in the mouths of a village, the writer's ending becomes meaningless.

Playing at the doorway, Ananya suddenly stopped. She looked toward Channa Grove and called softly, "Kabaddi... kabaddi...." Ba smiled. When a child learns the game of ghosts, the ghost no longer remains old; it becomes the future.

The highest leaf of the coconut tree moved. In that movement were Nand Aruni's hand, Sarayu's basket, Ujjwal's broken phone, Mrinalini's courage, Devika's anchal, Munna's lowered eyes, Ishan's returning shadow, Satyavrat Mehta's trembling but upright voice, Saumya's blue pencil, Gop's silence, Ira's question - all of them.

The crocodiles returned to the river. They were hungry because they had failed to eat the names. The river kept flowing. The bridge remained standing, but at night its piers began to murmur names. Travellers on trains crossing the bridge would sometimes wonder why the wheels beat so insistently - dhak-dhak, dhak-dhak. There was no answer. Only a sound from beneath the tracks: name, name, name.

And in Garh Narikel, when the night grew very deep, the game in Channa Grove began again. Ghosts, spirits, Rakash, Loth, drowned spirits, witches, Brahma, workers lost to water-burial, youths drowned in screens, women who survived blackmail, poor people used as mules, and an informer killed on paper - all shared one field. The rule was simple: whoever crossed carrying the truth could not be touched.

Then Budhba Ghost gave the final call: "Crocodiles eat bodies. But once a name is written upon water, even water cannot erase it."

And the coconut leaves went on sounding through the night - kabaddi... name... kabaddi... name....

FOLK SONG: NAMES WRITTEN ON WATER

Folk tune: boatman's song

Sound, O leaves, sound through the night,

Carry the names written on water from house to house.

Names written on water cannot be erased by waves;

The soil guards their footprints from birth to birth.

The crocodile returned hungry, carrying only the taste of flesh;

The name caught between its teeth, and the river spoke.

All night the bridge piers beat out the names - dhak, dhak;

The train passes, travellers listen: whose chest is beating there?

Ghost, woman, child, worker - all in a single turn;

Cross the boundary with truth - who can touch you then?

Kabaddi... name... let the leaves sound all night;

Carry the names written on water from house to house.

The wave could not erase them; the soil took them into its keeping;

A name caught in the crocodile's teeth - the river said it aloud.

All night the bridge piers beat the names beneath their breath;

Ghost, woman, child and worker weave one common turn.

CHAPTER 16

The Court of Channa Grove

Once a tree has heard a name, no page of paper can forget it.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: HOPE IN THE GROVE-COURT

Folk tune: Bhagat-mangal

Sit, O council, sit beneath the tree,

Write the law upon leaves; weigh truth against truth.

Seats are spread beneath the tree, the leaves become the law;

The seal stays far away, the people close - the hearing belongs to all.

Not the paper of victory, but the truth of names will prevail;

The lamp of the defeated people's work will light the path of justice.

Let one warn the children, another stand beside a sister;

The grove-court will carry the meaning of its decision from house to house.

Justice filled with hope will rise and walk through school and market;

From one decision upon a leaf, the people's world will wake.

Neither the arrogance of seals nor the force of paper will rule;

At dawn the hearing will be held before the people's own eyes.

Child, sister, elder - every voice will be weighed equally;

The road of the grove-court will be precious from house to house.

"Once a tree has heard a name, no page of paper can forget it."

"A name heard by a tree cannot be erased by paper."

- A saying of Garh Narikel

That night no dogs barked in Garh Narikel. Cats climbed onto the roofs and sat silent. In houses with mobile phones, the screens flickered by themselves; in houses with old lanterns, the wicks burned without oil.

And from Channa Grove rose a silence like an ancient river that had stopped flowing in order to press its ear to the earth.

News of what had happened in court that day reached the village neither by radio nor newspaper nor government statement, but through water. At dusk, when women returned from the pond with their brass pots full, it was not water that shone inside them but names. Some could read them, some could not, yet everyone understood that something had burst open in the city court and its liquid voice had reached Garh Narikel.

Ba sat at the threshold. Her eyes saw little, but whatever ordinary eyes could not see, she saw first. She looked at the water-filled pot, then toward the grove, and said softly, "Now it will not be a human court. The tree's court will sit."

Aruni did not answer. That night Gop Kumar held no file. Saumya had closed her satchel. Devika switched off her phone. Mira removed her spectacles, as though glass was no longer necessary for seeing. Ira, who had studied law abroad and once mistook the language of courts for the language of justice, sat quietly beside Ba for the first time. Satyavrat Mehta was far away in the city, but sleep would not come to him.

There was no kabaddi in Channa Grove that night. The ghosts sat in a circle. The spirits stood in a pale shimmer. The Rakash gave light from their small bodies, but tonight the light was not sharp; it was wounded. Loth, always condemned to watch, was placed in the middle for the first time - because those punished forever with seeing were to be given the right to speak tonight.

The Brahma of the pipal tree drank the winds of the four directions through his four mouths. He had no throne. He was not the judge. In the Court of Channa Grove the judge is never a single body. The judge is whatever has been suppressed the greatest number of times until, through repeated suffocation, it becomes a voice.

The drowned spirit emerged from the pond and sat at the edge of the grove. Her long hair was heavy with water, and as she spread it upon the earth it began to form a black script. The witches left their platforms and arrived without mounts. Budhba Ghost descended from his twelve-hundred-year-old branch. Hulasi, who had no hands, could nevertheless assume the posture of presence without them.

The first summons of the court was issued by the wind. It came from the north and said, "Let all whose names were cut away appear."

First came the sound of a splash from the piers of the Ganga bridge. Then footsteps rose from within the splash. Day-labourers began to arrive carrying baskets upon their heads. Some had half a body, some only the memory of a head, some the dust of cement upon their backs, some in their eyes the astonishment that flashes inside a person at the instant of falling - "Am I truly falling?"

Their feet did not touch the earth, yet wherever they passed, beads of dew became names. The first was Sarayu. The second, Makhna. The third, Bisesar. Then names came so quickly that the grass of the grove trembled under the burden of holding them.

Gop Kumar's eyes filled. After so many nights of counting papers, for the first time he felt the true weight of truth. Until now he had seen names inside files; here the names had stepped out of the files. Saumya reached to open her research notes, then closed them. She understood that taking notes in this court would be an indecency. Evidence was not written here; evidence walked in on its own feet.

The second summons was issued by the leaves of the pipal: "Let all whom the screen devoured appear."

Blue light rose from doorway after doorway in the village. Phones that had been switched off flashed once. A young man came and stood in Channa Grove. His face was bright; his name, Ujjwal, meant brightness too. But in his eyes lay the sleep of a screen that breaks between debt, winning, losing, threats and shame. Behind him came many more youths - one with the smell of counterfeit notes in his pocket, another with a bank slip in his hand, another with that voice still in his ear saying, "You are under digital arrest."

Devika watched the line. She recognised her brother, but did not run to embrace him. In a court of the dead, even the wailing of the living can cloud the evidence. She only bowed her head. Ujjwal looked at her and smiled as though saying, "Now I am not a debt. I am a name."

The third summons was issued by the drowned spirit's long hair: "Let all whose bodies were made into a market, whose privacy was turned into a noose, appear."

Now shadows of women and men, young and old, began to enter the grove. Some were faces without names, others names without faces. One had been taken in a police vehicle and never returned; another had forgotten the speech of home in a room in the city; another had been blackmailed for love; another had refused to sell the body, but hunger had been sold instead. Mira stepped among them. She understood that her privacy had never been her crime; the crime belonged to the hand that made privacy into a whip.

The fourth summons came from a lantern flame: "Let all whose breath was sold, whose medicine vial was counterfeit, whose hospital bed was billed twice in government papers, appear."

The dead of the pandemic came. One carried an oxygen tube, another a hospital bill, another an empty medicine box, another in his eyes the question: did I die of disease, or of the bill? They were silent. The silence of those who died in a pandemic is heavier than other deaths, because so many were denied even a proper farewell.

Then the Court of Channa Grove summoned the offenders. Something strange happened. Batuknath Hariharan did not come. Chandrapal Batra did not come. Raghav Signal did not come. Lau Kin-Hung's body was far across the sea. Edward Broom slept in his hotel.

But their shadows appeared in court. Hariharan's shadow came in the shape of a thick file whose pages changed dates by themselves. Batra's shadow glowed like a mobile screen, with a long serpent sliding across a keyboard inside it. Raghav's shadow was only a bodiless unfinished message: "Message deleted." Lau Kin-Hung's shadow hung like a percentage sign - two small circles and a slanting stroke. Broom's shadow was a lectern from whose microphone water dripped.

Budhba Ghost did not laugh. In twelve hundred years he had seen many such shadows. He said, "The law may shelter a man's body. The tree does not shelter his shadow."

Sarayu gave the first testimony. She was a woman labourer. The rasp of a river ran through her voice. She said, "I fell. No rope came to save me. Afterwards my name did not come either. The crocodile ate the body; the office ate the name. My family was told I had never come to work at all. Today I ask: if I never came, where did these cement blisters on my palms come from?"

She opened her palm. It was not a palm, but a row of tiny bridge piers. Inside each pier was an eye.

Ujjwal gave the second testimony. "First they showed me a win. Then a loss. Then debt. Then police. Then court. Then shame before my family. My body was found hanging from a fan, but my death had taken place inside the screen long before. The owner of the app that devoured me was not in this country. The account opened in my name was not mine. The voice that threatened me was fake. The noose was real."

Devika trembled where she stood. One face of the pipal Brahma turned toward her. "The trembling of the living is testimony too."

The third testimony came not from Mira but from her silence. She stood in the centre. She did not say whom she loved, whom she desired, whose hand had once been in hers. She said only, "Those who feared love tried to kill me not with law but with shame. Those who turned privacy into a crime will now find the locks of their own houses opening night after night."

Hulasi stood behind her. Even a ghost without hands can protect, if memory remains within her.

The fourth testimony came from an old man of the pandemic years. A mask covered his nose, but there was no opening in it. He said, "I needed breath. I received a bill. I needed medicine. I received a code. I needed a doctor. I received a consultant. I needed a pyre. I received a number."

At that instant every file in Channa Grove opened. No - no one opened them. The files themselves became leaves. Upon each leaf was a fact; beneath each fact, a name; beneath each name, a house; beneath each house, an unfinished hearth.

Satyavrat Mehta sat in his room in the city. There was no screen before him, yet the light of Channa Grove fell upon the wall. He understood that he too had been summoned. He closed his eyes and said, "I am present."

The wind carried his voice to the grove. He said, "I have spent years presenting the State's case. But if the State cuts the names of the dead from its records, then the side of the State and the side of truth become separate. Today I speak not from any office, but as a human being: whatever opened halfway in court must now be opened completely."

Batuknath Hariharan's shadow trembled. The pages of his file began changing dates faster and faster - next month, next year, next generation, next birth. Channa Grove did not laugh, but all its leaves rustled together. The sound was more humiliating than laughter.

A message flashed on Chandrapal Batra's screen-shadow: "Signal restored." It vanished at once. Then another: "Account active." That too disappeared. A third: "Insufficient shadow." The screen went black.

The four mouths of the pipal Brahma spoke together. He was not reading a judgment; the judgment was being read jointly by wind, water, leaves and names.

"The one who consumed bodies will not be punished merely by a prison for the body. The one who cut away names will spend a lifetime searching for names. The one who sold court dates will sleep each night inside an unfinished hearing. The one who devoured children through screens will see Ujjwal's face first in the mirror every dawn. The one who made privacy into a weapon will have his shadow stripped bare before everyone - not his body, but his greed. The one who sold breath will cough out every word of every speech. The one who lectures on ethics abroad while buying death here will stand forever upon a damp stage, however dry the auditorium may be."

These punishments were written in no book of law. But the Court of Channa Grove is older than books of law. It has less prison and more memory; less hanging and more names; fewer fines and more nights without sleep.

After the judgment, the dead looked at one another. No one applauded. There is no applause at the moment of justice; only the removal of a weight long held upon the throat. Sarayu set down her basket. Ujjwal held out his phone toward Devika. She did not take it. "I will carry your name, not your phone," she said. Ujjwal smiled, and the blue light of the screen became, in that instant, the flame of an earthen lamp.

Mira pulled from her chest the old fear that had lodged there like a thorny fruit and placed it upon the earth. The drowned spirit wrapped the fear in her hair and carried it toward the pond. Saumya wept for the first time - the wall of trained neutrality she had maintained for years collapsed that night. There were no tears in Gop Kumar's eyes. He knew this was no longer the time to weep; it was time to write.

Ba rose slowly. Her body was tired, but her voice was firmer than it had been in a long while. She placed the soil of Channa Grove upon her forehead. Aruni reached to support her; Ba pushed his hand away. "I do not need support now," she said. "You all need work."

Ira stopped at those words. She remembered that in foreign auditoriums people discuss justice; here, after justice, people divide up the work. She understood that when the defeated begin to work, the victor's victory is left alone.

Before dawn the Court of Channa Grove dissolved. No document was prepared. No seal was stamped. No copy was issued. Yet upon every coconut leaf in the village an invisible point had written: "Erasing a name is a crime. Stopping memory is impossible."

At dawn Batuknath Hariharan woke in his city house. There was water beneath his pillow. First he demanded a towel, then shouted at the servant, then checked the tap, then the roof. Everything was dry, yet water kept dripping from beneath the pillow. He looked in the mirror. His face was not there. A long list was. He tried to read the first name; his vision blurred.

Chandrapal Batra picked up his phone. Every signal was strong, but no message could be read. Every chat contained only names. He threw the phone away. Opened another - names. A third - names again. For the first time he understood that earning from numbers is easy; escaping from names is hard.

Edward Broom woke in his hotel abroad. The pages of his speech were wet. Water had spread across the words "human dignity," and fine cement dust clung to them. He replaced the page. The second was wet too. On the third only one sentence appeared: "Thirty names, the rest water."

Nothing miraculous happened in Lau Kin-Hung's distant office. Only a small error appeared on his giant screen: "Not account - memory active." He did not understand its meaning. In his language memory had no price.

The sun rose over Garh Narikel. The ghosts returned to their branches, ponds, shadows and darkness. But kabaddi did not begin again. The field remained empty. Its emptiness was not the end of the game; it was preparation for a new one.

Gop Kumar, Saumya, Devika, Mira, Ira, Aruni, Ramayya, and the voice of Satyavrat Mehta carried from afar - all understood the same thing that morning: a judgment had been received, but now it had to be written not upon paper but into people's lives.

Ba looked once more toward Channa Grove. "The victors will now watch the defeated," she said. "But they will not find the defeated at home. They have gone out to work."

And indeed, from that day onward the rogues wandered from place to place holding their paper of victory. Those whom they had defeated were nowhere to be found sitting upon courtroom steps. One was writing names, another teaching children to recognise the crocodile of the screen, another telling women that shame belongs to the offender, not the victim.

The novel did not end in Channa Grove that night - only one cycle ended, with many more still to come. Its first circle was complete. The leaves moved, and those who had ears could hear: now the real story has begun.

FOLK SONG: THE COURT OF THE GROVE RISES

Folk tune: Bhagat melody

The court has risen, the court beneath the grove has risen;

From one decision written on leaves, the people's voice has opened.

The judgment came beneath the tree; paper remained far away;

When the roots heard the names, the shine of falsehood broke.

The rogue wanders the village with victory's seal in hand;

The defeated have gone out to work, writing down their names.

One teaches children to recognise the crocodile of the screen;

Another tells a sister: the shame is not yours.

The empty field says: the story does not stop here;

The first cycle is complete; the true journey has awakened.

The court of the grove has risen; justice walks from house to house;

From one decision upon leaves, the people's voice has awakened.

Paper stayed far away; the roots heard every name;

Victory's seal remains in hand, yet the work is unfinished.

The defeated are at work - teaching children to recognise the crocodile,

Telling sisters: the shame is not yours - helping them understand.

CHAPTER 17

The Mourning of Victory

When the defeated stop waiting, the victor's victory collapses beneath its own weight.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: SERVICE WITHIN VICTORY

Folk tune: the bright gait of victory-lament

You have won, yes, won - but set the crown aside;

First tend the wounds of those you defeated.

*If you have won, first look to see whose wounds remain;
Remove the crown and serve - only then is victory fulfilled.
Honour the defeated side; keep the door of dialogue open;
After the verdict, sow seeds that can repair life.*

*The voices of "Sarayu" and "Ujjwal" wake conscience within;
Compassion turns victory's heavy iron into a flower.
If service lives within victory, mourning begins to melt;
A just and humble victory joins society together.*

*Let the drums of triumph fall silent; pluck the string of compassion;
Look inward through the memory of Sarayu and Ujjwal.
Rebuild the life that remains after the verdict;
Let the bright gait of victory become everyone's dusk and dawn.*

"If the one you defeated stops waiting for you, your victory will break beneath its own weight."

- A saying from Channa Grove after the judgment

At daybreak Batuknath Hariharan first demanded a towel to cover the water inside his house, then scolded the servant, then checked the tap, then the roof. When everything proved sound and yet water continued to drip from beneath his pillow, he understood that some things cannot be repaired by a workman.

He wanted to believe the Court of Channa Grove had been a dream - as a man, on hearing the name of his illness, wishes to believe the diagnosis is wrong. But a dream remains inside the head; this water lay inside his pillow. A dream disappears when the eyes open; this list clung to the mirror. He washed his face, but the list did not wash away. Names kept rising through the soap foam - Sarayu, Makhna, Bisesar, Ujjwal, and all those he had never considered worth reading.

Batuknath Hariharan was a victor. In court he had defended procedure. The media had called him "the guardian of legal tradition." His portrait was to be hung in the council hall. Yet that morning he felt a strange emptiness, like a soldier who wins a battle and reaches the field only to find that the enemy has packed its tents and gone away to plough the land.

Chandrapal Batra's morning was no better. He had five phones. The signal flashed on the first, but the letters turned to water when he opened a message. On the second an account opened, but instead of a balance it displayed the word "name." A code arrived from Hong Kong on the third, but when read it said, "Whom did you defeat?" Chandrapal threw the phone away, then picked it up again: he possessed the courage to throw away a phone, not the courage to live without one.

Raghav "Signal" Somani had disappeared all night. At dawn his message arrived: "Call a meeting. Paper has won, but the field is emptying." Chandrapal replied at once, "What does emptying mean?" The answer came: "The people we were supposed to silence have stopped talking and gone out to work."

Chandrapal laughed at the sentence. He thought it was language meant to frighten him. He had seen many people break - under notices, police stations, shame, debt, false cases. His experience said the defeated first appeal, then seek the media, then compromise, then tire. This time none of those stages appeared.

That day a ceremony in the capital's Bar auditorium honoured Batuknath Hariharan. Garland, shawl, applause upon the stage. Everyone said, "Procedure has survived." An elderly lawyer declared, "This is the victory of justice." At that instant a drop fell from the ceiling. Batuknath looked up. The ceiling was dry. The drop struck his table and formed a small word: "Waiting?"

He began his speech. "Friends, the dignity of the Court...." But the microphone answered, "Date." He coughed and tried again. "The process of law...." The microphone said, "Date." Whether anyone else in the hall heard it was unclear. Batuknath kept hearing it. He felt that every word he spoke was being heard again by the dead bridge-workers standing upon the court steps.

After the ceremony Chandrapal Batra met him in a separate room. The curtains were thick, trapping the city's sunlight behind them.

Chandrapal said, "The matter is finished. Now identify the opposition. Who wants money? Who can be frightened? Who can be bought?"

For the first time Batuknath fell silent - a silence that surprised even his years of practiced eloquence. At last he said softly, "Where are they?"

Chandrapal laughed. "Since when did you become a philosopher? Where can Gop Kumar, Saumya, Devika, Mira, Ira, Aruni go? They want justice, don't they? They will come back to court."

"No," Batuknath said. "No new petition came today. No press conference. No demonstration. No draft appeal. Satyavrat Mehta is silent too. This silence is unusual."

For the first time Chandrapal's face tightened. Criminals do not fear silence; they are accustomed to playing with noise. But when the victims abandon noise, the criminal begins to hear his own voice far too loudly.

By afternoon Batuknath's men had searched the court corridors. The bench where Devika used to sit was empty. At the window where Gop Kumar used to examine papers there was only dust. The tea seller who kept unsweetened tea for Saumya said, "They did not come today."

"Where did they go?" the men asked.

The tea seller shrugged. "To work."

That answer proved to be the most terrifying answer in the capital. In court, "work" meant dates, arguments, adjournments, copies, affidavits. But the tea seller meant something else. Batuknath would fail to understand that meaning, and therefore it would frighten him.

At that very moment in Garh Narikel, Aruni and Ba were driving the first bamboo stake into the ground beside Channa Grove. There was no flag upon it, no party emblem. Devika levelled the soil. Mira kept the children at a distance, not for sanctity but for safety. Saumya read the old names again. Gop Kumar held neither chisel nor paper; his hands were empty, because before writing a name the hands should be empty.

They had been declared defeated in court. Yet that day they did not look like defeated people; they looked like farmers setting out for their fields. They had no leisure to mourn their defeat. A stone had to be chosen for the village's first archive. If no stone could be found, names would be written upon dry coconut shells.

Ananya, Aruni's daughter, sat holding a small piece of chalk. She asked, "Whose name first?" Everyone fell silent. Ba said, "The one whose name was cut from paper first."

Saumya opened the list. It held a thousand forms, but the first line was blurred. The shadow of a leaf fell across the blur and the letters cleared: "Sarayu." Ananya found Sarayu hard to write. Twice she malformed the first letter. Devika did not take her hand. Ba said, "A name must learn to walk on its own feet. Let the child's hand follow behind it." The third time Sarayu came clear. Somewhere far inside Channa Grove came the sound of a basket being set down.

News of this small scene reached Batuknath by evening. One of his men sent him a photograph. It showed only a child, chalk, stone and a name. Batuknath stared at it for a long time. He could not locate his defeat in that image, yet a damp cold settled into his belly. One can defeat an opposing party in court; under which section of law can one charge a name being written by a child's hand?

Meanwhile Chandrapal ordered his digital net tightened again. "Launch a new app. Change the old names. Double the bonus. Guarantee the first win. Make advertisements in village languages." Raghav Signal replied, "New problem."

"What?"

"People are talking from village to village. They know digital arrest is a lie, mule accounts are a trap, the first win is bait. A girl named Devika Sah holds meetings. Nishant Jha sends leaflets from abroad. People have begun hanging up the phone."

A curse burst from Chandrapal's mouth. For the first time he understood that his real enemy was not the police but public awareness. Police can be bought, lawyers retained, a judge's time delayed; but if an old grandmother tells her grandson, "Do not trust a stranger on the phone," a server worth crores suddenly goes half-fed.

In another corner of the village Devika was indeed explaining things to children and young people. She did not climb onto a stage. She sat on the steps of the pond with people all around her. "If someone tells you that you are under digital arrest," she said, "first drink water, breathe, call your family. The criminal wants you alone."

An old man asked, "Have you studied law?" Devika said, "No. My brother died." The old man bowed his head. From that day onward, experience too became evidence in the village.

Elsewhere Mira and Saumya sat among a circle of women. No banner. No speech. Only women sitting together. Mira said, "If someone takes your image, your voice, your love, your letters, photographs of your body and uses them to frighten you, the crime is theirs. The shame is theirs. Not yours." At first no one raised her eyes. Then a young woman asked softly, "What if my family blames me?" Mira said, "Then we will all go to your house first."

That sentence was larger than any policy paper from the city. Victims need companionship before they need law. Batuknath's greatest mistake was believing that people move only because of judgments. In truth they rise at the sound of others walking beside them.

Abroad, Ira sat in her university library. A transcript of Edward Broom's old lecture lay before her. Once she had written questions in red ink. Now she stopped writing questions. On her computer she began building the first page of the "Garh Narikel Archive of Names." She understood that before questioning a global stage, one must secure the names of one's own people.

That night a strange email reached Broom's office. The subject line read: "Sarayu." Inside was no accusation, no threat, only one name and a blank space. Broom tried to delete it. The system asked: "Do you wish to erase the name?" He clicked "Yes." The screen went black. Then the same email returned. He understood: an accusation can be answered. A name cannot.

Satyavrat Mehta sat alone in his government residence. Departmental displeasure was gathering against him. A note in the file described his conduct as "excessive moral haste." A senior official advised, "You crossed the line." Satyavrat smiled. He understood that when a boundary is drawn to protect falsehood, crossing it is not a crime. It is a cleansing.

But he too did not go to court. He wrote a letter, not to the Court, but to the children of Garh Narikel. "Before you study law, read names," he wrote. "Before you read a section, ask: which human being survived in this section, and which one disappeared?" He did not send the letter. He left it in his notebook. Some letters, when their time comes, begin to travel by themselves.

By evening Batuknath had grown restless. There was a victory banquet: silver plates, expensive liquor, celebrated people of the city. They laughed, told stories of court, said, "Everything will return to normal." But in Batuknath's ears came the rustle of Channa Grove. Every spoon seemed to strike not a plate but a date. Ting - date. Ting - date. Ting - date.

During the banquet a young lawyer came close and whispered, "Sir, are they filing an appeal?" Batuknath meant to answer at once, but what escaped his mouth was, "They are writing names." The young lawyer laughed, thinking the president was joking. Batuknath did not laugh.

That night a meeting was held in Chandrapal's office. Raghav Signal appeared on a screen, the shadow from Hong Kong had no face, two legal advisers and three payment managers sat around the table. Chandrapal struck the table. "Drag them back into court. Defamation. Contempt. Data theft. Foreign funding. Put something on them."

The legal adviser asked, "On whom?"

"Gop Kumar."

"He has made no public statement."

"Saumya."

"She has published no research; she is helping with the archive of names."

"Devika."

"She gives advice on how to avoid fraud."

"Mira."

"She tells women not to be frightened by blackmail."

"Ira."

"She is building a website of names, not allegations."

For the first time Chandrapal panicked. The hardest resistance for a criminal is resistance that does not accuse but builds an alternative. Accusations can be sued. Alternatives become society.

Raghav Signal wrote, "They have left the battlefield."

Chandrapal replied, "Run away?"

Raghav wrote, "No. Gone farming."

The sentence flashed on the screen and vanished. Chandrapal did not understand it, but Lau Kin-Hung's faceless shadow went still for a moment. Capital that does not understand land cannot understand farming either; nevertheless it becomes afraid when people return to the soil.

That night, after the first name had been written in Garh Narikel, people did not go home. An elderly labourer's widow came and said, "My man's name is not in the government papers. But he belonged to this village." She could not read the dead man's name. Ananya placed the chalk in her hand. The widow wrote with a trembling hand. The letters bent crookedly, yet in Channa Grove they shone straight.

Ba said, "Letters of truth straighten themselves."

Gop Kumar stood a little way off, resting his tired body against the trunk of a coconut tree. He thought about safeguarding data, taking it to court, getting it to Satyavrat - all of that had been necessary. Yet perhaps writing the names was an even greater task. Data proves a crime. A name gives a human being birth again.

Ramayya, always talkative, was silent that night. Near dawn he said, "I will do this in my village in the south as well. There may be no bridge there, but the disease of cutting away names is everywhere." Saumya smiled. In this way Garh Narikel began to change from one village into a method.

Batuknath's mourning of victory deepened - a grief for which he could find no name in his own language. Victory needs laughter, an opponent, a stage, garlands. He had all of them. But victory needs one more thing: the defeated face of the loser. That he did not have. The faces declared defeated were busy working.

On the third day Batuknath went to court. The same steps before him. The same corridor. The same tea. Yet nothing looked empty; it looked orphaned. The people he had spent years building a palace of law to frighten had begun to build their own thresholds outside that palace.

Standing on the steps he said inwardly, "Come back. Appeal. Fight."

No one answered. Only from far, very far, toward Channa Grove came the voice of a child: "Sarayu." Then another voice: "Ujjwal." Then a third: "Do not cut away names."

Batuknath covered his ears. The voices continued to rise from within.

The chapter had not ended; the mourning of victory had only begun. The rogues would now watch day and night for those they had defeated. But those people would no longer be found at the courtroom door. They would write names, protect children, stand beside women, and write history upon water.

At dawn a leaf in Channa Grove moved lightly. Budhba Ghost looked down from his branch and whispered, "This is the mourning of victory. No court can impose a punishment greater than this grief."

FOLK SONG: THE HEAVY CROWN OF VICTORY

Folk tune: biraha

O victor, your crown is heavy iron;

The one you defeated no longer waits upon your road.

You won, sir, but who will come to congratulate you?

The court is empty, the steps deserted - where is the applause, brother?

The one you defeated no longer waits for you;

They write names, protect children, and do not count your seals.

The voice "Sarayu" rises within; "Ujjwal" calls again;

You covered your ears, yet a court opened inside your heart.

Victory's crown is iron; it bends your head;

The victims stopped waiting, and victory broke itself.

There is no medicine for such grief, no appeal that can cure it;

The one who erased names loses his own name night after night.

Within, the voices of "Sarayu" and "Ujjwal" do not cease.

You covered your ears, yet the court opened in your heart;

The one who erased names spends the night murmuring his own.

CHAPTER 18

The Empty Court

When a court falls empty, understand this: justice has grown afraid of the names of those who are absent.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE PEOPLE WILL FILL
THE EMPTY COURT

Folk tune: a labourer's-son parati

Fill it, fill it - fill the empty bench;

Raise the sweeper's son's letters upon your brow.

The bench looks empty, yet shadows sit upon it;

Names denied entry have arrived with the dawn.

The sweeper writes his father's name in the dust;

The erased letters rise like shoots between stones.

If justice reads the names, the building will become a home;

Joined with the people's memory, the emptiness will fill.

The people's bright call will fill the empty court;

Lives made present will receive the right to dignity.

The father's name written in dust will wake with the dawn;

Erased letters will sprout like shoots between stones.

The people will come without entry passes, carrying the tune of parati;

Only then will the house of justice make its name true.

"A justice that hears only those who are present is afraid of the names of the absent dead."

- A dry leaf from Channa Grove

On the fourth day after the third, the court opened again. The same doorway, the same metal detector, the same stairs, the same black coats, the same stale biscuits drowned in tea. Yet Batuknath Hariharan felt that something was missing from the building. There was a crowd, there were voices, files and orders; still, the emptiness was not like an empty chair. It was the emptiness left when an entire age rises and walks away.

When he entered the hall, his men hurried toward him. "Sir, they have not come today either." Batuknath snapped, "Who?" The men fell silent. The people for whom the net had been woven had become dangerous even to name. The moment a name was spoken, water began to drip.

The case was on the cause list. It had a number. There were papers. The government side was present. The contractor's side was present. Batuknath's team was present. But the people against whom all the preparations had been made were not there. The judge lowered his spectacles and looked again. "Respondent?" The clerk said, "Present." "Petitioner?" The clerk turned the pages. The attendance column was blank.

On an ordinary day a blank attendance column meant dismissal, costs, adjournment or punishment. But that day the blank column spoke more loudly than anything else. It contained neither absence nor fear. It contained a decision - the decision to stop waiting for justice.

Batuknath rose. "My Lord, this is contempt of court. People set a process in motion in the name of public interest and then disappear midway. This is a waste of the Court's time."

Satyavrat Mehta sat at the government table, upright but taut within. At those words a vein at his temple flickered. He wanted to stand, then remained seated. No rulebook records how many times a person occupying the government counsel's chair remains silent against the truth. But the weight of silence is carried not by the body, but by the soul.

The judge asked, "For the State?" Every eye turned toward Satyavrat. He rose slowly. His file lay open, but the pages were not trembling in the air; they seemed to tremble from within. He said, "My Lord, absence does not always mean neglect. Sometimes people do outside the courtroom what the courtroom itself has failed to do."

A stir passed through the room. Batuknath's face stiffened. Chandrapal Batra sat in the rear row and felt that Satyavrat had crossed the line again. But this time the line was drawn not on paper but across the courtroom floor, and a little dew had begun to gather upon it.

The judge said, "What do you mean?" Satyavrat replied, "The case before you is alive. But the names that have entered this case as compensation claims, death lists, technical reports, digital accounts, medical bills and evidence of fraud are alive outside this courtroom as well. If the petitioners have not come today, that does not mean the truth is absent."

Batuknath interrupted. "This is a court, not a poetry recital."

For the first time Satyavrat looked directly at him. "Poetry begins on the day the law stops reading names."

Silence filled the room. A sentence like that cannot be answered with a statutory section. Batuknath had sections in his hand, but the moment had slipped beyond his grasp.

The judge was preparing to adjourn the matter, the familiar remedy of every day. But before he wrote the order, a drop of water appeared on the tip of his pen. He started. The drop fell on the paper, spread in a small circle and formed a tiny word: "Sarayu." The judge shut the file. "Next date," he said.

"When?" the clerk asked.

The judge thought for a long time, then announced an ordinary date in an ordinary voice. Yet everyone in the room felt that it was not the hearing but time itself that had been adjourned.

In the corridor outside, Batuknath stopped Satyavrat. "Mehta ji, you hold a government post. Why do you speak like the opposition?"

Satyavrat said, "If the truth is left on the opposition side, the government should be ashamed, not I."

Batuknath laughed, but there was sand inside the laugh. "This will not do. The Bar, the government, the Council - each has its discipline."

"Discipline should not become the art of cutting the names of the dead," Satyavrat said, and walked away. Batuknath watched him for a long time. He understood that this man would not be easy to defeat, because he was not trying to win. A person who does not seek victory is difficult to make lose.

Chandrapal Batra came close and whispered, "Get rid of Mehta. If he plays this morality game in front of me, the problem will grow."

Batuknath said, "Mehta is not the problem. The problem is that our opponents are not returning to court."

"Drag them back."

"By law?"

"By law, by notice, by arrest, by defamation, by allegations of foreign funding."

Batuknath said slowly, "Defamation over which statement? Contempt over which speech? They are writing names. Writing names cannot be made a crime - not yet."

Chandrapal's eyes flashed. "Then make it a crime."

At those words, the fan hanging above the corridor stopped abruptly. The air went still. Lawyers began fanning themselves with their papers. But Batuknath felt it was not the fan that had stopped; it was the leaves of Channa Grove. When the leaves stop, there is something to be heard.

A voice came from far away: "Cutting names is a crime." Whose voice was it? No one saw. Chandrapal's face went white. A message from Raghav Signal appeared on his phone: "Careful. The court is being heard."

Chandrapal typed back, "By whom?" The message would not send. Only a circle kept turning on the screen. Slowly the circle became a crocodile's eye, then vanished.

At that same hour in Garh Narikel, there was no court in session; there was a school. Stones had been laid beneath Channa Grove, one name on each stone. The children read the names. If they could not read one, they asked. Whoever asked received an answer. In this way the dead became textbooks.

Ananya read the first lesson: "Sarayu." Then she stopped. "Who was she?"

Ba said, "A labourer. Her name was cut out."

"Why was it cut out?"

"Because the stomach of the paper was small and greed was very large."

The children did not laugh. Children understand some sentences at once because they have not yet learned enough civilisation to misunderstand them.

At another corner of the school Devika Sah opened a mobile phone and showed the young people. "Anyone who calls and says the police have put you under digital arrest is trying to buy your fear. First rule: do not be afraid alone. Second: do not send money. Third: call someone from your family."

A teenager asked, "What if they show my photo, Aadhaar and bank details?" Devika looked straight into his eyes. "The day a thief uses your name to frighten you, understand that he has obtained your papers, not your soul. Your soul is still with you."

By evening those words reached Chandrapal. His men reported, "The girl is teaching people. Digital-arrest scams are losing their effect in the village." Chandrapal smashed a glass against the table. It was not anger but fear that moved his hand. The glass shattered. In its fragments his face appeared in many pieces - lawyer, fraudster, broker, kingpin, consultant, actor playing the victim. He tried to assemble each fragment separately, but the face would not become whole.

Mira and Saumya gave the first women's-circle meeting no name. Once a name is given, an organisation is born; once an organisation exists, papers are demanded; once papers exist, attack becomes easier. So they simply said, "Come, let us sit together." That was all. There was a revolution in that sitting.

One young woman said, "Someone is threatening me with a photograph." Another said, "With my love letters." A third: "They said they would send everything to my family." Mira listened to them all and said, "Our first rule: the shame belongs to the offender, not the victim."

The sentence did not drift away into the air. It caught upon a leaf of Channa Grove. The veins of the leaf began to glow. From his branch Budhba Ghost said, "These women are opening a court larger than the court." Hulasi, who for twelve years had searched for her reflection in the darkness of the well, came that day for the first time and sat within the women's circle. No one saw her. But when one young woman wept while telling her story, Hulasi's invisible hand rested upon her head.

Abroad, Ira opened the first page of the archive of names. She refused to call it a website; she called it a "house of memory." There was no page of accusations, only names, villages, brief accounts of death or disappearance, and the family's consent. Nishant wrote to her, "They will try to shut down a site like this." Ira replied, "Then we will not make only a site. We will make copies - in children's notebooks, songs, walls and leaves."

Nishant looked at the screen for a long time. In the world of finance, copying is called theft. In the world of memory, copying is liberation. That night he did not steal his company's internal payment map; he read it, understood it, and wrote down the names of the points where money lost by Indian young people became profit abroad. Knowledge was not theft; it was raw grain for awakening.

Batuknath's empty court slowly became a story in the city. People said, "The case continues, but the petitioners do not come." Another asked, "Why?" A third answered, "They have opened a court in their own village." People laughed at that. Yet after the laughter, each felt a little fear: what if a court truly opened in the village?

An emergency meeting of the Bar Council was called. The subject was "Protecting the Dignity of the Court." Batuknath presided. A resolution appeared on the screen: "Unauthorised public archives create distrust in judicial processes." A young lawyer asked, "How is writing the names of the dead unauthorised?" The whole hall turned to look at him. The young lawyer fell silent, but the question remained in the air.

Batuknath amended the proposal: "False archives of names." But an immediate difficulty arose: how does one prove a name false? Is the death of a labourer false because it is absent from government records? Is a young man's suicide false because his family says it happened? Is a woman's account of blackmail false because it comes from her own mouth? The scissors of law jam at the point where human pain arrives without a certificate.

The meeting was adjourned. Batuknath sat in darkness in his room. His certificate of honour hung on the wall. Suddenly droplets of water shimmered upon it. The letters spread and rearranged themselves: "Empty President." He rose and wiped them with a cloth. The words appeared again. At last he switched off the light. In darkness the certificate could no longer be seen, but the word continued to sound within him: empty.

That night Chandrapal connected with the shadow in Hong Kong. Lau Kin-Hung's face never appeared in full, only a haze with a city of glass behind it. Chandrapal said, "I will suppress them through legal channels." The shadow asked, "Why are customers falling?"

Chandrapal was silent.

"I do not want Indian law. I want money," the shadow said. "If a village girl is teaching people to hang up the phone, if young men have begun asking questions before opening accounts, if women will no longer stay silent under blackmail, then your legal victory is my loss."

Cold sweat gathered on Chandrapal's forehead - the kind born not of heat but of deep insecurity. The global owner of a criminal business does not watch emotion; he watches flow. Wherever the flow of money stops, there is danger. The small gatherings forming in Garh Narikel were more dangerous to him than any court judgment.

That night a new game began beneath Channa Grove. The children played kabaddi, but the rules had changed. Whoever was caught did not have their name crossed out; everyone repeated it together. Whoever crossed the line holding their breath was asked, "Whose name are you carrying?" One child answered, "Sarayu." Another, "Ujjwal." A third, "Hulasi." The game slowly became an exercise in memory.

Budhba Ghost smiled from his branch. Raksh dimmed his glow so he would not disturb the children's game. For the first time Loth rose from the spectators and came to sit beside the field. Panidubbi's hair danced in the pond, but caught no one's feet. The witches circled above with their little baskets as though standing guard.

When word of the empty court reached Channa Grove, a faint laughter ran through the leaves. The leaves seemed to say, "When a building keeps waiting for the people and the people begin living outside it, the building is not merely empty. It is regretful."

That night Satyavrat Mehta wrote in his diary: "Today I understood that the greatest crisis of a court is not litigation but the maturity of society. When people do not hate the court but reduce their dependence upon it, the court must rethink its meaning."

He paused after writing, then added: "An empty court is not failure. It is a warning. If justice will not read the people's names, the people will open their own court."

At dawn a cleaner came to sweep the court corridor. He saw small names written in chalk upon one bench and began wiping them away. The names disappeared, then rose again in the dust. The cleaner stopped. His own father, too, had once failed to return from a construction site. The government record said, "Left work and absconded." Slowly he wrote his father's name in the dust.

Thus the first citizens' archive opened inside the empty court - not by order, not by petition, but because a cleaner remembered his father.

When Batuknath arrived, the bench was clean. Yet he felt as though invisible people sat upon every bench. The court was no longer empty; it had filled with all those who had never received an entry pass. He shuddered with a fear he had never felt in any case of his life. The mourning of his victory was taking shape now - in the form of an empty court.

FOLK SONG: FATHER, SIT UPON THE EMPTY BENCH

Folk tune: a labourer's son's lament

Sit, Father, sit upon the empty bench;

Today let the attendance of an absent life be marked.

They called the court empty, yet every bench is filled with shadows;

Those who were never granted entry are sitting there today.

The sweeper wrote his father's name in the dust;

For the first time the lie "left the job" began to tremble.

The erased name rose again, like a leaf from seed;

From a son's remembrance a citizens' archive opened in the night.

If justice will not read names, the people will become the court;

The empty building will regret and hear the call of home.

Father, sit upon the bench; your son has come;

Your absent life has become present today.

Those who were denied entry are all seated here today;

In the sweeper's dust the father's name is written.

The wiped-out name rises again like a sprouting seed.

CHAPTER 19

The Archive of Names

A chair rots, but a root does not; paper tears, but the name in an archive does not.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: PARATI OF PRESENCE

Folk tune: parati

Sing the parati - sing, "I am present";

Adorn the old names upon leaves of turmeric and kohl.

Arrange the old names upon turmeric-and-kohl leaves;

At the hour of attendance, let everyone sing, "I am present."

Paper may tear, but rooted letters sprout again;

When the drop of dew dries, the line of memory remains.

The government phone may fall silent, but the people's voice will not;

In the school of names, no one is absent.

Let every dawn begin with the parati of presence;

Let history become whole by marking the attendance of the unnamed.

In the cold air before dawn, the bell of attendance rings;

Paper may tear, roots do not - rows of names keep sprouting.

Government wires may stop, the people's voice will not;

History becomes whole when even the unnamed are marked present.

The seed of the names that had risen in dust upon the benches of the city's empty court travelled all night on the wind and reached Garh Narikel. Here the Court of Channa Grove had risen, yet its chairs remained. Call them chairs or roots, for they were not wooden seats. They were the roots of the tree itself, lifted above the earth through the night to become backs upon which the dead had sat, while the living stood and those who believed themselves victorious remained far away, behind raised car windows on the dusty road, wiping sweat from their faces.

When the first bird called at dawn, the lines of the game were still marked in Channa Grove. Footprints lay upon the earth, but no human being could tell whose feet had made them. Some prints touched the ground; some seemed to have passed a finger's breadth above it; some were round, as though a heavy boneless body had rolled there.

Panidubbi's hair, which had hung all night from the branches, was now falling in drops of dew. Brahma of the pipal remained silent - a silence like a judgment already written, whose copy each person must carry away inside the body.

Aruni rose first. He had not slept all night. The sound of the court kept circling in his head like the ceiling fan in the city courtroom. Yet the sound here was different. It contained no "allowed," no "rejected," no "next date." It held only names - names that had sounded through the night until the leaves of the grove seemed to have become sheets of paper.

Ba sat at the doorway. Her eyes were red, but her face was clear. She asked, "How many names do you remember?"

Aruni remained silent for a long time before answering. Does one remember names? Names fall like dew and flow like water. But once a name has come from the mouth of the dead, forgetting it is close to sin.

"Not all," Aruni said. "But once we begin, the remaining names will come by themselves."

Ba opened her old chest. The hinge cried out, and the mingled smell of old papers, camphor and dried neem leaves rose from within. It was the same chest that had held for years account books, old papers, wedding invitations, court notices, prescriptions, and Nand Aruni's unfinished application. The corners of that application had yellowed, but the ink still carried the smell of the night when Nand had written: "The actual number of labourers does not match the government record."

Ba ran her hand over the application. "This is not an archive," she said. "This is a paper stopped at the gate. An archive is what people keep in their chest. But chests split open, so it must also be written outside."

"Where shall we write it?" Saumya asked.

Ba pointed toward Channa Grove. "Where the court sat."

No announcement was made in Garh Narikel that day. No drum sounded. No poster was pasted. No committee, president or vice-president was formed. Whoever had a name to bring simply began to walk there. First came Sarayu's granddaughter. Sarayu was the woman labourer absent from the government list because attendance had never been marked in her name; wages had twice been drawn in her husband's name, and her body had gone into the Ganga on the same day that the engineer's register recorded, "Safety training completed." The granddaughter carried a plastic bag containing two pieces of broken bangles and an old photograph. When the bag moved, the bangle fragments chimed softly, as though they too wished to have their attendance marked. The face in the photograph was blurred, but the edge of the veil over the head and the corners of the eyes were clear.

"This is my grandmother," she said. "She is not in the papers. She is in our home. I want her to be in Channa Grove too."

Saumya sat beside her. "Name?"

"Sarayu Devi. Village - Bishanpur Tola. Work - carrying baskets on her head. Death - do not write death; write missing. But my grandmother died."

Saumya began to write, but not on paper. Ira took out a durable plaque she had brought from abroad - a thin sheet of metal that rain, sun, termites and government whitewash could not easily consume. But Ba stopped her hand.

"Metal later," she said. "First on a leaf. What the leaf accepts will endure on metal."

Ananya ran and brought a dried coconut leaf, long as an old map of a river. Devika cleaned it. Mira made ink from soot, kohl, ground turmeric and two drops of Ganga water. The mixed scent of turmeric and kohl rose from the ink, like the smell of home and the riverbank meeting in one place. Nishant, standing at the edge of the courtyard with his phone, put it into his pocket for the first time. He understood that there was no hurry to photograph what was being written here. Some things must first be seen with the eyes and only afterward by a device.

Aruni wrote the first name: "Sarayu Devi."

When the ink touched the leaf, a soft laugh came from within Channa Grove. No one knew whether it was Budhba Ghost or Hulasi. But there was relief in that laugh, as though some spirit sitting there for twelve hundred years were saying: yes, now it has begun.

The second name was Kanhaiya Paswan. His son Munna did not come; his grandson did. Kanhaiya had fallen while packing cement inside a bridge pier. In the government papers his signature continued to appear through the following day. A dead man's signature? When Nand had raised the question, the clerk had replied, "Sir, he had put his thumbprint in advance."

Kanhaiya's grandson took a small iron nail from his pocket. "This used to be with Baba," he said. "He used to say that if the iron meant for the bridge goes into people's stomachs, the bridge will shake."

The nail was placed beside the leaf. The name was written: "Kanhaiya Paswan."

After that, a procession of names opened. Mansur Ali. Phulo Mandal. Ganeshi Sada. Phoolbasia Khatoon. Bisesar Sah. Jagdish Yadav. Ramcharitan Mukhiya. Jhingur Mahato. Balesarni. Some names had no father beside them, some no husband, some only a tola. Disputes arose over pronunciation. Someone said, "Her name was not Phulo, it was Phulwa." Another said, "The paper says Phulo." Ba said, "Paper can lie. Write the name by which she was called at home."

Thus the first rule was made: the archive would preserve not only the official name but also the name by which a person was called. For the dead find release in the name with which a mother's voice once called them.

By noon fifty names had been written in Channa Grove. The leaves lay spread upon the ground. Crows walked over them, but the ink did not smear. A child stepped upon one, but the letters did not break. Ba smiled. "When a name is written with the consent of the dead, the feet of the living cannot harm it."

At the same time, a meeting was under way in Batuknath Hariharan's city office. The judgment lay on the table. It was in his favour. Sections, procedure, limitation, jurisdiction, admissibility - every word supported him. Until yesterday he had defeated people with these words. Today the words seemed empty.

Chandrapal Batra was chewing cloves instead of a cigar; his doctor had advised him to stop smoking. He said, "We have won on paper. What are they doing on the ground?"

Batuknath lowered his spectacles. "Who?"

"The same people - Gop, Saumya, Aruni, Devika. They are not coming to court. They are not going to the media. Not even to social media. This silence is not right."

"Defeated people become silent," Batuknath said, but his voice lacked the confidence his face was supposed to show.

Raghav Signal Somani checked his phone. A short message from Lau Kin-Hung had arrived on Signal: "Noise over?"

Raghav replied, "Noise over? Legally, yes."

The answer came at once: "Law is not noise. People are noise. Check."

Sweat formed on Raghav's forehead. Foreign crime bosses can smell new activity among people from far away. He understood that after losing a case, people usually break, accept defeat, ask for settlement. But these people were asking neither for settlement nor for money for an appeal. They had disappeared. Missing people are frightening in the way dead people are frightening - you cannot tell from where they will speak.

By evening the sunlight slanted through Channa Grove and the names began to shine on the leaves. Ira, who had studied law abroad, watched them. She remembered the Harvard auditorium where the wall bore the words "Ethical Leadership." There had been no names there, only principles. Here there were no principles written, only names - and in those names there was more ethics than in a thousand books in a library.

Ira said softly, "Shall I send one copy of this archive abroad?"

Ba laughed. "Send it abroad, send it across the sea, send it to the clouds. But the first copy will remain here. The soil that heard the name has the first right to it."

Gop Kumar, silent until then, opened his bag. It contained no printouts and not even the old pen drive. There were hundreds of small slips, each bearing one name and one number. A number meant a bank account, a bill, a payment, a date of death, an ambulance number, a medicine vial, a gambling transaction, the time of a digital-arrest call.

"These are names too," Gop said. "Not only labourers. Those who received bills instead of beds during the pandemic, receipts instead of oxygen; those whose sons were taken by the crocodile of the screen; those whose daughters disappeared into the market in bodies; those whose lives were silenced by blackmail - all of them."

Channa Grove fell quiet for a while, as though the dead were considering how many deaths one archive could contain. Then the pipal leaves moved. Brahma did not descend, but his shadow fell upon the leaves. The shadow split into four, toward the four directions of his four faces. Ba understood: permission had been given.

Thus the second rule was made: the archive would not preserve only the old water-burials. Anyone consumed by the system, erased by paper, drowned by a screen, killed through the theft of privacy, or sold in the market of bodies could have a name there, if their people wished it.

For the first time Mira spoke. "What if a person does not want their private life made public?"

Ba looked at her. "To name is not to strip someone bare. To name is to remember. The grief that must remain hidden will remain hidden. The name that must remain will remain. Channa Grove does not rob anyone of shame or dignity."

Mira lowered her eyes. The sentence gave her more shelter than any section of law had given her. She took out her paper. It contained no names, only markers: "a young woman, Darbhanga"; "a teacher, Patna"; "a nurse, Noida"; "a student, Kathmandu route"; "a wife threatened with a video." Mira said, "No names yet. Only markers. When they are ready, the names will come."

Thus the third rule was made: the archive would contain a place for silence as well. Some truths cannot speak at once; they need a protected shade.

By nightfall a sheet of leaves covered the earth in Channa Grove. Ananya and the village children began reading the letters. At first they treated the names like a game. Then Devika explained, "This is a lesson, not an examination. If you read a name wrongly, read it again. But do not forget it."

A child asked, "Did all of them die?"

Ba said, "No. All of them were written down."

On the distant road a black car approached, stopped and turned away, then came again. It carried one of Raghav Signal Somani's men. He tried to take a photograph, but the moment he opened his phone camera, the screen filled with water. He tried another phone - the same. A third - the same. The photographs showed only blurred leaves, water and letters hanging upside down. Frightened, he turned back.

Raghav received the report: "They are writing names."

Batuknath laughed. "Names? What can writing names do?"

Chandrapal Batra remained silent. He understood the world of online gambling. He knew that once data spreads, it is difficult to erase. Names are data too - but data whose password rests in the mouth of the dead. He asked quietly, "How many names?"

"Counting continues," Raghav said.

At the words "counting continues," Batuknath's laughter stopped. Victors fear counting, because they win by reducing numbers. Write thirty names and mark the rest absent. Record one death and call the rest illness. Record one suicide and call the rest personal reasons. Record one blackmail case and call the rest character. Record one fraud and call the rest greed. When counting begins in reverse, the paper of victory starts turning yellow.

That night no kabaddi was played in Channa Grove. The spirits sat around the field. Leaves lay spread in the centre. Budhba Ghost bent his dark body and read the first name, "Sarayu Devi." The white light in his eyes entered the ink for a moment. Then the letters of Sarayu Devi's name trembled slightly, as though from far inside a Ganga bridge pier she were brushing dust from herself and rising.

"I am present," a voice said.

No mouth moved, but everyone heard.

"I am present," came from another leaf.

"I am present."

"I am present."

Slowly attendance began to be marked throughout Channa Grove. In that attendance register there was no clerk, no red seal, no fee - only names, and air beside the names.

At that moment Aruni understood that this archive was not the next document in a lawsuit. It was society's first breath. The court had become empty because justice had found another home.

At sunrise the names written on the leaves of Channa Grove had dried. Some letters had turned faintly green, as though the leaves had taken them into their own veins. Ananya read each name aloud and the children repeated it. Devika stopped beside Ujjwal's name. She wrote: "Ujjwal Jha - the crocodile of the screen." Her hand trembled, but the letters remained straight.

Nishant stood beside her. He said softly, "The next work will be against the screen."

Devika looked at him. "Not work. A school."

Ba heard. "Yes," she said. "Boatmen recognise the crocodile that lives in water. Children must be taught to recognise the crocodile that lives in a screen."

That day the fourth rule was written in Channa Grove: an archive is not only memory; it is also caution. Writing a name honours the dead. Reading a name protects the living.

Far away in the city, Satyavrat Mehta sat at his table. A copy reached him too - by neither email nor courier. At dawn a coconut leaf had appeared on the veranda of his government residence. The security guard said, "Sir, no camera shows who left this."

Satyavrat opened the leaf. It still carried the faint scent of turmeric and kohl. At the first name his eyes filled with tears. At the second he rose from his chair. At the third he switched off his government phone.

He understood: the next hearing would not take place in court but in the memory of the country. This time the opposing counsel would not be a lawyer, but names. Names cannot be defeated by cross-examination.

That evening in Garh Narikel the first dry coconut leaf sounded in the wind. The sound was strange, like a school bell ringing somewhere far away.

Ananya asked, "Has the school opened?"

Ba said, "Yes. The school of names has opened."

FOLK SONG: I AM PRESENT

Folk tune: parati

Say it, say it - say, "I am present";

Set the old names upon leaves of turmeric and kohl.

Old names written on turmeric-and-kohl leaves;

A mother's voice called, and every life awoke.

Paper may tear and chairs may rot;

Letters buried in roots will sprout again.

Names fell like dew and settled as ink;

At the hour of attendance they rose to say, "I am present."

Mehta's eyes filled; the government phone fell silent;

The next hearing settled into the nation's memory.

A bell rang from the leaves - the school of names;

Mark the attendance of the unnamed and open a new light.

Let paper tear and chairs rot; the letters in the roots will remain;

Names fallen as dew will settle into ink.

Mehta's eyes grew wet; the government phone stopped;

The leaf-bell rang - the school of names opened.

CHAPTER 20

A School Against the Screen

Whatever the screen had swallowed, the school returned one thing at a time.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: NOT ALONE - A SONG OF TOGETHERNESS

Folk tune: children's folk tune

Call out together, friends; make a circle hand in hand;

Let the first question be: "I am not alone, am I?"

The screen-crocodile walks on four legs - greed, fear and shame,

And loneliness; once hands meet, its whole kingdom breaks.

Children make a circle and raise one question:

"I am not alone, am I?" - and a friend answers at once.

Shared fear grows lighter; shame returns to the offender;

Once support has a name, society takes shape.

The song of not being alone will echo across the phone;

Awakened voices will choose the road of life together.

The screen-crocodile hisses - greed, fear and shame;

When hand joins hand, its rule collapses.

Fear shared becomes half; laughter shared becomes double;

Children walk the road singing the song of companionship.

The dry coconut leaf that had sounded like a bell the previous evening kept ringing in people's ears until dawn. On the second day after the archive of names was made, a stillness descended upon Garh Narikel as though a great hand had been laid over the village. The names written on leaves in Channa Grove were wet with dew, but the letters did not run. Some had turned green, some black as kohl, some looked as though they were rising from within the soil. Children gathered there from early morning. For them this was not mourning; it was a new lesson. They stumbled over names, corrected one another, then repeated them together.

Ananya sat at the front. There was something in the way she read the names like a small child sounding out an alphabet for the first time - except that this alphabet had been made from the bodies of the dead. "Sarayu Devi," she read. The others answered, "Present." "Kanhaiya Paswan." "Present." "Ujjwal Jha." Here her voice paused. Devika Sah stood at a distance, her eyes fixed not on the leaf but on Ananya's mouth.

Beside Ujjwal's name there was no basket, no nail, no bangle. There was only a small piece of broken mobile-phone glass. The sky appeared upside down inside it. Sometimes a branch of Channa Grove entered the reflection, and it seemed as though the tree itself had been trapped inside the screen. When morning sunlight struck the glass, it flashed for a moment like a crocodile's eye.

Devika came forward slowly and sat beside the leaf. She reached to touch the glass, then stopped. Ujjwal had been her younger brother - the quickest in the house, the most cheerful, the best with phones. At first he repaired everyone's phone. Later the phone would not let him repair himself.

"At first he used to win," Devika told the children, twisting the end of her sari around one finger. "The crocodile of the screen lets its prey win a little at the beginning, just as a river crocodile first keeps the water still. Children, remember: when something gives very easy profit at first, look for its teeth."

A child asked, "Where are the teeth inside a screen?"

Nishant Jha, who until yesterday had been a silent observer, laughed for the first time. He had grown up abroad, studied financial technology, and worked at building pathways for money inside screens. He knew that the teeth of a screen were not iron but rules, conditions, fear and addiction. Yet those words were useless to a child. He said, "When the screen tells you not to tell anyone, that is a tooth. When it says send money at once or you will go to jail, that is a tooth. When it says you are certain to win, then its tongue is red."

Ba smiled. "Well said. In the old days a witch told a child, do not listen to your mother, I will give you secret sweets. Now the screen says, do not tell your family, trust me. The witch has changed; the trick has not."

That morning the first class sat beside the leaves of Channa Grove. There was no blackboard, no bell, no government recognition. The children sat in a circle. In the middle lay broken mobile glass, an old bank passbook, Ujjwal's unfinished notebook and a coconut leaf. Devika, Nishant, Ananya, Mira, Saumya and Aruni sat not as teachers but as witnesses.

Devika told Ujjwal's story, not as a lament but as a lesson, because she had already wept through too many nights. One day Ujjwal won five thousand rupees. He brought sweets home. Everyone thought he had found some online work. Then fifteen thousand was lost. Then fifty. Then debt. Then threats. Then one day a false official seal appeared on the screen and brought fear with it: "digital arrest" - words that made the body go numb. A voice on the phone said, "Lock the door. Turn on the camera. Tell no one."

Devika paused. The children kept looking at her. She said, "When the law truly detains someone, it does not make them sit alone at home with a camera open. When the State truly questions someone, it does not lock them inside fear. If fear tries to isolate you, understand that it is the fear of a thief, not the law."

Mira nodded. She remembered the blackmail in her own life. She too had been pushed toward isolation: "Tell no one, or the video; tell no one, or the photos; tell no one, or your family." She told the children quietly, "Fear that takes you away from your people is a messenger of falsehood. Truth leads you back toward your people."

The children did not understand everything on the first day, but they understood this much: a screen can also be a forest. A forest has snakes, jackals and the shadow of witches; a screen has them too. The only difference is that in the forest leaves rustle, while on a screen notifications flash.

By evening the whole village had heard that a mobile-phone school had opened in Channa Grove. Some laughed. "Such a huge scandal - courts, foreign countries, crocodiles - and now they will teach mobile phones?" But homes that had already received debt calls did not laugh; nor did homes where young men had lost money playing through the night, nor women who had trembled at calls from fake police. On the second day they came too.

Two days later there were more adults than children in the school: farmers on their way to the fields, labourers who had opened bank accounts, students studying in town, mothers of sons earning away from home, an old man who did not understand what giving his thumbprint meant. Devika listened to every story. Nishant drew lines on paper. He was not teaching methods of crime; he was drawing a map of fear - where fear enters, how loneliness is made, how greed catches hold, and how shame becomes a noose.

Nishant said, "The screen-crocodile does not walk on four ordinary legs. Its four legs are greed, fear, shame and loneliness. When you see all four together, run."

An old farmer asked, "Run where?"

Ba answered, "Toward your own people. The first medicine against fraud is: do not remain alone."

That sentence became the school's first rule. Ananya wrote on a coconut leaf: "Do not remain alone." The children read it. Those who could not read listened. Those who could not hear touched the lines of the leaf.

Meanwhile, unease spread through Chandrapal Batra's city office. His men reported, "Fewer new accounts are being opened in the Garh Narikel area. Young people are asking: where is this money coming from? In whose name is the account? For whom is the SIM card?"

Chandrapal struck the table. "Who is teaching them?"

"A woman - Devika Sah. A boy returned from abroad - Nishant Jha. And some village people."

"Village people?" Chandrapal laughed, but anxiety lived inside the laugh. "Village people will stop the game of finance?"

At that moment a message from Hong Kong arrived on Raghav Signal Somani's phone. Lau Kin-Hung's messages were always brief, as though he saved commission even on letters. The message said: "Trust down. Cause?"

Raghav replied, "Local rumour."

The answer came: "Not rumour. Education. Education is expensive."

Raghav froze. Criminals fear education as much as thieves fear the light of dawn. A rumour can be suppressed with money; once education enters a household, it becomes a child's question. No police guard can stand at the door of a question.

Batuknath Hariharan refused to believe it. "File a public-interest petition," he said. "Say these people are spreading false digital information, creating fear against the economy, driving away foreign investors. Drag them into court."

Chandrapal's eyes lit up. "A date?"

"Dates are my work," Batuknath said. "Let them run a school; I will trap them in procedure."

But there was a problem. The school was not an organisation. It had no registration, bank account, president or building. People simply sat in Channa Grove and talked. Whom could a notice be served upon? The tree? The leaves? Ba? The children? The ghosts? For the first time Batuknath understood that people who refuse to become an institution are difficult to catch in institutional traps.

That night Budhba Ghost laughed heartily in Channa Grove. "See?" he said to Hulasi. "The living are learning. Soon there will be less work for us."

Hulasi, who always searched the well's reflection for a child, watched the schoolchildren peacefully that day. "If children learn to recognise fear," she said, "far fewer spirits will come here."

From inside the pond, Panidubbi shook out her hair and listened. "I catch feet in water," she said. "But the screen-crocodile catches eyes. Save the eyes and the feet will save themselves."

So the second class was called "Save Your Eyes." Devika told everyone, "What glitters is not gold. Anything that says hurry is danger. Anyone who turns your shame into a weapon should be answered first by telling someone you trust."

A girl stood and asked, "What if my family blames me?"

Mira answered in a steady voice. "Then find another home - a friend, a teacher, a sister, an organisation. Do not accept blame yourself and thereby protect the offender. Society takes time to change, but silence is the offender's largest blanket."

That day Mira wrote the school's second rule: "Shame is not the offender's, not the victim's." Ba thought for a moment and corrected it: "Let the shame belong to the offender." The children wrote: "Let the shame belong to the offender."

On the third day Nishant made his confession. He said that the company he had worked for abroad had not merely built pipes for payments; it had measured people's desire, fear, addiction, time and loneliness. "I thought it was technology. Now I understand: when technology abandons compassion, it becomes a crocodile."

Someone in the village asked sharply, "Then are you guilty too?"

Nishant was silent. Devika wanted to defend him, but Ba stopped her with a hand. He had to give the answer himself.

"Yes," Nishant said. "I am guilty - I did not learn as much as I could have learned. I did not ask as much as I could have asked. But I will not run away now."

At that confession the leaves of Channa Grove moved. People usually run from guilt. Whether a person who accepts guilt and begins repairing the harm should be forgiven is a question for time; but such a person can be heard.

Saumya wanted to call the class "Guilt and Responsibility," but Ba laughed. "Do not give it such a heavy name. Write: If you understand your mistake, correct it." Ananya wrote exactly that. The children read it.

Slowly the school spread beyond the village. There were no posters, yet at weddings and shraddhas, in markets and bus stands, in tea stalls in Madhubani, lodges in Darbhanga, rented rooms in Delhi, children from

Garh Narikel repeated the rules: "Do not remain alone." "Let the shame belong to the offender." "If you understand your mistake, correct it." "Quick money is the crocodile's tongue." "If fear locks the door, open it."

Chandrapal Batra's gang suffered its first major blow the day Munna Paswan's cousin was taken to open an account. The boy stopped outside the bank. He held a pen, but his palm was sweating. He remembered the school. He asked, "Where will this money come from? Why is my name on the paper? Why will you keep my phone?" The man with him scolded him. The boy ran all the way to Channa Grove. His story was heard before everyone. No one called him foolish or guilty. They called him saved.

The word "saved" became very important. A person caught in fraud was not "stupid"; a person who stopped midway was "saved." That word began opening mouths.

Raghav Signal Somani grew irritated reading the reports. "Because of this rural counselling, the rate at which people are being trapped is falling," his men had written. Raghav flared up. "This is not rural counselling - fear is breaking," he thought. Fear was the axle of his business. Once fear broke, the voice of the call centre dried up.

Batuknath said, "Send law in place of fear."

He had a notice drafted. It said that an unlawful assembly in Channa Grove at Garh Narikel was making misleading statements against financial institutions, damaging the image of the digital economy, obstructing foreign investment and disturbing public peace. The notice was sent. The postman reached the village but stopped beside Channa Grove. The addressee read: "Coconut Leaf School, Channa Grove, Garh Narikel." The postman laughed. "Will the tree sign for it?"

Ba accepted the notice. In the place for signature she stuck a dry fibre from a coconut leaf. The postman grew nervous. "Will this be valid?"

Ba said, "Those who did not accept the names of the dead will not accept a fibre from a leaf either. Send it anyway. Paper wants an answer made of paper."

A copy of the notice also reached Satyavrat Mehta. He read it and remained silent for a long time. His government position told him to be cautious in such a matter. His conscience asked: if villagers cannot teach children how to protect themselves from fraud, what is law for? He wrote a personal note: "Public education cannot be treated as a crime when it warns people against fear, shame and greed." It was not a formal order, but later it proved very useful.

That night Satyavrat's note was read aloud in the school. The children did not understand the name, but they understood the sentence. Ananya asked, "Is this man on our side?"

Ba said, "He is on the side of truth. Whoever stands with truth sometimes ends up on our side as well."

Kabaddi was played again that night in Channa Grove, but the game was different. The lines the children had drawn by day became the ghosts' playing field at night. Instead of chanting "kabaddi," Budhba Ghost called, "Do not remain alone." Hulasi called, "Let shame belong to the offender." Panidubbi called from the water, "Save your eyes." In Raksh's glow, the rules written upon leaves kept shining.

At dawn the children found that a new line had grown by itself upon a coconut leaf. No human hand had made the letters. They were formed not from ink but from the veins of the leaf. Ananya read them slowly:

"Fear that is shared is no longer fear."

Hearing this, Devika wept openly for the first time in many days. It was not weeping over Ujjwal's death; it was weeping because she saw that her brother's death had not ended with him. It had become a lesson. A lesson can save more people than one body can.

Chandrapal Batra sat alone in his office that day. Messages from Signal had grown fewer. Some accounts had closed. Some boys had run away. Some families went not to the police but to the village school. For the first time he understood that the people he had defeated in court were putting down roots in society. His court victory was a roof made of paper; in Garh Narikel they were ploughing the earth.

He looked at the judgment on his table. It had a seal, a date, a signature. But no child's voice lived in the paper. He felt that one day it would turn yellow. And the leaves of Channa Grove? Leaves dry into seed. Seed becomes tree. Tree becomes leaf. Leaf becomes lesson again.

Evening wind moved through Garh Narikel. Coconut leaves sounded. The school did not close; people rose and went home, but the rules went with them. From that day a new greeting entered the village. Whenever someone sounded frightened on the phone, the other person asked, "You are not alone, are you?"

Slowly the question became a mantra.

You are not alone, are you?

That question broke many frauds. Many fears were shared. Much shame was returned to the offender. Many screen-crocodiles remained with their mouths open while the prey escaped.

And the Court of Channa Grove, which had already given its judgment, sat at a distance and smiled. It knew that justice does not always become an order. Sometimes it becomes a school.

FOLK SONG: YOU ARE NOT ALONE, ARE YOU?

Folk tune: children's folk tune

Ask first, children - ask, "Who is with you?"

When one another's voices remain, the crocodile will go hungry.

The screen-crocodile has four legs - greed, fear, shame;

When loneliness joins them, it can swallow the whole day.

Children sit beneath the tree, hands joined in a circle;

One question becomes a mantra: "I am not alone, am I - are you with me?"

Fear shared broke apart; shame returned to the offender;

The swindler's tongue dried up; the household companion was saved.

The lesson of the leaf does not yellow; it wakes again as seed;

Justice does not always come as an order; sometimes it comes as a school.

When the phone trembles, ask first: "Who is with you?"

When one another's voices remain, the crocodile stays hungry.

Greed, fear, shame and loneliness - the crocodile's four legs;

Once a circle forms, every net it cast begins to break.

Fear shared becomes half; shame returns to the offender.

CHAPTER 21

The Oath of Privacy

Peace does not come from outside; it breaks through the soil of fear and grows from within.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: INNOCENT, TOGETHER

Folk tune: women's-circle awakening song

Rise, sisters, gather the circle,

"We are innocent, we stand together" - join your voices.

We are not guilty, sister; let shame rest on the offender's brow,

Hold one another's hands, and a safer road will open.

The veil is ours to choose; let the voice remain free,

Fear shared is halved; courage flows from standing together.

The cry "I am not alone" will become a lamp in every home,

An awakened community will break the swindler's net.

We are innocent, we stand together - sing this song,

Set a guard of dignity at the threshold of privacy.

Let drums sound in every courtyard, let opened voices sing,

Lay the bundle of shame upon the one who commits the crime.

If one sister's step falters, ten hands will steady her,

No swindler can enter the ring of an awakened circle.

"You are not alone, are you?" That question had now become a greeting in the village. On the strength of it, once the Archive of Names had been made, people thought peace would at last descend upon the village. But peace never comes from outside; it grows from within. And when the inner soil has for years been packed with fear, shame, silence and threats, the earth trembles when the first shoot breaks through. The names had been written down, but with the names came bodies; with bodies, privacy; with privacy, the fear of humiliation; and with that fear came all the voices that had been locked for years inside the dark room of the mobile phone.

The night Devika Sah saw Ujjwal's name written on the third leaf of the archive, she could not sleep. Her brother's death no longer seemed a black dot drowned in a mobile screen; it was the darkness of the whole village. While Ujjwal was alive, everyone at home had said, "He is a bright boy. He will go to the city, find a job and bring honour to the family." After he was gone, people began to murmur: "He got trapped on the phone. He lost in a game. His own fault." Devika kept feeling that society does not forgive the dead; it even turns their death into a reason to punish them.

So she sat beside the Archive of Names and wrote its first sentence: "We must identify not the dead person's mistake, but the net that killed him." Her hand did not tremble as she wrote. Only the shadow of the coconut leaf above her head trembled in the wind of Channa Grove.

Saumya Ramanathan returned to Garh Narikel from Delhi. She brought envelopes, files, notebooks and the small black device that recorded voices. This time, however, she came not like a journalist or researcher but like a priestess entrusted with writing an oath. She understood that testimony is given in court, but an oath is taken in society. Testimony may remain on paper; an oath changes the way people behave.

Meera, whose full name was Mrinalini, had at first refused to return to the village. She feared that people there might have heard about her. Fear has a strange shape: it can bring something years old to stand at today's door. She had received a message: "Do what we want, or all your photographs, all your conversations, all your relationships go public." There was no name on the message, only a blurred mark on Signal. But Meera had recognised that this was not personal hatred. It was a business.

What was her crime? She loved a woman. She had never understood how love could become a crime; but what society does not understand, it often turns into a weapon. Meera used to say, "My body is mine, my mind is mine, my love is mine. The crime belongs to the one who wants to sell them." Saumya urged her to come to Garh Narikel. "In this village even the ghosts live under their own names. Why should the living be afraid to speak theirs?"

No meeting was announced beside Channa Grove that day. In Garh Narikel, work that was truly serious was never proclaimed with the beating of drums. People arrived slowly. First Devika, then Saumya, then Meera. After them came Ujjwal's mother, whose eyes had stopped weeping and grown deep like a pond dried by summer. Then two young women arrived - one a nurse in the city, the other a contract worker at a bank. Both had been threatened from different numbers. Someone had told each of them: send money, or everything will be shown to your family.

At first none of them told her story. Silence, too, can sometimes be the first testimony. The ghosts of Channa Grove came walking just above the ground, leaving a finger's breadth between themselves and the earth.

Budhba Ghost shifted to another branch. Hulasi left the direction of the well and came toward the grove. Panidubbi emerged halfway from the pond and sat there; from her hair dripped not water but the glow of screens. Raksh shone, but this time his light did not dazzle the eyes; it was like a courtroom bulb lit so that a file might be read.

Saumya drew a circle on the ground with red earth. Beneath her finger the soil was damp and shivering, as though the earth itself were holding its breath before the oath. Inside the circle she wrote: "Privacy." Then she looked at them all and said, "The word may sound new, but the matter is old. A veil was privacy. A room was privacy. A letter was privacy. The body was privacy. A dream was privacy. The only difference is that once a thief broke open the door; now the thief breaks open the phone."

Devika drew the next line: "Fraud." Then Meera stepped forward slowly and drew a third: "Shame." She said, "The swindler catches us not with money but with shame. He knows that before we think of going to court, we will fear our family; before the family, society; before society, our own body. So today we swear that shame will belong to the offender, not to the victim."

At those words wind moved through the grove. All the coconut leaves stirred at once. For the first time in twelve hundred years Budhba Ghost laughed. His laughter burst like dark light, and in that light every woman's face grew bright.

At that same hour Chandrapal Batra sat in his office in the distant city. A message appeared on Signal: "A group is forming. Name: Oath of Privacy." Batra laughed. He thought it was some NGO-style performance. He did not call Raghav Somani; he only wrote, "Watch it. Fear is necessary." Raghav replied, "Fear is decreasing." For the first time Batra sat silent before the screen for a while.

The oath began. Saumya said, "First: the person whose photograph was stolen is not guilty. The person whose conversation was recorded is not guilty. The person whose love was mocked is not guilty. The person whose bank account was turned into a mule account is not, by that fact alone, the true criminal; the true criminal is the shadow that showed him the bread of commission and pushed him into the fire of the law."

Munna Paswan, who had appeared again and again through these chapters like a frightened face, stood at the edge of the grove. It was difficult for him even to say his own name. "They told me, just give us the account and you'll get five thousand rupees. Then the police came. My family said, 'You're a criminal.' But I never found the name of the people who gave me the work. They spoke on Signal; I was arrested at the police station under my own name."

Meera looked at him. "If you were caught by your name, you will also be defended by your name. Our work will be to give names to the anonymous criminals."

Ira watched the gathering from abroad. On her screen the circle in Channa Grove looked small, but the people sitting inside it seemed to her like the greatest university in the world. She had grown tired of hearing ethical frameworks, theories of privacy and human dignity discussed in Harvard halls. What Devika was writing on the earth here was more exact than many books. Ira wrote in her notebook: "Ethics is born where frightened people stop blaming one another."

Nishant too was present by video that day. Around him in the foreign fintech office were shining screens, green graphs, user growth and transaction statistics. Now he understood that inside the word "user" were buried Ujjwal's face, Munna's account, Devika's night, Meera's threat and the leaves of Garh Narikel. He sent Saumya a private message: "I am beginning to understand some of the payment routes. But I am afraid." Saumya replied, "Fear will remain. If there is no fear, caution dies. But fear will not be the master."

In the middle of the oath a little girl who studied with Ananya at the school asked, "If someone says, 'I'll send your photograph to everyone,' what should I do?" Everyone fell silent. The question was so simple that its answer became difficult. Devika sat beside the child. "First, do not blame yourself. Second, tell someone you trust immediately. Third, do not send money. Fourth, do not erase the evidence. Fifth, find the person's name - the offender wants to remain without a name; we will bring that person into a name."

The girl asked again, "And if my family scolds me?" Meera said, "Then we will teach the family too. Scolding the victim is help given to the swindler."

From that day a new custom began in Garh Narikel. Anyone who received a threatening message no longer remained alone. They came to Channa Grove, drew a circle on the red earth and said, "I am not guilty." Those three words slowly became a mantra. No priest had composed it. It came from the mouths of people whom society had trained to be silent.

Batuknath Hariharan grew uneasy. He loved the language of law because within it he could hide delay, appeal, technical objection and procedure. But what objection could he raise to "I am not guilty"? He told his secretary, "Find a way to stop these emotional gatherings." The secretary asked, "Under which section?" Hariharan fell silent. For him, silence was the first taste of defeat.

That night Raghav "Signal" Somani messaged Lau Kin-Hung: "Local resistance is taking a route different from law." The reply came: "Outside the law?" Raghav wrote, "Not outside the law. Before the law." For the first time Lau Kin-Hung answered, "I do not understand." Raghav stared at the reply for a long time. He knew that a man who understands only accounts, percentages, commissions and transfers cannot be made to understand oaths, shame, names and memory.

The night deepened. Meera sat alone beside Channa Grove. Only crickets sounded in the silence. Hulasi came near. Hulasi had no hands, yet her presence was gentler than a hand. Meera closed her eyes and remembered the woman she loved, who still lived in the city and was still afraid to come to Garh Narikel. Meera whispered, "To save love, we first have to change the language of fear." Hulasi smiled. The water in the well shone from within.

That night Saumya wrote in her notes: "The fight against the market in bodies is not only a fight against traffickers; there is no liberation without the protection of privacy. Homosexual, heterosexual, married, unmarried, woman, man, third gender - the first right over every body belongs to the person whose body it is. Whoever takes that right away through blackmail, religion, family, market, police or fear of the courts - write all their names on the same leaf."

The note was later pasted into the last section of the Archive of Names. Ananya gave it the title: "Dignity of the Body, Freedom of the Mind." Ba read it and said, "The words are new, but the matter is old. Why did Sita enter the earth? Because people thought they had a right over her body. Now we will not enter the earth; we will write upon the earth."

Three days later the first result appeared. A boy who had been caught in an online fraud came to the school before sending any money. On his phone was a threat: "Digital arrest." Devika read it. She neither laughed nor scolded him. She read it aloud to everyone. "Look - this language is a stamp made of fear. Real police do not speak like this on Signal. A real notice comes on paper, and behind the paper there is an office." The children clapped. The boy began to cry. Devika placed a hand on his head. "Cry, but do not send money."

That day Ujjwal's mother spoke in the gathering for the first time. "When my son died, I thought he had brought shame on us. Now I understand that we left him alone. If this school had existed that day, perhaps he would have said, 'Ma, I have been trapped.'" Her voice broke, but the words did not.

At this the spirits playing kabaddi in Channa Grove stopped. Budhba Ghost said, "When the living admit their own fault, half the burden of the dead is lifted." Raksh shone. Loth, who was always a spectator, moved a little forward this time. His mouth was half open, and for the first time it seemed to be trying to form a voice.

Meera wrote the last line of the oath: "We will not allow anyone's love to be used as evidence against them." As she wrote, a dry leaf fell from the tree. Its veins spread like a map of a city. Saumya picked it up. To her every vein looked like a lane, and in every lane someone was running to save their privacy. The leaf was placed in the archive.

Meanwhile, in Edward Broom's company office, a presentation was being prepared: "Management of Social Resistance." Its slides showed a map of India, risk zones, influence clusters and complaint groups. Beside Garh Narikel was a small red dot. What they did not understand was that a point that has begun to grow upon a leaf cannot be cut out of a map.

At the end of the night everyone repeated the oath. No hand was placed upon a religious book. Hands were placed upon their phones, which were no longer to be instruments of fear but boxes of evidence; upon their chests, which were no longer to be prisons of shame but homes of voice; and upon the earth, where names were being written. The cold glass of the phones slowly grew warm in their palms, as though even the devices were listening to the oath.

Together they said: "We are not guilty. The shame of what was done to us belongs to the offender. My body is mine. My conversation is mine. My love is mine. My name remains in my own hands. Whoever tries to silence me through fear, we will write that person's name in the archive. Whoever tries to isolate me, we will stand together against them."

When the oath was complete, Panidubbi returned to the pond. Hulasi looked into the water of the well and, this time, felt that her reflection had hands. Budhba Ghost climbed back to his branch and could not stop laughing. Raksh kept shining in Channa Grove. Far away, Chandrapal Batra's Signal app opened and closed at once - like a crocodile that had smelled the air outside the water for the first time and slipped back into its den.

At dawn the children of Garh Narikel wrote a new sentence on the school wall: "Fear, when shared, becomes a warning; fear, when hidden, becomes a noose." Underneath, Ananya added in small letters: "Silence is the swindler's first profit."

Devika stood at a distance and read it. She knew Ujjwal would not return. But now, if another Ujjwal became trapped, he would have somewhere to speak before dying. This was not justice, but it was the thing needed before justice: support. And when support acquires a name, it becomes society.

FOLK SONG: I AM NOT GUILTY

Folk tune: women's-circle song

Rise, sister, rise with your head held high,

"I am not guilty, I am not alone" - say only this.

My veil is mine, my room is mine, my dream bears my name,

The one who broke into the phone and robbed me bears the stain.

Fear hidden became a noose; shared, it became a warning,

The moment a sister held my hand, the swindler lost his swagger.

In the middle of red earth three bright truths sprouted -

I am not guilty, I am not alone, society stands with me.

Silence is the swindler's first profit; voice is his wall's collapse,

The moment support received a name, it became a people's net.

Whoever binds me with shame, we will write that person's name,

Together we will guard the threshold of privacy.

The veil is ours, the room is ours, even the dream bears our name,

The one who opened the phone and robbed us bears the stain and price.

Silence is the swindler's first profit - so Ba has said,

When the circle found its voice, his swagger dissolved like water.

CHAPTER 22

Harvard's Second Lecture

A second lecture is better than the first only when someone has spoken the truth in between.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE STRAIN OF TRUTH ON AN EMPTY STAGE

Folk tune: auditorium rhythm of a Vidyapati song

*Sing the strain of truth, let the stage remain empty,
Let a single voice from the leaf fill the whole hall.*

*Even if the stage is empty, the voice of the leaf will rise,
Greater than golden words, one true name will break forth.
The microphone may fall silent; the people's voice will not,
No bell is louder than the quiet strain of a question.*

*Read one name and the air of the hall changes,
More than applause, attentive silence meets the truth.
On the empty stage the strain of truth will make a new road,
Ethics will leave the paper and enter life.*

*The microphone silent, the lights dim, yet the gathering wakes,
One name spoken aloud changes the direction of the air.
Golden words fall away; truth stands unmoved,
In the deep rhythm of silence, a flood of truth descends.*

Dawn in Cambridge is not like dawn in Garh Narikel. There, mist does not rise over paddy fields, dew does not drip from the edges of coconut leaves, and the ghosts of Channa Grove do not end their night's kabaddi and climb back onto their branches. Yet that morning in Cambridge the air grew so damp that the smell of the Kamla-Balan seemed to rise between the university's old bricks. Security staff wondered where water was leaking from. There was no water anywhere. There was only memory, and when memory travels from very far away it first becomes a smell - as though the oath and the Archive of Names of Garh Narikel had crossed the sea by way of the wind and come this far.

That day Edward Broom was to speak on ethics again. Posters outside the auditorium announced: Global Enterprise, Human Dignity,

Responsible Capital. The lettering was gold, the paper thick, and the flowers on the stage were so clean they seemed never to have touched soil. Broom's assistants moved through the hall checking seats, testing microphones and loading slides onto the screen. The first slide showed a bridge over the sea beneath a blue sky. The second, a hospital. The third, a school. The fourth bore a single word: "Trust."

Broom stood before the mirror in his room. His face carried the calm of a man who had passed through many courts, many inquiries and many press conferences and could still straighten the knot of his tie as though he were the victor. He had been told that the matter in India had legally subsided. The disturbance around the sealed cover had exhausted itself. The Bar Council people were reassured. Old contract files lay beneath the dust of time. Digital fraud was a local crime. Questions about medicine procurement were administrative. Human trafficking was emotionalism. Payments for weapons belonged to national security. Drug money came from unknown sources. Every word had its own lock.

But he did not understand that once the lock on a word breaks, the voice does not remain on paper; it stays in people's mouths. And no seal can be placed upon a people's mouth.

Ira Aruni had an invitation to enter the auditorium. Her seat was in the front row, with a card bearing her name. Professor Elina Graves read the card and smiled. "Will you ask a question?" Ira smiled too. "No. Today I will not ask a question."

Elina Graves was slightly surprised. She had expected Ira to challenge the speaker from the floor and create an intellectual clash inside the auditorium. Universities can turn even conflict into a programme - time limited, questions polite, answers rounded, applause controlled. But Ira had understood that a question asked within the stage remains imprisoned by the rules of the stage. She now wanted to change the rules.

The auditorium filled. Journalists, researchers, donors, students, company representatives and policy advisers sat with their notebooks open. Broom came onto the stage. Applause. His first sentence was: "Ethics is not an ornament of business; it is its foundation." More applause. He went on: "Development is complete only when the dignity of the weakest person is protected." At that sentence the applause lasted longer, because the weakest person was not present in that auditorium.

At that same moment, outside the hall beside the old stone steps, Ira opened her small computer and sat down. With her were three students and two elderly women whom no one recognised. One student adjusted the camera. Another opened a live feed from Garh Narikel. The third checked the sound. Ira said, "Do not point the microphone at Broom's auditorium. Point it at the leaf."

In Garh Narikel evening was falling. The next page of the Archive of Names was opened upon the leaves of Channa Grove. Ananya was arranging the children in a line. Devika Sah stood nearby, Meera and Saumya on either side, Nishant struggling with the mobile connection, Aruni silent. First on the leaf were the names of labourers, then Ujjwal, then the women whose bodies had disappeared into the market, then the old people whose breath had been buried under bills. Today a new line was to be added: "Those whose names were called profit in foreign auditoriums."

Ananya began to read. "Sarayu Devi." The children answered, "Present." "Kanhaiya Paswan." - "Present." "Ujjwal Jha." - "Present." "Unknown woman, Room Twenty-Seven." - "Present." "Third old man on the oxygen waiting list." - "Present." "Not mule-account number - Munna Paswan." - "Present." The voices rose from the village into Ira's device, from there to the Cambridge steps, and from the steps to the closed doors of the auditorium.

Inside the hall Broom had reached his third slide. He was saying, "We must learn from local communities." At that instant the photograph of the bridge on the screen changed. Someone assumed a technical fault. In place of the bridge appeared a name written on a wet leaf. Broom froze. An assistant ran forward. The screen corrected itself. He began again. Before his next sentence ended, a second name appeared. Then a third. A fourth. The names were entering the slides like seeds long pressed beneath paper suddenly breaking out as letters.

For the first time sweat appeared on Edward Broom's brow. The air-conditioning was strong, yet beside his ears he heard the churn of Ganga water. It was not water; it was the splash of bodies fallen among crocodiles. The tie knot he had straightened before the mirror like a victor now felt like a noose around his breath. He gripped the microphone and tried to speak: "Please... a technical problem..." But through his own voice came another: "Thirty declared. The rest absorbed." Broom panicked. He could not tell whether anyone else had heard it. But Elina Graves had.

Elina rose slowly. She did not move toward the stage; she walked toward the door. The dignity of an auditorium depends upon the speaker continuing to speak and the listeners remaining seated. But Elina went outside. A few students rose behind her. The donors were first displeased, then uneasy. Broom began to feel alone on the stage although the hall was still full. Sometimes a crowd makes emptiness more visible.

Outside, Ira was not reading the names. She was only guarding the transmission. The names were being read in Garh Narikel. She could have taken the stage, asked questions, waved documents and made accusations, but she had understood: every time we go onto their stage, they will say this is a dispute. In a dispute truth becomes half. In a name, truth remains whole. So she sat silently. This time her silence was not fear; it was the silence of organisation.

In Hong Kong the same transmission opened in Lau Kin-Hung's office. He normally did not look at any face for long; he preferred numbers. But the names written on the leaf refused to become numbers. A message appeared on Raghav "Signal" Somani's device: "Shut the source." Raghav replied, "There are many sources." Another message: "Main person?" After a long pause Raghav wrote, "There is no main person. There is a village."

In Delhi Chandrapal Batra watched the transmission and shouted at his people. "Stop all of this! It is contempt of law! It is damaging the country's image on a foreign platform!" Those listening remained silent. They understood that contempt was a legal word, but the children were reading names. Under which section does one forbid the reading of a name? Under which Act does one prohibit saying that a dead person is present?

Batuknath Hariharan sat in his luxurious drawing room. Tea stood before him with a skin forming on its surface. He watched Ira on the screen. He hoped she would say something in anger, cross some line, so that defamation, contempt, breach of decorum, national interest - something could be applied. But Ira remained silent. The children of Garh Narikel were speaking. How does one send a notice to children? How does one summon a coconut leaf? How does one obtain Panidubbi's signature?

Satyavrat Mehta watched the transmission in his office. His eyes filled not with relief but with pain. He knew these people could have come to a state court, yet they were building their society outside the court. It hurt him because this was a defeat of the State. But a small gladness rose within him too, because truth had escaped the delay of the courtroom and entered the people's mouths. Softly he said, "The State may delay; sometimes society stops waiting."

The crowd on the Cambridge steps kept growing. The stone had absorbed the evening cold, but no one got up. Inside the hall the lecture continued; outside, the names. Inside: "accountability." Outside: answer. Inside: "dignity." Outside: the presence of the dead. Inside: "ethical framework." Outside: children's voices. Slowly the journalists came out as well. They found no sensation - no shouting, no posters, no list of accusations. Only a village, a leaf and children reading names. It was a difficult scene for journalism because it was not noise; it was patience.

Broom's lecture ended. The applause was formal. He tried to leave through a private door. But as he crossed the corridor he saw the shadow of a coconut leaf on the floor. There was no coconut tree inside the building. He stopped. A name was written in the shadow, but he could not read it. He felt that the language of a name lay outside all the languages his lawyers could have translated.

Elina Graves sat beside Ira on the steps. For a long time she said nothing. Then she asked, "What can I do?" Ira looked at her for the first time. "Leave the stage," she said. Elina did not understand. Ira repeated, "The next time they come to your stage to speak about ethics, leave the stage empty. That empty stage will speak more loudly than their lecture."

That night copies of the children's reading of names circulated through the Cambridge dormitories. Some called the pages a research paper, some resistance, some a people's code. Ira gave it no name. To her it was simply a leaf from Garh Narikel. Once something is named, universities turn it into a syllabus; without a name it remains alive.

After the transmission ended in Garh Narikel, the children scattered. Ananya could not fold the leaf; the wind folded it by itself and laid it at the root of the coconut tree. Budhba Ghost sat laughing on his branch. Hulasi looked into the well and, for the first time, thought the eyes in her reflection resembled Ira's. From inside the pond Panidubbi raised a hand and slapped the surface three times. Three sounds came: splash, splash, splash. This time they were not death, but presence.

By dawn a new saying had spread through Garh Narikel: "Listen to what is spoken on the stage; believe what is written on the leaf." The children wrote it on the school wall. Beneath it Ananya added in small letters: "One way of asking a question is to read a name in silence."

The following week Edward Broom changed the name of his company. The news spoke of a new beginning, a new commitment, a new ethical direction. The children of Garh Narikel laughed. Changing a name does not change a crocodile's teeth. They opened the next leaf, because the story had not ended. Those who believed they had won would now have to face a new name every day; and those who had been called defeated were so busy with their second task that they had no time even to listen to the sorrows of the victors.

FOLK SONG: THE VOICE OF THE EMPTY STAGE

Folk tune: a Vidyapati-style melody

The stage has spoken, the empty stage has spoken,

At one labourer's name the cloud of ethics has broken.

Golden words upon the stage, truth's name upon the leaf,

Applause grew tired and slept; the village woke beneath.

Ira silently let the names be read; the auditorium shook,

Three splashes of presence stilled the microphone of lies.

The company changes its name and says: new direction, new beginning,

The children laugh: the teeth are old - what new religion is this?

Hear what the stage says; trust what the leaf records,

Know that sometimes a question is asked by reading a name in silence.

Today the empty stage spoke louder than a hall full of lectures,

At one labourer's name the cloud of ethics broke.

Golden words above, the true name upon the leaf,

A child laughed: the teeth are the same old teeth - what illusion is new?

CHAPTER 23

The Search for Batuknath

The paper of victory was thick, but it held not a single sound - and without sound, victory is only weight.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: LEAVE VICTORY, SEEK THE PEOPLE

Folk tune: travelling victory song

*Come, victorious traveller, first go to the defeated home,
Press the paper beneath your arm and walk while sharing affection.*

With the order of victory beneath your arm, first go to people's homes,

Hear how the one you defeated is living today.

If victory does not serve, it becomes only a burden,

The defeated rise through work and build a new society.

Lay aside the pride of office, let dust settle on your feet,

Learn your answer from the free lives of the people.

Leave victory and seek the people; the meaning of victory will change,

Your own honour will bloom when you preserve another's dignity.

Set the drum of victory far away; open the road to your ears,

First go and weigh the silence of the defeated courtyard.

Place the dust of the road upon your brow, cool the fever of office,

Bring back the people's laughter and only then preserve your victory.

Across the sea the stage had fallen empty and the company had changed its name; here in the city Batuknath Hariharan held the paper of victory, yet could find no taste of victory. The paper was thick, the seal shone, and the language of the order was so courteous that even cruelty wore manners. But there was no sound inside that paper. No applause, no slogans, no yellow pallor of defeat on the faces of the opposing side. He sat in his chamber for a long time turning the order over and over. He had believed that after his victory the defeated would come to his door - with an apology, a settlement, a list of money, a new case, a television debate, a threat of appeal. But the doorway remained empty.

That empty doorway frightened Batuknath more than anything else. He was a man who feared silence, not noise. Noise could be converted into advocacy; silence could not. Protest could be called contempt; absence could not. If the defeated wept, their tears could be turned into a trade in sympathy; if they raged, their anger could be made into a question of law and order. But if they simply returned to their work, he had no language with which to save himself.

He summoned his secretary, an old hand who could tell from the weight of a file whether it contained truth or bribe. Batuknath asked, "Where are they?" The secretary did not understand. "Who?" "The ones who lost. Aruni, Gop, Saumya, Devika, Meera, Ira - all of them." The secretary checked the files. "Sir, no further application has come from them." Batuknath narrowed his eyes. "No application? Defeated people do not file another application? How is that possible?"

The secretary said quietly, "Perhaps they have gone back to the village." At first Batuknath laughed. Then the laugh stopped halfway. Village. The word contained the sort of earth upon which his shoes were not accustomed to walk. He had always seen a village as an address written behind a court fee - police station, post office, district. To him, the village was an address of a litigant. Now that same village was becoming an independent territory outside the court.

Batuknath immediately sent Chandrapal Batra a message on Signal. He did not make a direct call; caution remained his religion even after victory. The message was brief: "Where are the main people?" Chandrapal replied, "Field empty. All in village. Some teaching children. Some writing names. Matter quiet." Batuknath read the message once, then again, then a third time. "Matter quiet" - he did not like the sentence. In the world of crime, quiet is often the first breath of a storm.

That night Batuknath could not sleep. In his dream the courtroom was empty. The judge's chair empty, rows of lawyers empty, gallery empty. Only a coconut leaf lay in the middle. On it was written: "Whom did you defeat?" He moved to pick it up, but the leaf slid away across the courtroom floor. He ran after it. It moved farther. At last it went out through the door and flew toward Channa Grove.

At dawn he decided to go to Garh Narikel. The journey would not be announced. No press, no security convoy, no reception. He wanted to see the real condition of the defeated. He believed that the moment he reached the village some headman, priest, broker, representative of a victim's family or local lawyer would come to his feet. They would ask, "Sir, what happens now?" And he would display his old art - a little reassurance, a little fear, a little charity, a little compromise.

But before he reached Garh Narikel the road itself changed. When the car approached the floodplain of the Kamla-Balan, the driver's navigation device stopped working. On the map the road ran straight, but on the real earth there was sand, riverbank, dry channels, half-dead culverts and water from a pond rising suddenly into the track. The sand squeaked beneath the tyres. The driver asked, "Sir, which way?" Batuknath snapped, "Look at the map." The driver said, "The river does not move on a map, sir. Here the river moves."

The sentence struck Batuknath. The map of law, too, draws straight roads, while the suffering of people keeps making its own channels. He did not want to admit it. He merely shut the window. Yet even through the closed glass the smell of earth entered the car. In that smell mingled the water of the courtroom, the sealed cover, the judgment of Channa Grove, the names read by Ira and Devika's voice.

There was no welcome at the village boundary. Only two children were drawing a circle with lime on the dirt road. Inside it they drew a mobile phone, and around it the teeth of a crocodile. Batuknath stopped the car and asked, "What are you making?" One child answered without fear, "The crocodile of the screen." The other added, "It gives you a win first, then eats your house." Batuknath's throat dried. Devika and Nishant's school was working.

He messaged Chandrapal again: "Children trained. Source?" No answer came at once. Batuknath waited. Five minutes. Ten. Fifteen. At last a short reply appeared: "Signal not clear. Network strange in village." Batuknath grew irritated. The network in Garh Narikel was not strange; words there travelled more by mouth than by mobile phone. And no company had bought the network of human mouths.

When he reached Channa Grove he saw no stage, no banner, no flag of agitation. A long bamboo rack stood there, and children were drying coconut leaves upon it. Every leaf bore a name. No caste, no religion, no occupation, no case number beside the names. Only a name, and sometimes a sound - splash, breath, screen, body, leaf.

No one ran when they saw Batuknath. No one protested. No one raised a slogan. That unsettled him even more. Had there been protest, he could have called for police. Had there been slogans, he could have called it contempt. Instead the quiet children looked at him and continued their work. A girl counting leaves beside Ananya asked, "Is your name written here?" Batuknath started. "My name?" The girl said, "The names worth saving are written here. A name that knows how to save itself does not need to be written."

Ananya came then. She was no longer a child, though the fearless clarity of a child remained in her eyes. Batuknath recognised her. Her face had appeared in court papers, at the edges of news reports, in Ira's broadcasts. "I want to meet your father," he said. Ananya replied calmly, "He has gone to read names." "Where?" "Where the names are incomplete." Batuknath did not understand. Ananya added, "Please wait. You must have learned waiting in court."

The children who heard her did not even smile. Even the village's irony was disciplined that day. Batuknath sat upon an old wooden stool. For the first time he understood that waiting hurts most the person who has spent years imposing it upon others. Giving dates in court was easy; waiting beneath Channa Grove was difficult.

After a while Devika Sah arrived carrying a bundle of notebooks. She was recording village by village the suicides of young people, frauds, mule accounts, digital arrests and the testimony of surviving families. Batuknath rose at once. "I need to speak with you." Devika answered, "Everything will be said in front of everyone." Batuknath smiled. "Confidential communication has importance in law." Devika said, "Fraud also begins with confidential communication."

Batuknath thought this woman dangerous because she was not crying. A crying woman can be turned into a photograph; a calm woman becomes a document. He softened his voice. "I can help with the question of compensation." Devika looked directly into his eyes. "You should have offered compensation on the day a rate was fixed for removing the names of the dead. Now I want names, not rates."

Meera arrived meanwhile with three women and two young men. Their faces carried the exhaustion of people who grow old defending their privacy. Meera greeted Batuknath. There was neither fear nor reverence in the greeting, only civility. Batuknath said, "The matter concerning your private material can be suppressed by legal means." Meera did not smile. "It will not be suppressed. It will be erased. And whoever tries to suppress it will have their name placed on the leaf."

For the first time Batuknath understood that the language of these people had changed. They did not say "case"; they said "name." Not "claim," but "memory." Not "compensation," but "dignity." Not "confidentiality," but "privacy." The old weapons of law grew blunt against this language.

He thought perhaps he could speak with Aruni - the man of the family, representative of the lineage, the authorial face. A settlement might be possible with him. But when Aruni came, there was no petition in his hand, only an old spade. "What is this?" Batuknath asked. Aruni said, "Digging a new hollow beside the coconut trees. To store the leaves." "Your appeal?" "When there is time, we'll see. Right now the rain is making it hard to dry the names."

Batuknath felt insulted. Not because anyone abused him, but because no one gave him importance. The greatest hunger of the cunning is to remain important. It matters less to them that their crime be forgiven than that they remain at the centre. Garh Narikel would not place him at the centre. He was merely a visitor who had carried his old power into the wrong place.

He went to the village elders, human old men sitting in the sun, rubbing tobacco in their palms and squinting into the distance. He said, "I care deeply about your village's reputation. Outsiders will make this struggle political." One elder asked, "What does political mean?" Batuknath was ready. "Parties, slogans, arguments." The old man laughed. "Our party is the leaf, our slogan is the name, our argument belongs to the children. Whom will you buy?"

No one sitting there laughed at the sentence. Only the shade of Channa Grove shifted slightly. Batuknath felt the trees themselves were listening. He looked up. Ghosts are not normally visible in daylight, but that day he saw black-and-white patches moving among the branches - someone's eyes white, someone's body dark, someone's laughter caught between leaves.

He told himself it was fatigue: the long journey, the village air. But when he rose and walked into Channa Grove, his feet grew heavy. For the first time he entered without judge, police, article or rulebook. Here rules were made of leaves, washed by water and enforced by memory.

At the centre of Channa Grove lay a round empty space. Ananya said, "Kabaddi is played here." Batuknath wanted to laugh, but could not. He remembered the Court of Channa Grove, the judgment of the ghosts, the water of names. "Now?" he asked. Ananya said, "Now the children will play. The dead will watch. Sometimes it happens the other way round as well."

A small boy - perhaps Munna Paswan's nephew - drew a line on the ground and said, "This line belongs to the game, not the court. Whoever crosses it must hold their breath and speak the truth." Batuknath stared at the line. He felt that the instant he crossed it all the secret messages inside his belly would spill out - Chandrapal Batra, Raghav Signal, Lau Kin-Hung, payments, dates, defences. He drew his foot back.

Another message from Chandrapal arrived: "Situation?" Batuknath could not answer for a long time. At last he wrote, "No leader. No demand. No fear." A little later came the reply: "Then no danger." Batuknath stared at the phone. Chandrapal did not understand. Batuknath knew that a movement without leader, demand or fear is the hardest kind. A leader can be bought, a demand reduced, fear increased. But where does one find a broker for work sustained by love, memory and a children's school?

Batuknath walked toward the village pond. Stories of Panidubbi had once seemed absurd to him. That day the pond was so still that it reflected not the sky but the ceiling of a courtroom. He leaned over. His face was not in the water. Only one thick word floated there: "Procedure." He touched the surface. The word broke apart and became hundreds of names. He stumbled backward in fear.

The children watched him. None of them was afraid. He found this unbearable. The cunning want children to be impressed by their cars, clothes, titles, security, language and seals. Here the children looked at the city dust on his shoes and seemed to be estimating how far this man could walk through sand.

Evening descended slowly. The first shadows stretched through Channa Grove. Within them Batuknath saw figures: Budhba Ghost on a branch, Hulasi from the direction of the well, Loth by the bushes, the faint light of Raksh, and countless labourers carrying invisible baskets on their heads. They were not looking at him. They were looking at the children, as though they had now handed their justice over to them. For the first time Batuknath was completely alone.

He made one last attempt. "Write a settlement," he said. "Settlement of what?" Aruni asked. "All sides together - a peaceful resolution." Gop Kumar, who had remained silent until then, said softly, "Resolution is your word. Our word is remembrance." Batuknath grew annoyed. "Memory does not fill a stomach." Devika answered, "Fraud empties one. We were first taught the science of being emptied; now we are learning the art of filling again."

Batuknath took out a sheet of paper. It was blank - a draft settlement on which names would later be filled in. He expected the sight of paper to bring greed or fear into people's eyes. Ananya took it instead, folded it into a little boat and set it on the pond. The paper boat travelled a short distance, became wet and sank. The children watched in silence. Ananya said, "Water does not keep a paper that has no name."

At that moment Batuknath understood that he had come to the village looking for defeated people, but there were no defeated people here - only free ones. Defeated people look for an opponent; free people look for work. The villagers were not opposing him because they had already gone beyond him. What had been called defeat on the court steps proved beneath Channa Grove to have been a transition.

Night came. Batuknath sat in the car to return. The car moved, then stopped again on the floodplain. The driver said, "The road is blurred." Batuknath looked out. From far away in the direction of Channa Grove came the voices of children - not kabaddi, but names. After each name, a breath. After each breath, silence. In that silence the paper of his victory began to sweat.

The paper that had been stiff in court was now soft in his hand. Beneath his finger he could no longer feel the raised seal. He opened it. The seal's ink had spread, and between the lines of the order a new sentence had appeared: "Appeal against whom?" Batuknath trembled. There was no water in the car. His hands were dry. Yet the paper was wet.

On reaching the city he sent Chandrapal one last message: "They will not return to court." Chandrapal replied, "Then matter finished." Batuknath stared at the screen for a long time. Slowly he typed, "No. Now the matter will continue without us." He meant to send it, but his thumb stopped. At last he deleted the message. The cunning grow old before they learn to write the truth.

That night kabaddi was played in Channa Grove. The children had played by day; now it was the ghosts' turn. Budhba Ghost crossed the line, held his breath and chanted, "Batuknath, Batuknath, Batuknath." Raksh shone, Loth clapped, Panidubbi stirred the pond. But this name was written not to save it, but to warn. Not every name is memory; some names are caution.

At dawn Ananya went to gather the leaves and found a new one. It bore neither the name of a dead person nor of a victim. It said only: "If someone keeps searching after victory, understand that he is trapped inside defeat." Ananya smiled as she read it. The leaf was not placed in the archive but pinned to the school wall, because it was not a list of names. It was a lesson.

The day began again in Garh Narikel. Devika went out to teach the next lesson on digital fraud. Meera sat with the privacy circle to hear the story of a new woman. From far away Nishant explained the map of payment channels to the children through drawings. Ira kept writing her proposal for an empty stage at Harvard. Gop Kumar continued securing copies of the leaves. Aruni kept digging a new hollow beside the coconut trees.

And in the city Batuknath Hariharan put his order of victory into a cupboard. Sunlight did not reach the document. Yet from inside the cupboard he sometimes heard the rustle of leaves. Each time he started. Then he remembered: no one in Garh Narikel was waiting for him. That was the greatest punishment.

FOLK SONG: THE VICTOR'S SEARCH

Folk tune: travelling song of separation

Batuk searches, he searches for the defeated,

The paper of victory beneath his arm, but his heart will not settle.

The order of victory beneath his arm, Batuk walked to the village,

The one he had defeated was nowhere to be found by name.

One opened a school, another stood beside a sister,

Another turned the papers of the dead into a people's colour.

The empty doorway frightened him, not the crowded court,

On the road of free people victory had lost its price.

The order lies in a cupboard where even sunlight cannot reach,

At night the rustling leaves shake sleep from his eyes.

The one who keeps searching after victory is locked inside defeat,

Garh Narikel does not wait - no punishment is fiercer.

Night after night the rustling leaves shake sleep away.

CHAPTER 24

The Novel Begins Again

Where a story is said to end, the grove opens a new page from that very place.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: DAWN OF A NEW PAGE

Folk tune: children's kabaddi song

Turn it, children, turn the new page, old man who counted his breaths on the veranda because oxygen had failed him.

Ananya arrived first. She carried neither notebook nor mobile phone nor a copy of a court order. She brought a small wooden stick, the kind with which the ghosts had drawn the kabaddi line at night. The wood was cold and wet with dew. She cleared the ground. Beneath the dust appeared an old line, black as though scratched into the earth by a fingernail. The children drew a new line over it. Old and new merged into one another.

Budhba Ghost sat upon his branch. It was daylight, yet he was visible. Such a thing happens in Garh Narikel only when the dead have begun to trust the living. His body was dark, his eyes white; but today the eyes held no command, only the easy contentment that follows long exhaustion. Hulasi watched from the corner of the well. Panidubbi sent no hair above the pond, only a single ripple.

Ananya said, "Now the game begins."

Devika asked, "Whose game?"

Ananya answered, "For the one whose name survived. For the one whose name was erased too. Not for the one whose name was written in crime - that name is for warning."

Aruni watched from a distance. He understood that he had already written the end of the novel, but the village was teaching him that those who write endings live under the greatest illusion. Once a story enters the mouths of the people, the writer's pen must follow behind it. In Channa Grove that morning, ownership of the story was changing hands.

The first child crossed the line. His name was Somit, Munna's nephew. Holding his breath he chanted, "Ujjwal Jha, Ujjwal Jha, Ujjwal Jha." He did not say kabaddi. He spoke a name. Before his breath broke, Devika stepped forward, touched him and said, "Ujjwal did not lose. He taught us to recognise the crocodile of the screen." The children did not clap. They kept silence. In Garh Narikel some names ask not for applause but for silence.

A second child, a girl, crossed the line and spoke Sarayu's name - the woman labourer whose name had never been properly entered in the safety register. She returned before her breath failed and placed her palm upon the earth. A small damp print appeared there. Devika said, "This is a signature. The earth signs for the one who was called illiterate."

The third player who crossed the line was invisible. The children saw only dust rise. A voice came: "Not thirty names - three hundred names." It was the collective voice of the spirits who had taken water-burial. They did not recite each name. They wanted the children to keep searching for those names and writing them in the years ahead. An incomplete list gives work to the future.

At that same hour in the city Batuknath Hariharan opened his cupboard. The order of victory had lain inside all night. In the morning he hoped the paper might have dried. It was still slightly damp. The ink had not spread, but the edges of the words had softened. Beside "Petition dismissed" a fine new line had appeared: "Public work begins." Batuknath wiped his spectacles. The line remained.

He immediately messaged Chandrapal Batra: "What is happening in the village?" Chandrapal replied: "Classes. Names. Children. No agitation." The answer did not calm Batuknath. What section of law applies to work that is not an agitation? How does one order the suppression of something that is not a slogan? Where does one send a broker when there is no leader to buy?

Chandrapal Batra, for his part, was not greatly worried by the children, leaves, names and school. He thought those were the occupations of sentimental people. His real concern was the app's data. In the previous seven days fewer new mule accounts had opened. Five young men who had been offered five thousand rupees each had attended Devika's class, turned back and filed complaints at the bank. During one digital-arrest call, an elderly woman had laughed and hung up. For the first time Chandrapal understood that fraud loses not only to police, but to understanding.

Raghav "Signal" Somani sent Lau Kin-Hung a message: "Market slowing. Education creating resistance in rural area." The reply came: "Buy education." Raghav stared at the screen for a long time. How does one buy education? A teacher's salary can be bought, a curriculum can be bought - but a grandmother's story? A child's warning? The leaf of Channa Grove? None of these appears on an invoice.

Lau Kin-Hung sat in a glass office overlooking the sea in a distant country. On his screen was a map of India - states, districts, payment channels, loss and profit. Garh Narikel was only a small point. But from that point red lines were spreading, like not a virus but seeds of resistance. His analyst said, "Sir, this area is strange. Understanding is spreading faster than complaints." For the first time Lau Kin-Hung asked the economic value of "understanding." No answer came.

Edward Broom's second Harvard lecture was watched widely abroad, but the clipped videos of his talk were surpassed by the children's reading of names beneath them. Broom's PR team said, "This is an emotional reaction. It will fade." Ira knew that what tires is that which needs a stage. Once village people become absorbed in work, they continue even through exhaustion.

Satyavrat Mehta sat at his government desk. A new file arrived - not a petition to reconsider the old case, but a request for an opinion on "the legal status of community archives." He smiled. The State was now asking whether the leaves were lawful. He remembered: the State had spent years erasing people's names, and was now afraid of their leaves. At the top of the file he wrote, "Memory is not the property of the State."

Meanwhile the school had begun in Garh Narikel: the Coconut-Leaf School. No walls, no gate. On one side of Channa Grove, the Archive of Names; on another, a class on recognising the crocodile of the screen; on the third, the Oath of Privacy; on the fourth, song. Every child who came to study first spoke their own name, then one saved name. In this way, each day, every living child gave presence to one dead person.

In her class Meera said, "Love is not a crime. Privacy is not a weapon. Blackmail is not shame; it is violence." At first some people felt uneasy. Such sentences had not been spoken openly in the village. But Hulasi smiled at the corner of the well. Panidubbi's water stirred. So many births as women, so many hidden loves, so many suppressed bodies, so many threats - Channa Grove had heard them all. For the first time the children were hearing them too.

In her class Devika held up an empty mobile phone and said, "This is not only a weapon; it can also be a door. But when a crocodile sits at the door, you enter with your eyes open." Nishant explained payment channels to the children with drawings - village savings, city account, mule, Signal, Hong Kong, then back again into advertisements. Looking at the picture, a child asked, "Why does the money go around and then ask us for more again?" Nishant could not answer. Some questions receive answers only after the future system has been changed.

Aruni made copies of the Archive of Names. Gop Kumar made a digital copy, but this time not from secret fear; the copy was being made out of public trust. Ishan Dutt, the informer without a shadow, sat in one patch of shade in Channa Grove. Daylight fell upon him, but still no shadow formed. Ananya asked, "When will your shadow return?" Ishan said, "When my death is crossed out on paper and my life is written into people's memory."

At that answer Budhba Ghost moved his branch. Perhaps approval. Perhaps laughter. Perhaps one grain of the ancient weariness that falls away after centuries.

At evening the second round of the game began. This time some adults joined the children. Devika crossed the line chanting, "Ujjwal is not for sale." Meera crossed: "Privacy is not for sale." Nishant: "Open the payment channels." Saumya: "Documents belong to the people." Gop Kumar: "When data becomes a name, fear decreases." Aruni crossed and kept silent. His breath began to fail, but no words came. Ananya said,

"Babu, just say Garh Narikel." Aruni said, "Garh Narikel." And his breath survived.

At that moment the story turned over. In the first chapter the ghosts had played while the living watched in fear. Now the living played while the ghosts watched in reassurance. This reversal was the novel's new birth.

Far away in the city Batuknath Hariharan went to court again. He wanted a new petition, some dispute, some stay, some order. But in the registrar's room he was told, "Nothing from the Garh Narikel side." He went outside and sat on the steps for a long time. The steps were dry that day, yet his feet felt wet. His victory no longer travelled with him; it remained locked in the cupboard, damp and rustling like leaves.

At night Chandrapal Batra read the network report: "Conversion rate down." "Mule accounts failed." "Calls disconnected." "Victims seeking advice from school instead of police." These sentences frightened him more than statutory sections. He wondered whom in the village could be picked up. Then he remembered Batuknath's message: "No leader." Without a leader, whom do you arrest? Without conspiracy, what case do you file? Raid a school? Find a crime in a child's lesson? For the first time he looked at the framed LLB degree on his wall and understood that the language of law cannot catch everything.

Raghav "Signal" thought of disappearing. But a person who disappears on Signal still remains in the memory of some server. His vanished messages did not survive directly in Gop Kumar's data, but their patterns did. For the first time Raghav wrote on paper: "Erase the name." The tip of his pen snapped.

Lau Kin-Hung looked at the sea through the glass of his office. The sea had always seemed to him like a market - open, deep, profitable. That night he saw the Ganga in it. In the Ganga, a bridge. In the bridge, a pier. Inside the pier, labourers. Inside the labourers, names. Inside the names, children's voices. He drew the curtains. But the voices had already entered the glass.

At Harvard Ira held a small gathering, not on Broom's stage but on an empty lawn. She played only one recording: the children of Garh Narikel reading names. The foreign students did not understand the meaning at first. Then Ira told the story behind each name, briefly. No applause. No questions. After a long silence, one student asked, "What should we do?" Ira answered, "First, listen." Whoever learns to listen learns to tremble before signing a paper.

Satyavrat Mehta was returning home at night. His car stopped at a red light. On the pavement a child was watching something on a mobile phone. Mehta got out and looked. The child was not gambling; he was watching a video of the names being read in Garh Narikel. Mehta stared at the small screen for a long time. The truth that had failed to emerge from the files of the State's highest offices was now running on a child's cheap phone. He returned silently to the car. His eyes were tired, but there was no defeat in the tiredness.

Night deepened. The final kabaddi began in Channa Grove. This time the rule was different. Whoever crossed the line had to chant not a name but the future. Ananya went first: "Coconut-Leaf School, Coconut-Leaf School." Somit went second: "Recognise the crocodile of the screen." Devika third: "No digital arrest." Meera fourth: "No love blackmail." Ishan fifth - only a voice, no body: "No shadow lost."

Then Budhba Ghost rose. Twelve hundred years of weariness came down from the branch. He crossed the line. Everyone held their breath. He chanted, "The novel begins again." The children laughed at first, then fell silent. This was not a sentence of play; it was not an announcement. It was the mark of the circle made when truth passes from the hand of one generation into the next.

Hulasi came out from the well. For the first time her hands were visible - faint, but hands. She wrote one letter in the earth. It was not complete, but Ananya understood: it was the sound "ja" - the beginning of jaan, life; janm, birth; jagaran, awakening; jal, water. Hulasi smiled. Her rebirth had begun not in a womb, but in the children's language.

Panidubbi did not raise her streaming hair from the pond. She had not come to catch anyone's feet. She made a circle upon the water, and in its centre the sky descended. There were stars in the sky, and each star shone like a name. Raksh gave light, but it was no longer a light that frightened; it was a light by which one could read. Loth was no longer merely a spectator. Slowly he moved closer to the game. Perhaps, for the first time, he wanted to rise.

A wind came from the channel of the Balan. The smell of Kamla sand, the damp of Ganga water, city dust, hospital medicine, court ink, a Harvard lawn, Hong Kong glass, the warm surface of a mobile screen - all arrived together and merged into the scent of coconut blossom. That is how the air of Garh Narikel is made: whatever breaks anywhere in the world reaches this village as a smell.

The coconut tree that had watched since the first chapter dropped a fruit in the middle of the night. It did not fall with a crash, but with the soft sound of folding paper. The children gathered around it. The fruit split open. Inside there was no water, only emptiness. Ananya reached in. From the emptiness came a small leaf. On it was written: "Where a name is read, the story does not end."

Aruni read the leaf and remained silent for a long time. Gop Kumar asked, "Then?" Aruni said, "Then I will not write an ending." Saumya asked, "What will you do instead?" Aruni replied, "The children who play will write."

No one in Garh Narikel slept that night. But this sleeplessness did not come from fear. It was the wakefulness of people who had for too long been put to sleep by dates, decisions, orders, appeals and adjournments. Now they had to stay awake and work. Another page had to be added to the Archive of Names. The next class at the school had to be prepared. The next map of digital fraud had to be understood. The Oath of Privacy had to be carried to the next village.

Dawn came. The children returned home. The ghosts climbed back onto their branches. Panidubbi dissolved into the water. Raksh's glow vanished into daylight. Loth sat again beside the bushes, but his eyes were no longer closed. Budhba Ghost sat upon his branch and called one last time, "Kabaddi." From far away Ananya answered, "Name."

The first woman of the village came out to fetch water. She stopped beside Channa Grove. On the ground was the line of the game, the archive of leaves and the empty shell of the fruit. She did not know what had happened during the night. She picked up the empty shell, took it home and placed basil seeds inside it. From the fruit still came the faint smell of raw coconut water. In this way the next form of truth in Garh Narikel began preparing to become green.

In the city, the order of victory inside Batuknath's cupboard finally dried. But once dry, the paper began to crumble like powder. Frightened, Batuknath sealed it inside a plastic file. Yet every time he opened the file, a fine dust rose - not ink dust, but sand. Sand from the Kamla-Balan, which can uproot a whole grove and a paper order as well.

Chandrapal Batra's app began working again. Some people were trapped again. The world does not become free in a single night. Lau Kin-Hung opened another company under another name. Edward Broom found another stage. Batuknath smiled in another case. The villains had not ended. In this novel evil was not destroyed; people had begun learning to recognise it. That is a more difficult and more enduring victory.

The people of Garh Narikel understood this too. So they did not drift away in celebration. After every victory, work. After every name, a search. After every oath, the next village. After every lesson, the next child. The day they believed crime had ended would be the day the crocodile came out of the water again.

One evening Aruni was closing his notebook. Ananya asked, "Babu, is the novel finished now?" He looked at her. In her face he saw the child of that first night when she had looked at a photograph of the Chief Minister and asked a question about death. A child's question is the greatest court of time. Aruni said, "Books end. Villages do not."

Ananya asked, "Then the next page?"

Aruni handed her the notebook. "You write it."

Ananya wrote the first line: "Today kabaddi was played again in Channa Grove." She paused and added a second: "This time, what was caught was a lie."

At that line the coconut leaves stirred. Wind moved through the grove. Budhba Ghost smiled on his branch. In the pond Panidubbi gathered in her hair. Far away in the Ganga the crocodiles grew still. Over Garh Narikel the first wing of dawn descended, as though the sky itself were turning the page.

Crocodiles eat bodies; but once a name enters a child's breath, no river, no court, no foreign account, no digital screen, no order of victory and no paper of defeat can erase it. The name becomes a game. The game becomes a story. The story becomes a village again.

And the village - Garh Narikel - begins again.

FOLK SONG: THE PAGE OPENS AGAIN

Folk tune: children's kabaddi song

*The page has opened, cut through dew and opened,
The game became a story, the story became a village again.*

*The story said "end"; the village said "again,"
Dew cut through the writer's final boundary.
Once ghosts played while the living watched in fear,
Now children ran, and falsehood was caught within the round.
"Today kabaddi was played again in Channa Grove,"*

*From Ananya's first line the wing of dawn took flight.
Once a name entered a child's breath,
River, court and screen could never erase it again.
Let the book close; the village story does not stop,
The game becomes story, the story becomes village again.*

*Once ghosts played while the living were afraid,
From Ananya's first line the wing of dawn broke open,
Once the name entered breath, erasure lost its power.*

CHAPTER 25

The Mind Suspended

In a closed cupboard it is not the order but the dust that speaks—and the voice of dust will not let sleep come.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE ROAD OF THE MIND HOME

Folk tune: traveller's song

*Traveller, come, follow the road of the mind to the village,
Let the body stay in the city; set the bundle of the mind down at home.*

*Though the body is in the city, the mind takes the village road,
The rustle of leaves, the scent of the pond, Grandmother's words.
Take down the suspended mind and ready it for the journey,
Speak with the roots; tell them your own truth.*

*Returning home is not merely distance; it is an inward meeting,
Upon the mind's road you will meet ancestors, children, life.
Walk singing the traveller's song, leaving pride behind,
Let the soil of home turn the mind once more toward justice.*

*The rustle of leaves in the ear, the scent of the pond in the nose,
The thread of Grandmother's tale tied upon the shelf of the heart.
Put down the bundle of pride and walk lightly,
At the threshold let inside and outside become one.*

The village had already begun again; and over in the city, once an order of victory has dried completely, its voice no longer sounds like paper. It speaks like dust. That night the same dust was speaking inside Batuknath Hariharan's cupboard. The cupboard was locked, the key beneath his pillow, the room secure from outside; yet the paper within kept rustling as though a crowd of dry leaves were moving without any wind.

At first Batuknath thought—mice. Then he remembered that mice had been eradicated from his house years ago. Steel mesh over every opening, poison in every corner, surveillance over every servant. A man who drove people through loopholes in the law could hardly leave a mouse-hole open in his own house. So he rose. He took the key from beneath the pillow. As he turned it, the cold iron of the lock bit into his fingers. He opened the cupboard.

Inside lay the order of victory. It bore the court seal, the registrar's signature, the date, the case number—everything was in order. But a fine layer of sand had settled along the edge of the paper. The sand was not wet, yet it clung stubbornly. Batuknath brushed it with a finger. It did not fall away. Instead it formed letters: "The mind suspended."

Batuknath read the words and laughed. It was the laughter of a man who first turns fear into a joke so that fear may not recognise him yet. He looked at the paper again. The words were gone. The seal was the same. The order was the same. The victory was the same. Yet something inside him was no longer the same.

He picked up the phone. It was the third watch of the night. He was used to calling Chandrapal Batra at such hours; men of crime take legal advice by day and their real advice by night. Chandrapal's phone rang many times. At last his voice came: "Sir, something urgent?"

Batuknath said, "Is there any legal way to stop the reading of names going on in Garh Narikel?"

Chandrapal was silent for a moment. He usually had an answer to every question—stay order, injunction, contempt, defamation, cyber complaint, public order, the old shadow of sedition, the new mask of morality. But what law could he place upon a "reading of names"? He said, "Reading names is not a crime, sir."

Batuknath snapped, "Then make it one."

Chandrapal fell silent again. Something could be made into a crime when there was a crowd, a slogan, a leader, donations, posters, trucks, a stage. But here children were reading names from leaves. One woman explained digital fraud. Another read an oath of privacy. Old people were not giving testimony; they were telling stories. No ready-made criminal mould immediately fit any of this.

That night Chandrapal was alone in the study of his house. On the wall hung his Meerut law degree in a frame. The frame always reassured him that those who knew the language of law were safer than everyone else. But tonight a line appeared upon the glass as though someone inside had drawn it with a fingernail. Chandrapal rose and went closer. In the misted glass were the words: "First mule."

He did not tremble. He was not a man who trembled at the first apparition. He laughed. He wiped the glass. The words disappeared. But he remembered—the first mule account. The account of that student in Meerut whom he had brought into the work for five thousand rupees. The boy had thought it was a part-time job. Later the police arrested him. The real money reached Hong Kong. The boy went to jail. His father stood in court corridors for three years.

Chandrapal had forgotten the incident for many years. A criminal's memory is highly selective. An event that yields profit is called experience; an event that brings shame is called a mistake. But that night the glass of his degree turned his forgotten mistake into letters.

Raghav "Signal" Somani was awake as well. There was no message on his phone, yet the notification light was blinking by itself. He opened the app. All the conversations were gone. That was normal—disappearing messages were his protection. But upon the empty screen, leaves began falling one by one. Digital leaves. On every leaf was the name of someone through whose account money had been routed.

Raghav shut the screen. Opened it again. No leaves. Only the message list. He breathed in relief. Then a voice message arrived, sender: "Self." Raghav listened. It was his own voice, though he had never recorded it: "No paper. No voice. Only percentage." He had repeated that sentence hundreds of times for Lau Kin-Hung. This time, behind the voice, someone was weeping.

Raghav immediately sent Lau Kin-Hung a Signal message: "Problem appears memory-induced. Local name movement affecting market."

No answer came for a long time. Dawn was approaching in Hong Kong. Lau Kin-Hung normally replied at once, because in his business delay meant loss. This time the reply came only after Raghav had deleted and rewritten his message three times. It contained only three words: "Buy the names."

Raghav stared at the screen. Buy the names? How was a price to be placed upon a name? The name of a dead labourer? Ujjwal's name? Sarayu's name? Hulasi's name? How could one make a sale receipt for a name that had never been fully written in any government paper? For the first time, the language of Raghav's own trade seemed incomplete to him.

Lau Kin-Hung sat in his glass office. Behind him the sea; before him five screens. One showed payment channels; another, conversion rates for gambling odds; the third, old accounts for drug purchases; the fourth, an old file on identity construction; the fifth, a map of India. Garh Narikel was a dot. Yet the cursor kept catching on that dot by itself. He moved it away; it returned.

Lau's assistant asked, "Technical problem?"

Lau said, "No. A problem of geography."

He treated geography only as market territory. Country, state, district, village—each a potential consumer, potential worker, potential account, potential victim. But Garh Narikel was no longer a dot. It was holding the cursor fast, as though an invisible fingernail had been driven into the map.

Meanwhile Edward Broom was in a New York hotel. His second lecture had not been called a failure; the PR team had stated plainly, "Crisis managed." Yet he could not sleep. He reread the draft of his speech—dignity, partnership, transparent future, ethical enterprise. Beneath every English word he saw a name in Devanagari: Ujjwal, Sarayu, Ramdev, Phulkumari, Nand. He could not read the script, but he could read the pressure of the letters.

He drafted a message to Professor Elina Graves: "Can ethics become larger than memory?" He wrote it, then deleted it. Then he wrote: "Local emotive material is spreading against us." That he sent. When a criminal reaches the verge of asking a moral question, he usually sends a public-relations question instead.

In Delhi, Satyavrat Mehta was awake late at night. On his desk was not a government file but a printed copy of Garh Narikel's Archive of Names. He would read and then stop. Beside every name was an empty space. Perhaps for a story. Perhaps for a date of birth. Perhaps for the day of death. Perhaps for the lie invented to erase the name. He felt that law grants recognition to a name, but folk memory gives a name breath.

He opened his notebook and wrote: "The State is not the owner of a citizen's memory. A court is not the guard over the names of the dead. Procedure is not an instrument for choking the victim's breath." As he wrote, his hand stopped. He remembered his office. He was a government official. But that night his official post and his private self seemed to be sitting on two separate chairs. Between them stood an empty chair—the chair of truth.

That night Channa Grove in Garh Narikel was quiet. The game had not ended, nor had it been adjourned. It was the quiet in which a game waits for its next breath. Budhba Ghost swung from the branch. Below him lay the leaves of the Archive of Names. The children slept in their homes. But the names remained awake. The vigil of names is independent of human sleep.

In a dream Ananya saw Batuknath Hariharan arrive in Channa Grove. In his hand was the order of victory, on his head the pride of a lawyer, in his eyes exhaustion. He was shouting, "Where are the respondents?" Budhba Ghost answered, "At work." Batuknath asked, "What work?" Then all the children answered together: "The future."

The dream was not Ananya's alone. That same night Devika saw Ujjwal in a dream. He was not holding a mobile phone but a wooden slate. He was drawing a line around the crocodile of the screen. Devika asked, "Are you all right?" Ujjwal said, "Whenever someone else hangs up the call, I become a little more all right.” Devika woke. At dawn she made a new lesson: “Hanging up is also courage.”

Meera dreamed of a court where images from people’s private lives were being sold in bamboo baskets. The buyers had no faces, only hands. Those hands took the forms of money, legal notice, police complaint, threat to employment, family shame. Standing in the middle of the court, Meera said, “Love will not become evidence.” At once the baskets caught fire. When she woke, her fear seemed half as large. Fear does not disappear completely; by becoming half and half again, it becomes a companion one can live with.

Nishant was abroad. In his sleep the payment channels became a river. From account to account, wallet to wallet, server to server, then into the pond of Garh Narikel. He saw that behind every transaction was a hand. Some hands belonged to labourers, some to young men, some to women, some to the elderly. At dawn he opened his company’s data dashboard and for the first time began translating the number called “fraud loss” into “people’s names.”

Saumya spent the night translating documents. English audit comments into Maithili, legal orders into the people’s language, bank statements into lines of story. She felt that a paper ordinary people cannot read is half a lie. Language is the first door of justice. Beside “mule account” she wrote: “an account operated in another person’s name.” Then she stopped. Thought: “No, not enough. Write this: renting out the body of one’s own name.”

Aruni had opened his old notebook. He had stopped his pen. For many days a desire to write “The End” had been growing inside him. Human beings grow tired and long for an ending. But a village does not want an ending. A village wants a story to become not a burden handed down from generation to generation but work. He wrote in the notebook: “The Mind Suspended.” As he wrote, he understood that this chapter was not the rogues’ outward journey but the pull within them.

Batuknath opened the cupboard a second time that night. The order was unchanged. But now a shadow fell across the page. He turned. No one was there. The shadow lay upon the page, not in the room. It was not black but grey, like a person’s mind leaning over the paper after leaving the body. Batuknath looked at the shape of the shadow. It was himself—older, exhausted, voiceless.

He closed the page. Turned the key. Pulled the key out. Then from inside came a low voice: “What keeps speaking even after it is locked away is not an order; it is a crime.” Batuknath returned to the bed, but he could not place the key beneath the pillow. He sat until dawn with the key clenched in his hand.

Meanwhile Chandrapal opened his old register. In the digital age of crime he retained the habit of keeping a paper ledger. He trusted paper because he could burn it. On the first page were several names—mule, agent, commission, date. He tried to tear out the page. It would not tear. The paper stretched like cloth. He brought a blade. Drew it across. From the cut came red dust—not dust, but something like the dried blood of ink.

Raghav “Signal” searched for his passport. Not in the safe. Not in the drawer. Not in the bag. At last he found it in his prayer room, where he never kept anything. Inside the passport a leaf had been pressed. Nothing was written upon it, but it smelled of Channa Grove. For the first time, while planning to leave India, Raghav found himself caught inside one Indian village.

In Lau Kin-Hung’s office, analysts held a meeting. Their report said: “Behavioural resistance in Garh Narikel region. Investable interventions: entertainment, credit, inducement, local leaders, educational material.” Lau kept reading. The final line was blank. He asked, “Why is this line empty?” The analyst said, “Sir, the data model cannot predict it.” Lau’s eyes remained on the empty line. Sometimes an empty space is waiting for a name.

In Edward Broom’s PR office, a decision was made to produce a documentary about Garh Narikel—“The Resilience of Rural India.” It was an old manoeuvre of criminal capital: buy the image of whatever resists you. But Ira heard the news. She laughed. She wrote, “Bring your cameras, but the people will make you read the names.” Broom’s team did not understand the sentence. A camera does not always capture truth; sometimes truth captures the camera.

Before dawn a faint sound rose in Channa Grove. Not kabaddi. Not names. Only breath. From his branch Budhba Ghost said, “Now they will come.” Hulasi asked, “Why?” Budhba answered, “Their minds are suspended.” From inside the pond Panidubbi sent a ripple: “Without their bodies?” Budhba said, “First the mind. The body later.”

The old people of Garh Narikel believe that whatever a person fears for too long, in the end he cannot live without seeing it. Rogues need their victims. They need to see the eyes of the defeated so that victory may feel complete. But when the defeated are not there to meet their gaze and are busy working instead, victory remains half-finished. An incomplete victory leaves the mind suspended.

And so the minds of Batuknath Hariharan, Chandrapal Batra, Raghav Signal, Lau Kin-Hung, Edward Broom—all began moving toward Garh Narikel from different directions. Their bodies were still in the city, abroad, in glass offices, hotels, courts, safes, screens. But the mind set out first. And once a mind takes the road to Garh Narikel, Channa Grove brings it there one day.

The sun rose. Ananya woke and came outside. Dew lay on the coconut leaves. On one leaf she saw a new line. It was not a letter but a road—very thin, very long, running from within the grove outward and from outside inward. Ananya touched it. Dew came away on her finger. She caught the faintest smell of paper—the smell of the order of victory. She understood at once: today's lesson would change.

She ran inside and opened Aruni's notebook. On the previous page his line was still wet: "This time what was caught was the lie." Beneath it a new line was appearing by itself: "The lie's mind has already reached the grove."

Ananya whispered into her father's ear, "Wake up. The story is moving forward again."

Aruni opened his eyes. Outside, the leaves of Channa Grove were moving though there was no wind. In that movement he heard the rustling of the city's cupboard, the Meerut degree, Signal messages, Hong Kong glass, the Harvard stage—all at once. He sat up. Opened the notebook. The first line had already been written.

There was still no vehicle on the road outside the village. No passenger at the station. The court order was still in the cupboard. The passport still in the safe. The phone still on charge. Yet in Garh Narikel all their minds had already arrived. The mind travels faster than the body, is more stubborn than crime, and when a mind remains suspended, the story does not take it down—it begins to show it to itself.

The Court of Channa Grove had not been adjourned. It was merely waiting for the next party.

FOLK SONG: THE ROAD OF THE SUSPENDED MIND

Folk tune: traveller's song

Suspended mind, hanging upon the peg,

One day the body too will step down upon the village soil.

The body sleeps in the city, the mind takes the village road,

Dust speaks in the cupboard; the leaf of victory trembles.

Meerut's degree, the glass house, Signal's darkness,

Channa Grove's gate hears the rustle of them all.

The mind travels faster than the body, more stubborn than crime,

Whoever the grove draws in, cleverness will not save.

Ananya whispers at the ear—wake, the story has moved,

Leaves stirred without wind; the next party spoke.

If the mind hangs upon the peg, the night will not pass,

One day the body too will set its feet upon the village earth.

Dust speaks inside the cupboard; the leaf of victory trembles.

Whoever the grove draws in, cleverness will not save.

CHAPTER 26

Batuknath Hariharan's Journey

When a key remains in the hand all night, it is not brass but the smell of questions that settles into the palm.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: TAKE OFF YOUR SHOES, BECOME HUMBLE

Folk tune: railway traveller's song

*Take off your shoes, sir, take them off at the door,
The burden on the head, the heat of office—leave them all outside.*

*Take off your shoes at the threshold, and with them take off pride,
Let the coolness of the earth rise through your feet and lower the heat in your head.*

*Before you read a name, read the person's eyes,
Build not a seat for the order of victory but a place for listening.*

*The train may bring the body from afar; the mind will arrive first,
The moment a humble foot is set down, closed relationships begin to open.*

*Take off your shoes and read the name with reverence,
The earth teaches: before rank or office, the essence is to be human.*

*The wheels of the train turned far away; the mind ran ahead,
At the threshold, cool earth spoke beneath the feet.
First read the eyes of the people, and only then the book and page,
Before a humble step, closed doors and courtyards open.*

The mind had arrived during the night; now it was the body's turn. At dawn Batuknath Hariharan stood before his cupboard. Because the key had remained in his hand all night, the smell of brass had settled into his palm. The order of victory was locked inside, but its rustling had moved from his ears into his mind. A door can stop a sound that remains in the ear; when a sound enters the mind, people travel in order to stop it.

Batuknath telephoned his secretary. In a half-asleep voice the secretary said, "Sir, the Bar Council meeting is this afternoon." Batuknath said, "Cancel it." The secretary started. "The media?" "Cancel." "Where are you going?" Batuknath paused before answering. A village whose name one is ashamed to pronounce first becomes a thorn upon the tongue. At last he said, "Garh Narikel."

The secretary was silent. For him all villages had a single word: "local." But the crack in Batuknath's voice was not local. He asked, "Helicopter, sir?" Batuknath answered at once, "No. Train." He surprised himself. He had not travelled by train in years. Men who stand high in the law move by road, aircraft and security convoy; a train brings them face to face with the country whose laws they keep making and evading.

He put the order of victory into a leather bag. With it he packed two pen drives, one sealed envelope, some cash and an old pair of spectacles. The spectacles had belonged to his father—a father who used to say, "Study law, but do not forget to study people." Batuknath had considered the sentence ridiculous for years. Reading people was not his profession; entangling them in procedure was his art. Yet that morning the spectacles found their own way into the bag.

As he left the house, his wife asked, "So early? A case?" Batuknath said, "An old file." His wife looked at his face. A woman who has listened to a lawyer's lies for years comes to know the shape, weight and colour of a lie. She said only, "Not a file. It must be someone's name." Batuknath did not answer.

When he reached the station, the city was not fully awake. On the platform the steam of the tea seller's kettle seemed to hold the first hope of the day. Batuknath went toward the first-class waiting room. He had a special pass. But at the glass door his reflection paused for a moment and did not enter. The reflection remained outside. Batuknath reached out and opened the door. His reflection came in late.

He sat down. On the wall opposite was an advertisement—for investment, insurance, a new city, a secure future. In one corner someone had written by hand: "Do not buy names." Batuknath started. He went closer. The words were gone. He did not laugh. This time the laughter remained inside him.

The train moved. The city buildings began sliding backward. Batuknath sat by the window, the bag in his lap. The paper of the victory order pressed against his thigh. He opened his phone and read a message from his secretary: "Sir, media asking." He typed: "Unwell." Deleted it and typed: "Personal travel." Deleted that too. In the end he sent nothing. Sometimes silence is better protection than a lie.

The first station came. The signboard carried its name, but as the train slowed Batuknath saw the word "Date." He blinked. The board returned to normal. At the second station: "Adjournment." The third: "Settlement." The fourth: "Silence." He understood that the journey was no longer outward. The road to Garh Narikel was turning even station names into testimony.

Around noon an old man entered the compartment. Plain dhoti, an old gamchha over his shoulder, bamboo staff in hand. The first-class attendant moved to stop him, but the old man showed not a ticket but a dry coconut leaf. For a moment the attendant froze, as though remembering some ancient order, then silently stepped aside. The old man and Batuknath sat facing one another.

Batuknath first tried to ignore him. A man who buys testimony avoids the gaze of an unwanted witness. The old man kept looking out the window. After a while he asked, "Have you studied law?" Batuknath's pride woke at once. He said, "Studied it, taught it, wrote it, practised it." The old man smiled gently. "Have you studied names?"

Batuknath adjusted his spectacles. "Names? Is reading names some special science?" The old man said, "Law puts names into boxes: birth, father, address, age, signature. But there is a science in reading the weeping inside a name." Batuknath bristled. "Emotion is not justice." The old man replied, "Which is why justice has been waiting so long for emotion."

The train climbed onto a bridge. Below was a river. Batuknath tightened his grip on the bag. The current flashed in the sun. The old man said, "Look down. How many names have flowed away." Batuknath did not look. He was a man of files; anything flowing below made him uncomfortable. The old man continued, "Crocodiles eat bodies. But paper is more frightening than a body. Why?"

Batuknath said, "Paper is evidence." The old man laughed. "Paper is evidence, and paper can also be absence. Erase a name and the paper will say: no one died. Write a name and the paper will say: death is present." Batuknath fell silent. Inside his bag the victory order shifted faintly.

Budhba Ghost did not tell him his name. If he had, the story would have opened at once, and nothing in Garh Narikel opens at once. He merely drew a circle on the compartment floor with the tip of his staff. One line inside it, then another, then a third. Batuknath watched. It was not the plan of a courtroom but a kabaddi court. The old man asked, "In this game, does the victor remain outside or go inside?"

Batuknath said, "In kabaddi, the player who goes in holding his breath scores only if he returns." The old man said, "Exactly. You people never went inside. You gave judgment from far away. Now it is time to go in holding your breath." The word "breath" struck Batuknath's ears. His mind did not remember the value of breath, but the body remembers. His chest grew a little heavy.

The ticket examiner came. Batuknath showed his ticket. Then he glanced toward the old man. The examiner frowned. "Sir, are you travelling alone?" Batuknath started. "This old man?" The examiner looked at the empty seat. "What old man, sir?" Batuknath's mouth went dry. He looked at the old man. The old man slowly winked, as if saying: what the law fails to see does not become absent.

The ticket examiner went away. The old man said, "Wasn't it the same in your court? What existed was not seen. What did not exist was admitted to the record." Batuknath tried to harden himself. "Who are you?" The old man said, "You have seen me many times before. In the corner of testimony, behind a date, in the line drawn through a dead person's name. But you kept adjourned the act of seeing."

Outside, fields began. No mustard, no standing rice, only stubble from cut paddy. Water lay in patches between the fields. Batuknath remembered a scene from childhood—his father taking him into a court veranda. A poor man stood holding papers. His father had said, "Remember this man's name. Whether he wins or loses comes later; first remember that he is standing here." Batuknath had been bored then. Today, for a moment, the same man's face appeared in the window glass.

He asked the old man, "What does Garh Narikel want from me?" The old man said, "Not from you. From your mind." Batuknath gave a hard laugh. "The mind has no legal status." The old man answered at once, "That is the greatest property of a lie."

The sentence remained in the compartment for a long time. The fan kept turning, the tea seller came and went, the river receded behind them, but the sentence remained seated on the berth. Batuknath opened his bag for the first time. He took out the order of victory. The language of the court stood upright on the page—findings, record, lack of sufficient grounds, procedure, no necessity for intervention. The old man did not bring the paper close. He sniffed from a distance.

"Smell of bribery," the old man said. Batuknath gathered the paper up sharply. "Careful! This is an order of the court." The old man remained calm. "I do not insult the court. I respect smell. Paper can lie; smell cannot."

For the first time Batuknath brought the paper near his nose. He did smell something—old files, an air-conditioned room, perfume, leather, the stale warmth of banknotes, and deep underneath, stagnant water. He folded the paper at once. Budhba Ghost looked out the window. "When paper meets water, the letters swell of their own accord."

Evening began to fall. The train was entering Mithila. The language was changing. On the platforms, voices now carried the softness of "ki," "katta," "chalu," "baisu"; returning words felt cool against the ear like dew. The language Batuknath heard in court only through interpreters was now reaching him directly. When language is heard without an intermediary, power shrinks a little.

At a small station the train stood for a long time. A boy came to the window with a paper packet of roasted makhana. He looked at Batuknath and asked, "Did you win or lose?" Batuknath started. "Why?" The boy said, "Why does someone who has won look so sad?" The old man laughed softly. The boy walked away. Batuknath watched him for a long time.

The signboard at that station suddenly changed: "Mind Suspended Halt." Batuknath rubbed his eyes. The board returned to its real name. The old man said, "Before reaching Garh Narikel, everyone must get off at this halt once. Some get off with the body, some with the mind."

The night deepened. In the yellow light of the compartment bulb, the old man's face seemed at times very old, at times childlike, at times only a black line. Batuknath asked, "Your name?" The old man replied, "I am not the name that survived. I am not the name that was erased. I am the one who waits for the name."

Batuknath was irritated, exhausted, frightened—and also fascinated. Curiosity does not die inside a rogue; it merely becomes utility. He was thinking: could this old man be bought? Could the language of the Court of Channa Grove be bound inside legal procedure? Could the Archive of Names be attacked through intellectual property, religious sentiment, land dispute, security risk? His mind began weaving legal nets again.

The old man read his mind. "You are thinking of nets again. Nets are useful in water; in Channa Grove they become tangled." Batuknath said harshly, "No people's assembly stands above the law." The old man replied, "A name is not above law, but it comes before law. A child is born and receives a name. Law arrives later and asks: proof?"

Lightning flashed somewhere far away. In the train window Batuknath's face and the old man's face overlapped. For a moment Batuknath felt the old man was his future—the future day when all the victory orders would remain in cupboards and the mind in Channa Grove. He drew the curtain at once.

Dinner arrived. Batuknath's meal came in shining packaging. Nothing was placed before the old man. Batuknath asked out of courtesy, "Food?" The old man said, "I do not eat names. I chant them." Batuknath opened his meal, but the first morsel never reached his mouth. He saw tiny letters in the rice. He closed the tray.

At midnight the train stopped at an unknown place. The halt did not exist in the official timetable. Outside was darkness. Somewhere far away stood the shape of trees. The old man rose. "Come. Your first hearing is here." Batuknath said, "I will not get off." The old man answered, "Do not get off with the body. The mind already has."

At that moment Batuknath saw that his shadow was no longer on the seat. It was standing by the door. The shadow got down carrying a bag. The body remained seated inside. Batuknath tried to shout; no voice came. The old man got off behind the shadow. The train started again. Batuknath was alone, yet the bag was still in his lap. He opened it—the order of victory was inside. Then what bag had the shadow carried away?

He understood: the paper remained outside, but its inward meaning had got off the train. This was Garh Narikel's first move. It leaves the body safe and takes away the mind's documents.

By dawn the train reached the last major junction. From there to Garh Narikel came a branch line, then a jeep, then a footpath. As Batuknath was getting down, he saw the old man again on the platform, as though he had never got off at all. He was drinking tea from a clay cup. Batuknath hurried over. "You got off in the night." The old man said, "Your shadow got off. You are still arriving."

For the first time Batuknath looked at the old man's feet. They touched the ground, but not entirely. The heels stood a finger's breadth above the earth. Batuknath did not remember the tale of Channa Grove, but the body retains memory. He stepped back. The old man said, "Do not be afraid. I am not among those who eat you. I am among those who want to teach you to read."

The branch-line coach was crowded. Farmers, students, women, old men, baskets of fish, children sitting on sacks, a goat peering through the window. Batuknath had no reserved seat. He had to stand. For him this small experience was an extraordinary humiliation. Yet in this humiliation there was not the public but reality. A man descending from the height of law feels the crowd of bodies for the first time.

An elderly woman looked at him and said, "Babu, is the bag heavy?" Batuknath answered automatically, "No." She said, "Paper is heavy. Heavier still when it carries the names of the dead." Batuknath stared at her. She was an ordinary old woman. But on the road to Garh Narikel, ordinary people's sentences open extraordinary doors.

By noon he was on the dirt road to Garh Narikel. The jeep could go no farther. The driver said, "From here, walk. No vehicle goes as far as the grove." Batuknath flared up. "Why?" The driver shrugged. "Groves do not speak with vehicles." Batuknath did not understand, but he got down.

The wind of the Kamla-Balan moved along the road. Sand, mud, barren patches, cattle grazing in the distance, the shore of a pond, and here and there coconut trees whose presence on Mithila's soil seemed impossible. Batuknath thought: this village needs development. Then he wondered—why had the word development entered his mouth? People who sell solutions everywhere reach the land of a question and immediately say development.

The first leaf fell upon his shoe. A dry coconut leaf. He tried to shake it off. It clung to the shoe. He bent and picked it up. Nothing was written on it. But the moment it touched his palm, letters appeared: "You studied law. Read the name." He dropped the leaf. It did not blow away; it lay straight upon the path, as though pointing the direction of the next step.

Channa Grove appeared in the distance. Dense. Daylight seemed to tire as it tried to enter. Children's voices came from near the grove—not kabaddi, but the reading of names. Batuknath slowed. He felt as though he were entering a court, yet there was no judge, no bench, no registry. Only leaves, earth, children, women, old people, wind.

Budhba Ghost came and stood beside him. This time his face was clear—neither black nor white but grey, like dust mixed with moonlight. He said, "Batuknath Hariharan, you have arrived." Batuknath made one last attempt. "I have come to talk." The old man said, "No. You have come to read."

Batuknath tightened his grip on the bag. The victory order was inside. He kept thinking that at the right moment he would take it out and frighten everyone. But in Channa Grove the rule of fear was reversed. An order that frightens others outside is frightened by its own letters inside.

Just before entering the grove, the old man said, "Here one takes off not shoes, but pride." Batuknath tried to laugh, but no sound came. He took off his shoes. The earth was cool. The coolness climbed from his feet to his head. For the first time he understood that earth, too, can take testimony.

He entered. The reading of names did not stop. The children looked at him but were not afraid. Devika nodded from a distance. Meera saw him and folded her page. Saumya kept writing. Aruni bent over his notebook. Only Ananya came close and asked, "Did you bring the paper of victory?"

Batuknath said, "Yes." Ananya asked a second question: "Will you read the names?"

Before he could answer, Budhba Ghost climbed onto a branch. The air in Channa Grove moved gently. The leaves rustled together, like thousands of pages opening at once. Batuknath Hariharan's journey had not ended. He had merely reached the place where journeys begin for the first time.

FOLK SONG: TAKE OFF YOUR SHOES, READ THE NAME

Folk tune: railway traveller's song

*Take off your shoes, take them off at the door,
Take off your pride and first read the name.*

*The brass key leaves the smell of questions in the palm,
The mind reaches the village first; the body catches the train.
Station after station—date, adjournment, silence upon the line,
Batuk set out with the victory paper toward Channa Grove.
At the threshold the old man said—not shoes, but pride,
The cool earth climbed from the feet into the court of the head.
The children were not afraid; the reading of names went on,
“Have you brought the victory paper? Will you read the names?” they asked.*

*The journey did not end there; it began there,
Where the first dead person's name rose upon the tongue of law.*

*Station after station—date, adjournment and silence,
The brass key in the palm, the wind smelling of questions.
The moment cool earth touched the feet, the heat in the head fell,
“Will you read the names?”—the child's question stood before him.*

CHAPTER 27

Chandrapal Batra's Screen

A village cannot be seen through a glass wall, but the village's names can cross even glass.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: DIALOGUE ACROSS BOTH SIDES OF GLASS

Folk tune: jhumar

*Sway and sing, sing across the glass,
Make not a curtain but a bridge—come from both sides.*

*A glass screen has two faces, with eyes on either side,
The city sees the village, the village sees the city.
Do not close the screen; make a transparent road,
Let the person hidden behind the deleted word be heard.*

*Let technology become a mirror, not a wall,
Let two-way dialogue sow the seed of trust.
Dialogue across both sides of glass will make a bright bridge,
The distance of minds will shrink and a shared world will be born.*

*Here the village lamp burns, there a chain of city lights,
Let the glass between them melt into a link of dialogue.
Hear the voice of the face hidden behind delete,
Let the jhumar from both directions weave one rhythm.*

Chandrapal Batra would not go to Garh Narikel. He stamped that decision into place on the very morning Batuknath Hariharan was practising the reading of names with Budhba Ghost on a train. One rogue had set out bodily; the other had not moved from his place—but the grove was reading them both at once. Batra stood beside the glass wall of his high-rise apartment and looked at the city's smoky roofs. The city lay below him; village, court, police, bank, young men, old people, women, apps, debt—all lay below. When a man sees everyone on a screen, when does he ever need to go down to the ground?

His room was not an office but a net. Screens covered three walls. One showed the dashboard of an online gambling app, another a list of mule accounts, the third green and blue bands of Signal messages. In the middle stood a leather chair into whose back he sank as though not seated on a throne but inside someone's burrow. On the table stood the framed Meerut LLB degree. Its glass had been polished so often that the reflection shone brighter than the letters.

Batra had fashioned the prestige of his own name: Chandrapal Batra, Advocate; Chandrapal Batra, Legal Adviser; Chandrapal Batra, Compliance Specialist; Chandrapal Batra, Policy Guide to the Digital Entertainment Industry. A different title on every card, but behind every card the same word—percentage. Percentage was his god, his grammar, his sleep, his hunger.

In the morning a message came from Raghav “Signal” Somani: “Hariharan has gone toward Garh Narikel.” Batra replied, “Let him go. Emotion does not stop money.” Raghav wrote, “The Archive of Names is growing.” Batra laughed. He moved the cursor and opened a folder called “Local Narrative.” In that folder he kept everything that could be used to make the village's story look ridiculous: superstition, ghost tales, rural discontent, political incitement. Batra knew that to defeat a truth, first make it laughable.

He wrote a note: “Garh Narikel campaign: folk belief and legal truth.” Under it he wrote: “Recommendations: court order supreme; people's archive unlawful; digital security threat; possible communal tension.” He kept writing and, after his sleepless night, felt his first pleasure. To him words were not arrows but worms. He released words into a file and let them bore into the timber of truth from within.

But as soon as he typed the words “Archive of Names,” the screen flickered faintly. The letters stayed still, but a black line appeared in the background. Batra adjusted his glasses. The line slowly became a leaf. A coconut leaf. He jerked the mouse. The screen returned to normal. He swore. “Graphic glitch.”

On the second screen the night's earnings were open: how much money had entered from which accounts, how much had gone out, where payouts were withheld, where a new player had been given a first win, where a recovery call had been sent. A red mark flashed beside one line—Ujjwal Jha. Batra paused. He had seen the name before. Suicide. Two days in the media. Family wept. Police case. Then an attempt at settlement. Then silence.

He pressed delete to remove the line. The name vanished. In the very next instant another name appeared in its place—Munna Paswan. Delete. A third—Ritesh Kumar. Then—Sohail Ansari. Then—Chanda Devi's son, name unknown. Irritated, Batra closed the entire table. The screen went dark. In the darkness was his own face. Across his forehead appeared the words: “How many names will you delete?”

Batra rose from the chair. The air-conditioning was running, yet sweat lay along his throat. He knew that in the world of crime a technical problem is the easiest kind of fear: call a technician, restart the server, clear the cache. But when a screen begins asking human questions, whom does one call?

He opened the main server console. Password, two-factor authorization, encrypted key. His hands continued moving with their old practised speed. This world was his true court. Here the judge was algorithm, the clerk code, the witness transaction, the verdict outstanding balance. He believed that anything not in the log had never happened. Today the log began betraying him.

Another Signal message from Raghav: "L.K. asks: risk?" Batra typed: "Emotional noise. Under control." Before he could send it, the message changed by itself: "Noise of names. Out of control." Batra slapped the screen. He deleted the message. In the disappearing-message window a new bubble appeared: "Ujjwal Jha present."

Raghav Somani's voice did not come, but what Batra sensed behind that bubble was not Raghav. It was the breath of some young person trapped inside a mobile phone. Batra tried to throw the phone away, but it clung to his hand. For a moment thousands of thumbprints rose across his palm—those who pressed a thumb while downloading a betting app, gave consent while opening a loan app, folded their hands on video calls in fear of "digital arrest."

Batra went to wash his hands. Soap, hot water, cleanser. The foam was cool, but the black line under his nails seemed darker. He bent closer—small account numbers were written beneath the nails. Mule accounts. Poor students, unemployed young men, peons, small shopkeepers, migrant labourers. Every account paid him a commission, and every account hid the real criminal.

He looked at himself in the bathroom mirror. A light shadow of beard, a night's wakefulness in the eyes, salt from sweat behind the ears. In the mirror behind him appeared the old examination hall in Meerut. Young Chandrapal sat writing an answer to a law question: "The purpose of law is justice." An elderly examiner read the line and smiled. Batra splashed water on the mirror. The examination hall vanished.

The Meerut degree had never embarrassed him. He was proud of it—not a great university, but useful. Wherever the body of law is found, a clever mind can turn it into a weapon. He learned friendship with court clerks, the language of police petitions, the price of land disputes, the market rate of weeping in accident claims. Later he met a man who said, "You studied law? Come into digital gaming. Here every loss is written as legally consented."

That man was Raghav Somani. Behind Raghav stood Lau Kin-Hung. Behind Lau Kin-Hung stood sea, glass, banks, hawala, ships, servers, and a language Batra did not fully understand but whose percentages he understood perfectly. The real foreign owner needed the face of Indian law. Batra became that face. Before becoming the face he wore a mask; later the mask became the face.

By noon Batra had summoned his technical team. Four young men arrived—laptops, cables, anxiety. Company boys who worked through the night believing they were in the gaming industry. Batra told them, “There is malware on the server. Clean it.” One young man stopped while looking at the screen. “Sir, this does not look like malware.” Batra glared. “Then what?” The young man stammered, “Names are repeating themselves.”

“Names are repeating themselves”—the sentence fell into the room like a stone dropped into an old well. Batra sent the young man out. All the technicians left. Only the screens remained in the cabin. There were no tables now, only leaves. A name on every leaf. Some names clear, some blurred, some marked “unknown.” One leaf was empty. A cursor blinked on it, as though waiting for someone.

Batra thought: the people of Channa Grove must be hacking him. He laughed. At last, a rational explanation. “Gop Kumar,” he said through clenched teeth. “Saumya. Nishant. Ira.” He wrote down the names. He decided the defeated people stood behind the net. It comforted him, because if the enemy was human, lawsuits, threats, bargains, arrest, slander—everything remained possible. One cannot send a legal notice to ghosts and names.

He drafted a notice to Gop Kumar’s old address. Heading: “Unauthorized Digital Intrusion, Cybercrime, Defamation.” As he drafted, a line suddenly appeared in the footer: “For one who calls his crime legality, his own words become the lawsuit.” Batra shouted, “Someone has remote access!” His security chief ran in. System check. Result: no intrusion.

The security chief said, “Sir, everything is secure.” Batra asked, “Then these letters?” The security chief looked at the screen and saw nothing. This was Garh Narikel’s second move. Only the guilty would see it. An employee would see only an empty screen. When crime is private, fear too becomes private.

Toward evening Batra stepped onto the balcony. Thousands of windows lit up across the city. Every window was a screen. He thought: the country has moved onto screens. Games, credit, love, threats, jobs, justice, medicine, oxygen, tickets, school, court—all screens. Whoever controls the screen runs an empire without a body. Then how had Channa Grove of Garh Narikel entered the screen?

On the street below, a delivery rider stopped at a red light and looked at his phone. Batra suddenly felt his own face was on that phone. The rider neither laughed nor showed fear; he simply switched the screen off. For the first time Batra understood: his empire collapses in the moment someone turns off the screen.

At night Raghav Signal Somani came in person. Usually he conducted business by video call; today his body arrived. The same fear Batra carried within sat upon Raghav's face. "L.K. is not coming online," Raghav said. "The Hong Kong team says the accounts are not frozen—the accounts are silent." Batra asked, "Silent?" Raghav nodded. "We send transactions; no signal returns. As though thrown into the sea."

Batra snapped, "Not the sea. A technical block." Raghav said softly, "One more thing. The disappearing messages are creating backups. I delete them; by morning printouts appear." Batra stared at him. Raghav took a folded sheet from his pocket. It did not contain Signal messages but a line of names: Ujjwal Jha, Munna Paswan, and several names Raghav had never heard before.

"This is not some magic from Garh Narikel," Batra said, hardening his voice. "It is a psychological campaign." Raghav asked, "Then what is the answer?" Batra said, "Countermeasures. Declare the Archive of Names illegal. Seize the servers in the name of digital security. Call the children's school foreign-funded. Attack Meera on morality, Devika on political connections, Nishant on data theft. Prepare everything."

Raghav listened. Once he would have liked the plan. Today he heard a leaf rustling behind every sentence. "Sir," he said quietly, "what if they are not available to fight?" Batra flared. "Everyone is available. People can be caught through fear, money, cases, the body, family, love, shame—something." Raghav said, "What if they are building the future?"

Batra laughed at the question, but the laugh struck the glass and broke. It is difficult to sue the future. One can obtain a stay against the past, an injunction against the present—but the future? To stop it, children's voices would have to be silenced. And if the silencing of children's voices were recorded, the price could be high on international platforms. Batra immediately began devising strategy.

He opened the news feed on the main screen. Some channels were under his influence, some could be bought, some frightened. He wrote scripts: "Gang Spreading Digital Superstition," "Elements Inflaming Rural Sentiment," "Anti-Development Group." But when he saved the file, its name changed by itself: "Fear Among the Rogues." Batra struck the table with his fist. Raghav stepped back.

The night thickened. Raghav left. Batra was alone. He poured a drink, then put it back. Intoxication is for people trying to escape themselves; tonight Batra was trying not to escape himself but the screens. He switched off every screen. The room went dark. Five minutes of quiet. Then, in the darkness, the faint green lines of leaves. The switched-off screens began to glow.

On the first screen, the shadow of Channa Grove. On the second, a kabaddi court. On the third, a boy—perhaps Ujjwal, perhaps someone else—holding a phone, saying nothing. On the phone screen was Batra's face. Batra backed away. His chair overturned. The boy's mouth moved without sound. Then words appeared: "How did you give the first win?"

Batra remembered the first digital game in his career. A small app had launched. The rule was clear: bonus on the first deposit, increased chance of winning the first game, after that the algorithm would slowly draw the money out. Batra had drafted the legal clause: "Game based on skill; risk borne by user." The sentence had been praised as his brilliance. Today the same sentence felt like a rope around his neck.

A second question appeared on the boy's screen: "Why the debt calls after the loss?" Batra remembered the call centre. Young voices, scripts, fake police, fake courts, fake digital arrest. "Your Aadhaar has been used in a crime." "Stay on the video call." "Transfer the amount to a safe account." Batra had crafted the legal caution in those scripts—words meant to make fraud sound like compliance.

Third question: "Why did the account keep running after death?" Batra gripped the chair. Some dead young men's wallets had continued to be used. Commission chains. Bonus laundering. Dormant accounts revived. Digital ghosts of dead names. Batra had thought it was merely technology. Channa Grove said: no, it was using the dead body a second time.

Batra shouted, "I did not commit murder!" The screen answered: "Then which crime will you admit?" He fell silent. The practice of law had taught him to define an offence and then escape through the definition. But in the court of the screen, definition was not being asked for—effect was. The person whose money vanished, whose house was sold, whose son hanged himself, did not care about definitions.

He steadied himself. "This is a fear-inducing visual attack," he told himself. He lifted a laptop, an isolated machine—disconnected from the network. No intrusion was possible. He switched it on. A blank editor opened. He typed: "Chandrapal Batra and Garh Narikel People's Archive Committee." At once the cursor moved by itself: "Chandrapal Batra and his own mind."

Batra shut the laptop. He tried to remove the battery, but in the new machine it was sealed inside. In fury he hurled the laptop onto the floor. The screen cracked. The cracks spread like veins of a coconut leaf. Along every crack appeared tiny letters: name, name, name. He sat down on the carpet.

The first light of dawn entered through the window. The glass city slowly changed from blue to grey. Batra's eyes were numb. All night he had neither slept nor thought; he had only watched. The screens were now off, but a screen had opened inside him. "Mind suspended" does not mean that a person keeps remembering. It means that a person wants to forget, but forgetting no longer obeys his order.

In the morning his secretary arrived. "Sir, appearance in court today?" Batra said, "Adjourned." "Board meeting?" "Adjourned." "Raghav Somani?" Batra paused. "Tell him to keep all screens off." The secretary stared. "Sir?" Batra gave no answer. He kept looking through the window. Thousands of screens across the city were waking. In every screen he saw a leaf from Channa Grove.

He lifted the Meerut degree from the table. There was no dust on its glass, yet the letters inside had changed. Where it should have said "Bachelor of Laws," it now read: "Education in reading names incomplete." Batra turned the frame face down. On the backing board was his youthful signature. Beneath that signature another line appeared: "He who read law but not people became a slave of the screen."

By noon Batra made his decision. He would not go to Garh Narikel. Never. Not in the body. He would fight through screens, through law, media, servers, police. But while he was writing the decision, his phone opened by itself. In the map app a line appeared from his apartment to Garh Narikel. The line was not red but green. Coconut-leaf symbols marked it. Distance: "The mind has already arrived."

He tried to turn off the phone. The final message on the screen appeared: "You are not coming here. You are not leaving here."

Chandrapal Batra remained standing at the window. The city moved below. The screens above were quiet. Inside him the names kept moving. For the first time he understood that Channa Grove was no longer in a village; it had entered the network. The day he wrote the first script for online gambling, he had already placed a foot upon the kabaddi court of Channa Grove. Now only the act of admitting it remained.

Toward evening a Signal message came from Raghav: "Orders?" Batra spent a long time without typing. At last he sent one line: "Not evidence. Find the names." The message disappeared as soon as it was sent. Then a leaf from Channa Grove fell across the screen. On it were the words: "Before you find a name, listen to it."

And so Chandrapal Batra entered Garh Narikel without going there. His body remained in the city's glass room, but through a crack in the screen his mind hung toward Channa Grove. The inner journey of the rogues had only begun.

FOLK SONG: THE GLASS SCREEN HAS TWO FACES

Folk tune: jhumar

*Look, O screen, the screen looks both ways,
Letters deleted from the stump sprout again.*

*The glass wall says—the village cannot see me,
The leaf laughs—the screen sees both ways.
Deleted letters sprouted again from the stump,
Ujjwal's unfinished message woke inside the glass.
The empire's strength rested upon a single gesture,*

Someone switched the screen off and all the glare melted.

*“Not evidence, find the names”—Batra wrote and sent,
The leaf said—listen first, and only then seek the names.*

*Body in the city, mind hanging in the grove,
The wind of coconut leaves entered through a crack in the screen.*

*The glass wall said—the village cannot see me,
The leaf laughed and answered—the screen records both ways.*

*“Not evidence, find the names”—Batra wrote and sent,
The leaf said—listen first; only then can the journey proceed.*

CHAPTER 28

Raghav Signal's Silence

One who fears the voice speaks in vanishing letters; but fear erases no letter.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: SAVE THE MESSAGE, SAVE A LIFE

Folk tune: Signal awakening song

*Wake, companion, let the message bell awaken,
Put your ear even to letters that live for five seconds.*

*Even a five-second message is a signal—take heed,
Recognise words of crisis, fear and despair in time.*

*Before a message disappears, keep a safe copy,
Tell a friend, family member or source of help at once.*

*One reply—"I am with you"—can change the road of a life,
Behind the phone call of the night, a door to morning opens.*

*Save the message, save a life; do not remain silent,
Let a net of digital compassion hold one another up.*

*Even vanishing letters carry news of breath,
Three words—"I am with you"—can prepare the door of dawn.*

*One call, one knock, the warmth of one hand,
However dense the night, suffering can be cut through.*

The second station in the rogues' inner journey was Raghav. Voice had never mattered in the life of Raghav "Signal" Somani. He was afraid of voice. A voice can be recorded, become testimony, be played in court, reach a mother's ears. So on Signal he wrote, deleted, then wrote again. He believed that anything disappearing after five seconds had never happened in the world at all.

That night, after returning from Chandrapal Batra's glass room, Raghav stopped as soon as he opened the door of his apartment. Everything inside was as before—the blue light, glass table, three phones, two closed laptops, a metal cupboard containing not cash but SIM cards, bank kits, seals of fake companies and several old passports. But one thing in the room was new: silence.

Raghav was not unfamiliar with silence. Silence is the finest language of crime. But this silence had not been made by him. It was already seated there, like an elderly guest who never asks for an invitation but enters a house at the right time. He turned on the light. The silence did not move.

The Signal phone lay on the table. Raghav cleaned it twenty-seven times a day. Old messages erased, backup off, cloud storage disabled, separate SIM, separate name. He picked it up. The screen was bright. No notification. He felt relief. Then, in one corner, a green leaf appeared. It slowly spread until the whole screen became the veins of a coconut leaf.

He blinked. The leaf vanished. A message appeared: "L.K.: account suspended." Raghav's throat dried. Lau Kin-Hung never wrote "suspended." His language was short, cut down, sealed inside percentages: "Send." "Stop." "Withdraw." "Change route." Suspended was a word used by lawyers, banks, courts. Not L.K.

Raghav typed: "Clarify." The message would not go. Spinning dots. Then red letters: "Route unavailable." He picked up the second phone. The third. The fourth. The same reply on each: Route unavailable. Where had the safest routes in the world gone in one night? Roads can be closed, ports can be closed, borders can be closed; how does a digital route close?

He opened the metal cupboard. On a small sheet of paper inside were codes—Hong Kong, Macao, Dubai, Kathmandu, Guwahati, Patna, Meerut, Delhi. A number beside every name. An account behind every number. A person behind every account. A family behind every person. Raghav had never seen the sequence before. He saw only numbers. Today a body stood behind every number.

He folded the paper and put it into his pocket. Then an old printer started by itself. Raghav froze. The printer had been switched off for three months. The cartridge should have dried out. Yet it began to print. First page: "Ujjwal Jha." Second: "Munna Paswan." Third: "Sarayu, woman labourer." Fourth: "Name unknown." The fifth page was blank. On the blank page there was only one mark—a blurred thumbprint.

Raghav pulled the printer cable. The pages kept coming. Cable disconnected, electricity disconnected, still pages. He kicked the printer. The machine fell silent. Sheets lay scattered across the floor. The edge of every sheet was damp. It was not merely wetness but the smell of a river—raw mud, flattened rice and jaggery, stale corpse, and the impossible fragrance of coconut blossom.

He looked at his security watch. His heartbeat was fast. Raghav wanted to laugh. "Stress," he told himself. "Batra is panicking, and it is affecting me." But another voice inside said: the screen came for Batra; printouts came to you. Why? Because Batra made the letters, and you made the routes. The names came into his screen; the paths of the accounts are arriving in your house.

Raghav Somani was not fundamentally a trader; he was a ledger. Clothes on the body, smile on the face, phone in the pocket; inside, only credit and debit. As a child his father ran a small hardware shop. He watched customers take goods on credit; his father wrote down their names; money did not come on time. Raghav learned that day: writing names is foolish. Keep accounts instead; accounts have no faces.

That lesson became the root of his crime. When Chandrapal Batra first explained the work of mule accounts, Raghav understood at once—a poor young man's account, a SIM in another name, a courier sent to a third address, a fourth person's signature, a fifth person's commission. When a crime is divided into enough pieces, no one appears to be the whole criminal. That was modern cleverness.

Raghav's work was to join the pieces without showing the join. He gave "commission work" to thousands of young people. "Just open an account. Money will come in, go out, and your share is yours." Unemployment was his agent. Hostels, coaching lanes, grocery shops, tea stalls, private colleges, migrant workers' lodgings—his people were everywhere. Whoever was caught said, "How was I to know?" In truth, they often did not know. Ignorance was Raghav's greatest armour.

That night the armour cracked. The names on the pages scattered across the floor were not only names of the dead. Some belonged to people who were alive but had gone to jail. Some to women who had sent their household savings away under "digital arrest." Some to boys who began lying to their fathers after the first win. Some to account holders who rented out accounts for commission and were later called criminals.

Raghav tried another route to L.K. on the phone. Coded message: "Dry port?" No answer. "Northern route?" Silence. "Old ledger?" Silence. "Three percent extra." Silence. For the first time Lau Kin-Hung's silence seemed like death. Foreign kingpins speak little, but they send signals. Today there was no signal either.

Suddenly a message flashed on the phone: "Account closed." Nothing more. No name, no code. Something struck inside Raghav's head. Account closed did not mean only money stopped. It meant person closed. Contact cut. Whoever had been used had finished being useful. In an empire of crime there is no friendship, only routes. Once a route breaks, the person becomes scrap.

Anger filled Raghav's eyes. In his mind he cursed Lau Kin-Hung. "I ran India for you. I made accounts, washed your money, protected your apps, shielded your call centres from police." But behind the words he spoke inwardly came another sentence: "I broke thousands of homes."

He pushed the sentence away at once. In the court inside himself he objected: "Irrelevant."

Silence laughed. A laugh without sound.

Raghav opened the window. In the city's night, sirens, motorcycles, pressure cookers, children, lifts, and a distant train mingled together. Ordinary sounds. Yet behind them he heard a very faint "splash." Was it the splash of a river or of a screen? There was no longer any difference. Perhaps every transaction falling into the wrong account made that very sound.

He sat in the chair and opened his old notebook. It was not digital. He trusted digital systems, but he kept some codes on paper, because even the cleverest criminal sometimes trusts the simplicity of paper. On the first page he had written: "Do not trust the network; keep an exit formula." Raghav smiled. Exit formula. He had a way out.

He turned the pages. Exit formulas: another name, another passport, another country, a house in the hills, cash, gold, coins, a third phone. But a green line ran along the edge of every page. It looked like the vein of a leaf. Wherever he wrote an exit, a leaf formed there. As though Channa Grove were saying: "The road out passes through the inside."

He tore the watch from his wrist and threw it away. Criminals monitor time, but today time was monitoring him. The watch fell to the floor and kept running. Not tick-tick but "name-name." Raghav's ears filled with it. He pressed his hands over them. "Name-name" was coming from within.

By dawn he had decided—not to go to Garh Narikel. Batra had made the same decision; Raghav did too. But the two decisions were different. Batra did not want to go because he wanted to fight. Raghav did not want to go because he wanted to flee. He feared that if he reached Garh Narikel, all his signals would take bodies. What had been account numbers would stand before him as people.

That afternoon he sent a message to his people: "Stop mule recruitment." It was the first abnormal order of his life. Five questions arrived at once: "For how long?" "Which branch?" "Which case?" "Order from above?" "Payment?" Raghav answered none of them. His silence spread through the network. In a criminal web, nothing is more frightening than silence without an order.

By evening Chandrapal Batra called. Raghav looked at the phone and did not answer. Then a message: "Status?" Raghav began to type: "Everything under control." His finger stopped. He deleted it. Wrote instead: "The routes are silent." He sent it. Five minutes later Batra replied: "Silence can be managed too." Raghav kept staring at the phone.

He understood that Batra still did not know: silence cannot be managed, only heard.

The second printout came at night. This time one sheet only. No name on it, only a question: "Whose body made your first share?" Raghav stared at the page for a long time. His first share—five thousand rupees then. One student's account. The student was later arrested. His father sold the shop and went to lawyers. The case dragged on. Raghav moved forward. The student's name? He tried to remember. Could not. The page remained blank.

Something broke inside Raghav in that blankness. A criminal's greatest fear is not being caught; it is discovering that he cannot remember the name attached to his first crime. A forgotten name grows so angry that it becomes a ghost. Perhaps that is all the Court of Channa Grove does—it turns forgotten names into ghosts.

Raghav rose in a darkness like a nebula. He took all the SIM cards from the metal cupboard and began breaking them one by one. Each SIM made a small sound as it snapped—"hm." As though someone far away were answering. Fifty, seventy, a hundred. Sharp plastic edges cut into his fingers; they hurt. When he broke the last SIM, a message appeared on the screen: "Broken SIMs do not mend broken homes."

Exhausted, he sat on the floor. For the first time he remembered his own home. His father, the hardware shop, iron nails, the credit ledger, little Raghav wanting accounts instead of names. His father used to say, "Write the name, son. If the account fails, you can still ask the name." Raghav had laughed at him. Today his father was dead. The ledger was gone. Even the name had grown blurred.

Raghav's eyes filled, but no tears fell. Long practice in crime dries the water in the eyes. He wanted to cry, but there seemed to be no water left inside the body. Perhaps all that water was trapped in the accounts he had created. Perhaps the leaves of Garh Narikel would first demand that water back.

Then he did one small thing. He opened the laptop, not for anyone else but for himself. He created a file: "First Account." He began searching for the student's name. Old emails, old photographs, old payments, old bank lists. Three hours later he found it—Arunesh Kumar. He typed the name. The screen did not flicker. No leaf appeared. No ghost. The letters simply remained still. For the first time Raghav understood: writing a name can quiet a screen.

But the quiet lasted only a moment. As soon as one name was written, another demanded to be found. A blank line beneath Arunesh Kumar. Raghav thought: how many? A thousand? Ten thousand? As a crocodile chews through flesh to bone, the accounts of crime had chewed through memory to its bones. Would he be able to find every name? Did he want to? The questions had no answer. But the file was open.

The next morning Raghav Somani left his house. He did not go toward Garh Narikel. He first went to the old hostel where his first mule account had been made. New gatekeeper, new wall, new rooms. No trace. But the tea seller outside had grown old; he did not recognise Raghav. Raghav ordered tea and asked, "Did Arunesh Kumar live here?" The tea seller scratched his head. "Many years ago? The boy who got into that case?"

Raghav's hand trembled. The name was alive in the air. Government paper forgets, courts defer, but a tea seller remembers. This folk memory was stronger than his digital erasure. He drank in silence. The tea seller said, "Poor boy. His father sold the shop. Later the boy went half-mad for a long time." Raghav paid. The tea seller began counting change. Raghav said, "Keep it." The man laughed. "I don't want charity. Keep the account clear."

Keep the account clear. The two words lodged in Raghav's chest. Criminals give donations, not accounts. Temple, trust, aid, charity—all donations. Clearing accounts is difficult. To clear an account you need names, events, acknowledgment.

That evening he returned home. The Signal phone glowed again. Message from L.K.: "Why stop?" Raghav stared for a long time. The master above him had returned. The accounts might open again. Money might flow. The old life might become possible again. He could reply: "Route ready." But his finger wrote another sentence: "The list of names is being made."

The moment he sent it, the phone went black. For an instant he feared L.K. would have him killed. Then a calm voice rose from within: silence had been more frightening than death, and silence had now been heard. He could still run, lie, turn back—but he could no longer say that he had not heard the names.

That night Raghav Signal Somani slept for the first time without a phone beside his pillow. Sleep did not come at once. Channa Grove came to him not in a dream but in wakefulness. Leaves fell one by one, a name on each. They did not come to convict him; they came to make him read. Reading, too, is a punishment when one has spent an entire life reading only sums of money.

At dawn a new leaf lay on his table. On it were the words: "Before you break the silence, listen." Raghav placed it in his notebook. This was not confession, nor was it atonement. It was only a beginning. His first day in the inner world of the rogues was over. Outside, the world still feared the name of his network; inside, he was for the first time practising how not to fear names.

That morning, in the kabaddi of Channa Grove in Garh Narikel, a new sound arrived. The ghosts asked, “Who has come?” Budhba Ghost cupped his ear. “Not a body. Someone has sent silence.” The Loths smiled. The light of the Raksh grew a little brighter. Kabaddi began again.

FOLK SONG: THE LAMENT OF THE DELETED MESSAGE

Folk tune: viraha of silence

Listen first—before you break the silence, listen,

Not confession, not atonement—understand it as a beginning.

Letters vanished in five seconds; where did the sin vanish?

Behind every account a body stands; a name calls out.

The tea shop remembers what the file forgets,

The tongue that read money trembles when it reads a name.

Raghav kept the phone away and spent the night so for the first time,

Leaf after leaf of names fell, blocking the door of sleep.

“Before you break the silence, listen”—the leaf at dawn,

Not confession, not atonement, but the word beginning.

No body came to the grove; silence was sent instead,

In the ghosts’ new round, silence became a player.

Letters vanished in five seconds; the sin did not vanish,

Behind every account a body stood; a name spoke.

CHAPTER 29

Lau Kin-Hung's Dream

A name written in full can be arrested - but a half-written name becomes its own prisoner.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE RIVER'S SONG IN THE GLASS HOUSE

Folk tune: Sea-Malar

Sing the Malar, sing it in the glass house,

Awaken the river's tune in the cold breast of glass.

See the sea from the glass house, and bring its voice within;

Among the lines of profit, honour the names of human beings.

Open the windows of the glass tower and give the wind a place;

Give fair value to the labour and dreams of distant lands.

Let the splash be not a sound of fear, but the gentle rhythm of awareness;

Let justice endure across the seas in the dealings of the world.

The river's song within the glass house will soften the heart;

It will fill the cold world of glass with human warmth.

Open the tower's window and let the east wind enter;

Among the rows of profit figures, let the human face appear.

Let the sweat of distant labour receive its rightful worth;

Let the current of justice sing its Malar even across the sea.

Raghav's silence had already crossed the sea and reached Hong Kong. Lau Kin-Hung never pronounced his full name. A name written out completely on paper, he used to say, could be arrested. And so, in Hong Kong's financial darkness, his name had been reduced to three letters - L.K.H. Yet within those three letters mingled the salt of the sea, the old smell of the opium trade, the glass of banks, and the blue glow of screens in India's small towns.

He lived in a glass house built beside the sea. Not a house - a glass cave. Inside and outside at once. Sea outside, screens within. Ships outside, accounts within. Water outside, percentages within. Every morning he looked towards the sea but did not see the sea; he saw sums of money moving behind the floating ships.

That night he had sent Raghav Signal one final message: 'Close the account.' Only two words. To him this was not mercy but policy. The first rule of crime was simple: when a link begins to make a sound, cut it off. Raghav made no sound; but Raghav's silence itself had become a sound. So the account had to be closed.

After sending the message, he switched off the phone. Each of his phones bore a small coloured dot on the back - red for India, blue for Singapore, green for Dubai, black for Nepal, yellow for Hong Kong. The dots told him where the bodies were, where the money was, and where deaths would not be counted. His gaze lingered a little longer on the Indian dot. The dot moved.

At first he thought the sea breeze had stirred the curtain. Then he saw that it was not the curtain but the map that was trembling. The map of India broke apart pixel by pixel and became a village. The village's name was written not on a screen but upon a leaf. The letters moved: Garh Narikel.

Lau Kin-Hung laughed. His laugh was very small, no larger than the final decimal point in a deal. He believed that a thing called a village existed in the market only so that a city might buy it. A price could be placed on the village's land, its young men, its bank accounts, its soul. If something had no price, a price could be made for it.

He went to bed. The bed stood beside a glass wall opening towards the sea. He lay flat beneath the sheet. He never dreamed. Dreams, he said, belonged to poor people; rich people made projections. But that night, as a thin line of moonlight was drawn across the black surface of the sea, the dust of Channa Grove in Garh Narikel settled upon his eyelids.

The dream began with the sea. That night the sea did not make waves; it breathed. Once inward, once outward. Lau Kin-Hung stood inside his glass house. Water began to seep through the floor. He laughed - there was insurance. The water rose a few inches. There was a pump, he thought. It reached his knees. There was an emergency exit. It reached his chest. There was a helicopter.

But the water was not seawater. It carried no smell of salt. It smelled of hospital medicine, bridge cement, the heat of mobile phones, and the dampness of hoarded banknotes. The water was colourless, but many deaths had dissolved within it.

The first thing that floated towards him was a mobile phone. Its screen was dark, yet white light shone from within. Lau reached to pick it up. The phone opened by itself. A young man's face appeared on the screen - eyes sunk deep, lips dry, a blue rope-mark around his neck. He said, 'I am Ujjwal Jha. In the profit of which country was my loss entered?'

Lau dropped the phone. A second mobile floated up. A woman appeared upon it - a basket on her head, river-kohl in her eyes. She said, 'I am Sarayu. In which of your subsidiary companies was the insurance on the body that fell from the bridge pier deposited?’

A third mobile came. It carried a voice but no face. The voice said, ‘They told me I was under digital arrest. I sold the jewellery in my house. Later I learned that the uniform of the law had merely been worn on a screen. Where did the commission on my fear go?’

A fourth mobile came. A fifth. A tenth. A hundredth. The water filled with phones. On every screen the same question shone in a different form: ‘Under the law of which country is my death recorded?’

Lau Kin-Hung tried to scream, but no sound came from his mouth. His language was percentages, and percentages contain no word for weeping. He raised the hand with which, for years, he had written orders across the world. The lines on his palm began to glow like cracks in a screen.

Then a crocodile appeared in the water. A crocodile in Hong Kong harbour? Impossible, he thought. But dreams pay no customs duty on the impossible. The crocodile was black. A phone was caught between its teeth, and Chandrapal Batra’s smiling face filled the screen. The crocodile began to chew slowly. When Batra’s face broke into pixels, those pixels formed Sarayu’s name.

Another crocodile came from the far corner. A court seal was stamped upon its back. A third had the light of a Harvard auditorium in its eyes. The belly of a fourth was swollen, crammed with oxygen cylinders, vaccine vials, boxes of counterfeit medicine, and QR signs from betting wallets.

The crocodiles surrounded him. He did not become afraid; he began to count. One, two, three, four. At that moment, through the water came the sound of the ghosts playing kabaddi in Channa Grove. The sound did not rise from the sea but from inside the mobile phones. Not kabaddi-kabaddi, but name-name. Ujjwal. Sarayu. Munna. Devika. Nand. And a thousand names he had never heard.

The dream changed. He found himself in a Harvard auditorium. Edward Broom was speaking from the stage: ‘Human dignity is the soul of development.’ The hall applauded. Lau Kin-Hung sat in the darkness at the back. Figures moved across the tablet before him. Beneath each of Broom’s words, a sum flashed: dignity: forty-five lakhs. Development: twelve crores. Ethics: eight percent. South Asia operations: high risk, high profit.

Then water began dripping from the auditorium ceiling. Professor Elina Graves hurried to protect her notes. Ira Aruni did not rise to go towards the stage; she was outside on the lawn teaching children to read names. Lau looked out. Every child held a leaf. On every leaf was the face from one of those mobile screens.

Broom kept speaking. The water touched his shoes. 'This is a symbolic installation,' he said. The hall applauded again. But the water rose. The sound of applause became splash-splash. Lau saw a pipal tree growing in the middle of the auditorium. Budhba Ghost sat upon one of its branches.

Budhba Ghost looked at him and said, 'Your accounts are very clean. Only one column is missing.'

For the first time in the dream, Lau Kin-Hung found his voice. 'Which column?'

Budhba Ghost said, 'Sleep.'

He woke. The air-conditioning in the glass house was running. The sea was outside where it belonged. The phones were off. The curtains were dark. His heart raced. He immediately called the security room. The answer came: 'Everything normal.' He called the finance room. The same answer: 'Everything normal.' He rang the secure line to India operations. Three seconds of silence. Then a recorded woman's voice said: 'The name you are calling is busy in the archive of names.'

He slammed down the phone. Sweat stood on his forehead. In the cold glass chamber of Hong Kong, sweat felt like an insult. He went to the bathroom and splashed water on his face. In the mirror he saw the face of a man who never died anywhere in the world because he was never officially declared alive anywhere.

At four in the morning his chief assistant, Mei Lan, arrived. She was the kind of woman who understood an order before a question had to be asked. Standing by the door, she said, 'There is disruption at the India desk.' Raghav was unreachable. Chandrapal Batra was repeatedly demanding secure confirmation. Hariharan had gone to Garh Narikel.

Lau Kin-Hung asked slowly, 'Does Garh Narikel actually exist?'

For the first time Mei Lan looked directly at him. 'It is a village.' Small on the map. Negligible in the data. But searches for that name have risen sharply this week.

'Why?'

'People are searching for names.' Names of the dead. Of workers. Of victims of digital fraud. Of people harmed by medicine rackets. And some children have started a folk school.

Lau tried to laugh. The laugh would not come. He went to the window. The first light of morning lay upon the sea. Far away stood rows of containers on a ship. Every container looked to him like a coffin. He blinked and looked again. They were containers once more.

Mei Lan opened a file. 'Shall we order the Indian operation closed? The loss will remain limited. We can return later under changed names.'

Instead of answering, Lau returned to his desk. An object lay there that had not been there during the night - a thin green coconut leaf. It carried the faint smell of raw water and fresh green growth, a smell that did not belong in conditioned air. How had a coconut leaf entered a glass house in Hong Kong?

Mei Lan looked at the leaf. 'Who brought this?'

Lau said, 'No one.'

He picked it up. Its veins were fine lines, like the channels of bank transfers. Here and there were black marks along them. When he stared at the marks, they became letters. Not Chinese, not English - Devanagari. Lau could not read them. Yet someone inside him was reading: Garh Narikel.

He sat down to write an order. He meant to type: 'Wind down India operations immediately. Erase the evidence.' His fingers moved across the keyboard, but the screen displayed: 'Names will not be erased.'

He pressed Delete. The sentence returned: 'Names will not be erased.'

He shut down the system. The screen went dark. His own face appeared in the darkness. Behind his face, very far away, he could see Channa Grove. He understood that his dream had not ended. He was awake, but the dream had awakened behind him.

He told Mei Lan, 'I want the next India report on paper.'

Mei Lan was startled. 'You do not keep paper.'

Lau said quietly, 'The screen is no longer trustworthy.'

Mei Lan left. He remained alone. Morning had filled the glass house. The sea was blue, the city was waking, the markets were preparing to open. The world was normal. Only the coconut leaf on the desk was not normal. It did not dry. Its green colour only deepened, as though someone in distant Garh Narikel had just plucked it and sent it to him.

Lau Kin-Hung placed his hand upon the leaf. His hand felt a heartbeat. The leaf was not inert. Something was sounding inside it.

It was saying: 'Now your mind hangs suspended.'

Lau snatched his hand away, but the pulse remained in his palm. From that day onward he began to hear a faint sound of water in every line of profit. Before closing any account, he looked to see whether somewhere inside it a child might be writing a name.

By noon he had issued three orders: shut down all Raghav's access; stop Batra's payments; place Hariharan's expenses in a separate fund. They looked like ordinary business decisions. In truth, they were the decisions of a man trying to escape his dream by cutting away everyone who lived inside it.

What he did not understand was that the one who is cut loose first becomes free in the mind. Raghav's silence had already become a leaf. Batra's screen had become Channa Grove. Hariharan was travelling by train with Budhba Ghost. Now a coconut leaf sat inside Lau Kin-Hung's glass house.

At dusk a black shadow rose from behind the sea. The security cameras showed nothing. The satellite map showed nothing. But Lau's eyes saw a crocodile swimming straight towards his house. There was no phone in its mouth. This time there was a sheet of paper.

Lau drew the curtain. The sound of water came through the glass all the same.

It was not the sound of Garh Narikel. It was the sound of his own mind. The mind remained suspended, and a mind that remains suspended will one day drag the body after it.

FOLK SONG: SPLASH IN THE GLASS HOUSE

Folk tune: Sea-Viraha

The grove will pull, one day it will pull the body too;

Whose mind the village has caught will hear the water.

The sea can be seen from the glass house, but its voice cannot be heard;

The boat of dreams enters without paying customs duty.

The leaf pulsed in Lau's palm - 'Your mind is suspended';

Along every line of profit, a child's name awoke.

He tried to save himself by cutting accounts, severing his companions;

The minds of those he cut loose flew free before anything else.

This time the crocodile carried paper in its mouth, not a phone;

He drew the curtain, but could not stop the sound of water.

The splash beyond the glass was the sound of his own mind;

Whose mind the village has caught, the body too will one day be pulled.

The sea is visible from the glass house, though its voice cannot be heard;

Along every line of profit, the children's names awaken.

CHAPTER 30

The Court Within the Rogues

In the laughter of one who has won in the outer court and lost in the court within, you can hear the clatter of teeth.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE LAMP OF INNER JUSTICE

Folk tune: Bhagat justice-blessing

Light the lamp, light it in the court within;

Spread the ledger of your own deeds before yourself.

The outer court may delay, but the inner lamp burns;

The quiet judge of conscience holds the page of truth.

Read the account of your own deeds; do not flee from fault;

Do not fear to issue yourself an order to make amends.

The inner court is not punishment alone, but direction;

From remorse into action it builds a new hope.

If the lamp of justice burns within, the path outside grows clear;

The true verdict of the mind can cleanse a life.

Sing the Bhagat melody and tell the story of truth;

Bear the heat of guilt and take the road of repair.

Wash the courtyard of the mind with the clear water of repentance;

Carry the lamp lit within and win the road outside.

The minds of all five rogues now hung suspended, and for suspended minds Channa Grove opens its own court. When a person wins in the outer court and loses in the inner one, his gait becomes more measured than before. He smiles, but the clatter of teeth sounds inside the smile. He folds a paper, but from the fold comes not a rustle but a splash. He says, 'The matter is over.' Yet beneath his pillow an invisible clerk writes fresh dates all night long.

That night, in three cities and three separate rooms, three men woke at the same moment: Batuknath Hariharan in his costly chair, Chandrapal Batra before his screen, and Raghav Signal behind his closed window. Across the sea Lau Kin-Hung was awake as well, though there was no sweat on his body; upon the walls of his glass house a map of India was forming out of water.

No one's phone rang. No summons arrived. No attendance slip was served. Even so, each understood that he had to appear somewhere. This was not the court where men in black coats call their own voices law. This was the court where a voice rises first in the mind and only afterward searches for a mouth.

Batuknath Hariharan first looked for the order that had given him victory. He kept that paper not under his pillow but close to his chest. He found it. The seal was clear. The signature was clear. The language had the same stiff authority he liked: 'Petition dismissed on account of procedural defects.' He tried to smile. But from within the word 'dismissed' emerged 'Nand'. Then 'Sarayu'. Then 'Ujjwal'. Then many names he had never heard, though money for erasing them had reached his table.

He rose and turned on the light. The room was the same, yet it was not the same. Law degrees hung on the walls; behind the glass of every certificate, tiny leaves were caught. Names were written on the leaves. In the chair before his desk, where clients usually sat, sat a boy. Shorts to the knees, and in his eyes the same hunger Batuknath had carried in childhood when he first saw a book of law and thought: with this book, people can be saved.

The boy said, 'Read the names.'

Batuknath hardened his voice. 'By whose authority?'

The boy did not smile. There was no gavel in his hand. There was a pipal leaf. He laid the leaf upon the table. It made a small sound - tap. The court came into session.

'I am the president of the Bar Council,' Batuknath said.

'Then read the names,' the boy said again. 'Pronouncing the names of those you stopped in the name of procedure will not reduce your office.'

Batuknath clenched his fist. For the first time he felt that he was being heard not by a judge but by his own childhood. A judge can be frightened; childhood cannot. Childhood is the place where a person stores his first lie and spends a lifetime protecting it.

He refused to read. At once the sound of kabaddi reached his ears. Channa Grove was far away, yet the sound was close. Not 'kabaddi-kabaddi' but 'name-name'. He covered his ears. The sound was coming from within.

At the same moment a window opened on Chandrapal Batra's screen. Its title was: 'Account Reconciliation'. He had not opened it. Neither had his clerk. One by one the accounts appeared: Munna Paswan, Bablu Sah, Arman, Ujjwal Jha, Ranjit, Neeraj, Sabir, Lalita, Ajit, Unnamed. He moved the mouse and tried to close the window. It closed. His mobile rang immediately. The same accounts appeared on that screen.

Chandrapal Batra remembered his degree from Meerut. The smell of its yellow paper entered his nose. Once he had been a small lawyer: accident compensation, land disputes, police stations, bail. The earnings were small, but sleep came at night. Later he learned the language of accounts. An account was not a person but a road. Hunger opened it, gangs drove upon it, and police closed it.

A court formed inside the screen. No judge, only an empty chair. No prosecution, only a torn passbook. No defence counsel, only his own voice. He argued: 'There was consent. The account holder gave his documents.'

A page of the torn passbook moved. A voice said, 'The consent of hunger and consent in law are not the same thing.'

Chandrapal grew irritated. 'This is sentimentality. Business does not run on sentiment.'

The passbook laughed. The laughter of paper can be sadder than human laughter. 'Business is business only while the buyer knows what he is buying. You bought people's futures and sold the transaction back to them as a game.'

Chandrapal lifted a paperweight to smash the screen. But the paperweight had filled with water from the Ganga. It became heavy; his wrist trembled. On the screen appeared not Ujjwal's photograph but his final debt message. The words writhed like registered worms: 'Final warning today. Digital arrest order issued.'

'Digital arrest,' Chandrapal muttered. 'I was only an adviser...'

The voice inside the screen replied, 'An adviser is one who shows the road. You showed a pit and said: the road is here.'

Raghav Signal sat in his room waiting for a sound. Half his life had been spent removing sounds: disappearing messages, deleted chats, SIM cards in other people's names, false identities, commission chains, safe routes. He believed that anything erased after five seconds had never truly been born.

But that night leaves began falling onto his desk. The window was closed. The fan was off. Yet leaves kept falling. On each leaf was an unfinished sentence: 'Open an account...' 'Send Aadhaar...' 'Frighten the old man...' 'Pretend to be police on video call...' 'Three percent...' 'Keep the girl's photograph...' 'Money by evening...'

Raghav picked up the leaves one by one and tried to burn them. They would not catch fire. They were not wet, yet they would not burn. He understood: these were not leaves of a tree but leaves of memory. Memory is not dampened by water; it is soaked in names.

He wrote a message to Lau Kin-Hung: 'Get me out.' The message did not go. A red mark appeared in its place. Then, instead of a reply, a mirror opened on the screen. In it Raghav did not see his own face; he saw all the faces he had called 'small accounts': a college boy, an elderly woman, a rickshaw driver, an unemployed graduate, a son searching for a loan for his sick mother.

An old woman in the mirror asked, 'Son, when your voice became the police and told me my boy would go to jail, did you sleep well that night?'

Raghav covered his ears. But the question did not enter through the ears; it stuck to the back of his neck. That is where the mind hangs when a person can no longer see a way of escape.

Across the sea Lau Kin-Hung paced his glass house. His inner court did not speak any language he knew. He could hire interpreters for English, Chinese, Hindi, legal translation - for all of them. But this court spoke in smells. The house filled with the smells of salt, greed, damp banknotes, cheapened lives, and mothers weeping in distant countries.

A long table grew before him. There were no files on it. Only bowls. In every bowl lay a few coins, some medicine, drops of blood, shards of mobile-phone glass. He did not understand. Then a sea wave rose as high as the glass wall, and the objects in each bowl formed an image: a bridge, a hospital, a gaming app, a flesh market, a weapons crate, a packet of narcotics.

A voice asked, 'State the percentage.'

Lau Kin-Hung smiled. Percentages were his religion. 'The calculation of risk is the foundation of business,' he said.

The voice remained calm. 'What is your percentage in the deaths?'

For the first time he fell silent. He believed he did not kill bodies. He only built systems. He only moved money from one place to another. He only opened doors. Every crime, in his mind, happened in someone else's hands. But in the inner court it is not hands that are measured; it is shares.

Edward Broom's night was no calmer. He was reading the draft of his next speech: 'Human Dignity and Global Enterprise'. The words were beautiful. His secretary had written them; Professor Elina Graves had revised them. Every sentence sat cleanly on white paper. But when he read the word 'dignity', mud began to seep from the edge of the page. In that mud were false safety reports, swollen vaccine bills, and prints from workers' rough hands.

His inner court was the most civilised of all. It had wood panelling, soft light, quiet chairs, and soundproof walls. But justice does not always arrive with noise; sometimes silence is more terrifying. There was no ghost in the judge's seat. The applause from his own speeches sat there instead. Again and again it clapped, stopped, and asked: 'When your words held dignity, how many absent bodies were held in your accounts?'

Broom said, 'I had no direct knowledge.'

The applause replied, 'Was the profit direct?'

He fell silent. The smell of profit needs no interpreter.

In all these inner courts one chair stood empty. In Batuknath's room, Chandrapal's screen, Raghav's court of leaves, Lau Kin-Hung's glass house, Broom's civilised chamber - everywhere the same empty chair. It bore no name. Yet each knew it was not Satyavrat Mehta's chair. It belonged to those they had defeated.

The rogues wanted those people to come, weep, bow, ask for settlement, file review petitions, give statements to the media, and lose again. The pleasure of victory depends upon the presence of an opponent. When the opponent disappears, victory becomes a yellowing sheet trapped inside a file.

The inner court asked them all the same question: 'Where are the people you defeated?'

Batuknath said, 'In Channa Grove.'

Chandrapal said, 'At the digital school.'

Raghav said, 'In the leaves.'

Lau Kin-Hung said, 'Inside India's small mobile phones.'

Broom said, 'Outside the auditorium.'

The question came again: 'Then why are you here?'

There was no answer. A thin line appeared across the courtroom floor, running from the outer world into the inner one. It was not a road; it was a groove in the mind. The more anyone tried to erase it, the deeper it became.

Toward dawn, all five men found themselves back in their beds across the different cities. Batuknath still held the victory order, but his thumb was pressed over the place where a name should have been. Chandrapal's screen was off, but from within the glass Ujjwal's unfinished message glowed. Raghav's desk was clean, but a leaf was found in his pocket: 'Evidence does not become absent.' Lau Kin-Hung's glass house was dry, but a fine line of salt had drawn the map of India. Broom's speech was clean, but mud had settled beneath the word 'dignity'.

And at that same hour in Garh Narikel, the children were sweeping the yard of the Coconut-Leaf School. Devika wrote on the first lesson board: 'Do not fear digital fear.' Mira wrote on the second: 'Privacy is the body's shadow.' Saumya translated old papers into the people's language. Ira, having left the distant auditorium, practised the pronunciation of names.

The rogues had survived the first hearing in the inner court. But they received no punishment. They received something harsher than punishment: waiting. They were now compelled to watch the people who had gone away not to fight them but to build.

That morning Budhba Ghost remained awake a little longer in Channa Grove. He turned over a leaf. The next date was written upon it: the night of dreams. He smiled. Human courts give dates so that cases may be postponed. The inner court gives dates so that the soul cannot postpone itself.

FOLK SONG: THE COURT WITHIN

Folk tune: Bhagat justice-song

The outer court postpones, but the inner court will not;

The line drawn across the floor of the mind cannot be erased.

The outer court delays, the inner one does not;

The line across the mind's floor does not disappear.

The victory order lies beneath a thumb pressed over a name;

Mud gathers again beneath the word dignity.

A fine line of salt shapes the map of India;

Inside the darkened screen Ujjwal's message burns.

No punishment came; waiting became the harsher sentence;

Those they defeated are building the morning of the future.

Human dates are given so a case may be delayed;

The soul's date is given so the soul cannot delay itself.

The order lies beneath the thumb; mud settles beneath the name;

The word dignity remains pressed down, and pain gathers again.

In the fine line of salt, the map rises once more.

CHAPTER 31

The Work of the Defeated

The defeated do not raise slogans - they rise at dawn and lift another person's name.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE VICTORY OF WORK AMONG THE DEFEATED

Folk tune: Labour song

Yes, brother, win even after defeat;

Take up no flag - take the hoe, and sing the song of work.

No flag, no stage; the defeated go to work,

At the school, in the fields, in aid, in the children's society.

The quiet victory of work is greater than victory on paper;

The labour that improves a life is the truest love.

There is no defeat while hands still work and knowledge is shared;

Day by day, small repairs give shape to the future.

The working victory of the defeated flowers in silence;

The true history of justice opens through the people's labour.

School at daybreak, field and threshing floor at noon;

An evening courtyard of help, and at night care for the children.

Paper victories and defeats fade as days pass;

A small repair made by hand can endure for an age.

The inner court had bound the rogues to waiting. Meanwhile, those whom the court had called defeated rose at dawn without raising a slogan against anyone. They beat no drums before anyone's house. They made no black flag bearing Batuknath Hariharan's name, burned no effigy of Chandrapal Batra, smeared no soot upon Lau Kin-Hung's photograph. They rose not like defeated people but like farmers going out to scatter seed in a field.

The night of Channa Grove's court had passed. Dew rested on the leaves, and anyone who bent close enough to look into a drop saw not his own face but the name of someone dead. Budhba Ghost sat upon his branch that morning and said nothing. Usually the ghosts joked after a verdict, but that day they were silent. For when Channa Grove passes judgment, it watches less the judgment itself than what people do afterward.

Aruni rose first. He had not slept all night. He kept wondering: if the court's paper says defeat and Channa Grove says victory, which paper should a person trust? Ba had told him: 'When paper and leaf quarrel, look into a child's eyes.' Aruni went outside. Ananya was already awake, drawing round circles in the soil with a stick.

'What are you making?' Aruni asked.

Without lifting her head, Ananya said, 'A kabaddi field. But this time there will be no line in the middle. Whoever is called defeated will not be sent out. They will be given another task.'

Aruni fell silent. He understood that the children had already read the previous night's verdict.

That morning Devika Sah brought not a photograph of her brother Ujjwal but his old mobile phone. It was switched off, the screen broken, everything inside perhaps already ended. But Devika did not place it at the roots of Channa Grove. Holding it in her hand, she walked toward the school. On the wall of the old village meeting place - where wedding elders had once sat and betel stains reddened the plaster - she wrote the first sentence:

'The crocodile of the screen shows you victory first, then eats your house.'

The children did not laugh. Neither did the elders. Everyone understood that this was not the first lesson of a textbook; it was the first breath after Ujjwal's death.

Nishant Jha, who once sat in a counting-house abroad watching numerical streams of millions, now explained accounts to the village children. He used no English term. He said, 'Look: when you give the account bearing your name to someone else, they are not renting your body; they are renting your shadow. The money that moves through that shadow will send smoke back into your home. A mule account means carrying someone else's crime upon your own shoulders.'

Munna Paswan sat there quietly. Earlier he used to hide his face because money had passed through his account. But Devika seated him in front. 'The person who has been trapped is a witness before he is an accused,' she said. Munna's eyes filled. For the first time he felt that he possessed a name outside the papers of the police.

That day Saumya Ramanathan arrived carrying a bundle of documents. They contained bridge accounts, medicine bills, vaccine purchases, the price of breath in hospitals, lists from the flesh market, accounts of digital fraud, and court dates. Until then those papers had spoken in thick, heavy language - language in which pain was translated into something lifeless. Saumya began reading them aloud. After every line, she changed it into the speech of the village.

'Unreported death,' she read. Then she said, 'It means a person died, but the paper said he did not.'

'Procedural delay,' she read. Then she said, 'It means a man's father died, his son grew old, and still another date kept coming.'

'Economic adjustment,' she read. Then she said, 'It means the price of the medicine someone needed entered someone else's profit.'

At first the village elders had been afraid of documents like these. But when paper changed its language, they stopped being afraid. When a paper leaf speaks in the people's tongue, it ceases to be an object of the office and becomes testimony belonging to the home.

Mira arrived late that day. Her gait no longer carried the fear that had surrounded her between the chapters. Society had tried to make her love a crime; the company had tried to turn her privacy into a file; and Chandrapal Batra's people had tried to turn her photographs, messages, voice, and shadow into goods for a market. But after the Court of Channa Grove she came with a white cloth around her neck instead of a black scarf.

Standing in the middle of the courtyard, she said, 'No one's love will become evidence against them. The privacy of no one's body will become a market. No one's fear will become another person's income.'

Some women kept their heads lowered. Some young men avoided her eyes. Mira did not blame them. She said, 'The things you fear to speak of are the very things swindlers earn from. What you call shame, they turn into a weapon. From today, the shame is not yours; it belongs to the one who made the weapon.'

Devika stood beside her. Saumya closed the papers. Ananya looked at the children. They raised their hands together. No religious oath, no court oath, no party slogan. Only this:

'We will not turn anyone's privacy into a spectacle. We will not sell anyone's fear. If we see a fraud, we will name it. If we see someone breaking, we will not leave them alone.'

As they took the oath, the leaves of Channa Grove moved slightly. Budhba Ghost smiled for the first time. He understood that preserving the privacy of the living was as necessary as writing down the names of the dead. Death comes not only from crocodiles; people can drown inwardly from the fear of shame as well.

Ira Aruni had not returned from abroad that day, yet her voice arrived. It seemed to come not from a mobile speaker but through the split of a coconut leaf. She had already left the Harvard gathering. Some people told her she was destroying her future. She answered, 'A future built by erasing someone else's name is not a future; it is a rented house.'

Abroad she began a small gathering called 'Leaf-Lesson'. Indian, African, Latin American, and Asian students sat together there. Ira told them the story of Garh Narikel. She said, 'Before you enter an auditorium to lecture on ethics, read the name of the worker swallowed by your company's bridge. Before a presentation on development, read the name of the child who died in debt on a screen.'

In foreign auditoriums Ira raised no slogans. She simply read names. Hearing a name was the greatest question of all. A question may be answered; a name cannot. When a name is read aloud, everyone listening feels a slight discomfort in the seat beneath them. That discomfort is where a new ethics is born.

Gop Kumar watched all this from a distance. For several days he had spoken very little. Data still came to him, but he understood that unless data reached the hands of people, it would become yet another sealed envelope. Ishan Dutt, the shadowless informer, had told him one night: 'Turn the file into the people's speech. Otherwise the file will belong to those who can shut it.'

So Gop Kumar sat beneath the old pipal with two young men from the village and began turning data into story. He said, 'First table - names of the workers. Second - payments. Third - which account sent money to which. But do not understand this only through numbers; understand it through relationships. Beside each name write the person's home. Beside the home, the child's name. Beside the child's name, the dream that worker had for that child.'

One young man asked, 'How do we write a dream on paper?'

Gop Kumar was silent for a long time. Then he said, 'Where the dream cannot be found, leave a blank. A blank space is evidence too.'

That night, as Aruni put his daughter Ananya to bed, he said, 'Your studies will become difficult now.'

With her eyes still closed, Ananya asked, 'Why?'

'Because besides books, you will have to read people's names.'

Half asleep, Ananya said, 'Reading names is not difficult. Not reading names is difficult.'

Aruni watched her for a long time. It seemed to him that the next generation of Garh Narikel had already grown old, while the ancient ghosts were slowly becoming children.

In the city, meanwhile, a man came to Batuknath Hariharan's office with news. 'Sir, they are not filing any appeal.'

Batuknath started. 'No? Then what are they doing?'

'Writing names. Running a school. Explaining digital fraud. Taking an oath of privacy. Reading names abroad.'

Batuknath stared for a few moments. None of it sounded like legal language. He asked, 'Can an injunction be sought against this?'

The man was silent.

'An injunction against writing names?' Batuknath repeated to himself. He heard the stupidity of his own question and became angry. 'Then invent some charge. Foreign funding, anti-national activity, social disorder, unlawful assembly - something.'

The man said softly, 'Sir, they do not even hold assemblies. They teach children.'

Batuknath's face fell. For the first time he understood that it is difficult to sue people who have stopped fighting and begun working.

News reached Chandrapal Batra's office as well. He was told that young men from three villages had not fallen into his latest trap. At the school they had learned that the first win was bait. His representative wrote: 'Customers are alert.'

Chandrapal slammed down the phone. The word that frightened him was not 'customers' but 'alert'. The greatest enemy in the world of fraud is not police, court, or government - it is an alert person.

Raghav Signal Somani opened his deleted chats. He meant to type: 'Need a new strategy.' But as he typed, the message changed into: 'No new prey found.' He switched off the phone. In the glass he saw the faces of the children who had raised their hands in the courtyard and taken the oath.

Far away beside the sea, Lau Kin-Hung tried to open a new account in his glass house. His assistant said, 'The conversion rate in the Indian segment is falling.'

Lau asked, 'Why?'

The assistant could not answer. His report contained the words 'rural awareness'. But this was not Lau Kin-Hung's language. He understood only percentages. The percentage was falling. Why? Because far away in Garh Narikel children were learning to read names.

That night there was no ghostly kabaddi in Channa Grove. Everyone sat and listened. The sounds of the living working in different places travelled into the leaves: Devika's lessons, Nishant's rejection of compromise, Mira's oath, Saumya's translations, Ira's recitation of names, Gop's blank spaces, Ananya's sleep - every sound gathered in one place.

Budhba Ghost asked softly, 'Are these the defeated?'

Hulasi laughed. She had no hands, but that night there was the warmth of a palm in her voice. 'The defeated do not work like this. The defeated keep looking toward the victor. These people have stopped looking at them.'

The light from the Rakshas bodies grew a little brighter. The Loths, who were always spectators, rose that night and went to inspect the clay mobile phones made by the children. One Loth asked, 'Does this little box eat people?'

Budhba Ghost said, 'When people place their minds inside it.'

'Then how does the mind come back?' the Loth asked.

The leaves of Channa Grove answered: 'By reading names.'

By dawn a new saying had spread through Garh Narikel. People said that those defeated in court were no longer filing appeals; they were opening schools. At first it seemed a small thing. Later they understood that a school can be greater than a court, because a court asks questions after an event; a school teaches a child to be alert before it happens.

That morning, while setting water upon the stove, Ba said, 'This is work. If justice does not come, learn to make justice.'

Aruni asked, 'Make justice?'

Ba answered, 'Yes. The one who preserves names, protects children from fraud, prevents another person's shame from being turned into a weapon, turns the language of paper into the language of the people - that person makes justice. A verdict happens on paper; justice happens in human conduct.'

Aruni saw that the smoke from the stove did not rise straight upward. It bent slightly toward Channa Grove. For a moment Nand's face appeared within it. Nand said nothing. His silence was assent.

There was no declaration at the end of the chapter. No flag was raised. No stage was built. Work was simply divided. Devika would go to the next village. Nishant would turn the language of banking into village speech. Mira would turn the privacy oath not into a leaflet but a song. Saumya would write the stories hidden in documents. Ira would read names in foreign auditoriums. Gop Kumar would search for people who could fill the blank spaces. Aruni would ask the children: 'How shall we write the name that cannot be found?'

And the children would answer together: 'First we will look for it.'

Chandrapal Batra, Batuknath Hariharan, Raghav Signal, Lau Kin-Hung - none of them received news of a defeat that day. They only understood that the next move was becoming difficult. In the world of rogues, that is the first sign of defeat.

From that day an unusual custom began in Garh Narikel. Whenever anyone visited another household, before asking after health they asked one name-question: 'Who remains in your house, and who is still waiting to be written down?' At first people hesitated, then opened old trunks. As soon as a trunk opened, the smell of mothballs and old paper spread through the room. Letters, photographs, wage slips, hospital papers, bank receipts, school certificates - everything began to come out. Papers that had once gathered dust alone in separate homes became a shared memory.

The rogues thought this change insignificant. They did not understand that power first keeps people separate. When people keep their pain in separate rooms, men like Batuknath can call it procedure and postpone it; men like Chandrapal can call it a screen and trap them. But when one pain begins reading the name of another, it becomes not an organisation but a family - and it is hard to impose a legal section upon a family.

The leaves of Channa Grove whispered: 'One who stops fighting and begins working is not merely difficult to defeat - he is impossible to defeat.'

FOLK SONG: THE DEFEATED AT WORK

Folk tune: Labour song

They have begun, the defeated have begun their work;

Whoever has taken up the work of the future is hard to defeat.

No flag, no stage, no cry of victory;

Those called defeated divided an endless work among themselves.

One searches for names, another reads documents;

Another turns the language of fear into the village tongue.

Old trunks opened, and the smell of mothballs rose;

Receipts, photographs, and letters joined into a bond of their own.

Pain left its separate rooms and began reading one another's names;

Separate wounds joined within the body of one family.

Whoever left the fight and took up the work of the future

Could no longer be defeated - defeat became impossible.

No flag, no stage, no cry of victory;

Old trunks opened - receipts, photographs, newspapers.

Separate wounds joined into one family.

CHAPTER 32

The Third Kabaddi Match

When there is no wind and the leaves move, understand that some old verdict is leaving the paper and descending upon the tree.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE THIRD ROUND - TOGETHER

Folk tune: Kabaddi melody

Call out kabaddi, let the third round sound;

There are no spectators now - let everyone become a player.

The first round was play, the second a song of names;

The third is the round of togetherness - a campaign of the living.

The boundaries now are office, screen, home, and market;

Holding one another's hands, we will cross them all.

Do not carry only breath in the kabaddi chant; carry the rhythm of trust;

The net that catches is deceit - defeat it together.

The third round has begun; there are no spectators;

All are players, all are watchkeepers - no one is alone.

The first round belonged to ghosts, the second to the melody of names;

The third belongs to the living - a victorious campaign of togetherness.

Measure the borders of office, screen, and market with joined hands;

Take the long breath of trust and make the line of deceit tremble.

The evening whisper lingered into night. There was no wind in Channa Grove, yet the leaves were moving. When the wind is still and leaves move, understand that an invisible hand is stroking the head of the tree, or that an old verdict is leaving paper and descending into leaves. The people of Garh Narikel had heard this since childhood, but that night for the first time the children too understood that the movement of a tree is not always a matter of weather.

In the open ground at the centre of Channa Grove, a kabaddi court appeared. There was no chalk, no string, no line scratched with a stick. The court formed by itself, as though the earth had revealed an old scar upon its chest. Its boundary was not round: in one place it bent like the Kamla-Balan, in another it squared itself like the shadow of a bridge pier, elsewhere it shone like a mobile screen, and elsewhere ran straight as a courtroom table.

Budhba Ghost descended first. His black body was so anciently black that darkness looked pale beside him. Hulasi came after him, armless, yet with such grasp in her voice that no body seemed more complete. Panidubbi arrived carrying the smell of the pond. The Rakshas gave off light, but it was not fire; it was a glow rising from inside bone. The Loths, who usually sat as spectators, stood up this time along the edge of the court.

Then the dead began to arrive. Nand Aruni, Sarayu, the workers whose names had never been written in full in any register, Ujjwal Jha, the young men trapped in debt inside screens, the women whose names vanished into the darkness of the flesh market, the patients reduced to nothing while paying the price of breath, the labourers who died inside hospital bills - all of them. They did not form a crowd of the dead; they formed a line of names. Each name carried breath in place of a body.

On the other side of the court came the children: Ananya; the children of the Coconut-Leaf School; boys and girls who had travelled with Devika learning to recognise screen fraud; adolescents who had heard Mira's oath of privacy; students who had learned from Ira how to ask questions on distant stages. They carried no notebooks, only coconut leaves. They had come to play, but there was a lesson inside their game and a game inside the lesson.

The third side arrived late. They did not come in bodies. Their bodies remained where they were - in costly city houses, in glass homes across the sea, in locked rooms, in cars with black windows. Only their minds came to Channa Grove. Batuknath Hariharan's mind came first - sleek, smelling of paper, tinted with the red of seals. Behind it came Chandrapal Batra's mind, burning with the blue glow of screens. Then Raghav Signal's mind - half-written, half-erased, made of the smoke of disappearing messages. From very far away came Lau Kin-Hung's mind, like a cold coin of calculation. And Edward Broom's mind, wrapped in the soft cloth of civilised applause but wet with mud inside.

The children were not afraid of them. The dead remained silent. The ghosts took their places. Budhba Ghost made no announcement; Channa Grove does not announce, it only changes its breathing. When the breath changed, the game began.

The first breath belonged to the dead. Sarayu entered the court. She did not chant kabaddi. She chanted her own name: 'Sarayuu... Sarayuu... Sarayuu...' Each repetition of the name made a small hollow in the earth. Batuknath's mind tried to touch her. But minds have no hands. It tried to say procedure, but what came from its mouth was 'procedure... procedure...' and Sarayu came safely out of the court. The dead did not laugh. The dead do not laugh easily, because time has never been cheap for them.

The second breath belonged to the children. Ananya entered the court. She called, 'Question... question... question...' Batuknath's mind stepped back. Chandrapal's mind tried to stop her: 'Open the app first; you will win a prize.' Ananya paused and asked, 'Is there debt behind the prize or not?' Chandrapal's blue glow began to flicker. A question was the first defence inside the game.

The third breath belonged to the rogues' minds. By the rules of the game, they too had to enter. Batuknath Hariharan's mind stepped into the court. He had expected to argue. But in Channa Grove argument is measured not in words but in breath. What came from his mouth was: 'Adjournment... adjournment... adjournment...' The children watched. So did the dead. The breath of adjournment is short; it cannot travel far. Batuknath became trapped in the middle of the court. He tried to come out, but at every step lay a name. Whenever he stepped upon one, he staggered.

Hulasi moved forward. 'Read the names,' she said. 'Then I will let you out.' Batuknath's mind began to read. It read the first name halfway. It stumbled on the second. At the third, its polished form began to crack. It emerged from the court, but not with the posture of victory; it was panting. For the first time in the game it understood that the language of law, however long, shortens the breath when it refuses to carry names.

Chandrapal Batra's mind entered next. It was very fast, flashing like a mobile screen, slipping from one place to another. Among the children it scattered tiny flashes: 'First win free', 'Double', 'Earn in three minutes', 'Be afraid, the police are coming', 'Send the OTP', 'Open an account'. For a moment the children paused. Then Devika's voice travelled from the school: 'Ask the name of whoever frightens you. Stop whoever rushes you. When someone offers a prize, ask where the loss is.'

A child who until yesterday trembled at fraudulent calls entered the court, surrounded Chandrapal's mind, and asked, 'Who is your real owner?' Chandrapal's mind flashed. 'I am my own owner.' The child asked again, 'Then why did messages come from Hong Kong?' The question climbed into the leaves of the tree. All the leaves rang at once. A crack appeared in Chandrapal's screen-glow.

He fled out of the court, but an account remained caught behind him - Munna Paswan's account. It had been called a mule account. But in Channa Grove the account did not stand as a mule; it stood in the body of a human being. Munna said, 'My name is not Mule. I am Munna.' For the first time Chandrapal's mind was wounded by its own vocabulary. Crime's greatest armour is to call a human being an object; when the object becomes a name again, the armour cracks.

Raghav Signal's mind tried to disappear even as it entered the court. That was its habit - five seconds, ten seconds, message erased. But in Channa Grove what is spoken does not vanish; it becomes a leaf. Raghav drew breath: 'Erase... erase... erase...' Yet with every breath a leaf fell, bearing the imprint of messages he had sent to others.

Mira entered the court. Standing before Raghav, she said, 'Whoever frightens someone with a photograph steals their shadow. A shadow belongs to the body.' Raghav tried to say, 'I only delivered things.' Mira answered, 'The hand that delivers poison is written into the history of the poison too.'

Raghav's mind retreated. Its erasing breath was spent. It sat in the middle of the court and became silence. Silence had been following him long before this chapter received its name; now silence became his mouth.

Across the distant sea, Lau Kin-Hung's mind stood at the edge of the court. It did not want to enter. It believed distance was safety. But in Garh Narikel distance obeys a different law. Whose money moves from far away, that person's mind too is bound from far away. The line of Channa Grove lengthened across sea, harbour, glass house, bank, ledger, everything, and reached his feet.

The breath of Lau Kin-Hung's mind was very cold. It chanted, 'Percentage... percentage... percentage...' The dead stood still. The children stood still. The ghosts stood still. The language of percentages contains no compassion, but neither does it contain fear. He moved through the game, calculating at every step: risk, profit, loss, escape. Then Nand Aruni entered the court carrying the bridge plan. Upon the plan were not piers but names.

Nand asked him, 'How many piers are there in your calculation?'

Lau was silent.

Nand asked again, 'How many bones?'

The breath of percentages trembled. The language of profit does not count bones; when it is forced to, the mathematics of profit breaks apart. For one moment Lau Kin-Hung's mind became very small - so small that a Loth child could have lifted it onto a palm. The Loths, always spectators until now, laughed. Their laughter was light as ash from a cooking fire.

Edward Broom's mind entered last. It was civilised; first it bowed outside the boundary, then stepped in. Its breath was: 'Dignity... dignity... dignity...' The word was beautiful. The children were impressed. Even the ghosts fell silent for a moment. Beautiful words are not always dangerous, but when a beautiful word comes out of an account built on falsehood, it smells like a flower rotting in water.

Ira entered the court. She had left the Harvard auditorium and come into this game. She did not question Broom's mind in English; she asked in Maithili: 'In whose language do you speak dignity?' Broom's mind searched for translation. No interpreter could be found in Channa Grove. Ira asked again: 'How can you lecture on the dignity of someone whose name you cannot pronounce?'

The soft covering of applause fell away from Broom. Inside was mud. Stuck in the mud were hospital bills, safety certificates, research grants, weapons advice, vaccine contracts, and photographs of the bridge. He tried to say 'global responsibility', but what came from his mouth was 'profit'. With that single word, his whole speech lost the match.

The kabaddi continued. Time no longer remained separate inside the game; day, night, year, verdict, defeat, victory - all were tied into one breath. The dead chanted names, the children chanted questions, and the rogues' minds chanted their old words: procedure, percentage, adjournment, earnings, dignity, defence. The smaller words ran out of breath. The names endured.

Then something strange happened. The rogues' minds wanted to leave, but the children did not stop them. Neither did the dead. The rule of the game was this: whoever wished to leave could go, provided he left one word behind. Batuknath left 'procedure'. Chandrapal left 'account'. Raghav left 'message'. Lau left 'share'. Broom left 'dignity'.

They thought: we have escaped. But when they emerged, they saw that the meanings of the words left inside Channa Grove were changing. Procedure became the order in which names were read. An account became a human biography. A message became a warning. A share became responsibility. Dignity became not a speech but the pronunciation of a name. The rogues left after losing their words. A person does not die at once when his weapons are lost, but his gait changes.

Toward dawn water descended into Channa Grove. There was no river, yet there was water; it carried the smell of earth, as though some ancient rain hidden inside the ground had returned. The kabaddi court floated in the water. The children kept playing with their feet inside it. The dead did not withdraw; they remained not at the edge but in the memory of the game. The ghosts climbed back onto their branches, but their eyes looked less tired that day.

Ananya asked, 'Is the game over?'

Budhba Ghost said, 'Kabaddi does not end. The breath changes.'

'Then whose breath comes next?'

Hulasi said, 'Whoever has learned to ask a question.'

A coconut leaf fell. There was no verdict upon it, no order, no final sentence. Only four words: 'Let it begin again.' The children picked up the leaf. Aruni stood at a distance watching. He understood that a book can be closed, but a story cannot.

Far away, in cities, across the sea, in glass houses and locked chambers, the rogues woke at dawn. They did not remember going to the game during the night, but the taste of their old words was gone from their mouths. Batuknath tried to say 'procedure' and heard 'reading names'. Chandrapal said 'account' and saw Munna's face. Raghav wrote 'message' and a leaf fell. Lau calculated a 'share' and death asked a question. Broom read 'dignity' and a worker's name caught in his pronunciation.

No one in Garh Narikel celebrated a victory day. No flag of triumph was raised. There was no lament for defeat. The children went to school. Devika wrote on a new board: 'Question whoever frightens you.' Mira wrote: 'Name whoever steals a shadow.' Saumya wrote: 'When paper enters the people's language, it belongs to the people.' Ira wrote: 'Learn the names at home before speaking from distant stages.' Gop Kumar quietly opened a new file bearing no title, only a date.

By evening darkness descended again into Channa Grove. The ghosts peered down from the branches. The children returned home. The Loths rolled in circles over the ground and settled into their places. Panidubbi returned to the pond, but today her long hair caught no one's feet; it began writing names upon the water. The Rakshas dimmed their glow.

Then, from very far away, as though some new reader had opened the first page, came a low voice: 'Kabaddi...'

A second voice: 'Name...'

A third voice: 'Question...'

And Channa Grove drew its next breath. The story did not stop there. Crocodiles eat bodies, courts eat years, screens eat minds; but when the mind hangs suspended, the story begins again. That night kabaddi did not end - only the next breath was taken.

FOLK SONG: THE THIRD ROUND

Folk tune: Kabaddi melody

It has risen - the voice of the third round has risen;

No flag of victory, no defeat - the question has become power.

The first voice was kabaddi, the second was name;

The third voice, question, rose in the abode of Channa Grove.

The leaf said: begin again; this is not the final word;

A book may close, but the story does not.

When Batuknath says procedure, he hears the reading of names;

When Batra says account, he sees Munna's eyes.

When Broom reads dignity, his tongue catches on a worker's name;

Panidubbi's hair writes letters upon the water.

No flag of victory, no lament of defeat;

In the third kabaddi, the question became power.

Panidubbi's hair wrote letters upon the water.

CHAPTER 33

The Test of the Mind

When the body tires, it sits down; when the mind tires, it drags its owner along.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: REFORM THROUGH THE MIRROR

Folk tune: mind-jhumar

Look into the mirror; do not look in fear,

With a compassionate gaze, read the lines of your own deeds.

*Know the mirror not only as punishment, but as a friend of truth;
See your deeds as you see your face, and choose your errors clearly.*

*One may escape from prison, but not from one's own gaze;
Yet if that gaze is compassionate, reform is not impossible.*

*Before the mirror make a vow: from today I shall walk differently;
The right I took away, I shall return through justice.*

*When reform through the mirror enters conduct,
The shadow of crime recedes and humanity grows again.*

*To the beat of the jhumar, sweep every corner of the mind;
Whatever letter was written crooked, write it straight again.*

*Make a list of stolen rights and set out to return them;
When the mirror becomes a friend, walk beside reform.*

The next breath had been drawn. In Channa Grove the first breath of the third kabaddi match had ended, but the game had not. Only when a breath breaks do the true rules of the game reveal themselves. The dead had spoken their names. The children had saved their laughter. What remained now were the minds of those who stood in the outer world holding papers of victory, yet in the inner world were afraid even to breathe.

In the ghosts' kabaddi it is the mind, more than the body, that is tested. When the body tires, it sits down. When the mind tires, it drags its owner along. Batuknath Hariharan's mind stood apart from his body in the middle of Channa Grove. Chandrapal Batra's mind had the shape of his glittering phone. Raghav Signal's mind hung from the leaves in drops of invisible messages. Lau Kin-Hung's mind was soaked in the salt water of the sea, yet he could smell the soil of Garh Narikel. Edward Broom's mind was caught inside the sound of applause, into which, now and then, the splash at the Ganga bridge entered.

The children formed a circle. Ananya stood in the middle. She no longer looked like a little girl. In her eyes was the same question someone had once asked on seeing a photograph of death—has he died? But today the question was not directed at any photograph. It was directed at the minds of the living rogues.

Ananya said, "If you play kabaddi, you must take a name. Whoever does not take a name, that breath will not be counted."

Budhba Ghost spread his dark radiance. "Under the old rule," he said, "a player who was caught went out. Under the new rule, whoever has cut away a name cannot leave without speaking that name."

Batuknath's mind laughed first. The mind of a man of law does not laugh; it counts sections. He began counting—procedure, suit, objection, admissibility, jurisdiction. But just as he tried to say "jurisdiction," what came from his mouth was, "Sarayu Devi."

He started. Sarayu Devi was the woman labourer whose name had never appeared in the official list. He had never known her personally. Yet the name that had been cut from the file had now come onto his tongue. Batuknath tried again—"My Lord..." But what came out was, "Lakhan Paswan."

The ghosts in Channa Grove began to sway slowly. They did not clap; they moved the leaves. So many names lived in that rustling that even the wind would have tired of counting them.

Chandrapal Batra tried to cover his screen-shaped mind with his palm. He believed that whatever was on a screen lay under his control. But the playing field opened upon the screen. On one side were the children, on another the dead, and on a third the young men whose mule accounts he had used. Ujjwal Jha, Munna Paswan, the nameless student who had opened an account for a commission of one thousand rupees and become trapped in a crime of three lakhs—all of them now shone not on the screen but inside Chandrapal's eyes.

Chandrapal tried to say, "All this is sentimentality." But what emerged from his mouth was, "The first win was not free."

The children did not laugh. They already knew that. The crocodile of the screen gives a win first and then eats the house. Devika stood at a distance. She did not need to jump into this game. All day in the school she had already taught the children this lesson. The defeated were no longer opponents in this game. They were making the rules.

Raghav Signal's mind was caught in the shadow of the leaves. All the messages that once vanished became tiny Devanagari letters and flew around him. "Open an account." "No voice." "Send the percentage." "Empty it within six hours." "Frighten the mother." "Repeat the digital-arrest script." The leaves bearing these words circled around him.

For the first time Raghav fell silent. His profession was not voice but advice; not advice but signal; not signal but invisible command. Yet in Channa Grove invisibility did not protect a crime. What was invisible was clearest of all to the ghosts.

Inside himself he called to Lau Kin-Hung. No answer came from anywhere. Only a leaf fell upon his shoulder. Written on it were the words: "Use completed."

Raghav understood: while he had been turning others into mules, he himself had been the mule of a larger account. His master had abandoned him. This was not mercy in the Court of Channa Grove, but knowledge. And knowledge can sometimes hurt more than punishment.

Lau Kin-Hung's mind had come from inside the sea. He knew no Maithili, but no language was needed to understand the language of names. He saw that behind every name was a house, behind every house a threshold, behind every threshold a pair of sandals, and behind every pair of sandals an unfinished journey. He had understood India as a market. For the first time he saw India as a threshold that waits.

His mind did not want to enter the game. But in kabaddi, whoever takes a breath cannot remain outside the field. "Percentage" came from his mouth. The ghosts stood still. Then came, "Value of life." The children stood still. At last one name emerged from him: "Ujjwal."

At the sound of Ujjwal's name, the darkness of the screen grew a little brighter. Ujjwal himself did not come. His spirit was no longer bound to this game; whenever children learned to recognise fraud in Devika's school, his release grew greater. A name was becoming not punishment but a road.

Edward Broom's mind was strangest of all. It was a hollow vessel made from the applause of auditoriums. When it rang, people clapped; when it fell silent, there was a splash inside it. In Channa Grove the sound of his applause was defeated by the rustling leaves. He said, "Human dignity."

Budhba Ghost laughed. "Dignity? In what language? Say it in the language of the labourer whose body went into the bridge pier."

Edward's mind could not answer. He knew neither Hindi, nor Maithili, nor the labourers' song. He knew only presentations. Then Channa Grove translated his language itself. His word "dignity" climbed onto a leaf and became "price." Then "price" broke and became "name."

The children said together, "Name first. Price later."

This was the fourth breath of the game. In this breath no one was caught and no one was defeated. In Channa Grove the meaning of defeat had changed. Whoever was caught was not thrown out; he was taught to read a name. Whoever could read the name became a little more human. Whoever could not remained empty inside, though he still possessed position, money, passport, and applause.

Batuknath Hariharan's mind grew tired. He said, "I know procedure."

Ananya replied, "Procedure is not breath. A name is breath."

"I am president of the Bar."

“That is a chair in the outer world. Here you are only the man who cut away names.”

For the first time Batuknath asked, “And if I read the names?”

Budhba Ghost said, “Then your victory will hurt, but there will be a little water in the hurt. A victory without sorrow rots.”

Chandrapal Batra trembled on hearing this. He did not want sorrow. He wanted only safety. Yet safety comes only to the person who accepts something inwardly. The criminal wants safety, not acceptance. That is why his safety is never complete.

He looked into his screen. Earlier it had shown figures of victory; now it showed the children’s school. Devika was explaining to an elderly woman, “If someone on the phone tells you that you are under arrest, first drink some water, then call a neighbour. Fear eats the person who is alone.”

Chandrapal switched off the screen. But the voice did not stop. The old woman could still be heard saying, “Fear eats the person who is alone.”

Raghav tried to brush away the leaves. They would not move. Every leaf stuck to his palm. He understood that Channa Grove was not building a prison for him; it was giving him a mirror. A person can escape from prison. Escaping from a mirror is harder.

Lau Kin-Hung’s mind tried to draw back. The sea called him home. But the soil of Garh Narikel held his heel. For the first time he heard the Kamala-Balan flowing somewhere far away. He understood that knowing the name of a river is also a responsibility. Whoever buys its water without knowing the river’s name buys the curse of the water as well.

Night deepened. The Court of Channa Grove turned into a game, the game into a school, the school into memory. The dead stepped back. The children remained in the middle. The minds of the rogues sat at the edge. For the first time they were spectators. The loths, who had always been spectators, were now running in the game.

This reversal was the justice of Garh Narikel. Bring into the game the one who has always watched. Make the one who has always played the game of crime sit down and watch.

Ananya announced the final rule. “Until the next breath, each of you must find one name of your own. Take a name you cut away and pronounce it in full. Whoever can pronounce it will enter the field. Whoever cannot will remain at the edge, stroking his paper of victory.”

Batuknath, Chandrapal, Raghav, Lau Kin-Hung, Edward—the five minds were silent. Their bodies were in their own cities outside, but inwardly they sat on the veranda of Channa Grove. Far away Devika, Meera, Saumya, Ira, Gop Kumar and Aruni were holding no meeting of revenge. Each was busy with work. It was this busyness that frightened the rogues most.

For in a fight the enemy remains before you. In the building of the future, the enemy becomes irrelevant.

In the first light of dawn a leaf shone over Channa Grove. No judgment was written upon it. Only this: "Fourth breath ended. Next breath begins."

And at that moment the novel moved forward again.

FOLK SONG: THE PUNISHMENT OF THE MIRROR

Folk tune: mind-viraha

*Run, run if you will—but do not run from the mirror;
The name you cut away returns upon your tongue.
One may escape from prison, but not from the mirror;
The name you cut away keeps returning to your tongue.
Whoever played the game of crime now sits at the edge;
Whoever had always watched has entered the field and run.
The child says: pronounce one name in full,
Or sit stroking your paper of victory and lose.
The victims are busy at work; the rogues have become irrelevant;
This silence has grown fiercer than a sword.
No judgment was written, only "next breath";
In the mirror's punishment the mind's true vessel opened.
Whoever played the game of crime now sits to one side;
Whoever had always watched has entered the field.*

CHAPTER 34

The Listening River

A river stops its current to hear who is lying upon the bank.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE RIVER'S EARS

Folk tune: a bright form of the boatman-Sama-Daun

*Listen like the river; hold back the current and listen,
Bend your ear even to the faint call from far away.*

*The river stills its current and hears each name upon the banks;
Beyond the noise of lies it catches the note of truth.
Make our ears patient like the river too;
Receive the weak voice and the distant call with respect.*

*The river hears a name, yet does not impose a verdict;
It listens, then joins truth with soil, leaves and people.
Learn from the river's ears—the art of listening deep;
To give a heard name its rightful place is labour for justice.*

*Above the surface lies the noise of falsehood; beneath it, truth has a voice;
Go deep and listen—only then will the real news be found.
Do not impose after hearing; weigh it with soil and leaves;
Give the name you heard its proper ghat, its proper seat.*

The silence that spread after the fourth breath was not peace. It was the kind of silence in which a river holds back its current to hear who is lying on the bank. All night the leaves of Channa Grove made no sound, yet from their tips hung not dew but letters. Every letter was half of a name. To complete it, the rogues would have to open their own tongues.

Dawn had come in the outer world. There was no hand-pump in Batuknath Hariharan's Delhi mansion, yet that morning muddy water flowed from the tap in his bathroom. The servant ran at the sight of it. Batuknath snapped, "Have the tank cleaned." But when he took the water in his palm, a name shone there—Sarayu Devi. The name floated for a moment in the water, then entered his palm.

Impatiently he opened his copy of the judgment. The court's order was clear, lawful, victorious. Yet on the first page, where "Case disposed of" should have been written, stood the words: "Name incomplete." Batuknath removed his spectacles and wiped them. The letters remained. He understood that his eyes were not at fault; the judgment was.

At that hour Chandrapal Batra was opening the safe in his room. It held cash, seals, papers of foreign accounts, and several small mobile devices—the devices with which he had trapped some people, frightened others, driven still others to the edge of death. Today all of them were dark. Only one lit up. On it appeared: "Tell the mother's name of the person whose name is on the account."

Chandrapal laughed. His laughter was an old habit. "Who asks for a mother's name at a bank?" he said. At once a child's sobbing came from inside the safe. It was not loud. It was the kind of crying done at night with one's face pressed into a pillow so that the household will not hear. Chandrapal tried to shut the door, but the safe opened from within.

There was no mud in Raghav Signal Somani's house, no safe sprang open. His punishment was his silence. After dawn he tried to speak, but no voice came. To send a message to the doctor he opened an encrypted chat. His fingers moved across the screen, but the letters formed themselves in Maithili: "What you said by signal, read now from the leaves."

For the first time he was afraid. A criminal fears the police, the court a little, the master more—but most of all the moment when language changes. Raghav knew no Maithili. Yet as the letters of the leaves sprouted across his screen, he began to understand them. The language of crime is the same in every country; so is the language of fear.

In Hong Kong, Lau Kin-Hung woke on the nineteenth floor of his glass tower. Below him the sea was blue; the city glittered with the commerce of the approaching day. He called his private assistant. The assistant did not come. The internet bell did not ring. For the first time an order of his hung in the air. A coconut leaf lay on his desk. How had it come there? The windows of the glass tower did not open.

Written on the leaf in Devanagari were the words: "Name the first death in your profit." Lau could not read the letters. But a voice inside him read them aloud. It was not the voice of the sea, but the splash at the Ganga bridge. He ordered the leaf burned at once. Fire would not take it. Water dripped from its tip.

Edward Broom was then reviewing a draft of his next speech. Its subject was global responsibility and the ethical future of new markets. His assistant had written, "India's labour force is the backbone of global construction." With a red pen Edward tried to strike out "labour force" and write "human capital." From the pen came not ink but water. On the paper a word formed: "Labourer."

From four directions five minds were being drawn toward Channa Grove. Their bodies remained in their cities, but the human being inside each body who thought himself its master now had his reins in the hands of names. In Garh Narikel the children were already awake. Ananya chose the first leaf. Devika did not dry it. "Let the name remain wet," she said. "Only then does it remain alive."

Today's lesson in the Coconut-Leaf School was: "Do not speak an incomplete name." The children sat in a circle, each holding a pebble with half a name written on it. They had to find the other half from elders, labourers' families, river songs, or old registers. It was not a game but practice. Yet in Garh Narikel the distance between practice and play was the same as the distance between body and shadow—at evening, one entered the other.

Devika said, “When a swindler frightens you, he will not speak your full name. He will call you customer, accused, consumer, account-holder, user. First speak your own full name. Then ask his. Do not obey the order of anyone who cannot give his own name.”

The children repeated together, “Do not obey the order of anyone who cannot give his own name.”

The vibration of that sentence travelled as far as Delhi. In Batuknath’s chamber the law books opened themselves. Constitutional law, criminal law, law of evidence—the pages turned. On each page appeared not sections but names. He flared up. “These are no longer law books!” A voice from within answered, “If law does not preserve names, it is not a book but a curtain.”

Batuknath returned to his past. He was a student of law again. Once his teacher had told him, “A lawyer is not one who proves a lie true; a lawyer is one who makes sure truth is not killed by procedure.” Batuknath had abandoned that sentence many years ago. Today it grew wings and sat upon his desk.

In anger he summoned his secretary. “Bring me the Garh Narikel file.” The secretary trembled. “Sir, that file...” “What?” “It is no longer a file. It contains pictures of children learning names.” Batuknath understood that the paper outside had turned into leaves inside.

Chandrapal Batra thought in the language of crime: all this was a technical fault. Clean the server, change the accounts, cut the links, open a new app. He sent his men a message: “Empty all old accounts.” The reply came: “There is no money in the accounts. There are names.”

He opened the ledger. Where crores should have appeared, there unfolded details of homes—the mat spread in Ujjwal Jha’s house, the old chest belonging to Devika’s mother, the torn shirt of Munna Paswan’s father, the school certificate of the student who had received five hundred rupees at a bus stand for allowing his account to be used as a mule. For the first time Chandrapal saw that an account was not merely a number; behind every number was a body.

But seeing is not accepting. He closed his eyes. At once his mind rose inside Channa Grove and stood in the kabaddi circle. The children looked at him. Ananya asked, “First name?” Chandrapal’s mouth went dry. He remembered Ujjwal, but could not say the full name. He knew only the word “user.” The children turned their backs on him. That was the punishment: disregard.

Raghav fought his silence and tried to write on paper. Instead of names, codes kept coming from his hand: L1, P7, 05. He realised that his hand too had learned the script of crime. It no longer knew how to write a name. He tore the paper. The pieces became leaves and flew out through the window.

Those leaves reached Garh Narikel and fell into the children's laps. The children joined the pieces and began to read them. Devika said, "This is the language of fraud. Turn it into the people's language." The children began turning codes into names. L1 became Lalit. P7 became Paswan. 05 became five nameless accounts. The school was translating the language made by criminals.

A meeting was held in Lau Kin-Hung's glass tower. Lawyers, accountants, risk advisers and image managers all came. "Emotional stories work in India," they told him. "Give it time; the matter will settle down." Lau hid the leaf beneath the table. But its smell spread through the meeting. No one recognised it. Lau did—the soil of Garh Narikel.

He asked, "And if the story does not settle?" One adviser laughed. "Stories get tired." Lau did not answer. He remembered his dream of the night before. In Channa Grove a story does not tire. It changes its breath.

Edward Broom tore up his draft. A new one began: "Rebuilding trust in the countries of the Global South." But at the top of the page appeared by itself: "How will you return trust to the one whose name you cut away?" Edward's entire educated language became small before that one question.

In Garh Narikel, Budhba Ghost listened to the children's lesson. "This time the game requires greater cunning," he said. "The rogues will speak names, but keep their self-interest inside the names. Do not merely hear a name; test its warmth as well."

Ananya asked, "The warmth of a name?"

Budhba Ghost replied, "A name spoken with love gives off steam like hot rice. A name spoken only to save oneself lies like cold iron. Channa Grove knows both warmth and cold."

That night the five minds came again to the field. This time they were seated not outside the circle but within it. An empty earthen bowl stood in the centre. Ananya said, "When you speak a name, one drop of water will fall into this bowl. If the name is true, the water will remain. If the name is false, the water will turn to smoke and fly away."

Batuknath stepped forward first. His voice broke. "Sarayu..." A drop fell into the bowl. "Devi..." A second drop fell. He stopped. He knew nothing of Sarayu Devi's father, village, death, labour or body. The water trembled. Smoke began to rise. He panicked.

From a distance Devika's voice came: "No incomplete names." Slowly Batuknath said, "Sarayu Devi, who climbed the bridge pier with a basket on her head and was recorded as absent from the list.” The water did not turn to smoke. It remained in the bowl. Sweat appeared on Batuknath’s brow. This was not victory; it was the first wound.

Then came Chandrapal’s turn. He was silent for a long time. At last he said, “Ujjwal Jha.” A drop fell, then instantly became smoke. Ananya said, “You learned that name from the news. Tell us his fear.” Chandrapal was silent. He remembered only the amount, not the fear. The bowl dried. The children sent him back to the edge.

Raghav tried to write, “Munna Paswan.” Water fell. Then he remembered that he had regarded Munna only as an account number. He said, “Munna Paswan, whose account I opened and thereby made him look like a criminal, though the crime was not his.” The water remained. The first crack appeared in Raghav’s silence.

Lau Kin-Hung’s turn came. He did not know Devanagari. He could not speak the name. Yet in his mind the threshold of a house shone. “The boy...” he said. The children were silent. Budhba Ghost said, “Not the language of the market.” Lau trembled. After a long while, in crooked pronunciation, he managed, “Ujjwal.” A drop fell into the bowl but became smoke, because he still understood Ujjwal not as a human being but as an event.

Edward Broom stepped forward. “Labour,” he said. The bowl stayed dry. “Worker.” Dry. “Sarayu.” A drop fell. “Devi.” The drop remained. Edward’s eyes did not fill; his education would not break that quickly. But for the first time, the applause inside his speeches stopped.

Dawn was approaching in Channa Grove. There were five drops of water in the bowl. Each held a different temperature. Sarayu Devi’s drop was warm. Munna Paswan’s trembled. Ujjwal’s had already turned to smoke twice and was waiting for a third attempt.

Budhba Ghost said, “The fifth breath is not complete; it has only begun. The one who has spoken a single name is not free. Now he must travel to the home of that name.”

In the outer world all five bodies awoke. Batuknath bought a ticket—to Garh Narikel. Chandrapal thought of smashing his phone, but Ananya’s voice came from inside it: “Breaking the phone does not break the name.” For the first time Raghav sat down to form Devanagari letters on paper. Lau Kin-Hung ordered a map of India. Edward Broom did not cancel his speech; he changed its opening—but he still had not found the whole truth.

In the Coconut-Leaf School the children poured the bowl’s water onto the roots of Channa Grove. The roots drank it. The leaves moved. Their movement contained a sentence: “Speaking the name is the first breath. Reaching the name’s home is the second.”

And the story of Garh Narikel moved forward again, carrying the fifth breath.

FOLK SONG: THE RIVER HEARS NAMES

Folk tune: boatman-Sama-Daun

*Listen—the river stills its current and listens;
A drop bearing a true name remains within the bowl.
The river checks its current and hears who lies upon the bank;
Half a name rests on the leaf; the tongue must make it whole.
A false name turns to smoke and flies into the sky.
A name spoken with love steams like hot rice;
A name spoken merely to save oneself bears the mark of cold iron.
The first breath is to speak the name; the second is to reach its home;
Rub the dust of the dead one's threshold into your eyes.
The roots silently drank the water from the bowl;
The listening river said: now go to the home of the name.*

CHAPTER 35

The Threshold of Names

Speaking the name is the first breath; reaching the name's home is the second.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: BLESSING FROM THE DUST OF THE THRESHOLD

Folk tune: homecoming song

Dust of the threshold, place it upon the brow,

Fill a new house with the blessing of the broken one.

*Though the house falls, the threshold saves its dust;
It knows the returning feet and tells the ancestors' tale.*

Place the dust upon your brow and say: let the honour of the house remain;

New walls will rise, a new roof too, while the old affection flows.

The threshold is not only memory; it is the root of rebuilding;

Plant in that dust a small flower of trust.

From the dust of the threshold, blessing will come to the new house;

Even broken bricks, joined together, will give a safer future.

The wall fell, the roof flew away, but the threshold remained standing;

The marks of ancestral feet still glitter in that dust.

Mark the forehead with that dust and join the foundation stones;

From the meeting of broken and mended, build a new dawn.

After the fifth breath, the five drops of water poured at the roots of Channa Grove did not disappear into the earth. They moved within the roots like children's laughter circling through an old house. In the first light of dawn their shine appeared upon the leaves. Within each drop was a threshold. Speaking the name was the first breath; reaching the name's home was the second.

That morning Ananya drew a circle in the soil. Around it five small houses were made—Saryu Devi's house, Munna Paswan's house, Ujjwal's house, the houses of the unknown labourers, and the house whose owner had not yet found a name. The children sat in the circle. Devika said, "If we do not know the house, the name will remain half. And a half-name can again be used by rogues."

Batuknath Hariharan left Delhi. He wanted to travel by car, but the car stopped three times. The driver said, "Sir, the engine is fine, but it refuses the direction." In the end Batuknath had to take the train. The destination printed on the ticket was Darbhanga. But when the ticket warmed in his palm, the letters changed to: "Saryu Devi's threshold."

In anger he crumpled the ticket in his fist. The paper did not fold. It breathed. He felt as though someone's chest were moving inside it. Beside him the old man appeared again—the same old man who had asked the name of law on his earlier journey. Batuknath turned away. The old man smiled. "Today we shall not read sections. Today we shall read courtyards."

“Why are you following me?” Batuknath snapped. Looking out of the window, Budhba Ghost said, “I am not following you. The names you left behind are walking ahead of you.”

Through the train window the fields no longer seemed to flee; instead they seemed to come toward the train. In every field stood a woman with a basket on her head. Batuknath closed his eyes. At once the image entered within. The woman was no longer outside; she stood inside his head. She neither questioned nor accused him. She merely showed him the road home.

Chandrapal Batra could not destroy the phone. He struck it with a hammer, threw it into water, set it on fire; every time the screen became a leaf of Channa Grove. He called his old men. “Bring new devices. Burn all the old ones.” New devices came. As soon as one screen opened, Ujjwal’s house appeared—its roof half sagging, Devika seated beside the hearth, and the bare patch on the wall where Ujjwal’s certificate used to hang.

For the first time Chandrapal saw a home. In the world of crime he did not see homes. He saw only KYC, accounts, SIM cards, transactions, collections, percentages. The sight of a house made him uneasy, as though a stranger had entered his room. But the stranger was not the house. The stranger was Chandrapal himself.

He moved a finger across the screen. The image changed. Now he saw Ujjwal’s bed. On the edge of the pillow were teeth marks. Devika had later said that Ujjwal used to bite the pillow to stop himself from crying. Chandrapal shut the screen. But the teeth marks had entered beneath his nails.

Raghav Signal Somani was learning his first Devanagari letter. On the paper before him was “M.” He thought of M for mule, but the letter trembled. There was no teacher. The leaves of Channa Grove themselves were teaching him. From the tip of a leaf came a voice: “M—Munna. Not mule. Munna.”

Raghav wrote again. The M came crooked. Then U. Then the doubled N. Then A. “Munna.” As the name formed, a small threshold emerged upon the paper. A torn shirt was drying there. He remembered telling the boy who wore it, “Just open the account. You’ll get five thousand.” The boy had laughed. Raghav had heard that laugh, but his accounts had no column for laughter.

In Hong Kong, Lau Kin-Hung opened a map of India. It had layers for cities, ports, trade routes, banking nodes and digital-consumer density. But when he opened a new layer, only thresholds lit up across the screen. So many thresholds. Millions. At each one, someone’s name remained incomplete. Irritated, he asked, “Where is the market map?” The screen answered: “This is the market.”

Experts sat in Lau's boardroom. One said, "Rural sensitivities can be managed through narrative management." Another said, "Buy respected intermediaries at the local level." A third said, "Religion, caste, elections, debt and employment—through these five routes everything will quiet down." Lau listened. Beneath the table he kept hearing water drip. He knew it was not the sea. It was the sound of the five drops in the bowl.

Edward Broom had changed the opening of his speech, but words still betrayed him. He wrote, "We learn from mistakes." On the paper appeared, "We profit from the dead." He started. His assistant said, "Sir, a printer problem." Edward knew it was not the printer. It was the language he had buried for years beneath CSR reports.

In Garh Narikel the children of the Coconut-Leaf School were making a "map of homes." There were no roads on it, only thresholds. Ananya said, "The road to Sarayu Devi's house is not merely the village road. Where did Sarayu Devi's daughter go? Where does her grandson work? In which register is her name written only halfway? All of those are roads."

Saumya fell silent at that. In research papers this is called "intergenerational family impact." But in Garh Narikel a child was saying it while drawing the line of a threshold. Saumya understood that knowledge which looks very complex in English becomes direct inside people's suffering.

Devika sat before Ujjwal's house. She wanted Chandrapal to see that house—not for revenge. For once a house has truly been seen, it becomes difficult to turn it into a number. Beneath Ujjwal's name on the wall she wrote: "Drowned in the screen, but his name remains upon the earth."

The shadow of that sentence reached Chandrapal's screen. He read it. At first he laughed. "Sentimentality." But the words "upon the earth" shone. His apps lived in the cloud, on servers, in foreign accounts. He had nothing upon the earth. Suddenly he remembered his childhood courtyard—the small room in Meerut where he had first studied law. He too had once been a name upon a threshold, not a percentage.

Raghav began searching for Munna Paswan's village address. In the system it was incomplete. The bank held only the district. The SIM carried a false location. The documents misspelled the place. For the first time Raghav understood that the poor are deliberately left with incomplete addresses, so criminals may use them and the State may abandon them. On a leaf he wrote: "Paswan Toli, south of the river, near the old peepal." The leaf grew warm. The direction was correct.

Batuknath's train stopped at a small station. Through the mist he could not read its name. He did not want to get down, but Budhba Ghost said, "Here." The platform was empty. Only the sound of a woman's anklets came from afar. Batuknath looked back. Outside the station ran a footpath. His shoes sank into the mud. He resented the shoes. The old man said, "Shoes do not reach a threshold. Feet do."

Sarayu Devi's house was no longer a house. Half a wall remained, the roof had changed, grass filled the courtyard. But the threshold survived. A threshold is a strange thing: even when the house falls, it preserves the memory of the house for a long time. Batuknath stood there. The copy of the order in his hand grew heavy. For the first time he could not place that paper upon the threshold.

An elderly woman came out. "Whom do you want?"

Batuknath's old habit rose to his mouth. "I am from the Bar Council..." Then he stopped. Budhba Ghost was nowhere to be seen. The woman waited. Batuknath said softly, "Was this Sarayu Devi's house?" She replied, "It was a house. Now it is a name. Why are you asking?"

The question was harder than any question in court. In court an answer can be manufactured. At a threshold an answer either emerges or catches in the throat. Batuknath's caught. He could have lied—research, compensation, an old file. But lies have short legs upon a threshold. He could only say, "I had read her incompletely."

The old woman did not invite him in. She lifted a handful of dust and placed it in his palm. "If you want to read her fully, put this dust in your eyes. Putting it on paper will do nothing."

Batuknath trembled. Dust in his eyes? All his life he had placed spectacles over his eyes, law over the spectacles, position over the law. The dust mocked all his protections. Yet his mind hung suspended. He touched the dust to the corner of his eyes. In an instant Sarayu Devi's last day opened before him—the basket on her head, the smell of cement, the gleam of water, the crocodile's mouth, and the blank space in the official list.

He sat down on the ground. This was not repentance; repentance takes time to arrive. It was only the beginning of seeing. The old woman did not give him water. She said, "Write what you saw."

Chandrapal did not reach Ujjwal's house. Yet Ujjwal's house had reached his phone, his nails, the teeth marks on the pillow. He told his men, "No pressure on Devika." They stared. "Sir?" "I said no." This was not compassion; it was fear. But fear can sometimes become the first barrier to violence. Channa Grove does not despise fear. It treats fear as raw clay from which regret may be shaped—if water reaches it.

Raghav had finished writing Munna Paswan's address. For the first time his paper held not a code but a complete sentence: "Munna Paswan is not a criminal; he is a young man who was used." As he wrote, his voice returned, very faintly. He said, "Munna." The sound broke, but it came out.

The electricity suddenly failed in Lau Kin-Hung's boardroom. Emergency lights came on. Thresholds glowed across the screen. The experts laughed. "A cyber prank." Lau did not laugh. He understood that to those who do not recognise thresholds, everything looks like a market. But the greater the number of thresholds, the weaker the market map becomes.

Edward Broom reached the Harvard auditorium. He held his speech in his hand, but as soon as he stood at the lectern, the screen showed not slides but five thresholds. The hall fell silent. He wanted to call it a technical fault. But beneath the first threshold was written: "Sarayu Devi." He read the name, mispronouncing it. No one in the auditorium understood its meaning, yet the name caught in his throat like a thorn.

At that moment the children in Garh Narikel were playing a game called "Tell the house." One child spoke a name; the second told something about the person's home; the third named the fear; the fourth, the dream. If those three things could not be found, the name was still considered incomplete. This was the new rule of Channa Grove.

Ananya said, "A name is not complete merely because it is spoken. It has a home, a fear, a dream—all three."

Budhba Ghost moved the leaves. "This is the sixth breath."

That night the five minds again appeared in Channa Grove. This time there was no bowl in the field, but five thresholds. Each was made of earth, yet the moment a person placed a foot upon one, he felt the weight of the falsehood he had seen. Batuknath stepped onto Sarayu Devi's threshold. It did not move. The old woman's dust was still in his hand.

Chandrapal tried to step onto Ujjwal's threshold, but it moved away. Ananya said, "You have not seen his home. You have only seen a screen." Chandrapal growled, "I will reach the house." The children replied, "Reach it. But not carrying a threat."

Raghav stepped onto Munna Paswan's threshold. It trembled, but did not flee. A voice came to him: "Complete the address." Raghav said, "Paswan Toli, south of the river, near the old peepal." The threshold became still.

Millions of thresholds rose before Lau Kin-Hung. He could not place his foot on a single one. He was the owner of a market, not a guest at a threshold. For the first time he began to understand the word "permission."

Edward Broom stood before Sarayu Devi's threshold. "I am sorry," he said. The threshold was silent. Budhba Ghost said, "Do not speak sorrow in your own language. Speak it in the language of the victim's name." Edward fell silent. His education was long, but the language of names was short. He stood at the beginning of learning.

Dawn came. The sixth breath did not end; it scattered in five directions as dust upon the feet. In Garh Narikel the children sprinkled water over the thresholds. Devika said, "Now, when someone gives a name, we will ask for the home. When someone gives the home, we will ask for the fear. When someone gives the fear, we will ask for the dream. Only then will justice breathe."

All the leaves of Channa Grove moved together. Their movement carried not kabaddi but the sound of a school. The story moved forward—because a name does not tire until it reaches home.

FOLK SONG: DUST OF THE THRESHOLD

Folk tune: homecoming song

*The name has reached, has reached the threshold;
 Only then call it justice—Ba said only this much.
 The house fell, but the threshold held the memory;
 The incomplete address remained the fate of the poor.
 Speaking the name is the first breath; reaching home the second;
 Not shoes but bare feet understand what dust can do.
 Lau saw a million thresholds, yet could not become a guest;
 For the first time the word permission awoke within him.
 Foreign sorrow spoken in one's own language came to nothing;
 Open the door of forgiveness in the language of the victim's name.
 Ask the home, ask the fear, then learn the dream;
 Only when the name reaches its threshold should justice be believed.
 The house broke, but the threshold stood holding memory;
 Lau saw a million thresholds, yet could not become a guest.*

CHAPTER 36

Home, Fear, Dream

Among the three circles—home, fear and dream—only the truth that remained standing survived the game.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THREE PEBBLES—HOME, COURAGE, DREAM

Folk tune: children's jhumar

Rattle them, child, rattle the pebbles in your pocket;

Home, courage, dream—repeat all three names.

Three pebbles in the pocket, and the child gives them names:

One for home, one for courage, one filled with dream.

When fear comes, hold courage; when far away, hold home;

When you grow tired, the dream will say: the road still lives ahead.

These little pebbles are no game, but great marks of memory;

Through a child's simple device the mind finds its identity.

Three pebbles, three truths, light within the pocket;

With home, courage and dream, no one is helpless.

The first pebble says: however far, home is near;

The second says: take another step, and fear falls behind;

The third hums the dream: the road is not yet finished;

When all three rattle together, the mind is no longer alone.

When the name reached home, the seventh breath of the game in Channa Grove began. For six breaths the name had searched for its threshold; in the seventh, the darkness inside that threshold, the smell of rice, the thorn of fear and the dimmed lamp of dream slowly began to open.

At dawn the village children gathered beside Channa Grove. Beneath the shade of the leaves they were no longer playing but writing rules. Ananya drew three circles in the earth—home, fear, dream. In the centre of each she placed a pebble. The pebbles were small, but Budhba Ghost said, “There is no court greater than these three pebbles.”

Sarayu Devi's threshold spoke first. Within it were smoke, half-cooked rice, and a child who had fallen asleep after waiting all night for his mother. Batuknath Hariharan saw the scene and tried at once to turn his eyes away. But in Channa Grove, turning one's eyes away is also accepted as testimony. The leaves rustled: “Look.”

Batuknath saw Sarayu Devi climb the bridge with a basket on her head. No safety belt, no boat, no one recording her name. She fell. The sound of the splash rose. On the official paper the next line was written: “Female labourer not present.”

Batuknath summoned the lawyer inside himself. The inner lawyer said, “Where is the evidence?” At once ash flew from the stove at Sarayu Devi's threshold and settled upon his brow. In the ash appeared the word “Waiting.” Budhba Ghost said, “Evidence is not only what remains in a file. Evidence is also that a child could not eat even after the rice had gone cold.”

Chandrapal Batra went toward Ujjwal’s house. He had thought that a home meant an address, a lane, a house number. But as soon as he entered Ujjwal’s home, he saw the dim blue glow of a mobile screen. In that light was the face of a young man—the smile of the first day’s win, the silence of the second day’s loss, the sweat of the third day’s debt, and the broken voice of the fourth day’s digital arrest.

Devika was not far away; she was seated inside the same house. She looked at Chandrapal without anger. “Look,” she said. “He bit into this pillow. These are not marks of lost money; they are marks of a breath being held back.”

Chandrapal tried to say, “It was not my app; it was a foreign platform; I was only an adviser.” But inside Ujjwal’s home, the voice of a lie could not form a complete sentence. Only the word “only” came from his mouth. Outside, the children repeated: “Only means half an admission.”

His screen opened again. This time it did not show a betting app, but Ujjwal’s unfinished letter. It read: “Didi, I was wrong, but I was not a criminal.” Chandrapal’s fingers went still. He tried to press delete, but Devika’s voice came through the screen: “Do not erase the letter. This time, write an answer.”

Raghav Signal Somani reached Munna Paswan’s house. Munna’s home seemed built not of earth but of bricks of debt. On each brick was a one-time code, an account number, a copy of Aadhaar, a bank seal. Raghav recognised all of it. Those signs had been his livelihood. But for the first time he saw a human being inside them.

Munna’s father looked at him and said, “Why did you write that my son was the mastermind?” Raghav could not answer, because he remembered what he had written: “active mule account.” In Maithili, its meaning opened before him at that moment: “the one on whose back the crime was made to travel.”

Munna’s mother placed an old gamchha before Raghav. “He took this when he went to the bank. He said he would get a job. Is this what your kind of job is?” Raghav’s language of signals broke apart. He had codes, commission, links—but no shortcut for a mother’s question.

Lau Kin-Hung sat in his distant city by the sea, yet the seventh breath reached his glass tower too. Before him lay a market map. India shone point by point. Every glowing point was a potential consumer. Then the map changed. Every point became a threshold. At one, a son waited; at another, a sister read a letter; at another, a mother folded a gamchha.

Lau summoned his adviser. The adviser came. Lau asked, “Do we have details of the customer’s home?” The adviser laughed. “We have income, age, expenditure, behaviour, debt tendency, gaming habits.” Lau repeated, “Home?” The adviser fell silent. In that silence the leaves of Garh Narikel moved.

For the first time Lau understood that the people he had regarded as data were people of homes. Data does not die; it changes and becomes a claim. But homes die. And after a home dies, its smell can cross the sea. His air-conditioned room suddenly filled with the scent of wet paddy.

Edward Broom was practising how to write “Forgive me.” On a small sheet sent by Ira were Maithili letters. He grew tired trying to form the first “m.” His finger slipped across the smooth paper, but the letter demanded soil. Professor Elina Graves sat before him. She said, “If suffering gets trapped in translation, silence is not ethics.”

Edward said, “I pronounce the names wrongly.” Elina replied, “Mispronunciation is not a crime. Refusing to take the name is.” After that sentence, for the first time Edward left the lectern and sat at a table. The man of speeches became a student of writing.

In Garh Narikel, Ananya said to the children, “We asked about the home. Now ask about fear.” At first the children hesitated. Listening to a story of home is easy; listening to a story of fear is harder. Budhba Ghost said, “Fear is the name of the breath that could not come out.”

Sarayu Devi’s fear was that after her death her child would remain hungry. Ujjwal’s fear was that because of his mistake his sister would have to lower her head. Munna’s fear was that he would be called a criminal without understanding why. Meera Mrinalini’s fear was that her love would be used as a weapon against her. Nand’s fear was that even after truth was written, the river would swallow it all.

The children placed a lamp before every fear. There was little oil in the lamps, but no water had been mixed into it. Devika said, “We will honour fear. We will not call the frightened person a coward. We will not call the cheated person a fool. We will not call the blackmailed person guilty. This is the oath of the seventh breath.”

At that oath Chandrapal’s mind trembled. The first rule of his crime was to make the victim feel guilty. When the victim feels guilty, he does not complain. The day a village says that the cheated person is not a fool but a victim, half of Chandrapal’s trade dies on the spot.

Batuknath understood that victory in law was not enough. The day people begin to trust memory more than procedure, his harvest of delay will dry up. He thought, “I will have this oath declared unlawful.” At once the court within him asked, “Under what section? Against a child’s compassion?”

For the first time Raghav raised his hands without opening a signal. He bowed before Munna’s mother. He could find no words of apology.

He merely touched one end of the gamchha. Munna's mother pulled it away. "Not yet. First open the truth of the account you opened—not the account itself." Raghav's release was postponed.

Lau Kin-Hung dismissed his advisers. The room emptied. He bent over the map and clicked one point. Garh Narikel did not open. Only a question appeared: "Where is your home?" Lau grew angry. He ordered the server shut down. The order went through, but the reply came: "The question of home lies outside the network."

At last a sentence formed on Edward Broom's page: "Sarayu Devi, part of my offence is that I did not know your name." It was not a beautiful sentence. Its grammar was rough. But it was not a speech. The leaves of Channa Grove stayed still for a while over that rough sentence.

The final part of the seventh breath was dream. Ananya said, "After home and fear, dream." The children brightened, but Budhba Ghost became grave. "Dream is hardest of all, because the living must fulfil the dream of the dead."

Sarayu Devi's dream was that her child should learn to read. Ujjwal's dream was that Devika should never again be afraid of a phone. Munna's dream was that his father should be able to enter a bank without lowering his head. Meera Mrinalini's dream was that no one should blackmail another in the name of love. Nand's dream was that the labourers' names should be written upon the bridge pier.

After hearing the dreams, the children lifted their pebbles. On each pebble they wrote one letter—the letter of home, the letter of fear, the letter of dream. When all three were joined, the name became complete. Village water was sprinkled over the letters.

That night the minds of the rogues returned to the game in Channa Grove. This time their task was not to catch anyone, but to speak home, fear and dream. Batuknath could tell Sarayu Devi's home, could tell half her fear, and fell silent at the dream. Chandrapal saw Ujjwal's threshold and heard the fear, but his mouth closed at the dream. Raghav spoke Munna's home, spoke the fear, and wept on hearing the dream. Lau could not fully speak even one home. Edward managed one name in rough pronunciation.

Budhba Ghost announced no judgment. This time the Court of Channa Grove gave homework instead of a verdict. "Whatever you could not say, learn it and return."

Dawn came in the outer world. On Batuknath's desk lay the victory order, but upon it shone a sentence written by a child: "Ask the home of the name." On Chandrapal's screen no app opened, only the words "Write an answer." Raghav's signal was empty. Lau's map was blurred. Edward's speech was postponed.

In Garh Narikel the children set out for school. Ananya turned and looked back toward Channa Grove. The leaves were moving—not with kabaddi, but with the rustle of homework. The seventh breath had not ended; it travelled in the children’s pockets as three pebbles. The story moved forward, because without a dream a name remains incomplete.

FOLK SONG: THREE PEBBLES, THREE TRUTHS

Folk tune: children’s jhumar

*Rattle, pebbles, rattle—three inside the pocket;
Home, fear, dream—without all three, a name remains incomplete.
Three pebbles in the pocket—home, fear, dream;
Without all three the name is incomplete, and justice remains unfinished too.
Home is easy to speak; the breath of fear catches;
The dead one’s dream climbs upon the shoulders of the living.
Raghav wept at the dream; Batuknath fell half silent;
Lau knew not even one whole home; his image blurred.
The Court of the Grove gave no verdict—it assigned homework;
“Whatever you have not understood, learn it and return,” it said.
The pebbles rattle in the children’s pockets through the night;
Without a dream, a name never finds its complete place.
The Court of the Grove gave no punishment; it gave homework—*

CHAPTER 37

Three Pebbles

When the three pebbles in your pocket stop rattling, understand that some answer has gone missing.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: READ THE ROOT, SHAPE THE FUTURE

Folk tune: rice-transplanting song

Plant, planter, plant the seeds of questions,

Seek not the leaves but the roots—sink your hands deep.

*Read not only the leaves of the tree; read the roots in the earth,
The egg of crime is small; behind it lies a finely woven net.
When questions reach the root, the illness is rightly known;
Cut only the upper leaves, and the trouble sprouts again.*

*Like transplanting rice, examine each row of causes;
Write the remedy with reform at the root, education and rules together.*

*Read the root and shape the future, not merely the symptoms;
With the cultivation of deep understanding, no problem is immovable.*

*A field is not made clean by trimming only the grass above;
Only the hand that reached the root gathered the fruit.
Plant causes row by row, inspect bed after bed;
From clean planting at the root, a true solution will grow.*

The seventh breath travelled on in the children's pockets as three pebbles—home, fear, dream. All day the pebbles kept rattling: at school, on the field ridge, after the mobile screen had gone dark, and at night beneath the pillow. From that day in Garh Narikel, before beginning a game the children asked one another, “Your home?” then “Your fear?” then “Your dream?” Whoever could not answer was given less breath in the game.

The rogues could not escape this rule either. The Court of Channa Grove had said: learn whatever you could not say, and return. The rogues had thought this was the language of the dead, a sound within the game that would end when they awoke. But from dawn onward it became clear that the rule had spread into the waking world as well.

When Batuknath Hariharan awoke in his guest-house room, three pebbles lay beneath his pillow. He started and summoned the security guard. The guard came, saw the pebbles and asked in an ordinary voice, “Sir, how did these get inside?” Batuknath wanted to scold him, but what came from his mouth was, “Where is my home?” The guard grew frightened. The question was not meant for him, yet he had no answer either.

Which was Batuknath's home? The old lane in Madras where his father brokered the release of people fined for travelling without tickets? Or the bungalow in Delhi where he lectured on the dignity of the Bar?

Or the file room where eleven advocates waited for him? He understood: a man with many homes sometimes loses the real one.

He picked up the first pebble. A word was written upon it: "Beginning." Batuknath's body trembled. He understood beginnings. Before every bribe there is a beginning—a small concession, a lie that seems laughable, an untruth renamed "procedure."

Chandrapal Batra awoke in his city mansion. Though his screen had been off all night, it was warm. Three circles appeared upon it—home, fear, dream. He laughed. "A children's game." He entered his password. The screen would not open. Then from inside the phone came the smell of his Meerut hostel: an old mattress, half-dry socks, cheap tea, and the first lie written in the margin of a law book.

Chandrapal began remembering his student days. Had he gone to study law, or to sell it? At first he had genuinely wanted to become a lawyer. He believed words held power in a courtroom. But in his first case a broker told him, "You do not win an argument with truth; you win it with time." That day he learned the art of selling time.

Ujjwal's letter flashed again on the phone: "I was not a criminal." Chandrapal closed his eyes. But when he did, a screen opened inside him. He saw his first client, a farmer who had paid him two thousand rupees in a case over five bighas of land. Chandrapal had forgotten to file the papers, and the farmer lost his land. The farmer's face merged with Ujjwal's.

There was silence in Raghav "Signal" Somani's house. He was a man of disappearing conversations. There were no old letters, photographs or diaries at home. His wife had left him; his son called him not "Father" but "Sir." Raghav had thought this was security: less memory, less risk. But the eighth breath of Channa Grove first seeks memory in the houses of those who have removed memory from their homes.

A sheet of paper lay on his table. On it was his childhood name—Raghavesh. How many years had it been since he had seen that name? At school the teacher called him Raghavesh. He had been a brilliant student then. Mathematics delighted him. Numbers were his friends. Later numbers became accounts, accounts became mules, and mules became the backs on which crime rode. The friend became a slave.

Raghav lifted the paper. On the back was written, "Your fear?" He considered the answers—the police? Lau Kin-Hung? Chandrapal? No. His real fear was that one day his son would ask, "What work did you do?" and he would have no answer.

Far away in a city by the sea, Lau Kin-Hung sat on the seventh floor of his glass tower. Before him lay market reports from cities across the world. Where people were poor, addiction was cheap; where the law was slow, profit was fast; where young people were unemployed, sell them the lure of games. His empire had been built on that formula. But the eighth breath does not obey formulas. It obeys questions.

A line appeared on Lau's screen: "Your home?" Lau smiled. "Hong Kong." The line remained. He typed, "Glass tower by the sea." It remained. He typed, "Where accounts are opened." The line darkened. Then he remembered a small room whose window looked out upon a clothesline. His mother sewed through the night. That was home. In that room he had first decided to take revenge on poverty. Later his revenge ceased to be against poverty and became revenge upon the poor.

Edward Broom's room was filled with Harvard speech papers. This time all the headings had vanished. "Moral capital," "shared future," "human dignity"—the words had flown from the pages. At the top remained only a question: "Your home?" Edward wrote, "A citizen of an empire." The paper stayed silent. He wrote, "The head of a company." Silence. At last he wrote, "A boy taught that mistakes disappear inside numbers." For the first time, moisture appeared upon the paper.

In Garh Narikel Ananya told the children, "Today we shall read the homes of the rogues." The children stared. One asked, "Do they have homes too?" Budhba Ghost climbed down from the branch. "An oppressor has a home, but he abandons it. An abandoned home becomes testimony."

The children wrote five names in the earth—Batuknath Hariharan, Chandrapal Batra, Raghav Somani, Lau Kin-Hung, Edward Broom—and left a blank space before each. Ananya said, "If we do not write a person's home, we cannot fully understand his guilt. Crime is not born in the air. Crime is born at the moment a person begins to think that the pain of his own home gives him the right to burn someone else's."

Meera Mrinalini arrived carrying the page of the Oath of Privacy. She told the children, "Remember: the rogue's pain does not excuse his crime. But if we do not understand the pain, we will not recognise the crime's next form." Saumya added, "To know the root of a crime is not to defend it; it is to learn how to cut it."

Devika said, "Read the story of Chandrapal's first fraud." The children heard of his hostel, the first farmer, the delayed file, the selling of time. One child asked, "So first he told a small lie, and later a big one?" Devika answered, "Yes. Even a great crocodile is born from an egg."

Nishant Jha brought not Lau Kin-Hung's account map but a picture of his childhood home. "He came from a poor household," he said. "But the poverty that hurt him became the very poverty he turned into a business." The children fell silent. A small boy asked softly, "Then can someone escape poverty and also protect the poor?" Nishant said, "Of course. That is why this story matters."

Ramaiyya Subramanyam came laughing, though exhaustion lay beneath the laugh. “Raghav’s name was Raghavesh,” he said. The children were surprised again. Ramaiyya said, “Sometimes when a name is shortened, the soul is shortened too. He cut away half his own name, then began cutting other people’s accounts.”

Gop Kumar quietly opened a cloth bag. It held no formal papers, only old tickets, a hostel receipt, a training-camp card, the identity card from a first job, invitations to speeches and two or three photographs. “These are not evidence,” he said. “They are beginnings. Evidence is needed in court. Beginnings are needed in a story.”

Budhba Ghost placed five leaves before the five names. On the first was written “small concession”; on the second, “selling time”; on the third, “cutting a name”; on the fourth, “taking revenge on the poor for poverty”; on the fifth, “hiding guilt inside numbers.”

The light of those five leaves reached the distant rooms of the rogues. Batuknath saw his father—a tired man, not wholly evil. But Batuknath understood that while his father had brokered the release of a few people from fines, he himself had begun postponing decisions over people’s lives. When imitation of a small wrong acquires power, it becomes a great sin.

Chandrapal saw his old friend Shamim in the Meerut hostel. Shamim had said, “I will fight cases for the poor.” Chandrapal had laughed: “Will the poor pay fees?” Shamim later remained a small lawyer, but slept peacefully at night. Chandrapal became rich, but his sleep turned into an app screen.

Raghav went to his son’s room. The boy was asleep. On the table lay a science book, an unfinished drawing, and a question: “What is a mule?” Raghav’s feet froze. His son had already learned the word at school. Raghav understood: when crime becomes a word inside the home, a father can no longer escape it.

In Lau’s glass tower, the sound of the sea grew louder. His mother came in a dream. She said, “Did I lift you out of poverty so that you could turn poor people into data?” Lau woke before he could answer. Even after waking, his mother remained close—the eyes of a woman threading a needle.

Edward Broom abandoned his stage rehearsal and went to his company’s old warehouse. Dust lay everywhere. A plaque from the old bridge project had been thrown into a corner. An Indian river’s name was misspelled upon it. Edward tried for the first time to read that wrong name aloud, but his tongue caught. Professor Elina said, “The tongue catches because history has taken hold of the throat.”

In Garh Narikel the children studied the five leaves. Ananya asked, “What is the punishment for all this?” Budhba Ghost replied, “Punishment comes when the court’s time arrives. For now, the lesson. Whoever cannot read the beginning of a crime cannot prevent its rebirth.”

At night the three pebbles rattled again in Batuknath’s guest house. This time there were four. Upon the fourth was written, “Your beginning.” He did not scream. He only opened the window. From far toward Channa Grove came the children’s lesson: “Small concession, selling time, cutting a name, taking revenge on the poor for poverty, hiding guilt inside numbers.”

Chandrapal picked up the phone and for the first time spoke without legal language. “Raghav, I am remembering.” Raghav answered, “So am I.” Both were silent. They did not apologise, did not surrender, did not fully repent. But the work of the eighth breath is not to finish repentance; it is to begin memory.

Lau Kin-Hung did not close the Indian accounts. He was still a villain. But his market map was no longer still. At every point a window of a home appeared. The empire continued to run, but the first crack had opened inside it.

Edward Broom postponed his press release. It seemed a small thing, but in his empire postponing a press release was only a little short of confession. On a blank page he wrote five names. Three were wrong, two incomplete. Elina said, “Write them again.”

Night deepened over Garh Narikel. No kabaddi was played in Channa Grove. For the first time the children stopped the game and studied. The dead listened. Far away, the minds of the rogues trembled. The eighth breath was a pause in the game—because sometimes the game must stop so that one can look at the roots of its rules.

At dawn Ananya gathered the three pebbles and five leaves. “A new rule now,” she said. “Understand the home of the person you defeat as well. Otherwise victory itself may become another crime.” Budhba Ghost smiled. “These children are dangerous,” he said. “They do not look only at an enemy’s face; they look at the root.”

Thus the eighth breath ended—without forgiveness, without punishment, but with recognition of beginnings. The story moved forward because a door had opened into the rogues’ inner worlds. No one changes the instant a door opens; but air enters. Once the air of Garh Narikel enters, leaves begin to grow even in an empty room.

FOLK SONG: READ THE ROOT

Folk tune: rice-transplanting song

*Read the root, not the face—read the root;
The child who reads the root is the greatest watchman of all.*

*A great crocodile comes from an egg, crime from a small concession;
A name cut, time sold—the root sprouts from that crack.
When you defeat someone, read the pain of his home;
Otherwise victory may become a fire in another house.
Three pebbles, five leaves—stop the game a while;
Look not at the enemy's face, but at his root.
The village air entered the empty room;
A leaf sprouted there, and a name became work.
No forgiveness, no punishment—only recognition of the beginning;
Children who read the root are the most dangerous sentries.
A name was cut, time was sold—the sapling rose from that crack.
Otherwise victory will become a fire in another courtyard.*

CHAPTER 38

The Pronunciation of a Name

Writing a name is not enough—you must also give time to learn how to pronounce it.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: RIGHT NAME, RIGHT HONOUR

Folk tune: auspicious song of name-reading

Read it rightly, read the letters of the name rightly,

In every vowel-mark, shape someone's living breath.

*A written name is the body's shell; a spoken name its life,
Pronounce it rightly, and a person's honour rises.*

Ask the spelling before you write; let each person tell their own identity,

A small correction can preserve someone's whole existence.

*Read names rightly—in school, office, on every stage;
The first stair of respect is a name correctly spoken.
Right name, right honour—this simple law of the people;
Care with a single letter can preserve an identity.*

Ask the spelling before you write; let each person speak their own introduction,

*At a clean, correct call, victory rises upon the face.
School, office, stage—let this be the custom everywhere;
Respect for one letter can bind a lifetime of affection.*

After the eighth breath, the game in Garh Narikel stopped for two days. The children found this astonishing, because the ghosts' kabaddi never stopped. Flood might come, drought might fall, there might be a wedding or a death, a court might give judgment, the government might build a bridge, a foreigner might make a speech—once night fell in Channa Grove, the game began. But this time Budhba Ghost remained seated on his branch and kept saying only, "Once a name has been written, time must be given to learn its pronunciation."

At first the children did not understand. The names had been written. The archive had been made—on leaves, in earth, on screens, in songs. Why pronunciation now? Ananya asked, "Budhba, are reading a name and writing a name different things?" Budhba Ghost replied, "The written name is the outer body. The spoken name is the inner breath. Whoever misreads a name kills it again."

Word of this reached the rogues. Even "word" is not quite right. No messenger went, no letter arrived. But when Batuknath Hariharan lifted his cup for morning tea, letters floated on the surface instead of foam. He tried to read the first—"Bho... Bholaa...?" The foam trembled, and from within the cup came the sound of a splash. Someone whispered into his ear, "Not Bholanath. Bholaa Nat."

Batuknath dropped the cup. His hands shook. In court he had heard thousands of names—in files, arguments, affidavits. To him a name had been a party, a serial number, a case number. For the first time he understood that inside a name also live a father's voice, the smell of a mother's body, a childhood path, a field ridge, the burden of debt, and a child's crying after death. Misreading a name is not merely applying the wrong section of law; it is closing the dead person's door once again.

No wager opened on Chandrapal Batra's screen that day. No green numbers, no red numbers, no win, no loss. Names simply appeared one after another. He kept swiping, but the screen refused his finger. The first name was "Ujjwal Jha." He read, "Ujwal." The screen went black. Then the letters corrected themselves, spelling the name out slowly. It felt not like a phone but a school holding his finger and teaching him the alphabet.

He wanted to laugh. "What's in a name?" But before the sentence was finished, another voice came from the ceiling of his house: "There is plenty in your name, Batra Babu—an LL.B. certificate, hundreds of accounts, commission, protection, threats, and the price attached to every signature." Chandrapal looked up. No one was there. But on the certificate framed upon the wall the university's name faded, and beneath it appeared a line: "No degree was awarded for selling names."

Raghav "Signal" Somani feared the punishment of names most of all, because his whole life had been spent removing them. No client under a full name, only a signal; no account under a true name, only a mule account; no conversation preserved, only disappearing messages. But the ninth breath gathers even the ashes of erased things. At night a bundle opened before him. Inside were half-burned SIM cards, torn identity papers, bank slips, and fragments of many names.

On the first fragment was written "Mu..."; on the second, "nna"; on the third, "Pas..."; on the fourth, "wan." Raghav joined them: "Munna Paswan." As soon as the name became whole, a thin young man stood in the room. Whether he was alive or dead was unclear. A voice came from his mouth: "You called my account a mule, but my name was Munna. The mule was not my livelihood. It was your net."

Raghav tried to answer. The language of his crime was ready: "system, network, orders from above, mere facilitation, consent on paper." But before the young man's name, all those words fell away like sand. For the first time Raghav said, "Munna." Pain struck his chest as the name sounded. He understood: when a name is spoken rightly, it becomes not collection but return.

In Lau Kin-Hung's office by the sea, names arrived differently. Indian names seemed difficult to him. His staff shortened them in reports—B. Nat, U. Jha, M. Pas, D. Sah. Lau used to say: shorter names, faster business. But that morning the full names spread across his glass table as drops of water. The drops joined into Devanagari letters. Lau could not read the script. But the letters began reading him.

Many voices entered his ears—"Bhola Nat," "Sarayu Mahato," "Ujjwal Jha," "Munna Paswan," "the debt of Devika Sah's household," "the unnamed nurse," "the old man trapped by the price of an oxygen cylinder," "more than thirty beneath the bridge pier." Lau lifted a handkerchief to wipe the table. It was wet. He thought it was sea damp. But sea damp does not climb to the seventh floor of a glass tower. This was dew from the leaves of Garh Narikel.

For Edward Broom, the punishment of names came on a public stage. He was to speak again in a university auditorium, this time on "Accountability and Global Development." The speech was ready. Professor Elina Graves sat in the first row, but her eyes held not the shine of applause but the coldness of evidence. Edward climbed the stage and tried to read his first line: "Friends, we have gathered..." But the microphone said, "Not Bholanath. Bhola Nat." The auditorium fell silent. Edward broke into sweat.

The foreign students assumed it was some artistic intervention. A few began recording video. Edward tried to switch off the microphone. The microphone went dead, but the voice did not. One name after another began coming from every speaker. Ira Aruni stood at the back of the hall. She raised no slogan. She simply held a copy of Garh Narikel's archive of names. She understood that sometimes resistance is not snatching a microphone; it is reading a name correctly.

Meanwhile in Garh Narikel, the first "name-reading" assembly was held. The earth beneath Channa Grove was levelled. The children sat in a circle. In the middle were Ananya, Devika, Meera, Saumya, Nishant, Ira, Gop Kumar and Aruni. Budhba Ghost sat upon the branch. Hulasi came from the direction of the well and sat quietly. Panidubbi's hair did not rise from the pond, but ripples travelled over the water as far as the gathering.

Ananya lifted the first leaf. "We will not read a name wrongly." The children repeated in one voice, "We will not read a name wrongly." Devika added, "If we do not know a name, we will ask." The children: "We will ask." Meera said, "If a name has been hidden, we will seek it." The children: "We will seek it." Saumya said, "If humiliation has been attached to a name, we will remove the humiliation." The children: "We will remove it." Budhba Ghost was satisfied.

The first name read was Bhola Nat. No member of his family was present. Everyone said he had been a migrant labourer from a distant district. But when the name was pronounced correctly for the third time, a woman appeared at the outer edge of Channa Grove. Her body was indistinct. She said, "I am his sister. No one ever informed me." Someone asked, "After so long?" She replied, "When the name was spoken rightly, I found the road."

The second name was Sarayu Mahato. Sarayu had been a woman labourer. The official list said, "Sarayuh Mahato, male, absent." The children stumbled. Ananya said, "Here, read the truth of the body along with the name." They read: "Sarayuh Mahato, woman, labourer, fell from the bridge, not absent." Wind moved through the grove. The leaves of Channa Grove turned over. Fine lines appeared beneath them, as though someone had drawn the shape of a palm in henna.

The third name was Ujjwal Jha. Devika rose to read it. She feared her voice would break, but Ananya held her hand. Devika read: "Ujjwal Jha, son, student, caught by the crocodile of the screen, not a criminal." The children kept silence after this line. Silence too can be a lesson. In that silence Ujjwal's mobile screen flashed once, then went completely dark. The extinguished screen looked like a peaceful face.

The fourth name was Munna Paswan. Far away in the city, Raghav was drenched in sweat as he repeated that name. When Munna's name was read in Garh Narikel, a bank seal appeared on one leaf of Channa Grove and then vanished. The children understood: the account had been used in crime, but the name did not belong to the crime. At that moment the first knot of the mule-account net opened in the language of ordinary people.

A rule was made in the name-reading assembly: three things would be read with every name—its home, its death, its humiliation. Without the home, the dead remain wandering. Without the death, the crime remains unclear. Without the humiliation, justice remains incomplete. This rule was named "the Law of Three Leaves."

The law reached the rogues at once. In Batuknath's room a file opened: home, death, humiliation. He searched for a case number, but the file itself said, "Home first." Chandrapal searched his phone for the ledger, but the screen said, "Death first." Raghav searched old messages; the screen said, "Humiliation first." Lau opened a report and found only "Name first." Edward tore his speech; the pieces flew up and became three leaves.

For the first time Batuknath Hariharan abandoned courtroom vocabulary and wrote on plain paper: "Bhola Nat, home unknown." The page blackened as soon as he wrote it. "Unknown" is not so easy to write. To call a home unknown merely because no one searched for it is laziness. He wrote again: "Home yet to be found." The page turned white. It was a small change. But in Channa Grove Budhba Ghost said, "This is how responsibility for a name begins."

Chandrapal Batra wrote "suicide" before Ujjwal's name. The screen made a sound as though it had cracked. A line appeared: "Cause?" He wrote, "Debt." The screen asked, "Whose?" He wrote, "The game's." The screen asked, "Who built it?" He fell silent. It was the sort of question that, answered step by step, leads a criminal to his own role. Chandrapal's finger trembled. At last he wrote, "My network." The screen did not change at once. But beneath Ujjwal's name, for the first time, a small lamp appeared.

Raghav wanted to write "mule account" before Munna's name, but his hand stopped. He wrote, "Account created without the name." Then crossed it out. "Without the name's consent." Crossed that out too. At last he wrote, "The name was stolen." After those three words, a window in his room opened for the first time in years. Air came in from outside. It felt not like air, not like anyone's forgiveness, but simply like evidence entering the room.

Lau Kin-Hung could not read Devanagari, but for the first time he thought of seeking not a translator but a teacher of pronunciation. His assistant asked, "For a business meeting?" Lau answered, "No. For names." The assistant was astonished. Lau himself was astonished. He was still a villain; only a crack had opened in that villainy. But even a crack was much for Garh Narikel. A wall does not fall in a single day.

Edward Broom abandoned the speech in the auditorium and began reading names. The first two were wrong. Ira wanted to step forward, but Elina stopped her with a gesture: let him learn for himself. On the third attempt Edward pronounced Bhola Nat almost correctly. No one applauded. The absence of applause hurt him most. Speeches on morality receive applause; the correct pronunciation of a name receives silence. He understood that silence is harder than applause.

In Garh Narikel, Hulasi spoke for the first time at the assembly. "Read my name too." The children fell silent. Hulasi's story had been told in many forms—suicide, well, love, sin, shadow. Hulasi said, "I fell. By calling it suicide, they stole my right to grief. Read the humiliation." Ananya trembled. She read: "Hulasi, Garh Narikel, died by accident in the well, humiliated by being called a suicide." A very old wind passed through Channa Grove.

Tears filled Budhba Ghost's eyes. "This is the true beginning of the ninth breath," he said. "When the living read the names of the dead, not only are the dead released; the understanding of the living opens too. Now the punishment of the rogues begins. Every night they must read one name. If they read it wrongly, read it again. Without home, without death, without humiliation—the name will not be accepted."

The children wanted to turn the punishment into a game. "What if they do not read?" one boy asked. Budhba Ghost laughed. "Then their own names will begin to blur. Whoever denies another's name slowly loses the right to his own."

That night the punishment began to affect the rogues' signatures. Batuknath went to sign a letter, and "Hari" vanished from the middle of "Batuknath Hariharan." On Chandrapal's bank paper the middle letters of "Batra" blurred. The sender name disappeared from Raghav's message. In Lau's account the owner's name became "Unknown." On Edward's invitation only "Edw..." remained. They were frightened. The punishment of names was no game.

Gop Kumar listened to all this at night. He told Aruni, "I used to think data was the final form of truth. But data without names is only a count of bodies." Aruni replied, "And a name without story is incomplete. That is why the novel keeps growing." Gop smiled. "Then what we must preserve now is not merely paper but pronunciation."

Nishant brought the children a list of digital-fraud cases. "There are hundreds of names here," he said. "Some complete, some partial, some only phone numbers." Ananya said, "A phone number is not a name. Find the name." Nishant understood: technology's next task was not merely stopping money; it was returning names. The glitter of his foreign office suddenly seemed dim.

Meera added a new line to the Oath of Privacy: "If someone's name is exposed without consent, let that name be returned with honour." As she read it, the shadows of women whose names had been turned into commodities in the market of bodies appeared. No "goods," no "number," no "package"—each had a home, if not a death then a fear, and a humiliation. Meera said, "The names of the living must be protected too. Not only those of the dead."

Saumya wrote the Law of Three Leaves in ordinary language and began distributing it. Government language said victim, beneficiary, accused, witness. Saumya's leaflet said home, death, humiliation. People read it and said, "This is not law." Saumya answered, "The law can come later. First let the people straighten memory."

Night deepened. Again there was no kabaddi in Channa Grove. This time the children, tired from reading names, fell asleep where they sat. The ghosts kept watch. Panidubbi did not leave the pond, but her hair spread over the water like lines of writing. The witches did not fly from the platform; they listened from afar. Rakash kept the light. For the first time Loth was not a spectator but a corrector of lines—whenever a child misread, he moved his lips gently.

In the first light of dawn Ananya saw letters appearing on a new leaf of Channa Grove: "Whoever reads a name correctly begins justice. Whoever reads a name wrongly repeats the crime." She did not pluck the leaf. It was left upon the tree. A living rule must remain joined to its root.

Thus the ninth breath did not end; it became practice. Far away in their rooms, the rogues kept reading names—wrongly, then correctly, then stumbling again. In Garh Narikel, the victims kept hearing their names. The children kept asking questions. And Channa Grove understood: once the punishment of reading names begins, the story no longer belongs only to crime; it becomes a story of language, memory and the future. The next breath would show how work, not merely justice, would be joined to the names that had been read.

FOLK SONG: READ THE NAME RIGHTLY

Folk tune: name-reading folk melody

*Read it rightly, read the name rightly;
Whoever misreads it builds the crime again and again.
The written name is outer body, the spoken name is breath;
Wrong pronunciation makes another sacrifice.
One name each night, with the three leaves beside it—
Read home, death, humiliation; open the colour of the tongue.
Return the living woman's name with dignity too;
Do not erase her by calling her goods, a number, a package.
Loth corrects the lines, the ghosts stand guard;
When a child stumbles, a leaf softly speaks.
Whoever reads the name rightly, justice begins there;
Whoever reads it wrongly, repeats the crime once more.
Wrong pronunciation makes another sacrifice.
Do not erase anyone by calling them goods, number or package.*

CHAPTER 39

The Peace of the Seed

Still on the outside, preparing to break open within—such is the stillness in which a seed is made.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: DEW SAYS “NOW”

Folk tune: parati

*Wake, letters of dew, wake;
Not “tomorrow”—say “now” and take the first step.*

*Upon the still leaf, dew wrote: now, this moment, this very time;
The seed has waited long—open the door of life again.
Leave the excuse of “tomorrow” and do the first small task;
One call, one application, one hand held today.*

*Before the dew dries, sow resolve into the earth;
From the footstep of now, join the long road of the future.
The dew's “now” sings the dawn-song—time has awakened;
The seed inside the still leaf has asked for earth.*

*A trembling drop on the quiet leaf gives its sign;
How long the seed has waited for the soil.
Make one call, file one request, extend one hand;
Before the dew dries, let your resolve take root.*

After the name-reading of the ninth breath, a strange stillness descended upon Garh Narikel. It was not the peace a tired person finds after a meal, nor the quiet that settles over paper after a court adjournment. It was the stillness that exists inside a tree while a seed is being made: the leaves motionless outside, the earth preparing to break open within.

The children went home from Channa Grove before dawn, but their voices remained. The names hung in the air like dry aerial roots on an old banyan. Budhba Ghost sat upon the branch and kept counting—Bhola Nat, Sarayu Mahato, Ujjwal Jha, Munna Paswan, Devika Sah, Hulasi, Nand Aruni, and all those whom paper had never given a page.

The tenth breath began when the names had been read, yet their homes were still only half open. Pronouncing a name gives the soul a road, but finding a road does not make a home. A home is made of memory, food, labour, song, and a place where people do not lower their eyes when speaking of the dead.

At dawn Devika Sah took Ujjwal's old phone with its cracked screen. The screen was dark now, but in the black glass she saw not her own face but the face of the whole village. She understood that the crocodile of the screen had not been only fraud; it was the fear that entered homes and taught children to hide their sorrow even from themselves.

Under the thatch of the Coconut-Leaf School she wrote the first lesson: “Fear kept secret becomes a business.” The children read it. One asked, “Didi, if we speak fear aloud, does it end?” Devika said, “No. But the owner of the fear changes. While fear is locked inside, it belongs to the thief. Once spoken aloud, it belongs to society.”

That sentence reached Chandrapal Batra's ears. He sat behind the locked door of his city office. News had reached him that children in Garh Narikel were studying digital fraud. He tried to laugh. “Children will understand law?” But his laugh stopped halfway because the third phone in his drawer switched itself on without being touched. Upon the screen was written: “Fear has been spoken aloud.”

Chandrapal tried to switch off the phone. It would not shut down. On the glass over his certificate appeared Ujjwal's final sentence: “I am not a thief.” He had read it so many times that now it was not the meaning of the words but their sound that cut him. A man trained in law can escape the meaning of words; he cannot escape their sound.

That night every SIM card in Raghav “Signal” Somani's room cracked open and became a tiny seed. At first he thought the metal had corroded. Then a fine leaf emerged from each seed. On every leaf was half a name. The messages he had erased had not vanished; they had become seeds waiting for soil.

Raghav tried to brush the leaves away, but they flew through the air and returned to the table. One said, “Whose account did you create?” Another, “Whom did you frighten?” A third, “Whom did you call a traitor?” A fourth, “Whom did you tell to keep the camera on?” No answer to those questions could be found on Signal.

Lau Kin-Hung was planning something new in his city by the sea. An adviser told him, “The effect of the name archive in rural India is local. The impact on the market is limited.” Lau nodded. He understood the language of markets, not of people. But at that moment a map of India opened on his screen and, where the “limited area” should have been, a point began to pulse—Garh Narikel. It was small, but its beat did not rise and fall like a stock-market graph. It beat like a heart.

The incident in Edward Broom's auditorium spread around the world as a short video. Some called it a joke, some a technical fault, some a planned protest. Ira Aruni remained silent. She knew that a person asking for proof can be given paper; a person asking for a soul must be made to hear a name.

In the Harvard library Ira wrote a letter. It was for neither a newspaper nor a court. Its title was: “When Ethics Becomes a Speech, the Name Becomes Resistance.” She sat down to write it in English, but the first line came out in Maithili: “If you cannot speak someone's name properly, you cannot speak on their behalf.” The sentence refused translation.

In Garh Narikel, Saumya Ramanathan was turning documents into the language of ordinary people. The official page said “financial irregularity.” Beside it she wrote, “A child’s fear was bought with the child’s own money.” The file said “unauthorised labourer.” She wrote, “The one who came to build the bridge was called a labourer.” The hospital bill said “supply expenditure.” She wrote, “Selling breath.”

Ramaiyya Subramanyam joined the work of translation laughing, though the laugh was no longer carefree. “Translating government language into people’s language,” he said, “is one of this country’s greatest revolutions. Half the government’s lies are hidden behind thick curtains of words.”

Meanwhile another worry grew inside Gop Kumar. The archive of names had been made, the digital school had opened, the Oath of Privacy was being taught, but the owners of the real files were still alive. Broom, Lau, Batuknath, Chandrapal, Raghav—all had withdrawn into their holes, but the holes had not broken. Gop remembered Budhba Ghost’s words: “A crocodile will not leave its hole. Send the water into the hole.”

And so the true work of the tenth breath began: sending water into the holes. The water was not litigation, revenge or violence. It was knowledge. In every village, every school, every migrant household, every court waiting room: lessons in names, lessons in fear, lessons in recognising accounts, lessons in privacy, lessons in examining the language of development.

Ananya taught the children a game called “Catch the Right Name.” One child played the criminal, another the victim, a third the witness, a fourth the judge. The criminal distorted the victim’s name; the witness corrected it. When the name was pronounced rightly, the victim could run again in the game. The children became so absorbed that even the ghosts smiled while watching.

Hulasi said, “My name too was called wrongly for so many years. Some called it suicide, some sin, some ill omen. When you call me Hulasi, I remember not the wall of the well but my childhood.” For the first time the children understood that ghosts too have childhoods.

That night Batuknath Hariharan stayed at an outer inn in Garh Narikel. All day he had watched the name-reading assembly but could not enter it. He had orders, identity, position—but to enter the circle of Channa Grove he needed a name. He spoke his own: “Batuknath Hariharan.” The leaves moved. Budhba Ghost asked, “How many names are imprisoned inside that name?”

Batuknath did not answer. He remembered a scene from childhood. In a small town in Kerala his father used to write slips outside the court. Poor people spoke their names; his father wrote them down. One day his father had said, “Never write a poor person’s name badly. His name is his land.” Batuknath had laughed then. Now that laugh lodged in his throat like a thorn.

Chandrapal Batra devised a new strategy in his office: “Defamation action against the public-education campaign.” His employees began preparing papers. Allegations: damage to reputation, economic loss, illegal propaganda, spreading fear among children. But when the documents printed, every page automatically carried the line: “I am not a thief.” They turned off the printer. Turned it on again. The same words appeared.

Chandrapal roared, “Whose programming is this?” An employee said softly, “Sir, the machine is offline.” Offline. At that word Chandrapal’s face went pale. His crimes had always depended upon networks. Channa Grove had entered something offline.

Raghav Somani considered fleeing the city. He looked at an airline ticket. Destination: Dubai. But when he reached the box for his name, his hand stopped. On the passport: Raghav Somani. On Signal: R.S. In the criminal circle: “Crow.” At the bank: consultant. At home: a father. Before his wife: silence. Which was the real name? He could not book the ticket.

Lau Kin-Hung told his lawyers, “Let the local story remain local in India. Separate the global brand.” His advisers agreed. But at the end of the meeting those Devanagari dots appeared again on the glass wall. Lau could not read them, yet it seemed the letters were speaking his own name without his pronunciation. For the first time he felt uneasy at the sound of it—Lau Kin-Hung. Why “Hung”? Hanging? Suspended? His mind truly was suspended.

Meanwhile something new happened in Garh Narikel. At the Coconut-Leaf School the children began teaching outsiders. First parents, then shopkeepers at the market, then bus drivers, then a bank clerk. The clerk was told Munna Paswan’s story. At first he said, “The account was opened according to the rules.” The children asked, “Did the rule look at the person?” The clerk fell silent.

That night the bank clerk went home and opened his register. Mule accounts were not easy to identify, but neither were they impossible. He marked three accounts separately. For the first time, inside the system, a small clerk searched for a human being within the rules. It was the first victory of the tenth breath—without fanfare, without applause, only a small red-pencil mark.

Satyavrat Mehta learned of these things not through letters but through people’s statements. He understood that court orders move slowly, while people’s lessons move at once. A question rose in him: can the dignity of law learn from public memory? In his notebook he wrote, “The court hears a name; society lives by it.”

On the night of the tenth breath, no court assembled in Channa Grove. Instead there was a feast—a symbolic feast among the dead, the living, children, ghosts, spirits, witches and Panidubbi. There was no actual cooked rice. From every house came a handful of rice, a pinch of salt, a drop of water and a leaf, laid beside the archive of names. The warm scent of rice and faint sharpness of salt mingled in the evening air, as though the village had brought its entire kitchen for the dead to smell. Budhba Ghost said, “Whoever finds a place in the meal will find a place in history.”

Devika placed a pinch of salt beside the leaf bearing Ujjwal’s name. Meera placed a lamp beside the Oath of Privacy. Saumya placed a translated page. Ira placed a blank card brought from abroad, bearing no university seal. Gop Kumar placed a copy—not of a file, but of Ujjwal’s sentence. Ananya placed a piece of chalk with which the children wrote names.

Then a faint tearing sound passed through the air. The invisible screen above Channa Grove split. Through the tear came the inner voices of the rogues: Batuknath’s childhood, Chandrapal’s first lie, Raghav’s erased messages, Lau’s percentages, Broom’s applause. Not everyone could hear them—only those sitting in the name-reading circle.

The children were not afraid. Ananya said, “Their minds are coming.” Budhba Ghost nodded. “The bodies will come later. First the mind accepts. A mind left hanging swings in the wind until, at last, it becomes a leaf.”

In the final watch of the tenth breath, Batuknath did not sleep at the inn. Chandrapal sat before the printer in his office. Raghav left the ticket page open. Water dripped from inside the glass in Lau Kin-Hung’s seaside house. Edward Broom wanted to cancel his next speech, but the organiser asked, “Reason?” He could not write an answer. The reason had no name—or it had too many names.

Dawn came to Garh Narikel. Dew had gathered on the leaves of Channa Grove. In every drop was a tiny letter. The children came running. Ananya read the first drop. It held only one word: “Now.”

“Now”—it was an order from time. Neither past nor future. Read the names now. Speak the fear now. Look at the accounts now. Teach the children now. Go to the homes of the dead now. Let the rogues’ minds enter now, because what has entered within can no longer be protected by an outer lie.

Kabaddi did not begin again in Channa Grove. Nor was the game adjourned. It stood holding its breath, like a runner waiting for the next signal. The tenth breath was complete, but it had not been released. Only this echoed in the air of Garh Narikel: whoever has eaten at the feast of names will hunger thereafter for truth.

FOLK SONG: THE DEW SAID—NOW

Folk tune: parati

*The dew said “now” and woke us,
Not tomorrow, not the day after—this very hour demands an answer.
Inside the still leaf the seed wants to break the earth;
Erased messages wait in the soil as new shoots.
In every drop of dew, one letter says now;
Read the names now, let fear speak openly now;
Go to the homes of the dead now, examine every account.
There is not one cause; thousands of names bear the weight;
Sleep fled the rogues in every direction.
The game stands holding its breath, waiting for the sign;
At dawn “now” awakened a new thirst for truth.
Inside the still leaf the seed wants to break the ground;
Erased messages rise from the soil as shoots.*

CHAPTER 40

Letters in Dew

The palm of one who reads the letters of dew becomes wet, and a wet palm opens doors.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE PALM THAT OPENS THE DOOR

Folk tune: dew-song

Open your palm, not your fist—open it,

Dissolve trust into every wet line.

*The wet palm leaves a mark of affection upon the door;
The lock hears from within and slowly begins to move.*

*Not the fist but the open palm is the sign of trust;
Whatever there is can be seen clearly—such is the gift of truth.*

*The letters of dew say upon the palm: do not be afraid;
Before an open hand, a closed heart cannot remain closed.
The palm will open the door, companionship will make a home;
With the moisture of trust, dry relationships will flower.*

*The closed door puts its ear to the inside and listens;
At the sound of an open hand, the latch moves by itself.*

*The palm that shows itself clearly gives truth;
With the moisture of affection, a dried life joins again.*

At the end of the tenth breath, kabaddi stood holding its breath—and whoever had eaten at the feast of names now hungered for truth. So the eleventh breath descended upon the morning dew. The word “now,” written in dew, spread through Garh Narikel as though an old mantra had awakened not by mistake but at exactly the right moment. The children read the drops, and as they read, their palms became wet. The dew was cold, but within that cold lay the warm scent of morning earth, as though the ground itself had become ink. When those wet palms touched their notebooks, not letters but tiny doors opened on the pages. Behind every door was a name; behind every name, a home; behind every home, some humble object—a torn gamchha, an empty medicine bottle, a cut mobile-recharge coupon, a labourer’s iron tiffin, or a tin of rice—waiting.

The eleventh breath began with the understanding that reading a name was not enough. After the name, one had to read the life: its hunger, its fear, the fatigue of its body, a wife’s waiting, a child’s school fees, the sand of a field, the final call on a mobile phone. Here the punishment of the Court of Channa Grove changed: the rogues were sentenced not merely to read names, but to read lives.

Ananya told the children, “From today, write one object beside every name.” The children scattered. From one house came an old letter, from another a hospital slip, from another a photocopy of a bank passbook, from another a bus ticket. Devika brought the cracked glass from Ujjwal’s phone. Meera brought a sheet bearing only one sentence: “My love is not a crime.” Saumya gathered the identity tokens of the bridge labourers—

Nand's old measurement notebook, a smoke-stained blueprint, and the page where blank space followed thirty names.

The archive of names became an archive of objects. Names on the leaves of Channa Grove, objects upon the earth, stories in the air. The children asked, "Whose tiffin is this?" The answer came: "Bhola Nat's." They asked again, "What did Bhola Nat eat?" An old woman said, "Rice with salt, and the smell of onion in the salt." At once the ghosts' eyes brightened, because when the food of the dead is spoken aloud, half their hunger disappears.

News reached the city. For the first time Batuknath Hariharan heard the phrase "archive of objects." He could find no section of law for it. A defamation case could be filed over a name; what could be filed against an object? Damage to the reputation of a cracked tiffin? Contempt of an empty bottle? An injunction against an old passbook? He kept opening files, but the sections of law slipped from his hands like wet leaves.

Batuknath walked again from the inn toward Channa Grove. This time he carried not a copy of an order but an old name-slip written by his father. All night he had remembered how his father carefully corrected the names of poor people as he wrote them. The name "Hariharan" felt heavy in his pocket that night. When he reached the grove, Budhba Ghost asked from the branch, "Whose name will you read today?" Batuknath answered, "I want to read my father." The ghost smiled. "Reading a father is not easy. Your first lie lives in your father too."

Meanwhile Chandrapal Batra summoned a crisis committee in Delhi—lawyers, consultants, an information agency, troll managers, and two silent police brokers. A plan was made: "Call the archive of names a foreign-funded conspiracy." But when the press statement was typed, its heading changed to: "Read me too." Chandrapal shouted. The computer operator trembled. "Sir, the file had not even been saved." Chandrapal said, "Then who changed it?" The operator lowered his head. He understood outside hacking. He did not understand an inner signature.

In Raghav Signal Somani's room, by the day of the eleventh breath all the seeds of the SIM cards had become shoots. Tiny red dots appeared on them like bank seals. On every shoot-leaf half an account number was written. For the first time Raghav tried to join the halves and read them. When the number became complete, a name opened: Munna Paswan. Raghav's throat went dry. He had never seen Munna's photograph. Crime keeps accounts, not faces. Channa Grove returned the face.

That day Munna Paswan sat at the Coconut-Leaf School. The children were not explaining the word "mule" to him; instead they asked, "Was the account yours, or was it placed upon you?" At first Munna was ashamed. Then he said, "The account was in my name, but the fear belonged to them." The children wrote: "The owner of a name and the operator of an account may be different people.” That sentence would travel much farther than the bank clerk’s red pencil.

The bank clerk who had marked three accounts during the tenth breath had now reached fourteen. He worked within the rules—letters, alerts, holds, inquiries. But before sending each paper he placed a small dot beside it: “Look at the person.” A colleague laughed. “What official notation is that?” The clerk replied, “Not official. Human.” The colleague said, “Human things do not move in files.” The clerk smiled. “That is why the file kept moving until it reached the dead.”

A report on India reached Lau Kin-Hung’s office: “Local awareness activity. Limited impact.” A percentage appeared at the end. Lau saw the percentage and breathed in relief, but with that breath a grain of salt fell upon his glass table. Where had it come from? Salt in a high Hong Kong glass tower? He touched it with his finger. It did not melt. From inside the grain came a voice: “Have you eaten salt?” Lau did not understand the question, but his body knew this was not the language of trade. It was the language of food.

Edward Broom could not cancel his next speech. The organisers said, “In a time of crisis, display the dignity of leadership.” He went to the stage. The slide read: “Responsible Capital.” As he began to speak, an image of a tiffin suddenly appeared on the screen—rusted, with a dried stain of rice inside. The audience assumed it was a new visual metaphor. Broom’s throat went dry. He did not recognise the tiffin, but the tiffin recognised him.

Ira Aruni was not inside that auditorium. She sat outside with students, listening live to the name-and-object lesson from Garh Narikel. One child said, “Bhola Nat’s tiffin.” Another, “Ujjwal’s cracked phone.” A third, “Meera Didi’s paper.” Ira listened with closed eyes. She thought: universities teach theories about the world, but a village child shows the body of a theory.

That day Meera said something difficult in the privacy circle: “An object I share by my own will becomes memory. An object taken to frighten me becomes violence.” Silence followed. Many women, many young men, many people blackmailed through their love, bodies, desires or fears understood for the first time that shame was not their private property; shame was the fraudster’s weapon. From the branch in Channa Grove, Hulasi whispered, “This sentence is pulling me up out of the well.”

Gop Kumar spoke little during the eleventh breath. He watched the file being distributed among people. Once he had thought truth was protected by making copies. Now he understood: truth is protected by use. A truth kept only on a hard drive can be seized. A truth distributed through children’s games, women’s oaths, a bank clerk’s red pencil, questions from students abroad, and the feast of ghosts cannot be shut down by any server.

That day Satyavrat Mehta wrote a new note in his room: "Democratisation of evidence." Then he laughed. The phrase was too heavy. He crossed it out and wrote instead: "The evidence went from house to house." He liked this sentence. In court, evidence is presented; in society, evidence lives. He understood that a court keeps its dignity only when it learns the language for hearing evidence that lives in society.

Toward evening a small incident occurred near the Garh Narikel market. A new man arrived and quietly asked people, "Where is the archive of names kept?" His voice held not official authority but the smoothness of brokerage. The children did not seize him. They merely made him sit in the middle of the school. Ananya said, "First write your own name." The man wrote, "Madhav." The children asked, "Full name?" He faltered. A man who had come on secret business could not write his own full name.

Budhba Ghost did not laugh at the scene. He became serious. "The one who cannot write his own full name has come to erase someone else's." The children wrote the sentence upon the wall. Madhav rose slowly and left. Behind him, not footprints but four dots appeared in the dust—brokerage, fear, hire, silence.

Night deepened. No assembly of the eleventh breath gathered in Channa Grove, because the assembly had now spread beyond the grove. In every home, a small court; in every phone, a small school; in every bank account, a small question; in every love, a small oath; in every old object, a small life. For the first time the ghosts sat at ease. They understood that their work was no longer theirs alone.

Then Panidubbi rose from the pond. Instead of water, thin strands of paper hung from her hair. She said, "Water has carried away many names. Now water will carry names." She shook her hair. Three objects fell from it—a rusted nail, a broken SIM card, and a dried coconut flower. Budhba Ghost picked them up. The nail belonged to the bridge, the SIM card to the screen, the flower to the village. All three were placed upon one leaf.

By noon a map had formed in the earth beside Channa Grove. It was not a government map in which rivers are blue, roads red and bridges black lines. In this map, grains of rice ran from Bhola Nat's house to the bridge; a line of salt marked Sarayu Mahato; black ash ran from Ujjwal's house to the mobile shop; red earth ran from Munna Paswan's house to the bank. The children were making roads as though showing the dead a way home again.

Sarayu Mahato's daughter Kamli came to the gathering for the first time. Her father had gone to the bridge years before, yet the family rarely spoke of him. The government paper said "uncertain." Kamli sat on the earth and placed a small anklet upon the line of salt. "This was my mother's anklet," she said. "When Babuji left, he said he would have it repaired. The anklet remained broken; Babuji never returned." As it touched the earth, its broken bell gave a faint chime—a dull sound, yet every heart in the gathering leaned toward it. When the anklet joined the name, Sarayu Mahato rose one inch above water-burial.

Hearing Kamli's voice, Batuknath Hariharan looked out from the veranda of the inn. It sounded like an ordinary woman speaking. But the movement of her words was steadier than the law he had used all his life to silence people. The word "uncertain" struck his ears like a hammer. In court, uncertainty means adjournment. In a home, uncertainty means waiting. For the first time he understood the difference.

After the crisis meeting, a new man came to Chandrapal's office—Mahadev Sah, the same man who had written "Madhav" in Garh Narikel. Chandrapal scolded him. "Why didn't you write your full name?" Mahadev answered, "Sir, the children were watching." Chandrapal asked, "You were afraid of children?" Mahadev said, "Not of the children. A child who asks for a full name is nobody's hired man." Chandrapal raised his hand to slap him, but the hand stopped halfway. On his palm appeared Ujjwal's sentence: "I am not a thief."

Raghav Somani brought a blade to cut the SIM shoots. The moment the blade touched a root, it went blunt. He panicked. He remembered how many young men he had told, "Open one account; you will get a small commission." He had never kept their faces. The convenience of crime is faceless. Now every shoot was becoming a face—Munna on one, Ajit on another, Farman on a third, Anamika on a fourth. Raghav's room was no longer a bank branch. It had become a waiting room.

That day Saumya simplified the documents further into people's language. She translated "mule account" as: "an account in your name for someone else's sin." Then crossed it out. She wrote instead: "You gave the name; the string went into his hand." Ramaiyya applauded. "Children will understand that." Saumya said, "If children understand it, the babu will be afraid too."

Four sentences were written upon the wall of the Coconut-Leaf School: "Ask the full name." "Before opening an account, ask the work." "Hang up on a call that frightens you." "Your privacy is your right." At night the letters glowed faintly. The ghosts read them, Panidubbi read them, the witches read them, and far away in the city criminals felt their sting without reading them at all.

A bundle arrived for Satyavrat Mehta from Garh Narikel. It held no affidavit, no certified copy. Inside were grains of rice, salt, a rusted nail, a torn SIM card, a dried flower, and a note: "These are not evidence. They are pieces of life. If the law wishes, let it make them evidence." Satyavrat sat for a long time with the bundle before him. He understood that law turns objects into exhibits; people turn objects into relationships. Justice is incomplete without both.

That night Satyavrat opened his old law book. Its pages held sections, clauses, exceptions, burdens of proof. All seemed necessary, but insufficient. In his notebook he wrote: "When the State cuts away a name, people join the name back through objects. Will the law recognise this act of joining?" As soon as he wrote the question, a coconut leaf flew in through the window. On it was written: "Listen first."

On the evening of the eleventh breath, a strange exercise took place in Channa Grove. The children lifted objects one by one and told their roads. "This nail came from the factory, went by truck to the bridge, fell from the bridge near the water, went from the water into Nand's notebook, and from the notebook to Channa Grove." "This SIM went from the shop to a young man's pocket, from the pocket to the fraudster's hand, from the fraudster to the bank register, from the register into Munna's shame, and now onto this leaf." As each road was told, the object grew lighter.

Budhba Ghost said, "Reading a road is harder than reading a name. A name says someone existed. A road says who was with them, who abandoned them, who sold them, who saw them, who remained silent." The children fell quiet. This was not the silence of fear but the silence before learning.

Batuknath listened from a distance. He remembered many cases in which he had saved people by saying, "The link is not proved." Breaking roads had been his profession. "The chain of causation is broken," he would say in court. Now Channa Grove was joining the chain of causation again. That night an invisible rope tightened across Batuknath's chest—every knot a name, every name followed by a road.

Lau Kin-Hung received a second report from his adviser: "Local groups are engaged in route-mapping activity." Lau smiled. "Route mapping" sounded like business language. But when he opened the report, he saw not a maritime chart but lines of rice and salt drawn in the earth of a village. It was not a digital map, so it could not be erased. It was drawn on the ground, so it could be seen not by satellite but by memory.

The stain of the tiffin was spreading across Edward Broom's stage. He abandoned the speech and asked for water. In the glass there was not plain water but the faint taste of salt. He shuddered. For the first time in his life, the salt of labour touched his mouth. It lingered on his tongue for a long time, as though an unknown hand had placed an entire day's sweat into his mouth. In that taste, the sweetness of a thousand speeches was defeated.

At the end of the eleventh breath Ananya asked, “What now?” Before answering, Budhba Ghost looked up through Channa Grove. Wind moved the leaves. The wind said, “You have read the object. Now read its road.” The children understood that the next lesson would be a journey—where the dead had come from, where they had gone, which hand pushed them, which hand could have stopped them but did not.

The rogues heard it too. In Batuknath's pocket his father's slip trembled. A new folder opened on Chandrapal's computer: “Road.” The roots of Raghav's SIM shoots sank into the wood of the table. Lau Kin-Hung's grain of salt split in two. The tiffin stain spread across Edward Broom's speech paper.

The eleventh breath ended, and this time it was released. As it left, the scents of rice, salt, water, paper, tiffin, phone, leaf and flower mingled in the air of Garh Narikel. The story had moved from name to life, and from life to road. Channa Grove said softly, “Whoever reads a life cannot escape its road.”

FOLK SONG: THE DOOR OF THE WET PALM

Folk tune: dew-song

*The door opened, opened by the wet palm;
 Whoever reads a life cannot escape its road.
 Reading the letters of dew made the palm wet;
 When its print touched the notebook, a door opened.
 Behind the name a home, behind the home an object—
 Gamchha, bottle, tiffin, the true scent of rice.
 The sweetness of speeches lost to one pinch of labour's salt;
 Whoever reads a life cannot escape the pull of its road.
 Which hand pushed, which hand could have stopped it,
 Which hand stayed silent—all the footprints opened.
 Rice, salt, leaf and phone mingled and became air;
 Whoever reads a life cannot escape the road—the grove said.
 Gamchha, bottle, tiffin, rice—the weight and scent of truth.
 The footprints opened—who pushed, who tried to stop with force.*

CHAPTER 41

The Boat of Names

A boat kept on the bank means nothing—the boat of names speaks only when it enters the current.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: ROW WITH THE NAMES

Folk tune: boatman's song

*Row, boatman, row with the names beside you;
Carry not only bodies but identities across—take this vow.*

*The boat stands ready at the bank; take up the oar of names;
However swift the current, fill it with the courage of companionship.*

*One oar of memory, the other of evidence;
Living hope between them, justice as the direction.*

*The boat carries not bodies alone; it carries identity to the far shore;
The river respectfully sings the full name of every passenger.
Let the boat move with the names; let no one remain behind;
With the strength of shared oars, even a deep current can be borne.*

*One oar strikes with memory, the other with evidence;
Living hope seated between them sings its song.
The current roars, the boat bends, but the rope does not break;
Rowed by shared strength, even the deepest current is overcome.*

At the end of the eleventh breath, the sentence spoken by Channa Grove—"Whoever reads a life cannot escape its road"—kept sounding from leaf to leaf all night. The village understood that the time had come to move beyond names and objects. The dead person's name had been written; his tiffin, phone, slip and salt had been placed before everyone. But all these still remained like a boat kept beside the river. The meaning of a boat opens only when it enters the current.

At dawn of the twelfth breath Ananya cleared the earth in the middle of Channa Grove. The children brought water pot by pot; Devika brought rice; Meera turmeric; Saumya the red pencil from the old measurement notebook; Ira a blank sheet of map paper from abroad; and Gop Kumar an old USB drive preserved now not for use but for memory. Budhba Ghost watched from the branch. In his eyes was the light that comes only after twelve hundred years of waiting, when a village finally begins asking for the roads of its dead.

Bhola Nat's road was made first. The children shaped his home with rice, the fields with turmeric, the city contractor's camp with salt, and the bridge pier with water. Grains of rice settled beneath their fingers as though someone were adding an account step by step. From an old file Saumya struck out the word "unauthorised" beside his name and wrote: "Left home, reached work, name removed." The children read together: "Left home." The air of Channa Grove grew lighter, because for the first time Bhola Nat's journey had come outside official language.

Batuknath Hariharan, sitting at the inn, could not see all this but could hear it. The children's voices reached his ears, each cutting through an old courtroom argument of his. All his life he had said, “The chain of causation is not proved.” But in Channa Grove the chain of causation was being made not from witness statements but from rice, turmeric, salt and water. He understood that what he had called a “link” in law was called a “road” in the language of the people.

The second road belonged to Sarayu Mahato. It began from his tiffin. The lid was placed upon the earth, beside it a small piece of cloth cut from his wife’s bolt of fabric. From there the road went to the labour line, the contractor’s warehouse, the left pier of the bridge, and finally a round stain of water. The children asked, “Where did Sarayu Mahato fall?” An old man from the village answered, “Not from the pier—from the counting.” At that sentence the light of the Rakash sitting in Channa Grove trembled.

Gop Kumar watched the scene. He remembered his Excel sheets—columns, amounts, dates, payments, codes. He had thought the road of truth ran from cell to cell. Today he understood that feet come before cells. A labourer walks first; only afterward is he entered on paper. Crime is born where a walking foot is locked inside a paper box.

Devika made Ujjwal’s road. First on the earth: home, a small circle. Then school, two lines. Then a mobile shop, a piece of blue paper. Then the first win, five grains of rice. Then debt, a line of black earth. Then the fear of digital arrest, a circle drawn around everything. Then the roof, a dry leaf. The children fell silent. There was no river on Ujjwal’s road, no bridge, no crocodile, yet the road was as deep as the Ganga.

Nishant Jha showed on a screen how money moved, but he gave no technical lecture. He placed three bowls on the earth—one marked “name,” one “account,” one “fear.” Then he asked Munna Paswan, “Which bowl holds your name?” Munna touched the first. “The account?” He touched the second. “The fear?” Munna touched the third, then pulled his hand back. “The fear was not mine. It was given to me.” The children wrote: “Fear too can become transferred property.”

At that very time Chandrapal Batra was trying to open the “Road” folder in his office. It asked for no password. It opened directly. Inside were no bank statements, no chat logs, only pictures of the bowls made upon the earth. At the bottom of every bowl was his signature. Chandrapal shouted, “This isn’t digital!” The computer screen replied, “That is why it cannot be erased.”

Raghav “Signal” Somani’s shoots had now become wires. The roots sunk into the wooden table and slowly reached the wall. Each root led to a phone from which disappearing messages had once been sent. Raghav smashed the phones in fear, but from inside the broken phones came not dust but leaves. On the leaves were half-sentences—“Hang up the call,”

“Keep the camera on,” “Empty the account,” “It is a matter of national security”—all waiting to be completed.

He tried to send Lau Kin-Hung a message. But as each word erased itself, only one line remained: “The road is returning.” Lau’s answer came late. One word: “Cut it.” Raghav understood that in the world of crime, when a road exists, it is cut. But the children of Garh Narikel were learning not to cut roads but to join them. At that point Raghav’s language broke.

In Hong Kong, Lau Kin-Hung sat in his glass office listening to a report. An adviser said, “Indian rural groups are engaged in narrative construction.” Lau nodded, but on his table the grain of salt from the twelfth breath had become a line. The line made of salt crossed the map of the sea toward India, from India to Bihar, from Bihar to the Kamala-Balan, and finally to Garh Narikel. Lau tried to erase it with his finger; the salt clung to his skin.

For the first time he wondered: how can a maritime border stop a road made not of bodies but of salt? He remembered cheap Indian labour, cheap data, cheap fear, cheap life. In the market book everything had been marked cheap. But salt is not cheap; salt is the memory of sweat. That day Indian salt remained upon Lau Kin-Hung’s finger.

The tiffin stain on Edward Broom’s stage still had not washed away. The organisers installed a new screen, new lights, a new backdrop. The speech was retitled “Rebuilding Trust.” But when he mounted the stage and tried to speak in the calm voice of a pastor, before the microphone came the clink of a spoon—the sound of a spoon striking an iron tiffin. It was a thin sound, yet it cut through the velvet silence of the auditorium and lodged directly in the heart, as though somewhere far away an iron tiffin were remembering its owner’s last meal. Some in the audience smiled, others grew uneasy. Broom knew this was the sound of an Indian labourer’s mealtime, and before that sound all his language was made of glass.

This time Ira sat inside, not outside. But she did not rise to ask a question. She opened her notebook and kept writing down Channa Grove’s lesson of roads. Broom saw her. He understood that someone who asks questions is easier to deal with than someone who writes. A question ends upon the stage. Writing continues after the stage. Ira wrote: “Colonialism once occupied geography; new capital occupies roads. Resistance reads the roads again.”

In the privacy circle Meera made another form of the road lesson. “Data travels roads too,” she said. “A photograph given to me in trust—through whose phone did it pass, to whose server, whose threat, whose silence? That road must be read.” A young woman told her story with trembling hands. “Was my mistake love or trust?” she asked. Meera held her hand and answered, "The mistake belongs to the hand that turned trust into a business."

Saumya wrote the story in ordinary language. Instead of "leak," she wrote: "the road of trust was broken." Instead of "content": "a piece of someone's life." Instead of "blackmail": "a trade in fear." After each translation the victim's face grew lighter, because the shame locked inside hard foreign words was opened by the language of the people.

An elderly woman from Garh Narikel whose son had died at the bridge stopped as she approached Channa Grove for the first time. "I don't remember the road," she said. "I was young then. People said he went to the city and died. I only waited." The children seated her among them. Ananya asked, "What day did he leave home?" The woman said, "A Monday in Bhadon." Nothing more. The children placed rice and wrote: "Monday in Bhadon." At this the woman's eyes filled. "Can a road be made from just that much?" Budhba Ghost said, "A road is not always found whole. Whatever fragment is found, fill that fragment with truth."

Batuknath Hariharan trembled on hearing this. In law, an incomplete road becomes doubt. In Channa Grove, an incomplete road was becoming compassion. He thought, "If doubt becomes compassion, what will remain of my profession?" An answer came from within him: "Protecting truth." But the answer did not fit his old life. The slip written by his father trembled again inside him.

Satyavrat Mehta kept making notes on "roads" in his room. He understood that courts ask for chains of cause and effect, but in poor people's lives those chains are often deliberately broken. The testimony of the poor is not incomplete; it has been made incomplete. He wrote: "When power erases the road, the credibility of fragments must become a matter of jurisprudence." Then he simplified it: "An incomplete road is still a road."

Gop Kumar stopped at that sentence. His data was complete, but lives were incomplete. An Excel sheet completes; a human being remains unfinished. Gop understood that the truth of the novel lay not in the completeness of a file but in reassembling incomplete lives. He left one blank place in the earth of Channa Grove. Ananya asked, "Why is this empty?" Gop said, "For those whose road has not yet been found."

That empty place shone more brightly than anything else. The dead, the ghosts, the children all kept looking at it. No rice, no salt, no leaf—only earth. Hulasi said softly, "Respect the empty place. Not every story can speak at once." For the first time the children learned that memory is not only filling space; it is also preserving space.

Night deepened. The road lesson continued in Channa Grove. At the end of each road the children wrote one question: "At what turning could this have been prevented?" On Bhola Nat's road: a safety belt. On Sarayu Mahato's: true counting. On Ujjwal's: a collective response to the first threat. On Munna's: the bank asking a question. On Meera Mandal's: protecting trust.

Here the punishment of the twelfth breath became clear. The rogues would have to read not only names and lives, but turning points. If they read the turning points, they would understand that the crime had not been inevitable. In every death, every fraud, every blackmail, every water-burial there had been a place where a human being could have stopped it—but did not.

That night a new window opened on Chandrapal Batra's screen: "Which turning?" It showed him the first young man he had trapped by saying, "Just give us an empty account." He could have stopped then. A second turning: Ujjwal's first loss. A third: the first call-letter of digital arrest. Chandrapal's face appeared at every turning. He tried to remove it with the cursor, but the face would not go; if a turning is erased, the road becomes a lie.

Turnings opened before Raghav too. The first time he understood that disappearing messages were becoming a shield for crime, he could have left. When an old woman cried on the phone after sending her savings, he could have blocked the number. When a young man trembled before the camera, he could have said, "Do not be afraid. This is fraud." But at every turning he chose commission. Now the turnings were becoming leaves and being laid upon his chest.

Lau Kin-Hung's line of salt now became a sequence of turnings. At every turning the percentage changed. The suffering of Indian youth had been a conversion rate in his spreadsheet. He saw that at one turning he could have left the market; at another, removed the Indian agents; at a third, stopped the game played through the law firm. But each time he chose profit. The grain of salt entered the skin of his finger.

Edward Broom's stage microphone was switched off that night, but in his dream it came alive. He stood alone on the stage. Before him were empty chairs. On every chair lay an object—a tiffin, a bottle, a helmet, a SIM card, a passbook, a piece of chalk. He began his speech: "Human dignity." The tiffin answered, "At which turning?" Broom woke. The question was written upon his pillow.

Before dawn in Channa Grove, Budhba Ghost stopped the children. "Enough for today's lesson. You read the road and saw the turning. In the next breath we shall ask: who will carry the weight of what was not stopped at the turning?" Ananya asked, "The rogues?" Budhba said, "If the rogue carries it, that is atonement. If society carries it, reconstruction. If the State carries it, justice. But if no one carries it, the crocodile will carry it again."

At this the water stirred. Not the distant Ganga, not the current of the Kamala-Balan, but the dew of Channa Grove. In every drop tiny turnings gleamed. In the morning light the drops were little mirrors in which every child saw one turning beside their own face. The children read the dew. This time they found not one word but two: "Carry the weight."

The twelfth breath was complete. In the air of Garh Narikel, the scents of name, object, life, road and turning mingled together. Wherever the rogues were, they could smell it, and they understood that entry into the inner world brings not only fear but responsibility. The story stood ready for the next breath—the breath of carrying the weight.

FOLK SONG: THE BOAT OF NAMES IN THE CURRENT

Folk tune: boatman's song

*Row the boat, row the boat of names;
Whose road you have read, carry that person's honour.
A boat left on the bank never crosses the way;
The boat of names speaks only after entering the current.
Tiffin, slip, salt, gamchha—all became passengers;
Reading the turnings of a life opened many hands.
"Carry the weight," the dew wrote in the night of the twelfth breath;
If the rogue carries it, atonement; if the State, justice.
If society carries it, homes and thresholds will be rebuilt;
If no one carries it, the crocodile will take the weight.
Row the boat of names, recognise each turning;
Whoever has read the road must carry its honour.
A boat left on the bank never crossed the way;
Tiffin, slip, salt and gamchha all climbed aboard as passengers.
If no one carries it, the crocodile itself will take the burden.*

CHAPTER 42

The Circle of Weight

Punishment is given from above; weight rises from within and settles upon the shoulder.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: SHARE THE WEIGHT

Folk tune: Labour Jhumar

*Share the weight, shoulder to shoulder, share it,
Let the tired body sway and join the rhythm.*

*The weight upon a shoulder halves when company comes,
One hand reaches from behind, another stretches forward.
Share sorrow, work and responsibility equally;
Shared labour makes the difficult road easier.*

*In the round ring of the jhumar no one stands alone at the centre;
When shoulders remain joined, the weight is no mountain.
Share the weight, sing the song, match the rhythm of your steps;
Give one another's weariness the water of affection.*

*The one ahead lifts a step, the one behind sings;
If someone in the middle stumbles, both sides hold them up.
Sorrow halved, courage doubled - that is the reckoning of the jhumar;
In the sweat of companionship a rainbow line gleams.*

At the end of the twelfth breath, the two words the drops of dew had taught them to read - "Lift the weight" - remained caught upon every leaf of Channa Grove until dawn. The wind blew, the leaves moved, but the words did not fall. They seemed not like words but small stones. At first the children thought this was punishment. Budhba Ghost said, "Punishment is what is imposed from above. Weight is what rises from within and settles upon the shoulder."

Ananya drew two circles in the middle of Channa Grove. She named one circle "Those against whom the crime was committed." The second she named "Those by whom the crime was committed." The children asked, "And the third circle?" Ananya was silent for a while, then scratched a thin line in the soil with her nail: "Those who saw and remained silent." Budhba Ghost did not smile. "Most often," he said, "this is the heaviest circle of all."

First Bhola Nat's tiffin was lifted. A tiffin should have been light. An empty tiffin. Yet when Munna Paswan went to raise it, his arm trembled. There was no dal inside, but an unfinished account of wages; no rice, but the hunger of that day; on the lid not a shining stain, but iron dust fallen from the bridge pier. The tiffin handle bit into his fingers as though that light piece of metal had settled upon his shoulder like a lifetime's debt of grain. Munna grew frightened. Devika took his hand and said, "This is not your crime. But it is your society's weight. Lift it, so that the next Bhola does not die on an empty stomach."

Munna lifted the tiffin. As soon as he did, the fear attached to his bank account grew a little lighter. He understood that in the mule account his name had been trapped in the mouth of crime, but in society's work his hands could become free. The children placed the tiffin beside the Archive of Names. From that day it was decided that any family driven to the city for labour by lack of food would first have its name entered on the village grain list.

Meanwhile, in his room at the inn, Batuknath Hariharan opened the file containing his order of victory. At first the file looked ordinary. But when he turned the pages, a small mark of weight appeared in the corner of every page - not scales, but a shoulder. Law books display scales; in the writing of Channa Grove, justice sits upon the shoulder. Hariharan brushed at the page. The mark did not disappear. Instead, the file grew heavier.

He called the servant and said, "Put this file in the car." The servant tried to lift it, but the file would not move. Hariharan rose himself. A lawyer, he thought, spends his whole life lifting papers; how heavy can one file be? But the moment his hand touched it he understood: this file contained every adjournment because of which a widow had grown old, every objection because of which a labourer's son had grown up without his father, every procedure he had called professional skill. The file was not filled with paper but with time. Time is the heaviest thing of all.

Chandrapal Batra's screen changed that same morning. Every mule account became a brick and piled itself upon the screen. Each brick bore a name - Munna, Azhar, Pawan, Shakeel, Anjali, Rohit, Unknown. He pressed delete. Instead of vanishing, the brick fell out of the screen and landed on the table. At the first brick he laughed: an illusion. At the second he grew irritated. At the fifth his table sagged. At the tenth his wrist began to ache. At the twentieth he understood: the weight of digital crime ultimately reaches the body.

Raghav "Signal" Somani wanted to sleep peacefully after deleting all his chats. But when he woke, he found beneath his pillow not sheets of paper but leaves of stone. On each leaf stood a sentence: "The call was not disconnected." "Fear was sold." "Grandmother's savings are gone." "The young man trembled on camera." He filled a bag with the stone leaves and went out to throw them away. Hulasi stood at the gate. "Wherever you throw them," she said, "you will hear some mother weeping from that very place." Raghav turned back inside.

In Lau Kin-Hung's city the sea was unnaturally calm that night. His advisers brought a list of new company names - Renewal, Restructuring, Risk Control. Lau raised his pen to sign. From its nib came not ink but salt water. A ring of salt formed on every paper. He felt that the sea had entered his office. Irritated, he said, "Risk transfer." The adviser wrote it down. On the paper, by itself, appeared: "Not transfer of weight. Acceptance of weight."

Edward Broom was due that day to release his most expensive report yet, "Ethical Rebalancing and Emerging Markets." When the first copy came from the printer, the pages were not dry. Red streaks ran across them. "Bad ink," the assistant said. Broom knew it was not ink. Within those streaks were the tiffin stain, the medicine vial, the scratch on the helmet and the smell of a passbook, all together. Seeing the weight of the report, he ordered, "Release the digital copy." The computer opened. On the screen appeared the words: "Digital weight is weight too."

In Garh Narikel the children began the lesson of weight. They declared no one guilty and no one free. They asked only, "How much of this weight is yours?" It was the hardest question of all, because it did not ask for the whole crime, only for one's share. People find it easy to place the whole blame upon someone else; admitting a share is difficult.

Gop Kumar wrote his own share first: "Understood the data too late." He said, "For so many years I treated the file as work, not as life." Ramaiyya wrote, "I was talkative, yet how many times I remained silent." Saumya wrote, "The documents stayed trapped in English and reached the people late." Meera wrote, "I did not first listen to the language of people living in fear." Devika wrote, "When Ujjwal first showed fear, I thought him stubborn." Ananya asked, "What is my share?" Budhba Ghost said, "Your share is to keep asking questions."

At his desk Satyavrat Mehta opened a note headed "Weight." He wanted to place the word within the language of law - responsibility, liability, compensation, rehabilitation, corrective order. But every term seemed only half enough. At last he wrote: "The weight left upon society requires a new idea of justice that divides it among society, the State and the offender." Then he folded the paper away. He knew such a sentence would not be accepted in court at once, but one day children would make it simple.

Batuknath Hariharan's file still would not rise. In anger he picked up the phone. "Bring contempt proceedings against this village." At the other end was no clerk but the slow voice of the Brahma of the pipal: "Contempt of whom? Of the one who received no justice? Of the one whose name was never written? Of the one who asks a question?" Hariharan cut the call. In the call log appeared: "Contempt: against the soul."

Chandrapal Batra spent the whole night removing bricks. His servant asked, "Sir, are you building a house?" Chandrapal shouted, "Remove the bricks!" The servant lifted one and asked, "Why is a name written here?" Chandrapal gave no answer. He was beginning to understand that bricks of crime do not first make a house, nor even a prison; first they make a shoulder.

Raghav Signal counted his stone leaves. The count would not end. However many he counted, there was one more. At last he remembered all those whose calls he had cut, whose messages he had read and destroyed, whose pleas had received "seen" but no answer. The word "Seen" surfaced on the stone leaves. For the first time Raghav's eyes filled with water. The tears were not warm but cold, as though voices long frozen inside a switched-off phone had melted and escaped. Yet the water was not his. It belonged to all the voices he had cut off.

Lau Kin-Hung adjourned his risk committee. He opened a map. Red marks covered the map of India - cities, ports, servers, agents. Garh Narikel had no mark at all. Yet his eyes remained fixed there. From a place absent from every market report, weight was rising. For the first time Lau understood: the map of profit is incomplete; the map of weight is different.

Edward Broom told his public-relations team, "Build a sympathy story." The team began searching for photographs - children, village, leaves, women, bridge. Ira watched from afar. She sent a message: "If weight is turned into an image, it becomes commerce again." The team's screen went black. Only one line remained: "Do not sell sympathy; lift your share."

The second stage of the lesson of weight began in Channa Grove. Every object that had been lifted now had to be turned into use. The tiffin became a grain list. The helmet became a safety pledge. The SIM card became a lesson in recognising fraud. The passbook became community caution. The vial became medicine verification. The chalk became the lesson of questions. The objects were not locked in a museum; they were put to work. Budhba Ghost said, "A memorial is not what is looked at. A memorial is what works."

Meera wrote that sentence in her circle. A young woman who had not left her house for a month was now preparing to go to the police station with another girl. Devika asked her, "Are you afraid?" The young woman said, "Yes. But now the fear is not alone." Hearing this, Hulasi smiled from across the well. For the first time, inside her armless body, she felt as though someone's hand were reaching out without touching her.

In the school against the screen, Devika and Nishant gave the children a game. One child would be Fear, another Account, a third Temptation, a fourth Helpline. The child playing Fear shouted very loudly at first. Then Ananya changed the rule: "Fear will not be allowed to speak alone. Three people will answer together." The answer became collective, and Fear's voice grew faint. Nishant said, "This rule matters more than the technology."

At night Gop Kumar opened Ishan Dutt's old file. Ishan cast no shadow, but his note remained: "Do not merely expose weight; give it a destination." Gop stared at the line for a long time. Truth must not become orphaned after data is exposed. He decided that every disclosure would now be accompanied by public assistance, language support, a safety note and a list of next steps. The file would no longer be a scream; it would become a road.

The vanished souls watched this change carefully. At first the dead had wanted only that their names be written. Now that the names had been written, they understood that the living must not be left only the weight of weeping; they must be given the weight of work. If death leaves only grief, the rogues return. If death leaves a rule, society changes.

On the evening of the thirteenth breath, a strange scene appeared in Channa Grove. Beside every object of weight the children planted a small leaf. On each leaf was written: "Who will lift this weight?" The answer was not a name but a verb - "feed," "protect," "listen," "tell," "stop," "write," "stand beside." Ananya said, "A name is necessary, but without action a name becomes stone again."

Batuknath Hariharan finally managed to lift one corner of the file. One corner only. His shoulder felt as though it would collapse. He put the file down. For the first time the words escaped his mouth: "This cannot be lifted alone." Budhba Ghost, standing in the darkness outside the window, said softly, "To lift it alone is punishment. To share the lifting is justice."

Chandrapal Batra gathered the bricks and tried to build a wall so that the names would remain on the other side. But the moment the wall rose, the children's voices wrote themselves across it: "At which turning could it have been stopped?" He struck it with a hammer. The bricks did not break. They were not made of stone but of opportunities. Opportunities do not break; they are either used or become evidence.

Raghav Signal's stone leaves finally settled not upon his chest but outside his door. Whoever entered had to read them first. His office was no longer a court; it had become a waiting room - for all those whose calls he had cut off. Raghav did not have the courage to open the door. But the stone leaves kept sounding from within: "Answer."

For the first time Lau Kin-Hung drew the curtains in his glass house overlooking the sea. He did not want to look outside. But shadows of water fell upon the curtain, and within them the children of Garh Narikel walked carrying a tiffin, helmet, passbook and chalk. He grew angry. "These people were not on my map." An adviser said, "Ground-level people, sir." Lau answered, "No. A route of weight."

Edward Broom's report was not released after all. The company issued a press statement: "Technical reasons." But the reason was not technical. At the bottom of every page the same question kept appearing: "How much is your share?" The public-relations team could not erase it. Ira wrote in her notebook: "When the language of crime cannot bear a question of responsibility, the paper itself begins to fail."

Night gathered. The objects of weight remained in their places in Channa Grove. No statue, no garland. Only objects prepared for use. The children were tired, but their eyes shone. Ananya asked Budhba, "Now what?" Budhba said, "Now we watch whether those whose share it is come to lift it."

At that moment three winds came from three directions. From the city, the smell of paper. From the sea, salt. From the screen, hot iron. The three smells met in Channa Grove, but the leaves did not tremble. They were already prepared. Hulasi said, "If those who bear the share do not come to the weight, the weight will go looking for them."

The thirteenth breath paused upon that promise. Weight was no longer merely sorrow; it had become a travelling messenger. Whoever refused to acknowledge a share would find an object at the door - tiffin, brick, leaf, salt, chalk, passbook, vial. And when the object reached the door, the next breath would begin - the breath of the threshold.

FOLK SONG: THE WEIGHT UPON THE SHOULDER

Folk tune: Labour Jhumar

*Lift it, shoulder, lift the bowed shoulder;
Turn the weight of sorrow into work and carry it from house to house.
Punishment falls from above; weight rises from within;
A small stone of a name comes and sits upon the shoulder.
Tiffin, brick, passbook, vial, a grain of salt;
Not sorrow alone - each becomes a reason for work.
No statue, no garland, only preparation for use;
In the tired child's eyes the watchman's light shines.
Whoever will not own a share, the weight will reach that door;
The object will arrive and ask for its due.
If the shoulder has bent, human being, lift it again;
Turn the weight of sorrow into work and take it house to house.
Punishment falls from above; weight rises from within.*

CHAPTER 43

The Moving Weight

A weight that has been shared does not end - it begins to move, village to village.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: LIGHTER SHOULDERS, HOUSE TO HOUSE

Folk tune: Batagabani

Come, neighbour, come from threshold to threshold;

Let every house together shoulder the burden of one.

*The weight moves house to house, and relief travels with it;
One threshold offers two hands, another brings food.
Someone reads the paper, someone watches the child;
Someone goes along to court, someone saves the field.*

*House by house the shoulder grows lighter through communal affection;
The road of burden changes through homes of mutual aid.
Sing the Batagabani and say: all our homes are one;
Within shared weight rises society's truest support.*

*Today it is their courtyard, tomorrow our turn;
On the road of help the dark ring of sorrow shrinks.
One brings a book, one bread, one a shoulder's place;
To the Batagabani rhythm it sounds: every house is the same village.*

The promise left by the thirteenth breath - "to each share, its door" - stayed awake through the night; therefore the night did not quite end. Dawn arrived, but not with its usual colour. The redness that rose in the east of Garh Narikel stood a little way back that morning, as though even the sun were waiting to hear the final whistle of the game in Channa Grove.

Ananya was brushing the soil from her hands. The children had already shared the weight of the tiffin, but sharing a weight does not make it disappear. Now the weight begins to travel. What had once belonged to the names of the dead now wanted to move from village to village upon the shoulders of the living.

Aruni sat beside Channa Grove. It seemed to him the novel might stop here once again. But Channa Grove has no rule for stopping. There the story breathes. One breath ends and another begins. The breath of the dead, the breath of children, the breath of the rogues' minds - all tangled into one another.

Ba came slowly and stood beside the heap of leaves. Her eyes were the eyes of someone who had not slept all night. "Have the names reached home?" she asked.

"Whose home, Ba?" Ananya asked.

Ba said, "The names that were written have reached their homes. Now it is time to reach the homes of those who are accustomed to erasing names."

At that very moment in the city, Batuknath Hariharan stood before the degrees hanging on the wall of his sitting room. They had always hung straight and bright, sealed behind glass. But that morning a fine mist had gathered inside the glass. He wiped it with his hand. The mist was cold, and his fingerprints settled upon it like someone else's signature. When the mist cleared, the lettering of the degrees had vanished. In its place, in rough handwriting, appeared names - Bhola Nat, Sarayu, Munna, Ujjwal.

Hariharan panicked and called the servant. The servant stopped short as he entered. His master's face looked like that of a child caught stealing. Hariharan wiped the glass again. This time the names disappeared. The degrees became degrees once more. But something inside him had broken. The fear carried by the paper of victory had climbed onto the wall.

In an inner room of the same house, Hariharan's old mother, who for many years had spoken no one's name clearly, suddenly said, "Batuk, how many names have you eaten?"

Hariharan froze. For years his mother had called him only "Babu." The name "Batuk" survived only in the mouths of those who had seen him as a child. He ran into her room. Her eyes were closed, but her lips were moving. Her voice was thin, like a bell hung from an old thread, yet within it all Batuknath's acquired language began to sway. "You ate paper, you ate dates, and now you will eat names too?"

For the first time Hariharan understood that the inner world can be entered not only through a door, but through a mother's tongue.

A different play began in Chandrapal Batra's house. His son, who pretended to keep his distance from his father's business, stopped in the middle of breakfast while looking at his phone. The screen showed no game score, only a question: "The one who died after losing - do you call that victory or fraud?"

Chandrapal roared, "Give me the phone."

The son handed it over. The screen immediately returned to normal - advertisements, games, scores, coloured glitter. Chandrapal breathed in relief. But the son said softly, "Father, last night I dreamed that a boy was asking my name. He said the smell of my hanging is in your father's earnings."

The phone slipped from Chandrapal's hand. He could scold the boy, beat him even, but in which court could he sue a dream? Under what section? What adjournment? What bail?

In Raghav "Signal" Somani's house, silence first descended into the dinner plate. While serving rice, his wife saw all the grains bending in one direction. She thought it was a trick of the wind. But where would wind come from inside the house? The grains joined to form letters: "Account closed."

Raghav flung the plate aside. His wife was frightened. "Which account? The household account?" she asked.

Raghav did not answer. When a man's crime lives in signals, the woman in his house often learns to read only silence. But that day the silence was written in rice.

In Hong Kong, Lau Kin-Hung slept in his glass house beside the sea. After waking from a dream he wondered: how has some Indian village entered my sleep? He told his secretary, "Find a place called Garh Narikel." The secretary opened a map. Thousands of points appeared, but one point was glowing as though a coconut leaf were burning beneath the sea.

Lau Kin-Hung laughed. It was a practised laugh. Men of money practise laughing at fear. But his right hand was trembling. The hand that signed for crores trembled while writing the name of one distant village.

No one in Garh Narikel knew of any of this. Those who had lost were busy with their work. Their days contained no leisure for watching other people's dreams.

Devika Sah was cutting sheets for the second meeting of the school against the screen. On every sheet she wrote: "Do not be frightened by someone pretending to be police on the phone. Do not trust the first win in a game. Do not open an account in your name for someone else." On paper these sentences looked ordinary, but every sentence was a lamp for Ujjwal's soul.

Nishant Jha had left the glittering post of a foreign company and was teaching village children arithmetic. He said, "Wherever a percentage shines too brightly, ask questions. Wherever a bonus comes too quickly, stop. Wherever someone wants your password, run." The children laughed. In that laughter the hardest lessons in the world were becoming easy.

Meera sat with the women in the small room of the Oath of Privacy. "My love is not evidence against me. My body is not a document against me. My photograph is not a noose against me." A woman who until a month before had come with her face covered said for the first time that day, "Write my name. But with my permission."

Saumya was turning the documents into people's languages. A report written in English was now breaking open into Maithili, Hindi, Bengali, Odia, Tamil, Telugu and Urdu. "When truth remains only in the language of experts," she said, "it remains half imprisoned."

Ira had left the foreign auditorium and was now organising readings of names. There was no projector there; leaves hung instead. People read a name, then remained silent for a moment after each one. That silence was not merely mourning for the dead; it was responsibility for the living.

Gop Kumar was rarely seen. People said he was hiding. Some said he had died. Some said he lived with informers in the shade of trees. Yet whenever a new file opened, one line would always be found within it: "No evidence is complete without a name." People understood that Gop was somewhere - and nowhere as well.

Aruni had the children write the story of Garh Narikel. He told them, "Write the names of the criminals, but do not let them rule the story. Write the names of the dead, but do not turn them only into sorrow. Write the work of the living, because that is what opens the next page."

Meanwhile, the ghosts in Channa Grove began to show themselves faintly even at noon. Once they had been creatures of the night. Now children played there by day, and the ghosts learned the rules of their games. Budhba Ghost said, "Human children are cleverer than we are. They do not wait until death to become memory; they make memory while still alive."

The Loths, who had been spectators for centuries, now lifted small leaves. The Rakash spirits never tired of giving light, because the light was no longer needed for play but for writing. The pretas held the pages with their white bodies. The ghosts drew black lines around the names with dark fingers so that no rogue might come at night and erase them.

That night Ba told Ananya, "Fear has now gone to their houses."

"Then have we won?" Ananya asked.

Ba smiled. "No. Be careful with the word victory. Victory is often the rogues' favourite word. We are at work. People who are working do not announce victory."

Ananya wrote "Work" on a leaf. Beneath it, in smaller letters, she wrote "Breath."

Just before dawn, wind moved again through Channa Grove. The leaves struck one another. The sound was not kabaddi, not names, not a verdict. The sound was: "Forward."

Aruni heard it. He opened his paper and wanted to write the end of the chapter, but his hand stopped. To write an ending would have been wrong. This time the story was not ending; it was entering house after house.

Far away in the city, Hariharan's mother said again, "Read the names." Chandrapal's son switched off his phone and opened the window. Raghav's wife gathered the grains of rice and set them aside. Lau Kin-Hung kept his finger upon the map.

In Garh Narikel the children ran out for the first game of dawn. Channa Grove was ready. The dead were ready. The rogues' minds stood half inside, half outside. And on the leaf the word "Work" slowly began to turn green.

FOLK SONG: THE WEIGHT MOVED HOUSE TO HOUSE

Folk tune: Batagabani

*It moved, the weight moved from house to house;
Once it reaches a door, that household cannot cast off its share.
A shared weight does not end; it takes the road and moves;
Village to village it pauses as an object at the door.
A mother says, "Read the name"; a son opens the window;
A wife weighs one grain of rice for memory.
The paper wished to write "The End," but the hand stopped;
The story entered the house - who can say it is finished?
The rogue's mind stands half inside and half outside;
"Work" turned green upon the leaf and a new road opened.
The moving weight says: sorrow is not only weeping;
Once it reaches a house, that house cannot cast off its share.
A mother says, "Read the name"; a son opens the window;
A wife weighs one grain of rice for memory.*

CHAPTER 44

The Granddaughter's Notebook

Fear is like water: when it meets a wall it looks for a crack; when it finds no crack, it descends into a granddaughter's notebook.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE FLOWER OF THE GRANDDAUGHTER'S QUESTION

Folk tune: Grandmother-Granddaughter Song

Ask, granddaughter, ask whatever is in your heart;

*From Grandmother's storehouse of stories gather pearls of answers.
 The granddaughter asked, "Whose fear?" Grandmother smiled like a flower;
 "The one who hears truth named finds fear beginning to melt."
 Do not stop the question; fill the notebook with colour;
 Let old pain become a simple story and reach the next generation.
 A granddaughter's question is no thorn but a little flower of knowledge;
 Its fragrance can open the sealed roots of history.
 Grandmother and granddaughter, sing together, search for answers with affection;
 In a questioning child's hand stands the bright house of the future.
 Two generations sit beneath the evening lamp;
 Question and answer weave a loom, threading a cord of love.
 When old pain becomes story, its thorn no longer pierces;
 A fearless question opens the future's door.*

The story had entered house after house, and "Work" was turning green upon the leaf. After the fourteenth breath, the rogues thought fear had now reached their own bodies and perhaps would stop there. Human beings often imagine the boundary of fear to be their own chests. But fear follows the nature of water. When it meets a wall, it searches for a crack. When there is no crack, it emerges as sweat.

In Batuknath Hariharan's house, fear first came upon his mother's tongue, then the wall, then the glass of his degrees. At dawn of the fifteenth breath it entered his granddaughter's notebook. She was seven years old. She understood neither courts, nor the dignity of the Bar, nor procedure. But she loved drawing pictures.

That day she drew a tree in her notebook. On its branches were black people, white people, a dwarf light, round Loths, and below them an old man standing as though his mouth had been pasted shut. The little girl ran to her grandmother. "Look, Channa Grove."

Hariharan's wife started. No one in the house had spoken the name Channa Grove. The child asked, "Why is Grandfather standing outside? Why doesn't he enter the game?"

The question rang through the house not like a bell but like a summons. Hariharan came out of his room. He looked at the picture. The old man in it seemed to resemble him. In an innocent voice the child asked again, "Grandfather, why does the one who wins stay outside the game?"

Hariharan's throat went dry. He could draw many answers from his law books: definitions of victory, procedure, judgment, appeal, rights. But before a seven-year-old child, the language of law dried like a leaf. He managed only, "Child, this is not a game."

The girl laughed. "Everything is a game, isn't it? You all say, 'We won the case.' Doesn't 'won' mean a game?"

Hariharan stepped back. The notebook remained there. His granddaughter drew a piece of paper into the old man's hand and, in very small letters, wrote upon it: "Read the names." The smell of wax crayons rose from the page, and within it stood those two words - the smallest, heaviest order any court could issue.

In Chandrapal Batra's house the question arrived differently. His son had resolved to distance himself from his father's business, but even that resolve lived inside a house bought with his father's earnings. One day several young men came to the gate. They shouted no slogans and threw no stones. Each held a switched-off mobile phone.

The son came outside. One of the young men said, "We lost in the game where we won on the first day. Now we go to tell other children that the first win is a trap. We want permission to pass in front of your house."

The son stood stunned. Chandrapal watched from behind a curtain. He thought of calling the police. But the young men were not blocking the road. They were only asking permission for their route. Criminals often fear a courteous question more than violence. Violence has a penal section; under what section does a question fall?

The son said quietly, "Go."

The young men walked on. Five children ran after them. Chandrapal came outside and gripped his son's arm. "Why didn't you stop them?"

For the first time the son looked directly into his father's eyes. "Why would I? They are my age. Their lives were looted. I am only wondering how many switched-off phones are hidden inside my education, my car, my house."

Chandrapal raised his hand to slap him, but it stopped in mid-air. Between his hand and his son he saw a screen. On the screen was not Ujjwal Jha's face but his empty chair. An empty chair is the hardest evidence; no one can cross-examine it.

In Raghav "Signal" Somani's house the question came from his daughter. She was a teenager, and her father never spoke to her about his business. That day she returned from school and said, "Baba, the teacher says a deleted message disappears. But what if it remains written in someone's mind?"

Raghav's cup was full of tea. Fine letters surfaced upon the tea: "Mind suspended." He put the cup down. His daughter asked again, "Why do you all speak so secretly on the phone? Is a secret always something wrong?"

Raghav wanted to say, "No, secrecy is business." But the language of business would not enter his daughter's eyes. He said, "Some things are secret for safety."

The girl immediately asked, "Whose safety?"

That small question stayed in Raghav's ears all night. Whose safety? The victim's? The kingpin's? The poor young man's who opened the account? The Hong Kong owner's? His own? When an answer breaks into too many pieces, a person begins to understand that he is living in a house of lies.

In Hong Kong, Lau Kin-Hung's son, studying at a foreign school, asked his father for a map of India. Lau was surprised. His son said that school had a lesson on colonialism, markets and ethical trade, and the teacher had asked whether those who earn from the name of a country know the names of its people.

Lau smiled. "Countries run on names. People do not."

The son fell silent, then said, "And if one day people ask for an account in their own names instead of the country's?"

Outside Lau Kin-Hung's glass house lay the sea. In sunlight the water shone like silver. Suddenly he felt that every wave was a name. So many names. So many that even the figures in his bank accounts seemed small.

That day Lau could not escape his son's eyes for the first time. Traders read profit-and-loss tables. Children demand accounts with their eyes.

In Garh Narikel these events did not occur at the same moment, but they occurred within the same breath. In Channa Grove Budhba Ghost told the children, "When a child begins asking questions in a rogue's house, know that the leaf has reached that door."

"Does the leaf fly there?" Ananya asked.

Budhba Ghost laughed. "Not the leaf. The name flies. The leaf is only its excuse."

Devika Sah was preparing the next lesson for her school: "Ask questions." She had the children write: "If someone says quick money, ask how. If someone says keep it secret, ask why. If someone says everyone does it, ask which names."

Nishant added arithmetic to the lesson. "A question cuts interest before anything else," he said. "A fraudster's profit rises on fear and falls on questions." The children liked the line. In their notebooks they wrote: "Questions cut interest."

At a meeting of the Oath of Privacy, Meera said, "The question of love belongs to the lover, not society. The question of consent belongs to the body, not an owner. The question of fear belongs to the one who sells fear." A teenage girl stood and asked, "What if someone in the house says not to talk about fear?" Meera answered, "Then light a lamp inside the house first."

Saumya was adding a new chapter to the documents: "The Children's Questions." She had understood that the hardest place to break the inheritance of corruption was not the courtroom but the family's eating mat. There a child asks: Where did this money come from? Why this silence? Whose fear is this?

After a reading of names abroad, Ira told the students, "Read names before you read policy. A theory built without names is often a curtain for crime." Her teacher remained silent. A student asked, "Where do we begin the names?" Ira answered, "Where the first profit was made."

Aruni would pause while writing all this. He feared the story might again turn into a sermon. But Ba said, "If the question grows out of the story, it is not a sermon. If the story falls silent out of fear of the question, it is a lie."

Gop Kumar's new file opened that day. Its title was "The Door." Inside were only three lines: "Rogues enter the inner world from the outer world not through punishment but through questions. Their children are the first messengers. The child who asked has already opened half the door of Channa Grove."

That night another game was held in Channa Grove. At the four corners of the kabaddi ground hung four pictures: Hariharan's granddaughter's tree, Chandrapal's son's empty chair, Raghav's daughter's question, Lau's son's map. The ghosts formed a circle around them.

The Loths were not silent today. One Loth, who for centuries had only watched, rolled into the circle and asked, "Which side will the children play on?"

Budhba Ghost said, "Children are not a side. Children are the whistle. They start the game; they do not stop it."

At that moment Panidubbi lifted her head from the pond. Her hair was longer than the darkness of the night. "I do not seize the feet of those who ask questions," she said. "Those who suppress questions entangle their own feet."

The Rakash spirits increased their light. In the glow it could be seen that at one edge of the field Batuknath Hariharan's mind trembled, at another Chandrapal Batra's mind searched for a phone, at the third Raghav Signal's mind deleted messages, and at the fourth Lau Kin-Hung's mind folded a map.

But in the centre of the field the children's questions were running. Questions have no feet; they have wings. They cannot be caught. In kabaddi, whatever cannot be caught changes the rules of the game.

Ananya ran to the centre of the field. On the ground she wrote: "Whose?"

One word. Yet that one word made the earth of Channa Grove tremble. Whose money? Whose death? Whose victory? Whose order? Whose silence? Whose country? Whose village? Whose name?

The ghosts breathed together. The fifteenth breath did not end; it spread. Leaves flew though there was no wind. Names rose though there was no mouth. Questions walked though there were no feet.

Ba watched from afar and said, "Now the story has reached their houses. Even if they wish it, they cannot remain outside any longer."

Aruni wrote the final line on the page, though it was only the final line of the chapter, not the story: "Where a child asks 'whose?', the inner door of the rogue opens."

FOLK SONG: THE GRANDDAUGHTER ASKED - WHOSE?

Folk tune: Grandmother-Granddaughter Song

*The granddaughter asked, "Whose?" - yes, she asked;
With the point of one question the locked door opened.
Fear flowed like water and entered the granddaughter's notebook;
A question sprouted at the corner of the ancestors' victory.
The granddaughter asked: "Whose wealth? Whose tears? Whose name?"*

*One word opened every chamber of the closed house.
The question moved without a name, the word without feet;
A child's little hand reached door after door.
Ba said: now it is impossible to remain outside;
Where a child asks "whose?", the lock of falsehood cannot hold.
The granddaughter's notebook was no longer blank; it became the clan's mirror;*

*With the point of one question, inheritance itself was pierced.
"Whose wealth, whose tears, whose name?" - three questions;
Ba said: where a child asks, night cannot remain.*

CHAPTER 45

The Air Within

A door does not simply remain open - the air trapped inside must first come out.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE CLOSED HOUSE OPENED

Folk tune: Courtyard Parati

Open the door, open it from within;

Let stale air escape, let new sunlight dissolve inside.

*The door opened from within, the old air came out;
Sunlight spread through the room and the whole house shone.
Sweep the cobwebs, open the windows, arrange memory with care;
Give hidden sorrow a safe place to be spoken.*

*A closed house is not guilty; it too needs company,
Laughter, footsteps, song, conversation - the true wealth of life.
When the house opens, the mind opens and the shadow retreats;
New light in the courtyard rebuilds relationships.*

*Sweep the cobwebs, wipe the shelves, plaster the courtyard clean;
Give concealed sorrow a safe place to speak.*

*The closed house is not a criminal; it too needs company,
Laughter, songs, the sound of footsteps - a house's real inheritance.*

In the fifteenth breath the children asked "whose?", and with that one word the doors of the rogues' houses opened from within. In the sixteenth breath those doors did not simply remain open; air began to move through them. This was not air from outside. It was the air of houses in which, for years, papers of victory, the smell of bribes, locks of fear and the glitter of inheritance had been kept sealed.

For several days Batuknath Hariharan kept his granddaughter's drawing locked in a desk drawer. Anything that was not a legal paper, he did not regard as paper. But the child's drawing would not stay in the drawer. Before he opened the drawer in the morning, it was already on the desk. If he locked the desk, the drawing appeared beneath his pillow. If he lifted the pillow, it appeared upon the mirror.

He understood that the drawing was not an object but a question. A question cannot be locked in a drawer.

One evening his granddaughter came into his room carrying another version of the same drawing. This time three new figures stood among the ghosts on the branches - an old man eating papers, a man chewing a mobile phone, and a merchant without a face. "Grandfather," she asked, "who are these people?"

Hariharan asked, "Why do you draw things like this?"

The child said, "Because you all do not tell stories. When no stories are told in a house, pictures begin making themselves."

Something broke inside Hariharan. For the first time he thought: his granddaughter would inherit the property of his house, his name, his car, his library - but would she inherit his silence too? Inheritance is often not property but an unanswered question.

He wanted to stroke the child's head. He extended his hand. She stepped back. "First tell me why you are standing outside the game."

The question had now left the drawing and taken on a body. Hariharan forgot every language of law. He understood that his granddaughter was making him not a grandfather but a witness.

The next day Chandrapal Batra's son returned his father's car. In the boot he had found old papers, bags of cash and pages from several banks. He placed the car key on the table. "I don't want this car."

Chandrapal stared. "You don't want the car? I was going to put it in your name."

"In my name? My name? If your earnings are written in my name, what will remain of me? The phones that went silent, the young men who hanged themselves, the houses that sank into debt - why should my name take the place of theirs?"

Chandrapal laughed. First lightly, then loudly. "You have studied too much. Idealism does not fill the stomach."

His son answered quietly, "I am old enough now to see how many stomachs were emptied to fill ours."

After that sentence such silence spread through the house that even the sound of the air conditioner seemed guilty. Chandrapal's wife listened from a distance. There was no fear on her face, only relief. Sometimes the first truth of a household is born not in the son but first inside the mother's silence.

Raghav "Signal" Somani's daughter placed a notebook on her father's desk. Its title was "Record of Silences." She said, "Baba, whatever you do not answer, I will write here. One day when this notebook is full, I will know how many empty spaces there are in your life."

Raghav tried to smile. "Daughter, children do not speak to their fathers like this."

She replied, "Then teach me how a child should speak when a father lies to her."

At that moment Raghav's phone vibrated. The vibration travelled from the table into his fingers as though someone were shaking him from within. A Signal message appeared: "Remove the file. Stop the names." His daughter looked at the phone. Raghav turned it face down.

In her notebook she wrote the first line: "First silence: the phone was turned over."

The line was written upon Raghav's chest. It seemed that the blank space was not forming in the notebook but in his body. For the first time he thought: deleted messages disappear only from a device, not from a child's eyes.

Lau Kin-Hung's son wrote an essay at school titled "The Lineage of Profit and the Debt of Names." His teacher gave it a prize. Lau attended the ceremony. On stage his son began to read. The first line said that his father claimed countries run on names, people do not - but he suspected that a man who profits from a country without knowing the names of its people is not earning, but stealing.

No applause followed in the hall. Silence arrived. Silence can weigh more than applause. Lau Kin-Hung's face turned to stone. It seemed to him that his son was not standing on a stage but beneath Channa Grove in Garh Narikel.

The boy read on: "If my lineage is a lineage of profit, I do not wish to inherit it. I want the list of names that were erased to make that profit."

Lau remained seated, but the merchant inside him began to run. Far away, the feet of that fleeing merchant sank into the sand of the Kamala-Balan.

The same air reached Edward Broom's house. His granddaughter, who studied history, asked that when he gave speeches on dignity, where did his company keep the names of the people who had died in its old projects?

Broom said, "History is complicated."

His granddaughter replied, "Complication does not give permission to erase names."

Broom's library was filled with thick volumes on global policy, business ethics, human dignity and the philosophy of development. Yet in that moment every page seemed blank. Those who need names do not need theory.

In Garh Narikel, Ananya felt these distant tremors. "Ba, when a rogue's child asks a question, does the child remain a rogue, or join our side?"

Ba laughed. "A child's side is the side of questions. It is born not against anyone, but against falsehood."

Ananya asked again, "Then do they have the right to play in Channa Grove?"

Ba said, "The field does not stop one who comes carrying a question. The one who comes to defend an answer is made to keep circling the field."

In the school against the screen, Devika Sah added a new lesson: "Questions at Home." She told the children, "A fraud does not always begin outside. Often it begins in a household's silence. If suddenly there is too much money, too much fear, too many phones, too much secrecy in your home, first ask lovingly. A question is not an insult; it protects the house."

Nishant asked, "And if parents say: you are a child, you will not understand?"

Devika answered, "Then say: because I am a child, I have the right to understand. Do not leave the debt of a lie upon my head."

In the Circle of Privacy Meera said, "Lineage does not travel only through blood. Fear can be inherited too, silence too, shame too. Now a new lineage will be made - a lineage of consent, questions and one's own right over one's own body."

A young woman stood and asked, "What if the family says these are outside ideas?"

Meera answered, "Self-respect is never foreign. The outside world is only a mirror; the face is within."

Saumya was writing the accounts of all these meetings. She understood that the novel's true turning point was not the arrest of the offender but the heir's refusal. A generation that says, "I will not take this profit," changes the direction of history.

Abroad, Ira began the second round of her "name lessons" with her students. This time the subject was "Conditions for Accepting an Inheritance." She said, "Accept an inheritance only after you understand its account. Property that fears questions is not property; it is a noose."

In Gop Kumar's file on Ishan Dutt, a new appendix appeared: "The Heir." It said: "Criminals are broken less by their crimes than by their children's refusal. Punishment is given by an institution outside; defeat is given by the question inside the home."

Aruni read the line and remained silent for a long time. He remembered his daughter Ananya, who never tired of reading the names of the dead in the game. He understood that the true heirs of Garh Narikel were not owners of land but the children who read the names.

That night in Channa Grove every child's question was turned into a leaf and hung from the branches: Hariharan's granddaughter's question, Chandrapal's son's refusal, Raghav's daughter's notebook, Lau's son's essay, Broom's granddaughter's query. The ghosts read the leaves. The pretas cleared the letters with white light. The Rakash spirits gave illumination. For the first time, the Loths applauded.

Budhba Ghost said, "Today is the sixteenth breath. In this breath, children born into houses of crime refused to inherit the lineage of crime."

From the pond Panidubbi said, "I do not seize the feet of those who refuse. They may walk."

The Hakkal Witch, who was always circling the rooftop, came down today. The souls she kept were calm. She said, "Breaking a lineage is difficult. But when a child says, 'This fear is not mine,' the old rope rots by itself."

At that moment Hariharan's mind entered from one corner of the field, Chandrapal's from another, Raghav's from a third, Lau's from a fourth. Their minds wanted to enter the game, but the children stood at the gate. The children held no weapons, only questions.

Ananya stepped forward. On the ground she wrote: "What will you take?"

The rogues' minds were silent.

Ananya wrote a second line: "What will you leave?"

Hariharan's mind trembled. Chandrapal's mind searched for a phone. Raghav's mind deleted a message. Lau's mind counted percentages. But no number would remain upon the field.

The children said together, "We will take the names that were erased. We will leave the profit made by erasing those names."

At those words the colour of Channa Grove's leaves changed. A faint green glimmer entered the bodies of the black ghosts, like oil poured again into an old lamp. Tears entered the eyes of the white pretas. The Rakash light dimmed, as though so much brightness were no longer needed. The Loths rolled in circles into the middle of the field and formed a ring with the children.

Ba watched from a distance and said, "Now the story is no longer only the story of the dead. It is also the story of those children who refuse to drink the milk of an impure victory."

Aruni wrote: "The sixteenth breath came on the day the descendants of crime said: we will take the names, not the profit. The sound of that refusal echoed through Channa Grove for a long time."

FOLK SONG: THE AIR OF THE CLOSED HOUSE

Folk tune: Courtyard Song

*The air came out, the air of the closed house came out;
The heir took the names and broke the thirst for sinful profit.
The door opened from within and the old air escaped;
The smell of bribes, papers of victory and fear all flew away.
The child of crime said: we will take the names, not the profit;
We will not drink impure milk and stain our own chests.
A green glimmer entered the black ghost; tears filled the preta's eyes;
The Loth sat in the children's circle and the darkness softened.
The story of the dead now became the story of living children too;
The future belongs to those with courage to leave the profit behind.
When the trapped air came out, the house breathed for the first time;
The heir took the names and broke the thirst for sinful profit.
The criminal's child said: not profit - I take the name.
The story of the dead became dawn for the living child.*

CHAPTER 46

The Darkness of Inheritance

The one who never looked at the face of wealth but saw the darkness behind it is the true heir.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: LIFE, THE VALUE OF BREATH

Folk tune: inheritance benediction

*Sing the blessing, sing the blessing of breath;
 Life before profit—teach this lesson.
 Not profit but breath comes first—walk by this rule;
 Let the towers of wealth come later; first light the lamp of life.
 Work, medicine, trade—let all be joined to human welfare;
 Only when one breath is saved does true profit grow.
 Give children honesty as an inheritance greater than wealth;
 The name of one whose work saves life knows no limit.
 The value of breath is life; no market can measure it;
 Wealth earned with compassion leaves flowers of happiness behind.
 Let the tower of wealth stand high, but let mercy be its foundation;
 In every ledger place the letters of breath above all else.
 Hand down to sons and daughters the capital of integrity;
 May the grace of life-saving work resound from age to age.*

In the sixteenth breath the children had said: we will take the name, not the profit. Written from leaf to leaf in Channa Grove, the sentence reached house after house. But when a sentence enters a home, it no longer remains merely a sentence. It enters the clatter of utensils, the old key on the shelf, the bank-stamped paper, the smell of clothes inside a cupboard. The seventeenth breath began on the day wealth started searching for its heirs, and the heirs began looking not at wealth's face but at the darkness behind it.

For many days Batuknath Hariharan kept avoiding his granddaughter's answer. He thought children asked questions and then returned to their games. But a child's question is like a dog that has once caught the scent of a doorway: every dawn it comes back and stands there. His granddaughter returned. This time she held no drawing, only a blank sheet of paper.

"Grandfather, what will you leave in my name?"

The old practised smile came to Hariharan's face, the smile with which he had spent years turning aside the edge of hard questions in court. "Everything," he said. "The house, the land, the accounts, the library, the name."

The girl drew three circles on the paper. Over the first she wrote: house. Over the second: account. Over the third: name. Then beside the first circle she drew tiny feet, beside the second water, and beside the third a tree.

“Why does the house have feet?” Hariharan asked before he could stop himself.

The girl said, “If a house is built on someone’s dead feet, it must walk at night.”

At that moment Hariharan understood that the law had no answer to a child’s drawing. He wanted to snatch the paper away, but his hand would not move forward. The feet drawn beneath the house were moving. They were not broad like courthouse steps, but fine as the roots of Channa Grove.

That night Hariharan opened his will. Every line was correct: the legal language immaculate, the properties listed, the shares clear. Yet the pages clung to his fingers like a dried bandage over an ancient wound. When he began to read, where it should have said “movable property” he saw “moving dead”; where it should have said “immovable property” he saw “immovable names.” He rubbed his eyes and read again. The letters returned to their proper places, but beneath them a faint sheen of water remained.

In Chandrapal Batra’s house the matter began differently. His son placed a mobile phone before him. There was no game on the screen, no account, no message—only a list: Munna Paswan, Ujjwal Jha, Sarayu, names Chandrapal had never once read in full.

“Were all these people my partners?” his son asked.

Chandrapal laughed. “No. They were cases.”

His son said, “Not cases. People. You always told me: study law, use your intelligence, recognise opportunity. But what is the difference between an opportunity and prey?”

Heat rose into Chandrapal’s ears. He took the phone from his son’s hand. The screen went dark, but the list did not. In the mirror, instead of his face, he saw the old room in Meerut where he had first bought a law book. On the opening page he had written: “I will study justice.” Across that page another sentence now appeared: “I will discover the rate.”

His son quietly placed a paper bearing his own name before him. “Write the source of every profit standing in my name. If you cannot write the source, remove it from my name.”

“Son,” Chandrapal said, “the world does not work like that.”

“Then I do not want that world,” his son replied.

After those words the conditioned air in Chandrapal’s house stopped. A window opened by itself. There was no river outside, yet the smell of water entered. From within the screen came the sound of a splash. For the first time Chandrapal understood that the digital crocodile does not merely chew up bodies; it chews through the trust between father and son.

For Raghav “Signal” Somani, the question of inheritance rose from his wife’s dinner plate. While serving rice, she set one grain aside each day. At first Raghav laughed. Later he grew irritated. One night he finally asked, “Why do you put aside one grain every day?”

“For the household whose rice was taken away by the money you earned,” his wife said.

Raghav fell silent. “You understand nothing. These are business matters.”

His wife looked at him. “If business makes a grain of rice an orphan, then inside a home it is no longer food. It is grain for a funeral rite.”

That night Raghav opened his secure messages. The messages he had deleted did not return. Something worse happened: in their place he saw grains of rice. Each grain bore a name. He touched one. It did not break. A line appeared on the screen: “The account is not closed; the soul is open.”

In Lau Kin-Hung’s home the question came from the sea. His granddaughter painted a blue tree on a glass wall. “What tree is that?” Lau asked. “The one that came in my dream,” the child said.

Mobile phones hung from the branches like fruit. No face appeared on any of them, only a voice: “Under which law is my death written?” Lau Kin-Hung tried to stop his granddaughter’s hand. She would not release the brush. He could not understand where such strength had come from in that small palm.

That day Lau asked for a list of his assets. Companies across the world, trusted agents, layered accounts, island addresses, charitable foundations, education grants, hospital funds. The list was immaculate. But when he reached the line where his granddaughter’s name was to be added, a question appeared on the screen: “Answer in the language in which it was earned.”

For the first time Lau’s wealth demanded a translation from him. The language of percentages, exchange rates and contracts was useless. He did not know the language of names in Garh Narikel. Sweat appeared on his brow at the knowledge of that ignorance.

Meanwhile the children of Garh Narikel had invented a new game of inheritance. The rule was simple: whoever picked up an object had to answer three questions—“Whose labour is this? Whose loss is this? Whose name is this?” If no answer could be found, the object was removed from the game.

One child brought a gleaming toy car. Everyone asked, "Whose labour?" The child had no answer. The car was removed. Another child brought an old wooden spinning top. "My grandfather's hands," he said. "He made it while resting in the middle of the fields." The top stayed in the game.

Ananya said, "Inheritance is not an object. Inheritance is the story that enters the house along with the object."

Ba smiled when she heard this. "If the children have understood that much, the rogues' wealth will become an orphan inside their own homes."

Saumya was writing down the rules of the game. Meera said, "Add a rule for privacy too. No one's love, body or fear can be handed down as inheritance." Devika added, "And any account opened without someone understanding it is a cursed inheritance too." Nishant said, "Wherever the first win appears, ask the first question."

Aruni watched the novel cease to be a sermon and become a game. Children were making the rules; the dead were finding rest inside them. The leaves of Channa Grove stirred lightly, as though setting their seal upon the children's rules.

Then Budhba Ghost slowly descended from the branch. For the first time he was fully visible in daylight. His black body had acquired the grey of ash, as though twelve hundred years of smoke were slowly being washed away. He entered the field and said to the children, "One more rule."

The children fell silent. Budhba Ghost said, "Do not cry over wealth made by erasing names. Even if you must go without it, go without it. Sometimes deprivation itself is freedom."

At those words Loth spun in circles. Rakash's glow faded; by day the children's faces now gave enough light. Panidubbi did not emerge from the pond, but a drop of water rose from her hair and settled upon a leaf of Channa Grove. In that drop four faces appeared: Hariharan's granddaughter, Chandrapal's son, Raghav's wife, Lau's granddaughter.

In their separate homes the rogues trembled in different languages. Yet the meaning of the trembling was the same everywhere: the heirs were closing the window of profit.

Hariharan tried to sign his granddaughter's blank page. His hand stopped. A sentence was already written there: "Take the name; leave the profit." He saw that it was not his granddaughter's handwriting. It was the handwriting of many hands—labourers, women, young men, patients, children.

Chandrapal ordered papers prepared to remove assets from his son's name. The papers were prepared, but his son's name did not disappear. Instead a long shadow grew behind Chandrapal's own name: Batra, Lakhera, mule, screen, splash. He folded the paper and threw it away. It opened itself and returned to the table.

Raghav left home for a hotel. He ordered food. When the plate arrived, one grain of rice lay apart from the rest. He changed hotels. On the second plate too, one grain lay apart. At a third place he ordered khichdi. In the middle of it was one grain without spice, white and solitary, like a witness.

Lau Kin-Hung ordered his granddaughter's picture removed. A servant reached for the glass. It was not cold but warm. The paint had not dried; it was pulsing. From inside the glass came the voice of a sea wave: "Read the names of the country from whose name you earned."

None of this appeared in any newspaper in Garh Narikel. But the leaves knew. News travels from leaf to leaf just as village women carry news from hearth to hearth.

That evening Ananya wrote on a page: "Seventeenth breath: the heirs' refusal." Then she paused. The word "refusal" felt too hard. She crossed it out and wrote: "choice."

"Why did you change it?" Aruni asked.

"They are not only saying no," Ananya replied. "They are choosing which story they will carry with them."

Aruni looked at that sentence for a long time. It seemed to him that the future of the novel was now in the child's hands. The writer would only write; they would choose the story.

Night came to Channa Grove. Kabaddi did not begin at once. First the children sat in a circle. A blank sheet lay in the middle. On it was written: "Whoever gave up the profit became worthy of the name."

Budhba Ghost drew breath. The black ghosts stood in a row. The spirits were pale. Rakash's glow was low. Loth was round. Panidubbi lay quiet in the pond. The Brahma of the pipal descended and blew upon the blank paper with all four faces.

The paper did not fly away. It sank into the earth. Where it entered the soil, a tiny coconut shoot emerged. With it rose a new smell from the ground—not flower, not fruit, but the smell of a wet beginning. A coconut shoot in Mithila's soil was said to be impossible. But in Garh Narikel even the impossible sprouts after learning the rules.

From a distance Ba said, "The line of wealth has not broken. A new line has begun—the line of becoming free from it."

The rogues could not sleep that night. Their heirs slept—not heavily but lightly. Giving up profit had not emptied their stomachs; it had emptied their chests, and for the first time air entered the empty space.

The seventeenth breath wanted to end, but Channa Grove held it back. The story had reached the turn where the children of the defeated and the children of the rogues were about to play on the same field. No paper of victory would count in that game. Only names, labour, love and chosen memory would count.

Aruni wrote the final line: “The true test of inheritance is not what came into your hands. It is what you were able to let go with your own hands, so that your name might stand not upon someone else’s death but upon your own breath.”

FOLK SONG: NOT PROFIT, BUT BREATH

Folk tune: inheritance viraha

*Leave the profit, leave the profit born of sin;
Know that your own name must stand beside your breath.
The face of wealth glittered; behind it the darkness deepened;
The true heir was the one who saw both roads.
Bank papers, old keys, the smell of the cupboard—
Upon whose death stands this bright moon of comfort?
“Take the name, not the profit”—the children’s vow;
Only when the chest was emptied did the first wind enter.
Children of the defeated and of the rogues will come to one field;
No order of victory will rule—labour and love will play together.
Whoever could release the sinful profit from their own hands,
Their name will stand beside their own breath.
“Take the name, not the profit”—the children’s vow.*

CHAPTER 47

The Gaja-Graha Tale

The elephant's foot was trapped in water and the crocodile's teeth in history—the hand that frees is always a third hand.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE WISDOM OF GAJA- GRAHA

Folk tune: folk-tale benediction

*Listen to the tale, listen to Gaja-Graha;
Ponder this knot: wisdom joined with strength is greater than strength alone.
The elephant's foot was trapped in water; its companions raised their voices;
However hard the crocodile's teeth, wisdom can still make a path.
Strength alone is never enough—there must be time, company and means;
In danger the lamp of discernment shows the road to freedom.
The elephant says: leave pride behind; asking for help is honour too;
The river says: the strength of companionship is the greatest life-force.
Learn from the Gaja-Graha tale; understand the movements of the net;
With patience, knowledge and cooperation, gather the lotus of victory.
The water was deep, the teeth were hard, yet a road remained;
At one cry, help arrived in the trembling hour.
To put aside pride and ask for help is also the work of courage;
Society wins through the threefold strength of patience, discernment and fellowship.*

In the seventeenth breath the heirs had seen the darkness behind wealth. They saw the platter of profit set before them and did not reach out. Channa Grove did not smile at this. The grove knew that renouncing profit does not end a story; only after profit is renounced does a person begin to see the force that had been pulling them. The eighteenth breath was the breath of that pull.

At dawn the children of Garh Narikel gathered near Channa Grove to play. The night's dew still clung to the leaves. The Loths sat in circles as though they had spent the whole night meditating with closed eyes. Rakash's body glowed faintly because daylight was arriving. The pale bodies of the spirits looked whiter still beneath the dew. It was hard to distinguish the black ghosts from the grove's shade.

Ananya came carrying a blank sheet. With her came the heirs of the rogues too—Hariharan's granddaughter, Batra's son, Signal's nephew, and a girl from a distant country who had been raised in Lau Kin-Hung's family but had fled the burden of that family name and reached Garh Narikel. Each child brought the fear of their own home, but on a playing field a child's fear quickly finds language.

"What game today?" Ananya asked.

Budhba Ghost descended from the branch on which he had sat for twelve hundred years. His feet remained a finger's breadth above the earth, but his voice came from inside the ground. "Today we play Gaja-Graha."

The children burst out laughing. "Is there such a thing as a Gaja-Graha game?"

Ba arrived carrying two things: an old brass bowl and earth brought from the bank of the Kamala-Balan. She placed the earth in the bowl and poured water over it. The soil swelled as though some creature within had taken breath; tiny bubbles rose from it, as though the ground were clearing its throat before telling an old story. Ba asked, "Have you heard the story of Gaja and Graha?"

Some of the children had, some had not. The rogues' heirs had seen the picture in schoolbooks—elephant, lotus, pond, crocodile. But in Garh Narikel no story remains like a picture in a book. When a story is told there, it arrives with mud on its feet.

Ba said, "There was an elephant. Huge. Powerful. It had a herd, a forest, water, tusks, pride—everything. It entered a pond, not to pluck flowers but to quench its thirst. Yet a crocodile lived in the water. The crocodile seized its foot. The elephant pulled toward land; the crocodile pulled toward water. Day passed, night passed. Strength faded. The herd watched, raised dust, trumpeted—but the crocodile was in the water, and the water was on its side."

"Did the elephant survive?" Hariharan's granddaughter asked.

"In the story, yes," Ba said. "But the one who listens must understand who the elephant was, who the crocodile was, and what the water was."

Budhba Ghost laughed. "And in Garh Narikel there is a third question too: does the one whom the elephant calls actually come? And if that one comes, in what form?"

Ananya wrote: elephant. Then: crocodile. Between them she drew water. Across the water she began writing small names: Ujjwal. Sarayu. Nand. Absent. Thirty. Three hundred. Mule account. Breath. Body. Privacy.

Chandrapal Batra's son stared at the paper. He remembered his father's mobile phone on which, once, a gaming symbol had opened with a red message beneath it: "Win today." His father had laughed that night. Now the boy understood that the word "win" too could become a crocodile's tooth.

The girl from Lau Kin-Hung's family, named Mei-Lata because her Indian nanny had called her Lata in childhood, asked, "The water is the crocodile's home and the elephant is the outsider. Doesn't that mean the elephant will lose?"

Ba looked at her. "Living in the water does not make the crocodile right. Sometimes home itself becomes the shelter of wrongdoing."

At those words the leaves of Channa Grove stirred. Far away, a reach of the Kamala-Balan flashed though there was no wind.

Budhba Ghost signalled the children onto the field. The rule was simple. One child would be the elephant, one the crocodile. The elephant would try to cross the earth-line while the crocodile held its foot from inside a circle of water. But the true difficulty was this: the elephant could not advance by strength alone. It had to move by speaking names. If it spoke a wrong name, the crocodile's grip would tighten. If it spoke a true one, the water would loosen a little.

Ananya became the first elephant. Hariharan's granddaughter became the crocodile. Ananya ran into the circle and her foot was seized. The grip was cold and slick—as though water itself had grown fingers. She did not laugh. "Sarayu," she said. The grip loosened. Then: "Ujjwal." The water withdrew a little. Then: "Nand Aruni." The crocodile's hand trembled on its own. Hariharan's granddaughter let go of her foot.

Budhba Ghost stopped them. "You broke the rule."

"I don't want to be the crocodile," Hariharan's granddaughter said.

Budhba Ghost grew serious. "Then become the elephant."

The girl became the elephant. Chandrapal Batra's son became the crocodile. She entered the circle of water. Batra's son seized her foot. "Procedure," she said. The grip tightened. "Law." The grip tightened further. Fear took her. Then Ananya whispered, "A name."

Hariharan's granddaughter closed her eyes. She remembered her grandfather saying he would leave her everything. She said, "If a house is built on dead feet, it walks at night."

It was not a name, but it was true. The water suddenly fell silent. Batra's son let go. "No one in my house speaks names," he said. "Only file numbers."

"File number is the crocodile's language," Ba said softly. "A name is the elephant's breath."

Meanwhile, in a distant city, Satyavrat Mehta sat at his desk. The court papers were closed. Through the window of his government residence he could see the city lights, but they looked to him not like lights but like reflections on water. An old book lay open before him—the tale of Gaja-Graha. Yet he was not reading the story; the story was reading him.

The book said the elephant cried out in danger. Satyavrat stopped. It seemed to him that in this novel no elephant had been allowed to cry out. The labourers' mouths had been filled with water. Ujjwal's mouth had been trapped inside a screen. Meera had had to suppress her voice to save her privacy. The language of the police had frightened Devika even when she spoke her brother's name. The Gaja-Graha tale is incomplete if the right to call for help is taken away.

For the first time Satyavrat Mehta understood that his final role was not that of a rescuer. He was no god, no advocate, no mouth of the government. He would return like a person willing to admit: "You could not call out because the system to which we belonged had shut its ears. I have come now to listen."

A paper lay on his desk—not a resignation letter, but a confession. It read: "Where the State remained silent upon paper, my signature on that paper shared the weight of the offence." Satyavrat lifted his pen. His hand trembled. Channa Grove was very far away, yet the rustling of its leaves reached the window.

He did not sign. He understood that a confession written in haste could itself become a paper for self-defence. He folded the sheet and put it in his pocket. In the end he would not come empty-handed, but neither would he arrive carrying a paper of victory. He would bring the paper that placed him himself in the dock.

The game continued in Garh Narikel. This time Batra's son became the elephant and Mei-Lata the crocodile. At first he tried to wrench himself free by force. Mei-Lata held on. "Percentage!" he shouted. The grip tightened. "Signal!" Tighter. "Commission!" The water rose to his knees.

In fear he said, "I don't know the names."

Devika, watching from a distance, came forward. Her voice was not harsh. "You have a name of your own. Say that first."

Batra's son spoke softly: "Aryan."

The water loosened. He stared in surprise. Then Devika said, "Now speak the name of the one who died in your father's game."

He was silent. His mouth went dry. His father had taught him: never admit anything. But in Channa Grove, breath grows shorter the longer one denies. At last he said, "Ujjwal Jha."

Mei-Lata's hand loosened. The water withdrew. Batra's son did not cry, but his face looked as though he had stepped outside his father's house for the first time.

"In the Gaja-Graha tale," Ba said, "deliverance begins when the elephant calls not upon a god, but upon a name."

Budhba Ghost shook his head in disagreement. “No, Janaki. Deliverance begins when the crocodile too understands the history of its own grip. Otherwise the elephant escapes and the crocodile seizes another foot.”

At this, Panidubbi spoke from the pond for the first time. Her voice was slick as a wet lock of hair. “The crocodile too can be a prisoner of hunger. But making hunger into a religion is a crime.”

Silence fell across Channa Grove. The children did not fully understand, but they wrote the sentence down. Children do not understand everything at once; some things they write down for the future.

Far away in the city, Batuknath Hariharan stared at a train ticket. He had already returned from Garh Narikel, yet the date of travel on the ticket kept changing—each day to the current date. He understood that the journey was not over. His mind still hung in Channa Grove. Tonight in his dream he would be the crocodile and his granddaughter the elephant.

A new game opened on Chandrapal Batra’s phone. Its title: “Become the Elephant.” He tried to close it. It would not close. A rule appeared: “Stage One: Say your own name.” He threw the phone. It struck the floor but did not break. Ujjwal’s name continued to glow on the screen.

Into Raghav Signal’s silence fell a leaf. One sentence was written on it: “Breath travels not through invisible messages, but through names spoken openly.” No one could explain how the leaf had entered through the window.

Lau Kin-Hung sat beside the sea. He saw no elephant, only a vast shadow laying its trunk against a tower of glass. A crocodile rose from the sea and seized not the shadow but Lau’s own foot. He did not cry out. His voice was trapped inside percentages.

The game in Garh Narikel did not end. The children grew tired, but the water did not. It kept circling within the ring. Budhba Ghost said, “Write the lesson of the eighteenth breath.”

Ananya wrote: “The elephant was strong, but without a name its strength remained trapped in water. The crocodile ruled the water, but without history its grip became a curse. Whoever comes to listen will not be a god, but a witness.”

Ba added the final line: “In the end Satyavrat Mehta will not come carrying a sword. He will bring his ears. The first penance of a system that failed to listen for generations will be to listen.”

The leaves of Channa Grove bent over that line. The paper did not fly away. It stayed on the earth. For this chapter was not a tale of the sky, but a tale of the foot—the foot a crocodile seizes, and the foot that slowly rises out of the water through the strength of names.

The eighteenth breath did not end. It merely paused like the exhausted elephant still searching for the right word with which to call. And in Channa Grove everyone—ghosts, spirits, children, the minds of rogues, leaves, water—began practising how to listen. For the next breath would be a call. And when a true call is made, no ear in Garh Narikel remains innocent.

FOLK SONG: THE ELEPHANT'S FOOT, THE CROCODILE'S TEETH

Folk tune: folk-tale song

*Listen to the call, listen to the elephant's call;
Understand: one must stand not with a sword, but with ears.
The elephant's foot was trapped in water; the crocodile gripped it hard;
A third hand came to free it because it heard the cry.
After profit was renounced, the net that pulled became visible;
Across generations the terrible teeth remained beneath the water.
Not with a sword but with ears, Mehta will come one day;
The system's first penance will be to hear the silenced call.
The paper stayed upon the earth; this is a tale of feet;
By the strength of names, exhausted lives rise from the water.
The elephant searches for the word of its call; the grove becomes an ear;
In the next breath the crime of every silence will open.
The paper remained on the earth; the tale kept the rhythm of feet.*

CHAPTER 48

The Call

One may speak all one's life; when the hour for listening comes, the ears are found filled with dust.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: EARS FOR THE CALL

Folk tune: hopeful cadence of a sorrowful call

Give an ear, give the call an ear;

*Before answering, grant it its full dignity.
 Give an ear to the one who has called all their life;
 Do not interrupt with an answer—first grant the voice its full worth.
 Time given to listening is service; patience in listening is a gift;
 One attentive hearing can save many a broken life.
 Build in the village a “house for listening,” and keep its door open;
 Let one weep, another speak—let all find boundless support.
 If ears awaken for the call, silence will not die;
 Through respect for the heard voice, justice slowly descends.
 A half-heard story heals only half a wound;
 A voice heard with patience descends all the way within.
 Village after village, let a “house for listening” stand with an open veranda;
 Let the angry and the grieving alike find a place to sit.*

In the eighteenth breath the elephant had seen its foot trapped in water, the crocodile had begun to understand the history of its grip, and everyone in Channa Grove sat down to practise listening. Listening is no small task in Garh Narikel. People there speak all their lives, but when the time comes to listen, their ears fill with the old dust of fear, profit, caste, rank, education, defeat, victory papers and humiliation. So Budhba Ghost said, “No kabaddi today. Today: the call.”

That morning the dew in Channa Grove did not dry for a long time. The day rose high; the village women finished smearing their courtyards with dung-water, children set off with schoolbags on their backs, old men lit bidis on the verandas—yet the dew remained on the leaves of Channa Grove. Tiny drops hung from their tips as though waiting for someone’s name to be spoken.

This time Ananya brought not a blank page but an empty bowl. The moment Ba saw it she knew the child had found the next rule of the game. The bowl was set in the middle of Channa Grove. There was no water in it. “Why empty?” Ba asked.

“If a call is made into a full bowl,” Ananya said, “the voice will keep looking at its own reflection. An empty bowl is a home for sound.”

Budhba Ghost descended from the branch. In his eyes was the tired brightness of twelve hundred years. He placed an ear beside the bowl. Much can be heard even in an empty bowl. One who has no ear calls it emptiness; one who has an ear calls it history.

The first call was Sarayu's—the woman labourer whose name had never been written correctly in the bridge office. Sometimes "Saru," sometimes "woman," sometimes "absent," sometimes "left the worksite." Her voice came not from the bowl but from a drop of dew. "Even when someone wrote my name wrongly, I still existed. A wrong name brought no bread, no compensation, no mourning. But a wrong name does not make a death smaller."

The children began writing together: Sarayu. One child's "S" bent crookedly, another stretched the ending too long, another misplaced a mark. Ba did not stop them. "A name sometimes trembles the first time it is written," she said. "A trembling name is alive."

The second call was Ujjwal Jha's. It came not from water but from the darkness of a switched-off phone. Devika Sah had arrived carrying her brother's old mobile, dead for months. Without any button being pressed, the screen flickered. No game opened. Only one line appeared: "I am not the money I lost; I am the morning of my home."

Devika placed the phone on the ground. She was not crying. Her eyes held the steadiness of someone who had already turned grief into work. "These games swallowed my brother," she said, "but I will write his name not in a game, but in a school."

The leaves of Channa Grove stirred slowly at that sentence. There was no wind. They moved from memory.

The third call was Munna Paswan's. He was alive, yet his bank account was more haunted than many dead men. His name was an accused person in court, a beneficiary in the bank, a suspect in police papers, a disgrace in the village, and a frightened father at home. He did not come forward. His voice came from outside the grove's circle: "I did not understand whose corpse my thumbprint would have to lift."

Ananya called him inside. Munna entered trembling. His feet touched the ground, but his shadow lagged behind. Budhba Ghost picked up the shadow and set it beside his feet. "Where a name becomes trapped, the shadow is left behind. Speak."

"I opened the account for a commission," Munna said. "I thought I would get two thousand rupees. Then the police came. The person who lost crores has no name; my name is there. The one who told me what to do is in the city. The one who told the city is abroad. The person abroad has no face. I have a face, so I am the criminal."

Ba placed a hand on his head. "The burden of an offence committed knowingly is one thing. The burden of a person trapped in darkness is another. But when one who was trapped begins teaching others how to recognise the darkness, the burden becomes a lesson."

From that day Munna became the first volunteer at the school against the screen. He would tell the children about his own mistake. Speaking his mistake aloud would be both his punishment and his release.

While these calls were being heard, far away in Delhi Satyavrat Mehta sat in the library of his government residence. Before him lay files of every kind—sealed, open, marked, rejected, under reconsideration. On his desk stood a small brass bell usually rung for a servant. That day the bell rang by itself. Once. Then silence.

Satyavrat Mehta stared at the bell. He remembered the hardest day of his life—the day he had stopped midway while reading a line written by the State in court. People had thought it courage. Satyavrat knew it had been less courage than the helplessness of an exhausted soul. How many times can a person read a lie aloud? One day the throat closes by itself.

The bell rang a second time. Now the sound came not like a bell but like a bowl—the call from inside an empty bowl. Satyavrat rose and opened the window. Delhi's dust, trees, security guards, red beacons, government cars—all were still there. Yet the air smelled of earth from the bank of the Kamala-Balan.

An old paper on his desk lifted and fell to the floor. It was an affidavit that had never been filed. On it was his note: "Verification of the list of names required." Beneath the note new letters had appeared: "Not verification. Listening."

Satyavrat sat down again. For the first time he understood that reading a file and listening to a name were two different acts. In a file a person becomes an object. Once a name is heard, the person becomes body, home, voice, morning, humiliation, hunger and waiting. Jurisprudence had taught him much, but never the grammar of waiting.

That night sleep did not come. In its place came a long corridor. Cupboards lined both sides. Each bore a label: "Adjourned." One: "Dead." Another: "Absent." A third: "Digital dispute." A fourth: "Commercial secret." A fifth: "National interest." A sixth: "Privacy." A seventh: "Insufficient evidence." At the end of the corridor sat a little girl. She might not have been Ananya, and she might have been every child.

"Where are your ears?" the girl asked.

"Here," Satyavrat said, touching them.

The girl shook her head. "Those are for hearing sound. The ears for hearing a name are inside."

Satyavrat woke. It was four in the morning. He did not call the security officer, did not summon the government car, did not inform his secretary. Into a small shoulder bag he put two changes of clothes, a notebook, a fountain pen and the old affidavit. Then he opened the door and stepped outside. The guard started. "Sir, the car?"

"No," Satyavrat said. "Today I will begin on foot."

One cannot walk from Delhi to Garh Narikel. Yet some journeys must begin on foot so that the weight of office may fall away. He walked as far as the station. Some people recognised him, others did not. Those who recognised him thought: some important man in ordinary clothes. Those who did not saw only a tired old man. Under that second gaze Satyavrat felt lighter.

He had no reserved berth on the train. He climbed into a general coach. It was crowded. A young man watched a game on his phone, a woman nursed a child, an old man talked about litigation, two labourers slept with their heads on bundles. Satyavrat stood near the door. In that moment it seemed to him that the country's justice was standing in that very carriage—with tickets, without tickets, with fear, with exhaustion.

A child looked up at him. "Grandfather, where are you going?"

"Garh Narikel," Satyavrat replied.

"What is there?" the child asked.

After a long pause Satyavrat said, "Ears."

The child laughed. His mother hushed him. But the fan hanging from the roof of the coach turned at that answer as though it were a leaf of Channa Grove.

Back in Garh Narikel, the sequence of calls continued. Not all the names belonged to the dead. One day Meera stood in Channa Grove and said, "Tell the one who tried to frighten me: my love was not the crime; the blackmail was." The leaves set this sentence apart. A call about privacy is the quietest of calls, but once it emerges it travels very far.

Saumya Ramanathan was translating old papers into the people's language. "A lie written in English often looks more dignified," she said. "Translate it into Maithili and you can see its belly." Ira, back from abroad, told the children how different the applause of an auditorium was from the silence of a village. Gop Kumar remained quiet. His silence was no longer guilt; it had become a form of penance.

Budhba Ghost grew tired from listening to so many calls. Ghosts do not tire, but the exhaustion of listening belongs not to the body but to the soul. He said to Panidubbi, "Many names came today."

From the pond Panidubbi replied, "When names enter water, the water becomes heavy. But heavy water also becomes deep."

Evening was falling. Along the bank of the Kamala-Balan there was no red glow, only a pale light like turmeric. Then a figure appeared on the distant road. He carried no sword, no order, no microphone, no flag. Only a small bag. He walked slowly, as though with every step he were laying down an old office.

Ananya saw him first. "Who is coming?"

Ba narrowed her eyes. "Someone who has come to practise listening."

When Satyavrat Mehta reached Channa Grove, no one applauded. No one bowed. No one gave him a stage. There was no stage. The empty bowl stood in the middle. Names lay on paper. Dew rested on leaves. Children sat in a circle. Ghosts stood behind. The Loths were not spectators but participants.

Satyavrat set his bag down. He took out the old affidavit but did not open it. First he touched both ears with his hands, then folded his hands and said, "I have come very late."

No one answered. In Channa Grove, silence too is an answer.

Then he said, "I am accustomed to reading. Today I will listen. Whoever wishes to speak a name, speak. Whoever wishes to remain silent, remain silent. I will write down the testimony of silence too."

At those words water began to fill the empty bowl by itself. It did not pour from above; it rose from the bottom. There was no sound of a stream, only a faint humming from the brass as though a throat sealed for years were slowly opening. The water was not clear but muddy. Yet in that muddy water the sky appeared perfectly clear.

Ba whispered into Ananya's ear, "Do you see? Satyavrat is no god. He did not bring the water. He merely admitted that the bowl was empty. That was enough for the water to rise."

Satyavrat kept looking into the muddy water. In it he saw the courtroom floor, sealed covers, red beacons, official language, his own signature, and thousands of unread names. He lowered his head for the first name.

A voice came first from a leaf: "Sarayu."

Satyavrat wrote: Sarayu. Then he paused. "Full name?" he asked.

The leaf stirred. The answer came: "A name becomes complete only when you write the name of the home, the labour of the body, the child's waiting, and the lie in the compensation."

Satyavrat stopped his pen. What legal form could contain such an entry? He thought for a long time. Then on the first page of the notebook he wrote a heading: "The Full Form of a Name."

Budhba Ghost smiled. That evening a new chapter of jurisprudence began in Garh Narikel—not section but listening, not order but record, not victory but admission.

The night deepened. The calls kept coming. Some names were clear, some partial, some only sobs. Satyavrat kept writing. When his hand tired, Ananya took the pen. When Ananya tired, Devika. When Devika tired, Munna. When Munna tired, Hariharan's granddaughter. When she tired, Batra's son.

At the sight, the eyes of the ghosts in Channa Grove grew brighter and brighter. The hands of the rogues' descendants writing down names did not erase the crimes of their fathers; but those hands loosened the grip of the future.

At midnight Satyavrat did not close the notebook. He left it open. "It will remain unfinished," he said. "As names come, they will be written. If justice cannot be complete, let the record at least remain open."

"Now you have listened," Ba said. "What is your call?"

"Mine?" Satyavrat said, startled.

"Everyone who listens has something trapped inside too," Ba replied.

Satyavrat was silent for a long time. Then he bent toward the empty bowl and said, "I cannot ask forgiveness for all the days I remained silent, because asking forgiveness can itself become a trick for making oneself lighter. I will say only this: every time my silence supported a lie, write the name of that silence in this record too."

"Does silence have a name?" Ananya asked.

"Yes," Satyavrat said. "The heaviest name of all."

The children wrote on the paper: Silence. Beneath it: Satyavrat Mehta. He did not stop them. Water fell from his eyes. The drop did not enter the bowl; it fell upon the earth. Where it struck, a small black mark appeared in the soil, like a signature outside the record. The earth drank it.

The nineteenth breath did not end there. The chain of calls continued. Only one thing had changed: for the first time in Garh Narikel, a great man of law sat there carrying ears, and the dead understood that their voices would no longer strike a courtroom wall and return; they would descend into someone's chest.

At the end of the night kabaddi began. The rule was simple: whoever took a breath would speak a name. Whoever spoke a name would listen. Whoever listened would not flee. Satyavrat Mehta sat outside the circle. He was not required to play. His punishment was to listen. That night the punishment felt to him like a blessing.

Dew gathered again upon the leaves of Channa Grove. One drop slowly fell onto the open page of the notebook. The ink did not run. Instead a new word formed: "Call."

Budhba Ghost shook the leaves. "Write the nineteenth breath."

Ananya wrote: "The one who calls does not need a god; they need an ear capable of hearing the crime of its own silence."

Satyavrat Mehta did not read the sentence. He only listened. For he was slowly learning that some sentences, read with the eyes, become knowledge; heard with the ears, become remorse; heard with the heart, become work.

FOLK SONG: EARS FOR THE CALL

Folk tune: sorrowful song of calling

*Give an ear, give the call an ear;
Do not rescue us—recognise your own silence.
We spoke all our lives; when the time came to listen, who arrived?
The ears were filled with the dust of rank, profit and caste.
We need no god, only an ear
That can hear the crime of its own silence in the night.
Read a name with the eyes and it becomes a leaf of knowledge;
Hear it with the ears and it becomes a night of remorse.
When it descends into the heart, it becomes work;
The debt of the call falls upon the listener.
O listener, do not give us deliverance;
Hear our voice and recognise your own silence.*

CHAPTER 49

The Archive of Silence

A voice once heard becomes a debt - the one who heard it must repay it.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE LEDGER OF WHAT WAS HEARD

Folk tune: song of the ledger of silence

*Write, O ledger of the heart, write with the ink of consent;
Keep the pearls of heard stories in a casket of dignity.
The ledger written in the ear is deeper than paper;
Responsibility for what is heard makes the heart grave.
Preserve the name, the day, the context; write only with permission;*

Know the boundary of dignity - how much of whose story may be opened.

What you hear is a debt; repay it through service;

Keep the notebook of trust clean and carry it to its rightful place.

When the ledger of the ear remains in honest hands,

The history of the unheard can take a secure form.

Fix name, day and circumstance upon the page, clean and clear;

Ask before revealing whose words may open, and where.

Settle the debt of hearing slowly through service;

Keep this ledger of trust unsoiled throughout your life.

In the nineteenth breath came the call. In the twentieth, the reckoning of the call opened. In Garh Narikel it is believed that once a voice reaches the ear, it is no longer merely a voice; it becomes a debt. Whoever hears it must repay that debt. Satyavrat Mehta listened all night. At dawn he felt that his ears had grown heavy, as though every name had settled inside them as a small stone.

The bowl grew heavy with that understanding. For it was filled not merely with water, but with the weight of names that had crossed beyond the body.

At first Satyavrat Mehta tried to hold this matter in the language of law. "Posthumous dignity," "compensation," "liability" - he turned these words over and over in his mind. But in Channa Grove he understood that when the body is gone, dignity is not a courtroom term; dignity is the moment when a child reads a full name aloud without fear.

Thus water-burial was no longer merely death by drowning. It became the name of that unbearable bridge between the end of the body and the release of the bonds within, a bridge across which a human being walks weeping and yet growing lighter. The labourer who fell into the water lost the body; but the name that the contractor had marked absent came out of the river after the crocodile's teeth. The body ended; the name was free. That contradiction is the heart of this story.

From that night onward the tale of Gaja and Graha seemed to be told again and again in the leaves of Channa Grove. The elephant was strong, but in the water the graha seized it and broke the pride of its strength. When the foot would not come free, pride came free; when pride fell away, the cry was born. Once the cry was born, the road to deliverance opened. In Garh Narikel the crocodiles were neither the mythic graha nor angels; they were the hard teeth of nature. Yet sometimes, when they chewed a body away, the cry bound inside that body was released.

The crocodiles had played no game. The old people of Garh Narikel used to say that when a crocodile chews a body, it does not break bones alone; tooth by tooth it also loosens the knots of fear bound to the body, the lies of paper stuck upon the body like a burden, and the name sunk in the mud of humiliation. It sounded cruel, but the truths of Garh Narikel always sound cruel at first and compassionate afterward.

The dawn in Channa Grove was different that day. The sun rose, but the light caught in the leaves, as though day had come outside but not within. The empty bowl still stood in the middle of the grove. There was no water in it, yet its bottom was wet. Satyavrat tried to lift it. It would not rise. The Loths sat in a circle around it, their little round bodies like the seals of a court.

Ananya asked, "Why has the bowl become so heavy?"

Ba said, "When an empty thing has listened, it becomes heavier than a full one."

Satyavrat began to close his notebook. Budhba the Ghost called from a branch, "Not yet. The names have been written, but the names of silence remain."

Satyavrat stopped. His finger remained upon the notebook page. He was a man of law: he knew how to make lists, add sections, count charges. But a list of silences? Silence was not written on paper. Silence was the blank space between files, the moment in a meeting when someone heard the truth and reached for water, the corner of a statement where someone wrote, "investigation is in progress."

Ba kept looking at him. "Without writing the names of silence, the call will remain incomplete. We have written the names of those who died. We may or may not ever find the names of those who killed them. But history will remain incomplete until we write the names of those who saw and kept silent."

Satyavrat said quietly, "You want me to write my own crime?"

Ba answered, "Not yours alone. Everyone's. But you will begin, because you heard."

The sentence cut Satyavrat to the core. He remembered the first day of his first job: an old room in a district court, an old table, a file tied with red tape, and in that file a poor man's petition on which he had written, "For consideration." The petition never came into his hands again. Perhaps the man had died; perhaps he had gone home defeated; perhaps today his son was trapped in someone's mule account. Suddenly Satyavrat felt that the words "for consideration" too had been a small graha.

He opened the notebook again. On the first page was written: the full form of the name. Beneath it were the names written throughout the night. Satyavrat opened the next page and wrote the heading: The Archive of Silence. As he wrote, the letters trembled. Before the ink had dried, a drop of dew fell on the page and enlarged the first letter of "Silence," as though that letter were preparing to swallow all the others.

The first silence was written beside Sarayu's name. Nand's ledger had not contained her full name. In the contractor's office her death did not exist. In the government list she was absent. But in the Archive of Silence it was written: "The silence of the officer who did not think it necessary to ask the name of a woman labourer."

The second silence was written beside Ujjwal Jha's name: "The silence of the family that saw sleep leave his eyes on the first night, yet dismissed the red glow of the game on his phone as merely a game." Devika trembled as soon as she heard the line. "Write my name here too," she said.

Ba placed a hand on her shoulder. "Guilt and silence are not the same. But if you want the future to listen, write down the day on which you yourself did not listen."

With her own hand Devika wrote, "A sister's silence." Then she bowed her head over the page. She was not crying, but the tears of those who work from within do not always reach the eyes. Some tears go straight into the writing.

The third silence came before Munna Paswan: "The bank's silence." Munna spoke at once. "The bank clerk told me to open the account and said I would get work. Did he know?"

Budhba the Ghost answered, "Sometimes knowledge is not necessary; suspicion is enough. Whoever sees cause for suspicion and then remains silent belongs in the record of silence too."

Munna remained silent for a long time. He remembered that on the day the account was opened, a clerk at the bank had looked at his Aadhaar card three times and then murmured to someone on the phone, "Yes, this one is fine. He is a village boy." Munna had not understood those words then. Now he did.

Ananya wrote, "Silence after seeing cause for suspicion."

Satyavrat Mehta watched the child write with ease what was, in effect, a difficult proposition of law. In Delhi such a sentence would require a fifteen-page note. In Channa Grove, one line.

Meanwhile Batuknath Hariharan awoke in the village dharmashala. He had not slept all night. The copy of the judgment he had kept beneath his pillow was found at dawn with its paper edge bitten away, as though tiny teeth had been gnawing it all night. He opened it. The letters were correct, the order was correct, the victory was correct. But in the blank spaces of the page small words had sprouted: "When you knew, why were you silent?"

Alarmed, Hariharan folded the paper. His granddaughter came in. The light of a Garh Narikel dawn lay on the child's face. She asked, "Grandfather, will you write your own name in the Archive of Silence?"

A laugh tried first to escape Hariharan's mouth. "This is a children's game." But no sound emerged. The same leaf from the night seemed lodged in his throat. He managed only, "I am a man of law."

His granddaughter said, "Then you should be the first to understand the law of silence."

She left. Hariharan remained seated in the chair. He remembered how often he had declared in bar auditoriums, "Procedure is above everything." Today it seemed to him that, while saying "procedure" again and again, he had pushed countless faces downward. Yet he was not ready to admit it. In Hariharan's dictionary, admission meant defeat.

Elsewhere in the city Chandrapal Batra went to a shop to have the broken screen of his dead phone replaced. The shopkeeper said, "The screen is fine. The picture inside is damaged." Batra snapped, "Change the picture." The shopkeeper switched on the phone. The same list appeared again: Ujjwal Jha, Munna Paswan, unknown account, suicide, digital arrest, a mother's mortgaged jewellery. Frightened, the shopkeeper handed the phone back. "Sir, this is not a mobile phone. It is testimony."

Batra left the shop. The street was crowded, but upon every face he seemed to see the same word: "Silence." He sat in his car and sent Raghav Signal a message: "Stop the game of names." The message did not go. Instead the screen answered: "Silence sent."

Raghav Signal sat in his room. All the secret messages he thought he had erased were falling across his table like paper leaves. Each leaf carried no order and no amount of money, only the moment at which he had remained silent: "He is a poor boy; he will lend his account." "Frighten him; the money will come out." "Keep the girl's pictures; she will not testify." "Tell the old father his son will go to jail." These messages were not commands; they were the reverse face of silence.

For the first time Raghav wondered: had I committed crimes by speaking, or by remaining silent? He understood: both. His speech had been instruction; his silence, permission.

In Garh Narikel the Archive of Silence kept filling. Satyavrat grew tired from writing. Ba asked, "Tired?"

"Yes," he said. "But this is the right kind of tiredness."

Ba said, "Rightful weariness does not make a person smaller. It is better than the comfort of falsehood."

By midday a strange assembly had formed in Channa Grove: families of victims, children of rogues, village elders, the schoolmaster, a bank clerk who had taken leave, the hospital compounder who had prepared bills during the pandemic, a lawyer's clerk who had grown old writing dates - everyone. No one wholly criminal, no one wholly innocent. Channa Grove told them all the same thing: "Wherever you could have listened and did not, write it down."

The bank clerk protested first. "I have to follow rules."

Saumya asked calmly, "Is there no place in the rules to record suspicion?"

The clerk fell silent. He remembered that the final line of the form said "Other remarks." That line was always left blank. Slowly he wrote, "The silence of leaving 'Other remarks' blank."

The hospital compounder said, "I was not a doctor. The bills came from above."

Devika asked, "Where was 'above'?"

The compounder looked at the sky, then understood that "above" was not a deity but an accounts manager sitting in an air-conditioned room. He wrote, "I saved my own face by saying 'from above.'"

The lawyer's clerk who had spent his life writing dates looked at his trembling hand. "I never buried a file. I only wrote what I was told."

Satyavrat looked at him for a long time. "How many times did you see an old mother sitting at the door and still not send her file inside?"

The clerk's hand trembled. He wrote, "The silence of the doorway."

This Archive of Silence was not a court register. It contained no provision for punishment, only the pain of admission. But in Garh Narikel it is believed that when an admission is true, it cuts deeper than punishment. Punishment is imposed from outside; admission cuts from within.

Evening fell. Satyavrat Mehta's notebook was full. Ananya brought a second notebook. Ba a third. Meera a fourth. Ira laid down a stack of papers that had come from abroad; they bore the emblem of a foreign auditorium. Ba turned them over. "Applause was written on these. Now write silence on them."

Ira lifted the pen. She wrote: "The silence of the foreign auditorium, when the shadow of the Garh Narikel bridge appeared amid speeches on ethics and no question was raised."

Edward Broom, across the sea, was sitting in his office at that moment. Before him lay the draft of his next speech: "The Future of Accountable Capital." Suddenly a blank page slipped out from among the papers. Its heading was "The Archive of Silence." His secretary asked, "Sir, whose document is this?" Broom began to answer, but no voice came out. For the first time he understood that speaking from a lofty stage can itself be a form of silence when it covers the truth.

By nightfall fourteen lanterns burned in Channa Grove. There was the light of the Rakash too, but this time human beings had brought lanterns as well. The Loths watched the light. One Loth rolled slowly toward a lantern and placed its small hand upon it. The light did not dim. Ba said, "See? Even what is made from the remnants of a body can hold light."

Satyavrat Mehta wrote down the sentence. It seemed to him larger than all the books of law. A society that treats the memory of the dead only as inauspicious stops learning from the dead. Garh Narikel made the dead not into darkness, but into bearers of light.

Suddenly the empty bowl rang by itself. Ting. Everyone fell silent. A voice came from the bowl: "Silence has been written. Now the names that have been written must be read."

Budhba the Ghost nodded. "In the twentieth breath, the reading begins."

Satyavrat asked, "Who will read?"

Ananya answered, "Those who remained silent."

A stir ran through the gathering. Writing a name was one thing; reading it was another. While writing, a person looks at paper; while reading, other eyes look at the reader. The bank clerk tried to step back. The lawyer's clerk trembled. The compounder broke into sweat. Hariharan's granddaughter looked toward her grandfather. Hariharan stood at the far edge of the grove, believing no one saw him. But in Channa Grove the edge is never a place to hide; the edge is where the inside begins.

Ba said, "Hariharan Babu, you read."

Hariharan froze. "Me?"

For the first time Satyavrat looked him straight in the eye. "Yes. You have read procedure all your life. Today read names."

The paper was placed in Hariharan's hand. He began, "Sarayu..." His voice broke. He stopped. His granddaughter said softly, "Read it in full."

He began again: "Sarayu, whose name remained incomplete on paper; the silence of the officer who did not ask her name."

As he read the line the leaves of the grove moved. Hariharan's throat dried. It seemed to him that the words were not coming from his own throat, but from some ancient crack.

The second line: "Ujjwal Jha, whose dawn was eaten by the crocodile of the screen; the silence of the family, the silence of society, the silence of advertising, the silence of law." Hariharan stopped. Chandrapal Batra's son kept looking at the paper. Then he stepped forward and said, "I will read this."

He read it. His voice shook, but he read. In the city, at that very moment, Chandrapal sat clutching his chest. It felt as though a child were opening the safe inside him.

Throughout the night of the twentieth breath, Garh Narikel held a reading of names. Those who had never spoken from a stage read aloud. Those who had spoken too much from stages listened. This was not a reversal for its own sake, but the first lesson of justice.

At midnight Budhba the Ghost spoke the final line: "The names written in the Archive of Silence will not be erased. But this archive is not meant to remain a collection of guilt; it is meant to become a practice of listening. Whoever listens and turns that hearing into action will see their silence slowly fall away like leaves. Whoever listens and again remains silent will find that silence becoming a graha that seizes the foot."

Satyavrat Mehta sat beside the bowl for a long time. He understood that in the end he was not meant to become a saviour, but a keeper of this archive - a keeper who would guard not a gate, but the ear. When power said, "The matter is closed," he would say, "The name is incomplete." When a court said, "Procedure is complete," he would answer, "The hearing remains."

In the first light of dawn Ananya wrote the twentieth breath. She wrote: "Whoever writes the name of silence accepts the burden of guilt; whoever reads the name of silence opens a road for the future. In Garh Narikel justice grows not from verdicts, but from the reading aloud of names that have been heard."

Satyavrat read the line - this time with his eyes and his ears. The ears that had grown heavy in the night seemed a little lighter at dawn. One does not become light because guilt has vanished, but because one accepts the duty of guarding against it.

The leaves in Channa Grove slowly began to dry. The drops of dew fell away. The empty bowl could now be lifted. Satyavrat raised it. The bowl was light, but his hand was heavy. Ba smiled. "Good. The bowl is light and the hand is heavy. Work can be done by such people."

The twentieth breath had not ended. It had been only the first reading of the archive. In the next breath the names that had been read would walk. And when names walk, they leave footprints in village, city, court, foreign land, screen and auditorium alike. The rogues would think they could burn the paper. But the Archive of Silence had been written less on paper than inside ears. Once an ear awakens, fire cannot burn it.

FOLK SONG: THE LEDGER WRITTEN IN THE EAR

Folk tune: viraha of silence

*Repay the debt, repay the debt of the voice you heard;
The ledger of silence is not paper - find it inside the ear.
The voice you heard is a debt; its payment now is yours;
The ledger of silence is not paper; its home is in the ear.
Name after name made both of Mehta's ears grow heavy;
The bowl grew light, the hand grew heavy - there lives the breath of work.*

*Not erasing guilt, but accepting the watch makes one lighter;
Dew fell, leaves dried, and an inner music woke.
The rogue may burn the paper, but if the ear is awake,
Fire cannot burn the memory that refuses to flee.
Read the Archive of Silence; repay the debt today;
What has been heard now settles as work upon the chest.
The rogue may burn paper; an awakened ear does not fail.*

CHAPTER 50

The Name After the Body

The body goes away, the name remains - and the feet of the name stay wet.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE ROOT KEEPS THE NAME

Folk tune: a green form of samdaun

*Keep it, O root, keep the root of the name;
 Even when the body has gone far away, do not forget the letters.
 Though the body has gone far, the root keeps the name;
 Within the soil it feeds the letters the milk of dew.
 Plant a tree for the ancestors; write the full name on the plaque;
 In its shade children will learn labour, courage and honour.
 The root says: memory is steady, the leaves are ever new;
 Life changes form, yet love remains wondrous.
 When roots keep names, the forest becomes a family;
 Even beyond the body, the bright stream of dignity will endure.
 Write the full name upon the ancestral plaque and plant a tree beneath it;
 Generations will sit in its shade and learn the truth of labour.
 Leaves fall, seasons change, the root remains steadfast;
 Even the grieving tune of samdaun speaks a green hope.*

There was no water in Channa Grove that night, yet everyone felt that their feet were wet. The earth beneath the grove was as cold as though the first rain of the year had fallen upon it, though the sky above was clear. Stars seemed caught from branch to branch, and the branches trembled from time to time as though what rested on them were not stars, but names.

Satyavrat Mehta stood for a long time outside the grove. No one had given him permission to enter. No one was stopping him either. Yet he did not go in. For years he had known how to rise and sit in human courts, speak and remain silent, turn papers, reverse arguments. But the first rule in the court of Channa Grove was: first listen to the voice of your own body.

Listening to the body was difficult for him. A person who remains in office too long turns the body into a cupboard of files. Sections in the head, subsections within sections, judgments within subsections, interpretations behind judgments. How the heart beats, how breath moves, how the soles of the feet touch the earth - all these things he had forgotten.

Faint voices came from within the grove - not kabaddi, but names. First one name, then another, then a third. They were not being called in the way a court calls cases - "so-and-so versus so-and-so." Here names came from a mother's mouth, a father's knees, a half-sleeping child's ear, and the water of the river.

Budhba the Ghost stepped out from the shade of the pipal. The blackness of his body seemed bright that night because behind him the dwarf glow of the Loths shimmered. He looked at Satyavrat.

“You have come now?”

Satyavrat bowed his head. “I have come now to listen.”

“Listening is not difficult. Carrying the weight of what has been heard is difficult. Will you carry it?”

Satyavrat opened his mouth to answer, but no voice came out. At that moment he understood: those who speak too much in human courts become mute in Channa Grove. Becoming mute is not punishment; it is preparation.

In the middle of Channa Grove a pond appeared that night. It had not been there the day before. No one had dug it. No one knew where its water came from. But the moon did not float in the water; letters did. At first the letters were broken and scattered, as though a body had been torn by crocodile teeth. Then slowly they joined and began to form names.

Satyavrat knelt. The first name he saw in the water was Sarayu Devi. The second: Budhan Mian. The third: Jagesar Paswan. Then Ujjwal Jha. Then names he had never found in any case law, any digest of judgments, any government annexure. Yet the mere pronunciation of each name made the water tremble.

A child, perhaps Ananya, came and sat beside the water. Seeing Satyavrat, she asked, “Will you have your name written too?”

Satyavrat was startled. “My name? I am not dead.”

The child laughed. “Only the dead are not written here. The names of those who remained silent many times are written here too.”

The sentence entered Satyavrat like a needle that pierced not cloth, but skin. He remembered the first date when Nand’s file had reached the government table. The second, when the list of labourers had been returned as “incomplete.” The third, when Ujjwal’s death after digital fraud had been called “private financial risk.” The fourth, when he had said of Gop Kumar’s data, “We should wait for verification of the records.” Wait. Wait. Wait. How often does waiting become another name for crime?

He dipped his right hand into the water. The letters gathered around his fingers. The water did not feel cold; it felt warm, like the final warmth of a body. Softly he said, “Satyavrat Mehta. Silence.”

The name descended into the water. The water circled once, as though a crocodile were turning around him. Satyavrat’s body shuddered.

He was not afraid that a crocodile would seize his foot. He feared it would seize not his body, but his office.

Just then a long shadow came from the western side of Channa Grove. Whether it was an elephant or a human being was hard to say. Its head was immense, its eyes tired, its body muddy, and something bound its foot that showed at a glance that it had struggled for a very long time. Before it the water split and a graha rose from within - not the graha of a river, but the graha inside the body. Greed, fear, office, family honour, judicial dignity, government discipline, the convenience of history - all had joined into a single graha.

Budhba the Ghost whispered, "People hear the tale of Gaja and Graha often. But most see only the elephant and not the graha. The real question is: from what does the elephant want freedom? From the graha outside, or from the grip within?"

Satyavrat kept watching. The elephant was not trumpeting. It was exhausted. The graha held not its foot, but its memory. The harder the elephant struggled, the deeper the graha sank within. Then the old rhythm of kabaddi rose in Channa Grove - not from ghosts, but from names.

Sarayu Devi. Budhan Mian. Jagesar Paswan. Ujjwal Jha. Nand Aruni. Unknown. Absent. Missing. Gone.

Each name struck the elephant's body and broke one shackle. At last the elephant looked not at the water, but at the sky. What came from its mouth was not a cry but an admission. The graha released its foot. Whether the elephant was freed or died, no one could tell. For in Channa Grove freedom and death sometimes enter the same body together.

Satyavrat understood: "Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles" was not only the moment when crocodiles chewed a body to the bone. It was also the moment when the body's last pride broke. The body was destroyed, but the lie bound to the body was destroyed too. The one whom the world called defeated was released within. The one whom the world called victorious remained bound to the paper of victory.

At that moment the shadow of Batuknath Hariharan appeared at the edge of the grove. His body was still in the village dak bungalow, but his shadow had reached Channa Grove. The shadow carried an order in its hand. The paper of the order trembled not in wind, but in water. Batuknath's shadow shouted, "None of this is valid! What court is this? Where is its jurisdiction?"

The Loths laughed. Their laughter sounded not like tiny bells, but like a hearse far away. Budhba the Ghost said, "Jurisdiction? Wherever a name is erased, the jurisdiction of Channa Grove begins."

Chandrapal Batra's mind also arrived, flickering in the shape of a screen. It hung in the air of the grove as if suspended from an invisible wire. Upon the screen his gambling-app icon, the seal of his law office, mule-account numbers and fake digital-arrest notices all flashed together. He tried to erase them, but in Channa Grove there was no verb called "erase." There was only remembrance.

Raghav Signal's voice came without a body: "The message will delete itself."

For the first time the Brahma of the pipal spoke from all four faces at once: "A message that carries a crime does not disappear; it changes form. Sometimes a leaf, sometimes water, sometimes a child's question."

Satyavrat rose. His clothes were not wet, but his walk had changed. He no longer walked like a man of the court, but like an old man of the village - slowly, listening, feeling the temperature of the earth. He did not look toward Batuknath's shadow. He did not approach Chandrapal's screen. He went to Ananya.

"Where did you write my name?" he asked.

Ananya placed a finger on a leaf and showed him. It read: "Satyavrat Mehta - who listened late, but listened."

Satyavrat's eyes filled. He had received many certificates of honour in his life. Many offices. Many forms of address. But this was the first time his name had been joined not to an office, but to an action: listened.

Gop Kumar sat on the other side of the grove that night. He held no paper, only a dry coconut leaf. He was writing nothing on it. Devika asked, "What will you write now?"

Gop said, "Now I will not write. Now they will write themselves."

"Who?"

"Those who have been freed. Those who remain bound. The bound will write more."

The water of Channa Grove slowly began to sink away. The pond did not vanish; it went down into the earth. The soil of the grove remained damp. Budhba the Ghost said, "Freedom does not always rise upward. Sometimes it sinks into the soil and becomes a root."

After that night many people in Garh Narikel dreamed. Families of the labourers saw their dead emerge from the water and bathe, but without bodies. There were no baskets on their heads. Ujjwal's mother saw her son not smashing the mobile phone, but setting it afloat in the river and saying, "Mother, I am not a screen." Meera saw the papers of her private fear dissolve not in fire, but in water and turn into flowers.

But the rogues dreamed differently. Batuknath saw the order in his hand turn into the jaw of a graha and seize his wrist. Chandrapal saw all his passwords change one by one into the names of the dead. Raghav saw that his self-deleting messages had not vanished, but were written as blue bruises upon his body. Far away beside the sea, in his glass house, Lau Kin-Hung saw each wave pronounce a Maithili name; he could not understand the pronunciation, but it cut into his sleep.

Dawn came. Kabaddi was suspended in Channa Grove. Yet the ground of the stopped game was covered with countless footprints: human, ghostly, children's, elephant, graha, and those of all who had been freed from the body but remained joined to a name. Satyavrat Mehta came out. The driver who had come for him asked, "Sir, back to Delhi?"

Satyavrat remained silent for a moment. Then he said, "Delhi later. First the Ganga bridge."

"What is there now, sir?"

Satyavrat answered, "Where the bodies fell, names still have to be placed."

There was no official command in the answer, no court direction, no government programme. It held a human being's quiet vow. It was not enough to accept as liberated the voices bound inside the bodies that the crocodiles had chewed away. The freed names had to be given a place upon the earth.

The leaves of the coconut trees in Garh Narikel moved very slowly that dawn. There was no breeze. The leaves moved by themselves, as though saying: the body is gone, the water is gone, the fear is gone; now the name is searching for a root.

And when a name begins to search for a root, the story changes once again.

FOLK SONG: THE BODY IS GONE, THE NAME SEEKS A ROOT

Folk tune: samdaun

*Take it, O earth, take the name into your lap;
When the root sprouts, let the dead give shade again.
The body flowed away in water; the dampness of the feet remained;
Stars caught in the branches; the light of the name kept burning.
The crocodile chewed the body; the voice broke its bonds;
It is not enough to call it free - give it a place upon the earth.
A mother says, "Plant the root of the name in my courtyard";*

*A leaf says, "Sow the story upon a child's tongue."
The body went, the water went, the night of fear declined;
The name came seeking soil and paused at the threshold.
O earth, take that name into your lap;
When the root sprouts, let the dead give shade again.
A mother says, "Plant the root in my courtyard";*

CHAPTER 51

The Weight of Witness

The weight of a witness is measured not on scales, but upon the chest.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: STAND WITH THE WITNESS

Folk tune: penitential mangal

Hold the witness's hand, hold it with both your hands;

*Share the burden of the heavy chest, half and half.
 If the witness's chest is heavy, offer a companion's shoulder;
 Give a safe home, an ear, counsel and a place to rest.
 The teller of truth may be brave, yet remains human;
 Protect the witness's fear, fatigue and family honour.
 Institutions must share the burden of testimony;
 Not lonely courage, but collective protection.
 When a witness has companions, truth will stand firm;
 The heavy chest will grow lighter and point toward justice.
 Speaking truth is not easy; at night sleep may not come;
 If the lamp of companionship stays lit, fear cannot torment.
 Let society assume responsibility for home, counsel and rest;
 Not solitary heroism, but the spirit of shared protection.*

When Satyavrat Mehta entered Channa Grove, it seemed to him that he was entering not a grove, but his own chest. Outside, the earth was hard; within, soft. Outside were papers of orders; within, leaves bearing names. Outside was office; within, a naked voice. In the middle of the grove that night kabaddi had stopped. The halt was not from weariness of play, but from that silence after a hearing in which a verdict searches for its own body.

The Brahma of the pipal was not upon the branch. He had come down, but all four faces were silent in the four directions. Budhba the Ghost sat to one side, gathering in the light of his dark body. The Loths looked like a small hill of round forms; this time they were not spectators but guardians of the archive. Panidubbi had come out of the pond and lay across the dust of Channa Grove like a line of dampness. The witches did not dance their little steps; they scratched at the earth with their fingers.

Satyavrat took from his bag the paper bearing the seal of his office. The seal did not shine at night. In Channa Grove seals turn dark; only names shine there. The paper was heavy in his hand. Paper that bears the weight of government by day cannot bear the weight of the soul at night.

Budhba the Ghost asked, "What have you brought?"

"An account of what I heard," Satyavrat said.

"An account?" Budhba smiled. "An account is something in which figures can be increased or reduced. What has been heard is not an account; it is a weight. Have you come to carry the weight, or to weigh it again?"

Satyavrat did not answer. He remembered the courtroom by day, where everything was weighed: which section, which provision, which limitation period, which objection, which admissibility. But in Channa Grove no objection was raised. The only inadmissible thing here was forgetting.

Suddenly water rustled behind the grove. The crocodiles were coming. First their eyes appeared - two damp, cold points, like distant stars fallen into water. Then their backs. Then their teeth. Satyavrat's body trembled for a moment. He had heard of these crocodiles; he had never seen them. In court the crocodile had been metaphor. Here it had a body.

The crocodiles stopped upon the dust of Channa Grove. There was no blood in their mouths. Water lay upon their teeth. Satyavrat thought: these were the teeth that had chewed the labourers' bodies, dissolved Nand's evidence in water, separated so many names from bone. But Budhba the Ghost said softly, "Do not be afraid. Not every tooth is a weapon. Some teeth are made to cut bonds as well."

Satyavrat did not understand.

The oldest crocodile moved forward. Moss covered its body, and time had drawn a milky film over its eyes. It did not speak in human language, but Panidubbi translated its voice: "We eat bodies. That is both our fault and our nature. But if a body remains bound in water, whose work is it to cut it free?"

Satyavrat started. He remembered the tale of Gaja and Graha. The elephant had been seized, the graha held fast, the cry rose toward the sky. In that tale the graha appears guilty; yet sometimes the one that seizes also seizes the lies of the world. Here the crocodile had not spared the body; but by chewing the body away it had separated the name from the body's prison. Bones that would have remained trapped in a government register dissolved in water and became voice.

Budhba the Ghost said, "That is why you must not turn the title into fear alone. Water-Burial Among the Crocodiles - it is fear, but not merely fear. It is both the body's defeat and the name's release. What was chewed did not simply end; its bonds broke. But this release does not pardon the crime. The name of the one who pushed that person into the water will not be freed so easily."

Satyavrat thought of tearing up his paper. His hand stopped. Tearing paper does not tear a crime. He opened the paper and spread it on the ground. It bore the language of courts: "matter disposed of," "record unavailable," "evidence insufficient," "time elapsed." The wind of Channa Grove moved. The letters trembled. "Disposed of" became "trace." "Unavailable" became "unnamed." "Insufficient" became "our own thirst." "Time elapsed" became "time passed; the name did not."

Satyavrat sat holding his head. For the first time he understood how often the language of law writes a second death upon the temple of the dead. The body drowned once; the name drowned a second time. How many times had he himself taken part in that second drowning? The question entered his chest not like a crocodile's tooth, but like the point of a leaf.

"I came late," he said.

All four faces of the Brahma of the pipal spoke together: "Delay too can be a crime, but admitting delay is a doorway. The doorway can open if you enter through it and do not run back out."

Satyavrat rose. His shoes caught in the soil. With every step a name sounded: Sarayu, Dukhan, Mahito, Lalna, Ujjwal, Hulasi, Nand, the unnamed child whose body had not burned on a pyre, the migrant born abroad who heard the name of his village only at festivals, the woman who could not speak for fear of blackmail, the young man whose account had been turned into a mule account. The names were no longer separate; together they became one long breath.

The children reached the edge of the grove, Ananya in front. An empty notebook was in her hand. Seeing Satyavrat, she asked, "What does a witness do?"

Satyavrat looked at her for a long time. It seemed to him that this child's questions were larger than the questions of courts. A court asks, "Where is the evidence?" A child asks, "If you saw it, what will you say?"

He answered slowly, "A witness does not sell his eyes. And if he ever does, he spends the rest of his life returning the price."

Ananya asked, "How does he return the price?"

Satyavrat took out the strip of paper bearing his designation and placed it on the ground. "First make your own name smaller. Remove the office. Begin there."

The children made a circle around him. Devika, Meera, Saumya, Ira, Nishant and Aruni slowly arrived. Gop Kumar was nowhere visible, but a coconut leaf moved once. Everyone understood: what cannot be seen is not necessarily absent.

Satyavrat said, "I will not write a judgment. Channa Grove has given the judgment. I will write only a witness statement - for all those whose voices never reached the court. But this witness statement will not go first to a court. The children will read it first. A society whose children can read it may one day build a court where the dead do not have to wait to become evidence."

Batuknath Hariharan's mind hung outside the circle. His body was far away in the city, but his mind stood at the edge of the grove. He watched Satyavrat lay in the soil the office that Hariharan had treated all his life as a shield. The sight pierced him. He wondered: does a human being survive after the office is removed? Then a very old voice sounded within him: "What was your name?" He could not remember.

Chandrapal Batra's screen suddenly turned bright. It showed no number, wage or account, only Satyavrat's hand placing his official designation on the earth. In fury Chandrapal threw away the phone. It did not break. In the cracked glass his own face became ten faces, and not one bore a name.

Raghav Signal's silence cracked. The deleted message returned: "A witness is not for sale." He began typing, "From whom?" No answer came. In Channa Grove an answer is not always required; the question itself slowly becomes testimony.

Lau Kin-Hung sat in his glass house looking at the sea. The water abruptly turned not green but grey. A coconut leaf came floating upon it. Devanagari letters were written on the leaf. He could not read them. But he could read the fear. He knew the language of accounts across the world; he did not know the language of names.

In Channa Grove the old crocodile moved again. Water dripped between its teeth. Panidubbi translated its voice once more: "We cut the body. You cut the bonds. We gave release from the body; you must give release to the name."

Meera stepped forward and placed her palm upon the earth. "Can we return privacy once it has been stolen?"

Budhba the Ghost said, "You cannot return it. But you can turn what was stolen from a cause of shame into proof of theft. When the victim lays down shame, the thief's hand begins to tremble."

Devika asked, "How do we save the brother who drowned in the screen?"

"Not the one already drowned," said the Brahma of the pipal. "Save the next hand that is about to drown. Love for the dead becomes a watch over the future."

Saumya opened her records. There were numbers on the paper. She began to read them, but numbers would not remain numbers in the grove. Each digit wanted to become a name. She closed the notebook. "Numbers later. Names first."

Ira tried to say "Garh Narikel" in her foreign-born accent, but the words caught in her throat. Ananya took her hand and said, "Say it slowly. If you say the village's name too quickly, it does not listen." Ira tried again: "Garh... Narikel." This time the coconut leaves moved. In that moment a birth abroad entered the memory of the village.

Satyavrat sat down to write the first witness statement. The first line read: "I, Satyavrat Mehta, not by former office but by present remorse, admit that while names were being called, I listened for a long time only to procedure."

He stopped after writing. No one applauded in Channa Grove. True admission is not met with applause; it is met with stillness. In that stillness the crocodiles began to retreat. They turned toward the water. The guardians of the body had completed their work; the guardianship of names was now placed in human hands.

As the last crocodile entered the water, Satyavrat watched it go. He understood that crocodiles are not only monsters; they are mirrors too. Whoever lives in greed for the body meets teeth. Whoever is trapped in the bondage of a name may find those teeth becoming release. The contradiction was difficult to bear, but truth is difficult because it shows mercy and blame at the same time.

The children sat around the witness statement. Ananya read the first name. Another child read the second. Slowly what began in Channa Grove was not night, but a lesson. Kabaddi remained suspended that night. The game would return, but after the names had been read.

Satyavrat Mehta looked one last time at the strip bearing his designation. The wind turned it over. The back was blank paper. He did not smile; there was no time to smile. On the blank side he wrote one line: "What has been heard is no longer alone."

Above Channa Grove the first bird of dawn called. There was no proclamation in its voice. It merely seemed to say that the night had spent all its darkness. Day lay ahead, and in daylight testimony is harder than falsehood.

Satyavrat gathered the papers. The children rose. The leaves began once again to move normally. But in the soil of the grove, exactly where the designation had been placed, a small coconut shoot had appeared. No one was surprised. In Garh Narikel, an office buried in the earth sometimes becomes a tree of names.

FOLK SONG: THE WITNESS'S HEAVY CHEST

Folk tune: song of repentance

*Weigh the chest, not on scales - weigh it upon the chest;
When office was buried in earth, a shoot of name sprang forth.
A witness is weighed not on scales, but on the chest;
The designation turns over and blank paper appears.
"I kept listening to procedure while names were calling";
No applause for Mehta's admission - stillness descended.
Numbers wanted to become names; the notebook closed;
At "names first," the circle of crocodiles withdrew.
What has been heard is no longer alone;*

*In the hand of remorse, a leaf of work is right.
Office buried in earth; a shoot of name broke through;
A heavy hand raised the witness's first dwelling.
No applause sounded; stillness descended on the gathering.*

CHAPTER 52

The Next Voice

A crocodile may chew the body, a court may chew the years, a screen may chew the mind - but no one has been able to chew through the watch kept by a child's hands.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE NEXT VOICE AT THE CHAUPAL

Folk tune: collective song of names

*Sit, O chaupal, sit in a circle;
When your own voice is complete, make room for the next.
Where the tree was cut, a new chaupal grows;
When one voice is complete, the next receives its seat.
Some first, some later - an equal turn for all;
The people's story moves like a river, circling onward.
Keep an empty place for the next voice;
Do not drown another voice beneath the noise of your own victory.
The chaupal will lay flowers to welcome the next speaker;
An unbroken stream of hearing will make society whole.
At the site of the cut tree a gathering-place has grown;
One by one, everyone's story - no shoving, no enclosure.
Keep the noise of victory low; let the defeated voice rise;
Let the current of hearing flow without cease, like a river.*

In that listening lay not the end of the novel, but the beginning of the next voice. Crocodiles can chew bodies, courts can chew years, screens can chew minds; but if the guardianship of names reaches the hands of children, even water-burial can become a doorway to release from bondage. The story did not end in Channa Grove that day - only one long, sorrowful and luminous breath was taken.

But the world does not stand still after a long breath. Slowly Channa Grove began to be cut down. First tight ropes were tied around it, then the red cloth was removed, then a bamboo barricade was built around the roots. The trees that had kept darkness even by day, beneath whose shade people hid fears both true and imagined, gradually began to see day and night. Leaves fell, branches dried, the crown opened, and on the ground where the ghosts' kabaddi had been seen, the hammers of labourers began to ring.

At first people watched in silence. Some thought: this is proper; if the shade of the grove where that court sat is removed, perhaps the fear will go too. Others said: no, fear did not live here - memory did. But on the government map Channa Grove was labelled only "encroachment." In the contractor's papers it became a "development zone." The municipal file said: "Clearing for lighting, road access, movement and public use."

The grove that had preserved people's testimony for years was measured in three lines and ordered to be cut.

When the first thick branch struck the ground, a long shaft of light unexpectedly entered all the way inside. People saw how many colours had lived within what had always seemed darkness: wet streaks around the roots, a scrap of a woman's scarf trapped in a cleft, an old earthen lamp, many small stones bearing names, many children's glass marbles. What had been hidden was not destroyed; instead it became readable in the light.

Then Satyavrat Mehta came there again. This time not in the car of office, nor like an official carrying a file of orders. He wore a plain white kurta, his face tired, an old cloth bag in his hand. He sat silently beside the cut roots and said nothing for a long time. One of the children standing nearby - children who now guarded the names - asked, "If the grove is being cut, will the story be cut too?" Satyavrat looked once at the half-cut branches, then at the child's face. Softly he said, "A tree is cut; the root keeps listening. A story lives wherever someone remains who can listen."

There was no legal argument in the answer, no crowd-pleasing phrase. Yet everyone there understood that Satyavrat still did not consider himself acquitted. The offence of his silence had not been erased completely. Perhaps that was why he could sit before them all without defence. Women, young people and elders whose lives had at some point been scorched by corrupt courts, digital fraud, hospital brokerage, foreign greed, online gambling, the medicine market, or silent consent began arriving one by one around Channa Grove. No meeting had been announced, but listening began again.

Strangely, the more the grove was cut, the more people came. Those who once approached shivering now came openly. A tea cart appeared by day. Women placed lamps there in the evening. Some young people took photographs on their phones, broadcast live, and whispered the story of Channa Grove. Teachers came with children and told them, "This is not merely a grove; it is a living page of public memory." Even some labourers hired for the cutting quietly poured water on the roots at night. They said, "It is being cut by our hands, but something here keeps looking out even after being cut."

Slowly the vast canopy of Channa Grove broke apart. The whole sky became visible. Where darkness had remained even by day, morning sunlight now arrived first, then the hard glare of noon, then the grey light of evening. Birds returned, though not to the old crown - they perched on the rim of the cut stump. At night the moon seemed to descend directly upon the place. Passing became easy; even those who once lacked the courage to cross there stopped and asked questions.

Channa Grove slowly changed from a haunt of fear into a public square of memory.

But on the day the final great limb was cut, something strange happened. From inside the root rose not the smell of rot, but the scent of wet soil, incense, old paper, and something soft like the hair of a nursing infant. The labourer's axe stopped for a moment. The name-stones in the hands of the children standing around the cutting circle all grew warm at once. No one cried out. Everyone simply felt the warmth in silence, as though the tree itself were saying, "I am here, but not in the form in which you were accustomed to seeing me."

That evening the crocodiles were seen again - not beneath the water, but along the edge of public memory. No one could actually catch sight of them clearly, yet those who had understood the stories of water-burial, the destruction of the body, and release from inner bondage felt that the crocodiles' true hunger ended with the body. A name survives if children keep watch over it. The lesson of the Gaja-Graha tale rose again: even if the graha seizes, if the call is true, drowning too can become transformation.

The girl who had earlier questioned Satyavrat placed her hand on the cut stump and asked, "Can a tree be planted here again?" A second child said, "A new tree, but the old names." A third said, "Under the new tree's shade there will be no court of lies, but a chaupal for listening." Satyavrat Mehta did not even smile; the corners of his eyes were wet. From his bag he took an old register and gave it to the children. On its first page was written: "The first testimony to a person's existence is that their name was heard." Beneath that line the girl wrote in her own hand: "From today, the watch is ours."

Within that one sentence, the grief of many chapters found a strange simplicity. Corruption, endless court dates, signals of fraud, the shadow of Hong Kong, forged degrees from Meerut, the trade in vaccines and medicines, gambling, hawala, foreign greed, power and bar-room brokerage - the stories of all those shaken by these things did not vanish. But another principle now opened before them: memory can be made into an institution if its guardianship is given to innocent hands.

Night deepened. Lamps burned around the cut roots. The voice of the person seated on a distant boat was no longer indistinct; it could be heard clearly - no mantra, no lament, only the reading of names. One by one the names were spoken. Those who came named loved ones who had been lost, cheated, drowned, chewed, or silenced. Children wrote them in the register. Women listened. Elders bore witness. Young people switched off their phones. Satyavrat sat silently and listened. There was remorse in that listening, and penance, but beyond both a new social voice was taking shape.

At dawn people saw an exceedingly small green point breaking from one edge of the cut stump. It could hardly be called a bud, as if to invite instant celebration; it was only a minute green sign. Some called it a miracle, some natural vitality, some the stubbornness of soil. For the children it meant only this: "The tree is listening." They did not laugh or make noise. They simply stood and joined their hands.

Satyavrat rose. He had to leave now. But this departure did not carry the old sense of an ending. The girl asked, "Will you come again?" He said, "Wherever a name is called, I will remain indebted to listen." There was no smell of office in the answer, only a human admission. He slowly moved out through the crowd. People gave him way, but no one repeated the ritual of salutation; it was as though everyone understood that personality-worship was no longer needed - listening was.

The labourers' tools lay to one side. The file seeking to halt the cutting would move again; for now people continued reading names around the stump.

That is why the story did not end in Channa Grove that day. The grove remained half-cut, but a chaupal had grown. Darkness dispersed, but mystery did not die. Water-burial ceased to be the final word of fear; it became a doorway to release from bondage. And the long, sorrowful, luminous breath taken that day still continues - collective, incomplete, yet unbroken.

And then - from the very place people had taken for the end - the story began again.

FOLK SONG: THE CHAUPAL OF THE NEXT VOICE

Folk tune: collective song of names

*It has grown, O chaupal, grown beside the cut grove;
Where the end was imagined, the story has sprouted again.
At the place of the cut grove, lamps burned and a chaupal grew;
The name of each beloved was sung throughout the night.
A child writes the register, a woman listens with love;
An elder gives testimony, a young person understands the house behind the screen.
A tiny green point breaks from the stump and says:
"The tree is listening; the story moves again."
Water-burial is no longer the final word of fear;
It became a door of release, and the people's voice flowed.
The incomplete collective breath continues even now;
Where the end was imagined, the story sprouts again.*

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

A green point broke from the stump and spoke -

CHAPTER 53

Morning After Erosion

Morning does not stop when a tree is cut—the stump too begins looking straight toward the sun.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: DAWN OF THE STUMP

Folk tune: parati

Wake, O stump, wrap yourself in the gold of dawn;

Where branches were cut, join new shoots again.

*The tree was cut, yet the sun's road did not stop;
The first gold of morning bent over dew upon the stump.
Life stirred within the roots; a shoot will give the sign;
After destruction, a day of rebuilding will come.*

*Soften the earth all around the stump;
Give seed, water and watch, and fill the grove anew.
The stump's dawn says—let hope reach down to the roots;
From the cut history, let a new future spring.*

*Night's dew seeped down to the roots and softened the soil;
At the first touch of sunlight, the inward ache awoke.
All around, preparations began for seed, water and watch;
A flower garden will rise upon the breast of severed history.*

To all who had stayed awake through the night, morning came that day not late but suddenly. Channa Grove, which for centuries had seemed to hold dawn back, now, as a half-cut stump, let the sun enter without a curtain for the first time. When light came in, people filled not with joy but with a strange shame—as though an old body always kept under a sheet had suddenly been uncovered before everyone.

Even by day there had been darkness in Channa Grove. In that darkness stories preserved their voices. People spoke softly there, watched their steps, scolded children into silence. The ghosts' kabaddi went on as breath moves inside a word without sound. But now, with the great branches cut and fallen and the canopy torn into three parts, a patch of blue sky hung in the middle of the grove. For the first time people could look upward there, where before they had seen only branches, hanging creepers, pipal growth, frightened wings of birds, and old stories suspended overhead.

The first light of dawn fell on the round face of the stump. Inside the cut surface were printed the rings of rainy years—dark, pale, dark, pale—as though the tree had written both the hardness and softness of time into its own body. Budhba Ghost counted the rings. Never before had so much light entered his eyes. He whispered, “When a tree is cut, it opens its age. When a human being is cut down, their name should be opened too.”

No one knew whose ears those words reached. Yet at that moment the children seated around Channa Grove looked at one another. In their hands were the night’s name-registers. The pages were not wet, but they smelled of water. One boy fluttered a page and said, “From today, the watch will continue in daylight too.” Another said, “The ghosts play at night; by day we will keep the names.”

Kabaddi had not stopped. Only its time had changed. At night ghosts, spirits, rakshasas, Loth, Panidubbi and witches played in invisible held breath. By day the children drew the lines of play in open light. First a line was traced in the soil. Then the children placed stones bearing names along its edge. The rule was simple: if any stone was knocked aside, the game stopped; first the name had to be restored to its proper place, and only then could breath continue.

The elders smiled at this new rule. It reminded them of childhood games, but this was no ordinary game. Here a touch in kabaddi did not mean victory; it meant rescue. Whoever crossed the line was not seized by the other side but asked, “Whose name have you brought with you?” If the player entered without a name, the player lost. If a name was spoken, everyone let the player go. In this game there was less catching and more listening.

Devika Sah arrived at dawn. A white dupatta covered her head, and her eyes held the grit of someone who had been awake all night. She ran her hand over Ujjwal’s name-stone. The stone was cold. She said, “The one who drowned in the screen must have a name that stays warm in the soil.” The children made room for her. She sat down and, for the first time without weeping, wrote Ujjwal’s full name—Ujjwal Kumar Jha—not someone who lost money on a mobile phone without telling his mother, but someone surrounded by fraud and abandoned alone in fear. Her hand trembled as she wrote the whole sentence, but it did not break.

Mira came quietly. That day she wore no bright clothes—only a plain blue kurta and a bag over her shoulder. Those who looked at her did so with less curiosity and more respect. The children took one stone from their row and set it beside the stump: “Privacy.” Mira looked at it and smiled. “Guarding a name is necessary,” she said, “but so is the right to silence. Not every story belongs in public. Listen to the one who wishes to speak; and guard the silence of the one who wishes to remain quiet."

Ira arrived on the night bus. Education abroad, auditoriums, research, questions, speeches—all seemed to have settled on her face as fatigue. In the dawn light she stopped short at the mutilated body of Channa Grove. She thought: no museum could contain memory this naked. She opened her notebook, then closed it. This was not yet the time to write; it was the time to listen. She sat among the children. A little girl asked, "Did you come from another country?" Ira said, "Yes." The girl asked again, "Do names get cut there too?" After a long silence Ira answered, "There, names are turned into shining letters. The cutting happens differently."

Aruni watched from a distance. He remembered how the darkness near the grove had once matched the darkness within him. Now the light did not match. Light asked questions. Ba used to say, "A lie hides in darkness, but in light it begins to sweat." And indeed, as people came one after another to the severed stump, each face seemed to show the sweat of something hidden within.

Satyavrat Mehta did not come that morning. His absence too was recorded like a presence. The children wrote in the register: "The one who listens is absent, but the debt is present." No one laughed. No one corrected it. The guardians of names had learned that absence of the body and absence of responsibility are not the same thing.

By noon small tasks had begun around the new clearing of Channa Grove. Someone placed a water pot. Because there was no shade, someone tied cloth to make a temporary canopy. Someone drew a circle with lime. Someone cleared the sand. Someone brought a chisel to deepen names on stone. There was no chairperson, no inauguration, no ribbon. People asked one another, "Leave some space beside this name; perhaps the family will come and complete it." Empty spaces were left for incomplete names. Here, even blankness became memory.

Budhba Ghost could not remain long in daylight. Yet that day he stayed beneath the shade of a severed branch. His black body was thinning in the sun. Hulasi warned him, "Stay in the light and you will disappear." Budhba replied, "I will not disappear. Some darkness must dissolve into light so that the children's eyes do not grow accustomed to darkness." Hulasi said nothing. For the first time she looked toward the well in daylight. On the surface of the water she saw not her own reflection but the face of a girl writing names in the register.

By evening the flow of villagers had truly increased. Those who had once said Channa Grove was haunted now said, "Come, let us see the names." Those who had said the story ended when the grove was cut now saw that the story had descended from the leaves onto people's tongues.

Yet at the same time two unfamiliar men kept circling the road outside the grove. Their shoes did not belong to village soil. One spoke softly into a mobile phone: "The site is open. The crowd is regular. A project is possible."

No one noticed, but Panidubbi did. At dusk the pond water turned once in a slow circle. From beneath the surface, the long-haired spirit watched. Wherever memory wakes in people's hands, the market too comes sniffing.

Before sunset the children entered the kabaddi field one last time. This time the boy who crossed the line holding his breath did not chant "kabaddi," but "present—present." The other side did not catch him; they formed a circle and listened to the name he carried. When the game ended, all the children were tired, but none had lost. Dust rose, daylight withdrew, and the first evening star caught on the green point of the cut stump.

Looking at that star, Ananya asked, "Which star is that?" No one answered. Ira looked up and saw, in the distant sky, a strange cold gleam—as if some nameless place were listening to the earth's voice. She was about to speak when the village watchman came running with a yellow sheet of paper. It bore the municipal seal.

The yellow paper was pasted onto the stump. The children stopped playing. Budhba Ghost thickened again in the gathering darkness. Panidubbi smiled beneath the water—the market had arrived. The first test of the guardians of names was no longer waiting for morning; it was about to begin now.

FOLK SONG: MORNING OF THE STUMP

Folk tune: parati

The stump raised itself, raised its head toward dawn;

The guard of names awoke—the crocodile has found a new move.

The tree was cut, but the road of the sun did not stop;

The stump lifted its head straight toward morning.

When light entered, tears of shame fell;

History was uncovered like an old body stripped of its sheet.

A child ran in kabaddi chanting "present";

The other side did not seize him, but gathered to hear the name.

The evening star caught on the green point;

And then the market came running with a yellow sheet.

Morning after erosion is still a test;

The guard of names is awake, and the crocodile's new move is near.

The evening star came and caught upon the green point.

CHAPTER 54

Around the Stump

Where no branch remains, heads still bow—now not before darkness, but before testimony.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE CIRCLE OF ROOTS

Folk tune: courtyard mangal

Make a circle, make it all around the roots;

The stump at the centre, people at the rim—let a new grove rise.

Though no branch remains, still make a circle of roots;

Let people sit together and share memory, plans and song.

The stump at the centre, people all around—a new grove decided upon;

One brings water, one seed, another promises the watch.

The circle is not merely protection, but a place of shared labour;

With the roots will remain soil, water and breath.

If the circle of roots is strong, the forest will return;

Through communal affection, dry earth will grow green.

One brings a spade, one a water-pot, another a tray of song;

The soil is adorned with the alpana of shared work.

Let the circle not break; bind hand to hand;

Even dry land turns green when affection is mixed into it.

For the first time people sat in a round circle around the stump. Earlier, when entering Channa Grove, people bowed their heads, and it was hard to know whether this was because the branches hung low or the darkness pressed down. Now the reason for bowing had changed. The tree had been cut, but the exposed roots lay open like the chest of an old body split to reveal its bones. People lowered their heads not from fear, but from shame.

The first piece of sunlight sat upon the rim of the cut stump. It did not glitter like gold; it was fearless like a physician's knife. The darkness that for years had hidden people's sins, love, lies, testimony, vows, theft and weeping had withdrawn, and everything began to appear in its own shape. In one crevice of the roots lay damp earth; in another, a rotting fibre of red cloth; in a third, ash; in a fourth, a glass marble; and in a fifth, a half-written name scratched upon a sharp stone.

The children wanted to pick these things up like treasure, but Ananya stopped their hands. She was no longer merely a girl at play; she had become the first sentry of the watch over names. "Whatever comes out from within the stump," she said, "we will not lift it first. First we will listen." The children did not laugh. So many strange things had happened in the village over the past few months that the children had become more restrained than the elders.

When Aruni arrived, he saw the children seated in a circle with the severed roots at the centre. To him the scene looked more like a court than any court. No chairs, no table, no litigation, no lawyers' voices; yet every face was alert, as though each had sworn not to let a single word rising from the roots escape. After the Court of Channa Grove, this was the first people's sitting. No announcement, no plaque, no chief guest. Only stump, soil, and a readiness to listen.

Ba arrived slowly, leaning on her stick. Her eyesight had dimmed, yet her steps toward the stump steadied without help. She sat and reached out to touch the roots. For a long time she said nothing. Then she spoke: "So what if the tree has been cut? In our village many heads have been cut, but the lineage could not be cut. If the roots remain alive, shade is born again."

At those words Budhba Ghost, who was almost never visible by day, shimmered faintly like dust from leaves. No one saw him clearly, though several later said that a black figure had smiled behind the stump. The children looked that way, then placed fingers upon their noses to signal silence. Budhba had not come to give official testimony yet; he had come to see whether the living could truly keep the discipline of listening.

The first name was read by the son of a labourer. The son had himself grown old, yet while reading his father's name he trembled like a child. When the name was spoken, a little puff of air emerged from a crevice in the stump. Someone said, "Breath." Someone else said, "An insect." But the children wrote in the register: "The name was heard; the stump answered."

The second name was read by Ujjwal's mother. Her voice was low, and there was fear the words would disappear in the crowd. Devika placed a hand on her shoulder and said, "Read slowly. A name is in no hurry." Ujjwal's mother read it little by little. When the name of the young man whose mind had been chewed by the crocodile of the screen travelled around the stump, a bird perched on a cut branch cried out three times. Ananya wrote: "The soil hears even a name that drowned in the screen."

From then on a rule was made that after every name, one sign would be recorded—wind, bird, sunlight, shade, a dog's bark, a child's sneeze, an elder's cough, a drop of water. The children believed the tree no longer answered through leaves but through signs. They were not reading; they were making connections.

Saumya watched all this without quietly making notes. Once her habit had been to write what she saw and record what she heard. Now she understood that some things are wounded the moment they are recorded. She sat only beside those names whose families wished her to. When someone wanted silence, she accepted that silence without question. The oath of privacy was no longer merely Mira's sentence on paper; it was entering the conduct of the people's assembly.

That day Mira brought a small red cord. "Every name that has been read will be written on a stone and placed around the stump," she said. "But no one's suffering will be turned into spectacle. The right over a name remains with the home to which the name belongs." The people agreed. The agreement was not given by raised hands, but by bowed heads.

By noon a small ring of stones had formed around the stump. Each stone bore one name: some complete, some incomplete, some only a sign. One stone read: "For the one whose name could not be found." It was placed first. The children said, "Those whose names could not be found get the first place." At this Ba began to weep. Her crying had no sound—only a running nose and wet eyes in silence.

Gop Kumar stood at the back. He still possessed many copies, many lists, many encrypted files. Yet he saw that paper had only limited authority here. Paper would give the name; people would give it a voice; the stump would give it a place; children would give it a watch. Without these together, memory remained incomplete. For the first time he understood that exposing truth was not enough; truth also needed somewhere to live.

Satyavrat Mehta watched from a distance that day. No one had called him. He no longer wished to be called. The man who once sat at the front of every platform because of his office was now learning the discipline of standing behind and listening. When a child saw him and said, "Sit here," he replied softly, "Not yet. This place is for the names." The child was satisfied.

By evening people were coming and going around the stump in growing numbers. Someone brought milk, someone water, someone flowers, someone only time. A few drifted in who thought all of it was nonsense. But when they saw that no donation was being collected, no slogan shouted and no leader summoned, their mockery weakened. Even a person who does not believe must learn to respect a quiet place.

Then the first outsider arrived—the postmaster on a bicycle. His bag carried government mail. Ordinarily he never came toward Channa Grove, but the road had opened, so he had taken the shortcut. As soon as he saw the stump, he dismounted. From his bag he took a yellow envelope and handed it to Aruni. It was thick, with the municipal seal on top. The postmaster said, "It concerns this place. It seems important."

The envelope grew hot in Aruni's hand. He was about to open it, but Ananya stopped him. "The reading of names is still going on. The yellow paper can wait." A soft laugh passed through the crowd, but there was fear in the laughter. Everyone knew that yellow paper was often another form of darkness. What had begun with an axe would now move forward through a notice.

The first lamp of night was lit. Its light fell in pieces over the names on the stones. The yellow envelope was placed on one edge of the stump—as though its turn to testify would also come. Budhba Ghost's figure shimmered for one moment again. Air rose from within the cut roots and made one corner of the envelope flutter.

Closing the register, Ananya said, "Tomorrow the yellow paper will be read. But first we will ask the name of the words written upon it." No one understood what it meant for words to have a name. But the children understood: government language too could not remain nameless. When it laid claim to memory, its name, lineage, greed, fear and purpose would also be asked.

Thus the first day around the stump did not really end. It sat waiting for the next hearing. The tree had been cut, but around it a circle of people had grown. And at the centre of that circle the yellow envelope, like a dry leaf, turned restlessly through the night.

FOLK SONG: THE CIRCLE AROUND THE STUMP

Folk tune: courtyard song

Stand, O circle, a circle around the stump;

The people have become living sentries—this is the new dwelling.

No branches remain, yet heads bow today;

Not before darkness, but in shame before exposed bones of testimony.

The roots lie spread upon the earth like an old chest;

The people's round circle rises like a new tree.

The yellow envelope will turn all night upon the rim;

Tomorrow its words, lineage and greed will all be questioned.

*Government language cannot remain nameless;
If it claims memory, its purpose cannot stay hidden.*

*The tree was cut; the circle stands like roots;
Around the stump the people became living sentries.*

*No branches remain, yet heads bow today;
Not before darkness—but in shame before the exposed roots' testimony.
Tomorrow name, lineage and greed—all will be asked.*

CHAPTER 55

The Municipality's Yellow Notice

The flutter of a government yellow sheet is not the sound of wings, but of scissors.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: WINGS OF THE YELLOW PAPER

Folk tune: warning batgabani

Fly, O yellow letter, fly as wings;

Not scissors—become a warning and reach every home.

Yellow paper, do not be scissors; fly as wings;

Leave orders to cut behind and carry news of truth.

Mustard-yellow in colour, a white flower of knowledge;

Let paper warn the people, not cut home and root.

Write every notice simply and show the road to rights;

Remove the language of fear and arrive with help.

The wings of yellow paper will become a letter of hope;

They will spread public awareness and build a safer village.

On mustard-coloured paper set simple letters;

Cut away the speech of fear and speak the path of rights.

Beside it give the place, phone and address for help;

An informed village is a protected village—that is the letter's work.

All night the yellow envelope lay upon the rim of the stump. One by one the lamps went out and people's voices withdrew, yet a corner of the envelope kept fluttering in the wind. It seemed less like paper than some small yellow-winged creature waiting with hidden teeth. The severed roots of Channa Grove did not grow cold where they touched it; instead, the heat of the paper slowly travelled down into the soil.

At dawn Ananya arrived first. She looked over the row of stones, wiped the dew that had gathered on the register, then lifted the yellow envelope. Along its seam was the municipality's blue seal—a wheel inside the seal, letters inside the wheel, and inside the letters a cold voice. The children gathered slowly. One brought kite-string, one a slate, one water in an empty bottle. This was not to be a reading of names, but a reading of paper.

When Aruni arrived, he said, "I will read the paper." Ananya shook her head. "You will read it," she said, "but first we will all listen for what this paper's name is." Some elders smiled at the sentence. But Satyavrat Mehta, who this time sat not far away but low behind the stones, bowed his head and listened. He understood that the girl had grasped the first lesson of law better than most: even a paper that rules over people may be asked its name.

The envelope was opened. Inside were three pages. The first carried a bold heading: "Notice Regarding Public Beautification and Road Safety." The second showed a line on a map, with the place of Channa Grove marked as a small empty square. The third explained the procedure for filing an objection. The language was so polished, so well-oiled, that the paper itself seemed to say: I am not violence; I am order.

Aruni read the first line. "Stones, signs, lamps, cloth and temporary gatherings unlawfully established at the said site shall be removed so as to facilitate public movement, lighting, cleanliness and beautification." The words hung in the air. Some felt anger, some laughter, some disgust. Ba said quietly, "A name becomes a stone and they call it unlawful. The one who erased the name—was that lawful?"

Devika kept looking at the paper. The words "general public" struck her like a knife. Who was this general public? Not those who read names through the night? Not the mother who placed her son's name-stone? Not the labourer's son who wrote his father's name after fifty years? The "general public" of paper is often a population that is not present, yet in whose name anything may be done.

Mira asked for the second line to be read. Aruni read: "Crowding at the site and circulation of unverified narratives may create social tension and spread superstition." This time Mira laughed, but there was fire in the laughter. "When truth cannot be found on paper, what people say is called unverified. When bodies are sold, privacy sold, breath sold, there is no tension. When a name survives, then there is tension."

Gop Kumar took the third page. It was written in the language of forms—name, address, grounds, proof, ownership information, copies of relevant records. Gop whispered, "Proof for one whose body went into the water? Ownership of a name lost in fraud? Records for a silence that was bought?" He did not throw the form to the ground. He folded it and placed it beside the register. The struggle did not begin by tearing paper, but by seeing the crocodile hidden inside it.

For the first time Budhba Ghost appeared half-clear in daylight. His body was forming between shadow and dust. He circled the yellow notice three times. The children watched holding their breath. Budhba bent over the page as though smelling it, then released his dry laugh. "There is less ink in this paper than fear. Someone's hand is hiding inside the municipal seal."

Satyavrat Mehta said softly, "This cannot be the municipality's notice alone. There are people who prepared this language—people who know law, people who want a memorial, people who want contracts, and those who are uncomfortable with the watch over names." He stopped. Once he had been accustomed to finishing every sentence; now he left some sentences half-finished so that people could hear the remaining half within themselves.

Then a man stepped forward from the back. White trousers, a pale blue kurta, a gleaming file in his hand. He smiled. "I have not come in opposition to anyone. I have brought a proposal for cooperation. Batuknath Babu says this site must be formally converted into a people's memory trust. Otherwise the government will be compelled to remove it. We can arrange registration, permission, protection, funding—everything."

At the name, the circle went cold. Batuknath Hariharan—the man who had rowed the boat of crime through court—now wanted to climb aboard the boat of memory. His messenger opened the file and showed coloured renderings: gate, plaque, ticket booth, memorial gallery, visitors' book, donation box. At the top was written: "Channa Grove People's Memory Centre." The children studied the pictures. There was no tree, no stump, no stones bearing names; only shining floors and railings.

Ananya asked, "Where in this picture is the stone that says 'For the one whose name could not be found'?" The messenger hesitated. He turned a page, then said, "That will be represented symbolically." Another child asked, "Where will Ujjwal's mother sit?" The messenger said, "There will be an auditorium inside." A third child asked, "Where will the ghosts play kabaddi?" The messenger laughed. "Things like that will remain in people's feelings." The girl said calmly, "Then this is not a centre. It is a cage."

The messenger's face hardened. "Children do not understand law." This time Satyavrat Mehta rose. His rising carried no swagger of authority, only the weariness of a witness. He told the messenger, "Law is not the possession of those who understand paper. No legality is complete without hearing the people affected. And before turning memory into a trust, permission must be taken from memory itself." The messenger laughed. "Can memory sign?" Satyavrat replied, "It can—in the presence of the people."

A low voice rose in the crowd: "Present." First one, then another, then ten, then twenty. The messenger tried to gather his file, but the wind rose. Dust lifted from a crevice in the cut stump and fell across the glossy drawings. Soil stained the picture of the glass gallery. Irritated, the messenger blew on it, but the mark did not move.

Aruni took the yellow notice again. On its blank margin he wrote in pencil: "Not an empty plot—a place of names." Devika wrote on another edge: "Not a crowd—families." Mira wrote: "Not superstition—memory with privacy." Gop wrote: "The absence of proof is itself evidence of the crime." Ba wrote with a trembling hand: "The roots are alive." In round children's letters they wrote: "Present."

The municipal paper was no longer one-sided. The people's answer had sprouted upon it. There was no seal here, but there were thumbprints. Those who could not write their names left a stain, a line, the print of a leaf. Satyavrat watched the page. He remembered petitions, reports and affidavits filed in court for years. Yet this page seemed to him more alive than any of them.

Then the municipal messenger left one more sentence behind: "Remove it within seven days, or force will be used." With that he departed. His shoes kicked a little soil beyond the ring of stones. The children did not run after him. Budhba Ghost watched him go and said softly, "The one who speaks of using force usually has less strength inside than fear."

Evening sank. The yellow notice lay among the stones, but its colour was changing. Sun, dust, people's touch, tears, pencil, leaf-prints—together they were muddying its yellowness. Ananya wrote in the register: "Today the paper was heard. The paper spoke falsely. The people answered."

That night the circle did not break. People remained seated there. Discussion began—not merely about filing an objection, but about making their own map. On the government map, Channa Grove was an empty square; on the people's map it would be the centre. On the government map there was a road; on the people's map the road would include the homes where the mobile phones of cheated young men still lay. On the government map there was a bridge; on the people's map the names of the labourers inside its piers would appear. On the government map the river was only a line; on the people's map there would be the cries of water-burial.

Aruni spread an old mat. Gop opened his papers. Devika mixed red earth. Mira brought black charcoal. The children moved the stones aside and cleared space in the middle. Ba said, "Let the map be drawn by hands that do not merely see a place, but hear it." Satyavrat remained seated behind them, but for the first time his eyes held a faint lightness.

In the last watch of the night, the first point was marked in the centre of the mat—the severed stump of Channa Grove. Ananya drew a red circle around it. “Memory will spread from here,” she said. Far away a dog barked, water stirred, and Budhba Ghost’s voice came out of the darkness: “Now the real map has begun.”

The yellow notice remained upon the rim of the stump. Its seal was dimming, but the people’s written word “Present” shone. On the first night facing the seven-day threat, Garh Narikel sat down to draw its first map of memory.

FOLK SONG: THE SCISSORS OF THE YELLOW PAPER

Folk tune: warning folk tune

The paper says, “Move away,” it says;

The village says—no, the names are present here.

Yellow paper flutters—not wings, but scissors;

Calling it an “empty plot,” it would cut memory’s seat.

A seven-day threat, the mouth of the seal dark;

The people wrote “Present” and made their own road.

Red earth, charcoal, stones, an old mat;

The hand that hears a place is the hand that draws its map.

A red circle round the stump—memory will spread from here;

The paper’s fading seal will lose before the people’s light.

The yellow notice says—move; the village says—no;

A place where names are present is not empty.

CHAPTER 56

The First Map of Memory

The place marked “empty plot” was the very place where the greatest number of names were buried.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: LAND OF MEMORY

Folk tune: song of the soil

Read the soil, read it before you measure;

Even land marked “empty” holds stories of names.

*The place written as “empty plot” was filled with names;
Someone’s game, someone’s home, someone’s dream had grown there.*

*When you measure land, first read the map of memory;
Give honour to grave, tree, footpath and water source.*

If development comes, let it first obtain the people’s consent;

Let new construction honour the land of memory.

*No earth is empty; every grain contains history;
Development earns trust only by respecting the soil.*

*Here someone’s kite flew; there lies ash from a hearth;
Footpath, grave and tree each have their own standing.*

*Let the vehicle of development stop and seek consent first;
Bow to the land of memory, and only then lay the foundation.*

All night the words of the yellow notice fluttered upon the rim of the stump. The phrase “empty plot” entered everyone’s sleep like a thorn. The place where bodies had drowned, where names had risen, where ghosts had played kabaddi, where silence had become witness—this had been called empty. From that single line on a government sheet, the village understood that the cutting had not been only of the tree; preparations were now under way to cut memory itself.

At dawn Ananya did not begin by unfolding and reading the yellow notice. First she straightened the stones placed around the stump. Each bore a name—some letters crooked, some complete, some only an opening sound. Brushing dust away with a child’s hand, she said, “The paper that calls our place empty must first be shown how full it is.”

With that, the making of the first map of memory began. Aruni brought discarded sheets from the old bridge plan. They already carried lines drawn by the foreign contractor—measurements, piers, width, cost, water flow, approach road. The children turned the sheets over and spread them on the ground. They decided to draw people's lines on the back of the government's lines.

Mira brought red earth mixed with water. Devika brought ash. Ira gathered dry leaves. Gop Kumar arrived with a bundle of old copies, but Ananya said, "Hands first, copies later." Gop smiled. The man who had spent years searching for truth inside paper was beginning to understand that paper is not truth's home, only its veranda.

At the centre of the map they drew the cut stump of Channa Grove—a deep red circle. Around it the children made small points. Each point represented a name-stone. Where a name was known, letters were written beside it; where no name had been found, the point was left open. The open points were not called empty, but waiting.

Aruni drew the course of the Kamala-Balan. The line did not run straight. It bent again and again, cut through old fields, wavered past the labourers' settlement, formed a black whirlpool near the bridge pier, then came to rest beside Channa Grove. The children asked, "Why have you drawn the river trembling like this?" Aruni replied, "Because this is not a river from a file; it is a river of bodies. How can the line of a river in which names drowned ever be straight?"

With her fingernail Ba drew a very old footpath upon the map. It no longer existed on the ground: fields had changed, houses shifted, the road had cut across it. But Ba said, "My mother used to walk this way to the pond." The children labelled it "Mother's Path." What the municipality called a plot, the people marked as memory under a mother's feet.

Ujjwal's mother made a black circle at the place where Ujjwal's phone had last been found active. Devika drew a pale ring of ash around it—the crocodile of the screen. But Mira stopped her and said, "Mark the wound of his death, not a spectacle." So a small white point was set inside the black circle. The children named it "The Light Left in the Mind."

Saumya asked the women labourers which households had lost men in the bridge work. The women first looked at one another. Widows, sisters, daughters and mothers of those whose names never appeared in official testimony slowly came forward. The labourers' settlement took shape on the map—not as houses, but as palms. Each palm had a different number of fingers, because no family had been destroyed in exactly the same way; every loss had its own form.

Gop Kumar bent low over the place where the foreign company's temporary warehouse had stood. "Receipts disappeared from here," he said. Ananya asked, "What is the sign for a missing receipt?" Gop thought for a long time, then made a small hole in the ash. "What disappears from paper," he said, "will remain as a hole on the map." The children labelled it "Mouth of the Missing Paper."

As the map took shape, the villagers' speech began to change as well. Earlier they had said, "The bridge stood there," "The body was found there," "The police came that way." Now they said, "Here a name became water," "Here silence was bound," "Here the first crack opened in the lie," "Here the children took the watch." Place was no longer an object; place had become a knot in a story.

Later in the morning two municipal employees arrived. They carried measuring tape, a tin of yellow paint, and iron stakes. They said that under the notice the area had to be marked. Ananya showed them the map and said, "This area is already marked. Where will your stake go—through a name, through a footpath, or into the mouth of the missing paper?" The employees wanted to laugh, but the laughter caught halfway in their throats.

One employee said quietly, "We came under orders." Ba replied, "An order also has a parent. Tell us its name." The employee fell silent. Aruni lifted the yellow notice and read it aloud. "Public beautification," "extension of facilities," "vacant area," "unauthorised obstruction"—one by one the phrases were released into the air. Each time a phrase was heard, the children wrote its opposite meaning on the map: "memory," "assembly," "name," "stump," "watch."

Then for the first time Budhba Ghost became almost visible in daylight. He was no longer shrub or smoke, but an old figure standing with bowed head in the shadow of the cut roots. The employees could not see him, yet their measuring tape suddenly rolled itself back in. Ananya understood that the grove's old watchman had come to sign the new map.

Satyavrat Mehta came and stood at the back. He studied the map for a long time without speaking. His eyes stopped at the phrase "For the one whose name could not be found." He asked softly, "Why is this part left open?" Ananya said, "Because the government calls it empty; we call it waiting. When the name is found, this place will be filled. If the name is never found, the blank will remain to remind everyone that the search has not ended." Satyavrat Mehta bowed his head.

Mira drew a circle of privacy along one edge of the map. No names were written inside it. It was for the women who did not want their suffering made public. They called it "The Right of the Unspoken." Devika said, "Memory is not a chest forced open." The children wrote the sentence in red earth.

By late afternoon the map seemed nearly complete, but Ira said, "There is no sky in it." The children looked upward. It was true: river, tree, bridge, houses, footpath, stones, holes and circles were all there, but there was no sign of the sky into which the sound of kabaddi might rise. Then a boy mixed a blue colour like kohl and drew an open sky around the map. Inside it they made small circles—the planets. Ananya said softly, “If someone steals names and tries to leave the earth, the sky too will remain on watch.”

Everyone fell silent at those words. The matter of another planet had not yet fully entered the story, but its shadow descended onto the map. The future flight of the rogues who regarded the earth as an empty sheet stretched as far as the sky. In one corner of that sky the children wrote: “Unnamed Planet—not empty yet, but under question.”

By evening the first map of memory had dried. People wanted to fold it, but Ba refused. “Memory is not folded.” So two bamboo poles were fixed behind the stump and the map was hung between them. When the wind moved, the map trembled as though the leaves of old Channa Grove were rustling again.

At that moment a gleaming car arrived, raising dust in the distance. The man who stepped out carried not a leather file but a proposal wrapped in cloth. Bowing politely, he said, “Greetings from Batuknath Hariharan ji. He says that to safeguard this people’s memory properly, a formal ‘People’s Memory Trust’ must be created.”

Silence spread around the stump. The map kept trembling in the wind. For the first time the children understood that the next attack on memory would not come with an axe or a yellow notice, but with the sweet language of protection. Holding the corner of the map, Ananya said, “Tomorrow we will ask the name of this proposal.”

Night descended. The map hung behind the stump—river, tree, hole, palm, circle of privacy, the imagined question of the “Unnamed Planet.” And the proposal, polite from the outside, perhaps hid within it the first tooth of the most cunning crocodile yet.

FOLK SONG: NOT AN EMPTY PLOT

Folk tune: song of the soil

Not empty, no—this plot is not empty;

A thousand names lie buried here, a platter of history.

Where “empty” was written, a thousand names lay buried;

Ghosts’ games, women’s oaths, the labourers’ cry.

The red line became river, the palm became a ghat;

On the children's map everyone's road returned.

Then came a proposal speaking the sweet language of protection;

Inside the velvet of a trust, the crocodile's teeth were hidden.

Not an axe, but a courteous greeting is the next move;

A broker wants to buy memory in the name of service.

The map trembled; the child said—we will ask its name tomorrow;

Not an empty plot—here lies a platter of history.

Calling it “service,” the broker came running to buy memory itself.

CHAPTER 57

Gangesha's Question

There is no proposition without proof—Gangesha's question still turns today within the roots of the stump.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE FIELD OF QUESTIONS

Folk tune: question-bhagat

Plough the furrow of questions, plough it deep;

In Gangesha's field, sow the seed of proof.

Gangesha's question ploughs the soil deep like a plough;

Planting the seed of proof, it sows the rice of knowledge.

The field finds its proposition when it receives the water of reasoning;

Discernment slowly removes the weeds of doubt.

Let the field of questions remain open to every student;

Answers may change, but honesty must remain.

From Gangesha's questions the crop of knowledge grows full;

An enquiring mind lights Mithila's future.

Irrigate with the water of reasoning; pull out the grass of doubt;

Let the grain of the proposition sway, guarded by discernment.

Answers change like seasons; commitment remains the same;

The granary of Mithila will fill with the grain of inquiry.

For one night between the yellow notice and the first map of memory, the stump of Channa Grove was so restless that its severed roots seemed to turn from within. The children's map lay spread on the soil—the Kamala-Balan, the bridge piers, the feet of water-burial, Ujjwal's room, Mira's oath, Devika's school, and in the middle the half-cut stump of Channa Grove. The government paper called the place an empty plot; on the children's map, the "empty" place carried more names than anywhere else.

After dawn, when sunlight fell directly upon the cut face of the stump, a white car arrived from afar. It bore neither flag nor emblem; yet as soon as the passenger stepped out everyone recognised him—Batuknath Hariharan. The name already linked in the village with legal cunning, the swamp of court dates and the rescue of criminals was now entering the courtyard of memory with a red file in hand. His face wore the colour of mourning, but calculation shone in his eyes.

Batuknath stopped at a proper distance from the stump and folded his hands. "I understand the importance of this place," he said. "Feeling needs an institution. An institution needs rules. Rules need a trust. I have brought a proposal to establish the 'Garh Narikel People's Memory Trust.'" He opened the red file. Inside were thick papers: by-laws, a list of trustees, possible grants, cultural preservation, memory development, visitor management, and plans for a future research centre. The words were so beautiful that if one closed one's ears while reading them, even sin could seem like virtue.

Ananya did not look at the file. She lifted a stone from the stump, the one marked "For the one whose name could not be found." She asked Batuknath, "It is fine if you create a trust. But do you know justice?" Batuknath laughed with the practice of a courtroom. "Daughter, what trust can exist without justice?" Ananya asked again, "Then speak of justice first."

Everyone fell silent. After the yellow notice, this was the second paper assault. But this time the paper had arrived dressed in the language of grief rather than government. Aruni stepped forward, but Ba stopped his hand. "The children are asking. Let the children ask." Ba had learned that in this story, the generation that had seen less often heard more accurately.

At that moment Ira arrived carrying a copy of an old book. The paper was new, but the letters seemed to carry the smell of old sunlight. She sat quietly at the edge of the map and said, "Once a map is made against the phrase 'empty plot,' the question of proof must arise. And when the question of proof arises in Mithila, the name of Gangesha cannot be avoided."

Gangesha. As soon as the name was spoken, a faint gritty sound came from within the stump. Those who had only heard the name of a work of Navya-Nyaya were startled. Those who considered it merely a subject for pandits wondered what connection there could be between the cutting of Channa Grove and Gangesha's logic. Ira opened the first page of the book. "Gangesha Upadhyaya, author of the Tattvachintamani. Founder of Navya-Nyaya. A lamp of Mithila's mind who gathered into a single work thought equal to twelve thousand books."

Batuknath grew slightly impatient. "Why a philosophical discussion here?" he asked. Ira did not look at him. Turning to the children, she said, "Because a society that worships books of justice is often afraid to do justice. The story of Gangesha is not only a story of logic; it is also a story of the thorn of caste."

Ba said softly, "Speak." Then Ira untied the difficult knot of folk memory. "It is said that he was born five years after his father's death. The question arose: what is the proof of birth? What is the proof of lineage? Does what society declares impossible therefore become false? It is also said that Gangesha married a Chamar woman. The question arose: is a human being's worth made by caste, or by justice?"

A stir ran through the circle around the stump. Some elders grew uncomfortable. Some young men suppressed smiles. When caste is spoken aloud and driven like a peg into a public place, the village air changes. Those who moments earlier had felt sacred while hearing the names of the dead suddenly found themselves surrounded by memories of their own lineage, family, marriages, feasts, hearths, wells and bodies.

Ananya asked, "If he was the founder of Navya-Nyaya, who judged the justice of his marriage?" At the question Batuknath began closing the red file. He understood that the children were not going to sign the trust paper; they were asking for testimony about an old social crime.

Ira said, "That very question was hidden. Gangesha's intellect was accepted, but the inconvenient parts of Gangesha's life were concealed. The scripture was placed upon the head, while the truth of life was locked in the chamber of caste. Many called this respect. But if respect strangles truth, it is not respect—it is the murder of memory."

Mira spoke here. "Honour killing is not only the killing of a body. Often, in the name of protecting family honour, the truth of a life is killed. A woman's will is killed. A relationship across caste is killed. The body of an idea is killed. And the scholar who cuts away an inconvenient life to create a purified statue also commits a killing—inside paper."

Gop Kumar added in a low voice, "In some traditions of writing, among some critics, even under the shadow of established names—scholars such as Ramanath Jha and Udaychandra Jha 'Ashok'—the sharp edges of Gangesha's life became obscured. His Tattvachintamani shone, while the episode involving the Chamar woman was blurred. This is not direct bloodshed, but it is certainly an honour-killing of memory."

The sentence hung heavily in the air. Batuknath stood at once. "Careful! It is easy to accuse scholars. Evidence is required." Ananya neither laughed nor grew afraid. "Evidence? We are studying Gangesha now. Tell us the kinds of proof—perception, inference, testimony, comparison—as many as you accept, we will hear them. But what is the proof of caste? What proof denies humanity? And what proof gives anyone the right to cut away an inconvenient part of a life?"

This time a clear sound came from within the stump—neither human nor leaf; as though logic trapped in dry roots were searching for breath. The voice said, "You ask for proof; good. But first tell us—what is your proof for rejecting what you call unacceptable?" People started.

Some looked toward Budhba Ghost, but the voice was not his. It rose from the fine lines inside the roots.

Ira looked at the cut face of the stump. The tree-rings shone like twelve thousand thin lines. One child whispered, “Tattvachintamani.” Another said, “Twelve thousand books.” A third added, “Gangesha’s writing inside the tree.” No one could tell whether the children were playing or seeing philosophy. But at Channa Grove, when had the two ever truly been separate?

Batuknath tried to recover his position. “Very well,” he said, “the trust rules will contain no caste discrimination. Everyone’s name will be written.” Mira immediately asked, “And everyone’s body will be honoured too? Everyone’s love? Everyone’s labour? Everyone’s privacy? Writing names alone does not break caste.” Devika added, “And no trust will become the owner of names. A name belongs to family, people and memory. An institution may serve; it may not own.”

Aruni lifted the red file. On the first page of the by-laws was written “Jurisdiction of the Trust.” Aruni struck it out and wrote above it: “Duty of Service.” Batuknath’s face tightened. With that single stroke his entire legal game trembled. He lived by authority; duty frightened him.

Ananya told the children, “Add one place to the new map—Gangesha’s Question.” The children drew a small circle near the stump at the centre of the map. On it they wrote: “No trust without justice.” Beneath that: “If caste cuts a name, logic will catch it.”

For the first time real fear awoke inside Batuknath. He did not fear losing in court, nor the humiliation of paper; but when children turn philosophy into a game and a game into a social question, old cunning no longer works. He understood that this generation was learning the language of law, but tempering it in the fire of justice.

At evening Satyavrat Mehta arrived. Everything was told to him. He remained silent for a long time. Then he said, “Gangesha’s logic teaches us that the edges of words are sharp. The word ‘trust’ looks smaller than ‘justice,’ but without justice it becomes a crocodile.” Then he fell silent again. He understood that speeches were no longer central in this courtyard; questions were.

As night came down, many lamps were lit around the stump. The red file was placed in the middle. Beside it lay a copy of the Tattvachintamani, Ananya’s stone, Mira’s red cord, and the children’s map. Batuknath’s proposal was neither rejected nor accepted. It was kept waiting for a hearing—as a criminal is not punished at once, but first made to hear the full testimony.

That night, while returning home, people saw several young men looking at a shining notice on their phones: “Garh Narikel Digital Tribute Platform: Add the name of your loved one, preserve memory safely.” Beneath it was not the symbol of Chandrapal Batra’s company, but the emblem of a new cultural-service organisation. The children looked at one another. Ananya gripped the register tightly.

Gangesha’s question was not finished. After the paper trust, a screen trust was arriving. A faint laugh rose from inside the stump—as though Navya-Nyaya itself were ready to examine the proof of the next deception.

FOLK SONG: GANGESHA’S QUESTION

Folk tune: question-bhagat

Gangesha asks, he asks for proof;

Look whose pocket hides inside the hand of protection.

No proposition without proof; the roots ask at night:

Whose memory, whose trust, whose storehouse of profit?

Tattvachintamani, stone and red cord together;

The proposal waits for hearing, and the colour of deception opens.

Then the mobile glowed—a tribute platform;

Add a name, save memory—what a sweet contrivance.

Behind the crocodile of paper came the crocodile of the screen;

Navya-Nyaya laughed and ran to test the next proof.

Gangesha’s question says—test even the sweetest speech;

Look whose pocket is hidden inside the hand of protection.

The story of knowledge does not happen only in assemblies of scholars. The gleam of a shell, smoke on a mountain, an empty seat, a child’s indistinct word, green vegetables in a garden, a message on a mobile phone—everywhere the mind constructs a world with the help of perception, memory, inference, comparison and testimony.

Gangesha’s achievement is to open this everyday process in such subtle language that cause, defect, absence, relation and limit do not remain vague. Narrative makes this subtlety visible; theory remains in brackets to remind the reader that behind the visible scene stands an entire architecture of reasoning.

[Philosophical undertone—the final page of Kadambari—Book and Obstacle: an old copy of Banabhatta's Kadambari was kept in the library of Garh Narikel. (Philosophical principle: the direct fruit of the mangalacharana is not completion of the book, but removal of obstacles.)]

CHAPTER 58

Chandrapal's Memorial App

When tribute becomes an app, even grief begins to be collected in instalments.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE FUND OF SERVICE IN GRIEF

Folk tune: compassion jhumar

Share compassion, and keep the accounts clear;

Go beyond flowers and lamps to build the road of life.

Flowers and lamps on the screen, with open accounts beside them;

Let a service fund of grief give families an answer.

Compassion is not an instalment; let assistance be regular;

Let education, health and livelihood become lasting arrangements.

Let the donation code be transparent, and honour the beneficiary;

No business in the name of sorrow—make compassion a campaign.

When a service fund of grief lifts life again,

Memory moves beyond flowers and makes a road for the future.

No shop in the name of grief, but a courtyard of service;

Let every coin be openly accounted for before the people.

Education, medicine, employment—plant all three pillars;

With the lamp of memory, light the road of the next generation.

By dawn Chandrapal Batra's "Digital Tribute Platform" had begun glowing on many phones in Garh Narikel. The message said: "Make the name of your loved one immortal, preserve memory safely, offer tribute." Beneath it were flowers, a lamp, water, and a small shining symbol. No company name appeared clearly, only "People's Service Cultural Forum." Those who had gone home the previous night after hearing Gangesha's question woke to see that when the red file of the trust became stuck before the stump, a second crocodile of memory was lifting its snout from the screen.

Chandrapal Batra himself did not come to the village. That was his way. Wherever he would have to meet people's eyes, he sent representatives; wherever tears could be counted, he built a platform. He knew that in grief people hand over names, photographs, stories, tears, receipts and documents. If someone whom the court had not heard for years and whom the government had reduced to an “empty plot” was told by a shining page, “We will preserve your memory,” even a trembling hand might press the consent button.

When Devika opened the platform for the first time, her face tightened. The page was beautiful—a blue background, a faint wave of water, a lamp in the centre, Garh Narikel’s name above. But as soon as the window for adding a name opened, the questions began: full name of the deceased, full address of the family, copy of identification, bank-related information, photograph, cause of death, claim status, compensation details, contact list, numbers of relatives, and finally: “Consent: information may be used for memorial publication, research, assistance, donations and partnerships.” Devika switched off the phone. “Not tribute,” she said. “A net.”

Ananya gathered the children around the stump. She placed the phone in the middle, not as a sacred object but as one might place a snake. The button “Make the Name Immortal” glowed. One boy asked, “Why is so much paper needed to make a name immortal?” Another said, “If they are going to preserve the names, why do we need our register?” A girl added softly, “Anyone who asks for a consent form before listening to a name has not ears, but a stomach.”

Ira opened the copy of Gangesha’s book again. “Yesterday the question was: what is proof? Now apply Gangesha’s test to this app. What do we see by direct perception?” The children answered together, “A beautiful page.” Ira asked, “Inference?” Devika replied, “Inside the beautiful page is a desire to collect names, identities, sorrow, money and claims.” Ira asked again, “Testimony?” Mira said, “‘Tribute,’ ‘safety,’ ‘service’—sweet words.” Finally Ira asked, “Comparison?” Ananya looked toward the stump and then the phone. “A crocodile lies quietly on the surface of the water. Its teeth are underneath.”

A faint gritty sound rose from within the stump. Someone said, “The tree agrees.” Budhba Ghost shimmered unusually strongly in daylight that day; there was no laughter on his face, only contempt. As he leaned toward the screen’s glow, the screen went dark by itself, then lit again. The children shivered. No one clearly heard whether Budhba spoke, but one meaning reached them all: “Hunting names in the name of protecting names.”

Mira read the platform’s “consent.” Her voice grew harder line by line. “It says here that the story, image, voice, family details, future research, assistance, publicity, partnerships and donation appeals may all use the material. In other words: give them grief and they will turn it into a story; give them tears and they will turn them into an advertisement; give them the name of the dead and they will turn it into a donation plate.” A woman who had been thinking of uploading her drowned husband’s photograph lowered the phone from her chest and put it back into her bundle.

Gop Kumar remained quiet, making dots on paper. He could smell a digital net from afar. “This platform is not directly in Chandrapal’s name,” he said. “There are three layers—a cultural forum, a service group, memory technology. But look at the style of the writing, the information being requested, and the route of donations. It is the same old hand that once chewed not the body of a young man who lost at gambling, but the future of his family.” Gop did not give a detailed technical explanation before the village. He said only this: “Do not give trust to anyone who uses grief as a reason to ask for unnecessary information.”

Suddenly a young man near the stump laughed. “So is everything bad? What if a digital platform carries names far and wide?” Devika turned toward him. “Carrying them far is not bad. But whose hand holds the reins of the name? The dead person’s family? The people’s assembly? The children? Or Chandrapal Batra, who can change the next button one day and open a donation box?” The young man fell silent. His question had not been wrong, but the answer was difficult.

Then Satyavrat Mehta arrived. He looked at the phone, read the terms, then sat upon the roots of the stump. For a long time he said nothing. Finally he spoke: “In law, consent can be written. But how free is consent taken in a moment of grief? If a hungry person is made to sign in exchange for food, is that consent or compulsion? If a grieving family must surrender information in exchange for memory, is that tribute or a transaction?” His voice carried not the weight of court, but of regret.

Batuknath Hariharan stood at a distance listening. The red file was not opened that day. He felt both relief and anxiety. Relief because the children’s attention had shifted from his trust to the screen; anxiety because if the children cut apart the screen’s words with reasoning too, how would he defend the red file? He thought to himself: create an institution, attach an app, draw memory in through the route of donations, then bind it in rules. But Gangesha’s question followed behind him: “What is the proof of your authority?”

Meanwhile Chandrapal Batra sat in a cold room in the city watching a report. How many opened the page, how many entered names, how many stopped halfway—the numbers climbed his screen. He had no interest in names; he was interested in the half-completed windows. Incomplete grief can be called again. He told his assistant, “The village is emotional. Once trust is built, they will all come.” The assistant asked, “And the children of Channa Grove?” Chandrapal laughed. “Children are emotional obstacles, not permanent barriers.”

At that moment a strange error appeared on his screen. Wherever there had been a field for “name,” the word “proof” kept filling itself in. Where there had been “donation,” it became “duty.” Where there had been “consent,” it became “Whose authority?” Chandrapal grew irritated. He began calling the technical team, but the screen flashed again: “Tattvachintamani Mode Active.” No such feature actually existed; no programmer had built it. It was the stump’s laughter travelling across the network into the city room.

In Garh Narikel the children decided they would not prevent any family from adding a name to the platform, but everyone would first be taught what it meant to give a name. So a “School of Names” was set up around the stump. First lesson: saying a name and surrendering a name are two different things. Second lesson: let a photograph of grief not become someone else’s property. Third lesson: when memory is registered, first ask whether someone is becoming its owner.

Mira had the children write a new oath of privacy: “We will speak the name of the dead, but we will not hand over the key to the dead person’s house. We will listen to a story, but not sell tears. We will see a photograph, but not circulate it without permission. We will give help, but not demand a soul in return.” As the oath was spoken, the red cord beside the stump’s roots moved lightly by itself.

At evening an old woman came to write her son’s name. She did not know how to use a mobile phone, but a young man had told her that putting the name on the app would bring government assistance. Devika explained everything slowly. The woman listened, then said, “My son went into the water. I pulled his name out of the water. Why should I drown it again in a screen?” She wrote her son’s name on the stone by the stump and quietly went home. After that sentence, many people closed the page on their phones.

At night Ananya drew a new symbol beside the map—a small square screen with a wave of water and a crocodile’s eye inside it. Beneath she wrote: “Question of the Memory App.” Ira looked at it and said, “The next lesson of Navya-Nyaya is ready. Perception: the screen. Inference: hunger. Testimony: tribute. Truth: still under examination.” The children thought about the line for a long time.

Then a message came to Gop’s phone. There was no sender’s name. It was designed to disappear immediately, but in Garh Narikel disappearance was no longer silence. Gop read quickly: “The tribute platform is not alone. The donation code will change at night. Raghav is watching.” The message flickered and vanished. But as it disappeared, a faint leaf-mark remained on the phone glass.

Ananya saw the mark. She understood that Chandrapal was not alone; Raghav “Signal” had awakened again in the shadows. This time what rose from within the stump was not laughter but warning. The crocodile of the memorial app had opened its mouth; the donation code was about to become its teeth.

All night the children kept watch around the stump. One watched the glow of mobile phones, one the names on the stones, one the yellow notice, one the red file. Channa Grove had been cut, but four crocodiles now lay in wait around its courtyard—government, trust, screen and signal. Next morning Raghav's code would be read first, then the names.

FOLK SONG: INSTALMENTS ON GRIEF

Folk tune: plaintive satirical song

Not for sale, no—the name of a loved one is not for sale;

When devotion becomes a code, it is devotion no longer.

Flowers and lamps on the screen, a donation code below;

“To make the dead person's name immortal”—what turn of trade is this?

A mother offers tears while the app counts fees;

Collecting instalments even on grief, the crocodile fills its belly.

The leaf-mark on the glass did not vanish when the message disappeared;

Raghav awoke in the shadows, and a warning arrived.

Government, trust, screen, signal—four teeth;

Children keep watch at night in the courtyard of the cut tree.

A loved one's name is not a flower for sale;

When devotion becomes a code, devotion will not remain.

Flowers and lamps on the screen, a donation code below;

“To make a name immortal”—what turn of trade is this?

[Philosophical undertone—Kiranavali's unobstructed journey: in Udayanacharya's chamber, disciples were tying bundles of manuscripts. Later, a dispute arose over this event.]

CHAPTER 59

Raghav Signal's New Code

The scripture written in the faint trace of an erased screen is read more clearly than any other.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: ERASED CODE, SURVIVING TRUTH

Folk tune: secret-message awakening song

*Save the vapour, save the vapour upon the glass;
Find the road through the shadow of even an erased letter.*

*The message was erased, yet vapour remained upon the glass;
Read the tiny code, and the whole road tells its tale.
Preserve the digital ash and examine it with experts;
Do not rush to a conclusion—tie together the threads of evidence.*

*An erased code is not defeat, but the first door of inquiry;
A secure copy and a time-stamp will become the firm foundation.
From the marks of surviving truth the map of the web will open;
With the lamp of patience in hand, even darkness will dissolve.*

*Do not conclude in haste; join thread to thread;
Time-stamp, secure copy—turn them toward evidence.
Sit with those who know, and loosen the knots of the code;
Light the lamp of patience and weigh the secrets of the dark web.*

The next morning people sat around the stump to read Raghav's code as though an ancient scripture were about to be opened. But this scripture was written not on leaves, but on the blurred traces of a vanished screen. The message erased in the night had left no body behind, yet its vapour remained. The leaf-shape caught upon the glass of Gop's phone was not a severed leaf of Channa Grove; it was a leaf of Raghav's fear.

Raghav "Signal" Somani had always believed that if words were erased in time, a crime never acquired a body. His faith was simple: speak, erase, and no proof of what was spoken would remain. But from the day the children took the watch over names into their own hands in Garh Narikel, even erased words began returning with their shadows. The message vanished, but a leaf-shaped stain remained on the glass. The stain vanished, but its outline stayed in the children's eyes. Their eyes closed, but the roots of the stump had already heard it.

Ananya said first, "Before reading the code, make the code into evidence." Ira smiled at the sentence. Gangesha's question was still new in the courtyard of Channa Grove, but the children were learning its language in their own fashion. What is perception? The glass of the mobile phone. What is inference? Theft of memory under the pretext of donation. What is verbal testimony? Tribute, service, trust, donation. What is analogy? A crocodile that looks still upon the water while keeping its teeth below. What is postulation? If the message was erased, there was something the offender did not want to survive. What is non-apprehension? The name missing from the app bears witness to the name that was erased. The children counted these one by one, as though Navya-Nyaya were being born again upon the bark of the stump.

Gop said, "The meaning of the code will not be direct. Raghav always gave things other names. Money was donation, commission was service, theft was process, threat was advice, and deletion was privacy." Mira stopped him at once. "Privacy is not a shield for crime. Privacy is the victim's right, not the offender's cave." The sentence settled around the stump like stone.

Saumya brought out an old list. It contained many words for donations—gift of lamps, gift of water, gift of labour, memorial donation, scholarship, peace fund, disaster relief, cultural revival. Every word sounded sacred. Yet behind each stood one of Raghav's tiny marks—a bracket, a dot, a crescent, three lines, the vein of a leaf, an inverted lamp. To ordinary eyes the marks were decoration; to Raghav's people they were roads.

Aruni kept his palm upon the stump and remained silent for a long time. Then he said, "If the language of donation becomes a criminal code, it is no donation; it is a second water-burial of the body. Once the river drowned bodies. Now a plaque of charity will drown names." Several families shuddered. For the first time they understood that the name of a dead person could die again—this time garlanded with honour.

Batuknath Hariharan came again that day. His clothing still performed the old drama of stern, upright law. From a distance he saw the children reading Raghav's code, and discomfort crossed his face. In a court of law, codes remained under his control—sections, subsections, petitions, stays, replies. Here the children were opening the bodies of words. He said quietly, "Be careful. Digital evidence is not easily admitted in court.” Ananya answered at once, “Justice will be admitted here first. The court may examine it afterward.”

At that reply Budhba Ghost flickered. His form did not become clear in daylight, but his laughter sounded like the rasp of leaves. Batuknath’s face hardened. He understood that in this courtyard his years of legal pride were beginning to stagger.

Then a young man arrived who had done small jobs for Chandrapal’s memorial app. His name was Bhavesh. In a trembling voice he said, “I did not know all this was wrong. I was only told to create donation categories on the tribute platform. Raghav sent which category meant what. If a bracket came, the donation would never reach the family. If the vein of a leaf came, the name would remain only for display. If an inverted lamp came, the route of the account would change.” After each sentence Gop did not interrupt him; instead he repeated it slowly in ordinary language so that everyone could understand.

Mira asked Bhavesh, “Did you know that when a name glowed on the screen, the family believed their son’s memory was safe?” Bhavesh lowered his head. “I knew. But I was told that emotion runs the platform, while accounting runs the business.” As soon as he said this, a dry insect crawled out from inside the stump and moved across the cut bark. The children watched it. Ananya wrote: “An insect upon emotion.”

Raghav himself was not there, yet his absence was heavier than a presence. Perhaps from some glass room in a distant city he was watching the scene. He believed he could remain invisible. But in Garh Narikel invisible beings had always arrived before human beings—ghosts, spirits, Loth, Panidubbi, witches, the Brahma of the pipal. Here Raghav’s invisibility was no skill; it was merely a frail shadow in an ancient crowd.

At noon Raghav’s second message arrived. This time it did not appear on Gop’s phone but on the corner of the yellow notice lying near the stump. The paper itself turned faintly blue, and for three moments letters appeared upon it: “Donation code changed. Name-watch unstable. Find the source of silence.” Then the letters vanished. A blue stain remained. The children did not jump in excitement. They had already learned the discipline of evidence more deeply than wonder at an unexplained miracle.

Ira asked, “Who is the source of silence?” Everyone’s eyes turned by themselves toward Satyavrat Mehta. He was seated that day at the edge of the courtyard. He was silent, but this time his silence was not a cave for wrongdoing; it was a seat for listening. Raghav perhaps would not understand the difference. A man who had always treated silence as deletion now mistook even listening silence for conspiracy.

Satyavrat rose slowly. Batuknath’s face showed a strange displeasure as he came forward. Satyavrat said, “Raghav is searching for the source of silence because his code runs on words. Where listening comes before speech, the code breaks.” Then he sat down again. No lecture, no order. Yet in that short sentence Raghav’s entire trade trembled.

Ananya asked, “Then the way to break the code is not speaking, but listening?” Satyavrat replied, “Some codes open through the ear. The language of crime speaks quickly; the victim’s language comes late. Quick language is easy to catch. Late language is hard to hear. Whoever hears it can turn the code back into a name.”

At that moment Ujjwal’s mother read her son’s name once more. This time she fell silent after reading it. The silence lengthened. People began to grow uneasy. Earlier, after every name, some sign was immediately recorded—air, a bird, sunlight, shade. This time nothing happened. Ananya held her pen still. One minute. Two minutes. Three. Suddenly, far away, a child who had been playing outside the courtyard held his breath, ran shouting “kabaddi-kabaddi,” touched the edge of the stump and raced back. Everyone watched him. Ananya wrote: “The name’s answer: play.”

That small game was the first blow against Raghav’s code. Criminal codes move within closed groups; kabaddi is a game of open breath. The code says: keep the meaning of the sign secret. Kabaddi says: let everyone hear the breath, let everyone see the boundary, touch and return without deceit. Around the stump the children formed a circle for kabaddi, one after another. The name-stones stood guard outside the circle.

Batuknath grew irritated. “This is not a court. It is a game,” he muttered. Ba heard him. “If a court chews up years and a game saves a name,” she said, “then the game itself is justice.” Hariharan’s neck bent. For the first time he feared that caste, office, law, trust, donation and code could all find themselves faced by the people’s game.

By evening a list of Raghav’s signs had been made, but it was not posted publicly in full. Mira said, “When we describe the criminal’s trick, we must not open the road for the crime.” So the children decided that only a warning would be made public: “A donation separated from the name is the crocodile’s tooth. A platform that displays a name without the family’s consent is not memory, but theft. When a message is erased, ask about its shadow.”

Beneath the warning they wrote Gangesha’s question: “Where is the evidence?” Then a second line: “Caste, wealth, office, donation, screen—none is evidence if the name has not consented.” As the line was written, an elderly leather-worker stepped forward. “If Gangesha belongs to justice,” he said, “then I too belong inside justice. Do not write my name at the back.” The children wrote his name not on the outer ring of stones but exactly along the middle line. Upon the old scratch of caste order, that small stroke of the pen burned like fire.

When night fell, Raghav's third message arrived. This time it appeared on no phone, paper, screen or glass, but upon the children's kabaddi line. A blue streak rose in the earth: "Where there is listening, there is risk. Remove the source." No one spoke. Again all eyes turned toward Satyavrat. But he did not rise. He slowly placed his ink pen beside the children's register.

Ananya understood. The source was not a person, but a method. What if Satyavrat disappeared? If the children had learned to listen, the source could no longer be confined to one body. She picked up the pen and wrote: "Source of silence: the collective ear."

With those words the blue line in the soil split. It became blue dust and flew up to settle upon the cut stump. For the first time Budhba Ghost's voice sounded distinctly: "The code has been read. Now silence will be heard." A thrill passed through the people. For the next day Satyavrat Mehta himself would sit not in a reading of names, but in a reading of silence. Raghav's code had broken, but the fear behind the code—the fear of silence—still had to open.

All night the kabaddi line glimmered faintly in the soil. The children kept watch. The name-stones remained in place. The yellow notice was silent. The red file stayed closed. The memorial app's screen went dark. But from within the stump a low voice kept rising: "Listen, then write. Write, then keep watch." At dawn Satyavrat's second silence would be read.

FOLK SONG: READ THE ERASED CODE

Folk tune: secret-message song

Read the code, read the erased code;

Choose the real hand through the smoke of letters.

The message was erased; vapour stayed upon the glass;

At dawn the scripture of the blurred leaf became clear.

The donation code broke, the blue line split;

The source of silence was not one body—the collective ear awoke.

"Listen, then write; write, then keep watch,"

The low voice within the stump repeated through the night.

The yellow paper silent, the red file closed;

Name-stones awake, the children fierce in their watch.

Do not merely read the code; hear the fear behind it;

Choose the true hand through the smoke of erased letters.

CHAPTER 60

Satyavrat Mehta's Second Silence

An account written in the language of piety first seizes the ear of silence.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: FROM SILENCE TO SPEECH

Folk tune: silent parati

Let silence ripen, let speech ripen within it;

At the right hour bring clear words before the world.

The second silence differs from the first—this time it is a house of thought;

The garment of piety is falling away, and the true knowledge beneath it opens.

Questions ripen inside silence and take the form of answers;

At the proper moment clear speech descends among the people.

Let silence not be a shield for deceit, but a place for self-examination;

Let the vow of honesty turn into work after dawn.

From silence to speech, from speech to action—walk in that order;

Bring the truth within outward and light society's lamp.

Let silence not become a shield; let it become a veranda for thought;

Let questions turn within, searching for a new shore.

At dawn let silence rise, gird its cloth for work;

Plough every field of society with the light of honesty.

When Raghav “Signal” Somani’s new code reached the circle around the stump, at first no one understood its meaning. On paper everything was written in the language of piety—offering, reverence, rebuilding, memorial support, fund for victims’ families. But Devika’s eyes had learned that fraud most often dresses itself in sacred words. She laid the paper in sunlight. Under “reverence” the word “share” gleamed; under “fund” appeared “route”; and beneath “support” a fine thread spelling “commission” became visible.

People wanted to make an uproar. Some young men said, "This time, straight to court." Others said, "Call Satyavrat Babu; he is a Delhi man, he will understand." Some elders said, "Anyone who wants to trade in names again should be tied to Channa Grove." But the stump remained silent. There was a strange restraint in that silence, as if the cut tree were saying: "Listen first. Speak afterward."

At that moment Satyavrat Mehta was sitting at the edge of the village beside a dried pond. Word reached him, but he did not rise at once. In his earlier life he would have risen immediately—asked for documents, checked sections, prepared arguments, issued a statement. That readiness had made people call him a capable officer. Now he understood that urgency too could be a form of pride. A grief buried for years is not served by an instant answer; often an instant answer merely covers it once more.

He drew a line in the dried mud of the pond. As he drew it, Gangesha's question returned to him. What is perception? What is inference? What counts as verbal testimony? What is memory? And what evidence do we have for the caste order that kills inconvenient truths of life and turns them into statues of doctrine? Satyavrat was slowly learning that justice is not merely the art of speaking. Justice first requires the courage to place one's own right to speak in the dock of doubt.

Then Ananya came to him carrying the register. "Satyavrat Babu," she said, "everyone is calling you." He looked up. "Why?" "The paper has come again. Raghav's code. People want you to tell us what should be done." For a few moments he studied her. There was no worship in the child's eyes; there was insistence, but no blind faith. She asked, "Why are you silent?"

In that question Satyavrat Mehta's first silence and his second stood face to face. The first was the silence of a time when he could have spoken but did not—because of office, decorum, procedure, doubt, convenience and safe distance. That silence was wrongdoing. The second was the silence of the present—when he could speak, but did not want his voice to cover the people's. This silence was a vow to listen.

He told Ananya, "In my first silence I stopped people's voices. If I speak immediately now, I will make those voices small again. Let us go, but I will not pronounce the decision. I will listen, and if people wish, I will help loosen the knots in the language." Ananya closed the register. "So first you are a listener, and only then a lawyer?" Satyavrat smiled faintly after many days. "In justice, becoming a lawyer without first becoming a listener is dangerous."

Everyone was waiting near the Channa stump. The yellow notice, Batuknath Hariharan's proposal for a People's Memory Trust, a printed sheet from Chandrapal's memorial app, and the donation paper containing Raghav's new code lay separately beneath four stones. The four papers looked like four crocodiles that had crawled out of the water and flattened themselves around the stump—not to chew bodies, but words.

Satyavrat arrived, but did not sit in the centre. He sat on the ground outside the circle. People stirred. Some said, “Not there, come forward.” He replied, “Whoever sits in the middle today will be a name, not a person of status.” Ananya placed at the edge of the stump the stone marked “whose name was never found.” The meeting began from there.

Devika spoke first. “The people building a memorial on the screen will measure our weeping. If a name has no photograph, they will create an empty silhouette. If the family is poor, they will attach a donation button to the name. Whoever clicks will have even their tears counted. The fraud is old; only its vocabulary has become sacred.” No one applauded. The assembly at the Channa stump gave assent not through applause, but through silence.

Mira rose next. “If memory becomes an image without consent,” she said, “then it becomes another insult to the body. Anyone building a memorial over the name of a person whose face was stolen and whose privacy was broken must first learn the language of that person’s consent. Even the family of the dead has the right to say: we do not want our grief in the marketplace.” Her voice was not sharp, but it was clear. Those who knew the story of her old blackmail understood that this woman was not turning her wound into spectacle; she was drafting a law against spectacle.

Saumya Ramanathan spoke softly. “Look at the language of these papers. The yellow notice says vacant plot. The trust proposal says heritage. The app says digital tribute. The donation paper says revival. But none of the four asks even once: in whose hands is the watch over the names?” She read the words one by one. After each, the children asked for its meaning in earth-language: What does “vacant” mean? Whose “heritage”? “Digital” for whose benefit? Who accounts for “donation”?

As he listened to those questions, the old officer inside Satyavrat Mehta grew restless. He wanted to answer at once, cite sections, write the matter out in the language of rules. Instead he pressed his thumb into the soil. He remained silent. His silence was no longer escape; it was practice in giving the people’s questions room inside himself.

Ba said in her slow voice, “Gangesha wrote about justice, but society did not do justice to his life. Anything inconvenient about caste, marriage, birth or lineage was escaped by turning him into a statue of respect. That was the murder of memory in the name of honour. If the names of Channa Grove are now turned into statues, that too will be murder.” At those words a fine crack lengthened across the cut surface of the stump. Some were frightened, others awed. Ananya wrote: “Honour without justice can become murder.”

Then Satyavrat felt perhaps his time to speak had come. He did not rise; sitting where he was, he said, "I am a man of law, but I know that law too often swallows names by turning them into files. Today, if you wish, I can open the language of these documents. But you will decide whether the name goes into the paper, or whether the paper must answer before the name."

Aruni asked, "How will it answer?" Satyavrat replied, "Whoever brings a proposal must first listen to the reading of names. Whoever wants to build a memorial must first visit the home of the dead. Whoever says digital tribute must first switch off the mobile phone for one day and sit in the ring around the stump. Whoever wants to donate must first open the old waters of the accounts. Whoever wants a trust must first say where the children's rights lie within that trust."

A stir passed through the crowd. This was not a speech; it was an inverted statute. Until now authority had placed people in the dock of verification. Now the stump's assembly wanted to verify the proposal itself. Ananya, Devika, Mira, Saumya, Ira and Gop began drafting a page together. Its heading was: "The Proposal's Oath Before the Name." Satyavrat wanted to sign it. Ananya stopped him. "Children first."

Satyavrat withdrew his hand. It felt not like humiliation but release. In a system that always waited for the largest signature, the first signatures here would belong to children. One by one, instead of their names, they placed their signs of watchfulness—a fish, a leaf, a glass marble, an open eye. Only then, on the last line, Satyavrat wrote one word: "Heard."

After dusk two promoters from Chandrapal's memorial app arrived with phones. "Shall we live-stream the programme?" they asked. "People will know. Donations will come." Devika covered the phone screen with a cloth. "Not today," she said. "Where a name takes its first breath, the camera must come later." The promoters laughed, but the laughter fell empty. No one in the crowd joined them.

That night it was decided that the next day would hold the "First Festival of Names." A festival, but without instruments. A festival, but without a stage. A festival, but without garlands. Every household would bring one name, one sign, one memory and one question. The family of the dead would answer "present." The names of living offenders would also be read—not in celebration, but as accountability. Caste names would be read not as pride, but as questions. Gangesha's name would be read not as a statue, but as a challenge to justice.

After everyone dispersed, Satyavrat Mehta remained alone beside the stump. Moonlight lay upon its cut surface. He watched it in silence for a long time. It seemed that from within the stump came a question: "How long will your second silence last?” In his mind he answered: “As long as the people’s voice is more necessary than mine.”

When he rose to leave, wind passed through a split in the stump and sounded behind him: “Kabaddi.” Satyavrat stopped. The field was empty, the children had gone home, the ghosts were invisible. Yet the line had been drawn. The next day, at the Festival of Names, the game would begin again—this time not by holding the breath, but by saving it.

FOLK SONG: THE VOW OF THE SECOND SILENCE

Folk tune: silent parati

How long will silence last, how long the second silence?

As long as the people’s voice remains greater than mine.

Accounts hid beneath the garments of sacred words;

Offering, reverence, service—underneath them the share was written.

Satyavrat fell silent a second time, but the silence was new;

He vowed to restrain his own voice and listen to the people.

Caste names will be read not in praise, but as questions;

Gangesha’s name not as a statue, but as a challenge to justice.

The stump asked: how long will the second silence last?

The answer: wherever the people’s voice remains greater than mine.

The field empty, the line drawn, the wind said “kabaddi”;

The next game will not hold the breath—it will save the breath.

CHAPTER 61

The First Festival of Names

At a true festival no drum is beaten—the names themselves resound.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE QUIET FESTIVAL OF NAMES

Folk tune: Festival of Names song

*Celebrate the festival, celebrate without drums;
One lamp, one flower, one name—that is adornment enough.*

*No drum, no flag—the lamp of a name is enough;
When read in a quiet voice, memory remains safe.
With every name, one flower, one story, one dignity;
A festival does not cover things—it opens identity.*

*Children, elders and sisters of the village, form a circle;
No slogans—listen with respect to the song of a life.
In the quiet festival of names, the soul finds a place;
The simple light of remembrance will remain a dawn through the ages.*

*No clamour of slogans, no noise of flags;
A name read softly—that alone is the true dawn.
Children, elders and sisters in a circle, a platter of stories at the centre;
May the festival of quiet light continue through the ages.*

The morning of the Festival of Names did not arrive like a village fair. No drums sounded, no flags flew, no chairs were arranged on a platform while speakers were awaited. Around the cut stump of Channa Grove there was only the same old soil, the same severed roots, the same names written on stones, and the same children who, despite keeping watch through the night, sat not with sleep in their eyes but with light.

Many were startled by the word festival. Water-burial, fraud, humiliation of the body, years swallowed by courts, the crime of silence—and amid all this, a festival? Ananya said, “When a name is heard again, it is no longer only mourning. It becomes present. To become present is a festival.” After that no one objected to the word. For the first time the village seemed to understand that joy and grief are not enemies, but two colours of the same earth.

The children formed a long row on the eastern side of the stump. The families sat to the west. To the north sat elders whose memories still held many names. To the south sat those who did not consider themselves guilty, yet did not have the courage to remain absent. Satyavrat Mehta sat farthest back on a broken brick. A separate seat had been kept for him; with folded hands he declined it. Today the seat belonged to the name.

A small argument arose over where to begin. Some wanted the names of the labourers drowned at the bridge to be read first. Others said the name of the one devoured by the crocodile of the screen should come first. Others wanted first the names of women whose humiliation their homes had silenced for years. Then a boy, usually very quiet since the day of Gangesha’s question, stood and said, “Justice does not begin with order. It begins with listening. Those whose names were never found should come first.”

At those words a faint cough sounded like a leaf from Budhba Ghost. No one could see him, but everyone understood that Channa Grove agreed. The first stone was lifted. It bore the words: “Those whose names were never found.” Ananya held the stone in both hands and read it. No voice came from the family rows, because the families of those names were themselves unnamed. Then the children answered together: “Present.”

With that word—“present”—the air inside the stump changed. A shiver ran through those who had come only to watch. In court a name was often called and a clerk wrote “present” or “absent”; here the word was different from such paper language. Present meant: my body may be gone, but my absence is here; my memory is here; the injustice done to me is here.

The second stone bore an incomplete name: “Sar...” No one knew the rest. Years earlier a labourer had been swept away in a flood, and only the first letters had remained in someone’s notebook. An old woman said, “Perhaps Sarayu? Perhaps Saroj? Perhaps Sarpan?” The children wanted to complete the name, but Mira stopped them. “If we complete an incomplete name, we erase the truth of its incompleteness. Read it incomplete. Write it incomplete. Hear it incomplete.” Ananya read: “Sar...” From three directions in the family rows came the answer: “Present.”

Thus the reading began. No one's caste was demanded with the name, yet caste was not hidden either. If a family wished to add lineage, occupation, hamlet, river, or the mother's name, it was added. If not, it was not. Gangesha's question still circled the stump: what is evidence? What is lineage? What truth belongs to a name? If caste becomes the humiliation of a human being, its mention can be violence; but if caste bears witness to that humiliation, silence about it can also be violence. The children were learning that justice is not merely placing everyone in the same row; it is the discipline of hearing the different language of every wound.

Ba rose and said, "Gangesha asked about truth; society asked about lineage. So in the reading of names, truth comes first and lineage later." Many did not understand the sentence immediately, but it was entered in the register. Satyavrat Mehta listened from a distance. He had the language of constitutions, statutes and evidence, yet Ba's single line made the courtrooms of his years tremble.

When it came time to read Ujjwal's name, Devika trembled. She had thought herself strong now; but the sound of a name can undo all of a person's preparation. She said, "Ujjwal Jha." His mother answered, "Present." After a few moments Devika herself added, "His silence is also present." The children entered the two lines separately. Here not only the dead, but the dead person's silence, fear, humiliation and unfinished dream were given names.

Mira did not want her own name read. "I am alive," she said. But the women insisted that a living name should also be read when a woman had survived blackmail, shame, social fear and the trade in bodies, and had begun to speak. Mira then stood before the stump. She read her own name and added, "My privacy is present." The women answered together: "Present." The tremor in that sound was no less than a conch-blast.

Gop Kumar had brought a list. It contained the names of households broken by banking fraud, young men trapped in digital arrest, patients who never received medicine, labourers buried beneath bridge rubble, and those dismissed in files with the word "error." But as he began reading, the children said, "Not a list—names. Leave a breath between every name." For the first time Gop Kumar abandoned the pace of reading a list and learned the pace of reading human beings.

Kabaddi too formed part of the Festival of Names, but on a separate field. After every ten names the children rose, ran in a circle around the stump, and held their breath while chanting "kabaddi-kabaddi." If a child's breath broke midway, it was not counted as defeat. The child simply sat down to guard the next name. Kabaddi had now become a game of resistance—not disappearing while the breath was held, but carrying the breath as far as a name.

Once the circular kabaddi line suddenly lengthened. A streak of sunlight seemed to run from the stump to the pond, from there to the bridge pier, and then upward into the sky. The children stopped. Ananya said softly, "The line will not stop on earth." No one yet understood what that meant, but in a distant city Raghav Signal saw the same circle on the display of one of his devices and trembled. The dream of an "unnamed planet" glimmered as a seed in the sunlight of Garh Narikel.

At noon Batuknath Hariharan's people came again. They carried invitation cards: "Pre-consultation for the formation of the People's Memory Trust." They thought the crowd at the Festival of Names made it a good time for an announcement. But when an assistant began reading, the children stopped him. Ananya said, "Anything read here must be answered with 'present.' Shall we read the name of your trust?" The assistant's throat went dry. The paper fluttered in his hand.

Aruni said calmly, "Today belongs to the dead. Trusts, committees, schemes and tenders can all be heard tomorrow. No living cleverness will get a stage here today." A low murmur of support moved through the crowd. Batuknath himself had not come, but his shadow was printed upon the paper. After the yellow notice, this was paper of another colour—white, smooth, perfumed, yet just as greedy within. The children placed it on the edge of the stump, exactly where the yellow notice had spent the night.

Satyavrat Mehta said nothing about any of this. His second silence was doing its work. The first silence had been wrongdoing; this one made room for people's voices. But when the widow of an old labourer fainted while reading a name, Satyavrat ran forward and supported her. In that moment people understood that silence does not mean inactivity. Whoever is silent where speech is needed is culpable; whoever is silent in order to hear is a witness; whoever rises when support is needed is human.

By evening the ring of stones had doubled. The register pages were full. The children's fingers had turned blue with ink. The women's voices were hoarse. The elders' memories were tired. Yet nothing was as still as the stump. For the first time the full moon settled upon its cut circle. Someone said, "The tree is growing leaves on the moon now." No one laughed.

When the final name had been read, Ananya looked around. "Is the festival over?" a small boy asked. Ba said, "A festival of names does not end. Only today's breath is complete." At that the children said "present" one final time. The sound was very soft, but far away in the pond the water began turning in circles.

At night everyone slowly left. Around the stump remained the stones, two papers, new pages of the register and an extinguished lamp. Satyavrat Mehta rose after a long while. He saw, in a very thin split among the roots, something green—or was it only a trick of moonlight? He bent to touch it, then held back his hand. Some proofs are not taken at once. Some things must be allowed to wait until morning.

The stump stayed awake through the night. The sound of the reading of names had sunk into the soil. The white trust paper and the yellow notice lay beside each other and trembled, as though both had understood that the rule of paper would not be simple here. When the first dampness of dawn settled upon the roots, a green point truly emerged. But to see it, the story itself had to hold its breath until morning.

FOLK SONG: NO DRUM—THE NAME

Folk tune: Festival of Names song

The name resounds, not the instrument—the name itself resounds;

Hearing it, even a dry root dresses itself in green.

No drum, no flag, no slogans from a stage;

Cut roots, stones, children—this is the whole festival.

Name after name was read; the voices sank into the earth;

Among extinguished lamps a green point rose.

The white trust paper and yellow notice trembled;

Beyond the rule of paper the watch over names awoke.

Some evidence asks to wait until morning;

All night the shoot breaks through the chest of darkness.

At a true festival no instrument sounds—the names of the dead resound;

And hearing them, even the earth's dry roots dress themselves in green.

No drum, no flag, no slogans from a stage.

CHAPTER 62

A Green Point in the Stump

The oil was spent and the wick had grown small, yet the flame was stubborn—the stubbornness belonged not to the oil, but to the name.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: BIRTH-SONG OF THE GREEN POINT

Folk tune: sohar

*O child, sing the birth-song of the green point;
Even in a wick whose oil is spent, a wave of life remains.*

*The oil was spent, yet the little wick still burned;
Upon the black paper of night a green point grew.
That point was new birth, the first eye of hope;
A shoot was saying: the earth will be green again.*

*Sing the sohar softly—life is returning;
New sap is filling the heart of the stump.
With the birth of the green point, the future receives a name;
A small light will one day become a vast dwelling.*

*Night lay black as paper; a star rose in its centre;
The stump's chest beat—it had found new support.
Sing softly, do not break the shoot's sleep;
On the faith of one small point, the current of dawn will break forth.*

The night of the First Festival of Names passed, but the lamps burning around the stump of Channa Grove did not go out before dawn. Their wicks had grown small and the oil was nearly finished, yet the flames were stubborn, as though the watch over names had taken residence inside them. Fine drops of dew had gathered upon the stones on which names had been read through the night. The elders said the night had wept. The children said no—the names had asked for water, and dew had answered.

At the first hour of dawn Ananya came alone to the stump. She expected the place to look tired after the festival, as a singer's throat dries after a song. Instead she found the stump not tired but silently awake. Upon the grey ring of its cut body, which until yesterday had looked wholly dry, a minute green point had risen in one corner. It was so small that it vanished the moment the eye wandered, yet so bright that once seen it made the heart tremble.

Ananya did not touch it at first. She remembered the rule of the name-watch: whatever you encounter, listen first. She bent her ear. No word came from inside the stump, but a sound rose like the breath of kabaddi from very far away—kabaddi... kabaddi... kabaddi... It was not the sound of a game, but of a seed. The longer she listened, the clearer the green point became. In that act of listening a faint scent rose from the earth as well—neither flower nor leaf, but the smell of a beginning made wet, as though the soil were moistening its lips before speaking its first word.

Before long the children gathered. One cried, "A shoot!" Another said, "The tree will grow again!" A little boy who had read his father's name for the first time the previous day said, "This is Father's answer." Ananya did not scold him. No answer was rejected here. The children's rule was: let every meaning sit down first; then see which meaning stands by itself.

When Ba arrived, she looked at the shoot for a long time in silence. Her eyesight was weak, but the green point in the root seemed visible all the way inside her. "When sap remains in a cut body, a shoot appears," she said. "And when a name remains inside a severed memory, people grow again." The children opened the register. The shoot's first testimony was written: "A green point after the names."

By noon the news had spread. Some came to see a miracle. Others arrived with botanical explanations. A schoolteacher said, "Dormant buds can remain in a felled tree, and new shoots may emerge from them." The children wrote this down too. The lesson in Navya-Nyaya was no longer only a chapter; Gangesha's question was entering public behaviour. Evidence has many forms. What is seen is evidence. What is heard can be evidence. Pain experienced is evidence. Memory read generation after generation can also bear evidence.

Batuknath Hariharan's people smiled at the news. Their calculation was different: the green point would become public sentiment; public sentiment would produce a trust; the trust would produce authority; authority would produce donations; donations would produce control. But they did not come openly yet. They watched from a distance, like crocodiles beneath the water measuring a goat on the bank.

A photograph of the shoot appeared on Chandrapal Batra's app. The caption read: "Sacred Moment of Rebirth." Beneath it a donation button gleamed. Devika saw it and her face hardened. "If this green point is an answer from the names," she told the children, "we will not let it become a market image." But the photograph had already travelled widely. The first theft from memory had happened through names; now theft through sight had begun.

That evening Mira raised a separate question. "The face, body, tears and even the shoot connected with someone's pain remain under that person's rights. Showing memory without permission is theft too." The women agreed. Around the shoot they built not a small bamboo fence, but a discipline of sight. Whoever wished to look would first hear the reading of names. Whoever took a picture would write the reason. Whoever sold the image would be stopped.

Several young men grew annoyed at the rule. "Who can stop anything in this age?" they said. "Once a picture goes out, it is gone." Devika replied, "That is why the watch matters even more. A screen can chew the mind, but the eye of the screen can also be taught public shame." From behind her Ujjwal's mother said, "They sold my son's face. This shoot will not be sold."

That night Budhba Ghost appeared fully clearly for the first time. He stood not behind the cut stump, but directly beside the green point. His body seemed made of leaf-dust, smoke and old tears. Looking toward the children, he said, "The tree was cut, but the game is not over. From now on kabaddi is the game of saving the shoot." The children held their breath together. He continued, "Whoever crosses the shoot must return carrying a name. Whoever touches it without a name stays outside."

From the next day the children's kabaddi changed. No line was drawn in the soil; instead an invisible circle formed around the shoot. A child entering it pronounced a name. A child coming out said, "Present." If the breath broke, the child had not lost; the child simply sat down in the row to listen again. There was less victory and defeat in this game, more remembrance. Yet it remained a game, because memory without play becomes a burden.

Satyavrat Mehta watched the game. Many games of law returned to him—dates, adjournments, objections, articles, rights, procedure. Those too were games, but in them the person holding the breath was usually the victim while the offender breathed freely. Here it was reversed. The children held their breath to save a name, and even when their breath broke they were not shamed; they received another hearing. Satyavrat wrote inwardly: "The first rule of justice: when someone's breath breaks, do not punish them. Give them water."

The question of Gangesha arose again. A student asked, "If Gangesha was the father of this logic of justice, why did society not see the injustice in his own life?" Ba answered, "Because society reads scripture, not the body. It puts flowers upon the head of a book, but is afraid of the love, humiliation, caste-boundaries and rebellion of the person who wrote it." Satyavrat shuddered. He understood that a society capable of suppressing evidence from Gangesha's life could suppress the death of a labourer, the humiliation of a woman, the swindling of a young man, the land of a farmer—anything.

But the children were learning the art of lifting suppressed things again. They brought the name of Tattvachintamani into the game. One child ran inside holding his breath and cried, "Perception!" Another, before being caught, shouted, "Inference!" A third escaped saying, "Word!" A fourth little girl folded her hands by the shoot and said, "Memory!" The teacher smiled. Someone could have objected that the categories were philosophically imprecise; but in Channa Grove that day knowledge was alive, not sitting for an examination.

The green point slowly became a thin leaf. Its colour was startling—not a simple green, but green carrying the memory of a dark body, a mark of red cloth, the blue of water and the brightness of dew. It was as though the tree were saying: new life does not grow by forgetting old wounds, but by carrying them. Whenever wind touched the single leaf, a very fine trembling rose—too subtle for the eye, but clear to the tip of a finger.

News of the sight reached the district. That week a motor vehicle arrived bearing a shining plaque. Two officials, a photographer and a consultant stepped out. The consultant did not understand the speech of Garh Narikel very well, but knew expressions such as "folk culture," "cultural circuit," "heritage enhancement" and "modern amenities" fluently. He walked around the stump making notes.

Ananya stopped him. "Have you heard the reading of names?" The consultant laughed. "Inspection first, participation afterward." The children looked at one another. The sentence carried the smell of the yellow notice. Whoever measures a place before hearing its names has already turned that place into an object.

The officials looked at the shoot, the stump, the names on stones and the crowd. There was less reverence in their eyes than planning. "Development is possible here," they said. "Road access, lighting, visitor gallery, interpretation centre, ticketing..." The words flew into the air, and the shoot's leaf trembled. Budhba Ghost's shadow turned black.

Aruni could not remain silent. "Will there be a ticket to enter a place of testimony?" he asked. An official replied, "Without management there can be no preservation." Mira said, "Preservation—or ownership?"

Devika said, “Convenience—or surveillance?” Satyavrat Mehta said nothing, but his hand moved by itself to the register inside his bag. He understood: a second struggle had begun.

That evening the register gave the shoot a name: “Green Point. Child of: the cut Channa tree. Guardians: the Name-Watch.” Beneath it the children wrote: “Leaf trembled during external inspection.” This was not a trivial note. It was the first warning of the next age.

At night, after everyone had gone home, a sheet of paper blew toward the stump. It bore no government seal, but it was as smooth as a consultant’s draft. Across the top, in bold letters, stood: “Garh Narikel Heritage Corridor: Preliminary Concept.” The paper caught directly beside the shoot. All night the green point trembled in its shadow, while in the children’s dreams the kabaddi line stretched from the stump all the way to the road.

FOLK SONG: BIRTH OF THE GREEN POINT

Folk tune: a sorrowful form of sohar

Rise, little shoot, rise from the severed womb;

Drink the milk of names, stay safe from the shadow of greed.

The oil was spent, the wick was small, yet the flame did not die;

In the womb of the cut tree a green child rose.

The Name-Watch is guardian, the stump its mother;

A drop of dew becomes a cradle and sings the song of dawn.

At the touch of an outsider’s gaze the leaf trembled a little;

The children wrote a warning—the new age had awakened.

The Heritage Corridor paper came like a shadow;

The market’s first gaze settled upon the shoot.

O green point, we will honour the day of your birth;

Drink the milk of names; guard your life from the shadow of greed.

At the outsider's gaze the leaf trembled softly.

CHAPTER 63

The Garh Narikel Heritage Project

As long as the names were shameful, the files hid their faces; the moment the names became heritage, the vehicles arrived without shame.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: GUARDING THE LIGHT

Folk tune: Jhijhiya awakening song

Dance, Jhijhiya, dance with the lamp upon your head;

Check every opening and keep watch over the light.

When the lamp burns, do not merely look—guard it;

Take care that greed does not enter through the light.

Clear glass, open accounts, a shared watch;

Let no trade in darkness be done in the name of illumination.

Jhijhiya circles and says: inspect every hole;

Ask whose labour supplied the oil for the lamp.

Guarding the light will keep illumination sacred;

The shadow of greed will retreat and public trust will grow.

Light spills through the holes in the pot—count them as you walk;

Ask too whose sweat became the oil.

Clear glass, open books, a shared watch of eyes;

Let the black hand of greed never touch the face of the lamp.

On the third day after the green point broke from the stump, government vehicles arrived in the village for the first time without embarrassment. Earlier, whenever Channa Grove was mentioned, officials hid their faces behind files. Now that the stump had opened, sunlight had fallen upon it, crowds had grown and outside journalists had begun sniffing from afar, the same place suddenly became “heritage” in the eyes of administration. A site described in papers only yesterday as a vacant plot began that very morning to be called the “Garh Narikel Heritage Project.”

At the front came the district cultural officer, behind him a municipal clerk, behind that a photographer, and behind them a consultant seated in a gleaming jeep. The consultant's glasses were so dark that they reflected not the village but only his own face. The moment he stepped down he said, "This place has tremendous potential." The words were soft, but to Aruni they sounded like a second blow of an axe. Potential—that is, preparation to measure and sell what had already happened.

Name-stones lay around the stump of Channa Grove. The children kept watch. The officials looked first at the stones, and instead of reading the names began counting them. "How many stones?" "How many families are connected?" "How many visitors come?" "How much land is required?" The people understood: names were becoming statistics again. When a number sits upon a name, its weight can exceed that of stone.

Ananya quietly approached the consultant in dark glasses. "Have you read the names written on these stones?" she asked. He laughed as though children were merely decoration. "We will read them, daughter. Let us make the plan first." Ananya answered, "How can you plan for what you have not read?" After that, the consultant's smile remained trapped behind his glasses.

Batuknath Hariharan was present in the group not directly, but like a shadow. The draft of his proposed "People's Memory Trust" had already begun circulating in government files. He himself did not come that day, but his people did. A young man who called himself a legal consultant said softly into Aruni's ear, "Memory must be institutionalised. Otherwise disputes will arise later." Aruni looked at him. He remembered that wherever justice is alive, disagreement is evidence of life; locking memory away because one fears dispute is not justice.

At that moment Gangesha's question rose again. In recent days, as stories of Tattvachintamani had been told around the stump, the children had learned that evidence is not merely a seal. Ira said softly, "Gangesha would ask: first know what kind of proof this is. Perception? Inference? Analogy? Word? Or merely fear of office?" The officials grew uncomfortable with the language. They had expected villagers to rejoice at roads, lights, gates and glossy pictures; instead the children were asking for evidence.

The cultural officer opened his papers. Coloured lines crossed the sheet—on one side "Channa Memorial Gateway," on another "Ghost-Kabaddi Stage," on a third "Water-Burial Visual Gallery," and on a fourth "Digital Wall of Names." Proudly he explained that there would be lighting, a tourist path, entry tickets, a memorial building, and evening sound-and-light shows narrating the story of Garh Narikel.

Devika started at the phrase. “Sound and light?” she asked. “Whose sound? Whose light?” The officer replied, “An artistic presentation of the folk narratives.” Devika said calmly, “Which actor will repeat the trembling voice of a mother reading her son’s name? Will the family that never even received the labourer’s body have its loss sold by ticket as a scene?” Only the paper rustled in reply.

Mira stepped forward. Her eyes held the patience of someone who had endured cameras, taunts, blackmail and enforced silence. “Before placing on a stage the stories of those whose bodies were humiliated, whose privacy was stolen and whose names were suppressed, permission is required. The right over grief belongs to the person who bore it, not to the consultant.” An official murmured, “The project will be sensitive.” Mira replied, “Sensitivity is not a word. It is a watch.”

Saumya noticed that the language of government planning and the language of caste order shared a strange likeness. Both accepted names, but on conditions; both gave bodies a place, but only after fitting them into decorum; both wanted to turn rebellion into decoration. The uncomfortable questions of Gangesha’s life—marriage to a leather-worker woman, the story of his birth after his father’s death, the birth of Navya-Nyaya—had been too sharp for society, so instead of preserving them in memory it had turned him into a statue. Now the same thing was beginning to happen to Channa Grove.

Ba bent over the coloured map in the middle of the debate. Her eyes did not see well, but the gloss of the map hurt them. “Where on this map is the place where Sarayu’s name was read for the first time? Where is the water where the labourers’ bodies were never found? Where is the night when the children switched off their phones and listened to the names? If none of this is here, this is not a map. It is a printing block for cloth.”

The consultant became irritated. “Mother, the project is for development. It will preserve memory, create employment, bring visitors and promote local identity.” Ba laughed. The laugh came from an old body, yet carried the rustle of Channa leaves. “Promote identity? Identity spreads when its roots are touched. First you cut the roots; now you want to sell the shade.”

Then everyone’s eyes suddenly turned toward the green point on the cut stump. In three days it had grown enough to begin forming two leaves. The consultant brightened at once. “This could become the symbol of the project! Rebirth! Hope! Revival!” The photographer raised his camera immediately. Ananya stepped in front of him. “It is not a symbol. It is a child,” she said. “Before taking its photograph, ask its mother for permission.” The people laughed, but no camera rose again.

At that moment a faint chant of “kabaddi-kabaddi” came from the direction of the water. Hearing ghost-kabaddi in daylight was new for the village. The officials started. A clerk asked, "Is this a rehearsal for the programme?" Aruni replied, "No. This game is older than your plan." The chant circled the stump once, passed over the names on stones, touched the green leaves and then descended into the water.

Gop Kumar heard a strange warning in the sound. Earlier he had understood the language of networks through data theft, scams, accounts, codes and invisible messages. Now he was learning to read the language of the memory-market. When someone says "security," ownership may be hidden inside. When someone says "preservation," control may be hidden inside. When someone says "project," there may be tenders, commissions and hunger for credit concealed within.

Satyavrat Mehta stood at the edge of the gathering and listened. His experience of office told him the route for stopping the project ran through law; his newer discipline of listening told him first to make the people's meaning clear. He went to Aruni and said, "The struggle will also be fought on paper. But decide this first: what are you trying to save on that paper? The stump? The stones? The names? Or the right to listen?" Aruni thought for a long time. Then he said, "I want to save the tree. But even if the tree cannot be saved, I want to save the names from the hands that would sell it." Satyavrat nodded.

By evening the officials left. They left behind a copy of the coloured map. The villagers did not place it beside the stump, but far away in the dust, as one isolates something diseased. The children began the reading of names again. Today, however, after each name a new question was added: "Who owns this name?" The families answered: "The name belongs to itself, but the watch is collective." The sentence was entered on the next page of the register.

At night Budhba Ghost appeared openly. He sat on the edge of the stump, as though the felling had trained him to come out by day. Looking at the children he said, "People once came through darkness because of fear. Now greed is coming through light. You fought the darkness; now fight the greed inside illumination." His voice echoed far beneath the water.

At midnight a municipal worker came secretly. He carried no official seal, only a ladder and glue. Believing the village asleep, he planted a post beside the stump and pasted a new notice upon it. The paper was white, not yellow, but the letters seemed yellow from within. Across the top stood: "Garh Narikel Heritage Project: Invitation of Tenders for Construction and Presentation." The smell of glue hung beside the stump through the night—sweet, sticky and faintly rotten, as though greed could not entirely conceal its true scent.

At dawn Ananya saw the paper. She opened the register and wrote on a blank line: "Today memory was put out to tender." Then she looked toward the green leaf on the stump. It did not tremble. It seemed to be saying: "Now the struggle has begun."

FOLK SONG: GREED INSIDE THE LIGHT

Folk tune: warning jhumar

*Recognise the light, recognise the light filled with greed;
The village of names will not be sold, however bright the border.*

*As long as the names were shame, the files hid their faces;
When they became heritage, the vehicles came racing in.
We fought darkness; now comes the cunning of light;
Time wants to sell it through photographs, corridors and tickets.
At night a post was planted in silence, a tender notice fixed;*

*Memory will be contracted out—the village heart awoke.
The green leaf did not tremble; it spoke straight:
"Now the struggle has begun. Keep watch through the night."
Light that hides greed is darker than darkness itself;
The village of names will not be sold, however bright its border.*

*Once it became heritage, the vehicles came rushing in.
The green leaf did not tremble—it spoke plainly, and the village awoke.*

CHAPTER 64

Tender for Memory

The moment a tender opens for memory, understand this: grief itself is about to be contracted out.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: FROM GRIEF TO SERVICE

Folk tune: compassion-mangal song

Reach out your hand, reach it into the house of grief;

Along with flowers bring food, clothing and justice.

No contract in the name of grief—extend the hand of service;

Along with flowers bring aid, justice and treatment.

Do not make weeping an advertisement; honour silence;

Ask what the family needs, and give concrete support.

A memorial building is sacred only when people gain from it;

Let service be born from grief and save living lives.

Compassion becomes work when reverence remains true;

On the earth of sorrow a house of hope is built slowly.

Let weeping not be sold in the market; let silence keep its dignity;

Ask the family's need and let solid help flow.

Every brick of a memorial becomes sacred only then;

When the grain of service grows upon the soil of sorrow.

Not even three days had passed since the Garh Narikel Heritage Project was announced when identical white notices appeared on the tehsil wall, the municipal gate, bus-stand pillars and the half-broken bridge pier. At the top was a government seal, and in bold letters across the centre: "Tenders Invited for Memory Conservation, Beautification and Experience-Zone Development." What people called the stump of Channa Grove, the paper called "Site Parcel A." What the children called the watch over names became the "Community Participation Component." What the families of the dead considered the sole refuge of their mourning was renamed an "Emotional Heritage Resource."

The language of the tender was so smooth that its teeth could not be seen on the first day. The surface of the paper slipped beneath the fingers like soap—try to grasp it and the words escaped the hand. There was no grief in that language, only provisions; no names, only lists; no water-burial, only a “water-based interpretive corridor.” The ghost-kabaddi of Channa Grove became a “folk-belief performance-sport zone.” The terrifying and compassionate contradiction of bodies sinking among crocodiles and seeking release became an “immersive experience tunnel.” For the children who kept watch over names all night, the budget included training for a “junior guide corps.”

Aruni fell silent as he read. He remembered the old bridge-contract file. Its words too had been so civilised—safety, standards, international quality, labour welfare, third-party inspection. Then bodies had risen from beneath the soil, names had been cut from registers, and crocodiles had circled quietly in the river. The same sentence had returned wearing other clothes. This time the tender was not for a bridge, but for memory.

Ira brought a copy of the notice to the Channa stump. The children read its heading first. Then Ananya asked, “What does tender mean?” Devika replied, “When the government will pay someone to do work, it asks people to submit bids.” A small boy immediately asked, “Will they bid on names?” Everyone fell silent. A child had asked the question, but the answer shamed all the adults.

Mira placed a finger on one line: “Collection of oral material, visual material, family testimony and digital documents available at the site.” She said, “This is not collection. It is intrusion. By whose right will a contractor record the whisper of a woman who speaks the name of her dead in a low voice? If a family does not want its humiliation made public, who will sell its silence?” The Oath of Privacy was read again around the stump, but this time a government tender stood before it.

The children opened Gangesha’s question again. In recent days they had turned the word “evidence” into a new rule of play. Whatever was said, evidence was asked for. Whatever was written, its reason was asked for. Whatever was pasted on a wall, its purpose was asked for. Ananya read a line beneath the notice: “Protection of public sentiment.” Then she asked, “Evidence?” No one answered. She read the next line: “Tourism-oriented development.” She asked, “Purpose?” Aruni said, “Profit.” The children replied together, “Profit is not evidence.”

Ba smiled as she listened. She did not know the vocabulary of Navya-Nyaya, but she needed no book to recognise the smell of justice and injustice. “Anyone who contracts out sorrow should first have to look grief in the face,” she said. The children entered the sentence in the register. Their register had begun guarding not only names, but sentences too.

One section of the tender was titled “Sound Design for the Experience Site.” It proposed a mixed soundscape combining the breath of ghost-kabaddi, a splash in water, a courtroom gavel, a mobile notification and songs of mourning. When Ujjwal’s mother read this, her face dried as though someone had made her son’s phone ring again. “My son’s final ringtone will not become the sound of an exhibit,” she said. From inside the stump came a faint creak.

Saumya studied the cost sheet. Column after column held figures—stone, lighting, sound, crowd control, guidebook, digital archive, outside experts, research consultation, inauguration ceremony. But the line for rehabilitation of labourers’ families was blank. The cost of searching for the names of bodies lost to water-burial was zero. Privacy protection: zero. Preparation of archives in the local language: almost nothing. The largest allocation was for “brand identity.” Saumya said, “This is not memory. It is a market map.”

Gop Kumar’s old instincts awoke. He began looking for small numerical irregularities. Yet the worst error this time was not numerical. In the tender document the word “memory” appeared fifty-four times, “name” only twice, “victim” once; “profit” never appeared explicitly, yet its shadow moved through every line. Gop told the children, “Sometimes a word is never written, yet it governs an entire document.” Ananya asked, “Like a crocodile under water?” Gop nodded.

Then Batuknath Hariharan stepped out of a gleaming vehicle. He wore a sorrowful expression, as if the burden of social service had kept him awake all night. In his hand was a separate file: “People’s Memory Trust: Legal Framework.” He greeted everyone, made a gesture of blessing toward the children, and said, “To save this place we need a legal structure. Emotion is not enough. I will create a trust. Government, society, experts, donors—everyone will run it together.”

Ananya looked into his eyes. “Will the families whose names are here be in the trust?” Batuknath smiled. “There will be representation.” “The children?” “A children’s advisory committee can be considered.” “Mira Didi’s Privacy Oath?” “We can consider it in the bylaws.” “Gangesha’s question?” Batuknath stalled for a moment. He could not understand why the child had brought Gangesha here. The children spoke together: “Evidence, reason, purpose.” The first crack appeared in Batuknath’s manufactured humility.

Hariharan said, “Enough intellectual discussion. The land belongs to the government, the project is approved, the funds have arrived. If you remain outside, your voice will not appear on paper.” Aruni asked calmly, “And if we enter your trust, will our voice remain—or only our names?” Hariharan’s face hardened. “Law stands above emotion.” At that, Budhba Ghost’s laughter rose behind the stump, like dry leaves rubbing together.

Ba said slowly, “Law does not stand above emotion; it stands below justice. When law abandons justice, it becomes a crocodile.” A wave passed through the crowd. Batuknath was uneasy with such language. He had endured arguments in court, but the philosophy of public memory felt more dangerous. He closed the file. “Very well. Think about it. The tender deadline is short.”

As he left, he looked not at the stump but at the yellow notice. He believed notice, tender, trust, donation and experts would together turn the children’s watch slowly into a cage of paper. But he did not see the children drawing a new line for a game on the blank back of the notice—a kabaddi line.

That evening the children played kabaddi around the stump. This time instead of chanting “kabaddi-kabaddi,” they held their breath and chanted “evidence-evidence.” Whoever was caught had to explain the reason for one line in the tender. Whoever could not was declared “unnamed.” The game held laughter, but there was an edge of justice in that laughter. Gangsha’s Navya-Nyaya had become a children’s game in the dust of Channa Grove.

After nightfall one corner of the yellow notice folded by itself. The sound was so sour that it seemed like teeth grinding in darkness. Beneath it appeared a small mark no one had seen by day: “Draft prepared by an international cultural revival consultant.” The name was blurred, but Gop recognised the shape. He whispered, “This signature is old... there was a similar mark in the file of the bridge’s foreign consultant.”

Aruni took the paper from his hand. The mark was not clear, but an old shadow rose—Edward Broom. The man who spoke at Harvard about policy and ethics was now selling consultation upon the memory of Garh Narikel. Moonlight fell upon the green point of the Channa stump, and for a moment it trembled.

Ananya wrote the night’s final sentence in the register: “A tender has come for memory. The bidder is still hiding his name.” Then she closed the page. The smell of the river came from afar on the wind. The next hearing would begin from here—calling by its true name the person who had come to buy memory in the name of preserving it.

FOLK SONG: CONTRACTING OUT GRIEF

Folk tune: satirical biraha

No, not a contract—our grief is not a contract;

Memory is our right—first tell us your name.

*A tender opened for memory, even grief put up for bids;
Whose tears will be cheap, whose story called priceless?
In the name of beautification they dress the bodies of the dead;
They build an experience zone and sell tickets to eat.
In the shadow of a signature, Broom's old hand;*

*Harvard ethics has come back to buy again.
The bidder's name is still hidden;
In moonlight the shoot trembles.
Our grief is not a contract, memory is our right;
Whoever wants to sell it must first speak their own name.*

*The tender opened upon memory, and grief itself went to bid;
Calling it "beautification," they dress the body of the dead.*

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE YELLOW CONCH: In a physician's house a patient looked at a conch and said, "It is yellow." Everyone else saw the conch as white. The object of the first cognition was not wholly imaginary—the conch was there—but the colour imposed upon it arose through defect.]

CHAPTER 65

Broom's Return

The smell of greed comes not from fresh ink, but from the water beneath the old bridge.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: NEW FOOTSTEPS ON THE OLD BRIDGE

Folk tune: river wayfarer's song

*Take a new step, take it upon the old bridge;
Walk with bowed head before sweat, silt and history.*

*The old bridge smells of sweat, silt and history;
Step upon it anew, carrying trust with care.
Inspect every crack, strengthen the foundations, fasten a plaque of names;
Tell with honour of the labour of those who built it.*

*The old bridge is no burden, but an open book of lessons;
To mend what went wrong is the future's answer.
New footsteps will pass in safety, the ancestors will bless them;
Crossing the river, society will learn the discipline of justice.*

*Test foundation after foundation, keep watch upon each crack;
Hang upon the bridge the names of the workers who built it.
Let old mistakes become a book for the new generation to read;
To the rhythm of safe footsteps, let the river's heart dance.*

The moment the tender for memory was opened, an old smell rose from within it. It was not the smell of paper, nor of fresh ink, nor of government dust. It was the smell of the same old greed that had first descended upon the bodies of dead workers hidden in the river-water beside the bridge foundations. The language of the tender had changed, the department had changed, the seal was new, but the smell was old. Aruni turned the first page and, the instant he saw the name of the foreign consulting company, the old bridge's iron creak sounded inside his head.

The company's name was now different from the old one. The name that had first appeared on the bridge contract had been written in English letters, with Edward Broom's face gleaming behind it. Now the name on the paper had been translated into Devanagari: 'New Health Foundation Pvt. Ltd.' Beneath it, in small type, stood the name of a foreign partner. Gop Kumar's eyes stopped as he read it. He whispered, "The name is new; the owner is old."

Edward Broom had not come; his letter arrived first. In it he called Garh Narikel's pain "an opportunity for collective healing." He wrote that the open space left after the felling of Channa Grove could hold a "Memory Experience Centre," where visitors from India and abroad could experience together Mithila's folk beliefs, the river, justice, the wounds of the digital age and collective liberation. The word water-burial did not appear in the letter. In its place stood "water-memory section." There was no crocodile, only an "aquatic-creature symbol." There were no dead labourers, only a "labour-story gallery."

Ira did not laugh as she read, but a bitter light entered her eyes. "Look," she said, "the man who drowned the bodies now wants to sell tickets to the drowned." Devika bent over the second page. It said that the centre would contain films, sound installations and a "personal memory archive" in which people could deposit the names, photographs, voices, last messages and stories of their loved ones. Devika immediately recognised the shadow of Chandrapal's memorial app. Memory was being turned into data once again.

The language was read aloud to the children sitting around the stump. Ananya asked the first question: "They will ask for names? What will they do with the names?" No one found an easy answer. Batuknath Hariharan, who wanted to call the proposal "an opportunity for development," cleared his throat. "Child, the names will remain in an archive; the archive will be safe; if it is safe, the world will know." Ananya asked directly, "Will the world know, or will the company keep them?" Batuknath's tongue stopped for a moment.

Gangesha's question was still in the air. The questions once raised in the court of the stump—what is evidence, what is justice, what is caste, what is a name—descended again upon the tender papers. Aruni wondered what Gangesha would have said had he been sitting there. Evidence belongs not only to seals but also to experience; the meaning of a word unfolds not only in statutes but in use; and a society capable of suppressing the inconvenient truths in the life of a master of the philosophy of justice can also turn the names of dead labourers into decoration in a company's glittering presentation.

This time the letter came with an image as well—a coloured design for the proposed memory centre. Channa Grove was absent; in its place stood a circular glass building. A transparent dome covered the stump, lights shone upon the roots, an artificial pond had been laid out, and to one side stood a fabricated crocodile whose eyes would glow red at night. Ghost kabaddi had become a “night-time light show.” The children fell silent when they saw the picture. As their fingers moved across the drawing of the glass dome, they felt as though their own breath were fogging the glass: the game within could be watched from outside, but not touched. For the first time they understood that to kill a game you need not stop it; making a copy of it is enough.

Budhba's ghost was not clearly visible in daylight, yet several people caught him at the corners of their eyes. He leaned from behind the stump toward the picture and gave a small laugh. When a real ghost laughs, the air does not grow cold; it grows warm. The corner of the paper lying on the stump singed slightly, as though an invisible finger had written: “Memory cannot be made from imitation.”

At the end of Broom's letter he wrote that he wished to come personally to Garh Narikel and speak with the people. He also spoke of clearing the “fog of misunderstanding” surrounding his first project. Aruni stopped at that line. Misunderstanding? The names lost beside the bridge foundations, the bodies left in the water, the altered safety register, the compensation to labourers' families delayed month after month—were all these misunderstandings? The engineer within him trembled with anger, but in the assembly around the stump even anger's right to speak demanded restraint.

Satyavrat Mehta was present. Everyone's eyes turned toward him of their own accord, as though he would supply the legal answer. But he remained silent. This was his second silence—not an escape, but a way of giving the people's voices the first place. After a long while he said only, “The letter has been read. Now go from house to house and ask every family whose name will be used in this proposal. No memory is to be made public without consent.”

Meera nodded. “Photographs of bodies, death turned into spectacle, tears put on display, privacy sold as an ‘experience’—all of this is violence. If a memory centre is built, the permission of the victims' households must be its first brick. No permission, nothing.” Devika immediately added, “And no money in exchange for names. Donations, grants, tickets, apps—every account must be public.”

Batuknath made an unsuccessful attempt to smile. “How can any work proceed under so much suspicion? The world runs by process.” Ananya replied, “Does justice also run by process? Then why did it chew up all those years?” No lawyer answered. Sunlight struck the green point on the felled stump, and for an instant it gleamed like a needle.

Gop Kumar placed a new fact before them. One branch of the fund behind the foreign company was linked to the medicine trade that had driven up the price of breath around Garh Narikel during the pandemic. A second branch led to the old safety consultant on the bridge contract. A third invested in digital memory apps. New names, new forms, but the river of money was just as black. The people listened. This time there was less fear and more recognition.

Then an elderly woman from Saryu's line stood up. "My husband went into the water. For twenty years I thought he had died. Now I understand that his name not surviving—that was the death. If these people put his name in a glass house and sell tickets, that will be a second death." Everyone was silent. Her sentence outweighed all the language of the tender.

Meanwhile a child came from behind the Channa stump with a lota of water and poured it over the green point. He did this every day, but today he did it before everyone. Batuknath said, "Son, this may become an officially protected relic. Pouring water like that could be against the rules." The child looked at him quietly and said, "You make it official. I will keep it alive."

At that reply came the faintest rustle of leaves from within the stump, though very few leaves survived. Perhaps Budhba's ghost was pleased. Aruni placed a hand on the child's head. He thought: the strongest argument against the memory project is this child's lota. To imprison a living thing behind museum glass is a crime.

At evening the yellow notice, Broom's letter, the tender copy and the hand-made map of memory were laid together around the stump. The children decided that the map would be read first and the letter afterwards, because the map was born from the land and the letter from an office. The land would speak first; the office later.

As night descended, Edward Broom's face, printed smiling in one corner of the coloured brochure, began to blur. No one touched it, yet the pupil of the printed eye seemed to change. Some said that for one instant it became a crocodile's eye. Others said it was an illusion. But in Garh Narikel illusion too had become a kind of evidence: when many victims see the same fear, that fear is no longer private.

At midnight a message arrived on Gop's device. It contained no sender's name, only the crest of a foreign university, a travel date and a subject: "Field Study of Victim Memory and Folk Justice." On the next line stood the name: Professor Elina Graves's research team. The blue light of the screen froze like ice across Gop's face; it seemed that the chill of a distant university had reached all the way here. Broom's return was not solitary. Behind him came a glittering procession of knowledge.

Ananya saw the message. She looked toward the sky, where the stars had become clear after the felling of Channa Grove. Softly she said, “Where memory is put out to contract, research follows too. Tomorrow my first question to them will be—have you come to listen, or to write?”

The green point on the stump opened a little further that night. Broom’s letter fluttered in the wind as though some old crocodile from a distant seacoast had begun smelling the water again. Garh Narikel remained silent, but its silence now kept watch. The next morning, before Harvard’s research team arrived, the children rose to finish the reading of names.

FOLK SONG: THE SMELL OF THE OLD BRIDGE

Folk tune: river lament

*The water smells, the water beneath the old bridge smells;
The department changed, the language changed—but greed did not.*

*Not fresh ink—the water of the old bridge gave off its smell;
The moment Broom’s letter opened, the workers’ wounds shone.
The department changed, the language changed, greed did not;
A procession of knowledge climbed upon the chests of the dead.
The research team will ask for stories—but will they write, or listen?*

*With her first question Ananya will strip away every mask.
After the felling the stars are clear, the bud has opened a little;
The crocodile from the distant sea again moves, scenting water.
O village, keep watch through the silence of the night;
Old greed has taken a new name and returned to the ghat.*

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE GOOSEBERRY IN THE PALM: A teacher placed an Indian gooseberry in a pupil's palm and asked, "What is this?" The pupil replied without hesitation, "A gooseberry." "Did you examine the evidence?" the teacher asked. The teacher said, "The same kind of mental process does not follow every cognition."]

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: CLEAN LENS, HUMAN VISION

Folk tune: song of seeing

*Wipe the lens, first wipe the lens of the heart;
Before you look, attend to the human heart.*

*Clean the lens first, then look at the person;
A face is not an object—seek consent before writing the story.
The eye does not measure dignity; the eye gives respect;
If the image belongs to a person, let that person's consent be there.*

*Vision is greater than technology, cleared by the heart's affection;
Let there be no crocodile inside the lens, but the open mark of compassion.*

*Ask before you look; after seeing, give honour;
Give art and knowledge life through a human gaze.*

*The eye is not a balance; the eye is a lamp;
A picture taken without consent is an unrighteous act.
A face is not an object, it is a story—listen with respect;
Focus compassion and weave the image of a life.*

On the third morning after Broom's return, a strange vehicle came to Garh Narikel. Its windows were black, small devices were fixed on its roof, and identity cards gleamed at the throats of the people seated inside. It came along the municipality's newly forming road and stopped beside the stump. Two more vehicles followed—boxes, cameras, sound equipment, tripods, wires, and, brighter than all of these, curiosity. The villagers understood: these were not travellers; this was a research team.

A young man got out first. A cap sat on his head, round spectacles over his eyes, and a thick notebook in his hand. He introduced himself as a researcher from Harvard University. With him were three women scholars, two interpreters, a filmmaker and a grant coordinator. Respectful smiles rested on all their faces, but it was the respect of people who look at suffering from a distance and assume that the right to write about it has already become theirs.

Ira did not stop them at first. Pointing toward the circular space beside the stump, she said, "Sit here. Listen first." The young researcher smiled, opened his notebook and asked, "Will you guide us through the context, chronology, community, caste structure, ritual history and folk belief surrounding the alleged water-burials?" Ira's face remained still. "Names first," she said. "Guidance afterwards."

A little discomfort entered the research team's eyes. They had come with a timetable. Here time did not move by pages in a register but by the breath of pain. Ananya sat down with the register. The first name was read. The young researcher immediately began writing. Ananya stopped his hand. He startled. The child said, "When a name is heard, you do not write at once. First say 'Present.'" With difficulty the word came from his mouth: "Present."

His language hesitated over that one word. He knew "present" as information, not as responsibility. When each researcher in turn said "Present," sunlight trembled upon a tiny green point on the stump. Budhba's ghost, who since yesterday had remained caught at the edge of daylight, slipped behind a severed root and said, "Now write. What has not been heard has not been written."

One of the Harvard scholars stirred when she heard Gangesha's name. "I have read a little about the Nyaya tradition of Mithila," she said. "The Tattvacintamani—an extremely important work." Ba did not laugh, but an oblique gleam entered her eyes. "You read the book," she asked, "did you read the story of Gangesha's body?" The scholar fell silent. Ba continued, "The man you call the father of Navya-Nyaya—are the discomfort of his caste, the discomfort of his marriage, the impossibility surrounding his birth, society's fear—are these in your research?"

Silence descended upon the research team. Ira slowly opened the matter. "Here Gangesha is not the name of a book; he is the name of a question. If the story of a birth five years after the father's death survives in popular memory, the question is: what shall we call evidence? If the story of marriage to a leatherworker woman remains stuck like a thorn in society's belly, the question is: what is the evidence of caste? If the Tattvacintamani is said to equal twelve thousand books, the question is: does scripture measure knowledge, or does life?"

One researcher immediately asked, "The written source for this story?" His tone was polite, but within that politeness was the hunger of a notebook. Ananya placed her hand on a root of the stump and answered, "The source breathes here. If you want written sources, you will find them; but first understand that many truths are killed even after they are written, and many truths remain alive even when they have never been written."

Satyavrat Mehta sat behind them. As he listened, the legal practitioner within him stirred. Law asks for written evidence; memory is living presence. Yet he did not speak. He understood that this was not his chapter. He kept his notebook closed. His silence was no longer the silence of his first wrongdoing; it was a silence that did not wish to spread the shadow of his office across the people's questions.

A Harvard scholar said softly in English that they studied caste and justice. Meera, who until then had been sitting at a distance, moved a little forward. "Study is good," she said. "But caste is not merely a concept. It is a barrier at the door of the body, humiliation at the edge of a well, fear on a wedding night, distance between plates of food, and a stain fixed to a child's name. If you write this, preserve people's faces while you write. If you steal the face, it will not be research; it will be another violence."

At these words the filmmaker lowered his camera. His habit was to capture the face of whoever was speaking. Here, however, capturing a face began to feel like hunting. Meera kept looking at him. He did not dare raise the camera again.

Gop Kumar showed the research team the village's memory map. On it the river, the bridge, the stump, labourers' houses, Ujjwal's room, the room of medicine brokerage, the subterranean doorway of digital fraud and the severed shade of Channa Grove were all joined by a single line. The team wanted to photograph it. Gop said, "You will not understand this through a photograph. First walk this line with your feet."

They walked. From the stump to the bridge, from the bridge to the pond, from the pond to the house of a labourer's widow whose husband had been recorded on paper as "absent." The researchers were soaked in sweat, mud stained their trousers, and their shoes sank in water. Ira said, "If academic distance keeps itself free of mud, it will not deliver justice." The scholar wanted to write down the sentence, then looked at Ananya. Ananya nodded. "Write now. This sentence arrived by walking."

They stopped at the widow's house. The woman came out. At the sight of the camera she did not pull a veil over her face; she fixed her eyes upon it. Her eyes looked as though years of weeping had turned them to glass. The filmmaker raised his camera again. Such a face was rare material to him.

Meera stepped directly in front of him. “Stop,” she said sharply. “This face is not material for your research. Ask first—does she want this or not? Ask in her language. Do not invent the meaning of her silence yourself.”

The interpreter flustered. The Harvard researcher’s notebook trembled. Behind them, the grant coordinator sent by Broom whispered in English that time was short. Ira heard. She turned and said, “The time of the dead workers’ families was stopped for years. Your timetable is dust before those years.”

The widow remained silent for a long time. Then she said, “Do not write my face. Write my husband’s name. The water took my husband’s body; the paper called him absent. You write: he is present.” She spoke her husband’s name. Everyone answered, “Present.” This time there was less hesitation in the research team’s voices.

After that reply, a band of black cloud suddenly moved across the sky and sunlight fell directly into the woman’s courtyard. The camera remained lowered. The notebook remained open. For the first time the research team understood that some sights are not meant to be captured; one is meant to bow before them.

By evening they returned to the stump. The Harvard researcher’s notebook was not full; on the contrary, many of its pages remained blank. Looking at those empty pages, he said in English that he had thought he would find material here, but instead he was finding questions. Ba answered, “If you do not find questions, how will you find justice?”

That night, after the reading of names around the stump, Gangesha’s name was spoken again. “Gangesha Upadhyaya—Present.” The people answered. In the children’s voices were curiosity, rebellion and that fire of knowledge which makes the first crack in the wall of caste. Budhba’s ghost said softly, “The Tattvacintamani is not being rewritten on pages; it is being written again in these children’s eyes.”

The team rose to leave, but Meera told them the rule for the next day. “Tomorrow, if you want to take images, first we will speak about the right to sight. Who sees, who is shown, who is hidden, who is sold—all of this must be clear. Garh Narikel’s suffering will no longer become an unnamed scene.”

The filmmaker still held his camera, but dust from Channa Grove had settled on its lens. He moved to clean it, and in the dust he saw not his own face but a crocodile’s eye. He lowered the camera. Before the next day’s debate had even begun, vision itself had entered the dock.

FOLK SONG: THE CROCODILE INSIDE THE LENS

Folk tune: song of seeing

Clean the lens, first clean the lens within;

Suffering is not an unnamed scene—consent is the first leaf.

With instruments hanging from their necks, they measured before they looked;

They made the village's pain into data, image and specimen.

The Tattvacintamani was written again in children's eyes;

A question showed the first crack in the wall of caste.

Meera said—first, the right to sight:

Who will see, who will show, who will sell a family?

As the lens was cleaned, a crocodile's eye emerged;

The filmmaker's hand dropped at once.

Knowledge that does not listen is itself a hand of the market.

With instruments hanging from the neck, measuring before the eyes—

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE EMPTY SEAT: When the assembly began, the royal preceptor's seat was empty. He said, "Non-apprehension yields knowledge of absence only when all the conditions under which the object could have been perceived are present."]

CHAPTER 67

Meera and the Right to Sight

There is a right in seeing too—and the consent of the person being seen is the first document.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: CONSENT FIRST

Folk tune: women's dialogue song

Ask first, "Am I ready?"—ask first;

Honour “yes,” honour “no”—learn to understand both.

Before you look at me, ask—am I ready?

My body, my story, my decision are mine.

Honour “yes,” honour “no,” and listen to silence too;

Within the circle of trust, gather the flowers of consent.

Image, voice, touch, writing—all require permission;

This simple rule of respect is humanity's inheritance.

Consent first, action afterwards—walk in this rhythm;

Let the flowers of relationship bloom in the garden of a free mind.

My body, my story—the key is in my own hand;

Listen to the language of silence too; this is the grace of relationship.

Image, voice, touch, writing—the same rule everywhere;

In the garden of consent, let true affection flower.

When Harvard's research team returned to the Channa stump on the second day, they did not sit down and open their notebooks as before. This time cameras hung from their necks, bright bags swung from their shoulders, and there was a strange haste in their eyes. It was not the haste of knowledge but of collection—as though the village, the water-burials, the crocodiles, ghost kabaddi, the felled tree, the stones of names, women's weeping and the children's watch all had to be captured at once and carried away.

Ira was already standing there. The memory map was in her hand, but folded. She had understood that people who arrive upon the earth first “speak the language of the sky—“study,” “participation,” “documentation,” “global platform.” Yet no one asks the eyes of the person being seen. For that reason, on that day Ira stopped them at the outer circle instead of allowing them inside the stump’s enclosure.

There was a young woman in the group, a pupil of Elina Graves named Martha. She had learned a few Maithili words before coming. With a greeting, she said in broken Maithili, “We will take your pain to the world.” Ira replied with a courteous smile, “Before pain travels, does anyone ask where it wishes to go—to the world, or back to its own home?” Martha fell silent. She could not find a translation for that question within herself.

Then Meera stepped forward—the same Meera whom people had once tried to silence through blackmail in the names of body, privacy, love, gaze and shame; whom people had wanted to see not as a victim of crime but as a “secret.” Now she stood before the stump, a red thread tied around her wrist, a tired gleam in her eyes, and in her voice the patience that can be forged only by passing through the fire of humiliation.

Looking at the team, Meera said, “Whatever you see here is not an object for seeing. Listen first. And if you must see, ask: whom will you see? Why will you see? How much will you see? After it has been seen, whose right will that gaze belong to?”

A male researcher said, “We can blur the face.” Meera stopped him. “Blurring is not a right. Blurring a face does not blur the humiliation of the body. The fundamental question is whether your gaze will submit itself to my consent. Someone who is crying is not a scene; someone who is crying is a relationship.”

The children seated around the Channa stump listened to the exchange like a mantra. Ananya wrote a new heading in her register: “The Right to Sight.” Beside it, in smaller letters, she wrote: “The one who is seen also has eyes.”

Gangesha’s question had been floating in the air since the previous day: what is evidence? What is perception? What is inference? What is verbal testimony? What is comparison? What is non-apprehension? When Satyavrat Mehta saw Ananya’s line at the edge of the page, he said quietly, “In Navya-Nyaya, perceptual evidence is honoured greatly. But when does seeing become justice? When the one who sees has taken greed out of his gaze.”

Ba laughed at that. “Is it easy to remove greed? People wear caste even in their eyes.” Everyone fell silent. Ba continued, “Gangesha was accepted as scripture, but the fire of his life was suppressed. The story of his marriage to a leatherworker woman trembles in people’s throats. When the gaze puts on caste, justice too becomes caste-bound.”

The members of the Harvard team looked at one another. They had expected the village to spread its stories out in welcome. Here the story demanded rules first. Meera said, "Our history is not raw material for your research papers. Those whose bodies were chewed, whose names were erased, whose love was humiliated, whose breath of life was measured by caste—they are not your images. They are human beings."

Martha asked softly, "Then what should we do?" For the first time there was humility in the question. Meera took them to the ring of stones around the stump. She showed them the stone on which was written: "The one whose name was never found." Meera said, "Do not photograph this stone. Sit beside it. Write nothing for twenty minutes. If something moves within you after twenty minutes, then ask whether this stone wishes to show itself to you."

The members of the team sat in uncertainty. For the first time the cameras at their necks felt like burdens. The sunlight over the Channa stump became inexplicably hard. The birds were silent. The river could be heard in the distance. It seemed as though the whole of Garh Narikel were administering this twenty-minute examination. In that silence every researcher heard the sound of their own breathing for the first time—as though, in place of the machine, the body itself had become the archive.

Then an elderly leatherworker arrived. His name was Jagdish Ram. He usually sat at the back and spoke little. Something had stirred within him after hearing about Gangesha. Coming to Meera, he said, "If Gangesha truly married a leatherworker woman, then is the scripture his alone, or is the humiliation of my caste written inside it too?"

Meera did not answer. She placed the question among the children. Ananya said, "If justice became scripture, why was life's humiliation left outside? We will put Gangesha's book on the map, but we will put the story of his marriage there too."

Jagdish Ram's eyes filled. "Then for the first time," he said, "I shall sit not outside the scripture, but inside it." At those words a faint creaking came from within the stump. Someone said the dry wood had split. The children wrote: "First crack in the cage of caste."

Satyavrat Mehta opened his notebook but did not write. Meera looked at him. "Why aren't you writing?" Satyavrat said, "Some things, if I write them, will become government testimony again. This time Jagdish-ji will write for himself." He placed the notebook before him. With a trembling hand Jagdish Ram wrote: "My gaze too is evidence."

Martha from Harvard had been listening. She wanted to write something in English on her paper, then stopped. "Will you explain the meaning of this sentence to us?" she asked. Jagdish Ram replied, "No. First sit outside your own language." Two members of Elina Graves's group became uncomfortable at the answer. But Martha truly closed her paper.

Meera did not proclaim a new rule there; with the people's consent she simply had a short code written. First: no face without permission. Second: no weeping becomes a scene unless the person who weeps wishes it. Third: no memory of bodily humiliation without language that preserves dignity. Fourth: caste-based suffering will not be turned into a "social example" by removing the person's name. Fifth: whoever sees will remain answerable to the person seen.

The children called this code the "watch over sight." It became the first new lesson of the coconut-leaf school: permission before seeing, silence before listening, relationship before writing.

Meanwhile a young researcher quietly tried from the edge to photograph the severed stump, the stones bearing names and a weeping woman. His camera suddenly went dark. He panicked. Then words appeared on the screen: "You saw—but were you seen?" He shook the camera. The words vanished, but fear remained on his face. Budhba's ghost smiled from a distance.

Ananya softly began the rhythm of kabaddi: "Kabaddi-kabaddi... sight-sight... name-name..." The children did not enter the game; they merely caught the rhythm of breath. Meera understood that the game had not stopped. Kabaddi was now becoming an exercise not in escaping the grip of bodies, but the grip of the gaze. Could the one who is being seen hold breath and escape beyond the line? That was the new game.

At evening Martha came to Meera again. "I want one photograph," she said, "but not of a face. If you permit it, I would like to photograph only the red thread around your wrist." Meera looked at the thread. It was the same thread she had transformed from a memory of humiliation into a sign of rights. She thought for a while, then said, "You may take the photograph, but its story will be written in my words, not yours."

Martha agreed. For the first time the foreign research team had to trust the village's language. Ira opened the map and showed them: the Channa stump, the stones of names, Gangesha's question, Jagdish Ram's written line, the thread on Meera's wrist—all had become joined by a single line. Ira said, "On this map there is a current of sight, just as there is a current of the river. If it flows in the wrong direction, it will drown memory again."

Night fell and the team left. After they had gone, however, a small sheet of paper was found beside the stump. It bore the emblem of Chandrapal's memorial app, and beneath it the words: "Tribute Image Collection opening soon. Upload photographs of the dead, victims' stories and family details. Donation facility available."

Devika trembled as she read it. Meera took the paper in her hand and said, “Today we stopped the research team’s gaze. Tomorrow the memorial app will enter people’s homes.” Ananya wrote the next heading in the register: “The first doorway to the theft of names.”

The green point on the stump glowed faintly in the night, as though the tree were saying: the watch over sight is in place, but the market of memory is still awake.

FOLK SONG: ASK BEFORE YOU LOOK AT ME

Folk tune: women’s dialogue song

Ask first, ask before you look at me;

See me as a human being—do not take me for an object.

Before you look at me, ask for my dignity;

My face, my story, my consent are my life.

The eye too is a hand; it can plunder privacy;

If an image sells pain, it is not knowledge—it is commerce.

Meera stopped the lens; the dust protected the name;

But the mobile entered house after house with flowers and lamps.

The tribute app asks for images, stories, lineage, family;

Behind the donation button the market of names awoke.

The watch over sight is set; the war is still to come;

See me as a person, friend, not as an object.

The eye too is a hand—it can steal the dignity of privacy.

But the mobile entered every home in the place of flowers and lamps.

CHAPTER 68

Devika versus the Tribute App

The hand that presses a button in the name of the dead searches the pockets of the living.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: JUDGEMENT BEFORE THE BUTTON

Folk tune: children's warning song

Stop, child, stop before the button;

One breath, one question—only then lean forward.

Before the hand presses a button, first search the heart;

Whose name, whose money, whose honour—say it plainly.

A click moves fast, but the lamp of thought can be faster;

A warning message can block the road of fraud.

Think with your mother and father; do not open unknown links;

When greed speaks sweetly, sound the drum of verification.

Judgement before the button—the song of digital safety;

Care protects a household's labour, trust and honour.

Behind a glittering link spreads a net of thorns;

In the sweet cry of “free, free,” the fraudster's teeth gleam.

Tell your parents, check with a friend;

Only a thoughtful click will preserve the truth of the home.

The peace that should have descended upon Garh Narikel after the Festival of Names did not come. In the place where the children read names, where the green point on the stump squinted in sunlight, where Meera kept watch over the dignity of faces and the right to sight, the glow of screens began sliding in again after dark. Stones bearing names lay around the felled body of Channa Grove, but now there was a proposal to paste small shining signs upon the stones. It was said that this would keep memory safe.

When Devika first heard the proposal, the soft voice of Ujjwal's mother circled in her ears: "A name does not need haste." Yet the first line in the tribute app's advertisement was: "Tribute in a single touch." Devika trembled at those words. If tribute could be completed with a single touch, what would become of the length of grief, the heat of waiting, the tremor of calling a name, and the testimony of silence?

Chandrapal Batra was not described as the principal operator of the app. His name appeared nowhere. At the front stood a new company—"People's Memory Service Board." Behind it was a consultant, behind the consultant a donor, behind the donor a cultural worker, and behind all of them layer upon layer of fog. But Devika knew that inside fog there is usually the same face that does not wish to stand in daylight. Chandrapal's method was not hard to recognise. Wherever he saw a name, he saw an account; wherever he saw tears, he saw a donation button; wherever he saw memory, he saw a collection form.

The tribute app began in very gentle words. Write the name of the deceased. Add a photograph. Write the family's story. Donate if you wish. Light a memorial lamp. Offer digital flowers. A facility for those living in distant countries. Participate in grief. Among all these sentences Devika noticed a small opening: permission to collect the name, relationship details, phone number, banking route, location, birth, death, caste, father's name, a woman's married name, children's ages. This was not tribute. It was a census of grief.

Devika did not make her first test with Ujjwal's name. She knew that placing a hand directly on a victim's wound can wound the victim again. She first chose the name on the stone the children had placed before all others: "The one whose name was not found." The app opened. In the name field she wrote: "The one whose name was not found." The screen immediately replied: "Please enter full name." Devika wrote again: "Unnamed." The screen answered: "Invalid." A third time she wrote: "Unknown labourer drowned in the water." The screen said: "Please select category." Devika switched off the phone.

In that moment Devika understood that the app would accept only those names that fitted the market's boxes. A name that was incomplete, a person outside caste categories, a woman who wished to remain outside the definition of marriage, a labourer whose father's name was unknown, a body that fell into the water but never rose onto paper—none of them would gain entry to this app. On its very first day, this new doorway of memory was leaving the nameless outside.

Devika showed this to Ananya and the children. They did not read the small letters on the screen; they watched its behaviour. One child asked, "It says it needs a full name. If an incomplete name is found, does the person become incomplete?" Another said, "If there is no photograph, is there no face?" A third child, who had already heard

Gangesha's question, said softly, "Anything that removes the absent in the name of evidence is not justice; it is deceit."

Devika remembered Gangesha. The hard light of Navya-Nyaya reasoning suddenly descended upon the blue light of the screen. Evidence is not merely collection; evidence has disciplines and limits. What is seen, what is heard, what is inferred, what survives in collective memory, what lives in compassion—each has a different value. But Chandrapal's app was pushing every form of evidence through a single window: enter name, attach proof, accept donation, publish memory. Whoever could not fill the form became absent.

That night Devika went looking for Chandrapal. He was not beside the Channa stump but in a new office behind the market. A board outside read: "Cultural Memory Assistance Centre." Inside were a glass table, scented incense, the glow of computers, and on the wall an artistic image of Channa Grove. In that image the tree had not been felled; it was entirely green, entirely beautiful, entirely saleable.

Chandrapal smiled as soon as he saw Devika. "You people are very emotional," he said. "I have only provided a convenience. How will family members living away from home join the reading of names? They will connect through the app, donate, preserve memory." Devika looked at him. There was no remorse for crime in that face, only the old quickness that sees opportunity in a crisis.

In a calm voice Devika asked, "Why did your app refuse the person whose name was not found?" Chandrapal was silent for a moment, then said, "A system needs data. Without data there can be no register. Donors want completeness." Devika said, "Channa Grove gave the incomplete name the first place. Your screen left it outside. Then this is not tribute; it is the sorting of names."

Chandrapal laughed. "Not sorting—purification. If there are confused names, there will be misuse." Devika felt as though the crocodile had opened its mouth not in the water but inside the sentence. The thief who was himself weaving a net of misuse was warning of misuse by incomplete names. She said, "You fear incomplete names because incomplete names cannot be sold in the market. A full name, full relationship, full body, full grief—only then do you earn your profit."

For the first time Chandrapal's eyes hardened. "Profit is not a bad word," he said. "Preserving memory costs money." Devika replied, "There is a difference between cost and plunder. Stealing a name written on stone and putting it on a screen, then demanding 'proof' from the family, then opening a road for donations—that is not cost. It is the second death of the dead."

There was a small room at the back of the office. Devika's attention moved toward it. The door stood half open. Inside, young men were typing names. Some names were correct, some distorted; beside some they were asking for caste, adding fathers, putting husbands in brackets after women's names. Devika saw Ujjwal's name on the list as well. Beside it were the words: "High emotional reach." Cold entered her body. She neither shouted nor wept. She did not even photograph the line, because she knew that to stop another person's theft one must not commit theft again. She kept the words of the line in her memory.

She came out and said, "Remove Ujjwal's name." Chandrapal said, "The name has already become public. Memory is collective." Devika replied, "Collective memory and commercial possession are different things. You will not sell the tears attached to Ujjwal's name without his mother's permission." Chandrapal answered, "The law does not say that." Devika said softly, "If the law does not yet say it, the assembly of names will. And the court of the Channa stump does not wait for the law."

The next day Devika told the public meeting everything. She did not violate the privacy of the office; she did not read out names that had been typed without consent. She explained only how the app worked—rejection of incomplete names, classification of suffering, routes for donation, vagueness of consent and the marketing of memory. The children wrote a new rule in the register: "Before anyone's name is put on a screen, obtain the permission of that person's people. If no people remain, first hear the name in the village assembly. An incomplete name is not smaller than a complete one."

Meera tied her thread behind this rule. "Without the right to sight, memory becomes humiliation," she said. "If any camera, app, donation form, research project or memorial touches anyone's suffering without consent, it will not be allowed into Channa Grove." A faint laugh from Budhba's ghost was heard. Perhaps he liked the rule.

Satyavrat Mehta sat behind them listening. A notebook was in his hand, but he did not write every sentence. He wrote only one: "Ownership of a name belongs with the dead person's people, with memory and with justice—not with the market." After that sentence he stopped his pen. He understood how slowly law would move on such a matter; the children's moral code had already moved ahead of the law.

Chandrapal did not come to that meeting. His app came in his absence. On many phones at the same moment a notification flashed: "Your loved one's name has been added to the Garh Narikel Memory Collection. Light a tribute lamp." Some people startled. Some switched off their phones. Some eyes filled with tears. The same notification came to Ujjwal's mother's phone. She could not read it; Devika trembled as she read it aloud. The mother remained calm and said, "Do not drown my son in a screen again."

Then Ananya began collecting the phones. She placed them all face down within the circle of stones. The green point on the stump shone in the sunlight. The children drew the lines for kabaddi but did not begin the game. First they said together: “Names will not be sold.” It was not a slogan. It was an oath.

During the night the glittering notifications began disappearing by themselves. On some phones names vanished; on some they were wrong; on some they were repeated. Devika understood that Chandrapal’s app would not merely take names; it would change them too. The difference between the name written on stone and the name shining on the screen became visible. The difference was not small. It was the first warning of the next crisis.

At dawn the children went to count the stones. Every stone was still there, but the letters on three stones had grown faint, as though someone had scraped them with a fingernail in the night. When the children ran their fingers over the scratched places, the stone did not feel cold; it felt slightly warm, like a wound still fresh. “Who?” someone asked. Budhba’s voice came from very far away: “Whoever steals names on a screen will not take long to put a hand upon the stones.”

Ananya opened the register. On the first page she wrote: “From today, the theft of names has begun.” Devika looked toward the stump. The green point was still there, but the soil around it appeared slightly disturbed. Guarding memory was no longer merely work of feeling. This was the beginning of a war—not a war of slogans, but a war to save the letters of names.

FOLK SONG: THE BUTTON THAT SEARCHES THE POCKET

Folk tune: Devika’s warning song

Ask first, ask before you press the button;

The family owns the loved one’s name—understand this.

A button in the name of the dead cuts the pocket of the living;

A lamp burns on the screen while the household hearth burns low.

The name on stone stays still, the name on the screen changes;

In one night someone quietly scrapes three letters.

Devika said—recognise the light of grief;

See the donation code, the data, the woven net of theft.

The soil around the green point has been scratched;

The watch over names is no longer feeling—it has risen into war.

Do not press the button blindly; first ask whom;

The family owns a loved one's name—not any app.

A lamp burns on the screen while the household hearth diminishes.

In one night someone quietly scrapes three letters.

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—MEMORY OF THE BLACK POT: In a potter's house a pot had once been black. Months later, a young man returning from a distant country said on the basis of his old memory, "That black pot is still in the room." The pot was indeed the same pot and stood in the same place, but its colour had changed.]

CHAPTER 69

The Theft of Names

The theft caught on the screen is only the bright side of theft.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE LOTUS OF NAMES IN WATER

Folk tune: auspicious water-ghat song

*Fill it, sister, fill the pitcher with names;
Set a lotus upon every ripple of the water-ghat.*

*An erased name rises again in water as a lotus;
However far the current runs, the root remains within memory.*

*Sisters at the water-ghat, sing the song of names;
With syllable after syllable, bring identity home again.*

*Water does not erase truth; it only changes its form;
At dawn the lotus of a name opens toward the sun.
A flower on water, dignity in the heart, a lamp in the home;
Give erased lives a seat in memory.*

*Drowned and erased letters grew beneath the water;
Receiving dawn's first ray, they flowered again above.
Syllable by syllable, respect from ghat to ghat;
In the mirror of water a forgotten identity shines.*

When Devika exposed the lie of the tribute app before everyone, the people thought the real theft had been caught. But the Channa stump knew that the theft caught on a screen was only the bright page of theft. The real theft was the quiet removal of names from memory, so that the next generation would never even ask whose body drowned, whose labour was devoured, whose voice was silenced.

In the second week of the Festival of Names, Ananya opened the register and saw the first blank space. On the page where “Saryu Mandal” had been written the day before, only a faint stain of ink remained; the letters were gone. The stain looked as though someone had stroked the name with a wet thumb and wiped it away. Ananya rubbed her eyes, then raised the page toward the sunlight. Not even the shadow of the letters remained.

“Perhaps it is the wrong page,” one child said. Another ran toward the ring of stones. The stone bearing Saryu Mandal’s name was still where it had been placed, but its surface was smooth. The carved name was gone. The red thread remained tied around it, the place was unchanged; only the name had disappeared. It was a strange theft—the stone was not stolen, the thread was not stolen, the place was not stolen; only the name was stolen.

When the news spread, people came running. Some suspected Chandrapal’s app, some the municipality, some the foreign research team, some Batuknath’s proposed trust. But Ba said softly, “The thief is not the one who steals the stone. The thief is the one who persuades people that nothing was ever written on the stone.” At those words the crowd fell utterly silent.

Devika checked the digital list. There too several names had been marked “unverified.” Saryu Mandal—unverified. Munna Paswan’s father—unverified. Ujjwal’s incident—voluntary risk. Labourer’s death—not available in the contract register. Names that remained clear in people’s throats had been blurred on paper and screen.

Gop Kumar opened his old files. They contained names, dates, seals and copies of the dead workers’ thumbprints. But when the copies were held to the light, some of the marks ran like drops of water. Gop’s hands trembled. “Data can be stolen,” he said, “but this is an assault on the body of evidence.”

Ananya remembered Gangesha’s question. Softly she said, “What is evidence? What is written? What is seen? What remains in memory? Or what power agrees to accept?” Satyavrat Mehta stood behind her. Instead of answering, he remained silent. This time the silence held no guilt; it made room for the children to think.

Meera went to Saryu Mandal’s house. Saryu’s sister showed the hand on which she wore her rakhi and said, “The name was erased? But look at this hand. Father rowed a boat in every flood. The stories he told in my childhood—have those been erased too?” Meera understood that proof of a name is not merely letters; the gait of a body, the language of a house, surviving clothes and practices of memory are evidence too. But she also understood that society first calls someone “unverified” when it wants to suppress them.

While making notes on the incident, Saumya first wrote the heading “The Theft of Names.” Then she crossed it out. Beneath it she wrote, “Organised Forgetting Directed Against Names.” That sounded too scholarly. At last she wrote: “What is being erased is not a name, but a person’s presence.”

That same afternoon Batuknath Hariharan arrived carrying the papers for his trust. His face wore a neat polish of sorrow. “Look,” he said, “names cannot be preserved in this kind of disorderly people’s register. Let us form a properly constituted People’s Memory Trust: president, secretary, treasurer, legal adviser. Only then will the names be safe.”

The children surrounded him. Ananya asked, “Will you first read the name that was erased?” Batuknath smiled. “If there is evidence, we will read it.” Ananya asked again, “What if the evidence is not in your papers but in our elders’ throats?” Batuknath’s smile hardened a little. “Emotion and evidence are different things.”

Then Aruni said, “Not emotion—life testimony.” At the words a faint knock came from within the stump, as though a dry root agreed. Batuknath turned a page. “The trust will clarify historicity, documentation, legal status, ownership and management.” Devika interrupted: “And who owns the names?”

Batuknath fell silent. His professional cunning was in that silence. Ownership of names—the question cut at the root of every file through which memory could be possessed. At last he said, “In the public interest.” Meera did not laugh, but her eyes flashed like thorns. “You know very well how often ‘public interest’ has been a paper curtain hung over women’s bodies, Dalit names, workers’ deaths and the tears of the poor.”

At that moment Gangesha’s shadow thickened behind the stump. No one saw him directly, but a question sounded in the children’s ears: “Universal, particular, relation, absence—where is the name?” Ananya wrote in the register: “The absence of one called absent can itself become evidence, if someone manufactured that absence.” For the first time Satyavrat Mehta raised his head. In the child’s sentence he heard a new lesson in Nyaya.

At that moment a drop of sweat fell upon Batuknath’s paper. It spread into a round mark. Seeing it, a child whispered, “A crocodile’s eye.” No one laughed. The circular stain slowly settled upon the very place where the word “property” was written in the draft of the trust.

Chandrapal Batra watched the scene from a distance on his phone. A warning flashed in his app: “Invalid name reactivated.” He panicked. To him a name was only an entry; here names were rising again as people’s voices, the warmth of stones, the creak of the stump and children’s questions. The calculations on the screen were losing to the testimony of the stump.

By evening a list had been made of the erased names. There were seven in all. The children decided that instead of simply restoring seven names, they would hold seven days of name-reading: one name each day, and with every name they would hear the family, the house, the event, the work, the weeping, the song, the mistake, the shame and the laughter connected with it. A name would no longer be merely letters; it would become the whole tree of relationship.

On the first day it was Saryu Mandal's turn to be read. But when the stone was lifted, the wet earth beneath it held a strange shape—wavy, like the map of a small pond. Ba looked at it and said, "Saryu used to go into the water often." Gop bent down to inspect it. At the centre of the map was a round depth. Devika whispered, "Is this pointing toward the pond?"

When night fell, a faint gleam of water appeared in the earthen shape. People stood around the severed stump. Someone asked, "Where did the water come from? The ground was dry." From the tiny line of water rose the rich smell of wet earth, like the first drop of a very old monsoon returning. Budhba's voice came very softly through the darkness: "When a name is erased, water keeps it."

The register was not closed that night. Ananya wrote the final line: "The erased names have gone down into the water; tomorrow we shall listen to the pond." The yellow envelope, the draft of the trust and the app screen all lay to one side. The damp gleam rising from the stump's roots silently showed the path toward the pond.

The chapter paused where the theft of names began turning into the testimony of water. The next morning the people of Garh Narikel would gather by the pond, and for the first time the Panidubbi would speak in a clear voice: "A name that drowned in water cannot be erased from paper."

FOLK SONG: ERASED NAMES IN THE WATER

Folk tune: water-ghat lament

Water will keep them, water will keep the erased names;

Whoever cuts memory, water too will record the mark.

The theft caught on the screen was only its bright part;

The true theft is the night that removes names from memory.

The stone grows dim, the tongue catches, the register wakes;

From the dry root a wet gleam runs toward the pond.

Budhba says—water will keep the erased name;

Burn the paper if you will; the river will return the letters.

Ananya wrote—tomorrow we shall listen to the pond;

We shall gather drowned names from the Panidubbi's tangled hair.

An erased name does not weep; it becomes water and shows the way.

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—SMOKE ON THE MOUNTAIN: At dawn travellers were walking toward a mountain. Smoke could be seen rising from behind the summit.]

CHAPTER 70

The Submarine's Testimony

What cannot be seen from above remains tied in the Panidubbi's tangled hair.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: NAMES FREED FROM THE TANGLED HAIR

Folk tune: pond song

*Free them, friend, free the names that are tangled;
Oil of affection, comb of patience—bring both together.*

*The names tangled in the Panidubbi's hair,
The women brought combs and gently worked them free.
One knot of fear, one of shame, one forgotten matter;
With the oil of affection every difficult knot comes loose.*

*Freed names shine above the pond like the moon;
The story once bound now glows with an independent voice.
Give the name freed from the tangled hair a home upon a leaf;
Give tangled memory a throat of honour.*

*One knot was bound with fear, another black with shame;
Slowly straightened, every knot came open.
The freed name smiled like the moon upon the pond;
A free melody entered the throat of the bound story.*

Budhba's words—"Water keeps an erased name"—and Ananya's written resolve, "Tomorrow we shall listen to the pond," throbbed in the village's heart all night. No one in Garh Narikel slept well after the night of the theft of names. The pages of the register survived, and the stones still lay around the stump, yet a kind of smoke seemed to have settled over some names. The letters had not vanished, but recognition had blurred. A name that had sounded clear yesterday now made the tongue stumble when it was spoken. People said: the thief did not carry away the paper; the thief stole the voice of the name.

Ananya reached the stump early in the morning. She opened the register, ran her hand over the page, and saw tiny water stains in the places where the names seemed to be missing. Where had the water come from in the night? There had been no rain, and dew could not have fallen in drops so large. Ba said, "This is not water; it is the sweat of memory." But Gop Kumar said softly, "When a conspiracy gathers around a name, evidence goes in search of water."

The sentence reminded everyone of Gangesha's question. What is evidence? What is perception? What is inference? Who owns the authority of words? Gangesha Upadhyaya's Navya-Nyaya, which upon paper had spread with the weight of twelve thousand books, now trembled as a single fine fibre upon the Channa stump. The children said, "If perception is made unclear, we shall look for the reflection in water."

It was decided that testimony about the theft of names would be taken not at the stump but at the pond. Behind the village, where in the rains the waters of the Kamala-Balan entered and formed a pond, people gathered at evening. It was no ordinary pond. The elders said a Panidubbi lived there—woman or man, ghost or living being, no one could say for certain. When a drowned name was spoken, the Panidubbi answered from the bottom in the form of bubbles.

Chandrapal Batra's people were watching from a distance as well. They believed the surest method of erasing a name was to fill people's memory with doubt. Once people themselves began to say that perhaps the name did not matter so much, the theft would be complete. But now the people were walking toward the pond. The thieves found this intolerable: why should something removed from paper be searched for in water?

At the bank Meera first read out the rules: no one's face would be shown by force; no one's weeping would be filmed; no one's suffering would be turned into trade. Devika added that when a name was read, the family could speak if it wished; if not, the water itself could answer. Satyavrat Mehta sat behind them and did not uncap his ink pen. Hurrying to write what one had only just heard could again become an offence of silence.

Evening sunlight was sinking into the water. From the damp earth of the bank rose the rich smell of soil, and the reeds shivered slowly even without wind, as though the pond were holding its breath. Ananya read the first blurred name. The word would not come out whole. Her tongue caught exactly where the water stain lay in the register. Everyone's heart caught with it. Then a round bubble rose from the bottom of the pond. It did not burst; it came to the surface and stayed there, and within it something gleamed like letters. The children saw together—the name was complete.

Someone said, “Illusion.” Someone said, “Magic.” For the first time Satyavrat Mehta spoke: “If the letters written by society have become false, then nature’s reflection too can become evidence.” He immediately fell silent again, because he understood that even after this sentence the decision was not his; it belonged to the people.

At the second name the pond’s surface trembled. This time no bubble rose, but a leaf came up—rotten and soaked, yet the sound of a name seemed to run through its veins. The children tried to see letters on the leaf, but it was blank. Ba said, “Not all evidence is read by the eyes; some is read by the ears.” Everyone became silent. A faint voice rose from the leaf. The name blurred in the register was spoken from within it.

At that moment Gop Kumar remembered his digital files: copies of files, copies on servers, copies of email—everything depended on replicas, but here water itself was making a copy. He thought: a society that takes paper from the oppressed cannot take away water. If it takes the water, the name will grow in the air. If it stops the air, the name will enter the child’s throat. This is a chain of testimony that depends upon no department’s seal.

Then came the first clear sign of the Panidubbi. A round darkness formed at the centre of the pond. It was not terrifying; it was deep, as though the navel of the water had opened. From that navel rose a voice—not wholly woman, man, child or elder, but a joining of all voices. The instant it sounded, the damp air along the bank turned suddenly cold and the hair on people’s bodies stood up. The voice said, “A name drowned in water cannot have its reflection stolen.”

The people trembled. After many years the Panidubbi herself had spoken. Budhba’s ghost, hidden among the reeds on the bank, bowed his head. It seemed to him that the living had truly begun to learn how to listen; therefore the water too had begun to speak.

Gathering courage, Ananya asked, “What of a name that was never written at all?” The water’s navel deepened again. The voice came: “The weight of a name never written is greater than that of all written names. Put its stone first.” The children looked at one another. The meaning of the stone beside the stump inscribed “The one whose name was not found” had now received recognition from the pond.

Meera asked, “What if bodily humiliation is attached to a name and the family does not want it made public?” The Panidubbi answered, “Protect the name; do not make an exhibition of suffering. Water sees the face, but without permission it does not bring the image to the bank.” Meera took a long breath. The oath of privacy had become a law of the river.

Devika asked, “How does the name of someone who died in a screen come into the water?” No one could tell whether the Panidubbi laughed or the water merely trembled. The voice came: “A screen too is a copy of water—a shining surface, darkness within. A mind that drowned in that shine raises bubbles here as well.” Ujjwal’s mother covered her mouth with the end of her sari.

Then something strange happened. The image of the false donation page created in Chandrapal Batra’s tribute app opened by itself on Gop’s phone. Gop startled, then immediately tilted the phone toward the water. The screen’s lie broke apart the moment it fell across the pond’s surface. The letters turned backward, the names separated, and the accounts began fleeing like black fish. The Panidubbi said, “Water does not keep the accounts of those who earn from names; mud keeps those accounts.”

This time Satyavrat Mehta took out his ink pen but did not write. He laid the pen on the pond bank. The children understood: testimony would rise first from the water and only then go onto paper. Law has no right to climb upon memory and sit above it; it must learn the humility of walking behind memory.

After this testimony, the reading of names began again. With every blurred name, the water gave one sign or another—a bubble, a leaf, the tremor of a fish, a broken reflection of the moon, damp earth along the bank, the wing of a distant egret. The children recorded each sign in the register. The register was now an archive not only of letters but also of nature’s replies.

When the night grew deep, the Panidubbi’s voice rose one last time: “Do not merely save a name; save its play as well. A name that gives up play becomes a memorial. A name that plays kabaddi remains breath.” At this the children suddenly became alert. Kabaddi! Since the felling of Channa Grove, the game had remained incomplete for many days. Why was the Panidubbi herself speaking of the game?

Budhba’s ghost came out from the reeds and for a moment became clearly visible. Softly he said, “Where breath is held and a name is called, testimony remains alive. If kabaddi stops, the watch over names will grow old.” Having said this, he turned to smoke again. The brightness of the next game returned to the children’s eyes.

A few outsiders standing on the bank, men connected with the brokers of the heritage project, heard all of this and whispered among themselves. A new idea immediately entered their heads: if people wanted to see real ghost kabaddi, tickets could be sold. If the tale of the Panidubbi could be sold, it could be staged. The market of memory began sharpening its claws again.

The next morning new posters were found pasted on the village walls: “Channa Grove Ghost-Kabaddi Festival: An Astonishing Folk Experience—Light, Sound, Performance, Panidubbi Spectacle.” In small letters at the bottom stood a company’s name, and behind it the smell of Chandrapal’s people. Ananya read the poster and remained silent. The smell of its fresh paste was still in the air—the smell of the city trying to climb over the earthy scent of the village morning. Then she looked toward the pond. The surface was perfectly still, but somewhere within it a deep darkness seemed to be smiling.

Thus the Panidubbi’s testimony did not end. Instead, it opened the next danger: memory saved by water was now something the market wished to turn into performance. And the kabaddi of Channa Grove, which was the truth of breath, was being prepared for conversion into a procession of false ghosts.

FOLK SONG: NAMES IN THE PANIDUBBI’S TANGLED HAIR

Folk tune: pond song

Save them, save the names from theatre;

Do not sell the breath of memory in smoke and light.

Blurred above, names lay bound in the tangled hair below;

As the tongue faltered, the pond spoke its testimony.

Paper can erase, water does not forget;

In the depths the letters live and move like fish.

But the market heard—and suffering would become a stage;

At the Ghost-Kabaddi Festival, tickets would be sold again.

The Panidubbi said—my weeping is not performance;

The fear of the dead is not a spectacle for your profit.

The pond saved the names; now save them from theatre.

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE RED-HOT IRON BALL: In the blacksmith's furnace an iron ball glowed red. A new pupil declared, "Where there is fire there is smoke; therefore smoke will rise from this ball." The teacher let him watch for a while.]

CHAPTER 71

Procession of the False Ghost

In a procession of false ghosts, even the smoke comes on hire, while the real grove laughs.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: RECOGNISE THE REAL GHOST

Folk tune: satirical jhumar

Recognise it, friend, recognise the real ghost;

Count who stands behind the hired dance.

A hired ghost can dance and spread plenty of smoke;

Real fear flees only when the lamp of reason is lit.

Understand the tricks of disguise, rumour and counterfeit miracles;

Choose the path of truth with evidence, questions and laughter.

Society fears ignorance more than ghosts;

When the drum of knowledge sounds, the false shadow runs away.

Greed and deceit are the real ghost: call them by name;

With the bright laughter of satire, bring down the market of fear.

Smoke rises, the drum thumps, the false disguise is heavy;

Once the lamp of reason burns, every shadow flees.

Greed, deceit and rumour are the real ghost's name;

Beat the drum of laughter and auction off the market of fear.

The smell of fresh paste on the poster had not yet dried when preparations for the festival reached the village. On the second day after the submarine's testimony, a new vehicle arrived in Garh Narikel. Across its body, in glittering letters, was written: "Channa Grove Night Experience: Ghost-Kabaddi Procession." Beneath the words was a picture of rising smoke, half-transparent human figures, the cut stump behind them, lamps in front, and a small sentence in one corner: "A unique fusion of fear, heritage and entertainment." What had trembled on local lips here as names was becoming an “experience” in outsiders’ advertising.

A young man got down first, an identity card around his neck and a folded document in his hand. Showing a municipal permit, he said, “This programme will increase local employment, tourism and awareness of memory.” Behind him came boxes of make-up, canisters of artificial smoke, drums, lights, black-and-white costumes and five performers. Two were unemployed young men from the village, one came from a theatre troupe, one was a dance instructor from the city, and one was a boy who had never even seen Channa Grove at night.

Ananya watched from a distance, the register in her hand. She said nothing. Ira asked, “Should we stop them?” Ananya shook her head. “First we will watch. Whatever is false must also provide its evidence.” Gangesha’s question from the previous chapter had settled into the children’s speech. They now played by saying “perception,” “inference,” “testimony,” but this was no longer mere play; these were becoming tools of defence.

By afternoon a small square bamboo stage had been built around the stump. A line of lime was drawn on the ground: spectators on this side, performers on that. The exposed roots were placed at the rear and rigged to receive blue light. Roots once soaked in people’s tears were now being turned into a backdrop. Very softly Devika said, “What we call a wound, they call decoration.”

Meera stopped the organiser and asked, “When you refer to the dead in this procession, have you taken permission from their families?” The organiser smiled first, then looked startled. This question had not been in his training. “We won’t take names,” he said. “We’ll only create an atmosphere.” Meera replied, “Whose atmosphere? To create an atmosphere from the pain of people who drowned, were cheated and were silenced, without their names—this is a new method of theft.”

As evening fell, slips resembling tickets were distributed. Those who sat inside would receive the “special experience.” Some village youths went in out of curiosity. A few outsiders came with cameras. The children took no tickets; they sat on the other side of the stump beside the ring of stones bearing names. Ananya opened the register. On the page she wrote: “Today: direct examination of false ghosts.”

The programme began. Smoke rose. A slow beat sounded on the drum. The beat was hollow, like a hand striking an empty granary; it did not contain the pulse that lived in the breath of the real game. Wrapped in black cloth, their bodies smeared with lime-like paint, the performers began to twist and shuffle like half-naked ghosts. One dropped to his knees and said “kabaddi-kabaddi,” but his breath broke halfway through. Another laughed. The organiser signalled with his hand: “Stay serious.” Some spectators were thrilled, some embarrassed, some sat in sadness.

In the real kabaddi of the ghosts, breath was a rope. When a player came down to earth chanting “kabaddi,” the voice seemed to emerge not merely from inside the body but from among many invisible names. In this false game there was a word, but no breath; shouting, but no summons; smoke, but no smell of water; lime, but none of the trembling between death and release. The children kept noting the signs one by one: “Breath broke.” “No names.” “The soil did not answer.”

Then a performer behind the stage, cast as a ghost, suddenly froze. His foot had landed on a line of exposed root from the stump. The line seemed invisibly warm. Instead of his rehearsed dialogue, his own father's name came out of his mouth. Everyone startled. His father was not from this village; he had been a labourer killed in a mine in a distant district. The organiser ran over: “Don't go off script!” But the performer began to cry.

His sobbing cut through the procession's artificial smoke. The spectators who had come to see fear suddenly found real grief standing before them. The children wrote in the register: “An unknown truth emerged from inside a lie.” Ananya went to the performer. “Say the whole name,” she said. Trembling, he did. That name was not in the original record of Channa Grove. The children asked for a stone. The first letter of the name was inscribed on it.

After this, the discipline of the false procession collapsed. Another performer said his mother's name had disappeared from the widow-pension list. A third said his uncle's body had been held at a city hospital until the bill was paid. The dance instructor said he had come to earn wages by playing a ghost, but had never spoken the name of his own beloved for fear of society. Acting on the stage slowly turned into testimony.

The organiser panicked. He ordered the smoke shut off. The lights were made brighter. The drum stopped. But the voices did not. People seated among the spectators began saying, “In our house too...” “My brother's name...” “My husband's papers...” “My daughter...” A programme designed to sell fear by ticket became, without tickets, a hearing of names.

And where were the real ghosts amid all this? Would they have stopped the game, or begun to dance? No one saw them. But Ba later said that the real ghosts had been sitting that night at the water's edge, knees drawn up, chins resting upon them, silently watching. They were not angry. Perhaps they were watching human beings, while becoming false ghosts, reach their own real dead.

Budhba's ghost appeared only once. He stood behind the boy wearing a false mask. The boy wanted to make a frightening "haaaah" sound, but his voice changed into "Present." He frightened himself. Silence filled the spectators. The children answered at once: "Present." Sweat began to run from the eyes of the false mask. The boy took it off.

At that moment Gangesha's logic descended once more around the stump. Perception: the performer was visible. Inference: smoke and costume created the appearance of a ghost. Verbal testimony: the advertisement called it "ghost-kabaddi." But when the fourth edge of evidence—the witness of suffering—awoke, every lie withdrew. The children gave the conclusion in their own language: "A ghost is not one that frightens; a ghost is one that wanders because it was never given a name."

Devika told the organiser, "Now return the money taken for this programme." He said, "Permissions, taxes, expenses—" Meera cut him off. "Under which account is the tax on selling the fear of the dead deposited?" People's eyes turned toward him. For the first time the organiser understood that the crowd was no longer a set of customers; it had become a community. Without further argument he opened the box of ticket money. Refunds began.

But the story did not end there. Long after night deepened, the performers remained seated around the stump. No one drove them away. Ananya said, "You did work for a lie, but you spoke true names. Now learn not acting, but keeping watch." They lowered their heads. The false-ghost costumes were removed one by one and placed beside the stones. The black cloth no longer fluttered in the air; it had become heavy like wet cloth. The extinguished blue bulbs were still slightly warm; moths kept beating their heads uselessly against the glass.

There was an attempt to upload photographs from that night to Chandrapal's tribute app. The pictures opened, but the performers' faces appeared blurred while the names on the stones were sharp. In Raghav Signal's code the event was labelled "emotional risk." Broom's team reported: "Local resistance to experience design." But in the register of the children of Garh Narikel there was only one line: "The false procession changed into real names."

After midnight, when everyone was tired, a faint sound rose from inside the stump. It was neither weeping, nor wind, nor the rustle of leaves. At first everyone thought it an illusion. Then it came again—slightly sly, slightly affectionate, slightly full of mockery. The stump of Channa Grove laughed. The laughter was not like the rustling of leaves; it was as if old water had stirred somewhere within dry wood—slow, deep and faintly bitter.

Someone asked, “Did the tree laugh?” Ba replied, “Yes. When memory begins to be sold and yet survives, a tree laughs.” The children were not startled. They opened the next page. At the top they wrote: “The Laughter of Channa Grove.”

FOLK SONG: THE HIRED GHOST

Folk tune: satirical folk song

Go, hired ghost, go away;

*The real shadow will remain—the one whose grief it is will not endure
this.*

The smoke came on hire, the false ghost danced;

The real grove laughed slyly from within.

Fear, heritage, entertainment—three colours on one board;

The night's riverbank was dressed to sell the compassion of the dead.

The children stopped the spectacle, the names on the stones shone;

The market's procession choked in its own smoke.

The stump laughed—memory was to be sold, yet survived;

The voice of the roots spread into the ears of power and market.

Go, hired ghost; the real shadow will remain;

One who bears the grief of a name will not tolerate spectacle.

The children stopped the spectacle; the names on the stones shone.

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—DEVADATTA'S NIGHT MEAL:
Devadatta was stout, yet everyone in the village said that he ate nothing during the day. A person who never eats cannot remain well nourished; Devadatta is well nourished and does not eat by day; therefore he eats at another time. That night a friend stayed awake.]

CHAPTER 72

The Laughter of Channa Grove

The stump's laughter was not hollow—it was the voice of roots that had survived.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: FROM THE STUMP'S LAUGHTER TO A SHOOT

Folk tune: hariyarni song

*Green, O green, even the stump will grow green;
Trusting the laughing root, a shoot will return again.*

The stump laughed from within—the root is still alive;

At the first rain a new shoot will appear.

Do not abandon it by calling it hollow; give it moisture;

From the memory of the cut tree, give life to a new forest.

The stump's laughter is not mockery, but patience speaking sweetly;

Even after destruction, life finds a place for itself.

A shoot will break forth, leaves will stir, birds will return;

From the stump's laughter the whole grove will grow green again.

Whoever left it as hollow knew only half the truth;

A stream of sap flows within, though no one believed it.

Give moisture, give watch, water it with song;

Upon the chest of the cut tree, draw the picture of a new grove.

The heading written on the new page of the children's register—"The Laughter of Channa Grove"—began telling its own story by dawn. The laughter that had risen after the procession of false ghosts collapsed did not remain merely an incident of one night. Until morning it echoed like air trapped in a hollow inside the stump. At first people thought there must be some cavity in the cut root where the wind was catching. But even after the wind stopped, the fine vibration of laughter continued to spread around the stump. On the stones bearing names, the vibration seemed to rise as hair-thin lines across their surfaces.

In the first light of sunrise the children came to inspect the stones. The letters of some names had deepened; beside some incomplete names new dots had appeared. Ananya touched one dot with her finger. It was not warm, yet it felt alive. At her fingertip she felt at once the chill of morning dew and the dry roughness of stone, as though life and memorial had seated themselves upon the same surface. She said, "The tree did not laugh; the tree answered." Hearing this, Ba said softly, "Many times an answer comes not as weeping but as laughter. When pain is put up for sale, memory mocks the sale."

The municipal clerks were the first to become nervous. After their yellow notice, the place that had been classified for "beautification" was now being called "the laughing stump." A new note was added to the file: "Unscientific rumours are spreading at the site; crowd control is required." But what the file called rumour was settling in people's ears like evidence. Before the laughter of Channa Grove, official language seemed as helpless as a dry leaf issuing orders against a flood.

Gangesha's question returned once more. Ananya asked the children, "What is the proof of the laughter?" One boy said, "Perception, because we heard it." Another said, "Inference, because the letters on the stones changed." A third: "Testimony, because Ba said so." The fourth, a girl who rarely spoke, said, "When sorrow refuses to be sold, the sound that rises at that moment is evidence of justice." Everyone fell silent. No scripture contained this definition, yet around the stump it was accepted.

Saumya wanted to write down the answer, then stopped her hand. It was worthy of quotation in a research paper, but quoting it at that moment risked diminishing its dignity. She asked the girl, "Shall I write it?" The girl asked, "Will whoever reads it also listen?" Saumya could not answer. She closed her paper. In this village learning was slowly becoming larger than scholarship.

Chandrapal Batra's memorial app tried to capture the sound of the laughter. His team secretly installed equipment to upload whatever remained of the night's sound. But the recording yielded only emptiness. When people listened to that emptiness, each heard the name of a different offence. Chandrapal heard: "percentage." His assistant heard: "false tribute." A technician heard: "deleted list." The machine was silent, but the silence became an indictment.

Raghav "Signal" Somani began converting the incident into code. His message read: "laughter = crowd risk; narrative control required; ghost procession failed, emotional truth active." But when he typed "narrative control," the words changed by themselves into "narrative resistance." He erased them three times; three times the same words returned. The disappearing message did not disappear. Like the veins of a leaf, it remained fixed upon the screen.

Edward Broom's team called the laughter of Channa Grove "an acoustic marker of local resistance." One adviser said, "It can be used positively: community healing, memory tourism, a sound installation." Broom stood by the window listening. He thought someone had laughed somewhere far away. He turned—the room was empty. Then, within the applause from his Harvard lecture, he heard the same laughter, hollowing out the clapping from inside. He swallowed, and the coffee in his hand suddenly tasted of soil.

Meera put up a notice beside the stump: "No one owns the laughter. No one may sell the pain of the dead, the testimony of the living, or the sound of memory." Some asked, "Does laughter also have a right to privacy?" Meera said, "If selling an image of weeping is a crime, selling the meaning of laughter is also a crime. This laughter is not entertainment; it is refusal." From that day the sentence became a new rule of the watch over names.

By afternoon journalists arrived from outside. One asked, "Does the tree really laugh?" Ananya replied, "Do you really want the truth, or a spectacle?" The journalist smiled, but the question seemed to stop at his nose. He lowered the camera. Another journalist went to the children and asked, "What is the main story of this place?" A boy said, "There is no main story; there are many names. When you make one thing the main story, the rest get cut away."

After this answer, the journalists understood for the first time that Garh Narikel was not a news item but a test. Whoever wrote without listening would write a lie. Whoever wrote only the strange would write theft. Whoever wrote about the laughter without its cause would repeat the language of the market. That day many notebooks returned empty. An empty notebook was no longer shame; perhaps it was a beginning.

Batuknath Hariharan sat in his chamber hearing all this. He thought: if memory remains in the hands of children, how difficult it will be to place the stamp of law upon it. He reopened his draft for a "People's Memory Trust." At the top he wrote: "Preservation of Cultural Laughter." As soon as the words appeared, the ink spread. The first letter of "laughter" sat with its mouth open like a small crocodile. Batuknath put down his pen.

His mind said: give laughter a legal form; create a committee, appoint trustees, a secretary, obtain signatures, create a channel for funds. But another voice asked, "Do you know justice?" It was the same question the children had once asked him in Gangesha's name. Batuknath struck the table and stood. "How much have these children been taught!" he said. Yet inside he knew: the children had not merely been taught; they had listened. Knowledge acquired by listening can be harder than written law.

At the evening recitation of names, a stone for laughter was placed in the circle. It carried no name, only a round mark. Ba said, "This stone belongs to all that escaped being sold." Devika said, "And to all that is still in danger of being sold." The children placed it beside the nameless stone. Those present understood: first guard those who were never given a name; next guard those whom the market is trying to turn into merchandise.

In the mist of night kabaddi began again. This time both ghosts and children played, but there was less running and more breath. When the chant "kabaddi-kabaddi" rose, the laughter inside the stump joined it. When a player crossed the line, the foot seemed to fall not upon soil but upon a row of names. In the night's cold, the players' breath became little clouds of white vapour—this time not hired smoke, but the body's own. A player who returned before the breath broke was not said to have "survived"; they said, "He returned having listened."

An old ghost-player, one who for years had appeared only in darkness, became half-visible that night in moonlight. His body was not smoke but river mist. Teaching the children the game, he said, "In kabaddi breath is held, but in memory breath is shared. Whoever tries to win alone will be caught. Whoever returns carrying a name will save the game." The children wrote this rule on the next page.

The green point on the stump spread a little that night. Moonlight fell upon the tip of the shoot, and for a moment it seemed that the shoot was growing not toward the sky but toward people's ears. Channa Grove had been cut, yet its new green line was taking the shape of listening. Before becoming a leaf, it was becoming an ear.

All this increased the market's alarm. The false procession had failed; the laughter could not be sold; the sound could not be recorded; the journalists returned empty; the researcher stayed silent; the app was mute; the trust draft went wrong. Those who had come to trade in memory understood for the first time that here things became questions before they became objects. And the moment you put a price on a question, it slips away and starts travelling in people's mouths.

At midnight Batuknath Hariharan could not sleep. At last he bent over in his chair. The lamp was half burnt, the paper half written, the pen nib dry. As his eyes closed he saw the stump of Channa Grove—but the stump was not outside; it was growing inside his own chest. Around it sat not lawyers in black gowns but shadows of leaves. In the middle, the same laughter was circling in a ring.

Then a voice said, "Batuknath Hariharan, the first hearing of your trust will take place inside you." He tried to start awake, but in the dream his body was tied to the chair. From far away the children's voices rose: "Perception?" The stump answered, "Greed." "Inference?"—"Delay." "Testimony?"—"Justice." "Truth?"—laughter.

And inside that circle of laughter, Batuknath's dream court opened.

FOLK SONG: THE STUMP'S LAUGHTER

Folk tune: satirical jhumar

The stump laughs—not hollow, the root laughs;

What was taken for mockery now returns as justice.

The stump's laughter is not hollow, it is the voice of the surviving root;

Seals, stages and scholarship—all began to fear.

The stone moved, the paper trembled, though the air itself was still;

Laughter made a circle and opened the form within.

In Batuk's chest Channa Grove grew through the night;

Perception—greed; inference—the story of delay.

The word said justice; truth became laughter;

In the dream court the lawyer sat bound to his chair.

Hearing the stump's laughter, open your own chest and look.

CHAPTER 73

Batuknath's Dream Court

What he had taken for mockery all his life sits down in his dream and convenes a court.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: JUSTICE IN THE DREAM COURT

Folk tune: dream bhagait

*Let the court convene, let the dream court convene;
Give the widow, the child and the labourer the first seats.*

*The court convened in the dream, and everyone found a seat;
The widow, the child and the labourer were heard in full.
Conscience became the judge, the moon became the witness;
The verdict: honour for every name, respect for every life.*

*At dawn bring the law of the dream awake into the world;
Let office, court and village give everyone an equal hearing.
The dream court is not fantasy; today it shows a direction;
Turn the justice seen within the mind into social action.*

*Conscience became the justice, the moon became the witness;
Without bribe, without adjournment, the stream of justice ran.
At dawn fill your eyes with the rule of the dream;
Use that same measure in office, village and court.*

The circle of laughter that formed the threshold of the dream court had followed Batuknath since evening. The laughter of Channa Grove rang all night in Batuknath Hariharan's ears. At times it rose from the stump, at times from the corridors of a court, at times from inside the iron cupboard in his house. Everything he had spent a lifetime taking for ridicule—the poor man's weeping, the widow's petition, the labourer's waiting, the child's question—had joined into one laughter. Batuknath changed pillows, shut the window, drank water, but the fine thorn of laughter would not leave his ear.

He told himself it was all superstition. Give the villagers a few papers, a few trusts, a few committee members and a few donation receipts, and they would quiet down. He would give people's memory a legal form, appoint himself its chairman, open a fund in the name of preserving the dead, and bind this Channa Grove—wandering unruly in people's hands—with the rope of regulation. He sat at his desk and opened the draft: "Garh Narikel People's Memory Trust." Seeing the words, his old clever smile returned.

But the moment he wrote "trust," the ink burst and spread over the page. The letters became black ponds. Batuknath rubbed his eyes. The page on which he had written clause, sub-clause, chairman, secretary and treasurer slowly began turning into leaves. They were as fine, countless and startling as the subtle pages of the Tattvacintamani. On every leaf the same question shone: "Will you create a trust, or learn justice?"

At midnight Batuknath fell asleep. Between sleep and waking he entered a familiar hall—the great chamber of the Bar Council. A high chair, polished table, legal certificates on the wall, rows of advocates, and his own portrait at the rear. But when he tried to sit, the chair became a root. The polish peeled from the table and turned into the wet bark of Channa Grove's cut stump. The certificates became leaves and began to fall. The smell of varnish vanished from the hall; in its place came the bitter smell of wet bark and the mould of old paper.

In the centre of the hall stood a man—neither wholly old nor young; a hard light of reasoning on his face, compassion in his eyes, soil upon his feet. Batuknath tried to recognise him, but the name would not come to his lips. The man himself asked, "Have you learned to hear a name, or only a lineage?" Before Batuknath could answer, a vast book opened before him. The letters were minute, yet within their fineness seemed to rest the weight of twelve thousand pages. Someone whispered within the dream: "Gangesha."

At the sound of Gangesha's name, the hall stirred. Invisible scholars rose; some brought stools of caste, some opened genealogies, some displayed seals of scripture. Gangesha neither laughed nor grew angry. He simply lifted a small grain of dust in his palm and said, "Evidence exists even in this dust, if the eye is not covered by the curtain of lineage."

An old story began entering Batuknath's ears—the birth five years after his father's death, marriage to a woman of the leather-working community, the astonishing composition of the Tattvacintamani, the birth of Navya-Nyaya. In the dream these were no longer annotations in a book; they became embodied scenes. A woman whose hands carried the smell of leather-work stood unhesitatingly beside Gangesha. Behind her the caste order bared its teeth like a dog, but Gangesha did not release her hand.

Batuknath trembled. He had studied law, but this embodied form of justice was unbearable to him. He wanted to say, "Society too has its proprieties." Gangesha cut him off: "If propriety strangles truth, it is not propriety but fear wearing a sacred thread." At those words, all the certificates of honour hanging on the walls became smoke.

Then two shadows entered the dream—the name-shadows of Ramanath Jha and Udaychandra Jha "Ashok." They did not appear as embodied objects of accusation, but as stern editors of memory—pens in hand, a curtain of prestige behind them. They began drawing lines through the inconvenient parts of Gangesha's life: cut the marriage episode, soften the wound of caste, remove the word leather-worker woman, preserve the icon of Navya-Nyaya, suppress the rebellion of the life. The laughter of Channa Grove sounded again. The judge in the dream said, "In the language of this novel, this is an honour killing—not of the body, but of the truth of a life."

Batuknath saw that Gangesha's body had not been killed, yet the truth of his life had been buried under the proprieties of paper. The statue survived; the human being was cut away. Just as Batuknath, while winning cases about names in court, had often killed the human being within the name. He began to understand how often the brightest cloth of honour absorbs blood and makes it invisible.

Now the trial began in the dream court. Batuknath sat in the accused's chair, but his charge-sheet was unusual. Bribery, delay, defence of criminals, techniques of falsehood, misuse of profession—these were not written as separate counts. There was only one charge: "Turning justice into a profession and thereby turning the profession away from justice." He rose to defend himself. His old words came to his tongue—procedure, rights, representation, legal opportunity, lack of evidence. But each word, as soon as it left his mouth, became a dry leaf and fell. The crackle of falling leaves sounded through the hall like someone turning pages of an old file without reading them.

Gangesha asked, "Do you want evidence?" Batuknath felt relief. The language of evidence was his home. "Yes," he said, "there can be no justice without evidence." Then the floor of the court opened. From beneath it rose date after date, adjournment after adjournment, witnesses dying, victims' poverty, widows' sold jewellery, children's interrupted schooling, and the long waiting of old mothers. Gangesha said, "This is perception. What is your inference from it?"

Batuknath was silent. Gangesha said again, "Hear verbal testimony." Then voices rose one by one: the stump of Channa Grove, the submarine, the crying false ghost, the children who guarded names, Meera, Devika, Gop, Aruni, Ba, and Satyavrat Mehta's silence. They recited no sections of law. They said only: "We are present." Batuknath lowered his head.

To save himself he ran toward the old wall of caste. Suddenly a tall fence rose inside the dream court—Brahmin above, leather-worker below; scripture on one side, labour on the other. Batuknath climbed upon it seeking defence. But the leather-worker woman beside Gangesha reached out and pulled free a bamboo from the fence. The fence shook, then scattered across the whole court. She said, "Justice that fears the touch of a body is not justice; it is washed-and-bathed hypocrisy."

At those words, something broke inside Batuknath. For the first time he saw his own childhood: a separate drinking vessel kept near the well in the courtyard, a child seated outside the schoolroom, his father performing worship, and his mother's low voice—"We will not eat in that house." He understood that his advocacy had not begun in court; it had begun with that vessel at home, whose water was not equally available to everyone.

A girl entered the court—not Ananya, perhaps her shadow. Holding a stone bearing a name, she asked, "Hariharan ji, you want to create a trust. Will Gangesha's leather-worker wife have a place in it?" Batuknath did not answer. The girl asked again, "Will those who never received a name be given the first page?" Batuknath stayed silent. "Will those whose names were suppressed because of caste be treated as principal witnesses?" Batuknath's silence was no longer defence; it had become evidence of guilt.

Then a kabaddi line shone upon the court's ceiling. The ghosts did not enter; they stood at the boundary. Only Budhba's ghost said, "All your life you kept putting others out. Today hold your breath and cross justice's court once." Batuknath tried to say "kabaddi." The first syllable came out, but the rest did not. His breath caught. He fell.

Gangesha did not lift him. He said, "In justice, the work of rising must be done by oneself. But the first condition is this: step down from the throne of your lineage." Batuknath saw all the titles attached to his name—Senior, Chairman, Scholar, Patron—fall away one by one. In the end only "Batuk" remained, a frightened child. The child began to cry.

In the midst of that weeping he awoke. The first light of dawn was entering through the window. Batuknath's palm was wet with sweat and his mouth held the stale bitterness of night, as though he had returned after losing a case. The draft of the People's Memory Trust lay on the table. Astonishingly, its headings had changed. Where he had written "Chairman," the ink now read: "Not First Servant, but Last Listener." Where he had written "Fund," it said: "The watch over names remains in children's hands." Where he had written "Property," the words shone: "Memory is not for sale."

With trembling hands Batuknath folded the draft. His old cunning had not withered away, but for the first time a crack had appeared in it. He could have dismissed the dream as indigestion, fear or village madness. But Gangesha's question remained lodged in his ear: "Will you create a trust, or learn justice?"

That day Batuknath did not go to Channa Grove. He remained in his room and, for the first time, opened the cupboard in his office. Inside were old case files, fee receipts, adjournment notes and people's letters. Among them he found a small slip of paper: an old note bearing Chandrapal Batra's name. It contained only three words: "Memorial app secured." Batuknath understood—the court inside him was now leaving him and descending into the mind of the next guilty man.

That night, when the stump of Channa Grove laughed again, the laughter did not stop at Batuknath's house. It climbed an invisible wire and entered Chandrapal Batra's screen.

FOLK SONG: THE COURT THAT CONVENED IN A DREAM

Folk tune: dream viraha

The court convened, the dream court convened;

The laughter of those suppressed came asking to be recognised.

The widow's weeping, the poor man's plea, the child's question laughed;

All that Batuk had taken for mockery sat in the court.

Gangesha's question: will you create a trust, or learn justice?

Open the cupboard and recognise the old sins.

Adjournment notes, fee receipts, Chandrapal's slip;

"Memorial app secured"—a deceitful scrap.

Laughter climbed the wire and reached the next screen;

A new hearing began in the mind of the man of percentages.

The dream court does not leave the waking soul;

The laughter of the suppressed returns demanding recognition.

All that Batuk had taken for mockery sat upon the seats.

CHAPTER 74

Chandrapal's First Confession

The first confession is always made alone—the crowd applauds only later.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: A BEGINNING THROUGH CONFESSION

Folk tune: solitary song of hope

*Say it softly, say "I was wrong";
Take these words in the closed room as a seed of dawn.*

*The first confession is born quietly in a closed room;
As soon as "I was wrong" is spoken, the hard heart begins to soften.*

*Confession is not the end, only the first step toward repair;
Speak the true names, make proper restitution for the harm.*

*Fearless self-examination frees the mind;
Taking full responsibility for the wrong can awaken trust again.
A beginning through confession—the road may be long;
One honest step keeps the future from remaining dark.*

*As the hard chest softened, the first crack opened;
Through that crack slipped a thin ray of light.
Confession is not the destination, only the name of the first step;
Repair the harm, speak the names—only then is the work complete.*

"The turn of the man of percentages"—this unwritten notice in the stump's laughter had found its destination by morning. The night of Batuknath Hariharan's dream court had passed, but its dust had not settled on his head alone. The laughter that once rose from the stump of Channa Grove had travelled through the air. It had entered Delhi's files, Hong Kong's glass towers, Patna's offices, Meerut's falsehoods, and even Chandrapal Batra's mobile phone. At first Chandrapal thought it was ordinary anxiety; then he realised it was not anxiety at all, but an invisible finger writing names across the screen of his soul.

All his life Chandrapal Batra had avoided names. To him people were numbers—earnings per person, deception per click, extraction per fear, flow per account. He never wanted to know whose home, whose mother, whose roof, whose debt, whose beating heart stood behind a screen. He called them “the crowd”; once a person becomes a crowd, the face of the crime blurs. But there was no crowd now in Garh Narikel. There were stones bearing names, and every stone seemed to be looking at him.

That night Chandrapal sat alone in his room. On the glass table were three phones, two watches, a bottle of imported liquor and the fragrance of counterfeit calm. He opened a phone. The figures from the tribute app appeared again—how many viewed, how many clicked, how many donated, how many engaged, how many were frightened. His finger tried to move with its old cunning, but every line on the screen began turning into a name: “Ujjwal Jha”; “Munna Paswan”; “Saryu”; “the one who never received a name”; “the silence of the unmarried mother”; “the patient’s breath”; “the labourer’s feet.”

Chandrapal switched off the phone. The names continued to appear—on the surface of the glass table, inside the liquid in the bottle, between the hands of the watch, upon the windowpane. He opened the window. Outside was the city night—no river, no Channa Grove, no stump. Yet the city night too had a sound like water: a siren somewhere, a dog somewhere, a motor somewhere, the cough of a tired human being somewhere. Even in the cold air-conditioned room his temples throbbed with heat. For the first time he felt that a city too is made of names; only there the names are covered by advertising lights.

He held his head and sat. His crimes began returning to memory—but not all at once. A guilty soul does not suddenly see the whole truth; first it sees its own fear. Chandrapal feared that if every name recognised him, what would happen to his wealth? His passport? His contacts? His prestige? This was not confession, but self-preservation. Yet the first tremor of fear can sometimes be the first door to truth.

He told himself, “I never killed anyone.” The sentence had protected him for years. When someone was cheated, he said: I never touched them. When someone was frightened, he said: I was only a medium. When someone’s home was ruined, he said: business involves risk. When someone’s spirit broke, he said: that person was weak. That night the sentence split open. From inside came a voice: “If you did not touch them, who tied the rope of fear?”

A shiver ran through Chandrapal’s body. He went to the bathroom and looked at his face in the mirror. It was his face, but the eyes belonged to those he had called “users”: one eye Ujjwal’s, one a labourer’s, one a widow's, one a child's from the leatherworkers' quarter, one the woman's whose privacy had been sold, one the young man trapped in debt trying to save his father. The mirror became many-eyed. Chandrapal screamed.

There was no courage in that scream. It was the first terror of a man-eater discovering that the eyes of those he had devoured have remained inside his own body. Chandrapal sat down on the floor. Sweat ran from his nose. For the first time he did not think about how to manage papers, erase records or bring in a lawyer. He repeated only one sentence: "I did not see the names. I did not see the names."

By dawn, not through a clear decision but in a state broken by exhaustion, he set out for Garh Narikel. Chandrapal Batra, who normally worked through gleaming cars, security and distance, reached the cut stump of Channa Grove this time in an old car, without fanfare. His driver asked, "Sir, shall we get out?" Chandrapal did not answer. He sat in the car for a long time. Outside, the children were keeping watch over the names around the stump. Someone recognised him, but no one shouted.

That silence frightened him most. If people had cursed him, chased him or rushed to strike him, he could have invented a story about his own side. But here they watched, listened and waited. This waiting had none of the indifference of a court date; it had the patience of a seed in a field. Chandrapal stepped out of the car. His shoe touched the dust of the cut roots. The dust settled on the expensive leather. He bent instinctively to brush it away, then stopped his hand. In the village morning the air carried the smell of cow-dung-plastered courtyards and damp straw—a smell that had never appeared in any of his budget sheets.

That day Ananya raised her head from the register. "Will you read the names?" she asked. Chandrapal's throat was dry. His tongue tasted of iron, and his own voice sounded to him like someone else's. "I... I came to say something," he said. Ananya asked calmly, "In whose name?" Chandrapal did not understand. "My name is Chandrapal Batra." She asked again, "Your birth name, or your business name?" The question entered his chest like one of Gangesha's arguments.

In Chandrapal's mind flashed that room in Meerut where he had built a false dignity out of titles, contacts, qualifications and prestige. His true birth name had been left behind in a lane at home, in his mother's voice, his father's bitter labour and the dust of shame. Slowly he said, "Chandu." No one gasped. The children wrote in the register: "Chandu alias Chandrapal Batra—birth name spoken for the first time."

There was punishment in that writing. The expensive name of the guilty man broke and returned to the vulnerable name of his childhood. Chandrapal's eyes filled, but the tears were not yet trustworthy. Meera stood nearby. "Weeping is not evidence," she said. "Speak truth with the names.” Chandrapal lowered his head. He knew he could not yet tell the whole crime; he had not emerged from his fear. But what he could say was enough to open the first crack.

He said, “I did not treat people as people. Behind the screen I saw only a crowd. I turned fear into a product. I opened routes for donations through the names of the dead. A mother cried, and I turned her tears into data. A young man broke, and I called his breaking engagement. I did not personally hate anyone—and perhaps that is why it became the greatest crime. If I had hated them, I might at least have looked at their faces. I did not make the effort to see a face.”

The people listening remained silent. No one said “forgive him.” No one shouted “aren’t you ashamed?” Garh Narikel had moved beyond the old noise of accusation. Here a statement was heard in full and then its weight placed upon the stones of names. Devika asked, “What was earned through Ujjwal’s name?” Chandrapal trembled. He took a paper from his pocket. “The accounts are here,” he said.

Devika took the paper but did not read it immediately. She looked toward the ring of stones. “Accounts are not equal to names,” she said, “but without accounts the next struggle will remain incomplete.” To Chandrapal the sentence felt not like forgiveness but an order to work. He understood that the first day of confession was not the end of justice but its beginning. Money, routes, accomplices, documents, lies—everything would have to be exposed. Fear would bear fruit only if it became labour before the names.

Batuknath’s dream court, Gangesha’s question, the procession of false ghosts, the laughter of Channa Grove—all entered Chandrapal at that moment. He felt he was sitting not merely around a stump but before Navya-Nyaya as witness. Perception: he was a fraudster. Inference: he was part of a network. Testimony: he was called a businessman. Analogy: like a crocodile, he chewed through names. But the conclusion? The conclusion had yet to be written.

At evening he remained seated beside the stones. No one offered him food; no one sent him away. The children kept reading names. At each name his body bent a little further. After dark he suddenly took out his phone. He wanted to send a message to Raghav “Signal” Somani: “Stop. Things have changed.” He wrote, erased, then wrote again: “The names have risen.” He pressed Send.

The icon on the phone kept spinning. One dot, two dots, three. Then the screen said: “No connection.” Chandrapal stared. There was network here. Everyone else’s phones worked. He tried again. This time, instead of ordinary letters, a faint leaf-script appeared: “Where names are heard, code does not arrive.”

Chandrapal's hand went numb. Somewhere far away Raghav too must be looking at his device, he thought. A little air rose from inside the stump. Chandrapal understood: his confession would not remain limited to him. Raghav's turn was next, but in Raghav's world there would be no network now; only memory would operate.

The stump of Channa Grove fell silent again that night. But its silence carried a clear message: the first confession is not the end of punishment, only the latch of a door. Beyond that door sat Raghav Signal without a network.

FOLK SONG: THE FIRST CONFESSION

Folk tune: solitary song of sorrow

The door has opened, opened with one true word;

Confession is not the end of punishment—it is only the latch.

The first confession is not made in a crowd, but in a closed room;

As the letters are written, the hand trembles and the body weeps sweat.

Chandrapal saw his own share beyond the names;

He tried to send the code, but the screen said: connection lost.

Where names are heard, code no longer works;

Leaf-script slowly opens the lock within.

Confession is not the end of punishment, only the latch;

Beyond it Raghav, without a network, looks into his own chest.

One true word was spoken, and today the door opened;

Now the community of names will climb into the next mind.

As the letters are written, the hand trembles and the body weeps sweat.

Where names are heard, code does not work again.

CHAPTER 75

Raghav Signal Without a Network

*Surrounded by every kind of network and yet left alone, he understood:
a network is made not of wires, but of trust.*

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE NET OF TRUST

Folk tune: youth Jat-Jatin

Weave the net, weave the net of trust;

Hear the song of companionship like the pair Jat and Jatin.

Even with four bars of signal, companionship is still needed;

A network of trust completes the human chain.

A friend's phone, a family's ear, a help centre;

In crisis, one click can connect you to a safe centre.

Let the password be private, but the relationship stay open;

There is no shame in asking for help; it is an act of courage.

If the net of trust is strong, the fraudster's net will tear;

With one another beside us, the digital night can be crossed.

One knot of friendship, one cord of family;

One from a help centre—tie all three knots together.

To cast off shame and reach out a hand is a sign of courage;

The fraudster's net tears where voices are joined.

Beyond that door—in a glass room in the city—sat Raghav, who possessed everything except reach. For the first time in his life, Raghav “Signal” Somani felt that the greatest deprivation in the world was not money, power, access or cunning, but network. All day he stared at his phone. Four bars showed. Data moved. Message icons turned green. Yet whatever he sent reached no one. The phone said “sent”; his mind said “not delivered.” That lie between the two clung to him like dust on the cut stump of Channa Grove.

He was never truly a man of technology; he was a broker of fear. His art lay in never writing the whole truth, never speaking the whole lie, and leaving between the two a signal that allowed every criminal to think him one of their own. He lived in disappearing messages, vanishing rooms, half-spoken voices, half-read contracts and the smoke of percentages. But now the art of vanishing had turned against him. The messages were not disappearing; they were not even being born.

News of Chandrapal's first confession had reached him in the night—not by phone, not through a person, but through unease. When someone sees the first crack in his own crime, the tremor travels far through a criminal network. Raghav thought: “Chandrapal is breaking. Batuknath has been shaken from within. Broom is cautious. Lau Kin-Hung is silent. At a time like this, messages must be sent.” But every signal he tried to send snagged on an invisible thorn.

The first message went to Batuknath Hariharan: “Stop the trust proposal immediately. The children are out of control.” As soon as he sent it, two grey ticks appeared, but never turned blue. The second message went to Chandrapal: “Do not make the confession public. Change the narrative.” That too stalled. The third went to Broom's aide: “The ghost-procession incident is not weak; it is dangerous.” That too stalled. Finally, to Lau Kin-Hung's secure address he sent only two words: “Names spreading.” The phone trembled, then went still.

Raghav tried to laugh. He was alone in his room. Around him were expensive curtains, soundproof walls, an imported clock, a glass table and an air purifier. Outside, the city's traffic roared; inside there was only the machine's low hum. The hum was like a fly trapped inside a closed vessel—almost nothing to hear, yet impossible to remove from the ear. He thought there must be a service outage. He picked up a second phone. Then a third. Then a small old device kept only for emergencies. All showed the same condition: full network, zero reach.

Then he remembered the procession of false ghosts at Channa Grove. His report had called it “emotional risk.” But the real risk had not been emotion. The risk was that people were abandoning the language of signals and returning to the language of names. A criminal network runs on signals; society runs on names. The more secret the signal, the more useful. The clearer the name, the freer it becomes. For the first time Raghav understood that Channa Grove was not attacking his profession; it was attacking the language of his existence.

The night grew deep. He switched off his phone. But in the black screen of the dead phone he saw not his face but the roots of the cut stump. Raghav jerked upright. The screen was black again. He rubbed his eyes. Then movement appeared in the glass—leaves were sprouting one by one. On them were not words but names. Ujjwal. Saryu. Munna. The incomplete name of a labourer. The name of a woman removed from a pension list. The name of a body held in a hospital corridor. The name of the first young man deceived by Chandrapal. Names became leaves until the screen was full. Beneath his fingers, smooth glass suddenly felt as rough as bark—the touch of a tree in a polished device.

He tried in fear to throw the phone away, but it clung to his palm. For years he had held other people's lives as data; today the names were holding his hand. A voice came from inside the phone: "Before sending a message, you used to choose the recipient. Now the names will choose their recipients." Raghav's throat dried. He rose to drink water, but circular ripples were moving across the glass, as if someone far away beside the stump of Channa Grove were throwing pebbles.

He took out his old notebook. Very few people knew that even while living inside digital networks, Raghav kept his private accounts on paper. Paper felt trustworthy to him because it did not make copies of itself automatically. He opened the notebook—code names, dates, percentages, brokerage, donations, tributes, advice, trusts, consultations. Every line was a blow of profit. But as he read, the word "percentage" on each line began changing into "pledge." What had been a share of money became the burden of a promise.

At that exact time, children were keeping night watch at Channa Grove. Ananya said, "Tonight signals will be stopped." A boy asked, "How can a signal be stopped?" Ananya placed her hand on the green point of the stump. "The path of any language that refuses to take names will be blocked." The children sat in a circle and began the breath of kabaddi—slow, long and unbroken. They did not chant "kabaddi-kabaddi." They kept saying, "Present-present."

No instrument could prove whether the rhythm of "present" reached the city. But at that moment Raghav's phone vibrated. A message appeared. Sender: Unknown. Subject: Present. Inside there was only blank space. Raghav kept reading the blank. Within it he heard many of his own sentences: "I am only a messenger." "I did nothing." "I advised; I did not order." "It wasn't profit, only a fee." Each sentence broke apart as soon as it entered the blank space.

He immediately began typing a reply: "Please identify yourself." The phone wrote: "It is you who need identification." He erased it. Then he wrote: "This is an unlawful intrusion." The phone wrote: "The intrusion was what you did in the house of names." He trembled. Technology was no longer under his control. Language itself had begun to testify against him.

A dog barked outside. The curtain moved. Suddenly the air-conditioned room filled with the smell of wet soil. Raghav understood: the stump of Channa Grove, which he had treated as a limited village problem, had entered his glass room in the city. He would not be able to stop it, because the stump had entered not through the door but through silence.

He told himself, “The criminals are becoming emotional. I must remain steady.” He sat at the table, removed every phone battery, unplugged the wires and opened the window. Night air came through the curtain. Far away, among the city’s thousand lights, he saw a dark shape—neither tree nor tower, but something between the two. It seemed that all the network towers of the city had become cut branches of Channa Grove. Every wire was searching for a root.

That night for the first time Raghav began to think without writing. If a message cannot go out, what does a human being hear within himself? If no reply comes, whom can he blame? If the means of disappearing stop working, where can the face of a crime hide? The questions circled inside him like a kabaddi player holding his breath and running through his chest.

At Channa Grove, Budhba’s ghost was sitting quietly beside the children’s circle. He said softly, “A network breaks where a lie asks for passage.” One child asked, “And the network of truth?” Budhba’s ghost smiled. “Truth does not need a network. It needs relationships.” Ananya wrote the sentence in the register.

Just before dawn, all of Raghav’s phones lit up at once. He thought the messages had finally gone through. But there were no replies on the screens, only a map. Garh Narikel, Channa Grove, the stump, the river, the bridge, the hospital, the court, the tribute app, the stage of the ghost procession and his city room were all joined by a single line. Above the line were the words: “Network of Memory.” Raghav tried to close it. The map would not close.

A new point flashed on the map: “Lau Kin-Hung.” Raghav’s heart lurched. The name he had always protected had lit up by itself. He understood that this was not merely a hallucination on a phone. The most distant link in the criminal network was now entering the circle of the watch over names.

Raghav rose from the chair and went to the window. The pale light before sunrise was spreading across the city’s smoke. Along with the smell of burnt diesel, the morning air carried the scent of some faraway wet tree—city and village in one breath. Softly, without phone, code or signal, he spoke the full name for the first time: “Lau Kin-Hung.” As the words left his mouth, the room grew lighter, but his body grew heavy. Speaking a name was not liberation; it was the first frightening step toward it.

At that very moment in Channa Grove, Ananya closed the register and said, “Today a distant name moved.” The children asked, “What now?” Ananya looked at the green point on the stump. During the night it had lengthened a little. She said, “Now not a network, but a road will open.”

FOLK SONG: THE NETWORK OF TRUST

Folk tune: youth viraha

*Let trust remain—let the wired network break, trust remain;
The one who speaks a true name will flow all the way to the soil.*

*Four bars on the phone, yet no message anywhere;
Every network running, but not a thread of trust remained.
Without signals, Raghav spoke the name for the first time;
As “Lau Kin-Hung” was uttered, the room grew light.
The body heavy, the tongue empty, a step of fear arose;*

Speaking the name was not liberation—the road toward liberation opened.

Garh Narikel said: a distant name has moved;

No network now—the road will open.

*Let the wired network break; let the network of trust remain;
One who speaks a true name will one day flow all the way to the soil.*

CHAPTER 76

Lau Kin-Hung's Journey to India

Even one who crosses the sea comes ashore at the same ghat where the water bearing his name stands waiting.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: COMPANIONSHIP ACROSS THE SEA

Folk tune: traveller's song

Come, traveller, come across the sea;

Carry the speech of home in your chest and let the world's knowledge burn bright.

*The traveller across the sea looks upon the same moon;
He keeps the name of home and his mother's speech within his heart.*

*Make companions in a distant country, practise verification;
Let migrants know their rights too, and share the love of common safety.*

*Language may differ, law may differ, human dignity is equal;
Trust joined with caution—there lies well-being.*

*Companionship across the sea builds a bridge over distance;
The scent of home and the knowledge of the world can flourish
together.*

*In every lane abroad, keep a companion for verification;
Carry the book of rights at your side, the lamp of caution in hand.
Language different, rules different, human beings equally human;
Build the bridge of companionship, and distance will admit defeat.*

The shadow that had turned its face toward Mithila was now beginning to take bodily form. Raghav Signal's night without a network travelled all the way to Lau Kin-Hung's city. The message did not arrive, but news of its failure to arrive did. Seated on the twenty-second floor of a vast glass building, Lau kept looking at small images of Garh Narikel spread across the screens before him—the cut Channa Grove, stones bearing names around the stump, the children's register, the failure of the false-ghost procession, and Chandrapal's blurred face. The screens held pictures and data, yet for the first time Lau felt that the data were silent while the pictures were watching him.

His office opened toward the sea. Below moved lines of ships, lights, cargo, insurance, contracts, loans, medicines, tools, labour, organs, data—all parts of the world's currents. Lau took pride in those currents. To him the world was not a map but a route; human beings not faces but numbers; countries not borders but opportunities. But the stump of Garh Narikel was appearing on his map not as a profitable point but as a stubborn black stain.

His advisers came that night. One said, "It is local emotional resistance; it will settle with time." Another said, "Increase donations to the heritage project; acquire a local institution." A third said, "Offer to secure the records of names digitally; then control will come into our hands." Lau listened but gave no answer. He was beginning to understand that the problem was neither merely emotional nor merely linguistic. The problem was that in that village the names had learned how to remain alive.

When he slept that night, a long river came in a dream. Crocodiles swam in the water. They were not chewing bodies; they were chewing papers, contracts, confidential annexures, donation deeds, pages of undeclared accounts and reports by foreign advisers. Lau tried to run, but his feet were sinking not into the glass floor but into mud. One crocodile opened its mouth and asked, "In which water is your name written?" Lau woke. Sweat lay on his forehead, though the air-conditioner was running and the sea glittered far away.

By morning he decided to travel to India. Publicly the journey was described as a review of "cultural and rehabilitation investment." Privately it was an inquiry into Raghav's broken network, Chandrapal's cracked confession, Batuknath's dream court and Edward Broom's failed donation. In truth—though Lau did not admit it even to himself—it was the pull of a knot hanging in his own mind.

Before departure, a folder was placed upon his desk. Its title was: "Garh Narikel: Risk and Opportunity." Inside were lists of names, family conditions, political connections, local caste lines, religious places, the bridge project, heritage beautification, legal routes and possible resistance. Lau turned the pages. Suddenly his eyes stopped on one word: "Gangesha." The note read: "Local philosophical symbol; Navya-Nyaya; caste controversy; use in memory politics." Lau tried to smile, but the smile stopped midway. He thought: even a philosopher has now entered the risk table.

On the aircraft he was given a first-class corner seat. He sat by the window. The city's glass towers, the sea, bridges, harbour and ships grew small. As the aircraft entered the clouds, for one moment it seemed to him that rising above the earth was easy. Pressure changed inside his ears; a fine whistle sounded and fell silent—like a referee's whistle somewhere far away. The rich, companies, criminal networks, capital—all live inside the illusion that height makes sin look small. But once the aircraft steadied among the clouds, Lau heard from afar the chant “kabaddi-kabaddi.”

He covered his ears. The sound did not stop. The passengers were quiet inside the aircraft. An attendant was serving drinks. The route shone on the screen. But the chant remained—breath held, rhythmic, stubborn. Lau felt as though a child were running along the wing. He closed his eyes. In darkness he saw the cut stump of Channa Grove, the green point and the ring of stones.

For the first time he remembered his childhood, a memory he had long ago removed from the accounts of his life: a small harbour, damp lanes, his father's little shop, the smell of fish, fear of debt, and one day his father's bent back before a wealthy trader. Lau had thought: one day I will not bend; everyone will bend before me. He had never thought that the revenge for bending could become a business of erasing other people's names.

An elderly Indian passenger beside him was reading a Maithili newspaper. Lau did not understand Maithili, but the letters looked to him like waves on water. The old man glanced at him and tried to speak English, then stopped himself, smiled and showed him one corner of the paper. There was a small item: “Festival of Names in Garh Narikel.” Lau could not read the words, but in the photograph he saw children around a stump. Without thinking, he asked, “This place?” The old man said, “The names of the dead live there.”

Something cold moved inside Lau. He wanted to say, “Names can live on a server too.” But in the old man's eyes the sentence would have sounded ridiculous. The old man said again, “And if the server shuts down?” Lau startled. Had his thought been read? The old man folded the newspaper. “Paper too can burn,” he said. “But once children have heard a name, its second life begins.”

During the journey Lau fell asleep. This time he was not inside an aircraft but walking within the stump of Channa Grove. The passage inside was circular, damp and filled with countless lines. On every line was an argument, behind every argument a life, behind every life an exclusion. A voice in the distance asked, “Would you like to see the evidence?” Lau turned. A figure stood there, neither old nor young, neither scholar nor ghost, holding a jewel-like light in one hand. It gave no name, yet Lau understood that this was Gangesha's question.

The figure asked, "What is the evidence of profit?" Lau said, "Numbers." The figure asked, "What is the evidence of numbers?" Lau said, "Accounts." The figure asked, "What is the evidence of accounts?" Lau fell silent. The figure said, "How will you count the loss of one who has no name?" Lau searched for an answer, but on the walls of the passage thousands upon thousands of leaves opened. Like twelve thousand subtle lines of the Tattvacintamani, every line said: without justice, the counting of names is blind.

Lau awoke. The aircraft had entered Indian airspace. The captain's voice sounded. Through gaps in the clouds below, a web of rivers was visible. For the first time India did not look to him like a market, but like a vast memory written in lines of water. He wondered: how has this country survived after losing so many times? Perhaps because names are never completely destroyed here. They return in people's stories, caste, sin, resistance, gods, abuse, songs, graves, ghats, marriages, exclusions, justice and injustice—in one form or another.

Before landing in Delhi, his aide sent a message: "There will be press questions on arrival; please use the words rehabilitation, donation, partnership, sustainability and culture." Lau read it. Each word felt like a polished stone that could sink into water yet never reach the roots. He did not reply. He wrote only: "I will go to Garh Narikel." The aide immediately responded: "Capital meetings first." Lau switched off the screen.

The aircraft landed. The instant the wheels touched the runway, Lau heard the "kabaddi" chant again. This time it was not far away; it was beneath his feet. As though the runway were a line in a game, and the aircraft a raider that had crossed it. Lau involuntarily held his breath. He laughed—at himself, at his fear. But the laugh stuck in his throat.

Walking through the glass corridor of the airport, he saw his reflection. At first it showed a disciplined, cold face in a suit. Then the light changed. In the reflection his eyes were no longer his. He blinked and saw, within the glass, the long body of a crocodile. Its mouth was closed, its eyes open. It was neither eating him nor frightening him. It was simply watching, as though asking: "Have you brought a name with you, or only nameless profit?"

At immigration, the officer turned over his passport and read the name: Lau Kin-Hung. A stamp came down. On paper, entry had been granted. But Lau felt that his real entry into India had not yet happened. It would happen on the day the children of Garh Narikel asked him: "What is the evidence of your name? Whose blood lies within your profit? Whom does the memory you came to buy belong to?"

Outside, the media were waiting. Flashes burst. His aides advanced with rehearsed smiles. But Lau's eyes stayed on the crocodile caught in the glass. The creature inside the glass moved slowly as if swimming without water. In that moment he understood: Garh Narikel was not the destination of his journey; it was the doorway to a hearing within him.

He stepped out of the airport. Hot air, dust, the smell of fuel, tea, sweat, announcements, taxi drivers' calls—all surrounded him at once. The cool glass world broke. In the first breath, heat went down into his chest and the cloth of his suit clung to his body—the remembered cold of the twenty-second floor melted in a single moment. He told his interpreter, "Straight to Garh Narikel." The interpreter stared. "Today?" Lau replied, "The longer I delay, the crocodile will not blink."

The interpreter did not understand the sentence. But far behind them, in the airport glass, the crocodile's eye truly blinked.

FOLK SONG: THE TRAVELLER FROM ACROSS THE SEA

Folk tune: traveller's song

The feet search, the feet search for soil;

For one whose name is in the river, the road itself calls.

One from across the sea also lands at that same ghat;

Where the water bearing his name stands with eyes open.

From the glass twenty-second floor the village looked small;

In the hot dust of the airport, the empire melted.

The interpreter asked: will we go to the village today itself?

Lau said: if we delay, the crocodile will not blink.

The journey is not a destination, but the door of an inner hearing;

Wealth, country and passport all remained outside.

The feet from across the sea search for Mithila's soil;

For one whose name is in the river, the road speaks by itself.

The interpreter asked: shall we go to the village today itself?

“If we delay, the crocodile will not blink”—came the answer.

CHAPTER 77

The Crocodile at the Airport

The city's light is sold in the airport glass, but the crocodile's eye can be seen for free.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: CLEAN GLASS, CLEAR EYES

Folk tune: city dawn-song

Awake, O city, wipe the glass and awake;

Keep the heart transparent along with the pane.

*Let the glass walls shine and the mind within be clean;
Not the crocodile's eye, but compassion's gaze be forgiven and seen.
Let profit's glass be transparent, let labour's names appear;
Let the city's brightness never hide the village's right.*

*Open the window, let the wind come, let the people read the accounts;
Let institutions see their own deeds in the mirror and learn.
Clean glass, clear eyes—let the city stand by this rule;
Let the bright light of human dignity remain immortal.*

*However high the towers rise, labour's name lies in the root;
Let the window of accounts stay open for ordinary people to read.
Not the crocodile's cold stare, but compassion's morning gaze;
Let the city's creation shine while guarding the village's rights.*

The first step through the door opened by that blinking crocodile's eye lay inside the airport itself. Lau Kin-Hung's plane landed between night and dawn. City lights spread across the airport glass as though the sky had sold all its stars and put up advertisements on earth. People streamed out of the aircraft's belly—some tired, some excited, some pulling passports from bags, some watching their next message on a phone screen. Lau Kin-Hung came out last. His stride had the restraint of a businessman, but inwardly his mind had remained suspended since the moment he had dreamed of the cut stump in Channa Grove inside a glass tower in Hong Kong.

The instant he set his first foot on Indian soil, he caught a smell—spices, diesel, dampness, sweat, wet cloth, and from somewhere far away, earth. It cut through the airport's chilled air and entered him. Lau wrinkled his nose, treating it as a "local inconvenience," but his mind immediately said: there are names in this smell. The country he had viewed only as tables, markets, risks, labour costs and litigation management made its first direct appearance through his nose.

There was a long queue in the arrivals hall. Announcements echoed back from the high ceiling as though words had forgotten their sentences. Face-matching lights flashed at the digital gate. Lau's passport, investor identification and special permissions were all in order. He trusted that systems recognised the language of money. But when he stood before the glass frame, instead of a green beam the machine cast a blue-yellow flicker across his face. For a few moments, a crocodile's eye appeared on the screen in place of his face—still, wet, ancient, illiterate, yet seeing everything.

The officer did not seem startled; perhaps he saw only a technical error on the screen. Smiling, he said, "Please look again." Lau faced the camera once more. This time his face matched, the stamp was given, and the gate opened. Yet as he passed the line of glass, he felt the crocodile's eye moving with him. Glass, floor, steel railing, duty-free showcases—everywhere, for a moment, that same eye flashed.

He told his assistant, "The machines in this country are not right." The assistant, who had already been staying in Delhi, replied softly, "The machines are fine, sir. Here, sometimes, reflections show more than expected." The sentence unsettled Lau. In his commercial world, reflection had no value; value lay in real assets, contracts, accounts, control, data, and ways of avoiding litigation. But in the world of Channa Grove, even a reflection could become a witness.

Inside the airport, enormous billboards glowed. One read: "New Future, New Habitat, Safe Life Beyond Earth." The picture showed shining domes, artificial gardens, a metallic river, and smiling children. Lau had once been an indirect investor in projects of that kind. He believed that the older, more indebted, polluted, litigious and memory-burdened Earth became, the more readily the future could be sold in the name of another planet. But in the glass of the billboard's gleaming dome, he again saw the crocodile's eye. It was as though Earth were saying: whoever wants to chew my body and flee will need names even on an imaginary nameless planet.

Lau's assistant led him to the special guest lounge. There was the smell of coffee, soft sofas, quiet music and a muted news screen. The news showed Channa Grove in Garh Narikel, the cut stump, the Festival of Names, the Procession of the False Ghost, and debate over the heritage project. He could not hear the words, but he watched the images.

Children were placing stones around the stump. In their eyes he saw no investment opportunity, only a strange obstruction.

He asked, "Were these children not removed?" The assistant said, "They can be removed, but once removed they spread to more places." Lau did not understand. In his experience, obstacles were removed—by buying, frightening, filing cases, promising employment, or altering data. But once memory reaches children's hands, from how many hands can it be removed? His business education had never taught that question.

A message from Batuknath Hariharan arrived in the lounge: "A route is available for containing local sentiment within a statutory trust." Chandrapal's message came: "The Tribute App framework is secure; only public-emotion management is needed." Raghav Signal sent a coded note: "New code active; risk emotional." Lau kept reading. All three messages said the same thing—memory could be made into an object again. Yet behind the letters on his screen, he saw crocodile teeth.

He filled a glass with water. It was perfectly clear, packaged and chilled. As he was about to drink, he saw river water in the bottom of the glass—thick, green-black, moving. He set it down. The assistant asked, "Are you unwell?" Lau said, "Does water in this country carry the past too?" The assistant remained silent. There was no commercial answer to that question.

After a while, the glass door opened. An elderly cleaner entered and silently began collecting empty cups. The edge of his dhoti was wet, as though he had crossed a river, although the airport floor was dry and gleaming. Lau watched him. The cleaner paused for a moment and said, "Sir, think of a name when you drink water, and the water will remain clean." Lau stared. The assistant was about to rebuke him, but the old man laughed and walked away.

Lau asked after him, "Who was that?" The assistant could not find the employee's name on his list. There was no entry in the lounge register either. The elderly man did not appear on the security camera. Only the water in the glass on the table rippled for a few moments. Lau felt the first clear fear enter him: here even nameless people could appear, yet not be in the record. And what was not in the record could still speak a sentence.

When he came out of the airport, a black car was waiting for him. A name was written on the driver's badge, but the instant the driver saw Lau, his eyes became still for a moment like the stones around the stump in Channa Grove. The driver asked, "Garh Narikel?" Lau started. Garh Narikel was not public on that day's itinerary. He was only supposed to meet advisers in Delhi, then attend a secret conference. The assistant immediately said, "No, the hotel first." Watching the rear-view mirror, the driver smiled. "Every road ends there in the end."

The car moved. Elevated roads, shining malls, advertisements, smoke, red lights, the edges of slums, Metro pillars and the airport wall fell behind. Lau kept looking through the glass. In every drain he saw the winding shadow of a river, at every turn a crocodile's tail, in every half-built structure the pier of the bridge beneath which workers' names had vanished. He told himself it was an illusion. But when an illusion repeats the same story again and again, does it not become evidence for an inference? The language of Gangesha's logic was entering him without his ever having studied it.

The hotel room was made of glass and marble. The instant his bare feet touched the floor, the marble's coldness climbed from heel to head—a chill not from beneath a river but from the absence of memory. There was less earth there, more comfort. Lau took off his shoes and stood by the window. City lights crawled below. They no longer seemed like phone signals; they looked like eyes shining in water. He drew the curtain. But a shadow formed upon it—a long crocodile, its mouth turned not toward the city but toward him.

He could not sleep that night. After a while, he dreamed he was again standing at the airport arrivals gate. There were no officers; the children from the stump sat in a row. Instead of a passport, he held a profit-and-loss account. Ananya asked, "Name?" He answered, "Lau Kin-Hung." The children said, "That is the market's name. Your real name?" He fell silent. Then the crocodile moved forward. Its teeth gleamed, but it did not spring upon his body. It began chewing the account. Page after page was eaten, and from each page rose the voice of a worker, a cheated young man, a nameless woman.

When he woke, the first grey line of dawn stood behind the glass. A message glowed on his phone. It was not from Satyavrat Mehta, nor from any assistant; it contained only one sentence: "If you want to hear the names, come." Below was a location—not a court, ministry or boardroom, only: "Empty waiting hall on the old airport road."

Lau tried to delete the message. His finger moved across the screen, but it would not disappear. He switched off the phone, and the sentence appeared on the glass window. He drew the curtain aside and saw the sentence written in the city's haze. He closed his eyes and heard it within. He understood: this was not an invitation but pursuing testimony.

By afternoon Lau Kin-Hung decided he would go. He told himself: I will go, see, bargain, take control. But beneath that decision trembled something else—perhaps for the first time he was going to meet someone who would put aside his wealth, nationality, passport and language and read only his name.

Thus the crocodile at the airport did not chew Lau's body; it stripped off the first skin of his sense of security. He had arrived in India as a businessman, but as he moved toward the waiting hall his shadow belonged to a man who could no longer flee his own reflection. In the next breath Satyavrat Mehta would be before him—without a weapon, without the thunder of office, carrying only the weight of names.

FOLK SONG: THE CROCODILE'S EYE IN THE GLASS

Folk tune: city lament

Speak, O eye, you do not lie;

One whose shadow is guilty—where can he live away from himself?

City light is sold upon walls of glass;

The crocodile's eye freely opens the state within.

A businessman stepped from the plane; his shadow became guilty;

The first skin of security slipped away in silence.

Not an invitation, but pursuing testimony came;

On the road to the waiting hall his own reflection tormented him.

Satyavrat would stand before him without weapon or office;

Only the weight of names, a cold river of silence.

However the glass may shine, the eye does not lie;

One whose shadow is guilty—where can he live away from himself?

City light may be sold across walls of glass;

The crocodile's eye freely opens the news within.

The first skin of security silently fell away;

On the road to the waiting hall he met his own reflection.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE BRIDGE OF SILENCE

Folk tune: silent couplet-song

Build the bridge, build it between two silences;

If there are no words, give time; remain seated together.

Two silences sat beside one another; the wind spoke between them;

Moist eyes and trembling palms opened the dialogue.

If there are no words, give time; hold the seat of companionship;

Across the bridge of silence, let trust take slow steps.

One silence may belong to guilt, another to a deep wound;

When patience to listen is found, both receive new water.

Across the bridge of silence the throat of truth begins to grow;

Only dialogue without pressure can join a relationship again.

One silence bears the weight of guilt, another a wound;

The trembling of the palms speaks the feeling within.

Tears of the eyes became a bridge, crossed little by little;

In a meeting without pressure, the door of truth opened.

The road opened by the message from the waiting hall led directly to Channa Grove. After seeing the crocodile's eye in the airport glass, Lau Kin-Hung did not sleep all night. In the five-star guesthouse room, the bed was soft as an ocean wave, the air-conditioning steady, and fruit, flowers, mineral water and scented towels stood on the table—everything arranged so faultlessly that it seemed there had never been any fault in the world. Yet in his ears the eye inside the glass kept scraping. It was not looking at him; it was counting him—how many bodies, how many accounts, how much commission, how much silence.

Lau Kin-Hung told his assistant he would meet no journalists. No investor dinner. No cultural tour. He wanted only to meet the man whose name had appeared repeatedly in Indian papers—Satyavrat Mehta. The assistant laughed. "He now appears less in the language of government office and more in the language of public listening." Lau Kin-Hung did not reply. A man without office always frightened him more, because office could be bought, but a debt of listening could not.

The meeting place was no one's office. Satyavrat Mehta did not summon him to a building in Delhi or to a roadside spot outside Garh Narikel, but to the cut stump in Channa Grove. Lau Kin-Hung's security team objected first. "Open place, crowd, emotional risk." A message came from Satyavrat: "If you want the meeting, come to the place of names. If you are afraid of names, there is no purpose in meeting."

By the time Lau Kin-Hung reached Channa Grove, evening was descending. The air held incense, cut wood, river-smell and the coolness of wet stone. The village name that had seemed to him merely a risk-zone in a file now stood before him as breathing earth. Names were written on stones around the stump. Some were complete, some incomplete, some only marks. For the first time he understood the sky-wide difference between anonymous property and anonymous dead—the first is concealed wrongdoing, the second a stolen existence.

Satyavrat Mehta was not sitting inside the circle but at one side of it. He had no government guard and no prepared argument. Only a register, an ink pen and an old bag. Lau Kin-Hung made the formal gesture of greeting. Satyavrat inclined his head but did not fold his hands. He said, "Sit." Nothing more.

Lau sat. He expected the questioning to begin—company, accounts, contracts, payments, donations, compliance. But Satyavrat remained silent. From behind the stump came the low voices of children. They were reading names. After each name, the crowd answered, "Present." The collective voice was neither loud nor soft—like the flames of many lamps moving slightly together. At first Lau Kin-Hung tried to understand the word in three senses—present, entered in the account, recorded. Then he realised this was not administrative attendance; it was the social rebirth of the dead.

For the first ten names Lau only listened. At the eleventh, his finger trembled. At the twelfth, sounds from a Hong Kong boardroom entered his ears—"project segment," "loss absorption," "human variable." At the thirteenth, he saw his company's table, in whose rows there were no people, only costs. At the fourteenth, a line inside the stump turned red. Lau blinked. The line was ordinary again. Satyavrat did not look at him; he only listened.

After a long time Lau spoke on his own. "Do you want to accuse me?" Satyavrat said calmly, "A court makes accusations. Names are read here." Lau asked again, "Do you want evidence?" Satyavrat rested a hand on the register. "Evidence has many forms. Gangesha speaks of perception, inference and testimony. But here there is also a fourth pain—not a line of scripture, but something that speaks through people's bodies. Whether you accept it as a document or not is your crisis."

At the name Gangesha, Lau's assistant tried to take notes. Satyavrat stopped him. "This is not a quotation; it is a question." Then for the first time he looked directly into Lau's eyes. "In your world, a name has value for opening an account. Here, a name has value for grief, justice and liberation. You counted profits. Count names once."

A strange emptiness opened inside Lau Kin-Hung. He felt he could count money, time, risk, countries, brokers, judicial delay, political protection, data and donations. But names? With every name came a house, a body, a breath, a loss, a surviving child, a restless spirit. Number broke apart. Calculation began to dissolve like lime in water.

The moon had risen. The shadow of the cut stump now assumed a strange form—neither tree, human nor animal. To Lau it looked like the open jaw of a crocodile. He made to rise in panic. Satyavrat said, "Remain seated. What appears does not vanish because you run from it." Lau sat again, but he could no longer keep his back straight.

The children's reading of names stopped. Ananya came forward. She held a small stone. Placing it before Lau, she asked, "Will you write your own name?" The assistant tried to intervene, but Lau raised a hand and stopped him. Lau said, "My name is already written." Ananya replied, "A name written on paper and a name written before one's own wrongdoing are not the same."

Lau picked up the stone. He was not given an ink pen but a small piece of charcoal. He could not write Devanagari. Ananya said, "Write in your own script. I will write the pronunciation beside it." Lau wrote his characters. Ananya slowly wrote: "Lau Kin-Hung." At that instant the stone seemed heavy. Lau's palm sank. For the first time he experienced that a name is not metal; it is weight.

Satyavrat said, "This is not forgiveness yet. This is only presence. Only when the wrongdoer is present can the victim's testimony be fully heard." Lau kept searching for the legal meaning of the sentence but could not find it. He realised that the language of winning and defence was useless here. If he lied, the stump would laugh. If he remained silent, the silence would be written down. If he fled, the stone would remain heavier with his name.

Far away, people sent by Batuknath Hariharan were watching. Word reached him that Lau Kin-Hung was sitting in Channa Grove and listening to names. Batuknath smiled at the news. "Foreigners soften quickly under emotion." But his smile remained incomplete, because the second line of the report said that Lau Kin-Hung was suspending his donation pledge. He wanted to hear the archive first. If the donation stopped, the trust documents would remain incomplete.

That night Lau Kin-Hung stayed in Garh Narikel. He wanted a guesthouse, but the children did not permit him to remain around the stump. He said, "For security reasons—" Ananya replied, "Among those whose names drowned without security, speak less of security arguments." In the end he was given a room in an old school outside the village. The fan turned in jerks, frogs sounded through the window, and lime flaked from the wall. The coarse rasp of the khadi bedding kept reminding his body all night that he was outside the world of silk. Lau had never slept in such a room, where there was no smell of profit, only the dust of history.

In the middle of the night he dreamed. He stood inside a gleaming dome of the imagined "nameless planet." Every building bore a number, none a name. His company's emblem shone in the sky, but the faces of the inhabitants below were blank spaces. Suddenly the stump of Channa Grove grew in the middle of that lifeless planet. The children ran in a circle chanting "kabaddi-kabaddi." Each child who held a breath and touched his side made one paper fall from his suit pocket—a contract, a deed of gift, a research grant, a redevelopment proposal.

He awoke sweating. Dawn had not yet come. Yet someone by the window was softly reading names. He opened the window. No one. Only darkness, frogs, the distant river. Again the word came: "Present." For the first time Lau understood it without assistant, translation or contract. Present meant: escape is impossible.

At dawn Satyavrat met him again. Lau said, "I wanted to make a donation. Perhaps—" Satyavrat cut him off. "A donation first covers the account of wrongdoing. Here: before donation, documents; before documents, names; before names, listening." Lau fell silent.

There was a new vibration in that silence. Whether it was remorse or fear was hard to know at once. But no one here rushed to conclusions. The children's rule was clear—first day: listening; second: names; third: documents; only after that, anything else. Lau's glittering capital grew restless before this slowness. Slowness was the harshest punishment for him.

As the day rose, a messenger from Edward Broom arrived. In his hand was a deed of gift with a golden border—a vast sum for the Garh Narikel Memory Centre, foreign expertise, a digital archive, a world-class exhibition. The messenger trusted that such a document would make the village bow. But the children were already seated around the stump.

Ananya placed an empty stone beside Lau's stone and said, "Now the name behind the donation will be asked."

Satyavrat Mehta did not smile. Nor did Lau Kin-Hung. From inside the stump came a faint rattling—not laughter, not weeping, only notice that the next trial had begun.

FOLK SONG: A DIALOGUE OF TWO SILENCES

Folk tune: silent couplet folk tune

Speak, O silence, the dialogue of two silences has spoken;

Neither laughter nor weeping—the stump's rattle is speech.

When two silences catch on one question, it becomes dialogue;

Behind one stands a mountain of wealth, behind the other wrongdoing.

Satyavrat sat silently carrying the weight of names;

Lau's glittering capital was trapped in slowness.

Then the golden deed of gift arrived in pride;

It called itself world-class memory and brought the smell of a contract.

Ananya placed an empty stone and asked the name;

Before the donation, know—whose benefit, whose work.

The next trial began: the true kind of compassion.

Satyavrat sat carrying the weight of names, silent and wordless.

Before donation, know—whose benefit, whose work.

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE GAVAYA IN THE FOREST: ANALOGY AND RECOGNITION: A young man from the city had never seen a gavaya. A forest guard told him, "A gavaya is like a cow, but has a wild body, a different colour and a distinctive gait." The sentence remained in his mind.]

CHAPTER 79

Broom's Deed of Gift

The smoother the deed of gift, the older the contract beneath its seal.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: A TRANSPARENT DEED OF GIFT

Folk tune: compassion-mangal

*Dry in the sun, O deed of gift, dry beneath the open sun;
Whose money, where it went—show every letter.*

*Let the wet deed of gift dry beneath the open sun;
Whose money, whose benefit—let every public eye read it.
Less golden edging, more clear accounting;
A gift is meritorious only when help reaches where it should.*

*Protect the beneficiary's dignity; do not sell photographs;
Water every page of service expenditure with truth.
If the deed of gift is transparent, trust will flower;
The water of compassion will become life in the right field.*

*More than golden borders, let there be a clean ledger page;
Not photographs but dignity should arrive, and food and livelihood.
Let the public stamp every rupee of the account;
In the field of transparent compassion, let trust rise like a wave.*

The notice of the next trial that had sounded in the stump's rattling reached the village at dawn as a thick postal packet. The morning after Lau Kin-Hung's silent dialogue, the packet arrived in Garh Narikel. It was no ordinary bundle of paper: its cover bore a polished seal, a golden line, a decorative mixture of English and Mithilakshar, and inside, on thick paper, a printed deed of gift. The postman's hand trembled, because for the first time he had received a document that carried both the name of Channa Grove and the emblem of a company across the seas.

The deed of gift had come from Edward Broom's new institution. The company's old name appeared nowhere; the company whose contract had buried workers' bodies in the bridge piers, whose advice had turned water, labour, medicine, data and fear into "projects," now appeared in a new form—the "Global Memory Restoration Fund." Across the top stood the words: "Compassionate Grant for the Channa Grove Centre of Pain and Memory." The letters of the word compassion shone like gold, but their brightness carried no smell of water.

A municipal clerk, a district-office representative, advisers to the heritage project and several enthusiastic local people gathered around the stump, treating the deed of gift as a miracle. One said, "Now a memorial will be built." Another, "There will be jobs." Another, "Garh Narikel will become known at the world level." The word "name" appeared repeatedly in these sentences, but not one dead person's name appeared.

Ananya sat with the register. She had become accustomed to examining documents. First the yellow notice, then the map, then the tender, then the research permission, then the privacy terms of the app. Every document said: I am order. The children now looked not only at the letters on a document; they asked—what is this document hungry for?

Broom himself was not present. His representative, wearing a perfumed coat, had practised speaking polished Maithili. He said, "We wish to preserve the trauma of Garh Narikel with respect. This gift is selfless. It will create a museum, lighting, a digital archive, a visitor centre, research rooms and an international dialogue building." When he said "selfless," somewhere inside the stump came a sound like a worm chewing.

Devika asked softly, "What will you take in return for the gift?" The representative smiled. "Nothing." Meera asked again, "Pictures of the dead? Families' permission? Rights to use stories? Copies of the archive? Data attached to names?" The representative's smile shrank slightly. "There will be certain consent provisions in the legal language, but only for operational convenience."

Satyavrat Mehta stood behind them listening. He wanted to say something, but the discipline of the second silence held him back. This time the right to speak belonged to the children. Gangesha's question had settled in the roots—which is perception? which testimony? which inference? And who possesses the direct perception of what happened to a body?

Ananya took the deed of gift in her hand. It was heavy. It stated: "The Fund shall control rights of long-term preservation, digitisation, interpretation, exhibition and educational use of memory materials." Ananya read the line, then looked up. "Who has been called the owner of the names here?" The representative said, "The community." Ananya asked again, "Where is the community's signature?"

There was no answer. The shine of the deed's golden letters dulled slightly. Aruni stepped forward and said, "The same people whose workers' safety existed on paper while the bridge was built but not on the ground—will their hands build the memory centre?" The representative said, "That was a separate contract in the past." Aruni replied calmly, "One who calls the past a separate contract does not make a gift to memory; he buys release from it."

Then Ba rose, leaning on her stick. She smelled the paper of the deed. "There is no smell of weeping in this. It smells of a locked room." Everyone fell silent. No legal objection works against an old person's knowledge of smell. The children wrote: "The smell of weeping is absent from the deed of gift."

Some local people were perplexed. Rejecting money seemed foolish. The village was poor, the stump exposed, the road unfinished, the archive fragile, and the children's register could be soaked by rain. A proposal came: "Take the money; regulate it later." But Meera said, "Where rights are surrendered in the first line, dignity will not survive in the later lines."

Gop Kumar read the fine print of the deed. One line said: "The Fund shall have primary rights of use over shared communication materials." The moment he read it, his face changed. "This is not a donation. It is a first claim over the story. Today it takes names, tomorrow images, the day after voices, and then even rights over tears."

The representative grew irritated. "You are all emotional. This is how memory is preserved around the world." Ananya put a hand on the stump and replied, "By the methods used around the world, how many names have been erased from the world? Here we listen to names first and make the method afterwards."

In the middle of the argument, the sky closed over. Clouds suddenly gathered at midday. No one understood where the drops came from. It did not rain; there were only a few heavy drops. One struck the golden seal of the deed of gift. No sound was heard when it fell, yet every eye turned there—as though silence too had kept one drop of its own. The seal began to soften. A second drop landed on the letters. The paper's colour began to change. The representative shouted, "Careful! This is the original document." But the drops seemed to obey no one's orders.

The deed's surface shine washed away. Beneath it emerged the letters of an old blue document. The smell rising from the wet paper was not new ink but old rust and the dampness of a closed file. Aruni bent down to look. They were clauses from the old bridge contract—workers' housing, safety, treatment, compensation, distribution of risk. The dead lines of the old contract belonging to the company that now sent a gift of compassion began to show through the body of the deed. The deed of gift had been a mask; once wet, the real face came out.

The crowd held its breath. A young man whispered, "The paper changed form." Ba said, "Not the paper—the skin of sin became wet." The children's eyes flashed. This was perception—not the severe terminology of Gangেশa's logic, but the direct perception of earth. When a drop falls upon truth, the need for inference diminishes.

The representative tried to pull the document away. Ananya did not stop him. She only said, "Take it. But we have seen it. Guarding names is also done with the eyes." Devika raised her small device to take a picture, then Meera stopped her hand. "Ask everyone first." The families present nodded. Only then was the picture taken. This time the image was not spectacle but evidence, because permission, purpose and dignity were all clear.

Satyavrat Mehta stepped forward. He said nothing to the representative. He looked at the wet lines of the deed and wrote only this in his notebook: "When a gift covers the record of wrongdoing, it is not a gift but a delayed defence." He closed the notebook. His eyes held the fatigue of an old courtroom, but that fatigue now carried the strength of public testimony.

Batuknath Hariharan heard news of the incident from afar. He began to understand that deeds of gift, trusts and statutory structures were all parts of his old game, yet in Channa Grove paper was no longer invincible as before. Once wet, the truth inside rose to the surface. That night he remained awake for a long time at home. The papers of his own "Public Memory Trust" lay on his desk. His son quietly entered the room.

The son picked up the papers and began to read. Batuknath started. "What are you doing?" His son asked calmly, "Father, is this meant to save justice or the profession?" The question was small, but all the bells of the dream court rang at once. Batuknath's mouth went dry. For the first time he saw that inside the house built from court, Bar, prestige and family name, the stump of Channa Grove was growing too.

That evening the children placed the empty envelope of the deed of gift around the stump. Upon it they wrote: "If compassion demands rights, it will be tested." One corner of the envelope was wet. The representative had taken the document away, but the water stain remained by the stump. It did not dry until late into the night.

And from the wet smell of the deed was born the next question—if a father sold justice and earned prestige, would his child inherit that prestige or become a witness to his crime? Channa Grove's laughter had stopped. It was now time for the question inside the house.

FOLK SONG: THE WET DEED OF GIFT

Folk tune: compassion-satire song

*The stain will ask, the water stain will ask;
If a gift buys names, it is not a gift—it is trade.*

*Golden border, polished seal, an old contract within;
In the sweet lines of the gift, the smell of greed goes unseen.
Wet in water, the paper became its true copy;
When compassion demanded rights, the lamp of examination was lit.
The wet corner by the stump did not dry all night;*

*Batuk's certificates of honour trembled in his dream.
The father sold justice and earned the family's shining honour;
Will the child inherit it, or knowingly become a witness to the wrongdoing?
If a gift buys names, it is no gift but trade;
The water stain will keep asking for the answer of generations.*

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE BABY ELEPHANT AND THE DONKEY: A traveller was told, "The animal that looks like a baby elephant is called such-and-such." On the road he met a donkey whose body, from a distance, shared certain shapes with a baby elephant. (Philosophical principle: similarity is not merely the number of shared properties; relevant properties and dissimilarities are important in determining word-reference.)]

CHAPTER 80

Hariharan's Descendants

A child's single question—did you save justice, or the profession?—can shake every certificate of honour on the veranda.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE CHILD'S QUESTION, A NEW ANSWER

Folk tune: father-daughter dialogue song

*Ask, daughter, look him in the eye and ask;
Search the father's old ledger for the page of truth.*

*The daughter asks, "Did you save justice?" Father, raise your eyes;
Do not hide the old mistake; bring an answer of truth.
A child's question is not punishment but a lamp of reform;
Through one generation's courage, another learns.*

*Say, "The profession is for service," and prove it through deeds;
Give the child's clear gaze the honour of honesty.
A new answer will fill the old house with fresh air;
Through a child's question, even a family can take the road of justice.*

*The daughter's question is not punishment; it is the lamp's wick;
When the curtain of falsehood lifts, the air of the house improves.
"The profession will now become service"—show it through deeds;
Let the honesty of two generations bring a new dawn.*

The question inside the house found its threshold that very night. On the night Broom's deed of gift was soaked by water and turned into a copy of the old contract, Batuknath Hariharan sat on the high veranda of his house. Photographs of ancestors hung on the pillars, Bar Council certificates covered the inner wall, thick law books filled a glass cabinet, and in the middle sat he himself—as though what remained in the house of law was not law but its tired shadow. Outside was the city's yellow light; inside, silence. The old veranda fan was still, yet the faint leathery smell of ageing law-book bindings stood in the air.

In that silence the door opened without a sound. Batuknath's daughter, Tarini, entered. She was studying law, but unlike her father she did not treat law as professional cleverness. She had not gone to Channa Grove, yet on her phone she had watched the reading of names, Gangesha's questions, the Procession of the False Ghost, and Broom's deed of gift change form in water. She switched the phone off, because she had understood that the first respect owed to memory is to turn off the screen.

Batuknath lifted his face. "So late?" He tried to summon his old tone of authority, but his voice fell like a dry leaf. Tarini did not answer. She went straight to the cabinet, took out an old booklet of his lecture on the Tattvacintamani, and placed it on the table. "Father," she said, "did you honour Gangesha, or did you imprison his question?"

Batuknath frowned. At Gangesha's name the orator inside him tried to wake. In many assemblies he had declared that Navya-Nyaya was Mithila's extraordinary gift; that the Tattvacintamani contained the essence of twelve thousand works; that its logical subtlety was such that the world still bowed before it. But Tarini's question was not about honour; it was about confinement. The flowers on certificates of honour wither; the thorn of a question remains.

"Gangesha is a matter for scholars," Batuknath said. "History has many views. In the middle of the night at home, these things..." Tarini cut him off. "Not in the night of the house, Father—in the darkness of lineage. If a legend that says someone was born five years after his father's death makes society uncomfortable, if a story of marriage to a leatherworker woman shakes caste pride, then why is Navya-Nyaya only for speeches? Does the right to evidence belong only to the upper castes? If a truth lies outside the threshold of lineage, calling it a controversy and shutting it away—is that justice?"

Batuknath's hand fell upon the glass tabletop. In the glass his face split in two—one the Bar Council president, the other the crooked lawyer who had spent years weaving an invisible armour around accused men through dates, adjournments, appeals, technical defects, procedure, jurisdiction and evidentiary traps. He wanted to say, "Law is procedure." But he feared that his daughter would immediately ask, "Procedure protects whom?"

Tarini asked it herself. "Did you save justice or the profession? When labourers drowned in the bridge, you pushed their families' papers aside as technically defective. When Ujjwal lost to the crocodile on the screen, you diverted his case in the name of digital consent. When Meera protected the dignity of her privacy, you tried to push her into questions of character. When children placed names around the stump, you wanted to put them under a trust. Father, was this law, or a crocodile wearing the shell of a profession?"

For the first time, Batuknath felt like an outside accused man inside his own home. In court he could turn a question. He could tire out opposing counsel. He could measure a judge's patience. But he could not measure his daughter's eyes. Tarini's eyes held anger but not hatred. Had there been hatred, she would have slammed the door and left. A question makes one stay and inflicts the punishment of listening.

"Do you consider me a criminal?" Batuknath asked softly. Tarini said, "No. Calling you a criminal would be easy. You are a man who came to believe his intelligence was too great and placed his conscience beneath stamped paper. Some of those you saved were criminals; but the voices of those you silenced have reached your house."

At that moment the ancestral photograph on the wall trembled. There was no wind. Inside the cabinet, pages fluttered of their own accord. A fine sound arose—as though old arguments had begun asking themselves: what is evidence? what is perception? what is testimony? what is inference? And what is the evidence of a human being's silence? Batuknath started, but Tarini did not. She was standing before Gangesha's question.

Tarini opened the Tattvacintamani lecture booklet. It contained Batuknath's old essay: "Mithila Is the Land of Logic." She placed her finger on the page and said, "If Mithila is the land of logic, why so much silence over caste? If Gangesha is the founder of Navya-Nyaya, then to kill the uncomfortable truth of his life by garlanding it with honour—whose justice is that? If people such as Ramanath Jha and Udaychandra Jha 'Ashok' kept killing life-truth in the name of honour, then you all called their wrongdoing scholarship and let it pass. Honour-killing does not belong only to bodies; memory too can be honour-killed."

Batuknath's mouth went dry. He tried at once to object—"Without sources, without evidence..." Tarini did not smile, but her voice hardened. "Demanding evidence is proper. Opening the door to evidence is proper too. You demanded evidence while keeping the door itself shut. When the door is closed, if truth knocks, its sound is called controversy. The children of Channa Grove say: listen first, refute afterwards. You wrote the refutation first and postponed the hearing."

With that sentence, the floor of Batuknath's house began to change. The veranda's marble became the cut stump of Channa Grove. The books in the cabinet turned into leaves and flew, and on each leaf shone the name of someone whose case he had kept circling year after year. In the middle appeared a cot-like seat of judgment, but no judge sat upon it; only one empty slipper from Tarini's childhood lay there. Batuknath understood—the dream court had begun again, but this time his child stood at its centre.

Slowly other children appeared in the court too—one whose father had been involved in a medicine scam, another whose father had been a front for online gambling, another whose father traded in foreign donations, another whose father was an officer who altered documents. They were not merely children; they were mirrors of inheritance. In different voices they asked the same question: "What will you leave us? Wealth? Fear? Lies? A surname? Or a truth that allows us to love you without carrying your wrongdoing?"

For the first time Batuknath was not afraid of his child; he was afraid of his child's future. He thought: if Tarini refuses the wealth, office, network, name and honours he spent his life preserving, then for whom were they preserved? The deepest punishment for wrongdoing is not prison but an heir's refusal. When a child says, "I do not want the profit you earned," a person sees the true loss of his life.

Tarini said softly, "Father, I am your daughter. I cannot deny that. But I will not become heir to your silence. If a Public Memory Trust is created, it must be run by the children, workers' families, the women's assembly and those who keep watch over names. If you wish to advise, first come and listen to names. Not chairmanship—presence."

Batuknath tried to laugh, but his voice broke. "Will they accept me?" Tarini replied, "Give up the desire to be accepted. First endure the punishment of listening. The time you imposed on others for years through dates—now give that time yourself." The sentence entered his chest directly. Dates, once the weapon of his profession, were becoming the time of his atonement.

Outside, the first colour of dawn spread across the sky. A bird called in Batuknath's house. The stale cup of tea from the night stood on the table; when his finger touched its cold surface, all the heat of his arguments seemed spent. He had not slept all night. The Tattvacintamani booklet remained open, with the mark of Tarini's finger on the page. He picked up a pen. On a sheet he wrote: "Proposal concerning the Public Memory Trust postponed." Then, after thinking, he struck out "postponed." He wrote: "The proposal shall be heard before the public watch." His hand trembled as he wrote, because for the first time on paper he was reducing his own authority over himself.

Tarini stood at the doorway. She looked at her father. There was no theatrical embrace of reconciliation. The wound was too old to tolerate the falsehood of instant balm. But as she left, moving aside the garland from a certificate of honour on the table, she said, "Gangesha needs questions, not garlands. Justice needs listening, not office."

She left. Batuknath remained alone on the veranda. Behind him were ancestral photographs, before him opening dawn, and between them paper. For the first time he looked old. The man who until yesterday had been a crocodile of dates, chewing up people's years, had now been half-skinned by one question from his child.

That dawn, dew had settled on the sprout at the stump in Garh Narikel. The children were about to begin their watch over names. No one knew whether Tarini would reach there. Yet from inside the stump came a sound like a faint bell—as though the child's question had been accepted into the watch.

Meanwhile, in his locked room, Chandrapal Batra put his phone away and for the first time sat down to write his full name on paper. His hand trembled. "Chandrapal" was written; "Batra" stuck. Then instead of letters an incomplete round mark began to appear on the paper—like a percentage sign. The next court was waiting for him.

FOLK SONG: A CHILD'S SINGLE QUESTION

Folk tune: father-daughter lament

The question will open it, the child's question will open it;

The lock on the family's closed cabinet will break.

"Did you save justice or the profession?"—the daughter asked once;

Many certificates of honour on the veranda trembled.

Thick law books fell silent, the cabinet grew old;

The father, a crocodile of dates, was half-skinned today by a question.

Not a child's tears but the edge of a direct question;

Behind the shine of the family name he saw darkness.

There, dew on the sprout and the watch over names awoke;

Here, Batra wrote "Chandrapal," but "Batra" stuck.

Father, answering is hard, but silence is heavier still;

A child's question alone will open the family's locked cabinet.

Father, silence became deeper and heavier than an answer.

Batra's Incomplete Name

One who lives with half a name is afraid of a full signature.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: CLEAN THE INNER POND

Folk tune: hopeful rhythm of the elephant-and-crocodile tale

Clean it, clean the inner pond;

Let the four banks differ, but keep the water one.

Let the four banks be different; the water has one life;

Clean the inner pond and the net of illusion will lift.

Understand both the elephant's strength and the crocodile's grip;

Remove the silt of fear and choose clear discernment.

The lotus will rise when the mind's water becomes pure;

All four directions will hold the bright image of one sky.

If the inner pond stays clean, decisions become clear;

With the mind's clean water, life grows peaceful and strong.

Fear is nourished beneath layers of silt, shadow by shadow;

Not with a spade but with patient hands will illusion be removed.

The lotus opens only when the water is still and clear;

The sky of all four directions will shine on one mirror-like surface.

The waiting court was not convened in a hall but within the boundary of a white sheet of paper. The question Hariharan's daughter had asked her father that night—"Did you save justice or the profession?"—echoed far beyond Garh Narikel. It crossed mobile networks, bank accounts, deeds of gift, memorial plans and foreign meetings, reaching a room where Chandrapal Batra had been sitting for a long time with a pen poised above a white page.

The room was in the city, yet the shadow of Channa Grove lay around it. The window was shut, the curtain closed, the air-conditioner running, and rows of figures glowed on screens—but not a single word had descended onto the page. Across the top was written only: "Write your own name." No signature, no seal. It was as though the paper itself had sprung from inside the stump.

Chandrapal Batra had written himself in many forms: company director, adviser, representative, app promoter, cultural donor, technical partner, trust assistant, local face of foreign capital. In each place his name had shone in a different form. But when the time came to write "your own name" on this paper, his hand fell silent. The pen nib scratched without moving—as though someone were scraping a closed door with a fingernail. In the place of a name, all his life he had written percentages.

He lifted the pen. He thought: "Chandrapal Batra." But the page produced: "ten percent." He started and crossed it out. He tried again to write "Chandrapal." The page produced: "half the profit." He struck that out. A third time he thought "C. Batra," but the pen wrote: "commission." He turned the page. The same on the second sheet. The same on the third. It was as though a clerk sat inside him who knew only how to write profit-shares where a name should be.

Seen from outside, the incident would have been absurd; from within, it was terrifying. For the first time Chandrapal understood how many years ago his real name had been taken from him. No one else had stolen it; he himself had changed it into measurement, bargaining, deals, recommendations, account codes and hidden profit behind screens. Each time a person writes the sign of profit in place of his own name, he becomes a little more nameless within.

He remembered childhood. Not a village but an outer-city settlement; a father who was a small trader, a mother devoted to worship, and an old slate on which his name had first been written. Chandrapal—the protector of the moon. His mother used to say, "Light has been kept in your name, son." But light felt heavy to him. In light, the face is visible; in the face, shame; in shame, restraint. So little by little he abandoned light and entered the darkness of numbers.

The degree from Meerut that he had used as a shield all his life now fluttered before him like a yellow leaf. The paper said, "You studied law." The inner voice asked, "To protect whom?" He answered, "Business." The voice said, "Business, or a market in the fear of nameless people?" He answered, "I was doing my work." The voice said, "Work, or opening accounts upon bodies drowned in water?" He wanted to argue, but the pen again wrote on the paper: "percentage."

At that moment, an invisible line was drawn in the children's register at the stump in Channa Grove. Far away in Garh Narikel, Ananya turned the page while still seated. She did not know why, but in one corner a word appeared by itself in black ink: "percentage." She showed it to Ira.

Ira said quietly, "After the theft of names, the accounting of names will now open."

At that same time Devika was examining an old copy of Chandrapal's memorial app. Behind the names of the dead were small boxes—donation, tribute, message, lamp, assistance. But in a hidden layer behind each name lay the shadow of a share. A stream of profit had been drawn from the grief attached to names. Devika switched off the screen. "He was not selling names," she said. "He was selling a percentage of the mourning behind the names."

The walls of Chandrapal's room now began to move. On one wall appeared Lau Kin-Hung's shadow—cold, measured, speaking the language of profit. On another, Raghav Signal's disappearing messages. On the third, Batuknath's legal smile. On the fourth, the cut stump of Channa Grove. From a crack in the stump came a child's voice: "Your full name?" Chandrapal tried to answer, but what left his mouth was: "partnership."

The voice came again: "What did your mother call you?" Chandrapal's body trembled. He had never prepared for that question. Everyone had asked: how much investment? how much profit? how much share? how much access? how much risk? No one had asked how his mother called him. He remembered: "Channu." A very small, very warm, very vulnerable name.

He picked up the pen. This time he tried to write "Channu." The moment half of the first letter appeared, his hand stopped. His arm grew heavy, as though a crocodile had seized it with its teeth. He forced it, but the line would not advance straight. A crooked shape appeared on the page—half a letter, half a jaw. He became afraid. Crocodiles chewed bodies; Chandrapal was experiencing that the crocodile of profit had already chewed a name.

That night Chandrapal wept for the first time. His weeping was not a plea for mercy. It was the weeping of a man who had realised that the surviving child within him could no longer find the body of his name. When a wrongdoer weeps, that is not forgiveness; sometimes it is only evidence that the inner devastation has touched him too. The stump in Channa Grove remained silent before this weeping. Trees do not forgive quickly.

In that silence he remembered that he had profited from nameless crowds. In digital fraud, every face became data; in gambling, every young man a lost amount; in shortages of medicine, every family an opportunity; in memorials, every dead person a source of donations; in court, every delay a fee; in foreign partnerships, every village a "region." He used to say, "I do not need sentiment from names; I need patterns." Now the pattern gave him no name.

He began searching his tongue for Maithili words. His life had been filled with deals in many languages, but when his mother scolded him she spoke in a mixed domestic Maithili-Hindi: "Channu, do not spoil your name." The word "name" in that sentence suddenly spread through the room. The figures on the screen blurred. The smell of incense ash entered the air. Far away, a stone placed on the stump in Garh Narikel grew warm.

Ananya opened a new page in the register. At the top she wrote: "Incomplete Name." The children sat in a circle behind her. They asked, "If he is a wrongdoer, why write his name?" Ba replied, "Wrongdoing is written not for forgiveness but for evidence. One who has lost his own name bears witness even through that incompleteness." The children were not satisfied, but they listened. Learning to listen is harder than learning a lesson.

Satyavrat Mehta was present at that gathering. No one had told him what was happening in Chandrapal's room; but the discipline of listening can become such that even the tremor of a distant wrongdoer reaches the ear. He said softly, "Justice does not ask only for the victim's name. It also asks for the wrongdoer's true name. Because nameless wrongdoing returns." Everyone fell silent at the sentence. Some faces hardened. No one wanted forgiveness. Yet a complete archive of names must also contain the enemy's name as evidence—this was difficult to accept.

In his room Chandrapal bent over the page. The unfinished letter of "Channu" was damp with sweat. He wanted to tear up the paper, burn it, or scan it and bury it in a secure digital layer. But the paper grew heavy. He could not lift it. Its weight exceeded all his accounts, dividends, secret contracts and fabricated donations. The incompleteness of a name can become heavy like an object.

Night deepened. Outside, city lights switched off and on. Inside, only the paper remained white. Chandrapal could not finally write his full name. On the page there remained only: "Ch..." Beneath it, unwittingly, appeared: "percentage." Then his hand trembled to a stop. Thus the summary of his life stood complete—the unfinished letter of moonlight, followed by the complete word of profit.

At dawn the sheet folded itself. No hand, no wind. Fold after fold formed until the paper took the shape of a leaf. It did not pass through the closed window; instead it stuck to the glass. Chandrapal touched the pane. The cold of dawn outside and the faint warmth of the leaf inside rested upon the same surface. He rose and looked. In the glass he saw not his own face but the eye of an elephant. He started. Behind that eye was the darkness of water, and in the darkness, the jaw of a crocodile.

He could not tell whether this was dream or punishment. But in Garh Narikel, at that very moment, Ananya closed the register and said, "Next time the elephant-and-crocodile within will play." A shiver ran through all the children's bodies at once. The game was not entering the field but the water of the mind. Chandrapal's incomplete name had become the first piece of that game.

FOLK SONG: THE INCOMPLETE SIGNATURE

Folk tune: lament of the mind

Speak, O tongue, speak your full name;

How long will you save your life with an incomplete signature?

Living with half a name, afraid when the whole is written;

"Chandrapal" came down, but "Batra" remained stuck.

The paper became a leaf and clung to the glass at night;

Not a face but an elephant's eye, and behind it the crocodile's attack.

The round mark of percentage sprouted where the name should be;

It became the first piece in the game inside the mind's pond.

An incomplete name is no shield but an inner prison;

Full pronunciation will demand acceptance of the road of wrongdoing.

O tongue, speak your name; tell your share as well.

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE STRIPED ZEBRA: A teacher had said, "A zebra is like a horse, but its body has black-and-white stripes." At the zoo the child stopped the moment he saw the striped animal. Similarity supplied the instructional cue; the stripes and the overall form fixed the correct referent of the word. That day the zoo became a classroom of philosophy of language.]

CHAPTER 82

The Gaja-Graha Within

The four banks of a pond are different, but the water is one—and within the water live both elephant and crocodile.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: SCHOOL ON LEAF SEATS

Folk tune: children's school song

Sit, children, sit upon the seats of leaves;

Write letters on an earthen notebook with a twig for a pen.

Little shade, leaf seats, a vast sky of knowledge;

Children sit in a circle and learn affection for names.

First lesson—no one is nameless; second—stay together;

Third—share fear with everyone; fourth—speak the truth.

If there is no notebook, there is earth; if no pen, a twig;

People's experience is the book, grandmother's story the treasure.

School upon leaf seats awakens a sense of justice;

Children who learn today will become society's true watch tomorrow.

The cuckoo rang the first bell, the wind the second;

Grandmother's story became a book, experience became medicine.

"No one is nameless"—recite this mantra aloud;

Through the watch kept by educated children, cut the roots of injustice.

"Next time the elephant-and-crocodile within will play"—Ananya's sentence found its field the very next evening. The question from Hariharan's child, Batra's incomplete name, Raghav without a network, the crocodile Lau Kin-Hung had seen in glass—these were no longer separate events. They were four banks of the same pond. In the water between them, the tale of elephant and crocodile was about to descend again. But this time the elephant was no creature from a distant myth, and the crocodile no river animal. This time the elephant was truth trapped within a person, while the crocodile was the jaw of greed, lineage-pride, office, percentages, fear and anonymous profit.

There was no water on the stump in Channa Grove that night, yet everyone smelled water. Moisture lodged in the cracks of the roots began to gleam one by one. The shadows of the stones of names lengthened into a circle. The children thought the night was ordinary, but Old Budhba's Ghost whispered, "Tonight the elephant-and-crocodile within will be shown. What you see, do not immediately call a fault; first look at the living being trapped inside it."

Ananya asked, "It is hard to see a living being inside the guilty." Old Budhba's Ghost replied, "True. But justice is difficult; revenge is easy. The jewel of evidence that Gangesha fashioned was not meant only to be applied to others. The power to see the bondage within the person we call guilty is also a purified form of evidence."

Immediately after he said this, the darkness in the middle of the stump deepened. It was not the darkness of day turned night, but the darkness seen within after one closes the eyes. In it everyone began to hear the pulse at their temples—as though someone had stepped into the pond inside. First Batuknath Hariharan appeared in the darkness. His body was long like a high court corridor, his coat black, a white band at his throat, a rulebook in his hand. But from his chest an elephant's trunk was trying to emerge. The trunk was compressed, the mouth shut, the eyes wide.

The elephant inside Hariharan was his childhood—the child who once wanted to study justice, who as a new lawyer had once taken up a poor client's file without fee. The crocodile was his professional deceit. Its teeth were made of dates, adjournments, fees, pressure, Bar politics, caste pride and schemes for saving criminals. The crocodile held the elephant's leg and said, "You are not justice; you are a profession. You are not a question; you are an argument. You are not a human being; you are an honourable form of address."

Hariharan struggled. His child watched from a distance. The child's voice came: "Father, did you save justice or the profession?" The voice filled the elephant's trunk with air, but the crocodile's teeth bit deeper. Hariharan cried, "I was within the rules!" The stump replied, "Rules for whom?" He fell silent. In that silence his coat looked wet for the first time.

Then the scene changed. Chandrapal Batra appeared. Screens, accounts, slips, commissions, fake tributes and percentage signs surrounded him. The elephant within him was small—a child who wanted to write his own name correctly. The crocodile was enormous—the percentage that had climbed over the incomplete name. It told him, "Why write a name? Become a number. Sell numbers. Move numbers. With numbers pull bodies, pull minds, pull money."

The child inside Batra wrote "Chandra" upon the earth, and the crocodile flicked its tail and changed it into "percentage." He wrote "pal," and the crocodile turned it into "broker." He wrote "Batra," and the crocodile changed it into "wallet." The children watched. Devika said softly, "One who has not saved the letters of his own name—how will he save the names of others?"

For the first time Chandrapal saw the root of his deceit. He had believed that he profited from crowds; now he saw the crocodile had also been eating the child inside him. He did not weep, because he had forgotten how. Only one word came from his mouth: "Nameless." The stump replied, "By earning through namelessness, a person becomes nameless himself."

The third scene belonged to Raghav Signal. At first no elephant appeared within him—only droplets of messages, invisible writing, vanishing marks, hidden codes. The children wondered: where is the elephant here? Then Ananya saw a very small, transparent elephant whose body was made of sheets of paper and which was continually being erased. The crocodile was a technology of silence, saying: "Do not speak, send. Do not write, erase. No relationship, only signals. No crime, only mediation."

The greatest pain of Raghav's elephant was that no one had ever given it a complete sentence. All his life he had lived in half-messages, half-promises, half-threats and half-defences. His crocodile would not let him speak fully. When he tried to say "I," the message was erased. When he tried to say "guilt," the sign changed into "sent." When he tried to say "forgive," the network broke.

Meera said, "This is not respect for privacy; it is the darkness of wrongdoing." Saumya added, "Silence is not what protects a wound; silence becomes wrongdoing when it strangles the witness." Raghav's transparent elephant became clear for a moment. On its forehead appeared the words: "Complete sentence." Then the crocodile's jaw trembled.

The fourth scene belonged to Lau Kin-Hung. He was trapped not in a pond but inside a glass building. Outside was the sea; inside, calculation. His inner elephant was enormous but enclosed in a metal cage. The crocodile was not merely greed; it was geography-less capital, saying: "Remove the risk called country. Remove the face of labour. Remove the history of the river. Leave only the flow of profit."

For the first time Lau's elephant wanted to smell the earth of Mithila. It struck its trunk against the glass. Names appeared on the pane—Saryu, Ujjwal, Munna, unnamed worker, water-burial, Channa Grove. Lau panicked, because those names had no exchange rate. The crocodile said,

"Names are loss." The elephant answered, "Without names, profit turns to stone."

Edward Broom too appeared at the edge of that scene. His inner elephant sought applause from a conference stage; the crocodile was hunger for moral speech. He turned every suffering into a theory, every dead person into an example, every village into a case study. The crocodile's teeth were made of polished English words, yet in the darkness of Channa Grove those words trembled before Devanagari letters. The children saw him, but that night did not read his name in full. Ananya said, "His turn will come again."

Among all these scenes stood Satyavrat Mehta himself. He thought he was merely a spectator. But the stump looked inside him too. His elephant was the desire to truly listen to justice; the crocodile was discipline of office, a conscience that woke late, and the silence that had so often become protection for wrongdoing. Satyavrat trembled. He said, "Do not leave me out either."

The children looked at him. Everyone understood the importance of the sentence. The man who wrote down other people's testimonies did not want to hide the crocodile within himself. Ananya wrote in the register: "The witness too is not beyond examination." Satyavrat lowered his eyes and sat. At that moment his silence was born a third time—the first had belonged to wrongdoing, the second to admission, and now the third to entry into justice.

Then the real elephant-and-crocodile scene arose in the middle of the stump. Vast water, mud, moonlight. The elephant was half-submerged, the crocodile gripping its leg. But this time there was not one elephant. Hariharan's childhood, Batra's incomplete name, Raghav's complete sentence, Lau's caged memory, Broom's hunger for applause, Satyavrat's desire to listen—all became limbs of the elephant. Nor was there only one crocodile—caste, greed, procedure, profit, silence, global avarice, data and fear joined into one enormous jaw.

The elephant did not scream. Names came from its mouth. First one, then many, then names that had no place in any list. When the names fell upon the water, the children answered, "Present." With every "Present," one crocodile tooth loosened. When Ba added the names of her ancestors, the crocodile's tail shook. When Meera said, "The dignity of the body is present," its eyes blurred. When Devika said, "The youth drowned in the screen is present," the water grew warm. Even the earth beneath the palms of the children seated on the bank warmed—as ash remains warm beneath the surface long after a hearth is extinguished.

At last the question arose: was the elephant freed? The story gave no cheap answer. The crocodile did not let go, but its grip became public for the first time. A hidden grip is unbearable; once the grip is visible, hands can gather against it. That night the stump in Channa Grove did not create liberation; it made the grip visible. That visibility became evidence for the struggle ahead.

Old Budhba's Ghost said, "Remember: seeing the elephant inside the wicked does not erase the wrongdoing. The account of wrongdoing remains. But if you do not see the elephant within, you will fail to recognise the species of the crocodile. Its teeth are not made by one person alone; they are made by the whole system." The children grew serious. It was a difficult lesson—keep anger, but keep the eyes open.

As dawn approached, the watery scene at the stump faded. The village looked like a village again. Yet every character awoke tired within. Hariharan woke drenched in sweat in a distant room; Chandrapal kept trying for the first time to write his full name on paper; an unfinished message flashed on Raghav's device—"I will say it fully..."; Lau pressed his palm to the hotel glass and searched for the smell of earth.

Beside the ring of stones in Channa Grove, the children made a rule for the next gathering: "We will not read only the names of the dead; we will also search for the names trapped inside the living." From this rule was born the idea of the Coconut-Leaf School. Guarding names would no longer mean only protecting records; it would become lessons in intellect, body, caste, labour, privacy and justice.

That morning Ananya opened a new page of the register and wrote the heading: "Coconut-Leaf School." The green point on the stump spread a little. From afar Old Budhba's Ghost released the breath of kabaddi—"Kabaddi..." and the children answered, "School..." The game was entering education.

FOLK SONG: THE INNER POND

Folk tune: elephant-and-crocodile narrative song

Clean it, clean the inner pond;

Only one who can struggle with himself will cross over.

Four banks are different, the water one stream;

Batuk, Batra, Raghav, Lau—the elephant and crocodile within.

No one remains only elephant or only crocodile;

Greed grips, fear struggles, names flow within.

The children will seek even the names trapped in the living;

On leaves they will study caste, labour, privacy and justice.

The green point on the stump became a school;

The breath of kabaddi changed into the sound of learning.

Clean the inner pond; hold the lamp of names;

Batuk-Batra-Raghav-Lau—the essence of the elephant-and-crocodile within.

No one remains only elephant or only crocodile;

Greed grips, fear struggles, names flow within.

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE PARROT'S COMMAND:
WORD, SENTENCE AND BELIEF: The courtyard parrot learned from hearing its master's voice every day: "Bring water." One day the master was not at home. The incident raised a dispute: is the cause of verbal cognition only the speaker's present intention, or do the structure of the words and the independently known convention also possess their own efficacy?]

CHAPTER 83

The Coconut-Leaf School

Where no shade remains, a school can still sit—upon seats of leaves.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: SONG OF PRESENCE

Folk tune: attendance-mangal

Call the names, call them one by one;

At each answer of "Present," circle the lamp upon its tray.

*Call every name one by one; let all say—Present;
Mother, labourer, child, elder—let everyone's dignity remain safe.
Attendance is not merely a number; it is the recognition of life;
Whoever's feet stand upon the earth deserves a complete place.*

*Let no one fall from the line, let no one be erased;
With one voice of presence, break the invisible ground beneath exclusion.*

*Sing the song of attendance; place a lamp for every name;
Fill every colour equally into society's complete picture.*

*Mother present, labourer present, child and elder held in care;
Let no one slip from the line—this is the first remedy.
Not a number, but an account of breath, a ledger of heartbeats;
Only complete attendance can make society's bond complete.*

The game that had descended into study during the night began, by morning, to take the form of earth and leaves. After the night's elephant-and-crocodile within had subsided, morning in Garh Narikel was not ordinary. Water kept to its old course, dust rose from the road, arguments over the price of potatoes and onions continued in the market; yet around the stump of Channa Grove people felt as though some invisible beast had been defeated in the marsh within and forced to retreat. Batuknath, Chandrapal, Raghav, Lau and Broom remained in their rooms, hotels, embassies, aircraft and courts, but the crocodiles within them no longer flashed their teeth as before.

That morning Ananya was clearing sand from the empty ground behind the stump. With her were five children, two girls, an old potter, a widow and Devika. Someone asked, "What will be built here?" Ananya replied, "A school." Everyone was startled. A school on the very ground that had witnessed ghost-kabaddi, the call of water-burial, a false procession, a tender for memory, and the court of the inner elephant-and-crocodile? Yet there was such certainty in the children's eyes that the question gradually quietened by itself.

This school was not being built for government recognition. Its first lesson would not be the alphabet but the hearing of names. Here, presence would not mean a mark in an attendance register but acknowledgement of existence. Here "a" would not lead to anam, "nameless," but to the question "Who are you?" "k" would lead to kabaddi, and the rules of that game would be taught too—hold your breath, but do not bite another person's body; cross the boundary, but do not steal a name; if you are caught, do not lie—release your voice.

Ba gave it the name Coconut-Leaf School. She said, "The stump of Channa Grove will remain, but shade needs leaves. Coconut leaves catch the wind from far away. This school will catch people's voices in the same way." The potter brought old roof tiles from his house. The children chose flat stones from the riverbank. Meera came carrying a coil of red thread. Ira brought the reverse side of an old map across which the municipality had drawn its cancellation lines. On that reverse side the school's first plan was made.

The plan had four corners. First—name. Second—privacy. Third—labour. Fourth—breath. In the middle stood the stump. No statue upon it, no plaque. Only an empty bowl was placed there, to wait for a call. The children said, "If any name is left out, this bowl will hear it first." Ira did not laugh; she understood how many civilisations have survived because someone left an empty bowl.

On the school's first wall Devika wrote in charcoal: "No grief will be written here without permission." Meera added a second line: "No body will become spectacle here." Gop Kumar, who arrived late, wrote the third: "Paper is evidence here, but incomplete without the human voice." Satyavrat Mehta stood at a distance; the children saw him. Ananya said, "You write the fourth line." Satyavrat thought for a long while, then wrote: "Silence too is testimony here, when it is not the silence of fear but the silence of listening."

After these four lines, the school existed. Hearing of it, a town schoolmaster laughed: "You write four lines and a school is made?" Ba replied, "A school made by a building is for examinations; a school made by rules is for human beings.” The teacher fell silent. What came into his mind was not shame but perplexity. Later he brought his own school’s attendance register and said, “Read mine too. How many names in it have become nothing but numbers?”

The first day’s work was not to make benches. The children gathered leaves. The long coconut leaves that rattled in the wind were not cut; only those that had fallen on their own were picked up. The edges of the dry leaves rasped against the fingers like splinters; when they were lifted, a faint sweet sap-smell rose from the stalks. Small lines were drawn along the leaf-ribs. Each line was for a story. Ananya said, “Paper can tear; leaves can dry; but if we keep reading, the names will travel from leaves into people.”

The writing on those leaves was strange. Not complete stories, only signs—“bridge pier,” “digital fear,” “night of oxygen,” “Meera’s consent,” “Gangesha’s question,” “lament of the false ghost,” “the crocodile within.” Beneath each sign the children left an empty space. Someone asked, “Why the blank?” Ananya said, “If we write the story closed, where will the next person speak?”

News of the school reached the market. Some came in support. Others said, “This will spoil the children. Names, caste, corruption, bodies, courts, digital fraud—why burden children with such heavy subjects?” Devika replied, “When these subjects have already entered children’s lives, why keep them outside the school?” At that sentence some faces lowered, because in every house in the village some child had already seen the blows of mobile phones, debt, medicine, caste, livelihood or silence.

By afternoon the question of caste arose by itself. A leatherworker’s boy hesitated to pick up a leaf. A Brahmin boy sitting near him first drew back, then remembered Gangesha’s question. Slowly he took hold of the leaf with him. When both children’s hands rested upon one leaf, a fine green line gleamed down its middle. Ba said, “See? The Tattvacintamani does not live only in a book; sometimes it opens between two hands.”

Hearing this, an old pandit seated at the edge cleared his throat. He said, “Not every story about Gangesha’s life is established fact.” Ananya immediately asked, “Then what is the proof for the pride of caste? What is the proof for purity of lineage? If a story of birth five years after the father’s death may be questioned, then the claim of high and low by birth must also be questioned.” The pandit’s voice stopped. The school’s first debate ended without abuse, punishment or expulsion.

By evening a light pavilion like a roof of coconut leaves had been made. It could not stop rain, but it could sift the sunlight into small pieces. Behind the cut stump of Channa Grove hung a green curtain of leaves. People began saying, “The tree was cut and leaves grew.” Meera corrected them: “They did not grow; they gathered.” The correction mattered, because the school was not a miracle but the result of people's labour.

At night the first lamp was lit. No bell rang. Ananya lifted the empty bowl and struck it softly three times. The sound was not grave but gentle. The small ring of the earthen bowl faded almost as soon as it arose—like a drop of water pausing upon a leaf before sliding away. The children sat in a circle. Satyavrat was behind them, Gop to the right, Devika and Meera in front, Ba beside the stump. A faint smell came from the water's edge. Perhaps the submarine had come to listen. Perhaps crocodiles far below were blinking in the depths.

Ananya said, "Today the school has opened. The first lesson is tomorrow. Today we will only hear the rules." She read the four lines. Everyone answered, "Heard." Then she added a fifth: "Whoever is absent here will be called first." Everyone fell silent. The absent meant the dead, the lost, the forgotten, the shamed, the exiled, the name-struck-off, the caste-crushed, the violated body, the person drowned in a screen—all of them.

That night the shadow of the cut stump joined the shade of the coconut leaves and made a strange figure upon the earth. It was neither tree nor human nor animal. Ananya said, "This is the school's first letter." No one could read it. Satyavrat stared at it for a long time. It seemed to him that the letter might be "u"—the u of upasthit, "present."

At that very moment the faint sound of a drum came from far away. The children rose, wondering whether to begin kabaddi. Ba raised her hand to stop them. "Tomorrow is the first lesson. Save your breath tonight." Perhaps the ghosts too obeyed the rule. No game was played. Yet the breath of kabaddi remained hanging in the air—not suppressed, but preserved.

The chapter ended in that expectation. The Coconut-Leaf School had been made, but its first lesson was still waiting to open. The empty bowl remained in the centre. On a new page of the register the title was written—"First Lesson: Present." And throughout the night the absent names of Garh Narikel waited quietly for their turns.

FOLK SONG: SEATS OF LEAVES

Folk tune: school song

The seats are spread, seats of leaves are spread;

Where names are read, there the village takes form.

*No shade remains, yet the seats of leaves are spread;
In the courtyard of the cut stump a new school has opened.
The empty bowl in the middle, the register a new leaf;
All night the letter u whispers—upasthit, “present.”
Before the alphabet, first the dignity of names;*

*Saving our breath, tomorrow we shall study the absent lives.
The ghosts stopped their game; the rhythm stayed preserved in the air;
One by one each name watched the road toward its turn.
The leaf-seat is small, the lesson immense;
Where names are read, there the village takes form.*

*No shade remained, yet the school opened;
In the courtyard of the cut stump a new register gathered.*

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—BRING THE POT: A child was learning language. An elder said to another servant, “Bring the pot.” The servant rose and brought a water-pot from the room.]

CHAPTER 84

First Lesson: Present

The first lesson is not a letter—it is learning to say “Present.”

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: WOMEN'S BRIGHT WATCH

Folk tune: women's-circle mangal song

Gather, sisters, at the hour of the bright watch;

Speak your own names yourselves, and every tangle will break.

*Day's labour, night's speech—the women form a circle;
Hearing one another's voices, they light lamps of courage.
Mother, sister, daughter—each will speak her own name;
At home, field, office and stage, equal rights will remain.*

*A veil if you choose one, but no veil over the voice;
Half the world must never be half in decision.
Let the bright watch belong to women, and the village dawn grow;
With them, every institution of society becomes complete.*

*From courtyard to panchayat, half the world's footsteps move;
No veil over the voice, whether or not a veil covers the head.
Hearing one sister's victory, ten courtyards awaken;
From the women's row of lamps, the village dawn begins.*

That heading in the register—"First Lesson: Present"—became its own first bell in the morning light. On the first day after the Coconut-Leaf School opened, no one studied the alphabet. No letters, no numbers, no multiplication tables. In the shadeless courtyard of the stump, the children spread leaf-seats and sat down; beneath their thighs the cool, smooth leaves spoke with a crisp rustle, as though the seats themselves were recording their presence. Ananya placed an empty stone in the middle. No name was written upon it; it was for all those names still pressed inside homes, left outside genealogical charts, struck from the margins of papers, or hidden in the darkness of shame.

Ira held an ink pen, Devika the register, Meera a red thread, and Saumya a small cloth bag containing blank paper, kohl, two pieces of charcoal and several small flint stones. Aruni stood at a distance and watched. It seemed to him that bridge measurements, piers, river velocity and contract conditions were one part of knowledge; but there was no instrument for measuring the lesson beginning today.

Ananya spoke the first sentence: "The first lesson of this school is—Present." The children repeated together, "Present." The word rose into the air, entered the hollow of the cut stump, then slowly returned into everyone's ears. Those accustomed to answering attendance at school understood for the first time that being present did not merely mean a body seated on a chair; it meant standing with one's name.

The first child rose carrying his grandmother's name. At home she was called simply "that old woman." She had no papers, no date of birth, no claim upon land. The child said, "My grandmother, whose real name no one at home says—Sitamoni." A bird on the edge of the stump flapped its wings once. Devika wrote in the register: "Sitamoni—Present." The child exhaled, as though half a century of dust in his chest had grown lighter after the name was given.

A girl from the second row rose. Her name was Sonaki. She said, "My uncle went into the river. The village said he had gone outside to earn. But my mother said the river took him. His name was Bholaram." Silence. Bholaram's name appeared on no list—not labourer, dead, migrant or missing. Ananya asked, "Is this name spoken at home?" The girl said, "At night. Not in the day." The register received the line: "Bholaram—present from night into day."

A third child rose hesitantly. "My great-grandfather was a leatherworker. When his name is spoken at home, people say, leave it, the lineage will be spoiled. But my grandmother said that without him the household's shoes, drum, earthwork and repairs—nothing would have gone on. His name was Mangalu Das." At this name some elderly faces tightened. The school's first examination stood before it: the courage to say "Present" to a name caste had pushed downward.

Meera rose slowly. She sat between Sonaki and the third child and said, "The one upon whose labour everyone walked will not be written below but at the foundation." In the register Devika wrote Mangalu Das not in the first column but in the middle—exactly where the weight of a page rests. Ananya told everyone, "In this school caste cannot prevent presence." The children answered, "Present."

Then Gangesha's question returned. The story of Gangesha Upadhyaya told the previous day—birth five years after his father's death, marriage to a leatherworker woman, the Tattvacintamani, Navya-Nyaya, and the killing of life's truth in the name of honour—was burning inside the children. One boy asked, "If Gangesha made a system of justice, why did society refuse justice to his life?" As the question hung in the air, a minute green point on the stump trembled.

Saumya did not answer. She said, "Today the answer will not be made present; the question will." A new line opened in the register: "The suppressed truth of Gangesha's life—Present." Someone protested, "What will children know about people of scripture?" Ba said from a distance, "If children can hear a name, they can also hear the silence of scripture." The old man's protest dissolved inside the sentence.

The first lesson now moved beyond presence toward evidence. Ananya lifted the stone. "If I say there is a name on this stone, but no one sees it, then?" One child said, "We need perception." The stone was turned over—beneath it a half-written "M" in charcoal. Another child said, "This may be the M of Mangalu Das, or of mother, or of the dead." Ananya smiled. "Inference." Then Ba said, "I heard that Mangalu Das bore this mark on his hand." The children said, "Testimony."

Thus, through play, Navya-Nyaya descended into the earth of the school. Gangesha came out of library dust and sat among the children's stones, charcoal, names and questions. The Tattvacintamani was no longer merely a name said to equal the weight of twelve thousand books; it came to mean that a lamp of inquiry must be lit over every particle of truth, so that caste, greed, paper and fear cannot combine to make anyone absent.

The fourth child to rise had a very faint voice. He could not speak his sister's name. She had been threatened through a mobile phone; the family, fearing shame, had removed her name from school. Meera went to him and said, "If her name should not be public, we will write only this much—one daughter, silenced not by shame but by violence." The child nodded. The register received: "One daughter—present with dignity." Every head bowed over that line.

In this school, presence did not mean exposing everything. Some names would be spoken in full, some by signs, some held until the family consented, some kept only in the warmth of a stone. Meera wrote the rule: "Memory will not be made by cutting through privacy." Devika added: "If speaking a name creates danger, that silence too is present." The children repeated the sentence three times.

Near midday an old pandit arrived. He said, "It is not right to teach children such things against caste-lineage, family tradition and scripture." Ananya asked politely, "Does scripture preserve names or erase them?" The pandit fell silent. Then he said, "There must be order." Ira replied, "If order eats the names of the dead, it too will be called a crocodile." The pandit searched for darkness, but Channa Grove had been cut and the sunlight there was clear.

An old woman took a worn amulet from the end of her sari. Inside was a rotten scrap of paper. She said, "This has my mother's name, which I was forbidden to speak in my husband's home. I cannot read it." Saumya did not try to open the paper; it would have broken. The children sat around it. The letters could not be read, but the woman spoke her mother's name: "Phulkumari." At that moment the cord of the amulet loosened by itself. From the decayed paper rose the faint mingled smell of old vermilion and stale flowers—like a breath sealed for fifty years.

Devika wrote: "Phulkumari—present from within the sari's fold." At this line the coconut-leaf seats moved. There was no wind, yet the leaves rustled. The children said, "The tree heard." No one searched for science, no one announced a miracle. The school's rule was that an event which lightens grief should not immediately be turned into spectacle.

After midday the lesson of presence became a civic lesson. The children said, "Whoever's name is in the register has a place in society even if the body is gone." Aruni added, "Whoever's labour is in the bridge will have a name written into its piers." Gop Kumar said, "Whoever's data was stolen will return from an account-number to a human voice." Meera said, "Whoever's bodily dignity was taken will have no name sold without consent." Satyavrat Mehta listened from behind them and wrote only one word in his notebook: "Present."

At evening the children read the names of the first day. To every name everyone answered, "Present." Gradually the word became the village's new civic form of address. Someone called, "Ramsagar?" Answer: "Present." Someone asked, "The one whose name was never found?" Answer: "Present." "The suppressed life of Gangesha?" "Present." "Mangalu Das?" "Present." In these replies the old lines of society began to crack.

Before night fell an unexpected thing happened. The women who had stood listening at the edge throughout the day began to speak quietly among themselves. They carried names that could not be spoken in daylight—women beaten at home, burned for dowry, killed for love, hidden in the name of caste, pushed into silence after bodily humiliation. Ujjwal's mother, Meera, Devika, Saumya and Ba all wore the same shadow upon their faces.

Meera asked Ananya for the register. She turned the page and left it blank. "Some names ask for night. In the daylight they will scorch. Today's lesson belonged to the children; the next lesson the women will study at night." Ananya asked, "May we sit with you?" Meera replied, "You may sit, but first let the age of listening grow inside you."

The green point on the stump glowed faintly in the darkness. The school's first lesson did not end; it began turning into a night assembly. The children closed the register but left the blank page open. In charcoal above it they wrote: "Next Lesson: Women's Night Assembly." No crocodile was visible in the distant water, but a ripple made one circular ring—as though the boundary line of kabaddi had entered the night.

FOLK SONG: SAY PRESENT

Folk tune: attendance folk tune

Say it softly, say "Present";

Count the name even of the one no one counted.

The first lesson is not letters—say "Present";

Before the empty stone, bear your lost name.

The one whose name is not on paper also has a turn;

The one whose body is far away carries a debt present and heavy.

Some names scorch in the daylight;

The women's night assembly will open and tell their bodies.

The register is closed, the blank page open to night;

A crocodile-ripple drew a circle and spoke of the next turn.

Say "Present" softly for the one no one counted;

With one word a nameless life is born again.

Before the empty stone, bear your lost name;

The one whose body is far away—understand that debt as present.

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE WOODEN PUPPET: A puppeteer moved a wooden puppet by strings. A voice came from the stage: "Bring the pot." The puppet turned, lifted a small pot and brought it.]

CHAPTER 85

The Women's Night Assembly

The true body of the words spoken by day opens in the night assembly, when women begin to speak.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: A ROAD FROM THE DUST OF FEET

Folk tune: labour-traveller song

*Come, brothers, come with the dust-mark upon your brows;
Step by step, make the road of the future from footprints.*

*The dust of labourers' feet writes the map of the road;
Where labour steps, there alone can development be seen.
Do not brush the dust away in contempt; place it upon the forehead in honour;
Shoes, rest and a safe road are all rights.*

*Step joining step makes road, bridge, house and city;
Without the worker's name no progress can be called complete.
From the dust of feet comes the road, from the road a bright future;
Respect for labour is Mithila's greatest adornment.*

*Upon the hands that carry bricks rests the first foundation of the palace;
In the roots of bridge, road and city lives the life of sweat.
Rest, shoes and safe work are rights, not charity;
Without full respect for labour, progress has no honour.*

The page left open did not spend the night merely waiting—it summoned its own assembly as soon as evening fell. The first lesson of the Coconut-Leaf School, “Present,” had been taught by day; but the word’s true body opened at night. When the men’s arguments grew tired and returned home, when half the children slept and the other half kept watch, women began quietly gathering around the stump of Channa Grove. No one announced that there would be a meeting. No one erected a stage. Yet one by one the women came carrying sari-ends, shawls, bags, sticks, lamps, water and silence, and around the stump the night itself became an assembly.

Ujjwal's mother came first. In her hand was her son's old shirt, never washed since the last day he had drowned in the screen. The smell of sweat had gone from it, but the hard salt of maternal memory remained. Behind her came Devika, the light of anger still sharp in her eyes. Saumya brought her notebook but did not open it. Meera carried a bundle containing red thread, blank paper and a small glass bowl. Ira, Ananya, Ba, two elderly women descended from Saryu's line, widows of bridge labourers, women cheated at hospitals, and the silent woman who had heard the secret-love story of the dance teacher also came.

The night air was moister than the day's. Fine drops of dew settled upon shawls; from the distant pond, an occasional frog-call and the slap of water became punctuation marks in the assembly. The green point that had broken from within the cut stump was not visible in the darkness, yet the women said they could smell it. Ba placed her hand on the edge of the stump and said, "Tonight neither men's papers nor government notices will be read. Tonight the body will speak." The silence that followed was not fear but consent.

Meera did not begin the meeting; she gave it protection. She said, "Whatever is spoken here belongs to the one who speaks it. No one's story will enter the register without her permission. No humiliation of any body will become spectacle. Whoever wishes to remain silent will have that silence accepted as present." By day the children's school had taught the word "Present"; at night the women filled that word with the breath of privacy.

The first testimony came not from Ujjwal's mother but from his shirt. She placed it beside the stump. "Everyone says my son lost to the screen. But he did not lose to the screen alone; he lost to the silence of a society that does not let fraud be spoken of at home because of shame. I am his mother, yet I too could not hear his fear. My testimony today is this: before the soul of a son is lost, the ears of the mother must open." Hearing this, Devika bent and touched the corner of the shirt. No one applauded; in the women's assembly, acceptance came not through the noise of hands but through a change in breathing.

Devika said, "I fight fraud, but I have learned that fraud does not eat money alone. It eats shame, trust and the right to admit one's mistake. When a girl says she has been trapped, she is blamed first. When a young man loses, he is called a fool. The fraudsters sit abroad operating accounts, while the family smashes a pot of shame upon the victim's head. That smashing will stop now."

Then a widow of a bridge labourer rose. In the register she had once been written as “Munna’s wife”; that night she said, “My name is Phulkumari. Water took Munna’s body beside the bridge pier. On paper he was not a labourer; he was called an absent worker. People kept calling me widow, but no one asked my name. When a labourer’s foot sinks into earth, the foot of the woman in his household sinks too. Tomorrow, if a chapter is written about the labourer’s feet, write the cracked lines of our heels as well.”

Saumya still kept her notebook closed. She began, “I—” then stopped and corrected her own language. “When I wrote in the city, I thought writing a woman’s story meant recording her pain. Now I understand—first record her permission, her language, her pauses, her refusals. Writing without listening is another kind of occupation.” Meera looked at her; agreement passed between them without a sentence.

Ira untied the knot of the migrant mind in her own testimony. “Abroad we search for village women in pictures—fish, paag, Madhubani, folk songs. But after coming here I have understood that the village woman is not merely colour; she is argument. When Gangesha’s justice was discussed, everyone spoke of reading the Tattvacintamani. But justice remains incomplete without the memory of the leatherworker woman suppressed from Gangesha’s life. Society kept the scripture and erased the woman’s name. How great a theft of names was that?”

At this question an elderly woman from Saryu’s line rose. Her voice was rough as a broom. “The caste system always builds its fortress by guarding a woman’s body. A daughter is killed in the name of purity of lineage; sticks rise in the name of love; fear spreads that marriage will change caste—none of this is honour. It is the rule of fear. Those killed in the name of honour come at night to Channa Grove. They are not ghosts; they are questions.”

Ba said softly, “Gangesha wrote the Tattvacintamani—said to equal twelve thousand books. But if we cannot read the name of one woman of society within it, for whom is the weight of twelve thousand books?” At her sentence a cracking sound came from the roots of the cut stump. The children keeping watch at a distance ran over. Ananya asked, “What shall I write?” Ba said, “Write—if justice does not understand the caste imposed upon a body, reasoning remains incomplete.”

Meera opened the red thread. A piece was given into every woman’s hand. The rough touch of the cotton felt like a vow-thread tied around the palm—light, yet impossible to forget. A rule was made: this thread would not be a bond but a reminder. A woman who had told her story would keep the thread on her own wrist, not leave it beside the stump. Telling a story does not turn a woman into public property; she continues to guard her own story. The small rule was enormous.

A young woman who had remained silent until then tied the thread around her wrist and said, "Do not write the name of my love. Write—one woman who, despite fear, refused to call the truth inside herself a lie." Meera looked at her and said, "The right to the name is yours. Not speaking the name is also protection of the name." Devika wrote on the page: "Confidentially present." All the women agreed to the new phrase.

Half the night had passed. From behind the stump of Channa Grove arose a sound like a winter wind. Someone thought Old Budhba's Ghost had come. But this time it was a woman's voice—very old, from an age when caste coiled around the body like a python, when marriage was called sin, when a woman's entry into the house of knowledge survived only as whisper. The voice was not clear, but its meaning was: "Read us not in books, but in life." Ira shivered. No one spoke a name, yet everyone understood that the women suppressed by history were present in the assembly.

Saumya opened her notebook for the first time. But she did not write the whole story. She wrote only the heading: "Evidence of the Body." Beneath it she left blank space. "Blank space too is a document. For what cannot be written without permission, leave blank space." The method of evidence within Gangesha's justice changed in the women's hands that night—beside perception, inference and testimony, "consent" too became evidence.

At that time a subtle drumbeat sounded from far away. No men were present. The ghosts' kabaddi? No. The children too were not playing. Then at the water's edge appeared three or four shadows—women ghosts whose feet moved forward without touching the ground. They did not play kabaddi. They measured the circle—as though examining whether Channa Grove had enough circumference for women's voices.

The assembly ended before dawn. No resolution was formally passed, but five things stood settled. First—no story of anyone's body without permission. Second—when caste inflicts violence upon love, marriage, labour or names, make it a question of justice. Third—the shame of digital fraud belongs not to the victim but to the fraudster and the silent society. Fourth—write the name of the woman of the household beside the labourer's name. Fifth—privacy is not the enemy of memory; it is memory's dignity.

In the first light before dawn, the women rose one by one. Whether the green point on the stump had grown a little larger that night or it was an illusion of the eye, no one could say. Phulkumari looked at her cracked heels and said, "Tomorrow let us read the labourer's feet." The children answered, "Present."

Before sunrise the women left, but around the stump remained the smell of red thread, the dampness of the shirt, the weight of the blank page and the dust of cracked heels. Garh Narikel's next morning already knew: the history of those whose feet were buried in the bridge piers was not only the history of male labourers; with them had sunk women's heels, children's hunger and the unspoken names of households. From here the story turned toward the labourer's feet.

FOLK SONG: THE WOMEN'S NIGHT

Folk tune: women's-circle farewell song

The assembly rose, the women's night assembly rose;

Untold stories became the lesson of morning.

Words of day find their true bodies at night;

When sisters speak, earth and house tremble.

Red thread, damp shirt, the weight of the blank page;

In cracked heels lies the bridge's whole history.

The man's name in the pier, the woman's labour at home;

The child's hunger too sank into that iron voice.

Phulkumari said—tomorrow read the feet;

Whoever's heel is cracked, build that name too.

The night assembly rose; its scent remained at the door;

Women's untold stories became the morning lesson.

Phulkumari said—tomorrow read the feet again.

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE DOOR: Birro rose. Bihari stopped; yet how a whole sentence awoke within a single word remained a matter of discussion.]

CHAPTER 86

The Labourer's Feet

Once the name is present, ask—upon what earth did those feet fall?

WATER-BURIAL AMONG THE CROCODILES

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: REST FOR THE SCREEN, FESTIVAL FOR THE EYES

Folk tune: daylong folk song

*Put the screen away, give it one day of rest;
Fill the cupped hands of the eyes with trees and sky.*

*Let the screen rest for one day, let the eyes go to the grove;
See the colour of earth, the veins of leaves, the movement of clouds.
Let the phone be silent, the family speak, the courtyard hear songs;
Let the child sit beside grandmother and choose an old game.*

*Fasting from the screen is not punishment but a festival of life;
In face-to-face laughter, the taste of belonging returns.
The eyes rest, the mind widens, the body's rhythm mends;
With balance beside technology, life grows beautiful.*

*The phone sleeps in a basket, the courtyard stays awake;
Grandmother and grandchild play counters, laughter falling in streams.
The colour of earth, the veins of leaves, the slow movement of clouds;
This feast for the eyes fills the mind's empty plate.*

By morning the story that had turned took the road—from the village to the half-built bridge. After the republic of names completed its first lesson, the children felt that saying “Present” did not finish the story. Once a name was present, they also needed to hear how that body had moved, on what earth its feet had fallen, in what bridge its labour had been buried. So one morning the children of the Coconut-Leaf School took the register, kohl, an earthen bowl and some blank leaves and walked toward the half-built bridge where, years before, labourers' names had been dropped from the contractor's account.

From afar the bridge showed iron, sand, cement, government paint, inauguration ribbon and a stony deck shining in the sun. But the closer one came, the more fatigue appeared in its body. The soil beside the pier still sank in a strange way, as though something remained trapped below. Aruni had seen the map of that place many times, measured it many times, marked warnings in red in files many times. Yet walking there with the children that day, he felt that the true measure of a bridge was not taken with a tape but with the fatigue of feet.

An old man came first—Munna Paswan's uncle. He wore no sandals. The soles were cracked, the heels split, the big toenail bent, yet his stride had a strange steadiness. He stood beside the first pier and said, "My brother's sweat fell here. His name is not on paper, but the pressure of his feet is here." The children fell silent. Ananya placed the earthen bowl before him. The old man set his foot in it, then left an impression upon a leaf. The cool wet clay climbed from the sole upward, and when the print was lifted it made a faint snapping sound—as though the earth itself had raised and handed over its seal.

This was the first footprint. Not a photograph, not an identity card, not a thumbprint of the kind seized by a bank, police station or office. It was a footprint—evidence of a life that had walked. Gangesha's question descended again upon the leaf. Perception—the cracked foot stood before them. Inference—within those cracks were hidden rain, sun, hunger, loads and the contractor's abuse. Testimony—the uncle was speaking. Yet the children understood a fourth evidence too: the smell of labour, which remains less upon paper and more within earth.

Ira wrote upon the leaf: "The foot of Munna Paswan's uncle: labour present." Ba dropped one bead of water on the leaf. It spread and blurred the line of kohl slightly, but did not erase it. Ba said, "That is how the name of labour is—tears may make it faint, but cannot erase it."

Gradually the families of labourers arrived. Someone's father had worked on the bridge, someone's husband, someone's son, someone's sister who carried food for the workers. At first the women hesitated—"Why our feet?" Devika asked, "Did the feet that carried bread not labour?" At that question a woman lifted the edge of her skirt, placed her foot in the earth, and printed it upon a leaf. In her foot sounded not anklets but kitchen smoke and river mud.

Leaf after leaf beside the pier filled with feet—black, grey, wet, crooked, small, broad; children's, elders', women's, men's. Every print was different; every print held a story. In government records the labourers were "numbers." In the contractor's accounts, "daily wages." In the foreign consultant's paper, "workforce." But upon these leaves they rose as feet—the feet on which the bridge stood, for whom no nameplate had ever been placed upon it.

Aruni touched the bridge pier. His hand trembled. He was an engineer; he had been taught to measure load, depth, mixture, proportion, tension and pressure. No one had taught him that contempt for labour hollows out a bridge's soul. He said to the children, "A bridge that does not keep the labourers' names is an incomplete bridge." Ananya immediately wrote: "A bridge is complete when the feet are present."

At that moment Chandrapal Batra's men arrived from a distance. They carried a small plaque: "Martyr Labourers' Memorial Wall." The size was decided, the place decided, the letters decided. One man said, "Give us the names, we will print them." The children pointed to the circle of leaves and said, "The names may be printed, but first read the feet." The man laughed. "Can feet be read?" The old uncle replied, "One who cannot read feet cannot read the bones pressed beneath a bridge either."

At this sentence the air changed. From beneath the bridge arose not water but a cold groan. The air under the iron shadow was heavy like stale water; as soon as it touched the body, the skin chilled. No one went closer to look. Everyone understood that a resting-place of labour's bones is not always a cremation ground; sometimes it lives beneath a bridge being built, a rising building, a gleaming road, or an inauguration stage.

Meera added another rule that day. She said, "Whoever gives a footprint—without that person's permission, the image, story or tears will not go into any leaflet, screen or stage." The women agreed. The oath of privacy was now joined to the dignity of labour. Earlier humiliation of the body broke privacy; now humiliation of labour sold memory. They were two teeth of the same crocodile.

Saumya arranged the footprints in order. She was not making notes; she was making a guard. On the back of every leaf they wrote one sentence: "This print is preserved for public memory with the family's consent." Gop Kumar's eyes lit up at the sentence. He said, "Not data—trust." The children laughed. Devika said, "Yes, and if trust is stolen, we will write the thief's name too."

By afternoon a long path of leaves had formed beside the bridge pier. The path moved toward the water and then turned back toward the stump of Channa Grove. It was as though the workers' feet had not merely built the bridge and crossed the river; they were returning to the village by the road of memory. The children lifted the leaves one by one, spoke the names, and the families answered "Present." The old rhythm of kabaddi returned here—one foot crossing the boundary, holding breath, speaking a name, then returning.

Then Ananya suddenly drew a line in the earth. "Feet on this side, paper on that side. Any paper that refuses the name of the feet is out." The children immediately understood the game. One child crossed saying "kabaddi-kabaddi," reached the paper plaque, lifted it, placed it inside the circle of footprints, and returned before the breath broke. Everyone laughed. Yet there was justice in the laughter. The game again moved faster than the language of law.

Satyavrat Mehta stood behind them watching. He remembered countless affidavits in court. How many testimonies correct on paper but false to life; how many witnesses absent in court but present in the earth. Slowly he removed his shoes. Aruni was startled. Satyavrat placed his feet on the soil and said, "I am not a labourer, but in the silent crime of this bridge my feet too have eaten dust." The children did not take his print. Ananya said, "Not your feet. Your silence has already been written. This place belongs to labourers' feet." Satyavrat bowed his head and stepped back. Even the refusal given to him became part of justice that day.

As evening came, the footprints were spread on stones to dry. The last line of sunlight fell across the leaves and shone. Each foot seemed marked not by fire but by memory. Ba said, "Whose feet are correctly read upon earth, that soul need not wander in the water." At the sentence a faint ripple rose in the distant river. No crocodile appeared, but a dark shadow turned upon the surface and vanished again.

By night the footprints were brought beside the stump of Channa Grove. The stones of names and the leaves of feet were placed together. The archive was no longer only of names; it became an archive of lives that had walked. The children opened a new section in the register: "Archive of Feet." Its first sentence read: "Whoever walked upon the earth requires not only a garland upon the head in memory, but justice for the feet."

As everyone began to return home, the sound of a labourer's sandal continued for a long time from the direction of the bridge. No one was there. Perhaps wind. Perhaps memory within the roots. Perhaps those labourers whose wages were withheld, whose names were erased, whose bodies drowned, yet whose feet were still walking upon the earth.

As she walked home Ananya said, "Tomorrow the school will have no screens." Devika asked, "Why?" Ananya replied, "Today we read feet. Tomorrow we must open the eyes and ears again. The screen that chews the mind all day will fast for one day." The children laughed with the held breath of kabaddi. The next day a screen-fast was to begin in Garh Narikel.

FOLK SONG: DUST OF THE LABOURER'S FEET

Folk tune: labour song

*Read the dust, read the dust of the labourer's feet;
At every step remember the name of an unnamed worker.*

*The name is present; now ask the earth of the feet;
Which field did they leave, inside which pier do they sleep?
Sandals worn, heels cracked, wages left far away;
In the bridge's breast is buried the warm light of labour.
The returning wind heard the sound of sandals;*

*No one was there, yet the rhythm of footsteps sounded.
Without justice for the feet, justice for names is incomplete;
Read the dust, read the road, read the labourer fully.
When you walk upon the bridge, honour the steps below;
At every step remember the name of an unnamed worker.*

No one was there, yet the rhythm of footsteps sounded.

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE VILLAGE ON THE GANGA:
A traveller was told, "The village is on the Ganga." He took a boat and began searching for houses in the current. Because of an intimate relation with the Ganga, the word "Ganga" indicated the riverbank. The village earth was damp with water, its life dependent upon the river.]

CHAPTER 87

Fasting from the Screen

After a one-day fast from the screen, the sound of one's own breath returns to the ears.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: MORNING FROM HOME IN A LETTER ABROAD

Folk tune: traveller-letter song

Write a letter, write to the one abroad;

Fill it with courtyard laughter and news of every new shoot.

Write to the child abroad—the courtyard is still laughing;

A shoot has broken from the cut stump, tulsi leaves are still there.

Mother's health, father's field, water in the pond;

With true news from home, distance grows lighter.

No commands in the letter, only an open door of affection;

Return whenever you wish, the home will remain ready.

Send morning abroad in a letter, fill it with the colours of hope;

In a distant city the smell of home will become a bright thread.

The tulsi altar, pond water, father's fields and threshing ground;

Mother's fritters made from colocasia leaves—tell of them all.

Not an order but an invitation of affection; the door will remain open;

The scent of the letter will make the room abroad smell of home.

The morning of the announced fast awakened the village's ears before it awakened anything else. The earth on the labourers' footprints had not even dried when the children of the Coconut-Leaf School made their next decision—a one-day screen-fast in Garh Narikel. A fast not of food, but of sight. Eyes trapped all day in shining glass would spend one day looking toward earth, water, faces, stones, names and sky.

As soon as the proposal was heard, the village split in two. Someone said, "No mobile phones? Then how will we receive news?" Another asked, "What about shop transactions? A medical call? A message from a son living in the city?" The children made no harsh rule. They said, "For emergencies the road of voice will remain open. But let there be one day's rest from greed, lies, spectacle, games, gambling, humiliation, fear and purposeless staring."

Ananya placed a small earthen pot beside the stump. It was named the "screen-pot." Whoever voluntarily wished to deposit a mobile phone, old device, broken tablet, small gaming screen—whatever it was—for one day placed it in a cloth bag beside the pot. No one was compelled. The children had learned from Gangsha's question that morality forced by power is not evidence either; it is merely another form of fear.

Devika placed her phone first. A slight tremor crossed her face, because shadows of Ujjwal's last message still came and went in that device. Tying the bag, she said, "Let it rest for one day too." Meera placed her device and said, "The thing that once tried to sell my sight will close its eyes today." Saumya hesitated for a while; news kept arriving from a distant city. Then she said, "Today I will hear the news from people's mouths."

Satyavrat Mehta placed his small mobile phone last. People looked at him in surprise. He did not even smile. "For many years, as soon as the phone rang, I rose from the middle of people's voices. Today the phone will remain silent and I will remain seated." Hearing this, Ba slowly nodded. She had no mobile phone, but she placed her old spectacles beside the pot. "My sight too has been blurred for some days; today I will listen."

The day of the screen-fast opened in a strange way. On an ordinary day the first thing to rise from each house was the chime of notifications; that day the rooster's call, the clang of a ladle, the creak of a well-rope and children's laughter were heard first. It seemed to the village that its ears had been returned.

People gathered around the stump of Channa Grove. Today there was no reading of names but a "reading of mouths." One person from each household told an old story—on which day the news of the first bridge had been heard; whose boat broke in which flood-night; who went to the city for medicine and was cheated; who saved whom from a screen-lie; who, after hearing a threat of digital arrest, ran to open the door. The stories held fear of technology, but even more the loneliness of human beings.

Gop Kumar spread out a paper map that day. He did not open a digital list. By hand they began writing the names of those cheated by screen-fraud whose voices had never been recorded anywhere. An old farmer said, "I did not understand the bank message. My son was in the city. People in the village said everything happens by phone now. The phone ate my field.” The children wrote a sentence: “The phone does not eat the field; loneliness does.”

At noon the children of the school went out to play kabaddi instead of using their phones. But this was no ordinary kabaddi. The rule was: while crossing the line, a child would not say “kabaddi” but a name. If, before the breath broke, the child could tell that name’s story, the child could return. If the name remained incomplete, all the players together would complete it. Winning and losing gave way to practice in presence.

The first boy crossed the line and said, “Saryu...” then stopped. From the other side came a voice: “Saryu Paswan, labourer.” A third said, “His name was buried in the bridge pier.” The boy completed his breath and returned. No one applauded; everyone said only, “Present.” Kabaddi became a game again, but inside the game the body of history was moving.

Watching this, Old Budhba’s Ghost became almost clearly visible in the shade of the stump. In daylight his figure was not smoke but that of a tired man. Seeing the children play, a smile came to him. Perhaps he understood that the ghosts’ kabaddi had reached the children’s hands; spirits no longer needed to guard defeat but could hand over the tradition of play.

Meera and the women taught the second lesson of privacy that day. They said, “Merely turning off the mobile phone is not enough. Another person’s face, grief, love, body or tears—simply seeing them does not make you their owner.” At this sentence some young men were ashamed. Digital fraud does not steal only money; it can make the gaze itself criminal—this understanding slowly entered everyone.

By evening old songs returned to the village. Songs that had once been sung at weddings and gradually drowned under the loud music of phones emerged from the throats of elderly women. Some lines were complete, some half remembered. The children wrote down the half-lines too. Ba said, “The incompleteness of a song also needs guarding, just like a name.” The cut stump of Channa Grove seemed to grow slightly damp at those songs, as though its roots were listening beneath the water.

For the shopkeepers the day was difficult. Transactions were written by hand. The smell of red cloth on ledgers and fresh ink spread through the shops—the smell of relationship before the smell of sale, after many years. For the first time many people understood how much debt there actually was, the full name of the debtor, which widow took rice on credit and how often she repaid without speaking. With the screen on, numbers were visible; when it was off, relationships appeared.

Meanwhile Chandrapal Batra grew restless in a distant city. That day his tribute app showed little activity from Garh Narikel. The data fell. Clicks fell. The flow of donations paused. He understood that if one village could live for one day without a screen, a hole had opened in his net. He wanted to send Raghav a message but stopped himself, because Raghav's network had already shut down from within in an earlier chapter.

Broom's research team was astonished. They knew the phrase "digital detox," but Garh Narikel's fast did not fit inside it. People here had not turned off their screens as a health fashion. They were trying to return the names of the dead, the right to privacy, the farmer's debt, the labourer's body and the breath of kabaddi to human beings. Harvard's notebook remained blank that day because the right words were hard to find.

At night, when the bags were opened, no one snatched up a phone in haste. First the children announced around the stump: "The device is returning, and the rules return with it." The rules were written: phones off during the nightly reading of names; no picture of anyone's tears without permission; no entertainment made from anyone's grief; do not read a fraudulent message alone—ask the community; when afraid, do not stay with the phone—knock on a human door.

People picked up their devices one by one, but this time they did not immediately put them in their pockets; they weighed them in their hands. As though each mobile phone were asking: am I the master or the tool? The children left a blank place for the answer. Some questions are not filled in immediately; they are lived.

In the last watch of night, when everyone was tired and content, Ananya looked toward the sky. Because the shade of Channa Grove had been cut away, the sky was now fully open. Eyes without screens took time to adjust to the darkness; then the stars appeared one by one—as though the eyes too were breaking their fast. In the north-west a very tiny green point flashed and vanished. Someone called it a star, someone an aircraft, someone an illusion. The children wrote in the register: "Today the screen closed; the sky opened."

Ira gazed for a long time toward the green point. She thought of the children of Garh Narikel living abroad—children who understood only half their Maithili, saw the village in pictures, and took the pain of their roots as stories. That very night she decided to write to them. The letter would not say, "Remember the village." It would ask: if there is a screen in your hand, can you also hear the names?

Ba's spectacles beside the pot, Satyavrat's phone, Devika's device, Meera's thread and the children's register shone together in the moonlight. The screen-fast ended, but its hunger did not. People understood that one day of silence was not enough; every day needed a small corner where there was no screen, only the human voice.

FOLK SONG: FASTING FROM THE SCREEN

Folk tune: daylong folk song

*Keep one day, keep one day of fasting from the screen;
Look beyond the screen toward the homes of your people.*

*One day the screen closed and the eyes saw earth;
The ears recorded their own breath, stove and water-wheel.
The mobile stayed hungry, the human being filled again;
The old road between face and face reappeared.
Beside the pot spectacles, thread and register shone;*

*In the silence, questions of distant children were born.
Keep one corner every day where no screen remains;
There let only human breath and names flow.
The fast is for one day, the lesson for a lifetime;
Look beyond the screen toward the homes of your people.*

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—SAINDHAVA: While eating, the king said, “Bring saindhava.” The servant ran toward the stable because saindhava can also mean a horse from Sindh. The cook stopped him: “At mealtime the king is asking for salt, not a horse.” The same word, two meanings.]

CHAPTER 88

Ira's Letter to Children Abroad

Whether the letter arrived is not for the post office to decide—the reply finds its own road.

CHAPTER-OPENING FOLK SONG: THE CHAUPAL OF UNHEARD VOICES

Folk tune: public-hearing mangal

*Give a seat, give the unheard the first seat;
Do not interrupt midway; hear the whole story.*

*Give the first seat to the one who was never heard;
Do not interrupt—give dignity to telling the whole story.
Make the chaupal round, lower the height of the stage;
Light lamps of quiet ears and bring every unheard voice.*

*Testimony is not weak because its language is simple;
People's experience can preserve a new direction for law.
The chaupal of unheard voices will make society complete;
Through a culture of listening, justice will enter every home.*

*Break the steps of the stage and spread a round chaupal;
Give honour to testimony spoken in simple language.
Keep the lamp of the ear burning, filled with the oil of patience;
Through this culture of listening, justice comes to the doorstep.*

The first line written before dawn was now demanding its complete letter. On the second morning after the screen-fast, the village sky seemed a little clearer. During the day when mobile phones remained closed, people's ears had recovered the sounds of their own bodies—the breath, footsteps, water rising on a pulley, rice cooking on the stove, and children's kabaddi. But Ira understood that this fast was not enough for those inside the village alone. Many children of Garh Narikel were growing up in homes where there was no smoke from a hearth but machines blowing warm air; where the river existed in photographs and the village was a “place” for holidays, not a debt of life.

That morning Ira sat on the veranda of the Coconut-Leaf School. Before her stood the cut stump of Channa Grove, the green point on one side and stones of names on the other. Among those stones were some whose names children born abroad could not pronounce. Looking at them, Ira thought: how will a child who cannot speak an ancestor's name hear that ancestor's grief? How will one who hears the village only as story participate in the village's justice?

Upon a leaf she wrote the first sentence: “Dear children living far away, Garh Narikel is not your holiday picture; it is your responsibility.” Her hand stopped as soon as she wrote it. Wherever the reed-pen moved, the veins of the leaf rose beneath her fingers—as though the letter were being written upon its own body. The word responsibility was severe, but necessary. If memory becomes only sweetness, it can be sold like confectionery in a market. When memory becomes responsibility, the teeth of crocodiles jam when they try to chew it.

In the letter Ira wrote that the village earth was not only the memory of hearth, pond, mango, betel, fish and the taste of paan. The village was also the place where labourers' feet were buried beneath bridge piers, where a young man's mind drowned in digital fraud, where a camera lunged at a woman's privacy, where a court chewed up years, where names waited in the darkness of Channa Grove. If you are descendants of this village, your first task is not to make its grief visible but audible—listen first.

In the middle of the letter she made a short line of rules: “If you come to Garh Narikel, do not take a photograph first; hear one name first. If you do not understand the language, learn the pronunciation. If you mispronounce, apologise to the family that owns the name. If you come to research, keep silence before the question. If you wish to donate, give your attention before your money.”

As she wrote, Ira remembered her days abroad: orderly cities, measured roads, shining glass, the silence of libraries, and within that silence her own incomplete pronunciation. Abroad people had often asked her, “Does your village have ghost stories?” She had smiled, because then it had been hard to answer: say yes and it became spectacle; say no and it became untruth. Now she wrote, “If you ask about ghosts, understand first—the ghost is not the thing that frightens you; the ghost is a name whose justice was never completed.”

Ananya sat beside her. Reading the letter she asked, “Will children born abroad be able to write the name of their village?” Ira said, “Perhaps not. But the child who tries can become a watchkeeper.” Ananya removed a blank page from the register. "We will write their replies here."

In the second part of the letter Ira added Gangesha's story. She wrote: "Mithila is not merely a land of caste pride; it is a land of questions. Gangesha Upadhyaya wrote the Tattvacintamani and gave birth to Navya-Nyaya. Yet society tried to suppress the inconvenient episodes of his life. If you hear Mithila's glory, hear Mithila's injustice too. Those who worship the thinker but fear the truth of the thinker's life are not practising justice; they are trading in idols."

The letter continued: "Caste is the first theft of a name. It places a guard of lineage before a human name. The children of Garh Narikel are writing against this theft. Names pressed inside leatherworker, Das, boatman, Musahar, woman, widow, migrant, labourer, lover, cheated youth, ashamed family or silent body will all be called Present in full voice."

Saumya remained silent over this part of the letter for a long time. It seemed to her that Ira was not merely calling children abroad; she was teaching them the ethics of arrival. The memory of the village had often become decoration in outside hands. Now Ira wanted even the village's own children abroad not to become decorators, but to learn how to guard.

By afternoon several copies of the letter had been made—some on coconut leaves, some on paper, some for electronic sending. Devika said, "The screen-fast is over and now the screen again?" Ira smiled. "The screen itself is not a crocodile. The screen that chews names is a crocodile; the screen that carries names back home is a boat." Devika wrote the sentence down. It would be useful in the school's lessons against digital fraud.

In the evening the first letter crossed the sea. It did not become visible, rise into the air, or turn into a bird; yet a faint light fell on the green point of the stump. The children said the letter had travelled by the road of the sky. That evening there was no sound like the bell of a postal runner; only one long rustling of coconut leaves, slowly fading toward the sea. Old Budhba's Ghost said, "Not a letter—breath has gone." His voice was barely audible, but Ananya wrote: "Breath sent to distant lands."

Two days later a reply came. The first was from a boy in Toronto called "Neil" at home, though his grandmother had called him Neelkanth. He wrote: "I have never been to Garh Narikel. I have seen Channa Grove in pictures. I read names incorrectly. But I will learn. Send me my first name." Ira did not cry while reading the letter, but her voice grew soft. She said to Ananya, "Send him first the name of that labourer whose family has no one abroad."

The second reply came from Melbourne. A girl wrote: "My mother says the village has too many complications, so stay in the city. But if names are buried inside those complications, I want to listen." The third was from a child in Dubai: "My father builds buildings, but his name is not written on the building. Will his name also enter the watch of names?" The Coconut-Leaf School discussed this question all day. The chapter on the labourer's feet returned to memory.

Replies multiplied. Some children could not write Devanagari, some could not speak Maithili, some did not know the meaning of their surname, some had forgotten how to pronounce the village of a grandmother. Yet in every reply a similar line appeared: "I am present, but I still have learning to do." The children decided to make a special stone for the sentence. On it they wrote: "Present from afar."

The people of Batuknath Hariharan's Public Memory Trust became excited when they heard about the letters. Children abroad, migrant families, donations, stages, conferences, broadcasts—this seemed to them an opportunity to institutionalise memory. But below the letter Ira had written clearly: "This letter is not raw material for any trust, institution, stage, prize, donation appeal or cultural spectacle. It is a children's dialogue for guarding names." Hariharan's people frowned when they read the line.

Edward Broom's research team also took interest in the replies. Their phrase was "diaspora-memory network." Ira answered, "Call it a network and the language of wires, data, grants and ownership returns. I call it a chain of breath." The translator stopped. "Chain of breath" was difficult to render into English. Ira said, "Let it remain difficult. Not everything is born for translation."

At night, when "Present from afar" was written upon the stone, the shadow of the stump became unusually long. Whether it was stretching beyond the village boundary, across the bridge, station, airport and sea, no one directly saw. But the children writing letters dreamed of the cut stump, the green point and the circular line of kabaddi.

In Toronto Neelkanth dreamed that beneath his feet on snow the earth was warm. The girl in Melbourne saw sea-waves form Maithili letters and break upon the shore. The child in Dubai saw labourers' footprints turning to stone upon a sand dune. Their mobile screens did not shine all night; they trembled once, displayed "Present," and went dark.

These replies affected Garh Narikel too. Those who had mocked migrant children as "foreign, spoiled, language-forgetting" fell silent. Ba said, "Do not cut off the ear of one who wishes to hear a name from far away." Meera added, "But teach etiquette to the eyes along with the ears." Devika said, "And I will teach how to steer the screen-boat."

Ira sent the final copy to Satyavrat Mehta. With the letter she enclosed the children's replies, a picture of the "Present from afar" stone, and a question: "How should we hear the testimony of those who are distant, who do not know the language, who are not directly guilty of the wrongdoing, yet have grown up inside the world that benefited from it?" Satyavrat looked at the question for a long time. The law books had no prepared answer.

Late at night Satyavrat wrote back: "A public hearing is not only for bodies present in the room; it is also for debts that are present. If Garh Narikel wishes, the letters of distant children may be read at the next hearing." He folded the letter and sent it.

The next morning, when children gathered around the stump of Channa Grove, Ananya opened the register and wrote the heading: "Satyavrat's Public Hearing." Ira placed the letters from distant countries beside it. The green point on the cut stump was becoming two leaves. And the village understood—the hearing no longer had a boundary.

FOLK SONG: LETTER TO CHILDREN ABROAD

Folk tune: traveller-letter song

Write a letter, write to the children abroad;

Wherever you are, make a little chaupal of names.

From the light of the cut stump we sent word abroad;

Child, your village is not merely a small place upon a map.

Close the screen and hear the voices of stove and water;

The names of your ancestors still live in houses of leaves.

You were born far away, yet the debt is present;

The road of the letter finds you; the post cannot guarantee it.

Make maps, send questions, pronounce the names correctly;

A child beyond the border too can stand as a watchkeeper.

Not merely from the village—from the light of the roots this affection was written;

Wherever you are, give names a small chaupal there.

Make maps, send questions—become a watchkeeper with resolve.

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE DISPUTE OVER PANKAJA: A poet wrote, “The pankaja bloomed.” A new student of grammar objected: “A water-lily, insect or other thing born in mud could also be called pankaja; the meanings of the components lead that way.” The poet pointed to the lotus in the pond. “The components pank, ‘mud,’ and ja, ‘born,’ provide a general derivation, but the complete word-community, through long usage, evokes the particular lotus.”]

CHAPTER 89

Satyavrat's Public Hearing

At a public hearing, the greatest testimony is that which has never yet been heard.

OPENING FOLK SONG: THE PEOPLE'S LAW OF THE LEAF

Folk tune: Song of the People's Law

Read, O read the veins of the leaf, read Earth's law there,

Bear this constitution without a seal upon your head with care.

*In every vein of the dry leaf a river-road is drawn,
Nature's constitution stands accepted without a seal upon it.
Share the water, save the shade, guard the seed's right,
Creature, soil, and human—let the world live side by side.*

*If law stays joined to people, it will bend like a leaf,
Justice will reach the roots and shelter every life.
Read the leaf's people's law—simple, yet great,
In the letters of coexistence lives the breath of Earth.*

*Water first for the thirsty, shade first for the traveller,
The seed belongs to the next generation, the soil to everyone.
With creatures, trees, and plants together the world moves on,
In every letter of the people's law the Earth is nourished.*

No sooner had that new heading been written in the register than the day of the hearing seemed to stand before them of its own accord. No post office could certify whether Ira's letter had reached the children abroad. Yet the reply to that letter arrived in Garh Narikel in a strange way. The first answer from overseas was not an e-mail, not a parcel, not a money order—it came as a map drawn by a child's hand. Across the sea was a city of tall glass buildings, in its middle a small round dot, and above the dot, in trembling Devanagari letters: "Where am I to keep my grandmother's name here?"

Ira pinned the map to the wall of the Coconut-Leaf School. At first the children laughed, because no one could imagine where, in the middle of such a city, a grandmother's name might be kept. But the laughter quickly turned into silence. Ananya said, "The farther one is from one's soil, the more space one needs for a name." After that sentence, for the first time, a village child and a child abroad met inside the same sheet of paper.

That was when the date of Satyavrat Mehta's public hearing was fixed. Public hearing—the people of Garh Narikel had once heard the phrase with fear. In a government hearing the platform stood high, an official sat in a chair, announcements came through a microphone, police stood behind and files lay in front; people compressed their suffering into two minutes and received "under consideration" in reply. This time the hearing was to take place around the stump of the felled Channa tree. No platform, no rows of chairs, no microphone. The listeners would sit on the ground. The speakers would sit in the stump's shade.

Satyavrat Mehta arrived last. People were surprised, because he had earlier been urged to sit among everyone that day. But as soon as he arrived he said, "Today I am not the chair. Today I am not even the recorder. First, I am a listener. The children will write." An old disciple of Batuknath Hariharan, who had quietly slipped into the crowd, tried to smile at this; but the children noticed him. Here even a smile could become testimony.

Ananya, Devika, Meera, Ira, Aruni, Saumya, Gop Kumar and many women and men sat in a circle. Three objects were placed in the middle—the old register, a dry leaf of the Channa tree, and an empty clay bowl. The tips of grass beneath them pricked their thighs like tiny thorns, a lesson no chair had ever taught. Satyavrat asked, "Why the bowl?" Ba replied, "The silence of those who cannot speak will be placed here." Satyavrat lowered his head. He felt that his own silence, too, was asking for a place in that bowl.

The first testimony did not begin with Ira's letter or the map from abroad. It came from an old leatherworker woman. Leaning on her stick, she stepped forward and said, "When Gangesha's question arose, an old fire in my house flared up again. The caste that is willing to see me make its sandals does not want to see my daughter study scripture. You speak of justice—then ask: who makes the shoes of knowledge?"

Everyone fell still at the question. Satyavrat tried to write, but Ananya stopped his hand. "Let the question be completed first," she said. The old woman continued, "Gangesha wrote the Tattvacintamani and people accepted his book. But the story that breaks caste's glass was suppressed as shame. Tell me—whose honour? Whose killing? If thought was preserved and life was destroyed, what kind of justice is that?"

This time Satyavrat remained silent. It was not the silence of escape. Fivefold definitions of Navya-Nyaya rose within him, but the question of the woman before him stripped them naked one by one. Evidence belonged not only to books; the humiliation of a body was evidence too. Inference did not travel only from smoke to fire; it travelled from caste-smiles to violence. Testimony was not only the word of scripture; it was also the broken voice of the old woman.

The second testimony was connected with the map from abroad. Ira read from a letter: "At my school, Mithila is a project. I wrote my grandmother's name. The teacher said, 'Correct the spelling.' But my grandmother's name was not a spelling; it was my grandmother's voice." The children in the school looked towards the wall. On the hanging map, the glass city suddenly seemed a little blurred while the small round dot began to shine.

Satyavrat asked, "Under what category shall we record this reply?" Gop Kumar said, "Diaspora memory." Meera said, "Record it with consent." Ba said, "The child's grandmother's name first, the category later." In the end the register received the line: "Question of a child born far away: a name needs pronunciation, not spelling alone."

The third testimony came from the families of labourers. The new courage that had arisen after soil was brought from beneath the bridge pier now took the form of words. A young man said, "On paper my father was a temporary labourer. In the water he became permanent." Bodies in the circle shuddered. There was no joke in that one sentence, only the cruelty of the state. A dry Channa leaf trembled against the rim of the bowl. The children wrote: "Permanent water-burial of a temporary name."

This time Satyavrat himself spoke. "I will not deliver a verdict on these testimonies. In the habit of giving verdicts, for years we have made people's voices smaller. Today each testimony will remain in its own size." His voice was low, but there was hardness in the statement. Some people were disappointed; they wanted him to pronounce something like an order at once. Devika whispered, "An order would put power back into someone's hand. Let the hearing be shared hand to hand."

The rules of the hearing took shape there itself. No one who spoke would be interrupted. Whoever did not wish to speak could place their silence in the bowl. Whoever did not want a name made public could leave a sign instead. Testimony that wished to become an accusation and travel to court would have a separate page. Testimony that wished only to remain memory would not be pushed into a file. It was not a court, yet it was more careful than a court.

At midday Gop Kumar brought a copy of an old message from Raghav "Signal" Somani. It read: "Turn emotion into content, content into funding, funding into control.” People read it and understood that the market’s plan for memory had been hidden inside the words themselves. Beside the sentence Satyavrat wrote: “To call people’s memory ‘content’ is a second killing.” Ananya smiled. It was the first time Satyavrat’s pen was strengthening the hearing instead of reducing it.

Near evening something remarkable happened. Five children began drawing kabaddi lines at the edge of the cut stump. The hearing was still under way, and people first wanted to scold them. But Ba stopped them. “Hearing and play are not separate. A game played on held breath teaches how to listen to names.” Chanting “kabaddi, kabaddi,” the children circled the enclosure. On each round they touched a stone bearing a name. When a name was touched, the family answered, “Present.” The thud of running feet sent a faint tremor through the soil and into the palms of those sitting there—as though testimony were running beneath the ground as well. Play became a method of testimony.

At that moment Satyavrat Mehta understood why so much of the language of law, once written, had become lifeless. It did not know play. It did not know how to hold its breath. It did not touch names. It only read clauses in sequence. The children running around the Channa tree gave justice a body again. Satyavrat closed his notebook and, for the first time, listened with empty hands.

When night fell, the empty clay bowl had not filled, yet it had grown heavy. So many silences had been placed inside it. Meera tried to lift it, but the bowl did not move. Then the old leatherworker woman came forward again. “If you want to lift silence,” she said, “let caste, shame, fear, and office release their hands.” Four adults withdrew their hands. The girl Ananya placed one hand on the bowl, and it lifted.

The adults remained silent. Ananya opened a blank page of the register and wrote: “Rules are needed to guard names.” Satyavrat closed his eyes. A sentence rose inside him: “If rules are not given to the next generation, memory will be looted again.” But he did not say it. He looked at the girl. Ananya opened the blank page and wrote once more: “Rules are needed to guard names.”

All the children bent over that page. Someone wrote the first rule: “We will not erase names.” The second: “We will not mock silence.” The third: “We will not turn pain into spectacle.” The fourth: “The dignity of the body comes first.” The fifth: “Consent before putting anything on a screen.” The sixth: “We will not kill the truth of a life in the name of caste.” Satyavrat watched. The public hearing had, by itself, become the birthplace of a people’s code.

In the last watch of the night everyone departed. Around the stump remained the stones, leaves, bowl, register, and the rules written by the children. The moon was overhead, but its light no longer seemed like an order; it seemed like a reading lamp. The shimmer of Budhba's ghost appeared behind the stump. Today he said nothing. Perhaps he understood that on the day children begin to write rules, a ghost's duty of guarding becomes a little lighter.

The farther Satyavrat Mehta walked, the more one line written by the children kept sounding in his ears: "Rules are needed to guard names." He knew that the next day those rules would be asked for a name. Someone would call them a proposal, someone a code, someone a people-written oath. But the stump of the Channa tree knew: this was the first breath of a small constitution.

FOLK SONG: WHAT WAS NEVER HEARD

Folk tune: Public Hearing Song

*Listen, O listen, listen to what was never heard,
From unheard voices weave a new rule of the people.*

The greatest testimony is the voice that was suppressed,

A far-off child's map opened a new court.

The body is absent, the debt is present,

Letter, stone, tears, question—all are witnesses.

The moon became no order, but a reading lamp,

The children's rules kept sounding in Mehta's ears.

A ghost's watch grows lighter when children write law,

A breath of rules rises to guard the names.

A public hearing is no stage—it is the discipline of listening,

From unheard voices a new governance is made.

From the far child's map a new court opened.

The children's rules kept sounding in Mehta's ears.

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—THE CHILD'S "AMBA": A small child, crying from hunger, uttered "amba." A learned guest asked, "The word is grammatically incomplete; how did its meaning arise?" The mother replied, "Tone, circumstance, the child's previous behaviour, and resemblance to the correct form of 'amba' joined in the mind." A listener often recalls the correct word through a corrupted sound.]

CHAPTER 90

The Constitution of Names

A constitution can be written even on a dry leaf—if the writers are children.

OPENING FOLK SONG: EMPTY CHAIR, FULL PEOPLE

Folk tune: Festive form of the Silent Jhumar

Fill the chaupal, let the chair remain empty,

Let the current of work flow through the people's waking circle.

*Though the chair be empty, let the chaupal remain full,
If the office-holder does not come, the people's work must not stop.
Write one another's words, make the decision clear,
Adorn the empty seat with flowers of questions.*

*The chair is a sign of service, not merely a person,
An institution stands on people's trust—there is no cause for fear.
The vigilance of gathered people is greater than an empty office,
In democracy's jhumar, let affection be equal for all.*

*If the office-holder does not come, arrange flowers of questions,
Before the empty seat, pronounce your own decision.
The chair is the sign of service; people come and go,
An institution stands upon the pillars of the people's trust.*

At dawn that first breath began looking for a body between dry leaves, notebooks, and pens. On the second day after the public hearing, no lesson was taught at the Coconut-Leaf School. The children sat with notebooks open, but in the teacher's hand was not a textbook; it was a dry leaf fallen from the stump of the Channa tree. Its veins spread like rivers, channels, villages, roads, wounds, and witnesses of some unknown geography written upon one green body. The teacher placed the leaf in the middle and said, "Today we will write, not read." A collective flutter of turning pages rose once and stopped—as though the whole school had held its breath together.

Ananya immediately asked, "What are we to write?" The teacher replied, "The rules you will make to guard your names." At first the children laughed; the word "rules" reminded them of school scolding, municipal notices, court dates, and the terms of Chandrapal's app. But the teacher said again, "These rules will not come from above. They will arise from the names placed around the stump."

Ba sat in a corner of the school that day. Her hearing had grown weak, but she could still hear clearly whatever rose from the soil. She said, "A constitution is made by a society willing to look at its own crimes. A society that writes only its glory writes not rules but genealogy." That sentence became the first line in the children's notebooks: "First look at the crime; then write the rule."

Satyavrat Mehta sat at the back. He had much to say, for he had lived long with the words constitution, law, rights, procedure, justice, and state. Yet he remained silent. People had begun to understand his second silence. He stayed quiet so the children's words would not be crushed beneath his. Sometimes even human knowledge becomes a crocodile—it chews another's experience and turns it into theory. This time Satyavrat did not want to become such a crocodile.

The first rule came from Devika: "We will not erase names." The children wrote it. Then Devika added, "A name will live not only in large letters on a memorial, but in the speech of the home, a mother's call, a labourer's wage-book, court papers, a hospital slip, school attendance, and the stone at the water's edge." The rule grew long, but the children did not stop. People disappear only after their names have first been made small.

Meera gave the second rule: "Privacy will not be sold." Some children fell silent. They had thought privacy meant shutting a door. Meera said, "Privacy is not a room closed by fear; it is the right that no one's body, face, love, shame, crying, letter, shadow, or silence be turned into a market without permission." The children wrote into the rule: "Consent before looking; dignity before telling."

Saumya offered the third rule: "The body will not be humiliated." At that rule, the sound of the women's night assembly returned to the school. Ujjwal's mother added, "A dead body is not an object either." Munna Paswan's sister said, "A labourer's feet are evidence too." Saryu's grandson said, "The name of a body drowned in water belongs to the water, not to any contract." The children kept writing; their hands ached, yet no one crossed out a line.

Aruni gave the fourth rule: "No contract shall be placed upon memory." A strange stillness spread through the school. The heritage-project file, the tender for memory, Broom's deed of gift, Chandrapal's tribute app, the procession of the false ghost—all seemed to run at once through the veins of the leaf. Aruni said, “No memorial will be built from someone’s suffering without the sufferer. No one will earn money in the name of those who were never heard.”

The fifth rule was born from Gangesha’s question. Ananya wrote: “Justice will not be murdered in the name of caste.” Some old faces hardened at once. To some the sentence seemed too sharp. But the children had already heard Gangesha’s story—the author of the Tattvacintamani, founder of Navya-Nyaya, a thinker as grave as twelve thousand books, and the crime of silencing an inconvenient truth of life in the name of honour. The children decided: “If we revere someone’s thought, we will not suppress the truth of that person’s life.”

The sixth rule came from Gop Kumar: “The truth of paper is incomplete without the voice of the people.” He still held copies, lists, and proofs. Yet he himself admitted that paper does not remain alive unless someone reads it, hears it, questions it, and joins it to suffering. Beneath this rule the children wrote: “Paper is witness, the human being is hearing, the soil is address.”

The seventh rule arose from the day of fasting from the screen: “Do not make convenience your master.” The children wrote that mobile phones, apps, messages, pictures, donations, archives, searches—all would remain tools, not masters. Use the device that helps preserve names; fast from the device that steals names, sells privacy, spreads fear, or chews the mind. At this rule Ujjwal’s mother gave a thin smile. It seemed to her that perhaps this was the answer her son had sent too late.

The eighth rule came from kabaddi. The children made it themselves: “Return before your breath breaks, but do not abandon your companion.” In kabaddi, the raider who crosses the earth’s boundary must return while holding breath. The children said, “Whoever crosses a boundary into power, market, foreign lands, screens, money, caste, research, charity, or the glitter of planets will return preserving the breath of names. Whoever does not return will be called back.” In this rule a later story glimmered from afar—for one day the boundary would stretch from Earth to the sky.

Ba gave the ninth rule: “Those whose names have not been found shall have the first seat.” Every child wrote this on a separate page. Everyone had understood that society forgets first those who have no documents, no lineage, no photograph, no signature. Giving the first seat to the unnamed became the soul of the Constitution of Names.

The tenth rule was asked of Satyavrat. He remained silent a long while. Then he said, “Keep an account of silence.” The children were startled. Satyavrat explained, “Write the name of the person who commits the crime; also write the silence of the one who sees and remains quiet. A society drowns not only because of criminals, but because of the silence of spectators.” Beneath this rule Ananya wrote: “Silence is also present.” Satyavrat’s face trembled.

The eleventh rule came from the memory of Panidubbi: “Do not claim what the water has kept.” River, pond, channel, stream, flood, water-burial—these were not only geography but witnesses. The children wrote that the story of a name drowned in water would be asked of the water; if a map was made, the paths of water would be shown; if a bridge was built, both the labourer’s feet and the movement of fish would be heard.

The twelfth rule came from Ira’s letter to the children abroad: “The village is not a souvenir; it is a responsibility.” Those living away would not preserve the village only as beautiful stories, festivals, language, food, and old photographs; they would ask: how many names were left out? How many stones are blank? How many children stand guard? Distance from the village is not release from memory; it is a new test of memory.

There was long debate over the thirteenth rule: “How does forgiveness happen?” The names Batuknath, Chandrapal, Raghav, Lau, and Broom moved in the air. Some children said, “No forgiveness.” Others said, “Punishment.” Ba said, “Forgiveness is not declared; it is slowly born from listening.” In the end they wrote: “Forgiveness will not be sought on a stage but in the labour of hearing names; first the profit of the crime must be relinquished, then forgiveness may be spoken of.”

The fourteenth rule concerned the future: “Children are guardians, elders witnesses, women bearers of the code, labourers owners of the soil.” No single mouth produced the entire line; everyone made it together. One child wrote “children are guardians,” Ba added “elders witnesses,” Meera “women bearers of the code,” and Aruni “labourers owners of the soil.” In this rule lay the seed of Garh Narikel’s new society.

When all the rules had been written, the question arose: who would put a seal on this constitution? The municipality? The court? A trust? The state? Satyavrat remained silent. Ananya took a dry fibre from the felled Channa stump, dampened it with water, and laid it in the corner of the page. “The seal of the root,” she said. The children dipped their thumbs in soil and pressed them below the page. When the thumbs lifted, cool smooth traces of earth remained; many children did not wash the dark rings from the edges of their nails until evening—as though they were the first stains of a vow. Those thumbprints were less evidence than promise.

Someone wanted copies of the constitution. Devika said, “Make them, but let every copy begin with a blank page. Any village that adds its name must first write the names it has left out.” With that decision the rules became not a fixed book but a moving leaf. The memory of Tattvacintamani rose again—when thought descends into the roots, one book becomes equal to twelve thousand voices.

At night the sheet of rules was read around the stump. After each rule people answered, “Present.” Those who had once kept away because they thought this was politics saw that the constitution was not a declaration for seizing power, but a pledge to preserve memory. Yet such a pledge can be more dangerous to power, because it awakens inside people.

Far away, in Batuknath Hariharan’s house, his descendants were reading a copy of the constitution. On Chandrapal’s device the line “We will not erase names” flashed again and again. On Raghav’s networkless phone “Silence is also present” froze on the screen. In Lau Kin-Hung’s glass room, “No contract upon memory” kept distorting in Chinese translation and then correcting itself. In a corner of Broom’s deed of gift appeared: “First look at the crime.”

That night in Garh Narikel no one invited the rogues to the assembly. Rules were made, testimony written, thumbprints placed, names read—but the offenders remained absent. The next question now had to rise: when a society has made its own constitution, is the absence of the rogues a punishment, or the beginning of a new conspiracy?

The roots of the Channa stump stayed faintly warm all night. The children kept watch in turns. Lamplight trembled over the first page of the constitution, while on the final blank page some invisible hand seemed to wait to write: “The name of the absent will also be asked.”

FOLK SONG: THE CONSTITUTION ON A DRY LEAF

Folk tune: Song of the People’s Law

Written, O constitution, written upon a dry leaf,

Before a child’s pen even power stood still.

On the dry leaf its veins became river-roads,

From a child’s pen the Constitution of Names was born.

We will not erase names, we will not sell privacy,

We will not insult the body, we will place no contract on memory.

Thumb, letter, tear—all became seals,

The rogues' empty chairs became a shadow of questions.

*The final page is blank—the names of the absent,
Those who are outside will also be asked by the people's dwelling.*

*The paper is small, the vow deeper than a tree's roots,
Before the children's constitution even power stood still.*

*We will not erase names, we will not sell privacy,
Thumb, letter, tear—all became seals.*

[PHILOSOPHICAL UNDERTONE—NEWS OF A SON'S BIRTH: Chaitra sat despondent. A child seated nearby did not clearly hear the messenger's words, but saw the change that came over him.]

CHAPTER 91

The Absence of the Rogues

The absence of a rogue is also a presence—the empty chair speaks loudest of all.

OPENING FOLK SONG: HEARING IN THE STUMP'S SHADE

Folk tune: Shade-Parati

Sit in the shade, O sit even in its little shade,

The stump has great ears—spread out your story there.

*The tree was cut, the stump remains, its shade may be small,
But in that shade the ears are large; the hearing will not stop.*

*One by one people sit and tell their grief and joy,
The stump's roots keep safe the ancestors' gift.*

*Can a small seat stop justice? No—the heart must stay open,
From one heard voice the bonds of society bloom.
The hearing in the stump's shade sows a seed of hope,
If the roots survive, the dream of a forest will one day be whole.*

*The tree was cut, the shade diminished, the hearing did not,
As each told sorrow and joy, the clouds of the mind cleared.
In the roots the ancestors' blessing, above an open sky,
Even in a little shade can grow the faith of a whole forest.*

Until the pages of the Constitution of Names dried, a strange peace remained around the cut Channa stump. The rules written by the children—we will not erase names, we will not sell privacy, the body will not be humiliated, no contract upon memory—were descending not only onto paper but onto faces. Eyes that had once lowered in fear now read. Tongues once tied by family shame, caste fear, threats of court, fraudulent calls, or bar-room arguments slowly began to open.

The next question surrounded the assembly: should those who had stood at the root of all this suffering be summoned? Batuknath Hariharan, Chandrapal Batra, Raghav Signal Somani, Lau Kin-Hung, Edward Broom—the names seemed caught like thorns along the edge of the paper. Some young men said, “Call them. Expose them before everyone.” Some women said, “No. Why punish the whole gathering by making us look at their faces again?” The children stayed quiet.

Ananya opened the register at Gangesha’s page. When the story of Tattvacintamani had come among the Channa stump, the children had heard the word “absence.” That even what is not there may be known as evidence had remained in their minds. Ananya said, “We will read the names of those who are present. We will also read the absence of those who are not. But we will not give them the stage.”

The decision sounded simple, yet in the history of Channa Grove it was among the hardest. Society often punishes an offender by placing the offender at the centre again. The very person against whom people rise once more covers everyone with the same name, face, statement, defence, and fear. The children had recognized the game. They said, “First place belongs to the names that were killed, drowned, cheated, or chewed. The rogues belong at the edge.”

Aruni said nothing for a long time. The engineer in him wanted a list; the wounded citizen wanted accusations; the father in him understood that justice is not merely showing the offender’s face. Sometimes justice is allowing the injured face to appear without fear for the first time. He accepted the children’s decision.

Satyavrat Mehta sat at the back listening. He had seen no such decision in any court. Courts proceed in the offender’s name—State versus so-and-so, People versus so-and-so, Appeal of so-and-so. Here, for the first time, an assembly was proceeding in the names of the injured. The offenders remained absent, but their absence entered the record. Satyavrat wrote in his notebook: “Proof of absence: when the offenders were not summoned, the victims’ voices grew larger.”

No announcement was needed before the reading of names that day. Sitting at the stump, Ananya said, “Those who have not been invited are absent. Do not fear this absence. This gathering is not for them, but for the wounded names injured because of them.” Then the first family rose. Their son had drowned at the bridge pier. His name was read. The answer came: “Present.”

Far away in the city Batuknath Hariharan sat in his chamber. He was certain Garh Narikel would send an invitation, for without his legal counsel no people’s memory could be permanent. Two speeches lay ready on his desk—one of atonement, the other of institutional structure. But the phone did not ring. No car arrived. No messenger came. His secretary said, “Sir, the program time has passed.” Batuknath looked at his watch. For the first time he understood that some events could happen without him.

Chandrapal Batra kept watching Channa Grove on his phone. The app should have displayed a notice: "Special Live Testimony." But the screen was quiet. The tribute app would not open. He thought someone had blocked him. In truth no one had. The people were holding the assembly with their phones switched off. Chandrapal understood for the first time that the greatest defeat of a net is not the breaking of its password, but the day people no longer feel they need the net at all.

Raghav Signal Somani sat among his silent messages. He thought perhaps there would be an inside exchange—some hint, some code word, some half-sentence like "do it." But no message came. Not even a disappearing one. Complete silence. He could not tell whether it was a technical failure or a social decision. His night without a network awakened again, the night in which messages vanish but memory continues.

Lau Kin-Hung watched the Indian evening from his hotel window. He was told that a local assembly was taking place, but his name had not been read, his donation had not been accepted, and his defence had not been heard. "Placed at the edge," the interpreter said. Lau did not understand at first. In his world, an object at the edge was either dropped or bought. But in Garh Narikel, the edge was punishment—a place where you could see and hear but could not make yourself the centre.

Edward Broom received the news from his adviser. He laughed. "Local emotional politics." But when the report said the gathering had gone on without a stage, funding, branding, or foreign partnership, his laughter stopped. This lay outside his training. The suffering he wanted to turn into a "project" had begun to speak without the project.

At Channa Grove, meanwhile, people did not even use the word "rogue." To curse the offenders was still to centre them. The children said, "Their names will remain on the warning page, not the main page." A black-edged page at the back of the register was opened and headed: "Those because of whom names were wounded." Space was left below. The full names were not written immediately, because the children said, "First write the names of their deeds."

Then words descended onto the page: devouring dates, trafficking in bodies, the screen's snare, the mask of charity, caste arrogance, selective scripture, trade in memory, the crime of silence. Beneath these names of acts, the offenders' names were written in very small letters. Ba looked on and said, "Good. The sin in large letters, the sinner in small. Otherwise the sinner will die and the sin will live under another name."

Saumya trembled at the decision. She understood that this people's justice was not merely emotional; it was subtle. The fine distinctions of Gangesha's Navya-Nyaya had become a social method in the children's hands. Substance and quality, cause and effect, presence and absence—all were descending into the dust around the stump.

Meera asked, “When we do not call them, is that cowardice?” Ananya answered, “No. Their names will be taken when necessary. But today we will not measure our wounds through their eyes. Today we will speak our names with our own mouths.” Meera smiled. It was the same principle she had argued in the right to privacy: the right to be seen must remain with the injured person.

The day declined. The weight of the absent rogues slowly lifted from those present. Families that had once asked, “What if they come?” no longer trembled while reading names. The absence of the offender became the courage of the injured. Ananya wrote: “The absent is not fear, if we are present.”

But the Channa stump never allowed a decision to settle into easy happiness. When the final name was read, a gust rose. The black-edged page turned. The offenders’ names, written in small letters, slipped out of the paper as shadows and fell upon the ground. People saw not names but shadows. The rogues were physically absent, yet their shadows crawled among the stones of names.

The children were frightened. Ananya lifted a stone and set it on a shadow. The shadow moved away. Another child placed another stone. A third said, “The stones bear names; shadows cannot remain on them.” Slowly all the offender-shadows were pushed outside the ring of stones. Old Budhba’s Ghost watched from afar and said nothing. There was approval in his silence.

The assembly ended, but the injured families left their name-stones inside the ring. The rogues remained absent; their shadows stayed caught outside the stones.

Afternoon passed and evening descended, yet from the western edge of the stump a long patch of darkness kept spreading. Everyone asked: the tree is cut, so where does so much shade come from? Had the direction of the sun changed? The cut roots were not high enough to cast such a long shadow. Ba said softly, “This is not the tree’s shade. It is the shade of those absent people who have been kept outside the guard of names.”
